ASPR – Austrian Study Centre for Peace and Conflict Resolution, Vienna, Austria

Description

The lens of formalized political unsettlement asks for pathways in conflict transitions where the radical disagreement at the heart of the conflict cannot be resolved. It questions the idea of conflict resolution on the assumption that power-sharing arrangements in peace agreements may indeed be able to stop violent conflict but, in turn, perpetuate the contestation between the conflict parties. In formalizing the existing political unsettlement, they cannot transform conflict into normal politics as it is often promised. They can, however, tame armed violence and so prepare the ground for creative modes of transitional engagement. Even though they may appear stuck and deadlocked, situations of formalized political unsettlement are fluid and constantly changing. Pathways for structural engagement – “hooks” – can open up and be fostered and utilized for transformational change. Conflict parties and other stakeholders also apply creative nonsolutions to avoid triggering a relapse into violence and keep the transition moving. Peace in formalized political unsettlement is, thus, not built but instead evolves out of a long-term transitional process.

Introduction

Forging “inclusive political settlements” has become a key vision for peacebuilding interventions in armed conflict from the year 2010 onward. For multilateral as well as bilateral actors, predominantly the United Kingdom and Australia, the notion of political settlements rose to prominence as the substitute for the statebuilding agenda that has dominated international engagement in armed conflict since the 1990s. After the projection of formal state structures based on a model of Western liberal statehood to so-called fragile situations broadly failed, the political settlements approach promised a more contextualized pathway for war-to-peace transitions. Questions of how to make a political settlement as inclusive as possible in order to work, thus, developed into major questions for international peace process support. Allegedly, the right sequence of measures, the right composition of parties to a peace process, and the broadest possible representation of stakeholders and interests could trigger a process of formal and informal institutionalization that would enable a sustainable post-conflict framework.

Experiences from past peace processes contradict this assumption. The power-sharing frameworks often put in place by peace agreements rather enshrine the contestation of the conflict instead of resolving it. Transitional frameworks do not pave the way into normal politics but tend to stick, like the Dayton Accord for Bosnia and Herzegovina, as just one example, demonstrates. How is it possible to conceptualize the impact and the achievements of peace agreements while avoiding the sentiment of continuous failure? The Dayton framework may have failed to forge an inclusive political settlement and to provide a transformation into normal politics. It has, however, formalized the political unsettlement at the heart of the conflict in a way that ended the armed contestation by institutionalizing and thus preserving radical (ethno-)political disagreement (Ramsbotham 2017).

While perpetuating radical disagreement is certainly not the outcome many stakeholders are looking for, a transitional approach accepting and working with formalized political unsettlement may still provide a useful lens to conceptualize and engage with conflict transitions. It avoids the overburdening optimism of – and disappointment with – ideal-type notions such as peacebuilding, conflict resolution, or “inclusive political settlements.”

Political Settlements and Power-Sharing

Not the least driven by policy demands for substituting the rigid institution and statebuilding approach that was perceived as failing, political settlement thinking made its way into the mainstream development and peacebuilding debate in the late 2000s. Seminal for this school of thought are the works of Mushtaq Khan. Khan understands political settlements in a Marxist tradition. They would occur “when the distribution of benefits supported by its institutions is consistent with the distribution of power in society” over the longue durée (Khan 2010). Equally influential, especially in development policy circles, became works building on critical insights of new institutional economics (North et al. 2009), which highlight the contextualized and, often, informal character of political institutions (di John and Putzel 2009).

These two attributes of political institutions in transitional processes, contextuality and informality, indeed represent a decisive shift away from traditional statebuilding, which has for long been accused of transferring Western blueprints to transitional post-conflict situations. The political settlements approach offered a viable alternative perspective for structural engagement. In the peacebuilding mainstream, the new framework enabled to rethink the institutionalization aimed for by comprehensive peace agreements and the subsequent peace process. The rationale was not only to forge an elite pact but to place elite actors into a configuration that would enable the (re-)construction of a wider political settlement and, eventually, transit to normal politics (Cheng et al. 2018; Kelsall 2018).

Since political settlement institutionalization cannot rest on formal state institutions alone, contextualized forms of elite bargaining became acceptable for development policy and peacebuilders. However, the emancipatory social agenda related to international peacebuilding would not accept pure elite bargains. For guaranteeing a sustainable transition in the view of most peacebuilding practitioners, therefore, political settlements needed to generate a far-reaching public buy-in. Settlements had to be “inclusive”: “our aim is to promote inclusive settlements that meet public expectations and address the underlying causes of conflict and fragility” (DFID 2010, p. 24; see also Hirblinger and Landau 2020).

Inclusion was and still is perceived by a relevant strand of the contemporary peacebuilding debate as a panacea for overcoming the limitations of peace deals resting on “handshake moments” that only involve a vastly limited number of (mostly male) actors. For turning limited elite peace settlements into sustainable political settlements, “horizontal inclusion” had to increase the number of armed groups and political actors involved in the negotiations, while “vertical inclusion” had to guarantee the active participation of society at large, in particular habitually neglected groups such as women, victims, the youth, or disabled persons.

Contrasting reservations of experienced mediators and diplomats that such an undertaking would make negotiations overcomplex and impossible to handle, creative ways of public participation were developed in the course of peace talks, ranging from regional consultations to online fora. The Colombian FARC negotiations from 2012 to 2016 emerged as the test case of crafting an inclusive political settlement by expanding public participation. Many suggestions and concerns of the population were structurally channeled into the Havana talks, which remained enclosed and limited to the two parties to keep the process efficient. As a result, the most extended comprehensive peace agreement produced so far was drafted by the negotiation teams. However, much to the shock of the negotiators and the international peacebuilding community, the peace agreement subsequently got rejected in a public referendum, bringing to the fore the severe limits of inclusivity.

Contrary to the idealist assumptions of many peacebuilding practitioners and academics, inclusive approaches do not automatically transcend conflicting interests or guarantee majority buy-in for a peace process. Not all political contestations provide an escape in the form of a mutually fertile middle ground. Political settlements, as well, remain tied to power and interests. Expanding the stakeholder base does not make these interests and tensions go away.

Besides the convincing conceptual critique on inclusive peacebuilding (de Waal 2017), it appears predominantly the power dimension of peace talks that limits inclusion's effectiveness. In many instances, even comprehensive peace agreements that address a fair number of public concerns introduce wide-ranging power-sharing frameworks that shape the political institutionalization in conflict transitions. It would be misleading to think of power-sharing between elite actors as exclusive per se. Armed actors are often forced to demonstrate successes and hands-on outcomes in peace negotiations toward their constituencies in order to gain or at least retain legitimacy. In turn, increased public participation does not make the conflict fault lines go away. Depending on the context, increased stakeholder participation can mitigate radical disagreement (Bell 2018). At the same time, it can result in hardened political positions as well.

Introducing Formalized Political Unsettlement

Peace agreements have a limited chance in succeeding to transcend the radical contestation and, thereby, forge a new political settlement. Even if a transformation happens, it is likely because of contextually supportive factors and less because of the agreement itself. More often, the conflict's political contestation is enshrined by power-sharing arrangements that are part and parcel of many negotiated peace deals. The Dayton Accord for Bosnia and Herzegovina is a typical example of a multilevel power-sharing (territorial, political, military) that institutionalizes in the aftermath of the deal. In contrast to ambitions by mediators and peacebuilders, the transitional arrangement produced by the agreement did not trigger a transition to normalized politics. Decades after the accord was signed, Bosnia and Herzegovina's polity is still characterized by the same unsettled framework that in December 1995 has been agreed upon as being transitional.

Several other examples from peace processes across the globe show similar characteristics: multiple peace agreements in the Sudans have led to comparable outcomes, as well as peace processes in Lebanon, Mozambique, Sierra Leone, or the Philippines. While power-sharing arrangements in Northern Ireland and Nepal have been able to provide a path toward normal politics to some extent, the gains remain fragile and contested. Other attempts, such as in Yemen, Libya, Somalia, or CAR, fell apart.

The peacebuilding community and often the broader population living in these countries who must cope with the political, economic, and social consequences of power-sharing tend to perceive such mid- to long-term outcomes as failures. While perfectly reasonable, these sentiments still undervalue that power-sharing arrangements, in many instances, have succeeded in stopping the armed fighting. This is not a small achievement. When the limited traction of inclusivity and the political settlements approach in enabling sustainable conflict transitions threaten to turn into frustration again, a different, more realistic perspective on peace processes becomes necessary.

As it has been discussed, enshrining contestation is not a structural failure or a shortcoming of peace processes. Formalizing a given political unsettlement is often the only option at stake in situations when (re-)constructing a political settlement, especially by means of a unitary constitutional process, remains elusive. Radical disagreement is not just an unfortunate mistake, a temporary misperception, or even foolishness. Conflict parties usually fight for a reason. Such reasons are not necessarily approachable by the attempt to address the "root causes" of a conflict because they are essentially subjective. In a number of conflicts, root causes themselves, or the perception thereof, turn into a major factor in the radical disagreement at hand.

Understanding a peace process outcome not as a political settlement but as a formalized political unsettlement is not without precedence. Neil Walker (2014) has introduced the argument of the beneficial character of constitutional unsettlement using the example of the United Kingdom. Any attempt of sorting this constitutional unsettlement by means of a written constitution, so he argues, would most likely not result in a more stable political settlement but would instead put the UK at risk of becoming torn apart between the divergent interests of its constituent entities. The unsettled but functional arrangement between the UK's main entities – England, Northern Ireland, Scotland, and Wales – requires political room of maneuver. Sorting and normalizing all differences in a fixed, once-and-for-all settled way would force the entities to fall back to radicalized default positions. Permanent renegotiation and informal arrangements in unsettlement may instead provide more flexible avenues to navigate divergent political interests.

Factors Contributing to Formalized Political Unsettlement

Several factors, external as well as internal ones, have aggravated the trend to unsettled conflict transitions in recent years. Apart from growing skepticism of peacebuilders and multilateral and bilateral donor agencies alike, who all started the endeavor of transforming armed conflict very optimistically after the end of the Cold War only to enter a stage of disillusionment (Bell 2015), three trends deserve particular attention:

1. Peace processes become increasingly entrenched in what Thomas Carothers and Oren Samet-Marram (2015) have called a “global marketplace of political change.” The traditional Western donors, peacebuilders, and mediators have lost the purchase of being the only game in town. An increasing range of actors, emergent as well as regional powers, get involved in supporting parties to armed conflicts and brokering peace deals. Consequently, the leverage the “international community” of liberal state actors could rely on in a short period in the 1990s has vanished. Armed conflicts and peace processes see an increasing internationalization, albeit, in most instances, not advanced by the global superpowers but
2. At the same time, armed conflicts themselves tend to regionalize and localize. While peace processes still focus on the national level, statehood in conflict contexts often appears only in fragments and incapable of implementing a peace deal. Power-sharing agreements, in most instances, rest on the premise of sharing a cake that does not (yet) exist. At the same time, oppressive regimes, such as the Assad regime in Syria, seem unwilling to compromise even on superficial arrangements. Instead, they prefer a regional “unsettlement,” also if it implies sacrificing parts of the national territory to opposing actors. Against this background, the perspective of forging national political settlements seems more and more unlikely.
3. Many conflicts experience a blurring into a continuous no-war/no-peace situation. Even comprehensive peace agreements cannot guarantee a transformation into a tenable form of transitional partnership. They must manage existing tensions and formalize an arrangement that, at the minimum, stops the worst armed fighting. Conflicts in DRC, Somalia, South Sudan, or Myanmar show a complex mesh of different conflicts in which clear fault lines and main actors are difficult to distinguish. These situations show remarkable resilience, a “stable instability” (Verweijen 2016; Perera 2017). Conflict only exists in a blurred plurality; it is open, undefined, and nonlocalized. In such contexts, unitary settlements are unlikely to occur. Even the formalization of political unsettlement is an incredibly challenging task and, in many instances, would be welcomed by most internal and external actors.

Characteristics of Formalized Political Unsettlement

The notion of “formalized political unsettlement” has not been developed as an analytical tool. It aims to provide a lens that offers a different perspective on the long-lasting, enduring transitions from armed conflict. Nevertheless, situations of formalized political unsettlement share some overarching characteristics which will be discussed in the following (see also Bell and Pospisil 2017).

First, formalized political unsettlement contains rather than resolves conflict and its main fault lines. It essentially represents a non-resolution to a conflict. It is not an unconditional compromise but a managed pathway of non-compromising while, at the same time, preventing parties to revert to their default positions. Formalized political unsettlement establishes a dialectical situation of neither/nor: neither are the parties incentivized to overcome their confrontational positions nor are they forced to rely on them entirely. They need to compromise on imposing their default positions while upholding them politically. The tension between pragmatic politics and radical claims enables the managed and, ideally, formalized way of conflict transitions.

Second, deriving from the permanently managed character between radically disagreeing positions, situations of formalized political unsettlement are institutionally fluid and turbulent. At the same time, they are sticky and durable. Formalized political unsettlement represents a broader perspective on a situation Alex de Waal has fittingly described with an often-heard joke among international observers about Sudanese political life: “it changes from week to week, but if you come back after ten years it is exactly the same” (de Waal 2015, p. 17). What static or resolution-oriented approaches tend to neglect is that both sides need each other: the durability and stickiness of formalization and institutionalization cannot exist without the fluidity and turbulence caused by the political unsettlement and vice versa. Therefore, formalized political unsettlement is difficult to transform or to overcome.

Third, formalized political unsettlement contains a hybrid institutional space situated between and incorporating both substance and process. This hybridity derives from the highlighted dialectic relationship between fluidity and turbulence and institutional formalization and stickiness. Formalized political unsettlement attempts the irresolvable task of establishing a unitary polity without the political agreement to do so. It is through this continuously rejected claim that the formalization evolves and progresses. The agreement between the conflict parties is precisely on their disagreement. Just as in conflict, disagreement appears as the predominant connecting factor. The formalized agreement on radical disagreement can only occur in a constantly managed process of which it becomes the primary substance.

Fourth, formalized political unsettlement is characterized by its specific nonlocal dimension. It is “glocalized,” incorporating international, regional, national, and local actors and their discourses. They all overlap and even appear interchangeably as one another depending on situation and context. Formalized political unsettlement is nonlocalizable. It occurs in peace processes happening at various peace process “levels,” relying on an assemblage of comprehensive national peace agreements, traditional methods of conflict management at the local level, and everything in between. It integrates all these “levels,” both building on and triggering them and yet, by doing so, renders stratification impossible.

Modes of Transitional Practice and Engagement

Considering these four characteristics, formalized political unsettlement appears as a complex constellation that cannot be grasped by sequencing and spatial hierarchization. Its characteristics explain why traditional types of peace- and statebuilding analyses and intervention often result in what is perceived as a failure. However, for supporting to bring about better modes of engagement in conflict transitions, the perception of failure needs to be further disaggregated. As already highlighted, misguided visions, aims, and expectations are often the primary reason for such sentiments. The main benefit of constellations of formalized political unsettlement is that, by relying on power-sharing arrangements or related types of constructions, armed conflict can indeed be stopped and transferred into less violent politics of radical disagreement. Although this might resemble of what Michel Foucault (2003), in paraphrasing Clausewitz, has called “politics as the continuation of war with other means”, formalized political unsettlement still represents a significant change in the living conditions of a large part of the population. Few would think of formalized political unsettlement as peace, but it is certainly preferable to war.

Along with the required adjustment of aims, approaches and methods of transitional engagement can profit from taking the characteristics of formalized political unsettlement into account when designing interventions. Textbook-style peacebuilding interventions understanding peace processes as sequenced transitions that progress from ceasefires over comprehensive peace agreements toward constitutional processes and, eventually, normalized politics. Established peace process “package deals” such as disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR), security sector reform (SSR), or transitional justice are substantially limited in facilitating transitional progress. Instead, the outcomes in situations of formalized political unsettlement, in most instances, are contradictory, unforeseeable, and, considering the initial aims, unsatisfactory. Being an essential part of the formalized fundamental contestation between parties, these procedures will always turn into modalities of political power play.

Formalized political unsettlement invites to rethink the modalities of engagement and external intervention in conflict transitions in a way that questions the focus on solutions and their orientation on so-called best practices. However disappointing, the acceptance of the incomplete and procedural character of transitional processes is pivotal. Recent works (Pospisil 2019; de Waal et al. 2019) have explored several existing practices of usefully maneuvering formalized political unsettlement.

A critical assessment of interventions in formalized political unsettlement invites to accept a new perspective of what is implemented or supported. Contemporary peacebuilding rationalizes institutional setups that it implements based on success or failure. Does a certain stipulation work, has it been adequately implemented? Such reasoning is deeply entrenched in the linear logic of sequencing. It neglects that conflict transitions do not simply progress.

In contrast to solution-based approaches, institutions, concrete structural setups, as well as legal or normative frameworks as foreseen in peace agreements may be interpreted as “hooks.” Such hooks may have a role to play, they may become critical in a transitional process, or they may not. It is impossible to know beforehand, at the time these measures are negotiated and inscribed in agreements, whether they will turn into real levers for change. The complexity of transitional processes in a conflict mesh entails the impossibility to accurately project the future role of particular measures and institutions. Therefore, measuring success only in terms of implementation and outcome, and not in potentialities, can result in short-sighted and limited assessments.

Other modes of navigating conflict transitions evolve out of the contextual surroundings and fundamentally contradict the Western action-oriented approaches. Some of these modalities creatively play with time and space. They intrinsically accept transitions as a long-term project. One practice that directly challenges the predominance of the implementation paradigm is the enduring postponement of contractual obligations that may take the form of “creative nonsolutions” (Pospisil 2019, pp. 127–164). Such nonsolutions can occur in relation to referenda foreseen in peace agreements: the postponement or even cancelation of referenda, habitually condemned and bemoaned by international stakeholders, is indeed common practice. Not even a fifth of the referenda stipulated in peace agreements are held (more or less) on time.

Resolution- and implementation-based logics interpret delays as structural problems. They might be the exact opposite. The Comprehensive Peace Agreement between Sudan and now independent South Sudan did foresee a referendum on the status of Abyei, a region that remained contested between both states ever since the beginning of the peace negotiations. This referendum should have been held at the day of the South Sudanese independence referendum but was postponed indefinitely since then. The postponement enabled both sides to uphold their claim on the territory and, by doing so, to satisfy the expectations of their local constituencies. Would the referendum have been held, the losing side would have come under immediate pressure not to accept the result and act decisively against the opponents – or people in the region themselves would do so. In contrast to textbook peace process knowledge, the chances are that the implementation of the referendum would likely trigger a war between the two countries, whereas a permanent postponement enables a creative management of tensions that does not hamper the broader transitional process.

Alex de Waal and others (2019) have referred to the traditional Sudanese negotiation method of “tajility,” the strategic politics of delay. Instead of falling into the paradigm of acting, political negotiations in the Sudanese context often turn into a waiting game, usually to the frustration of external observers. Interpreting this waiting game as the unwillingness to settle or pure ignorance would be a severe misperception. In contrast, the ability to wait can be seen as a powerful action, whereby such power can only come to the fore in political configurations favorable to political non-closure, such as formalized political unsettling. Western peacebuilders tend to dismiss “tajility” as counterproductive to conflict resolution. But, as another saying in the Sudanese context goes, “you have the clock, and we have the time.” In a transitional perspective focused on the long term, this approach might have considerable advantages compared to the often short-sighted implementation paradigm.

Formalized political unsettling, as well, challenges the liberal relationism of contemporary peacebuilding: for peace to work, everybody and everything needs to be connected and included. Such a perspective neglects the opportunities embedded in disaggregation, disrelation, and, in the last instance, ignorance. Contemporary armed conflict rarely is an event unfolding between large standing armies, perhaps even after a formal declaration of warfare. It more resembles the weather. Armed fighting comes and goes; clouds develop locally, along with showers, hurricanes, and the occasional sunshine. In these conditions, it appears odd that peace processes predominantly focus on the national level. While it may be possible to resolve armed conflict along major fault lines, the perspective of conflict disaggregation, the disintegration of the conflict system, and a disrelation of contesting actors seem an equally likely perspective.

While the formalization of the political contestation between major parties to an armed conflict is a structural component of formalized political unsettling, the lens still provides considerable space for non-understanding, ignorance, and disrelation. Despite going against the deep structure of liberal peace that fundamentally rests on agreement and understanding, these elements have an intrinsic peaceful quality that is ignored all too often. For example, it is worth thinking about separating the ideas of demos (the people), polis (the political community), and territory and the ways in which these elements can be disaggregated to provide creative ways to address radical disagreement in innovative constitutional frameworks. This may require understanding post-conflict polities to function as “disrelated communities” who navigate their coexistence, rather than unified polities working based on a unitary social contract.

Summary

Formalized political unsettling is a likely outcome of peace processes. It enshrines instead of resolves the radical disagreement between the conflict parties. Irrespective of how the concrete methods of transition support might look like, navigating formalized political unsettling requires overcoming the traditional conflict resolution paradigm. It favors a rationale that emphasizes process over outcomes and the acceptance of long-term transitions over resolution-based outcomes. It is an invitation to work with the grain of conflict transitions, in full acceptance of the challenging trade-offs such an approach implies.

The likelihood of failure and the unpredictability of success point toward pragmatic approaches in which the concrete goals of a transformative intervention emerge in the course of action. By no means, however, pragmatism translates into an “anything goes.” In contrast, a clear orientation based on a robust and transparent normative framework can provide guidance for actors engaging in such contexts. These two aspects – pragmatically mitigating transitions based on a well-communicated normative framework – taken together form the foundational pillars of a “principled pragmatism” in conflict transitions. This approach must accept the risk – and even likelihood – that engagement falls short of expectations. Especially in these circumstances, a principled approach is vital. Norms are always instantiated locally and incrementally, and more importantly, they are given their content through practice, rather than encapsulating static commands to behave in a certain way.

Formalized political unsettlement is a configuration difficult to like, neither for peacebuilders nor for the people having to live in such surroundings. Yet, they are able to tame armed violence and are often the only tangible results of peace negotiations in situations of radical disagreement. In many cases, agreeing on a power-sharing arrangement that formalizes and institutionalizes political unsettlement instead of aiming to resolve the underlying political conflict is simply the only deal available at the negotiating table. Against this background, formalized political unsettlement offers a humble perspective that contrasts the optimistic and visionary assumptions of liberal peacebuilding, in particular an accountable and functional state based on the rule of law. Nevertheless, if functional statehood and the creation of a unitary polity are no feasible outcomes, alternative models of designing and evaluating transitional efforts are required. Not achieving the gold standard of liberal peacebuilding does not equal failure. What many critiques of liberal peacebuilding often tend to overlook, however, is that the alternative to the liberal ideal is not necessarily better. Often, it is the reality of hard and pragmatic choices and the need to take risks to make transitions work and to create openings and opportunities for sustainable change.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace after Conflict
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

Acknowledgements This work was supported by the UK Foreign, Commonwealth and Development Office under Grant PO 6663 (Political Settlements Research Programme).

References

- Bell, C. (2015). What we talk about when we talk about political settlements: Towards inclusive and open political settlements in an era of disillusionment (PSRP Working Paper No. 1). Edinburgh: Global Justice Academy, University of Edinburgh.
- Bell, C. (2018). Political power-sharing and inclusion: Peace and transition processes (PA-X Report: Power-Sharing Series). Edinburgh: University of Edinburgh, Political Settlements Research Programme.
- Bell, C., & Pospisil, J. (2017). Navigating inclusion in transitions from conflict: The formalized political unsettlement. Journal of International Development, 29(5), 576–593.
- Carothers, T., & Samet-Marram, O. (2015). The new global marketplace of political change. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Cheng, C., Goodhand, J., & Meehan, P. (2018). Synthesis paper: Securing and sustaining elite bargains that reduce violent conflict. London: UK Stabilization Unit.
- de Waal, A. (2015). The real politics of the horn of Africa: Money, war and the business of power. Cambridge, UK: Polity Press.
- de Waal, A. (2017). Inclusion in peacemaking: From moral claim to political fact. In P. Aall & C. A. Crocker (Eds.), The fabric of peace in Africa: Looking beyond the state (pp. 165–186). Waterloo: Centre for International Governance Innovation.
- de Waal, A., Boswell, A., Deng, D., Ibreck, R., Benson, M., & Pospisil, J. (2019). South Sudan: The politics of delay (CRP/PSRP Memo). London: London School of Economics and Political Science.
- DFID – Department for International Development. (2010). Building peaceful states and societies (A DFID Practice Paper). London: DFID.
- Di John, J., & Putzel, J. (2009). Political settlements (GSDRC Issues Paper). Birmingham: Governance and Social Development Resource Centre.
- Foucault, M. (2003). Society must be defended: Lectures at the college de France, 1975–1976. New York: Picador.

- Hirblinger, A. T., & Landau, D. M. (2020). Daring to differ? Strategies of inclusion in peacemaking. Security Dialogue. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010619893227>.
- Kelsall, T. (2018). Towards a universal political settlement concept: A response to Mushtaq Khan. African Affairs, 117(469), 656–669.
- Khan, M. H. (2010). Political settlements and the governance of growth-enhancing institutions (Unpublished Draft Paper). Version July 2010.
- North, D. C., Wallis, J. J., & Weingast, B. R. (2009). Violence and social orders a conceptual framework for interpreting recorded human history. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Perera, S. (2017). Burning the tent down: Violent political settlements in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Journal of International Development, 29(5), 628–644.
- Pospisil, J. (2019). Peace in political unsettlement: Beyond solving conflict. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ramsbotham, O. (2017). When conflict resolution fails. Cambridge, MA: Polity Press.
- Verweijen, J. (2016). Stable instability: Political settlements and armed groups in the Congo. London: RVI Usalama Project, Political Settlements Research Programme.
- Walker, N. (2014). Our constitutional unsettlement. Public Law, 7, 529–548.

Peace Architecture

- ▶ Peace Infrastructures

Peace Art

- ▶ Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation

Peace Communities

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Peace Community

- ▶ Zones of Peace

Peace Deal

- ▶ In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda

Peace Diplomacy

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Peace Formation

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester, Department of Politics,
Manchester, UK

Introduction

The concept of peace formation represents an endeavour to move the debate from conflict management, resolution, transformation, and peacebuilding onwards towards the perspective of peace at the local level of agency, frameworks such as hybridity, and scales such as the everyday (Mitrany 1944; Galtung 1969; Burton 1969; Lederach 1997; Paris 2004; Richmond 2005, 2011; Jabri 2007; Aggestam and Björkdahl 2012). This is a challenge to long-standing thinking about the nature of the state and international order (Huntington 1968) in that it implies that peaceful political communities are formed through internal but networked and relational processes of legitimation, rather than state-level or international process. Yet, simultaneously, state- and international-level processes block or circumvent such peace formation.

Drawing on critical interests particularly in local agency, resistance and hybridity in IR, and the more recent turns to local ownership, micro-politics, networks, and practice debates, as well as post-structuralist interests particularly in power formations and the positive potential and limits of ‘peace formation’, points towards concepts of social and global justice. It extends the arguments often made by those working in the areas of conflict transformation or peacebuilding into a newer, interdisciplinary and more comparative, trans-scalar, and networked conceptual framework. It tends to be a bottom-up, intensely networked, and mobile phenomena. Peace formation lies parallel to, in opposition to, or alternatively formative of a different type of state and international. It connects this alternative theory of order formation with critical debates surrounding international relations (IR) theory, with implications for governance and the creation of stable and peaceful orders. It does so through an eirenist and critical approach (Richmond 2009), which is also salutary in that its conclusions point to the significant limits of such locally and everyday oriented approaches to the development of post-conflict frameworks for political community.

The Nature of Peace Formation

Peace formation operates in local contexts, cultural, social, economic, and political spaces, and increasingly influences the state and international institutions. These ‘local’ processes provide contextual and social legitimacy and cannot be imposed externally (Foucault 1980; Foucault et al. 2003). They seek to determine the terms of emancipation for the community, polis, and eventually for the state. This has also historically given rise, via hegemonic states, to both regional and international organisation and shaped international law and markets. Private transcripts inherent in peace formation are often networked and multiplied locally and transnationally, through civil society, customary governance, and conflict resolution processes. They may arise in family networks and in professional or social networks; they may be hidden or public. In some cases, they move into the terrain of the state, shaping and modifying institutional processes, governance, and law. They often become internationally connected, through INGOs, the UN system, donors, or family, social, cultural, or labour networks or other forms of association. These processes are often based upon pre-existing traditions, institutions, or norms that have often been targeted in wartime but recover afterwards. They represent significant constituencies and a perspective that spans local, regional, and global historical, material, and social constraints and possibilities. Much of this operates within the older, analogue epistemologies of order, focusing on human interactions, thought organisations and institutions, law, and association.

Peace formation provides a complex positionality through which to understand the realities of the multiple, ongoing attempts to rebuild peaceful social orders. There are two sides to this development. On the one hand, and from a small base, peace formation can be seen in examples of ‘embedded, participatory, and communitarian’ spaces, in which local and international governance and assistance can converge sensitively; on the other hand, they may be seen as creating spaces of parallelism, self-help, and abandonment, where neither the state nor internationals care to tread (Luckham and Kirk 2013).

Thus, peace formation offers contextualised, networked agency in support of progressive forms of self-determination, political, social, economic, and cultural rights. It transcends the modern state framework, the norms of liberal peace, and the global political economy. It draws on already existing social capacity, but it is also creative and innovative. Autonomy and human security, networks and associations, and formal and informal are vital for any peace. The more of them there are, the better the mobilisation of local agency, and the more legitimate and the more stable the peace. In recent times, such agency has shifted into a ‘digital’ form, able to transcend the usual constraints of sovereignty (authority, territory, distance, power, and knowledge constraints) through networks, mobility, and access to enormous amounts of information upon which to make political calculations. Peace formation may indicate a capacity to bridge the old analogue international order with new digital forms of peace (also partly as a response to the ways in which new technologies have also become agents of violence).

These peace formation processes – an assemblage of local, state, transnational, international and transversal, formal and informal ‘peace’ processes with a heavy emphasis on the bottom-up perspective – constitute a widening pool of political subjects. They maintain a memory of historical peace practices and institutions related to custom, culture, identity, religion, or western norms of human rights and representation. They may seek to influence and hold government to account, seek international support to modernise and expand their practices, and set an example to wider society. They slowly insert contextual modes of politics into institution-building processes and legal and constitutional frameworks and influence donors and other international actors. This implies that a local-to-global coalition of actors is required so that a broader legitimacy can emerge. Yet, local reconciliation and sustainability appear more feasible, if legitimacy emanates from local agreements and processes (not only at the elite or national level). What is important is the way in which, in a minor register, peace formation agency tries to navigate, with varying degrees of success, around power and political deadlock and whether international processes engage with and support it. It indicates how power is relational and so can be rejected or modified even from a subaltern position. Peace formation thus endeavours to maintain everyday life where it can. Without it, internationals distribute material and epistemic resources as a simulacra of peace or the state operates in an authoritarian mode. With it, the political order may become more representative and also receive guidance for its policies, practices, and institutions. Peace formation offers limited material support and sometimes goes as far as establishing parallel institutions that provide public services. Sometimes they managed to insert themselves into the state formation process, becoming a form of peace infrastructure (OdenDaal 2013).

They have not only emerged from direct resistance but a result of quiet perseverance in view of entrenched and dangerous power structures, drawing on critical social practices. It does so carefully because such ‘peace work’ entails costs, risks, and sanctions aimed at those who take part. This is because peace often threatens local ethnonationalism, patriarchy, and economic and political practices which maintain conflict, political authority, and forms of power. Every engagement peace formation dynamics and networks have with direct, structural, and governmental power inherent in conflict structures puts peace formation at risk of co-optation or complete negation.

Participatory and decentralised systems of democracy assume local agency should not be blocked (see, e.g. (Harvey 1988)). Peace formation agency is one of the several foundations of a legitimate and emancipatory peace (along with the representative state and the international system of law, norms, and institutions) that have emerged from history so far. It is aimed at mitigating direct, structural, and governmental power in favour of the complex subaltern, deemed the font of legitimate political authority. It offers the pragmatic point that subjects of violence and power relations can identify these relations best and probably spent a lot of time thinking about what to do about them.

The positionality of peace formation is complex, because it has to balance local legitimacy, identity, resource inequality, and historical positionality with modernisation and liberal theories backed by global institutions – expert knowledge in other words (Mitchell 2001). It is scalar, networked, and mobile rather than fixed in a territorial space. It is also pitted against the historical accumulation of power and always operates in reaction to violence, even though it remains permanently in the background working towards peace. Time and time again, peace actors and networks speak to these problems and have found ways of allowing such differences to coexist in transformative ways, entwining them together: ethnonationalism, pluralism, and liberalism in Cyprus, Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), or Kosovo; custom and indigeneity, self-determination, and the modern state in Timor, Colombia, or Afghanistan; in all cases, religion, material needs, and the modern political economy; and yet more elements. Local agency sits agonistically between context and structure in a postcolonial world of hybridity. Thus, peace formation requires an ‘ethics of the local’: how conflict is caused, how it affects everyday life, how it may be dealt with in context in a positive manner, and how this is related to state and international order, increasing not just in analogue form but also now networked, transversal and trans-scalar, and digital. This may also require an ethics associated with new digital dynamics. It points to broad questions of justice, resource distribution, and the need for empathy and localised as well as transnational legitimacy. Peace formation may be the basis for legitimacy of any polity aimed at an emancipatory and positive hybrid peace. It transcends power relations at the state-level and international frameworks for peace but is also closely connected to both (Nadarajah and Rampton 2015). It is the basis of concepts such as bottom-up peacebuilding, peace infrastructures, and local agency for peace, and it should be closely connected to external processes such as conflict resolution, transformation, peacebuilding, and state-building: indeed, it should guide them, as it often has in the production of hybrid forms of political order (Boege et al. 2009).

Within localised political, cultural, gender, identity, and socio-economic, stratifications, power structures are often based upon discrimination and inequality and their long-term maintenance. This means that any local peace is often negative and relatively unstable. This also means that peace formation groups are often working against the majority in their own contexts, as well as not being fully in line with the goals and preferences of international donors nor are able to move fully into the open because of security concerns. Both local and international actors, being increasingly aware of the hybridity of the peace framework that emerges from their mutual projects of peace, are also aware that this is a peace in negative hybrid form (Richmond 2015). Thus, in lieu of earlier theories of the social contract, legitimate authority, and state formation, peace formation foregrounds the question of what peace actors perceive as emancipatory, how they attempt to constitute an alternative order, as well the limitations on their capacity to do so. Peace formation is a rapidly evolving and very subtle phenomena, travelling along a path that might be familiar to scholars from post- or critical development studies (Escobar 2008), but also other, perhaps, more liberal thinkers such as Rawls, Habermas, and Nussbaum might recognise it (Rawls 1993; Habermas, 2001; Nussbaum 2011).

Local Agents of Peace Formation

To understand the local agents of peace formation and their role, we have to comprehend subaltern power, the importance of the local scale in terms of knowledge and legitimacy, their transversal and transnational networks and mobility, and also the marginal nature of peace formers in relation to existing international and local power structures. So, local authorities, peace networks, and advocates of reform situated in the cultural and material context of a specific context provide crucial signals as to how peace and order can be reconstructed. Yet, quite often their messages challenge existing power structures, such as elites, the state, and internationals, and take a long time to percolate through. Peace formation arises nearly always after the event of war and, yet, is an intergenerational background phenomenon. Peace formation dynamics and actors offer a cultural and ethical site of knowledge about peace and order, which may be translated through tactical and critical agency into political reform. Local or 'organic' intellectuals; activists and advocates; some policymakers, politicians, and bureaucrats; some professionals; and social, cultural, religious, identity, labour, and leisure networks for everyday associations provide a three-dimensional vision of peace and order. Often this is deterritorialised, transnational, and transversal, aimed at an emancipatory and empathetic form of peace. Historically such networks, movements, and everyday forms of mobilisation drive towards this. Peace formation offers a historical and social positionality necessary for local-scale legitimacy. It increases in scale over time after violence stops – and as networks and institutions are built – but peace formers also want autonomy, introducing a dangerous contradiction into the equation between peace and power. Peace formation spans politics, economics, culture, and identity into emotional and creative areas, bridging difference, where power structures and social, political, economic, cultural, and territorial systems accentuate difference as a zero-sum process or at best an ugly hierarchy (or 'balance'). It is connected to emerging non-Eurocentric thought on global justice (in environmental, security, gender, historical, and distributive forms, amongst others). Peace formation's new digital capacity expands the rights claims it can make, disguises it, speeds it up, and extends its reach, although it also now confronts the forms of violence new technologies produce.

Mitigating the Violence of Local State Formation

Conflict, war, and other forms of violence are mitigated by social, legal, and political institutions and mechanisms in society. However, peace formation is seriously disrupted by violence, and, though it works in the long term and in the background, it also requires time to reconstitute after violence. Furthermore, it is often aimed at combating the 'last war' rather than the next. However, it leads to the possibility that a networked polity, with internal power, exists in society before (or in spite of) the state, which is aimed at maintaining order and responds to expectations for progressive reform, albeit in limited ways [see, e.g. a similar argument about the EU in Beck and Grande (2007)]. This partly represents what may be called the 'undercommons' of peace formation (hidden away from the worst excesses of violence but also spanning a much longer time frame), aimed in part at dealing with local power structures, as well as the newer exclusions that are arising from the contemporary neoliberal global order (Haiven and Khasnabish 2014, pp. 12, 44). In this way peace formation has something in common with new social movement theories. Social actors negotiate their own peace, drawing on long-standing, quiet forms of legitimacy and legitimate authority, displaying some albeit limited agency, even over direct and structural power and certainly against governmental power. In most cases, such organisations use external concepts such as development, human rights, human security, and democracy upon which to pin their claims. Often less visible is their valorisation of mediated identity and their critiques of the inequities of the international system, both past (colonialism) and present (neoliberalism and Eurocentrism).

Indeed, peace formation is one of the multiple and entwined historical roots of the state, albeit rarely recognised by elites or internationals, who focus on power and its more negative foundations. Its role has been to balance the state's excesses of power and maintain an emancipatory project both through and despite the state (Chowdhury and Duvall 2014, p. 218). Peace formation's aim is to expand the possibilities for peaceful everyday life, requiring both transformation and cooperation, and a retreat from a methodological exclusion often embedded in practices of power and intervention. Context empowers such agency, even if it cannot countermand structural, direct, or governmental power.

Peace formers often work for themselves and their own, local but also often networked, transnational and/or transversal communities, in ways that they had defined, and are confident of a slow and hidden multiplier effect emanating from their efforts (personal communication, Balkan Sunflower 2014). They also form networks of their own, sometimes whilst also formally working for international organisation or NGOs.

Across large parts of the developing and conflict-affected world, it is a normal part of life for citizens to operate in different modes of politics, informal and formal institutions, law, and identity, simultaneously. What has also become clear is that locally sited systems of legitimate authority need to be mirrored by the state, if any peace system constructed around statehood is also to have internal and international legitimacy. This raises some obvious issues, already noted across the literature, including the self-defeating nature of territorialism, the prioritisation of elections (though democratisation is a demand emerging broadly from peace formation), and a need to invest in public services in a comprehensive fashion, particularly in education, health, and income support. Inequalities, often the basis of conflict, cannot be dealt with without an active state, supported by international donors, in such areas. Nevertheless, this means cutting across local power structures and having a strong international consensus, both of which are difficult and fleeting.

This means that peace formation is a slow process, which builds upon a number of different and sometimes contradictory systems: the move towards regional integration and international law and global governance (i.e. the liberal international order) is certainly one key aspect, in a formative international community. The reform of the state away from its earlier clash of power and interests into a more social form is another key aspect. But there is also an underground dimension which signifies a different type of political community, which is both more autonomous and, yet, far more relational, across time and space, and may not be solely directed towards state reform or international links (especially in the newer digital format). Peace formation seems to be a slow and quiet process of reform, reconciliation, respect, and institutional development, rather than a revolutionary process of state or international restructuring. It also appears to be discordant with modern state and international processes, at least superficially, raising concerns that any engagement with peace formation will constitute neocolonialism. This is a paradox relating to the problem of how subaltern claims become politically salient in relation to existing power structures, without being co-opted. Both are inevitably mediated, but co-optation is unlikely, given these are peace formation rather than state formation forces (i.e. driven by principles rather than material aims). This process is far from a simple dynamic of domination and submission.

In this way, at times peace formation may be open to the criticism that it maintains or merely tweaks a painful and unjust status quo (as in BiH or Israel/Palestine) or is eventually co-opted into the formal power structures of the state without significantly changing them (as in the case of many peace infrastructures) or leads to isolation (as with the inter-communal groups in Cyprus) or a dangerous parallelism in political order, which threatens the stability of the state, if it does not reform to incorporate them (as in Timor Leste). At the same time, it is clear that in every one of these examples, the constituent actors and networks in the peace formation process resolve issues and make some political space for discussions about the nature of peace. In everyday terms, one might say that for as long as they survive, a successful peace process already exists.

Nevertheless, one major problem with peace formation is how easily extinguishable it is, or how easily it may drop from view. These dynamics – disappearing to escape sanction and being disrupted or ended by conflict actors – are where the praxis of intervention for humanitarians, development specialists, the various programmers of liberal peacebuilding, and, in some cases, peacekeeping forces might be reframed.

Peace formation may be stifled by clientelism and neopatrimonialism, which is not in favour of reform. In some cases, however, it appears that peace formation actors are able to mitigate such dynamics even with minimal resources. They may do so within the very same normative or social network that clientelism uses. Dependent upon a deep understanding of local politics, this highlights the need to let local actors take the lead in discursive terms, even if the power required to stop war and make space for diplomacy, mediation, negotiation, and reconciliation (intervention in other words) must come from outside of the conflict-affected areas.

Encounters with Local Actors

Justice at local and international levels in general terms is highlighted by a peace formation positionality. Yet, it also points to the limits of liberal global justice accounts (Shapcott 2018) and the insertion of alternative traditions. Neoliberalism is widely critiqued by peace formation actors, who argue that it creates significant tensions in a peace process, where political and human rights, and justice, are deemed to be key to addressing the roots of a conflict and to building viable and legitimate institutions. Furthermore, any peace process creates new demands for a wider social justice, because of the legitimacy of the agency of local actors, even if long latent.

The peace dividend is found in the recommencement and mutual negotiation of improvements in patterns of everyday life disrupted by the conflict. Whilst peace formation offers a progressive rethinking of peace, rights, class, gender, and resource distribution, the state often is controlled by elites who block progress, indirectly utilising the resources that internationals provide them with. From this arises resistance towards pathway dependency, one-size-fits-all blueprints, standard operating procedures, and postcolonial and anti-colonial narratives about intervention. From here also arises the tendency of peace formation to adopt a parallel track, which challenges the state's claims to have become domesticated and oriented towards the interests, rights, and needs of citizens. Parallel track peace formation may also be forced underground in order to survive state or elite repression, to recuperate enough capacity and develop (analogue and digital) tactics aimed at reshaping the state through localised strategies or international alliances.

Peace formation implies a postcolonial version of peacebuilding and state-building, which means that its current economic and normative underpinnings need to be expanded, as does their conception of the relationship between society and legitimacy. Peace formation implies concern about inequality in material, gender, and identity terms, as well as with solidarity and empathy. The bottom-up drives the formation of legitimate authority, if it emerges from peace formation, which will be hybridised and relational, depending upon complex transversal and transnational networks. The subaltern power exercised by peace formation makes the replacement of the direct, structural, or governmental power of powerful elites or international actors unlikely. The dynamics of insurgency, critical agency and the subaltern, resistance, and alterity point to the doggedness of 'resistant subjectivities' and 'subjugated knowledges' and their focus on peace in everyday life. They all make emancipatory claims, but at best all the examples in existence – Timor Leste, Cyprus, Kosovo, Bosnia, Sierra Leone, Afghanistan, and others – point to the emergence of a negative, hybrid form of peace.

Hybrid political orders are a more significant sign of the capacity of peace formation processes and actors to nudge or reshape power structures, either at the elite level or those associated with liberal peacebuilding. What tends to arise is a blend of different forms of political authority, connecting peace formation to existing elite power structures, civil society, the state, the international peace architecture, as well as the global economy. A new struggle for dominance of political order in these terms emerges and, in recent times, has been dominated by an alliance between capital and elite power, with peace formation operating from a parallel track, which nevertheless impinges upon the evolution of the state (as might be clearly seen in cases such as Timor Leste, Cambodia, or Kosovo in very different ways).

How Successful Have Peace Formation Strategies Been?

Four main possibilities emerge for peace formation dynamics.

- (i) They survive in the informal shadows, away from the risks of crossing powerful actors (as in Kosovo before 1999, where services and self-determination circulated away from the gaze of formal authorities), and avoid the risks of moving into public space.
- (ii) They move in the public space and take this risk (as in Cyprus, where the inter-communal movement stepped out of the shadows with international support in the early 2000s), but they also adopt the liberal peace/neoliberal state international architecture and accept their (lowly) place in the current international hierarchy and system but without any right or capacity to change it (as perhaps also in Kosovo, Bosnia, or Colombia).
- (iii) They may try to choose only the positive aspects of the liberal peace system and discard the rest (though there are no real examples of this).
- (iv) They may build a hybrid system, in which they have some greater stake in the whole, whilst also recognising power relations (as in Timor Leste, Somalia, Somaliland, and others).

These different dynamics indicate that peace formation plays a role in building order, different in every case. This is success of sorts.

Peace formation uncovers conflict-sustaining inequality and, at least in discursive terms, indicates the existence of a small but growing network of plural and micro-solidarities: it highlights relationality, bridging, and translation claims for pluriversality, equaliberty, heterotopias, trans-scalarity, and transculturalism. It rescues such dynamics from the past or manufactures them for the future, focusing on their transnational, cultural, and social legitimacy. For many reasons, on paper a positive hybrid peace may thus be imagined.

Peace Formation Strategies

Contextual knowledge is of great tactical value in maintaining peace formation against local- and state-level conflict and against inappropriate international blueprints or involvement. It has little capacity against direct violence or war, but it provides pathways through insecurity. It also provides some defence against unrepresentative global governance, though it has little capacity against predatory aspects of global capitalism. Clearly, any legitimate peace and order is unsustainable without the support of subaltern or critical agency and society in general (other than through structural or, perhaps, governmental power). Peace formation provides a social form of governance, often without formal government. The peace and state that emerges from this process is likely to be contingent, fragmented, decentralised, and capable of supporting peaceful alterity (Axtmann 2004, p. 259) discursively, if not in practice. Though it cannot respond to direct, structural, or governmental forms of violence, it can work on their delegitimisation, digital methods appearing very effective here. It also connects with the emancipatory wing of liberal thought, hybrid notions of law and transitional justice, participatory democracy, human rights, context and dignity, poverty, lack of resources and facilities, and inequality. Concepts, such as local ownership, participation, responsibility to protect, sustainability, and ‘do no harm’, have emerged because of it, pointing to more critical, postcolonial, or anti-colonial dimensions. Hybrid approaches to decentralised governance and law, involving local leaders and processes, have also been recognised as important because of it. Expanding rights claims have cascaded from the local scale upwards as a result.

Peace formation and its informal critical agencies as well as its collective political mobilisation dynamics from within civil society may do little more than mitigate everyday life in material terms, but in the longer term it may be able to move into the open and begin to connect with and shape the state as well as influence donor strategy. It may develop informal governance without a state, following trans-scalar and transversal networks.

Four key strategies emerge from this analysis. This confluence may start with parallelism (as in Afghanistan and Palestine, where peace formation is forced to work under cover, and in parallel to existing and new power structures relating to the conflict and the state entities). It may involve bridging (as in Timor, where peace formation processes helped translate local forms of legitimate authority and make the state more legible to them). It might involve co-opting (as in Bosnia, where it seems that peace formation processes are partly controlled by state formation actors). It could lead to a takeover (as in Kosovo, where peace formation actors and state formation actors took control of the state to a large degree). It may influence civil society, the state, or donor strategies. It may be deemed successful, if the resultant state – or system of governance is more representative – allows for the expansion of rights and justice, donor strategies are more sensitised, and local ownership and autonomy has been upheld, along with democracy. Success may well depend on the way informal processes maintain and improve everyday life and, more ambitiously, form networks that begin to find support within the international community and more formally begin to reshape the state, social norms, as well as donor policy (OdenDaal 2013, p. 23). It may also point to the emergence of scale jumping, where positionalities are altered beyond the canon that can be easily recognised in formal liberal political philosophy (Agnew 1987).

Historically, political order has always been shaped by the paradox that the institutional mechanisms of war and militarism do not develop at the same pace as the mechanisms related to peace formation. The evidence tends to show that peace formation systems may collapse under acute direct and structural pressure from external forces, but they always find ways of adapting and re-establishing themselves in order to counteract violence, digital shifts being a recent adaptation. This is a slow, long-term process, in which peace formers are vulnerable, but they establish private or public, informal, or governmental associations and networks. These slowly offer a platform for reform aimed at more progressive politics, drawing on traditional associations, networks, and history as well as international norms. Peace formation is vital in preventing state reform and any peace process from simply consolidating the political order created by conflict. Thus, peace formation may lead to a social convergence with governance and international norms at one end of the peacebuilding scale, as might be said in the cases of Timor, Kosovo, or Cyprus. At the other end of the scale, and inevitably where resistance to negative peace emerges from within society, peace formation produces the paradox of resistant and critical agency. In its opposition to the governmentality from previous exercises of direct or structural power that attempts to normalise injustice and oppression (as might be seen in Palestine or Colombia), subaltern agency, discursive critique, dissent, and resistance (whilst avoiding violence) produce ‘ungovernmentality’. That is, networks and groups oppose forms of quasi-peace associated with a naturalised consolidation of hierarchy and injustice, and which are discursively engaged in imagining a just form of peace.

Peace formation from below continues during the conflict and long afterwards. As in Cyprus and Colombia, whenever the formal, high-level peace process stumbles, or the state that comes into being proves unable to deal with the diverse claims that arise from society (e.g. when pluralism and nationalism are in tension; when rational-legal institutions are unable to provide security, law, or order; or when neoliberalism undermines solidarity), peace formation begins to fill the gap. It may reshape the state, or it may provide a basis for everyday life to continue despite state failure or injustice. Individuals and groups within society in many different locations around the world engaged with peace movements and processes often describe how they are slowly and incrementally piecing together a new peace, often drawing on existing agency and previous social institutions or practices as well as international norms, combined with their own innovative thinking. Often, they are searching for a new and alternative vocabulary also.

This has often happened without much or any outside help and in the face of considerable structural and direct violence. The slow and painful piecing together of new services, institutions, and agreements on how to distribute resources or bridge identity difference, and offering assistance to those who need help, is a marked characteristic of every post-conflict society. In Cyprus people have organised inter-communal events and projects, despite massive resistance and suspicion from both sides of the buffer zone. In Colombia people attend civil society meetings to share their experiences, network, ask for advice, as well as state their principles, and assert their needs, even though their communities were often under fire and under curfew or they face historical systems of oppression (not least the impact of global or elite capital). In BiH, organisations continue to struggle onwards for human rights, to assist in peace education, and to lobby politicians and internationals, even forming plenums within which to publically debate and mobilise. In Somalia and Somaliland, customary governance compensates for a lack of viable state or international support. In Timor and others, hybrid forms of state and governance emerge to keep the peace, build a better future, and maintain the support of a range of local-to-global-scale parties (Richmond 2016). In all cases, such activity was despite (though very aware of) the risks of opposing mainstream politics, economic arrangements, or social customs. The agency that is displayed and the way the visions developed transcend conflict is impressive, creative, and astute but all too often blocked by elites focused on their interests and internationals focused on their own models.

Ungovernmentality, then, is a sign that innovation in the production of a peaceful political order is taking place, which identifies the dynamics of conflict, resists their perpetuation, refuses to deploy violence, forms trans-scalar and trans-temporal networks and associations, and subtly works to displace naturalised orders that entail governmental, structural, or direct forms of violence with more progressive and legitimate forms of political order. Convergence between local, state, and international scales might be the result (as the cases of Kosovo or Cyprus may eventually illustrate), as with some versions of peace infrastructures, but it is also possible that difference requires mediated autonomy between these scales, as with Somaliland or Timor. ‘Grounded legitimacy’ is essential for the broader production of hybrid legitimacy (Boege et al. 2009) itself, a product of local, state, and international frameworks and the tensions within and between them (Boege 2009; Clements 2008).

In practice, this is a painful process, in which actors across society identify problems that are and have been causal factors in violence in historical, social, political, economic, and identity terms and begin to act. Their first act often takes place in a hidden manner, perhaps resisting or co-opting. When they are more assured, they begin to form networks, perhaps underground, normally informal, but often engaging with international donors and moving into local, national, and global public spaces if possible. They begin to informally network with local power elites, and perhaps even the state. Eventually they acquire a name, funding, and status and even begin to advise or occupy the state and international networks and roles. It is a slow process almost in ‘geological time’. It represents the slow reforming of solidarity in society, a realisation of agency, and a development of strategies to stop violence as well as to deal with the consequence of violence. Subaltern agency is wielded, and faint signals are offered about the nature of an emancipatory peace, how the state should be reformed, and how the international might assist or enable. The recent digital shift has strengthened these faint signals, however.

The subaltern has long been involved on transformative local- and transnational-scale projects, expressing an agency that confronted imperialism (and before it slavery, disenfranchisement, labour conditions, claimed a wide range of rights, opposed the arms trade, and campaigned on cultural and environmental matters), and continues to push at the limits of progressive thought even today (Bill Ashcroft 1989; Ashcroft 2001, p. 2). Indeed, it is the localised aspect of peace formation, but particularly its social and emancipatory connections across history and geography, that gives hybridity its purchase and empirical falsifiability in everyday contexts, along with an impact on the changing state and international peace architecture. It illustrates its ‘contrapuntal’ nature, to draw on Edward Said’s (2004) work on hybridity. The reality is that analogue and digital ‘ungovernable-scapes’ – localised or failed systems that are not under close to northern authority or global governance – continue to be self-governing in their own way, developing modes of peace formation. Peace formation does not seek to erase the international or the state, as it is cognisant of its very limited capacity, but it does try to reform them through subaltern means whilst making a space for a reformed polity to emerge. Peace formation communities consciously and unconsciously exercise critical agency aimed at designing a sustainable and emancipatory peace, reflecting local conditions and constraints, patterns of violence, structural and direct, and the possibilities imminent in the local and the international.

Methodology and Peace Formation

Peace formation indicates that ‘expert knowledge’ is subjective and often hegemonic and not well suited to meeting claims made at the local level. Likewise, peace formation is limited in terms of scope and power by the very power structures it opposes and by its networked and mobile rather than concentrated nature. A multidimensional methodology and interdisciplinary approach is needed to understand these dynamics, blending social theory, philosophy, anthropology, geography, as well as IR and political science. This methodology may also be translated into law and economics at a later moment of consolidation. Peace formation requires a research methodology suited to engaging with local, informal knowledge and creating equal partnerships, decentralised power, and redistributed resources. To avoid recreating trusteeship and native administration bureaucracies, it needs to be linked to political self-determination and autonomy and, through awareness of inequalities relating to postcolonial and gendered analyses, avoid the risk of inadvertently supporting unjust outcomes or processes. The subtleties of peace formation point to how deconstruction assists in the emergence of justice. Subjects have, over the last 25 years, uncovered the very power systems which drive conflict, as well as how they are perpetuated through intervention (often inadvertently), and now point to how reconstruction may attain justice (Derrida 1992, p. 15). As Foucault (Foucault et al. 2003, p. 179) argued, peace formation, self-formation, and local knowledges are in a constant struggle for survival against industrialised knowledge and disciplinary power states, the international architecture, and the global economy. Peace formation requires the recovery and assertion of subjugated knowledge. Furthermore, its digital shift to some degree undermines inside/outside, top-down/bottom-up frameworks: it collapses space, speeds up interaction, extends networks, supports the knowledge side of the power-knowledge equation, and offers camouflage in situations of danger. This reframes agency as far more relational than hitherto understood (Qin 2006), and this has significant impact on the micro construction of political order and legitimate authority, whether local, state, or global (Solomon and Steele 2017). New methods are required to engage with these dynamics.

Much of the empirical evidence on peace formation is anecdotal, or scattered and impressionistic, partly because of the well-known risks activists and social movements take in responding to entrenched power relations or practices. Any reconstruction of a historical political record, at whichever level, will probably be susceptible to such weaknesses, however. So far, a fragmented record and some affiliated theorisation have only just been brought into view. It might be said that in a range of literature spanning Marx to Foucault, the sense of political agency has been theorised more strongly than it has been practiced (or at least empirically researched). Nevertheless, subaltern agency is not much of a match for governmental, structural, or direct power. Some peace processes only exist (in terms of reconciliation and emancipation) at this level, as the state, regional, or international levels have long been deadlocked (as in the Middle East, Bosnia, and Cyprus, as well as others). Peace formation's discursive signalling represents a positionality, from which local-to-global dimensions of a peace process and settlement can be viewed and tested. Nevertheless, this is a highly politicised process: it is predicated upon a struggle for rights and material needs often against entrenched power structures, vested interests, and received wisdom amongst outside experts.

Conclusion

Peace formation offers the possibility of transcending the inside/outside, bottom-up/top-down, us/other binaries that bedevil the praxes of peace, at least in discursive terms. However, power relations cannot be wished away: they have to be addressed legitimately. Furthermore, it exposes the strategy of 'practicing' reforms on the post-conflict subjects before then transferring them elsewhere as a way of reinforcing the liberal state system, and despite its internal contradictions. Peace formation is more focused on the positive agencies expressed for peacemaking, reflecting '...multiple degrees and sites of agency' and 'collective social assemblages' (Connolly 2011, p. 22). Peace formation draws on anthropological and sociological insights on how well-being is conceived of in terms of the international, the state, social relations, kin networks, and an individual's position in them. These often point to the need for or create 'moral economies' and redistributive networks in situations of overt and structural violence and poverty (Booth et al. 1999, pp. 10, 19). It overturns structures of oppression and often organises itself into hidden or public forms of resistance and mobilisation. It aims to redress inequality, to produce socio-historical legitimate institutions and practices, to learn from the international whilst reforming it, and to support positive hybrid forms of peace. Just as social movements and organisations across the world over the last century have engaged in a constant struggle with power hierarchies, as global civil society develops beyond the liberal, normative framings offered by Rawls, Habermas, and Kaldor (Kaldor 2003), rights claims expand, and new networks and tools emerge. This points to a connection between the networked, mobile, and transversal qualities of peace formation, with new and perhaps ‘digital peace’ dynamics.

Peace formation highlights the structural violence inherent in governmental power. However, it is clearly only a partial response to the vexed question of how to build peaceful local and global orders. It partially contradicts Eurocentric liberal norms, rights, and self-determination. Peace formation reflects the transversal circulation of power but does not act as ‘native enablers’ of historical empires (Mishra 2012, p. 60), liberal norms, or global capital. It maintains a high degree of autonomy, in identity, ideology, norms, and objectives. Peace formation struggles with structural power and governmentality, but the agency it exercises is more than just that of bare life, protest, or compliance. Peoples, identities, cultures, needs, and rights have been recognised across the world because of it. Direct, structural power and governmentality has been exposed and called to account through it, though it finds its limits in vested powerful interests at local, state, and global levels and is only a partial response to the weak distribution of rights and material resources around the world.

Peace formation derives from those groups and communities who work for peace, actively and intellectually, in everyday and highly localised settings as well as within the institutions of the polity. They use history, identity, culture, religion, language, resources, boundaries, institutions, rights, and needs, not as a means of division but as a means through which bridges can be built by exercising subaltern power and critical agency and coaxing governmental and even direct or structural power to shift slightly in their favour. They understand the micro and meta-narratives of legitimacy, through which these relationships are rebuilt, and their historical sensitivities. They understand also how elites and political entrepreneurs abuse them or manipulate society. They understand how to mitigate such stresses. They have a heightened awareness of the multi-dimensional basis for peace, across time, space, societies, and the international system. They work slowly and quietly with minimal capacity.

The relationship that has emerged between power and peace formation indicates some important lessons. First, most power lies within direct, structural, and governmental systems that normally exercise top-down power on the subject. Subaltern actors may respond, but their response is very limited. Often the vertical top-down exercise of power has negative if unintended consequences upon the subaltern. Thus, the idea that subaltern power can be harmonised in unison with structural, direct, and governmental power is probably a myth. It is likely that any peace framework that emerges from the interaction of peace formation with the state and international will be based upon managing difference and dealing with contradictions rather than building a unified system.

Foregrounding peace formation, engaging with its signals, and understanding how peace is a political project – one amongst many – is a crucial next step in the development of an international architecture, designed to improve international order rather than just to maintain it, especially in view of the need to reconsider the relationship between universalism and particularism that the tension between peace formation and the international peacebuilding architecture suggests. It is essential for substantive democratisation, human rights, understanding the role and nature of the state, as well as its legitimacy, and for the legitimacy of intervention to protect vulnerable subjects whilst also maintaining their political autonomy. Peace formation makes clearer the blockages to peace, who controls them, and how they operate (often with great subtlety).

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peace and Political Unsettling
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace

Bibliography

- Aggestam, K., & Björkdahl, A. (Eds.). (2012). Rethinking peacebuilding: The quest for just peace in the Middle East and the Western Balkans. London: Routledge.
- Agnew, J. A. (1987). Place and politics. London: Allen and Unwin.
- Ashcroft, B. (2001). Post-colonial transformation. London: Routledge.
- Axtmann, R. (2004). The state of the state: The model of the modern state and its contemporary transformation. International Political Science Review, 25(3), 259–279.
- Balkan Sunflower. (2014, May 23). Focus Group. Prishtinë.
- Beck, U., & Grande, E. (2007). Cosmopolitanism: Europe's way out of crisis. Cambridge: Polity.
- Bill Ashcroft, G. G. (1989). The empire writes Back: Theory and practice in post-colonial literatures. London: Routledge.
- Boege, V. (2009, September 10–12). Legitimacy in hybrid political orders – An underestimated dimension of peacebuilding and state formation. In European consortium of political research conference. Potsdam: Berghof Conflict Research.
- Boege, V., Brown, A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2009). On hybrid political orders and emerging states: What is failing – States in the global south or research and politics in the west? In Berglof handbook for conflict transformation dialogue series 8 (pp. 15–35).
- Booth, D., Leach, M., & Tierney, A. (1999). Experiencing poverty in Africa: Perspectives from anthropology (Background Paper 1b for World Bank Poverty Status Report). Washington DC.
- Burton, J. (1969). Conflict and communication: The use of controlled communication in international relations. New York: Free Press.
- Chowdhury, A., & Duvall, R. (2014). Sovereignty and sovereign power. International Theory, 6(2), 191–223.
- Clements, K. P. (2008). Charismatic and grounded legitimacy: Sector project good governance and democracy. Deutsche Gesellschaft für Technische Zusammenarbeit (GTZ). Staat und Demokratie, Bundesministerium für wirtschaftliche Zusammenarbeit und Entwicklung (BMZ).
- Connolly, W. E. (2011). A world of becoming. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Derrida, J. (1992). Force of law: The “mystical foundation of authority”. In D. Cornell, M. Rosenfeld, & D. G. Carlson (Eds.), Deconstruction and the possibility of justice (pp. 3–67). London: Routledge.
- Escobar, A. (2008). Territories of difference: Place, movements, life, Redes. New York: Duke University Press.
- Foucault, M. (1980). Two lectures. In C. Gordon (Ed.), Power/knowledge: Selected interviews (pp. 78–108). New York: Pantheon.
- Foucault, M., Bertani, M., Fontana, A., Ewald, F., & Macey, D. (2003). Society must be defended: Lectures at the Collège de France, 1975–76. New York: Picador.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Habermas, J. (2001). The post-national constellation: Political essays. Cambridge: MIT Press.
- Haiven, M., & Khasnabish, A. (2014). The radical imagination: Social movement research in the age of austerity. London: Zed Books.
- Harvey, N. (1988). The Chiapas rebellion: The struggle for land and democracy. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Huntington, S. P. (1968). Political order in changing societies. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.
- Jabri, V. (2007). War and the transformation of global politics. London: Palgrave.
- Kaldor, M. (2003). The idea of global civil society. International Affairs, 79(3), 583–593.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: Institute of Peace Press.
- Luckham, R., & Kirk, T. (2013). The two faces of security in hybrid political orders. Stability: International Journal of Stability and Development, 2(3), 1–30.
- Mishra, P. (2012). From the ruins of empire: The intellectuals who remade Asia. London: Penguin.
- Mitchell, T. (2001). Rule of experts: Egypt, techno-politics, modernity. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mitrany, D. (1944). A working peace system: An argument for the functional development of international organization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Nadarajah, S., & Rampton, D. (2015). The limits of hybridity and the crisis of liberal peace. Review of International Studies, 41(1), 49–72.
- Nussbaum, M. (2011). Creating capabilities: The human development approach. Cambridge: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- OdenDaal, A. (2013). A crucial link: Local peace committees and national peacebuilding. Washington, DC: USIP.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Qin, Y. (2006). A relational theory of world politics. International Studies Review, 18(1), 33–47.
- Rawls, J. (1993). The law of peoples. Critical Inquiry, 20(1), 36–68.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). Eireneism and a post-liberal peace. Review of International Studies, 35(3), 557–580.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.

- Richmond, O. P. (2015). The dilemmas of a hybrid peace: Negative or positive? Cooperation and Conflict, 50(1), 50–68.
- Richmond, O. P. (2016). Peace formation and political order in conflict affected societies. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Said, E. (2004). Humanism and democratic criticism. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Shapcott, R. (2018). Global justice: Shaped rather than found. International Relations, 32(1), 104–123.
- Solomon, T., & Steele, B. J. (2017). Micro-moves in international relations theory. European Journal of International Relations, 23(1), 267–291.

Peace Formation in Bougainville

Volker Boege
The University of Queensland,
Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Definition

Peace formation on the Pacific island of Bougainville after a protracted internal violent conflict has been a remarkable success story. In this entry it will be argued that this success is due to constructive interactions between international and national formal institutions and actors on the one hand and local informal institutions and actors from the sphere of civil society and customary governance on the other. While the first pursue a conventional liberal agenda of peacebuilding, the latter introduce their indigenous ways of conflict transformation, peace formation, and forming political community into the process. Externally driven peacebuilding is thus only one aspect of much broader and deeper peace formation. In the course of local-liberal interaction, hybrid forms of peace emerge that differ considerably from Western concepts of peace but at the same time can become more efficient and legitimate in maintaining peace and order. After two decades of peace formation, Bougainville has recently entered a new stage of state formation, based on a successful independence referendum which was conducted between November 23 and December 7, 2019. The lessons learned during peace formation will inform future state formation.

Introduction

For almost 10 years (1989–1998), the South Pacific island of Bougainville in Papua New Guinea (PNG) was the theater of a large-scale violent conflict. Over the last two decades, Bougainville has undergone a comprehensive process of largely successful peace formation and (re-)construction of political order. A high-level political peace process commenced in 1997, and a formal Bougainville-wide cease-fire came into effect at the end of April 1998, paving the way for official peace negotiations, which finally culminated in the Bougainville Peace Agreement (BPA) of August 30, 2001. The BPA has two core political provisions: firstly, the establishment of the Autonomous Region of Bougainville (ARoB) as a special political entity within the state of PNG, with far-reaching autonomy and, secondly, a referendum on the future political status of Bougainville – either complete independence or remaining with PNG. The ARoB has its own constitution, adopted by the Bougainville Constituent Assembly on November 12, 2004. The first elections for a Bougainville House of Representatives (HoR) and a Bougainville President were held in June 2005, followed by two more elections in 2010 and 2015. Since 2005, Bougainvilleans are governed by their own Autonomous Bougainville Government (ABG).

The BPA stipulated that the referendum on the future political status of Bougainville had to be held 10–15 years after the establishment of an autonomous government for Bougainville. This opened the time window for a referendum between June 2015 and June 2020. In May 2016 the ABG and the government of PNG agreed upon June 15, 2019 as the target date for the referendum. Due to delays in preparation, the referendum had to be postponed twice. It was finally carried out between November 23 and December 7, 2019. In the referendum, Bougainvilleans were given the choice between greater autonomy (within PNG) and independence. They overwhelmingly opted for independence. However, according to the BPA, the referendum is non-binding; both sides are obliged to “consult over the results of the referendum,” and “the outcome will be subject to ratification (final decision-making authority) of the National Parliament” of PNG (Bougainville Peace Agreement 2001, clause 312). It can be argued that only with the peaceful implementation of the referendum results will the Bougainville peace process have reached a satisfactory conclusion.

In the following this entry will not recount the history of the successive steps and stages of the political peacebuilding process in much detail; rather, it will focus on the local/customary – international/liberal interface in peace formation and on the specifics of this interface which made the process a success. It will be argued that the collusion of international liberal notions of peace (building) and local indigenous understandings of shaping peaceful and orderly community resulted in the emergence of a distinct Bougainvillean variety of “peace.” Although some international engagement was – and continues to be – important, the process was and is mainly steered by local agency.

The exploration of the international-local interface will be guided by a relational-cultural approach to understanding peace formation. In the Bougainville case, as in most other internationally supported peacebuilding endeavors, the actors come from fundamentally different socio-cultural backgrounds. On the one hand, there are the locals who had been embroiled in violent conflict and who now find themselves in a post-conflict situation, in need of building peace. On the other hand, there are the internationals who for one reason or the other entered the place to address the locals’ need for peacebuilding and who stay only temporarily, for the purpose of peacebuilding. The former are mostly places and people in the Global South, as this is the theater of most of today’s violent conflicts, and the latter are usually from Western liberal states and/or international organizations which are shaped according to and operate along the lines of Western liberal values, norms, and procedures. Peacebuilding interventions hence are local-international interactions across cultural difference.

Of course, the international and the local are not hermetically separated from each other. Rather, in today’s globalized world, the local is more or less imbued with international (i.e., Western liberal) culture and linked to the international sphere through a plethora of connections, and the international has its own local from where it threads itself into other localities, in the process becoming more or less affected by local culture. Moreover, the local and the international are highly diverse in themselves, with all kinds of internal differences and frictions. Nevertheless, the local/international interface is of particular significance for peace formation, because actors position themselves as “local” or “international” and from this position see and engage with the “other.” Peace processes are imbued with behavior, actions, norms, and interests that stem from this positioning.

Both the local-international interface and culture have to be understood relationally. The local and the international are “relational concepts,” with the local and the international “co-constitutive of each other” (Mac Ginty 2016, p. 207), and changing due to their interaction. Culture is also a relational concept, “culture and cultural difference are formed relationally” (Brigg 2014, p. 17), and as such culture is “holding difference and sameness together in dynamic relation” (ibid., p. 16). The coexistence of difference and sameness makes cross-cultural exchange both necessary and possible (Brigg 2016). Internationally supported peacebuilding thus can be conceptualized as a relational exercise in working with and across cultural difference.

Such a relational approach, which foregrounds relations rather than entities, captures the fluidity and dynamism of peace formation and the emergence of peace as hybridized (Boege et al. 2009; Richmond 2011; Mac Ginty 2011; Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013, see also “► Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”). The concept of hybridization takes note of fundamental cultural difference and at the same time allows us “to move away from the rigid categories and binaries that are commonly used to explain peace and conflict, (encouraging) a concentration on fluidity and leaching of identities, institutions and ideas” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2015, p. 224), and it allows us to capture the ambiguity of the international-local interface (McLeod 2015).

Cross-cultural interaction and hybridization play out in the context of the local; its site is the local(e), understood not as another (lower) level (beneath the national and international) of politics but as “. . . a sphere of activity that is constantly being made and remade, sometimes with replication and sometimes with change. It is made, remade and negotiated through the everyday actions of inhabitants, as well as those of exogenous and institutional actors” (Mac Ginty 2015, p. 851). The locale/the locality is co-created and shared by a variety of interacting local, national, regional, and international actors and institutions, and, accordingly, in the context of the locale, the boundaries of “the international” and “the local” become porous and blurred, with the local infused with the international and the international with the local (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013).

In the Bougainville context, local kastom (the culture of the locale) and kastom ways of dealing with conflict were decisive for the specific forms of hybrid peace and order which emerged in the course of peace formation. For local agency is grounded in kastom as everyday practice. (The term kastom, a Pidgin derivative of the English “custom,” is frequently used today in Melanesian countries, both by people in the villages and politicians, in order to stress their cultural heritage and the difference between their own ways and foreign ways of governance, economics, conflict resolution, peacebuilding, etc., often depicting kastom as rooted in ancient pre-colonial traditions, a set of rules developed by the ancestors (Keesing 1993). Kastom governance is thus presented as the other of, or even alternative to, introduced state-based governance. At the same time, kastom is different from the customs of the precontact and pre-colonial past. It has developed since the times of first contact and colonization due to interaction and exchange with various external influences, and it continues to change today. In other words, kastom is hybrid.) In their exchanges with the external forces of liberal peacebuilding, the local actors found strength by reference to kastom. Before the specifics of Bougainville peace formation in the context of the local-international interface will be explored, a brief introduction to the locale, the people, and the violent conflict will provide the necessary background information for understanding the peculiarities of forming peace and order Bougainville style.

Violent Conflict on Bougainville

The island of Bougainville in the South Pacific, with an area of about 9000 km² (approximately the size of Cyprus or Jamaica) and 300,000 inhabitants, geographically belongs to the Solomon Islands archipelago. Politically, however, it is part of PNG. Bougainville society is characterized by a complex web of cultures, languages, and social systems that evolved in the course of thousands of years. Segmentary, highly egalitarian communities consist of social groups of different sizes and with different functions (clans, sub-clans, lineages), with descent being the organizing principle. Matrilineal descent is widespread. This provides an important social role for women; rights to land and other resources are mainly based on descent. Access to land depends on the membership in a kin-based group; the group and the land are closely interwoven. Land belongs to the whole group. Land is at the heart of life on Bougainville. Loss or scarcity of land does not only pose economic problems but has far-reaching effects on the social structure, the spiritual life, and the psychic conditions of the affected groups and their members (Regan and Griffin 2005).

Given the importance of land, it comes as no surprise that the key sources of the violent conflict which devastated Bougainville in the 1990s were related to a giant mining project and its negative social and environmental effects. (For an overview of the war on Bougainville, see Carl and Garasu 2002, Braithwaite et al. 2010, Regan 2010, and Wallis 2014.) In the 1970s and 1980s, the Panguna gold and copper mine in the mountains of Central Bougainville was one of the largest open-pit mines in the world. For the British-Australian mining company (CRA – Conzinc Riotinto of Australia, today’s Rio Tinto) that ran the project, it brought enormous profits, and it brought considerable revenues for the central government of PNG. Over the years the mine caused immense environmental destruction, thus endangering the land-based way of life of the people. An influx of large numbers of workers from outside Bougainville added to the pressure on local communities. Local people blamed outsiders – workers, expatriate company management, and the agents of the central government – for not respecting indigenous culture and their special status and rights as the traditional owners of the land.

The people in the mine area demanded meaningful environmental protection measures, compensation for environmental damage, and a larger share of the revenues generated. Both the mining company and the PNG government rejected these demands, and as a consequence, members of local clans brought the mine to a standstill by acts of sabotage in late 1988 and established the Bougainville Revolutionary Army (BRA). Fighting between the BRA and the security forces of the PNG government soon spread across the whole island, and Bougainville in the 1990s became the theater of the longest and bloodiest war in the South Pacific after the end of World War II. The BRA adopted a secessionist stance and called for independence for Bougainville. The Panguna mine was forced to shut down in 1990, and the BRA took over control of the mine site. The mine has remained closed ever since.

In its war against the BRA, the PNG military was supported by local Bougainvillean auxiliary units, the so-called Resistance Forces. Over time, it became the Resistance that bore the brunt of the fighting on the government side. Moreover, traditional local conflicts were also fought under the umbrella of the “great” war of secession. Parties entangled in local conflicts joined either the BRA or the Resistance, which both were made up of largely independent units. The war became more and more complex and the frontiers blurred. There were no two clear-cut sides fighting each other over one single distinctive issue as in conventional wars. What took place on Bougainville was neither a war between states, nor was it an internal war between the central government and its security forces on the one side and a unitary armed opposition on the other. Rather, the Bougainville war is best understood as a hybrid, shaped by a patchwork of actors and interests both from the local social and the modern state and economic sphere. The overlap of these spheres with regard to the causes of conflict, the issues at stake, the perceptions, values, and motives of the conflict actors, as well as the forms of their (violent) behavior and activities gave the war its specific features.

The time of war was to a large extent a time of statelessness. “The state” and its institutions were forced to withdraw from Bougainville in an early stage of the war. Neither was the PNG government able to maintain a monopoly over the legitimate use of force, nor did the secessionist movement manage to establish one. This opened the space not only for at times largely uncontrolled and widespread violence but also for a resurgence of non-state local customary institutions. These institutions had been sidelined, but had not completely disappeared, during colonial times and during the phase of the formation of the independent state of PNG after 1975. The fact that customary institutions were able to take over control in many places in the stateless times of the war is actually an indication of their resilience. In many places traditional authorities such as elders and chiefs once more became responsible for regulating conflicts and organizing community life. In doing so, they referred to Bougainville kastom, according to most accounts to the satisfaction of the members of their communities (Regan 2000).

Elders and chiefs were also entrusted with an important role in dealing with violent conflicts in the local context. They were widely successful in achieving reconciliation at the intra- and inter-communal level, utilizing customary methods of conflict resolution. Localized “islands of peace” were established even at the height of the war. Local peace processes thus had already generated positive results well before a first round of “high-level” talks and negotiations took place in 1997 and a formal Bougainville-wide cease-fire was achieved in early 1998. From then on, a high-level political peacebuilding process ensued. Again, customary institutions and local non-state actors played a decisive role in this process.

Peace Formation at the Grassroots

Peace formation in Bougainville emerged in a societal environment characterized by hybrid structures of governance and political order, with relatively weak state institutions and relatively strong customary institutions coexisting and exerting influence on each other, with civil society and its institutions (women's organizations in particular) gradually gaining strength, and with limited external intervention. Under these conditions, peace formation was characterized by the combination of bottom-up and top-down approaches and the interaction of local, national, and international actors and institutions. This process let hybrid forms of peace and political order emerge. (This understanding of peace formation differs to a certain extent from Oliver Richmond's concept of peace formation (see Richmond 2016, 2019).)

The utilization of customary institutions and traditional ways of conflict resolution was of utmost importance for peace formation in the local context. As has been said, the violent conflict on Bougainville was not just a war of secession but a complex mixture of such a war and localized sub-wars between societal entities such as clans, lineages, or villages. Therefore, peacemaking had to address not only the "higher" political level but also the "lower" level of (inter-)communal conflicts. This (inter-)communal peace formation was largely based on local customary approaches. Elders and chiefs – as well as women leaders – were entrusted with an important role when violent conflicts had to be settled in the transition phase from war to peace. Thousands of customary peace processes have taken place at the local level between enemy villages and clans all over the island since the end of the war, with a new wave emerging only rather recently in 2018 and 2019, in preparation of the referendum on independence in November/December 2019.

The aim of customary peacemaking is the restoration of social harmony within and between communities and of amicable relationships between the conflicting parties. This is achieved by means of reconciliation, which is at the core of customary peacemaking (Boege and Garasu 2011). Reconciliation is based on the development of a common understanding of the causes and the history of the conflict, willingness to accept responsibility for wrongdoings and to apologize, and the negotiation of the – material and spiritual – conditions for the restoration of relationships. Perpetrators have to apologize to the ones they wronged and ask for forgiveness. Victims must develop a willingness to accept the apologies and forgive. Such kind of reconciliation is not a one-off event or a quick fix. It needs time. Slowness, breaks, and "time outs" are deliberately built into reconciliation processes to give parties time to calm down, assess the state of the process so far, reformulate their position, and prepare themselves spiritually and emotionally for a resolution.

Once solutions are found, they are ratified in highly ritual forms. Ceremonies mark the culminating points of the reconciliation process. Usually there is not one reconciliation ceremony but a series of ceremonies, according to the progress of reconciliation. The ceremonies vary from area to area, but generally they encompass rituals such as breaking spears and arrows, drinking and eating together from the same dish, singing and dancing together, or chewing betel nut together. (In some places, for instance, people bury large stones. "The significance of the stone is that it is heavy and it does not move and it gives a sign of strong and unchanging reconciliation between the people" (Howley 2002, p. 111). In other places the parties "would plant tangget plants on stone. This symbolized their promise to forget the past and remain as silent as stone. Anyone who violated this agreement would be cursed by the stone and any talebearer would be punished by its strength" (Tanis 2002, p. 59).) These symbolic activities are expressions of commitment and trust and are more powerful than mere spoken or written words. Finally, gifts are exchanged (pigs, shell money, food, cash, or a combination of all these items).

The whole community participates. Church services and prayers are usually an integral part of these activities, as most Bougainvilleans are devout Christians, and “Christian principles of reconciliation have conveniently found their place in the culture and have, indeed, added a great deal to the process, through the incorporation of prayers and public acknowledgements by priests and church ministers” (Tanis 2002, p. 60). Church leaders were and are particularly active in initiating and stabilizing reconciliation processes.

Reconciliation ceremonies are loaded with spiritual meaning. Ceremony is an important vehicle for cleansing and purification. Mental healing is an important aspect of reconciliation. Reconciliation is not only an issue of reason and the intellect. It is a deeply emotional and spiritual experience. It is about mending hearts. (See the title of Pat Howley’s (2002) highly informative and moving book: Breaking spears and mending hearts.) It is about repairing broken relationships and restoring harmony so that people can live in peace not only with each other but also with God and the spirits of the dead. God is present in reconciliation and so are the spirits of the dead. (Most Bougainvilleans are devout Christians, but this does not replace belief in the spirit world. Rather, this goes together; there is mixing and blending.) Social relations are guarded by the spirit world. Whenever social relations break down, the spirit world is affected. Conflicts also play out in the spirit world. This is why cleansing rituals that appease the spirits are linked to reconciliation. If such cleansing rituals are not performed, the spirits of the fallen will not rest but come back and haunt the living, and all kinds of misfortune will befall the communities – illness, accidents, madness, and death. Therefore, in the course of a reconciliation process, the spirits will be called on to remove any illness that has befallen the community because of the conflict and bring back healing. Peace formation thus is relational also with regard to the invisible world; in Bougainville, the visible and the invisible world are closely connected and affect each other. Relationships that emerge in the peace process (and let peace emerge) also comprise the actors of the invisible world. Peace (formation) is thus not confined to the visible world. Internationals conceptualizing it in such a manner miss a decisive dimension. Peace processes are imbued with otherworldly aspects, hence engaging with the spiritual dimension is of utmost importance – even if this means to question one’s own secular enlightened convictions.

In this context, proper burials of the dead are highly important. In fact, one major problem for reconciliation after the war was and still is today that many people who were killed have not been buried in a culturally appropriate manner. Relatives do not know where the remains of their kin are, or there are graves with bones that have not been identified. In order to find peace and to reconcile, the dead have to be given a proper burial (UNDP 2014, p. 12, 32). The unburied dead have an influence on the lives of the living, both the perpetrators and the relatives of the victims. Therefore, finding and bringing home the bodies, burying them properly, and grieving at their graves are an indispensable dimension of reconciliation. This is why the topic of “missing persons” looms large in making peace on Bougainville.

While the peace process at the grassroots was grounded in and largely followed kastom, customary local peace processes were also modernized in various forms. Local peace committees or district reconciliation steering committees were formed, and local mini peace treaties were elaborated, put into writing, and signed. Local peacebuilders also took over foreign conflict resolution knowledge and adjusted it to their specific needs. For example, the NGO Peace Foundation Melanesia (PFM) conducted training of locals as mediators, facilitators, and negotiators in the transition phase from war to peace and the early stages of the peace process. PFM’s village-based, elicitive courses did not impose fixed Western-style concepts of conflict resolution but built on local approaches, in particular by referring to the concept of restorative justice, revitalizing customary ways, and adapting them to contemporary needs, e.g., by introducing more “modern” training techniques (Howley 2002). A similar approach was taken in later stages of the peace process by the Panguna Dialogue, Referendum Dialogue, and Transition Dialogue projects that were conducted by the Peace and Conflict Studies Institute Australia (PaCSIA) in collaboration with a network of local facilitators and community-based organizations.

Finally, it has to be acknowledged that external factors contributed to the success of local reconciliations. Bougainvilleans say that the Peace Monitoring Group and the UN mission which came in to support the peace process (see below) initially provided the space for them to come together for reconciliations. Because of the presence of the internationals, they felt safe enough to meet their former enemies to commence reconciliation processes. The internationals often also provided the means to come together – transport, a neutral venue – or even facilitated the first steps of a reconciliation process. Bougainvilleans are thankful to internationals for enabling reconciliations; they think of this as a major contribution of the internationals to the peace process (Boege 2019). The peace process at the local level in Bougainville thus was a “local-liberal hybrid” (Richmond 2011, p. 18), with local customary ways (of reconciliation and restoration of relationships) being the predominant factor (Boege 2012).

High-Level Peacebuilding

High-level political peacebuilding was also hybridized, although the local customary aspects at this scale were less visible. At first sight it looks like these activities followed a typical international liberal template that is familiar from other post-conflict peacebuilding theaters – negotiations facilitated by an external third party (New Zealand), a cease-fire (1998), a peace agreement (2001), a constitution (2004), elections (2005, 2010, 2015), etc. At the same time, however, the high-level activities were also to a large extent imbued with local ways of operating (Boege 2012).

For example, the local actors imposed their pace of doing things on international actors and forced them to adjust pre-planned peacebuilding timetables to local needs and customs. The Bougainville peace process was and is framed in a long-term perspective. This holds true for the process as a whole as well as for its single elements. Peace formation on Bougainville has already been going on for two decades, and it has not been completed yet. Dozens of rounds of talks and negotiations and a host of intermediate agreements, memoranda of understandings, protocols, and so forth were necessary to make progress – very slowly as it might seem from an outsider’s perspective.

During negotiations participants took their time too. The first rounds of talks between the parties in New Zealand in 1997 and 1998 took weeks. The New Zealand hosts were so prudent as not to dictate a timetable. Rather they provided for a lot of “free” time, so that there was enough time for the representatives of the parties to adjust, to spend time with each other without the duress of a tight schedule.

Furthermore, no time frame was given regarding demobilization and disarmament. At the beginning, there was only general agreement on a three-phased open-ended weapons disposal process. The real weapons disposal only started in December 2001, that was 4 years after cessation of armed conflict, and no dates were set as to when the single stages of the process had to be accomplished. Weapons disposal was not finalized officially until the year 2005; and another round of weapons disposal was conducted in 2018 and 2019 in preparation of the independence referendum of November 2019, this time also including those factions which had not taken part in the 2001–2005 disarmament exercise.

The focus on process and on long time frames is very much in line with local customary principles and methods of making peace. At the same time it poses a major challenge for the international actors whose mindset is determined by the notion of getting things done and getting things done as quick as possible. On Bougainville, as in other international peacebuilding interventions, the external actors tried to impose their (tight) time frames and their own temporal culture onto the locals. But at the end of the day, they had to adjust to Bougainville time. It can be expected that the transition phase toward independence after the November 2019 referendum again will take years.

Another important aspect of high-level peacebuilding on Bougainville was its inclusiveness, which also reflects local ways of operating. Customary dispute settlement necessitates the participation and commitment of all members of the parties involved in conflict. Accordingly, a very broad process was organized, trying to include all stakeholders at all levels of society. High-level peace talks were each attended by dozens, if not hundreds of Bougainvilleans, not only by the political and military leadership. Truce and cease-fire agreements were signed not only by the leadership but also by the local commanders of the BRA and the Resistance Forces as well as by traditional authorities and by representatives of civil society, e.g., church leaders and women representatives. This made the agreements more binding and easier to implement. Given the matrilineal organization of most of the communities on Bougainville, the involvement of women was of particular importance (Havini and Sirivi 2004).

Local actors managed to impose their understanding of proper representation and participation in political negotiations, and this differs from conventional international practice. Accordingly, the forms of negotiations differed from what would be seen as “normal” through the international liberal lens. Extended times of prayer and singing together, for example, were integral parts of the negotiations – activities which from the liberal internationals’ point of view can easily be misjudged as folkloristic and tokenistic accessories to the “real” business of political negotiation.

To conclude, high-level peacebuilding on Bougainville was thus a liberal-local hybrid, following a liberal international template but infused with local patterns of appropriate behavior (Boege 2012). The local-liberal interface in the Bougainville peace process showed the following features: while at the top, it followed largely the international-liberal peacebuilding template, the processes at the bottom were dominated by local customary practices. The local customary approach, however, also permeated the top processes, and liberal approaches colored and reformed processes at the bottom. What ensued was a liberal-local or a local-liberal hybrid of peace formation. And it was due to the permeation of liberal-international forms with local customary ways that the negotiations at the higher political level led to a comprehensive peace settlement, while the sustainability of this settlement depended on the maintenance of customary conflict resolution practice at the bottom. The combination of top-down (liberal-local) and bottom-up (local-liberal) processes made Bougainville a success story; and while in conventional Western academic and political thinking “the top-down story is the master narrative and the bottom-up reconciliations are subsidiary,” it can be argued that “in important ways the bottom-up micro narratives subsume and infuse the top-down peace” (Braithwaite 2011, p. 140).

Peacebuilding in the liberal understanding of the term was thus only one aspect of a much broader and deeper process of peace formation. Bougainville peacebuilding could only become a success as embedded in this broad and deep process, which goes well beyond the internationally dominant technical understanding of peacebuilding. While peacebuilding suggests a planned top-down, technical, linear, and predictable endeavor of social engineering, peace formation by contrast is a messy, contradictory, nonlinear, and complex long-term process which involves a wide and diverse range of actors and institutions, be they state, para-state, or non-state/customary/traditional and civil society, local, national, or international. Technocratic, externally supported, peacebuilding is and can only be part of such complex peace formation. What was successful in Bougainville was peace formation, not peacebuilding; and peacebuilding only succeeded as part of peace formation. Accordingly, international actors did play a role, but did not dominate the peace process.

The Internationals: Helpful, but Not in Control

Although the success of peace formation in Bougainville is rooted locally, external support has to be acknowledged. Particularly in the first stages of the peace process, from 1997 to 2005, their presence was of major significance, although, compared to other endeavors, the international peacebuilding mission on Bougainville was a light intervention (Regan 2008, 2010). Mention has to be made of the activities of the New Zealand government, the United Nations observer mission, and the everyday routine operations of first an international Truce Monitoring Group (TMG) and later an international Peace Monitoring Group (PMG). In later stages of the peace process, after the stabilization of the security situation on the ground, a considerable number of foreign development agencies, international nongovernmental organizations, and United Nations programs and institutions became active on Bougainville. The international presence reached a new peak in the phase of the preparation for the independence referendum (2014–2019). In the late 1990s, New Zealand played a significant part initiating the peace process. All conflict parties trusted the New Zealanders. It was only because the New Zealand government acted as a facilitator and provided logistical assistance, hosted the initial rounds of talks and negotiations, and offered an open and warm atmosphere to participants that the peace process got off the ground.

The UN sent a small contingent, known successively as the UN Political Office in Bougainville (UNPOB), from August 1998 to 2004, and the UN Observer Mission in Bougainville (UNOMB), from 2004 to June 2005. Initially, the BRA had pressed for UN engagement (so as to internationalize the Bougainville issue), whereas the central government of PNG was skeptical, presenting the Bougainville conflict as an “internal affair” of PNG. Later in the process, all parties realized the importance of having the UN involved. Its symbolic value, demonstrating the international community’s interest in events on Bougainville, as well as its contribution to conceptualizing and implementing the weapons disposal process should not be underestimated. The UN personnel on the ground proved to be patient, culturally sensitive, and committed. The engagement was long term; it was only at the end of June 2005, after the first ABG elections, that the observer mission came to an end. In the phase of referendum preparations, the UN again played an important role, in particular with its Bougainville Referendum Support Project, which was steered by UNDP and funded through the UN Peacebuilding Fund.

In the early stage of the peace process, neighboring countries provided the personnel for first the TMG and later the PMG, which were on the island from late 1997 to June 2003, followed by a small Bougainville Transitional Team until December 2003. New Zealand led the TMG, and Australia led the PMG, with Australia providing the bulk of personnel and resources (Adams 2001; Wehner and Denoon 2001). The TMG/PMG’s mandate was to support the peace process “through logistics, monitoring, verification, mediation and confidence building” (Australian Government 2012, p. 20). Over time, the TMG/PMG won the trust of all sides (Adams 2001; Wehner and Denoon 2001). Cooperation with the conflict parties ran smoothly, and in many places cordial relations with villagers, elders, and chiefs were established. Given the significance of personal relationships in a Melanesian cultural context, this relationship building was of utmost importance.

The makeup of the international TMG/PMG deserves special attention: in contrast to the mainstream tendency of having so-called robust peace-keeping mandates and interventions, the TMG/PMG was an unarmed unit, comprised of both military and civilian personnel, men and women, from Australia, New Zealand, Fiji, and Vanuatu. Of major importance was the participation of women. Bougainville women had female counterparts among the outsiders of the TMG/PMG. The participation of personnel from Fiji and Vanuatu was relevant because of the common Melanesian cultural background. Fijians and Ni-Vanuatu had obviously an advantage over other PMG members because of their cultural affinity to the Bougainvilleans (Boege 2019).

The Bougainvilleans managed to control the extent and content of the activities of the external actors at all times. This was mainly due to the fact that the local actors were successful in their insistence on having an unarmed intervention. This arrangement was carried through by the locals against considerable initial concerns of the interveners, in particular the Australian military, who felt uneasy about being unarmed in a volatile post-conflict situation. It meant that the interveners were dependent on the locals for their security and protection and not capable of enforcing anything against the locals' wishes or interests (Breen 2016). Hence the power relations between the internationals and the locals were in the latter's favor (while in most other cases of internationally assisted peacebuilding the former have the upper hand). Moreover, the locals were extremely smart in utilizing the capacities provided by the internationals for their own purposes. For instance, transport by PMG helicopter was extensively used by chiefs to get them to and from local peace meetings, villagers made comprehensive use of the PMG medical facilities, and the men used the paper of all the leaflets, flyers, newsletters, etc. distributed by the TMG/PMG for rolling their bush tobacco in. So one may argue that it was not so much the TMG/PMG's "core business" prescribed by the liberal peacebuilding agenda (supervise the cease-fire, assist in weapons disposal) which made it really useful in everyday life but more the "collateral goods" that its presence provided for the locals.

The examples given above demonstrate that in the local-international interface both a recalibration of relationships between the actors and a renegotiation of the content, aims, and strategies of the peace intervention took place. The liberal peace agenda was rearticulated and reshaped. At the end of the day, "the way the intervention developed was not so much a matter of careful planning, but rather a product of complex interactions of numerous often distinct interests among both international and local actors" (Regan 2010, pp. 162–163). In the course of everyday interaction with the locals, the internationals' peacebuilding agenda had to change considerably. The intervention was hybridized due to the agency of the locals who transformed the liberal peace agenda according to their own norms, interests, and ways of doing and understanding peace. The seemingly all-powerful liberal peace approach was rearticulated by its "recipients" on the ground, who turned out to be not simply grateful and abiding subjects of external agendas and strategies but powerful actors in their own right, maintaining autonomy and agency, neither merely adopting the liberal peace agenda nor resisting it totally. The all-too-often misused phrase of "local ownership" has real substance in the Bougainville case, with local ownership taken by the locals rather than granted and nurtured by the internationals (Krogstad 2014).

This also holds true for the most recent stage of the peace process. In the preparation phase of the independence referendum, and for the actual conduct of the referendum, international actors and institutions again played an important role, but the locals steered and controlled the process. Internationals provided substantial support to the ABG and the government of PNG. The abovementioned UN Bougainville Referendum Support Project gave assistance to the political dialogue between the ABG and GoPNG and between the parliaments of Bougainville and PNG, as well as to the weapons disposal process. It also supported the inclusion of women, youth, and persons with disabilities in preparations for the referendum.

Most importantly, the UN gave financial assistance to the Bougainville Referendum Commission (BRC), including for work on the voter roll, for the distribution of information material, and for a technical electoral assistance project. The BRC was established in 2017 as the independent administrative agency which, according to the BPA, was in charge of the referendum. The BRC had as its governing body a Board of Commissioners comprised of seven members, namely, the National and Bougainville Electoral Commissioners, two persons appointed by the GoPNG and two by the ABG, and a Chairperson appointed by the two governments. The understanding was that this Chairperson should be an eminent international elder statesman/stateswoman. Both governments agreed on the former Prime Minister of Ireland, Bertie Ahern, as the BRC Chairman. He was appointed in June 2018. The BRC Board was supported by a BRC Secretariat under a Chief Referendum Officer (also an international).

Although the BRC was only able to commence its work in earnest in early 2019 due to funding problems, it managed to do its job to the full satisfaction of all sides. The referendum, which took place from November 23 to December 7, 2019, was assessed as free and fair and transparent. The overwhelming majority of the 206,000 eligible Bougainville voters opted for independence. The referendum was observed by international observers, and a regional police support mission – made up of personnel from New Zealand, Australia, Fiji, Vanuatu, and the Solomon Islands – assisted the Bougainville police in provision of security during the referendum.

While international support in the phase of referendum preparations was no doubt of importance, the main foundations of its success were again laid by the Bougainvilleans themselves at the grassroots level. The 3 years in the lead up to the referendum were characterized by enormous efforts of Bougainvilleans to get “referendum ready.” In September 2016 the ABG agreed upon a “Bougainville Referendum Ready Concept,” which tasked each of the 33 Constituencies in Bougainville to prepare for the referendum. Constituency Referendum Committees (CRC) were established in every constituency; they carried out referendum awareness at the local level, with the aim of making each and every hamlet, village, ward, and constituency “referendum ready.” Furthermore, a dense network of local facilitators, in cooperation with the ABG, NGOs, and community-based organizations, conducted hundreds of local Referendum Dialogues in order to inform about the referendum and discuss the questions, concerns, and expectations of the people. For achieving “referendum ready” status, communities had to participate in weapons disposal and to conduct and finalize reconciliations addressing cases left over from the war (so-called crisis-related cases). A host of such reconciliations, often in combination with weapons disposal, was carried out in all parts of Bougainville in 2017, 2018, and 2019. These included smaller reconciliations at the level of families, villages, wards, and clans and “mass” reconciliations at district or constituency level. All constituencies were declared referendum ready before the actual conduct of the referendum, and Bougainvilleans indeed were ready when the time of the referendum came in November 2019.

The referendum was another high point of the Bougainville peace process, but it is not the end point. According to the BPA of August 2001, the referendum is non-binding. The BPA stipulates that both governments have to “consult” about its outcome, and the parliament of PNG has to ratify it. Therefore, Bougainville finds itself at the beginning of a transition process which most probably will take years. Only if this process can be managed peacefully, the success story of Bougainville peace formation will actually have a happy ending. At the same time, with the transition Bougainvilleans embark on a new journey: the journey of state-building or state formation. For in the eyes of the Bougainvilleans, the result of the referendum can only mean that the transition will be about implementation of independence. In the process of state formation, Bougainvilleans can build on the experiences of and the lessons learned in the period of peace formation. Bougainville will have to establish itself as a state so as to fulfill its obligations as a member of the international community of states; in the domestic realm, however, this polity does not have to be – and will not be – a proper Western-style Weberian state, but a home-grown variety imbued with the features of hybrid governance and security arrangements. Such a home-grown form of polity does not necessarily have to be seen as “second best” in comparison to the ideal type Weberian state but potentially can serve the needs of the people in effective and legitimate ways, not least in the domain of peace and security.

Conclusions

Bougainville has become a success story of peace formation based on positive mutual accommodation of local indigenous and introduced liberal institutions and procedures, thus bringing about a unique Bougainvillean form of “post-liberal peace” (Richmond 2009a, b), and demonstrating that “alternative versions of peace to the liberal peace can have legitimacy” (Mac Ginty 2008, p. 159). As the Bougainville experience demonstrates, peace cannot be “built” by just implementing a pre-planned international agenda; rather, peace formation is a multifaceted and complex international-local exchange, hybridizing processes and outcomes (Richmond and Mac Ginty 2014).

International actors were engaged in the Bougainville peace process, but they were not able to impose their liberal agenda on the locals. Local agency drove the process. Based on customary institutions and ways of operating, local agency was maintained in the everyday interactions with external actors. Customary institutions have proven to be remarkably resilient and of major significance for the organization of the everyday life of local people, not least during the stateless times of the violent conflict and its immediate aftermath. Accordingly, kastom played an important role in post-conflict peace formation. Kastom as everyday practice was also the main resource that local actors were able to draw upon in their interactions with external (international and central government) actors. Based on kastom, they managed to maintain autonomy and agency; they were forced neither into outright adoption of the international liberal peace agenda nor into outright resistance. Rather, they were able to negotiate the local-liberal interface largely on their own terms. The seemingly all-powerful liberal peace approach was rearticulated by its “recipients” on the ground. The locals managed to “kastomize” the liberal peace. At the same time, kastom was also “liberalized.” The results of these processes of working with and working through cultural difference are very specific hybrid forms of peace.

Peace on Bougainville might not fit the model of liberal peace. But for the Bougainvilleans, their own way of doing “peace” opens avenues to create peaceful political community which is different from the off-the-shelf packages offered by the international peacebuilding and state-building industry.

Cross-References

- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Peacebuilding

References

- Adams, R. (Ed.). (2001). Peace on Bougainville – Truce monitoring group. Gudpela Nius Bilong peace. Wellington: Victoria University Press.
- Australian Government – Australian Civil-Military Centre. (2012). Partnering for peace. Australia’s peacekeeping and peacebuilding experiences in the autonomous region of Bougainville in Papua New Guinea, and in Solomon Islands and Timor-Leste. Canberra: Australian Government.
- Boege, V. (2012). Hybrid forms of peace and order on a South Sea Island: Experiences from Bougainville (Papua New Guinea). In O. Richmond & A. Mitchell (Eds.), Hybrid forms of peace: From everyday agency to post-liberalism (pp. 88–106). Houndmills/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Boege, V. (2019). The rambutan, the chopper and the broken spear: Peacebuilding on Bougainville as a cross-cultural exchange. Peacebuilding, 7(1), 1–19.
- Boege, V., & Garasu, L. (2011). Bougainville: A source of inspiration for conflict resolution. In M. Brigg & R. Bleiker (Eds.), Mediating across difference. Oceanic and Asian approaches to conflict resolution (pp. 163–182). Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press.
- Boege, V., Brown, A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2009). On hybrid political orders and emerging states: What is failing – States in the global South or research and politics in the West? Berghof handbook dialogue series no. 8 (pp. 15–35). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Bougainville Peace Agreement. (2001). In: A. Carl & L. Garasu (Eds.), Weaving consensus – The Papua New Guinea – Bougainville peace process (Conciliation Resources Accord Issue 12/2002) (pp. 67–85). London: Conciliation Resources.
- Braithwaite, J. (2011). Partial truth and reconciliation in the long duree. Contemporary Social Science, 6(1), 129–146.
- Braithwaite, J., et al. (2010). Reconciliation and architectures of commitment. Sequencing peace in Bougainville. Canberra: ANU ePress.
- Breen, B. (2016). The good neighbour: Australian peace support operations in the Pacific Islands, 1980–2006. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brigg, M. (2014). Culture, ‘relationality’, and global cooperation. Global cooperation research papers 6. Duisburg: Centre for Global Cooperation Research.

- Brigg, M. (2016). Relational peacebuilding. Promise beyond crisis. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneckener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 56–690). London/New York: Routledge.
- Carl, A., & Garasu, L. (Eds.). (2002). Weaving consensus. The Papua New Guinea – Bougainville peace process (Accord issue 12). London: Conciliation Resources.
- Havini, M. T., & Tankunani Sirivi, J. (Eds.). (2004). ... as mothers of the land. The birth of the Bougainville women for peace and freedom. Canberra: Pandanus Books.
- Howley, P. (2002). Breaking spears and mending hearts. Peacemakers and restorative justice in Bougainville. London/Annandale: Zed Books/The Federation Press.
- Keesing, R. M. (1993). Kastom re-examined. Anthropological Forum, 6(4), 587–596.
- Krogstad, E. G. (2014). Local ownership as dependence management: Inviting the Coloniser Back. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 8(2–3), 105–125.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Indigenous peace-making versus the liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance. Hybrid forms of peace. Hampshire/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2016). What do we mean when we use the term ‘local’? Imagining and framing the local and the international in relation to peace and order. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneckener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 193–209). London/New York: Routledge.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2015). The fallacy of constructing hybrid political orders: A reappraisal of the hybrid turn in peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 23(2), 219–239.
- McLeod, L. (2015). A feminist approach to hybridity: Understanding local and international interactions in producing post-conflict gender security. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 9(1), 48–69.
- Regan, A. J. (2000). ‘Traditional’ leaders and conflict resolution in Bougainville: Reforming the present by re-writing the past? In S. Dinnen & A. Ley (Eds.), Reflections on violence in Melanesia (pp. 290–304). Annandale/Canberra: Hawkins Press & Asia Pacific Press.
- Regan, A. J. (2008). The Bougainville intervention: Political legitimacy and sustainable peace-building. In G. Fry & T. T. Kabutaulaka (Eds.), Intervention and state-building in the Pacific. The legitimacy of ‘cooperative intervention’ (pp. 184–208). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Regan, A. J. (2010). Light intervention. Lessons from Bougainville. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Regan, A. J., & Griffin, H. M. (Eds.). (2005). Bougainville before the conflict. Canberra: Pandanus Books.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009a). A post-liberal peace: Eirenism and the everyday. Review of International Studies, 35, 557–580.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009b). The romanticisation of the local: Welfare, culture and peacebuilding. The International Spectator, 44(1), 149–169.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London/New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2016). Peace formation and political order in conflict affected societies. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2019). Peace and the formation of political order. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 85–110.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Where now for the critique of the liberal peace? Cooperation and Conflict, 50(2), 171–189.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mitchell, A. (Eds.). (2012). Hybrid forms of peace: From everyday agency to post-liberalism. Houndmills/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tanis, J. (2002). Reconciliation: My side of the island. In A. Carl & L. Garasu (Eds.), Weaving consensus – The Papua New Guinea – Bougainville peace process (Conciliation resources accord issue 12/2002) (pp. 58–61). London: Conciliation Resources.
- UNDP. (2014). Peace and development analysis. Findings and Emerging Priorities. Port Moresby: United Nations Development Programme Papua New Guinea Country Office.
- Wallis, J. (2014). Constitution making during state building. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Wehner, M., & Denoon, D. (Eds.). (2001). Without a gun. Australians’ experiences monitoring peace in Bougainville, 1997–2001. Canberra: Pandanus Books.

Peace in International Relations Theory

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester, Department of Politics,
Manchester, UK

Definition/Description

This entry outlines and critically evaluates the different understandings, concepts, and approaches to peace that the different IR theories offer. It argues that though IR has had the study of peace at its heart since its beginnings, it has tended to rely on a very limited amount of work on peace, focusing more on the relationship between war, violence, power, the international system, and the state. Each IR theory offers a preliminary framework for peace, however, whether a victor's peace, law, rights, and democracy (a liberal peace), equality and sustainability (pointing to economic, postcolonial, gender, and environmental questions of peace with justice), at domestic, state, and international levels. They provide the basis for a more substantial engagement, beyond the usual recourse to negative or positive concepts of peace. More critical thinking problematizes issues of universalism, inter-sectional issues of race and gender, inter-generational questions of justice and equity, sovereignty versus fluidity, representation, and points to everyday and hybrid peace, and perhaps ultimately to a concept of peace with global justice. This entry disaggregates the implications for peace that each theory and methodology engenders, in order to open further, more sophisticated understandings of peace in IR theory.

Introduction

Looking at the discipline of IR through the lens of a search for peace (one or many) underlines paucity of its historical engagement with peace as a complex concept. IR theory has failed to develop an account of peace, focusing instead on the dynamics of power, war, and the state, assuming the realist inherency of violence in human nature and international relations, or liberal supremacy. Utopian and dystopian views of peace, relating to contemporary and future threats calculated from the point of view of states and officials, often delineate the intellectual extremes of a linear typology of war and peace inherent in mainstream international thought. The peace inferred in this typology is concerned with a victor's peace, a balance of power between states or the liberal domestic and international exemplars gleaned from the development of democracy, law, and capitalism. Each of these approaches takes priority over the subtle texture of everyday life of the millions of people living in conflict-affected environments. Even the ambitious peacebuilding efforts of the post-Cold War environment in places as diverse as Cambodia, DR Congo, the Balkans, East Timor, and Afghanistan, among many others, testify to this shortcoming. From an everyday perspective, the large-scale violent events of "war" maybe not be directly present in such contexts, but the structural, cultural, and environmental aspects of violence continue. As both Erasmus and Einstein famously pointed out in different centuries, peace was both separate and preferable to war. Peace and war should be held apart decisively and yet violence is an integral part of the lives of modern conflict-affected citizens in postwar arenas as well as in contexts where public security and urban violence is a concern (as in large parts of South America) but direct war does not exist (Ferreira 2017). After war, violence continues in direct, structural, cultural, and many other forms.

This raises the question of what the discipline of IR is for, if not for peace? For many, IR theory simply has not been ambitious enough in developing an "agenda for peace" in addition to investigating the causes of war. Axiomatically, Martin Wight once wrote that IR was subject to a poverty of "international theory." He also argued that its focus is the problem of survival (Wight 1966: 12–33). Such arguments are commonplace even in the context of more critical theoretical contributions to IR theory (Richmond 2002). Today, survival is not everybody's concern, especially those in the developed world. Such arguments usually support the position that liberal or neo-liberal polities, notably in the Western developed world, or closely related to its economy (such as China, or the Gulf states) are domestic oases of democratic and/or capitalist peace. They obscure the possibility that such polities are also likely to be engaged in a constant struggle for survival, or a war for "peace" on a systemic or ideological level. Thinking about peace opens up such difficult questions. Yet, many approaches to IR theory routinely ignore the question – or problem – of peace: How it is constituted and one peace or many? Even "successful" empires have developed an interest in an ideological and self-interested version peace (Salem 1997: 12), whether it was a Pax Romana, Britannia, Soviet, American, religious, nationalist, liberal, or neoliberal peace.

Many scholars have hoped that science would, as Hobbes wrote, open the way for peace (Hobbes 1998 [1651]: Chapter V). Hobbes, writing in the aftermath of a bloody English civil war wrote Leviathan (often held up to be the epitome of tragic realism in IR) to illustrate that peace was plausible in spite of hatred, scarcity, and violence. Of course, he also developed the notion of the Leviathan as a way to moderate the “natural state” of war. IR has instead focused on the latter (war as a natural state) rather than the former (peace as a natural state), despite the fact that so much of the ground work has been done in peace and conflict studies, anthropology, sociology, law, philosophy, archaeology, in the arts, in branches of several other disciplines, such as economics or psychology, and via the more critical approaches to the discipline of IR. The supposed Freudian death instinct has seemed to resonate more powerfully through the discipline than notions of peace (Freud 1975 [1922]). Yet, as Fry has argued, a vast range of anthropological and ethnographic evidence shows that peace, conflict avoidance, and accommodation are the stronger impulses of human culture (Fry 2007: 7). War is a significant part of western culture as well as others, but not of all cultures (Fry 2007: 208). Indeed, it is notable that in Western settings war memorials are frequent, particularly for WWI and II, but peace is rarely represented in civic space unless as a memorial of sacrifice during war. Similarly in art, aspirations for peace are often represented through depictions of war and violence, such as in Picasso’s Guernica (1937) or Goya’s, The Third of May, 1808: The Execution of the Defenders of Madrid, (1814). Lorenzetti’s The Allegory of Good Government (1338–1340) and Rubens’ Minerva Protects Pax from Mars (1629–1630) are notable exceptions. Further afield, one could point to the Ottoman Topkapi Palace’s Gate of Peace in Istanbul, and the Gate of Heavenly Peace leading into the Imperial City in Beijing (though these were, of course, associated with both diplomacy and imperial wars).

Peace can be seen in more critical terms as both a process and a goal, but following multiple paths simultaneously, always unfinished and unlikely to converge on a single outcome. Hybrid forms and processes fit best with the indicators developed by critical discussion of peace. This opens up a particular focus on the processes by which peace as a self-conscious and reflexive goal may be achieved. If peace is taken as a strategic goal, it would tend towards a focus on mutual preservation and never move beyond preliminary stages relating to security, but there are further, more inspiring, possibilities.

This is certainly not to dismiss the importance of mainstream IR, but to caution against its representation as a “complete” discipline, which it clearly is not. Indeed, there is a serious question as to whether aspects of orthodox approaches (by which I mean positivist debates derived from realism, liberalism, and Marxism) to IR are anti-peace, sometimes purposively, and sometimes carelessly. War, competition, trade, class, Eurocentricism, patriarchy, individualism, extraction, and imperialism are their main engines. The three main orthodox theories are often taken to offer determinist grand narratives: realism offers an elite and negative inter-state peace based on inherency; liberalism offers a one-size-fits-all progressive framework of mainly elite state and international governance with little recognition of difference; and Marxism offers grass-roots emancipation from determinist structures of the international political economy via violent state and global revolution.

In particular, peace in everyday terms requires an understanding of the hidden and long term workings of power in political, economic, and social terms. This requires engaging with the consequences of imperialism and colonialism, capitalism and extraction, patriarchy, state formation and state power, and class.

More than ever, research and policy informed by a contextual understanding of peace are needed, rather than merely a focus on fear reproduced by worst-case security scenarios stemming from a balance of power or terror derived from military, political, or economic analytical frameworks that assume violence and greed to be endemic. This contextual understanding needs to become a far better accommodation in what has now come to be called the international peace architecture: that is the international framework of law, institutions, agencies (covering security, development, refugees, peacebuilding, peacekeeping, culture, and others), INGOs, NGOs, and all of their partners. Indeed, in the contemporary context, it is also clear that any discussion of peace also connect with research and policy on development, on global and local justice, and on environmental sustainability. These are the reasons why the liberal peace (comprising law and human rights, democratic institutions, trade, and a vibrant civil society) and its more recent neoliberal derivation (security, trade, and capital are its main priorities) – the main concepts of peace in circulation today – are in crisis.

Much of the debate about war that dominates IR is also indicative of very unambitious and sometimes insensitive assumptions about what peace is or should be. This ranges from the pragmatic sole focus on the removal of overt violence, an ethical peace centered on a certain “centricism,” an exclusive ideology, to a debate about a self-sustaining peace within a certain set of boundaries. Anatol Rapoport conceptualized “peace through strength”; “balance of power”; “collective security”; “peace through law”; “personal or religious pacifism”; and “revolutionary pacifism” (Rapoport 1992). Hedley Bull saw peace as the absence of war in an international society (Bull 1977; Bull and Watson 1984), though of course war was the key guarantee for individual state survival. State formation and survival are thus central to such thinking about peace. These views represent the mainstream approaches and indicate why the creation of an explicit debate about peace is both long overdue and vital in an international environment in which major foreign policy decisions seem to be taken in mono-ideational environment where ideas matter, but only certain, hegemonic ideas. To investigate the concept of peace more precisely, it needs to be thought in the context of these different theories, in the context of other disciplines, as well as from other positionalities or through other methodologies. The latter imply the possibility of a radical break from perspectives reliant on traditional or even critical IR theories.

With the exception of orthodox versions of realism and Marxism, approaches to IR theory offer a form of peace that many would recognize as personally acceptable. Realism fails to offer much for those interested in peace, unless peace is seen as Darwinian and an unreflexive, privileged concept only available to the powerful and a bounded commonwealth they may want to create. Most realist analysis expends its energy in reactive discussions based upon the inherency of violence in human nature, now discredited in other disciplines (Fry 2007: 184, 193), which are ultimately their own undoing. This is not to say that other approaches do not also suffer flaws, but the focus on individuals, society, justice, development, welfare, norms, transnationalism, institutionalism, or functionalism offers an opportunity for a form of peace that might be more sustainable because it is more broadly inclusive of actors and issues. In other words, parsimony, reductionism, and rationalism run counter to a peace that engages fully with the diversity of life on this planet, and its experiences.

Peace and Methodological Considerations

Any discussion of peace is susceptible to universalism, idealism, communitarianism, exceptionalism, and even rejectionism. A minority think that war is the engine of progress and peace encourages sloth, though this ignores the vast majority of evidence pointing the gigantic losses and costs of war. Yet, peace as a concept can easily collapse under the weight of its own ontological subjectivity. A genealogical approach can be used to challenge the common assumption of IR theorists that peace as a concept is ontologically stable, in terms of representing an objective truth (plausible or not), legitimating the exercise of power, and representing a universal ethic (Foucault 1980: 121). To rehearse this, a genealogical approach allows for an investigation of the subject without deference to a meta-narrative of power and knowledge in order to unsettle the depiction of a linear projection from “origin” to “truth.” The camouflaging of the subjective nature of peace disguises ideology, hegemony, dividing practices, and marginalization. In addition, it is important to note the framework of negative or positive epistemology of peace, as developed by Rasmussen, which indicates an underlying ontological assumption within IR theory as to whether a broad or narrow version of peace is actually possible (Rasmussen 2003: 113).

The investigation of discourses indicates the problematic dynamics of positivist approaches (Foucault 1980: 30; 1972: 205) and allows for a deeper interrogation reaching beyond the state than a traditional positivist theoretical/empirical approach (Bleiker 2000). This enables an examination of competing concepts and discourses of peace derived from IR theory rather than accepting their orthodoxies. Peace, and in particular the liberal and realist foundations of the liberal peace, can be seen as a result of multiple hegemonies in IR (Hoare and Nowell-Smith 1971: 56–59). Deploying these approaches allows for an identification of the key flaws caused by the limited peace projects associated with peace in IR, and for a theoretical and pragmatic move to put some consideration of peace at the center of what has now become an “inter-discipline.”

For much of the existence of IR, the concept of peace has been in crisis, even though on the discipline’s founding after WW1 it was hoped it would help discover a postwar peace dividend. In this, it failed after WWI, which indicated yet again the limits of the victor’s peace, but it has been instrumental in developing a liberal discourse of peace after WWII, though this in itself has become much contested (as it certainly was during the Cold War). Even peace research has been criticized for having the potential to become “a council of imperialism” whereby telling the story of “power politics” means that researchers participate and reaffirm its tenets through disciplinary research methods and the continuing aspiration for a “Kantian University” (Ashley 2007). This effectively creates a “differend” underlining how institutions and frameworks may produce injustices even when operating in good faith (Lyotard 1988: xi). This requires the unpacking of the “muscular objectivism” (Appadurai 2001: 6) that has dominated IR in the western academy and policy world, allowing an escape from what can be described as a liberal-realist methodology and ontology connected to positivist views of IR. The demand that all knowledge is narrowly replicable and should be confirmed and implemented by “re-search” in liberal institutions, organizations, agencies, and universities without need for a broader exploration is not adequate if IR is to contribute to peace. Thus, the notion of methodological pluralism has become a generally accepted objective for researchers across many disciplines who want to avoid parochial constraints on how research engages with significant dilemmas, and who accept the growing calls for more creative approaches to examining the “great questions” of IR (Shapiro 2004). To gain a multi-dimensional understanding of peace as one of these great questions, one needs to unsettle mimetic approaches to representation that do not recognize subjectivity, rather than trying to replicate an eternal truth or reality (Bleiker 2001: 527; Adorno 1997; Gadama 1999; Constantinou 2004). IR theory should fully engage with the differend – in which lies its often unproblematized claim to be able to interpret the other – that its orthodoxy may be guilty of producing, and open itself up to communication and learning across boundaries of knowledge in order to facilitate a “peace dividend” rather than a “peace differend.”

The critique developed here is an attempt to contribute to the ongoing repositioning of a discipline now increasingly concerned with IR’s connections with everyday life and agency. IR requires a research agenda for peace if its interdisciplinary contribution to knowledge – and speaking truth to power foregrounding the needs and rights of the subaltern (Spivak 1988), within the possibilities of capacity and the expanding terms of global justice – is to be developed. IR needs to engage broadly with interdisciplinary perspectives on peace if it is to contribute to the construction of a framework that allows for the breadth and depth required for peace to be accepted by all, from the local to the global, and therefore to be sustainable. Like social anthropology, IR needs to have an agenda for peace, not just to deal with war, violence, conflict, terrorism, and political order at the domestic and international level within the confines of geopolitics and liberal internationalism, but also incorporating the interdisciplinary work that has been carried out in the areas of transnationalism and globalization, political economy, development, identity, culture and society, gender, children, and the environment, for example. Yet, where social anthropology, for example, has elucidated this agenda clearly, IR has been more reticent, despite the claims about peace made on the founding of the discipline (Gertz 2001). As with anthropology, IR should "... uncover counterhegemonic and silenced voices, and to explore the mechanisms of their silencing" (Bryant 2004: 8). Of course, this happens in the various areas, and especially in the subdisciplines of IR. Where there have been efforts to develop peace as a concept, this is by far counterbalanced by the efforts focused on war, terrorism, or conflict. Concepts of peace should be a cornerstone of IR interdisciplinary investigation of international politics and everyday life.

This is a perspective that can be described as "eirenist" (Richmond 2009, 2012), which stems from a subaltern positionality, when looking up at power structures and power relations, which helps to formulate new political claims for rights. In turn, these are connected to peace settlements and peacebuilding, shifting them from an association with the balance of power, social justice, or liberal peace, and towards newer conceptions of global justice.

Peace can thus be viewed from a number of perspectives. It can be a specific concept (one among many): it infers an ontological and epistemological position of being at peace, and knowing peace; it infers a methodological approach to accessing knowledge about peace and about constructing it; and it implies a theoretical approach, in which peace is a process and outcome defined by a specific theory.

The Concepts of Peace

What is peace? This would seem to be an obvious question deserving an obvious answer. Yet, the reluctance to open this debate could be merely an oversight, it could be because the answer is too obvious to waste time upon it, or it could be because once opened up, the debate upon peace offers all kind of possibilities, liberal, illiberal, or radical, and possibly subversive. Two World Wars and the Cold War would seem to have settled this basic question of modernity in favor of the "liberal peace," made up of a victor's peace at its most basic level, an institutional peace to provide international governance and guarantees, a constitutional peace to ensure democracy and free trade, and a civil peace to ensure freedom and rights within society (Richmond 2005).

This in Anglo-American terms places the individual before the state, though in Continental varieties, it sees the individual as subordinate to the state (a little noted, but significant point) (Williams 2006: 6). Both variations rest upon a social contract between representatives and citizens. Yet, events since 1989 indicate that peace is not as it seems. There may be a liberal consensus on peace, but there are many technical, political, social, economic, and intellectual issues remaining, and the very universality of the post-Cold War liberal peace is still contested in terms of components, and the methods used to build it (from military intervention to the role of NGOs, international organizations, agencies, and international financial institutions).

One approach to thinking about peace that is commonly used is to look back at its historical, international, uses. These generally include the following: an Alexandrian peace, which depended upon a string of military conquests loosely linked together; a Pax Romana, which depended upon tight control of a territorial empire, and also included a "Carthaginian peace" in which the city of Carthage was raised to the ground and strewn with salt to make sure it would not re-emerge; an Augustine peace dependent upon the adoption and protection of a territorial version of Catholicism, and the notion of just war; the Westphalian peace, dependent upon the security of states, geopolitics, and the norms of territorial sovereignty; the Pax Britannia, dependent upon British domination of the seas, on trade and loose alliances with colonized peoples, or more broadly dependent on imperialism; the Paris Peace Treaty of 1919, dependent upon an embryonic international organization, collective security, the self-determination of some populations into territorial entities, and democracy; the United Nations system, dependent upon collective security and international cooperation, a social peace entailing social justice, and the liberal peace, including upon democratization, free markets, human rights and the rule of law, development, and perhaps most of all, the support both normative and material, of the United States and its allies.

Finally, two new versions have appeared on the landscape: a neoliberal peace made up of states focused on security and trade; and a digital form of peace aimed at the tensions arising with the shift from analogue to digital processes and capacities and the radical changes this is engendering for society, the state, the global economy, and political life.

Though peace was supposed to be one of IR's key agendas when the discipline was founded in 1919, and certainly was explicitly part of the main institutional frameworks of the modern era, IR as a discipline has tended to deal with peace implicitly, through its theoretical readings in international order, of war, and history. It has done so in the light of assumptions about analogue forms of IR: face to face diplomacy and everyday life, moderated through human institutions at a certain speed, traditional forms of military, and the control of political discourse and law by key institutions such as certain states, or institutions of global governance, as well as fairly static forms of citizenship attached to a specific territory and state. The growth of global trade was connected with human development, understood as numerical indicator. This form of peace was slowly shifting away from its humanist components. Furthermore, the empirical events that mark IR tend to be associated with violence, rather than peace. As we move from the analogue to the digital, there is little reason to think matter will change. Even such an attempt as this study, ambitious though it might seem in its attempt to recast IR theory, is indicative of further and perhaps crucial weaknesses in both the discipline and its author's capacity to speak on behalf of anything other than the developed, Eurocentric, and enlightened discourse of IR, increasingly shifting from governmentality to digital biopolitics. To attempt to speak on behalf of those from other cultures, religions, and so-called underdeveloped regions would assume the viability of sovereign man's discourse of the liberal peace, and its newer, neoliberal, and technological twists and turns, which are exactly what is thrown into doubt by a consideration of peace from a conflict-affected positionality.

The following dynamics are characteristic of the way in which peace is often thought of and deployed in IR:

- (i) Peace is always aspired to and provides an optimum, though idealistic, point of reference.
- (ii) It is viewed as an achievable global objective, based on universal liberal norms presented as an objective truth, associated with complete legitimacy (e.g., peacebuilding).
- (iii) It is viewed as a geographically bounded framework defined by geopolitics, territory, culture, identity, and national interests (a realist perspective).
- (iv) It is related to a certain ideology or political or economic framework (liberalism, neoliberalism, democracy, communism, socialism, etc.).
- (v) It is viewed as a limited temporal phase.
- (vi) It is based upon state (via statebuilding) or collective security (e.g., through NATO or the UN).
- (vii) It is based upon local, regional, or global forms of organization and governance, perhaps defined by a hegemonic actor or a regional and multilateral institution.
- (viii) It is viewed as a top-down institutional framework or a bottom-up civil society oriented framework.
- (ix) The environment, gender, identity, legitimacy, and justice are either ignored as being too complex or viewed to be essential.
- (x) Most thinking about peace in IR is predicated on reacting to conflict, and at best creating an externally supported peace, not on preventing or creating a self-sustaining peace.

- (xi) Once military security has been achieved, peace is built through trade and interdependence (the neoliberal view).
- (xii) Technology in a digital world opens up new questions about peace.

Even in the realms of peace and conflict studies, the focus has been on preventing violence rather than on a sustained attempt to develop a self-sustaining order. One has to draw on a range of different disciplines, where fragments of knowledge are available to help us understand this complex area. Where attempts have been made to reflect on a viable world order in a number of different quarters, the liberal peace often emerged as the main blueprint approach after the end of the Cold War and the collapse of socialism. Neoliberal versions of peace focused on limited state agency and maximum trade have most recently been foremost. What is most important about this treatment is that as an objective point of reference, it is possible for the diplomat, politician, official of international organizations, regional organizations, or international agencies and NGOs, to judge what is right and wrong in terms of aspirations, processes, institutions, and methods, in their particular areas of concern. The liberal peace briefly became the foil by which the world was after 1990 until attention in the 2000s turned to a model based upon security and prosperity rather than rights and democracy (pointing to a comparison say between Denmark or Singapore as possible versions).

Perspectives on Peace in IR Theory

Realism implies a peace found in the state centric balance of power, perhaps dominated by a hegemon. Peace is limited to a balance of power and power-sharing, if at all possible. Research is required to understand how this operates. Idealism and Utopianism claim a future possibility of a universal peace in which states and individuals are free, prosperous, and unthreatened mainly because they adopt the same norms and identities. Research is required to base this future system on. Pluralism, liberalism, internationalism, liberal institutionalism, and neoliberalism see peace as existing in the institutionalization of liberal norms of economic, political, and social institutionalization of cooperation, regulation, and governance. Thus, research focuses on the conditions and processes of such governance. These approaches offer functional networks and organization, and transnationalism, between and beyond states, and the ensuing liberal peace is believed not to be hegemonic, but universal. The latter point allows the liberal peace to be constructed on behalf of conflict-affected societies by external actors. Structuralism and Marxist approaches see peace as lying in social justice, solidarity, and international cooperation along socialist lines, together with the absence of certain types of structural violence, often in structures which promote economic and class domination. Research is required to undercover power relations and their contradictions, stratification, and injustice, in order to perfect a response. Cosmopolitanism extends the liberal argument to include the development of a universal discourse between states, organizations, and actors for mutual accord. Constructivism combines these liberal and cosmopolitan understandings, allowing identities and ideas to modify state behavior but retaining the core of realism which sees states as underpinning order and peace as limited to institutional cooperation and a limited recognition of individual agency. Neoliberalism is also connected to these dynamics, shifting to the political benefits of market “authority” at the global, state, and social level, indicating that trade promotes cooperation at all levels (rather than extraction and exploitation). The neoliberal peace, meaning a light tough system of state and global governance focused on producing resilient and self-supporting populations, has become the most recent iteration of a global model for peace, for better or worse. Research focuses on these dynamics and their interactions.

Critical approaches also see peace as a consequence of a cosmopolitan, communicative transcendence of parochial understandings of global responsibility and action. Research needs to uncover its parameters to establish such global frameworks. More radically, poststructuralism represents peace as resulting from the identification of the deep-rooted structures of dominance and their revolutionary replacement as a consequence of that identification by multiple and coexisting concepts of peace which respect the difference of others. It does not offer a notion of state of global governance, however, warning instead of the risks of centralized power. Research thus must uncover power-relations, but refrain from any form of prescriptive behavior hence forth. Postcolonialism offers a notion of peace in which the global north and south achieve material equality as states through self-determination and equalization, or in which the southern subaltern defines the nature of quality of peace – upon which research focuses.

These research agendas are also clearly connected to ideological understandings of human history and society (left and right): none can claim to be purely scientific because in many ways they involve political discussions about how power and resources are and should be distributed.

Further areas have also opened up as a result of more critical understandings of power and politics: gender approaches indicate the deep and historical power relations underlying patriarchy and the very subtle ways in which this connects to geopolitics, authoritarianism, antidemocratic practices, capitalism, and social patterns of power. It offers a more complex and sensitized approach to the nature of inter-generational human society, and the damage caused by war, pointing to far more complex understandings of peace. Environmental approaches also connect to this, in that the misuse of resources underpins power in geopolitical, geo-economic, authoritarian, and patriarchal frameworks, exhausting or ruining the biosphere in the process. Also following the same logic is the way geopolitics and geo-economics have now expanded into a digital and technological terrain, which however also raises new critical possibilities. This underlines a shift not just away from centralized forms of state or imperial power and radical thought, postcolonialism, and anarchism might have it, but also a shift away from the centrality of humans – and their states or institutions – in global politics (recently explored in so-called new-materialist literature).

This brings the debate to a crucial point. In the past, war and peace were thought of in what might be called “analogue” modes: determined by material factors, geography, distance, time, and so forth. New technologies, with their impact on knowledge, communication, mobilities, and the amplification of power – indeed, the very nature of power – give rise to a very changed environment and what might be called “digital” modes of war and peace. Old constraints for both, related to power, distance, geography, human interfaces (diplomacy, borders, boundaries, institutions, etc.), now no longer apply. This risks conventional modes of violence being made far more dangerous in the collusion between violence, the state, capital, and technology. It requires a digital peace in response.

Such an analysis, by the way, rests on a much longer perspective than social sciences traditionally permit. In geological time, archaeological, historical, philosophical, and anthropological literature suggests that the stimulants for political violence and war run far ahead of social, state, or international capacities for peacemaking, but in the very long term, and despite terrible disruption, peace reforms and re-emerges, drawing on social networks, transnational capacity, and underground movements that seek to dismantle and reform power and conflict practices. This literature on the collapse of complex societies among others points to the way in which war and crisis go hand in hand with peace and order building in the long term.

One common thread within many implicit debates about peace is its use as something close to the Platonic “ideal form.” In The Republic, Socrates argued that truth is found in an ideal form, associated with “goodness” rather than in subjective perceptions and interests. This type of thinking indicates that there could be an objective reality of peace, but because it is an ideal form, it is probably not fully attainable (Plato 1941). Yet, it is often assumed that history is driven by a linear, rational progression toward that ideal form. The notion of peace as an ideal form has different implications for different approaches to IR theory, spanning the implicit acceptance that peace is a guiding objective even though it cannot be achieved to a belief that rational progress will lead to peace. Critical debates since the 1990s have attached this idea of the existence of an ideal form, and of linear progression, especially of the ends justifying the means to achieve it (which has become connected with fascism in particular). Recent counteractions have placed the state and the market at the center of peace and order, once again, replicating earlier debates between realists and liberals (or idealists) and seeming being condemned to repeat the past failure of nationalism and inequality.

Debates about peace thus span both classical and contemporary literatures, and a range of intellectual debates. These include what modern realists often described as the realism of Thucydides, Augustine, Hobbes, and Schmitt, in which peace was to be found in bounded and often tragic strategic thinking in which unitary actors delineate their own versions of peace within the framework provided by sovereign states. These approaches' tragedy lies in their unitary internal assumptions of a shared peace within political units based upon common interests and values, and the difficulties in maintaining peaceful relations with other external polities that have their own notions of peace. Peace in these terms is derived from territorial units, determined to protect their identities and interests, and is therefore extremely limited. For this reason, an international system comprised of states pursuing their interests is said to exist, which denotes few shared values beyond domestic politics, and rests upon the hierarchical ordering of international relations. This is based upon relative power and alliances derived from shared interests rather than shared values. Peace is conceptualized as very basic, or as a utopian ideal form, which is unobtainable.

A less harsh version of peace is to be found in the idealist, liberal, and liberal interventionist strands of international thought. These also focus on territorially bounded identity and interest units – mainly states – but see their interests defined in terms of cooperation and shared norms rather than power. Consequently, these approaches engender a concern with the nature of the domestic polity and the best way of creating domestic political harmony to ensure peaceful relations between polities at the same time. This type of thinking has given rise to major projects to construct international regimes, laws, and norms to limit war and engineer peace between polities, including states and multilateral organizations. Here, questions of justice begin to emerge at a normative level in relation to peace between and within political units. Subsequent debates about justice revolve around the discovery and construction of legal frameworks based upon universal norms and so acceptable to the majority of states within an international society or community. This latter concept denotes the liberal belief that shared values at the international level indicate a community of states rather than merely system of states as realists would have it. For those interested in what happens inside states rather than between them, peace may rest upon the preservation of a socio-economic order, or the use of a particular type of constitution, or the construction of an equal and just society. Democratic peace theorists are able to extend this domestic peace to an international community. The liberal peace is the widely used term to describe this broad framework.

Lying behind such thinking is one of the core implicit debates in IR theory. Peace is seen to be something to aspire to though it is perhaps not achievable. This failure rests on human nature for realists, or the failure of institutions for liberal, and is reflected in the nature of states and organizations, which at best can attain a negative peace. This is the hallmark of conservative and realist thought, though for liberals, a positive peace is plausible through the adoption of certain domestic and international practices that are aimed at guaranteeing the rights and needs of individuals. For some, idealism could also be pragmatic and merely rest upon the discovery of the obstacles to peace, and then upon the deployment of the correct methods required to overcome these obstacles. The Westphalian international system represents a compromise upon both positions. This is indicative of Galtung's negative and positive peace framework, which is the most widely used conceptualization of peace (Galtung and Jacobson 2000). This can be extended, as Rasmussen has indicated, into a negative and positive epistemology of peace, meaning that ontological assumptions are made about whether a negative or positive peace can exist (Rasmussen 2003: 113). The dominant mode of thought, however, which informs most IR theorists and policymaking today is that "... the logic of strategy pervades the upkeep of peace as much as the making of war..." (Luttwak 1987: xi). In other words, a negative epistemology of peace arises from strategic thinking, and even the application of force or threat. War can even therefore be seen as the "origin of peace" by exhausting opponents and their resources (Ibid: 57).

The Marxist-derived orthodoxy offers a concept of peace relating to the international political economy, the problem of economic exploitation of its weakest actors, and the subsequent need for radical reform. It posits that the international economic system defines the behavior of its key actors. From this perspective, peace can be seen in terms of development and the just division of resources. Social and economic justice provides the dominant focus of significance for peace within Marxist-influenced approaches in IR. This raises the issues of the emancipation of the individual, the provision of welfare, and the sharing of resources equitably across society without regard to political, economic, or social hierarchies. Beyond the state, Marxist-inspired approaches focus on the division of resources through an equitable international economy and the reform of neoliberal strategies of trade and development, as well as transnational approaches to global political and social communication designed to produce fairer communication, dialogue, and interaction.

For contemporary realists such as Waltz or Mearshimer, peace is very limited, delineated by a natural confluence of interests rather than a mechanistic reform or management of interests or resources. For contemporary and broadly liberal thinkers like Falk or Keohane, or pluralist thinkers like Burton, the latter provides the basis for a more humane peace guided by liberal norms and human needs. For English School thinkers, and for constructivists, peace is equated with the liberal nature of the state, which provides security and manages equitable and transparent transnational mechanisms of exchange and communication. In terms of social constructivism, peace could be both pragmatic and ideational, and constructed by actors with the resources and broad consensus to provide both social legitimacy and material value. To some degree, critical theorists and certainly poststructuralists see more ambiguity in peace and war and recognized that peace would only be achieved in pluralist forms by uncovering the relationship between power and discourse, and the ways in which behavior is constrained and conditioned by the hidden exercise of hegemonic power. Peace is impeded by hegemony, "Orientalism," or by methodological, ontological barriers erected by the tradition of liberal-inspired post-Enlightenment rationalism and institutionalism. Critical theorists and post-structuralists are interested in identifying the structures of hegemony and domination, and the case of the former creating universal programs providing a cosmopolitan response. Newer critical debates push these intentions even further, identifying new and hidden power structures and dynamics, taking the autonomy of the subject ever further, pointing to environmental and research constraints, and questioning the nature of human society.

A major criticism of the "agenda for peace" in IR has been that it has been strongly influenced by idealism or utopianism, rather than reflecting a pragmatic engagement with the problems of IR, power, and structure, or the failings of human societies. However, the democratic peace project, and the broader forms of the liberal peace, illustrates that this is not the case. The concept of liberal peace has practical implications and can be conceptualized without necessarily entering into the realms of fantasy. Yet, this concept also is subject to significant problems. Because thinking about peace is dominated by a set of key assumptions, most theorists, policymakers, and practitioners assume that the concept of peace they deploy is ontologically stable. By extension, this means that peace can be engineered in environments where it may not yet be present. As a result, peace is constructed according to the preferences of those actors who are most involved in its construction. This confirms the pragmatism inherent in an agenda for peace, but also the interests that may lurk behind it.

For a complex set of reasons, it has become the orthodoxy that attaining peace is a long-term process, which is probably not achievable but is worth working towards. As a result, intellectual energy tends to be focused upon problem-solving from the perspective of achieving a minimalist version of peace in the short term. This then provides the basis for a longer term refinement of the concept. In the short term, stopping violence and providing basic security are often the focus, with more sophisticated attempts to provide rights, resources, and democratic institutions seen as a longer term process. The hope is that the short-term peace will be superseded in the longer term by a self-sustaining peace according to a universally agreed formula. International theorists, political scientists, diplomats, officials, politicians, and citizens rarely question whether they understand these short-term and long-term concepts of peace, but instead take them as predetermined givens, which should simply be implemented when the opportunity arises. Certainly, among groups united by common interests, this appears to be a plausible position. What becomes clear when one examines the views of actors that are divided by interests, culture, conflict, ideology, religion, or other forms of identity, is that these assumptions of peace break down very easily. An assumption of peace tied up in the framework of a group's position on a particular piece of territory, or the superiority of one culture, identity, or religion over another, can easily become a source of conflict. One could make a strong argument that IR is actually about conflicting images of peace, as opposed to conflicting interests. Some of those images are based on hierarchical views, others on conceptions of justice and equality. Furthermore, it has recently become clear that realist, liberal, Marxist, and various critical concepts of peace have not been developed in view of the full set of dynamics peace needs to engage with. They are still very much preliminary theories.

War and peace are seen as separate concepts, which are the antithesis of each other, particularly for pluralists, liberals, constructivists, and critical theorists. Peace may masquerade as war for some poststructuralists. For the new wave of radical thinkers, peace cannot be seen merely in political, economic, and social terms, however, but involves questions related to a much more holistic perspective of the global environment, nonhuman affairs, the Anthropocene, and the directions that new technologies take us in.

Yet, this separation has always been weak. For example, in the debate on peace-enforcement or humanitarian intervention, and on statebuilding, there has been much tension because their methods often rest on coercion and even violence. This is partly why the debates over state-building in Afghanistan and Iraq in the early 2000s have been so controversial. The lack of intervention aimed at peacebuilding or statebuilding has also been controversial, however, most notably in the case of Syria after 2011. This separation in part rests on the notion that sovereignty is the organizing system of the international system. A lack of separation, on the other hand, suggests the international system is not made up of sovereign states, but of constant interventions, whether multilateral, unilateral, or increasingly governmental or even automated, built into the very fabric of an interventionary rather than international system.

The contemporary concept of the liberal peace, which is expressed in different ways throughout much of IR theory, also makes this separation. The liberal peace provides the "good life" if its formulas are followed, for all, and without exception, and even if it rests on a coercive introduction through invasion or peace enforcement. But it is organized around states with some international coordination, rather at a global level and focused on the equalization of and between societies. This has mainly occurred within a western context, which immediately points to a major flaw in thinking about peace (and indeed in the capacity of this study), which is firmly rooted in a critique within this western, secular context. It suggested a hierarchy of states with the west leading the rest, rather than a system engaging with global equality as its eventual goal.

Furthermore, this version of peace rests upon a set of cultural, social, and political norms, often dressed up as being secular, though closely reflecting the nonsecular religious writings on the issue. The Christian notion of crusades for peace, or the use of force to construct peace, is taken for granted in this context. Lawful self-defense and just war remain integral to the preservation of this “tranquil” order, once all peace efforts have failed. From this have sprung the great peace conferences that marked the nineteenth and twentieth centuries and which contributed to the emergence of the United Nations. Also visible have been the various social movements, charities, and NGOs campaigning for human rights, voting rights, the banning of certain weapons, and more recently, multiple forms of humanitarian assistance in conflict and disaster zones. Yet, where and when IR theorists do attempt to engage with peace as a concept, they often focus upon ending war, or preventing war, and in the context of units such as states, IOs, or even empires. The role and agency of individuals and societies in the creation of peace tends to be less valued, the focus instead being on grand-scale and top-down political, economic, military, social, and constitutional peace projects undertaken beyond the ken and capacity of the individual (Aron 2003 [1966]: 151).

The liberal peace is closely associated with the orthodoxy of IR theory and can be seen as an outcome of a hybridization of liberalism and realism. This can be described as liberal-realism in which force, controlled by states, underpins the democratic and liberal political, social, and economic institutions of a liberal polity. Liberal-realism explains both violence and order, and how they are related in the maintenances of domestic and international order. Structural thinking adds to this a concern with social justice and legitimacy, but this is mainly dealt with in a liberal-realist context by democratization rather than the promotion of social justice. So while the structuralist or Marxist agenda has been partially incorporated, it lacks the affinity of liberal-realism, where hierarchies, states, and groups accept certain levels of dominance and intrusive governance in order to also receive related, progressive freedoms. Equality or environmental sustainability is not a key issue, rather security and stability discursively construct international life.

A number of strategies for the conceptualization of peace can be identified in the literature on IR, and its subdisciplines. These can be summarized as follows:

- (i) Idealism depicts a future complete peace incorporating social, political, and economic harmony (of which there are no clear examples) represented by internationalism, world government, and federation. This type of peace is represented as desirable but effectively unobtainable. It is an “ideal form,” though for idealists, this does not mean that attempts to achieve it should be abandoned. Some idealists saw the League of Nations, and later the UN, attempts at disarmament, and the outlawing of war, as an attempt to attain this peace.
- (ii) Liberalism, liberal internationalism/institutionalism, neoliberalism, liberal-imperialism, and ultimately liberal-realism depict an achievable general peace derived from international institutions and organizations representing universal agreements and norms. This provides a basis for individualism, and social, political, and/or economic rights and responsibilities, based upon significant levels of justice and consent. It is generally acknowledged that this form of peace will probably be marred by injustice, terrorism, secessionism, or guerilla warfare perpetrated by marginalized actors which do not accept the norms and frameworks engendered in such universal agreements. Still, this represents a form of peace that is believed to be plausible, achievable, though often geographically limited by boundaries that exclude actors who do not conform to such a view of what is essentially an international society. Peace in this framework can be constructed by actors with the necessary knowledge and resources, probably resembling a Kantian Perpetual Peace. This is commonly referred to as the liberal peace, embodied in the UN system and a post-Cold War “international society.” In the early post-Cold War period, human rights and democracy were its most prominent features.

Post-2001, state security and openness to global trade have presented a different character – a neoliberal peace.

- (iii) Realism (and other power-/interest-focused theories) represents IR as relative anarchy managed by a powerful hegemon or an international system, which produces a basic international, though not necessarily domestic, order. This imposes a limited temporal and geographically bounded order, which attempts to manage or assuage border conflicts, territorial conflicts, ethnic, linguistic, and religious (and other identity conflicts). The resulting type of peace rests upon the balance of power, or domination, perceptions of threat, and the glorification of national interest in relation to military might. There have been many examples of this type of peace, from Alexander's conquest of the ancient world, the Pax Romana (and the destruction of Carthage), the Pax Britannia, and the Paris Peace Treaty of 1919. Neorealism extends this analysis into a discussion of unipolar, bipolar, and multipolar systems of power, but the focus is still on how geopolitics underpins the international system, and how war is part of that system, promoted by the structural conditions of international anarchy.
- (iv) Marxist-inspired structuralist insights into peace represent it as resting on social justice, equality, and an equitable system of international trade, where states and actors are not hierarchically organized according to socio-economic class indicators. Peace in these terms is achievable, but probably only after massive, and probably revolutionary, upheaval in the international economy, in traditional class and economic hierarchies, and in systems based upon imperialism. The goal is to reorder states and the international in a way which better represents the interests of workers and society, rather than wealthy elites.
- (v) Critical theory and poststructuralism, resting to some degree upon the intellectual legacy of (i), (ii), and (iv), depict an emancipatory peace, in multiple forms, in which consideration of forms of justice, identity, and representation allows for marginalized actors (such as women, children, and minorities) and environmental factors can be considered. Critical theory seeks a universal basis to achieve such an outcome through ethical forms of communication, whereas poststructural approaches are wary of accepting its plausibility in the light of the dangers of universalism, the problem of relativism, and the genealogical scale of the obstacles to emancipation. Hypothetically, both approaches concur that marginalized actors and discourses should be recognized, and discourses and practices of domination should be removed through radical reform. Whether there can be a universal peace or multiple states of peace, reflecting pluralism/relativism and even anarchism, is heavily contested. However, there is still a strong sense that peace as an ideal form – or multiple ideal forms – could be achieved within critical theory. Poststructuralism certainly does not deny the possibility of peace but sees it reflecting difference, autonomy, everyday life, hybridity, and personal agency.

One Peace or Many Peaces?

One of the ways in which IR theory and international practices related to the ending of war can be evaluated is by opening up the conceptualization of peace by asking the question: one type of peace or many? Clearly, the liberal peace has been the dominant conceptualization deployed in these processes and has represented an amalgam of mainstream approaches to IR theory. The shift towards a neoliberal form of peace, connected closely to security and capital, to which the state is subservient, as opposed to rights, welfare, and democracy, has been strongly critiqued for decades. This makes it all the more surprising that the neoliberal peace became the next stage in the development of the concept. IR theory and associated debates also offer a powerful critique of both conceptualizations and offer a glimpse of alternatives (Mac Ginty 2007; Fry 2007; Kelly 2000).

These alternatives are as yet not comparable to the liberal/neoliberal peace in their intellectual conceptualization and have had little impact on the policy world. A debate about other forms of peace, and a negotiation between the different actors, levels of analysis, and many issues involved, is necessary. Indeed, for IR to contribute to its original promise (even if weak) of peace, it must become more fully involved in this process of theorization of peace and a negotiation between its possible concepts. By developing a clear idea of the type of peace that each theoretical perspective envisages, and also developing theoretical approaches in the light of this debate, this process of evaluation and development could begin, setting peace and its variants at the center of IR theory rather than as is currently the case, at its periphery. For this process to be meaningful, however, there also needs to be a debate about what basis such evaluation would rest on. Would it aspire to a cosmopolitan and universal set of basic norms? Would it aspire to a communitarian version of peace? Would it give rise to one peace or many peaces? If the latter, how would the via media, or process of negotiation and mediation, between them operate? Would peace be limited simply to the prevention of open violence, or would it aim to respond to structural violence, inequality, domination, and marginalization? What are the factors that create a sustainable peace in this case, how might such a peace be theorized, and then constructed? Or, perhaps, even more ambitiously, how can a self-sustaining peace be created?

A universal, single form of peace will inevitably be seen by some as hegemonic and oppressive, and though there may indeed be a dominant version or agenda for peace in IR theory and in practice (currently the liberal peace), this reflects the intellectual limitations of the orthodoxy of the discipline, its culture, ontology, and methods, rather than its achievements. It is clear that peace is essentially contested as concept. Inevitably, and following on from this, it is a subjective concept, depending on individual actors for definition, different methods and ontologies, and indeed different epistemological approaches. Its construction is a result of the interplay of different actors' attempts to define peace and according to their relative interests, identities, power, and resources. For this reason, different approaches to IR theory produce different discourses about peace, some within the liberal peace framework, and some outside of it, both as rhetorical devices and as practices (Foucault 1980: 205; Hoare and Nowell-Smith 1971). In the context of such inter-subjective concepts, theory is inevitably intertwined with practice and cannot merely be read as representing an orthodoxy, hegemonic or otherwise. In practice, in different political, social, and economic environments around the world, there are rich variants of peace known to other disciplines or perhaps awaiting discovery. Yet, the liberal and later neoliberal peace have become hegemonic concepts. They are wedded to a contradictory mix of territorial sovereignty, the democratic state, global governance, rights, and economic trade and extraction. The shift into more complex and technological forms of politics (digital international relations) may advance rights and democracy, but it is perhaps more likely that it will facilitate the advance of neoliberalism over the liberal state.

To counter this, peace might instead be contextualized more subtly, geographically, and culturally, in terms of identity, and the evolution of the previous socio-economic polity. This means that one should be wary of a theoretical approach, or an empirical analysis, or a policy, which suggests that the institutions, norms, regimes, and constitutions associated with peace can be applied equally across the world. There needs to be a differentiation between international order and peace in a global context, as well as local order and peace in a local or indigenous context. This means that peace as a concept can be subjected to very specific interpretations, determined by politics, society, economy, demography, culture, religion, and language. It should not merely be a legitimating trope applied to bolster a specific theory, policy, or form or organization but conceptually and theoretically should represent a detailed engagement with the multiple dynamics of conflict, war, and disorder as well as the social, political, and economic expectations, practices, and identities of its participants. Engaging with the multiple concepts of peace forms the heartland of IR's quest to contribute to an understanding of stability and order and the "good life" (and digital versions of the latter now on the horizon).

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace after Conflict
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Ethnographic Peace Research
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace
- ▶ R2P and Prevention

References

- Adorno, T. W. (1997). Aesthetic theory. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Appadurai, A. (2001). Grassroots globalisation and the research imagination. In A. Appadurai (Ed.), Globalisation. Durham and London: Duke University Press.
- Aron, R. (2003/1966). Peace and war: A theory of international relations. London: Transaction.
- Ashley, R. (2007). Comments at a conference on his work and 'oeuvre'. UK: University of Newcastle, 19 April.
- Bleiker, R. (2000). Popular dissent, human agency, and global politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bleiker, R. (2001). The aesthetic turn in international political theory. Millennium, 30(3), 509–533.
- Bryant, R. (2004). Imagining the modern. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Bull, H. (1977). The anarchical society. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Bull, H., & Watson, A. (1984). The expansion of international society. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Constantinou, C. (2004). Political discourse: Words, regimes, Seditions. London: Routledge.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. (2017). Estudos Críticos da Paz e Crime Organizado Transnacional. Revista Crítica de Ciências Sociais, 11(3), 29–50.
- Foucault, M. (1972). The archaeology of knowledge. London: Tavistock Publications Ltd.
- Foucault, M. (1980). In C. Gordon et al. (Eds.), Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and other writings. Brighton: Harvester.
- Freud, S. (1975/1922). Beyond the pleasure principle. New York: Norton.
- Fry, D. (2007). Beyond war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Gadama, H. (1999). Turth and method. New York: Continuum.
- Galtung, J., & Jacobson, C. G. (2000). Searching for peace: The road to transcend. London: Pluto Press.
- Gertz, C. (2001). Available light: Anthropological reflections on philosophical topics. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Hoare, Q., & Nowell-Smith, G. (1971). Selections from the prison notebooks of Antonio Gramsci. Lawrence and Wishart.
- Hobbes, T. (1998/1651). Leviathan. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kelly, R. C. (2000). Warless societies and the origins of war. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Luttwak, E. N. (1987). Strategy: The logic of war and peace. Cambridge, MA: Harvard.
- Liotard, J.-F. (1988). The Differend: Phrases in dispute (G. V. Abeele, Ed.). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2007). Reconstructing post-war Lebanon: A challenge to the liberal peace? Conflict, Security & Development, 7(3), 457–482.
- Plato. (1941). The Republic of Plato (Francis MacDonald Comford, Trans.). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rapoport, A. (1992). Peace: An idea whose time has come. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Rasmussen, M. V. (2003). The west, civil society, and the construction of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2002). Maintaining Order; Making Peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). A post-liberal peace: Eirenism and the everyday. Review of International Studies, 35, 557–580.
- Richmond, O. P. (2012). A post Liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Salem, P. (1997). A critique of Western conflict resolution from a non-Western perspective. In P. Salem (Ed.), Conflict resolution in the Arab World. Beirut: American University of Beirut.
- Shapiro, I. (2004). Problems, methods, and theories. In S. K. White & J. Moon (Eds.), What is political theory (pp. 194–213). London: Sage.
- Spivak, G. (1988). Can the subaltern speak? In C. Nelson & L. Grossberg (Eds.), Marxism and the interpretation of culture (pp. 271–313). University of Illinois Press.
- Wight, M. (1966). Why is there no international theory. In H. Butterfield & M. Wight (Eds.), Diplomatic investigations (pp. 12–33). London: Allen and Unwin.
- Williams, A. (2006). Liberalism and war. London: Routledge.

Peace Infrastructures

Balázs Áron Kovács
forumZFD – Forum Civil Peace Service, Davao City, Philippines

Synonyms

I4P; Infrastructures for conflict transformation; Infrastructures for peace; Peace and dialogue structures; Peace architecture

Definition

Peace infrastructures are persistent networks of institutions, organizations, and mechanisms that span various, potentially every level of a society, which contain expertise in conflict resolution or conflict transformation, and address ongoing or emerging conflicts within their respective areas of influence. Sometimes the individual components of such networks are also referred to as peace infrastructure. Usually, these peace infrastructures or their components are present in the context, in which case peacebuilding efforts aim at their strengthening, or they are created as part of a peacebuilding intervention.

No universally accepted definition of peace infrastructures exists in the literature or practice. The most widely referred to, but by no means exclusively accepted one, is that provided by UNDP's Bureau for Crisis Prevention and Recovery, according to which an "infrastructure for peace is a network of interdependent systems, resources, values and skills held by government, civil society and community institutions that promote dialogue and consultation; prevent conflict and enable peaceful mediation when violence occurs in a society" (UNDP 2013).

Introduction

The concept "peace infrastructures" emerged in the peacebuilding literature of the 1990s along with the shift of focus from conflict resolution to conflict transformation. The term itself was originally coined as "Infrastructures for Peace" by John Paul Lederach (1997, p. XVI), and this remains widely used both in the literature and in practice, along with its popular shorthand I4P. It emphasized the aspiration of transformatory approaches in peacebuilding to generate structural and cultural change beyond reaching a formal agreement between conflict parties (e.g., Notter and Diamond 1996).

Since its emergence, the concept has undergone changes and reinterpretations. The early formulations envisioned peace infrastructures as structures that concentrate, empower, and magnify the already existing capacities in conflict-affected societies to address ongoing and emerging conflicts as close to the source as possible while contributing to the dissemination of a culture of peace. Accordingly, they focused on civil society organizations, local governance structures, and religious and so-called traditional leaders and mechanisms of conflict resolution. Since the early 2010s institutional actors such as the United Nations and states have become more active in promoting the creation of peace infrastructures, which now increasingly reflect their priorities and assumptions.

Peace infrastructures can function as a general framework for conflict transformation or as an element of peacebuilding interventions. These differences have led to divergent trajectories in how the concept is used in practice.

Theory formation on peace infrastructures has primarily been driven by practice, especially locally driven efforts at violence mitigation and conflict resolution observed since the late 1980s and early 1990s. The experience accumulated from these influenced the emerging conflict transformation school from where the concept emerged. In the following the theoretical considerations will be explored, followed by practical ones. Some of the cases that inspired the theory will be discussed at the end of the entry, under Practice, along with cases that made use of the concept.

The Origins of Peace Infrastructures

Thinking about the structures necessary to sustain peace goes back to the earliest phase of theory construction in peacebuilding. Johan Galtung (1976) suggested that “structures must be found that remove causes of wars and offer alternatives to war in situations where wars might occur” (p. 298) in order to increase societies’ resilience to violent conflict. The end of the Cold War in the late 1980s opened up the space to address intrastate conflicts in ways that was not normally possible under the conditions of bipolarity, giving way to contemporary international peacebuilding. With the subsequent emergence of conflict transformation as an approach, the interest focused on those substate-level structures that held the potential to enhance the capacity of society to sustain peace:

I believe that the nature and characteristics of contemporary conflict suggest the need for a set of concepts and approaches that go beyond traditional statist diplomacy. Building peace in today’s conflicts calls for long-term commitment to establishing an infrastructure across the levels of society, an infrastructure that empowers the resources for reconciliation from within that society and maximizes the contribution from outside. (Lederach 1997, p. XVI)

Much of the more immediate impetus for theory construction came from praxis, the often grassroots-based localized peace initiatives (Mitchell and Nan 1997). These included various local peace committees and zones of peace created in regions as far apart as the Horn of Africa, Central America, and Southeast Asia (e.g., Garcia 1997; Hancock and Mitchell 2007; Lederach 1997; Lopez-Reyes 1997; Mouly 2013).

Accordingly, for the first decade of the concept’s existence, it was the primary domain of what Newman (2009) described as transformatory peacebuilding. It aimed at mobilizing the existing resources in society to create local peace and prevent local conflict, with a view of linking these initiatives with each other. To better understand what it meant, it is worth briefly dissecting the key points of Lederach’s original proposal from 1997: the need to go beyond statist diplomacy, long-term commitment, reconciliation, and the middle-out approach (see: Kovács 2018, pp. 117–123).

Lederach, in particular, called for going beyond what he called “statist diplomacy,” which had characterized first-generation peace missions (Kenkel 2013), conflict management, and resolution. In intrastate conflicts, which came to dominate the post-Cold War landscape, state sovereignty could not be the basis of conflict settlement the way it is in “traditional” interstate conflict resolution. This was needed from a practical perspective as well, since intrastate conflicts are rooted in contradictions that cannot be resolved by the fiat of an agreement between high-level political leaders. Perhaps most importantly, however, Lederach’s proposal was part of a shift in the ethics of peacebuilding itself. Rather than systemic stability or state security, peacebuilding ought to prioritize the common people and create conditions in which they could thrive.

Since the time of Robert McNamara’s time at the helm of the World Bank (1968–1981), international development has been financed, and therefore planned and implemented, through the project approach (Ghani and Lockhart 2008, p. 95). Due to institutional reasons, peacebuilding inherited this. Lederach’s call for long-term commitment questions the project-based approach, pointing toward the high complexity of peacebuilding, the time needed for cultural change to take place, and the unpredictability that is implied in the work. Sustainable peace infrastructures can help overcome the shortcomings of the project time horizon and donor fatigue, which may set in much before the transformation from a conflict to a peaceful society happens.

Reconciliation for Lederach (1997) is a “point of encounter” (p. 27). This is understood metaphorically as the locus where paradoxes can be overcome and enemies can deal with the past and plot an interdependent course into the future (Lederach 1999, pp. 51–61) and, in the case of peace infrastructures, in the physical and institutional sense as well. Reconciliation is broader, however, than simply creating some kind of agreement between parties in conflict; it is a place where diverse social strata, insiders, and outsiders, including domestic and international actors, come together. In this encounter the local is always primary to the international whose role it is to support the efforts of those seeking to build peace in the midst of conflict. Ultimately, only locally created, or at least accepted and embedded, peace infrastructures can be sustainable without continued supply of external resources.

Finally, the idea that the individual components of a peace infrastructure be connected across levels of society reflected Lederach's thinking at the time about the need for a middle-out approach. For him, leaders at the three main levels of society – elite, grassroots, and the middle – have particular opportunities and limitations in shaping a peace process. It is exactly the flow of information, coordination, and support across these levels that increase the possibility of success and sustainability. The creation of a persistent network – an infrastructure – makes this more likely to happen, while it also allows for better targeting of capacity development for key people and groups.

Divergent Definitions and Conceptual Core

The logic behind peace infrastructures was being used from the early 1990s by conflict transformation practitioners seeking both structural and cultural transformation in conflict-affected contexts, without them necessarily calling their approach to it “peace infrastructures.” From the mid-2000s, and in particular after 2010, however, the interest shifted to peace infrastructures as a discrete, circumscribed, and even deliberately designed kind of intervention, particularly in support of larger peacebuilding schemes. This can be traced to Kofi Annan's time as UN Secretary General, forcefully expressed in his progress report on the prevention of armed conflict to the General Assembly of the United Nations (2006), in which he encouraged states to develop their own infrastructures for peace along with pointers as to the possible forms in which it can be done.

Pursuant to this the UN took a proactive role in promoting the creation of peace infrastructures. In 2010, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) convened a seminar in Naivasha, Kenya, where the participants drafted a definition: “dynamic network of interdependent structures, mechanisms, resources, values, and skills which, through dialogue and consultation, contribute to conflict prevention and peace-building in a society” (Kumar 2011, p. 385; Kumar and De la Haye 2012, p. 14). This evolved later into the UNDP definition at the beginning of the entry.

With the weight of the UN behind it, a period of intense attention and theorizing began. The Journal of Peacebuilding and Development dedicated a special issue (van Tongeren et al. 2012) to it, and the Berghof Foundation issued a Dialogue Series (Unger and Lundström 2013). The divergent definitions created since highlight the conceptual fluidity of peace infrastructures, the diverse experiences from which theories draw, and its double rootedness in the bottom-up tradition of conflict transformation and the top-down, state-centric approach of institutional peacebuilding. Ulrike Hopp-Nishanka (2013) defines it as follows:

Peace infrastructures consist of diverse domestic, inter-connected forms of engagement between conflict parties and other stakeholders. Their organisational elements can be established at all stages of peace and dialogue processes, at all levels of society, and with varying degrees of inclusion. The objective of peace infrastructure is to assist the parties (e.g. through capacity building or advice), the process (e.g. through mediation between the conflict parties or facilitation of public participation), or the implementation of process results (e.g. through monitoring and coordination of agreement implementation). (p. 4)

Hopp-Nishanka emphasizes the domestic character of peace infrastructures and by extension local ownership. At the same time, she is interested in creating tangible organizations/institutions, arguing that peace needs an “address.”

A very different definition is offered by Jeannine Suurmond and Prakash Mani Sharma (2013), who put what they call the “peace needs” of society at the center:

the structures, resources, and processes through which peace services are delivered at any level of a society. It is helpful to make a distinction between formal and informal infrastructures for peace. Formal infrastructures for peace have a physical structure, a degree of organisation, stability, mandate, resources, training, and are recognised as such by their beneficiaries, or “users.” Examples include community mediation committees, local peace committees, peace radio stations, peace agreement monitoring mechanisms, religious institutions, and zones of peace. By contrast, informal infrastructures for peace are those that emerge on an ad hoc basis, do not require a physical structure, and operate without funds. Examples include the many traditional dispute resolution mechanisms [in Nepal]. Together, they make up the Infrastructure for Peace (I4P) of a society. (p. 3)

A definition as this allows for a freer, potentially more contextually appropriate and inclusive notion of peace to emerge and dictate the form – or absence of it – of peace infrastructures. The problem with such an approach is that it does not take into consideration the extent to which such needs can be shaped, created, or tailored by powerful elites or external interveners, leaving open space for manipulation.

The conceptual and practical heterogeneity shown by the four definitions – Lederach’s, UNDP’s, Hopp-Nishanka’s, and Suurmond and Sharma’s – discussed is an enduring character of peace infrastructures. While the UNDP definition dominates the field, many actors in the field pursue peacebuilding agenda that approximate alternative understandings.

Having said this, a conceptual core has emerged, which allows the identification of peace infrastructures as such, as well as the design of new ones. Accordingly, every such infrastructure has components that have the capacity – know-how, social embeddedness, authority, public trust, etc. – to resolve conflicts within their reach. These components can be very diverse, ranging from various peace committees (e.g., local, regional, national), traditional conflict resolution mechanisms (e.g., tribal leaders, religious authorities, village elders), peace museums, educational institutions, particularly those that deliberately decide to address conflicts in some way, zones of peace, local governments, ceasefire monitoring committees to the extent of their mandate, certain government agencies, various early-warning systems, and even the justice system of the state or non-state actors in some cases.

These components are networked in more-or-less persistent structures. This connectedness allows the components to support each other in resolving conflicts. Such support can be offered both horizontally and vertically. Horizontal support can take the form of providing advice, independent or disinterested counsel, and intervention. Vertically, it can facilitate information flows and provide expertise missing at other levels, such as contextual knowledge or technical know-how.

The inclusion of the “right” actors in a peace infrastructure is a central issue. This typically means the broadly understood civil society, including local nongovernmental organizations, community-based organizations, churches and religious leaders, traditional leaders, educational institutions, or the local structures of the state such as municipal governments (Odendaal 2010, pp. 19–22). More often than not, particularly in the cases where peace infrastructures emerge organically, these are their originators. Ultimately, long-term conflict transformation depends on civil society; it makes sense, therefore, to include its members in these efforts.

The strategic inclusion of key conflict actors in the infrastructures is necessary for reasons of legitimacy and viability (Odendaal 2012). This can mean the direct inclusion of both (all) or only one conflict party, or only their indirect inclusion. Odendaal and Olivier (2008, pp. 13–14) argue that both sides to a conflict need to be included, while Hopp-Nishanka (2013) suggests that at least one of the actors should be part of a peace infrastructure. There are numerous examples, however, where the inclusion of conflict actors was only indirect, such as in the case of local peace committees in Nicaragua (Mouly 2013) or peace zones in the Philippines (Avruch and Jose 2007), where the infrastructures themselves were purely civilian (civil society, the religious). In these cases the organizers engaged the armed groups and the state’s military, getting them to (explicitly) agree not to initiate hostilities or even to not enter armed within a defined area in order to reduce violence in their localities. Ultimately, which actors comprise a peace infrastructure is dependent on the capacities and opportunities present in the context, though as they progress engaging, possibly integrating the conflict actors and the state – itself a conflict actor in most cases – is inevitable.

Contemporary Peace Infrastructures

At present, the term peace infrastructure covers a wide range of structures, initiatives, and networks. These include organically-emerged, grassroots initiatives, which are created by and among populations directly affected by armed conflict in a bid to reduce violence and/or to resolve conflicts within their purview locally; already existing mechanisms such as indigenous and other “traditional” forms of conflict resolution, especially when newly-networked either with similar entities or others to function as such; sometimes they are created, in a top-down fashion, by external interveners, such as the UN, or the state itself where the conflict takes place. This diversity in form is not only generated by the great variety of agents who create them but is also required by the need to be both viable and locally relevant and to be able – eventually – to connect to other components.

Examples of possible components include zones of peace; dialogue platforms; local, regional, and national peace committees; peace museums; religious institutions; educational institutions and academic programs; think tanks; art centers; early-warning mechanisms; and certain government units among others (e.g., Ryan 2012; Suurmond and Sharma 2013; van Tongeren 2011).

It is important to be aware that the heightened interest among international and/or institutional peacebuilding actors, particularly those working within a liberal peacebuilding framework, has come about in parallel with the so-called “local turn” peacebuilding (e.g., Leonardsson and Rudd 2015; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Paffenholz 2015) and the emergence of hybridity as an important area of enquiry in the peace and conflict research agenda (e.g., Boege et al. 2008; Clements et al. 2007; Mac Ginty 2011; Millar 2014). While Lederach (1997) already put local peacebuilders at the center of his conflict transformation framework, it was adopted about a decade later by the abovementioned institutional actors, often creating designed hybrid structures, trying to merge traditional, local systems and values with those of a modern Weberian state, globalized market economy, and electoral democracy.

Categorizing Peace Infrastructures: Formal and Informal, Top-down and Bottom-up

One way to categorize peace infrastructures and their components is distinguishing between formal or informal ones. There are two – mutually compatible – ways to think about formal peace infrastructures, either through their relationship with the state or through their persistence. Thus, those that are either part of the state apparatus, for example, a local dispute resolution body organized by a state agency or a local government, or a specialized unit within the apparatus such as a ministry or one of its deconcentrated organs are formal. Some are created by the state – or an intergovernmental organization – without being state institutions themselves. Think tanks, public foundations, or so-called government-organized nongovernmental organizations (GONGOs) belong to this group. Finally, there are organically grown, often originally grassroots or civil society organizations that are officially recognized by the state. These are also formal peace infrastructures.

Even without being a state institution or having been recognized by the state, one can also think of formal infrastructures as those that have a physical and/or institutional structure that remains in place for an extended period of time. These are often civil society organizations, civic associations, and so on that have some tangible physical presence such as an office, an internal structure that allows for division of labor, and/or mechanisms to secure their functioning even when the membership changes. Some indigenous conflict resolution mechanisms also belong to this type. They are present in communities for many generations, usually adapting in some way to changing circumstances, their membership and point of access is known in the community, and they have long-established methods to settle disputes. Whether they are recognized by the state and in what form varies from country to country and from case to case.

Informal infrastructures are, in contrast, those that are not organized or recognized by the state, or which lack the kind of structure or long-term physical presence in an area described above. They are often transient, though some might persist for longer periods. Typical examples include local, grassroots, or civic initiatives or ad hoc dialogue platforms created by established entities such as NGOs, other civil society organizations, local governments, and so on. Some of these later become formalized either through co-optation by the state or through their own decision.

The recent literature almost uniformly argues in favor of creating formal peace infrastructures, even when they recognize the contributions of informal ones (e.g., Hopp-Nishanka 2013; Suurmond and Sharma 2013), or argue for their superiority in some aspects (Odendaal 2010). This fits the liberal peacebuilding paradigm, which to a significant extent – and increasingly – overlaps with statebuilding (e.g., Cubitt 2013; Kovács 2018). While it is possible, in theory, for institutional actors to stimulate the creation of informal peace infrastructures, this seldom if ever happens. Similarly, these actors can engage already existing ones, but the interaction between them pushes informal structures toward formalization.

It is also possible to distinguish between peace infrastructures that originated in a bottom-up or top-down process. This tends to overlap with the formal-informal division but not entirely. There are examples of formal peace infrastructures created close to the site of conflict by local governments, which were then scaled up by the national government to eventually span all levels of the administrative apparatus of the state as was seen in Ghana (Odendaal 2012). Examples also abound where bottom-up informal peace infrastructures assumed a more formal character over time, often linking up with state institutions in the process (e.g., Adan and Pkalya 2006; Mouly 2013).

Now that peace infrastructures have become a “peacebuilding tool” in domestic and international interventions, the aforementioned

localization and hybridity also reinforce the preference for creating formal infrastructures or formalizing informal ones. The “local” is often not readily accessible to institutional peacebuilding actors for a number of reasons including geographical distance or isolation, institutional distance, the absence of the state, and epistemological differences between modern, rational-bureaucratic institutions and organizations formed along different – often called “traditional” – principles. Thus, on the one hand, the experience of the first two decades of peacebuilding points to the necessity of engaging and eventually integrating “the local;” on the other hand, this “local” does not necessarily lend itself easily to this. Creating hybrid peace infrastructures is one way to bridge this gap. It creates a space where institutional peacebuilding actors – be they the state or international organizations – can insert their structures – and epistemology – to make the traditional accessible and legible while having direct access to it and benefiting from its legitimacy. At the same time, designed hybrid peace infrastructures may serve the needs of traditional, often indigenous, communities inasmuch as they can allow them to adapt to and survive in a changed environment, they can neither hold at bay nor transform.

Conceptually, therefore, it is useful to disaggregate these and treat them as distinct phenomena. A structure organically emerging from a conflict context as a way to improve the survival chances of a community is fundamentally different to a structure put in place from outside with the aim of stabilization or statebuilding. Genuinely local initiatives may or may not be “traditional;” in fact they are often nontraditional and novel, but they emerge from the context and as such can be seen as adaptation of a society to changing circumstances. In this sense, they are emancipatory. Formal peace infrastructures, especially the ones created in a top-down fashion, tend to serve the interests of the state and statebuilding, which can be at odds with the interests of communities affected by conflict. In other words, locally emerging peace infrastructures can be seen as the emergence of new socio-cultural traits within society, attempts at adapting to changed circumstances, while top-down ones are often constraints put in place by the higher levels that local societies eventually need to adapt to.

It does not follow that formal peace infrastructures cannot, by definition, be emancipatory, or that they cannot serve the interests of these communities, but the priorities are clearly different, as are the actors in control of them. This can have practical implications for peacebuilding actors who seek to engage with these peace infrastructures whether they be complete outsiders such as international organizations (the UN or INGOs) or semi-outsiders like domestic NGOs from outside the area of the peace infrastructure in question.

The Importance of Peace Infrastructures

As Ulrike Hopp-Nishanka (2013) argued, the fundamental usefulness of having a peace infrastructure in place in a conflict or post-conflict situation is that it “gives peace an address.” Persistent structures such as these can generate trust within communities divided by violent conflict, as well as trust in that conflicts can be resolved nonviolently. When a group of people come together and create a peace infrastructure, it is partly a public expression of their belief in and commitment to creating a more peaceful community or to address underlying causes of conflict not talked about (e.g., Iyer 2004). While this may seem trivial, in highly polarized situations, talking about peace may be perceived as disloyalty, even betrayal. Thus, challenging cultures of violence and silence is a crucial step toward building peace.

When a peace infrastructure is in place, it allows for the accumulation of expertise in conflict resolution within a community. This is an invaluable resource well beyond addressing the armed conflict directly. Such knowledge and skills help resolve communal-level conflicts of various kinds from potentially violent marital issues to land disputes. Often, these are effective local drivers of armed conflict, but even when not, it is important for a community to have the capacity to address them nonviolently.

When properly functioning, a peace infrastructure can facilitate the flow of information needed to prevent the outbreak of violence and direct peacebuilding resources to where they are needed (e.g., Brand-Jacobsen and van Tongeren 2012; Ryan 2012).

Finally, peace infrastructures can be a point of encounter between a conflict-affected community and external peacebuilders and, if properly handled, a site of empowerment. Sooner or later communities in peacebuilding contexts come into contact with outside peacebuilding actors, be they agents of the state, domestic or international NGOs, or international organizations. From the perspective of the outsiders, a compatible interlocutor is usually necessary to have access to a community, which is why much of international peace work is done through some form of partnership approach with local civil society or community-based organizations. Thus, if there is a peace infrastructure in place at any level in a society, it provides a much needed – and particularly well-suited – entry point for peacebuilding. Conversely, a peace infrastructure can attract the outside resources it needs to help its work. And while on the surface the relationship between well-endowed external (especially international) actors and local ones is highly asymmetrical, the contextual knowledge, embeddedness, and legitimacy of the local actors balance out the resource differential. Thus, when its members are conscious and prepared, a peace infrastructure can have quite broad space to set the parameters of its engagement with more powerful external actors, zones of peace being a case in point where they have been able to achieve this with armed factions. This is where mid-level domestic or international NGOs can play a pivotal role, developing the capacity of local actors to better manage these relationships.

Criticism

When revisiting the concept, John Paul Lederach (2012, pp. 11–12) warned in unambiguous terms of the risks of institutionalization, professionalization, and bureaucratization. According to him, the creation of permanent institutions, such as those promoted by institutional peacebuilding actors, means the creation of bureaucracies, with their attendant rules and regulations, specialization and compartmentalization, and the resulting reduction of creativity and generative capacity, and finally an interest in self-perpetuation.

Professionalization is linked to bureaucratization, which increasingly needs staff trained and qualified in particular ways. This, Lederach argued, is supposed to increase the legitimacy of the institutions, but it also leads to channeling resources toward incidentals such as formalized tools, standardized tasks, and ultimately, again, further decrease in creativity. It also creates a distance between the communities peace infrastructures serve and the people who staff them. While it fits well with the ways of working of international peacebuilding organizations, it does not lead to improved peacebuilding outcomes (Lederach 2012, p. 12).

Elite takeover happens when a peace infrastructure is captured by local or national elites, setting its agenda in a way that it reflects the elite's notions of peace and their interests. No kind of peace infrastructure is immune to elite takeover. More often than not, it is members of the elite themselves who are key conveners of a peace infrastructure. They can be local leaders, elders, members of the clergy, tribal leaders, and so on, such as it happened in Nicaragua (see below). This in itself does not constitute elite takeover, given that they exercise their authority in the interests of their community, for example. Sometimes, local or domestic elites are not the creators of the peace infrastructures, but they are able to use their position to take control of and use them to their own ends.

Finally, a third line of criticism concerns the co-optation of peace infrastructures – individual entities as well as the approach itself – by, generally, the liberal peacebuilding project and, specifically, peacebuilding-as-statebuilding. Oliver Richmond (2013a), for example, pointed out the inherent tension between peace formation processes originating from and rooted in the conflict-affected society and the statebuilding, institutionalizing impulses of internationals, as well as the possibility of synthesis (Richmond 2013b). Peace infrastructures when used in the interest of statebuilding are easily instrumentalized by elites, most especially domestic and local elites. They can use them to penetrate hitherto hard-to-reach segments of society and geographical areas to expand state power that serves the interest of the elites in control of the state (Kovács 2018). Such efforts involve co-optation and the remaking of local societies in the image of the modern state, simplifying and making it more legible to power. And while facilitating information flows is a possible key advantage of having a peace infrastructure, when mobilized toward the ends of building the state, this can easily mean channeling intelligence up and instructions down.

Peace Infrastructures in Practice

Their spontaneous emergence in communities and their interactions with the state and international peacebuilding actors or, vice versa, their creation by the latter to reach the local means the form of peace infrastructures and the trajectories they take are as diverse as the cases themselves. The three examples below highlight some of this diversity. Other examples not detailed here are also worth mentioning: in South Africa the dismantling of apartheid was accompanied by a peace infrastructure with an expiry date – it was meant to close with the transition (Ball and Spies 1998); in Nepal the state created a Ministry of Peace and Reconstruction as part of its – internationally guided – peace process, accompanied by a top-down state-organized network of peace infrastructures (Giessmann 2016; Suurmond and Sharma 2013); the Ghanaian state developed its own national peace infrastructure by appropriating local-level ideas, creating a pyramidal hierarchical structure mirroring the state's administrative structure, into which it co-opted civil society, religious, and so-called traditional leaders (Verzat 2014), a clear example of a state attempting to make a complex social reality simple and legible.

When developing the concept of infrastructures for peace, Lederach (1997) relied strongly on the experience of Nicaragua, making the various local peace initiatives there the first to be discussed as such. During the civil war of the 1980s, peace initiatives sprung up in various parts of the country, initiated and supported by local community and religious leaders of the Catholic and Protestant churches. Beyond them, the membership of these structures included so-called insider mediators (residents trusted by the conflict parties) and in some cases the representatives of the conflict parties themselves. They “supplemented existing networks of personal contacts, enabling information exchange and continual dialogue” (Odendaal 2010, pp. 29–30).

These came to be called peace commissions after the Esquipulas II peace agreement called for the creation of a National Reconciliation Commission, tasked by Daniel Ortega with creating “a more extensive internal structure that included region-specific commissions and an extensive network of local commissions” (Lederach 1997, p. 50). Thus, the peace infrastructure of Nicaragua simultaneously emerged from bottom-up and top-down, meeting as a result of a prospering peace process to end formal hostilities as well as contributing to its success. The individual peace infrastructures created during the 1980s were not uniformly successful, yet some have adapted to the post-conflict context and survived into the 2010s (Mouly 2013).

Much of the recent literature (e.g., Chuma and Ojielo 2012; Kumar and De la Haye 2012; Odendaal 2010; van Tongeren 2011) identifies the experience of the Wajir District Development Committee as a key inspiration for the approach. The first recorded peace infrastructure grew out from the initiative of a group of local women in the Wajir District of Kenya, on the Somali border, who sought to ameliorate the clan conflicts in the region. They did this by persuading clan leaders to engage in addressing the clan feuds. Later, seeing the success of the initiative led to its expansion into a civil society peace movement (Adan and Pkalya 2006), generating a code of conduct between the clan elders. Eventually, the civil society organizers approached the representatives of the state, pursuant to which the Wajir District Development Committee was created with the participation of “the heads of all government departments, representatives of various peace groups, religious leaders, NGO representatives, village chiefs and security officers” (Odendaal 2010, p. 40).

The case of Wajir is interesting because its local success prompted the government, backed by the international donor community, to replicate the model and export it to other parts of the country. Likely this is why it became the go-to case study of peace infrastructures in the 2010s when international donors, particularly UNDP, adopted the approach. A great number of local peace committees were established by a variety of actors including the state, which eventually created the National Steering Committee on Peacebuilding and Conflict Management (NSC) to coordinate peacebuilding activities in Kenya, including the local peace committees (Odendaal 2010, pp. 40–41).

Kenya’s peace infrastructure was further expanded and diversified after the election-related violence of 2007–2008, during which the presence of local peace committees had a mitigating effect (Chuma and Ojielo 2012, pp. 27–28). This eventually led to the creation of the Uwiano Platform, an early-warning mechanism created for the 2010 constitutional referendum (Chuma and Ojielo 2012).

In a way, the example of the Philippines is an illustration of the shift from organically grown initiatives that provided the basis of the early thinking about peace infrastructures in the 1990s to a more international theory-driven top-down creation of peace infrastructures with an aim to bolster the state. Over the course of 60 years of conflict between the government and Moro and communist insurgents, the Philippines gave rise to a number of initiatives that fit the within the peace infrastructure approach, though they are not called so. These are found both ends of the top-down-bottom-up spectrum, predominantly grassroots initiatives as well as government-organized ones.

On the one hand, from the 1980s onward several peace zones have been created in all conflict areas of the country, in which civilian communities declared their villages as zones of peace (some used different terminology such as space of peace) (e.g., Avruch and Jose 2007; Garcia 1997; Iyer 2004; Macaspac 2018). The common thread among these is that they are local initiatives, often though not always supported by external ranging from national and international NGOs to religious and academic institutions. Peace zones are created through an agreement between the community and the armed factions – typically the Armed Forces of the Philippines and a non-state armed group present in the area – in which certain rules of behavior are laid down to ensure armed violence does not take place within the designated zone. The communities also design mechanisms to deal with intra-communal conflict, to promote a culture of peace, and to facilitate development-oriented activities. Some of these have survived for decades, while many initiatives eventually failed. And while it is desirable that these zones contribute to the larger peace processes (GTZ n.d.), and many are supported by organizations with wide reach, they have not been organized into some kind of mutually supporting network.

On the other hand, the government initiated an ambitious program in 2010, the Payapa at Masaganang Pamayanan (PAMANA, Peaceful and Prosperous Community) to address what the government sees as the root causes of the conflict, such as the absence of government in remote areas and the lack of access to government services. The design itself is rooted in already existing economic development and conditional cash transfer programs of the government, which they tweaked to meet peacebuilding needs, in the idea and design of the World Bank-funded Kecamatan Development Program in Indonesia and in earlier counterinsurgency approaches of the Armed Forces of the Philippines, themselves based on the experience of the Thai military in the Deep South of Thailand (Kovács 2018, pp. 181–185).

Divided into three “pillars,” the program targets the macro, meso-, and local levels. At the macro level it seeks to create peace-promoting legislation and improve governance in the line agencies, regional, provincial, and municipal levels of government. The rest of the program is focused on development projects, primarily, though not exclusively physical infrastructure. These are large installations at the meso- (subregional, provincial, municipal) level and small-scale infrastructure projects at the village-level, where they are decided on and often implemented through a community-based participatory process. The government uses these projects to address the abovementioned supposed causes of conflict, to instill conflict sensitivity in the decision-making, planning, and implementation processes of the government at all levels of public administration, and finally to demonstrate its commitment to constituencies of insurgent groups with which it has a peace agreement and to win the hearts and minds of the population in the areas of communist New People’s Army with which it is at open conflict (Kovács 2018).

Summary

Peace infrastructures are a broad concept, manifested in diverse organizational forms. Much of the theory construction, especially during the 1990s and 2000s, followed practice. A conceptual core has emerged since, which includes the existence of some persistent structures, networked with others, that have the capacity to address conflict at their level and location and possibly assist other members of the network to do the same. The relative openness of the concept, in combination with the great variety of actual peace infrastructures, allows for a creative yet guided approach to building peace in conflict-affected and post-conflict societies. While they can be important loci of communal self-empowerment, peace infrastructures are often drawn into the service of statebuilding, to consolidate systems of domination. In such cases it may be more appropriate to talk about infrastructures for pacification, rather than infrastructures for peace.

The networked nature of peace infrastructures can help integrating various levels of intervention, in particular “the local,” which is often hard to reach – though whether that integration serves to emancipate or to pacify depends to a significant extent on the circumstances and the agenda of the actors involved. It can also integrate diverse actors horizontally and thus help mobilize peacebuilding resources in ways other interventions may not be able to. As a practical approach, they can help reduce violence, rebuild trust, and consolidate the gains of peace processes. When functioning well, peace infrastructures can serve their communities' needs well beyond the armed conflicts as a reaction to which they were created.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation

References

- Adan, M., & Pkalya, R. (2006). The Concept Peace Committee: A Snapshot Analysis of the Concept Peace Committee in Relation to Peacebuilding Initiatives in Kenya. Nairobi: Practical Action.
- Avruch, K., & Jose, R. S. (2007). Peace zones in the Philippines. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 51–69). Bloomfield: Kumarian Press.
- Ball, N., & Spies, C. (1998). Managing conflict: Lessons from the South African peace committees. Retrieved from http://www.ciponline.org/images/uploads/publications/Nicole_Ball_SA_Peace_Committees.pdf
- Boege, V., Brown, A., Clements, K. P., & Nolan, A. (2008). On Hybrid Political Orders and Emerging States: State Formation in the Context of "Fragility". Berlin: Berghof Research Centre for Constructive Conflict Management. Retrieved from: https://www.berghof-foundation.org/fileadmin/redaktion/Publications/Handbook/Articles/boege_et_al_handbook.pdf
- Brand-Jacobsen, K., & van Tongeren, P. (2012). Infrastructure for Peace: A way forward to peaceful elections. New Routes, 17(1).
- Chuma, A., & Ojielo, O. (2012). Building a standing national capacity for conflict prevention and resolution in Kenya. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(3), 25–39. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.774790>.
- Clements, K. P., Boege, V., Brown, A., Foley, W., & Nolan, A. (2007). State building reconsidered: The role of hybridity in the formation of political order. Political Science, 59(1), 45–56. <https://doi.org/10.1177/003231870705900106>.
- Cubitt, C. (2013). Constructing civil society: An intervention for building peace? Peacebuilding, 1(1), 91–108. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756274>.
- Galtung, J. (1976). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking, and peacebuilding. In J. Galtung (Ed.), Peace, war and defence: Essays in peace research volume II (Vol. II, pp. 282–304). Copenhagen: Christian Ejlens.
- Garcia, E. (1997). Filipino zones of peace. Peace Review, 9(2), 221–224. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10402659708426054>.
- Ghani, A., & Lockhart, C. (2008). Fixing failed states: A framework for rebuilding a fractured world. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Giessmann, H. J. (2016). Embedded peace – Infrastructures for peace: Approaches and lessons learned. Retrieved from New York. Retrieved from: https://www.undp.org/content/dam/undp/library/Democratic%20Governance/Conflict%20Prevention/Berghof-UNDP_EmbeddedPeaceI4P_2016.pdf
- GTZ. (n.d.). Practitioner's guide: Peace zones. Retrieved from: <http://www.methodfinder.net/principles88.html>
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. R. (Eds.). (2007). Zones of peace. Bloomfield: Kumarian Press.
- Hopp-Nishanka, U. (2013). Giving peace an address? Reflections on the potential and challenges of creating peace infrastructure. In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice. Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- Iyer, P. (2004). Peace zones of Mindanao, Philippines: Civil society efforts to end violence. Cambridge, MA: CDA Collaborative Learning Projects. Retrieved from: <https://www.cdacollaborative.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/01/Peace-Zones-of-Mindanao-Philippines-Civil-Society-Efforts-to-End-Violence.pdf>
- Kenkel, K. M. (2013). Five generations of peace operations: From the “thin blue line” to “painting a country blue”. Revista Brasileira De Politica Internacional, 56(1), 122–143. Retrieved from Go to ISI://WOS:000322955500007.
- Kovács, B. Á. (2018). Peace infrastructures and state-building at the margins. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kumar, C. (2011). Building national “infrastructures for peace”: UN assistance for internally negotiated solutions to violent conflict. In S. A. Nan, Z. C. Mampilly, & A. Bartoli (Eds.), Peacemaking: From practice to theory. Santa Barbara: Praeger.
- Kumar, C., & De la Haya, J. (2012). Hybrid peacemaking: Building national “infrastructures for peace”. Global Governance, 18(1), 13–20.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1999). The journey toward reconciliation. Scottsdale: Herald Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (2012). The origins and evolution of infrastructures for peace: A personal reflection. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(3), 8–13. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.767604>.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 825–839. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029905>.
- Lopez-Reyes, R. (1997). Establishing Salvadoran zones of peace. Peace Review, 9(2), 225–231. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10402659708426055>.

- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Macaspac, N. V. (2018). Insurgent peace: Community-led peacebuilding of indigenous peoples in Sagada, Philippines. Geopolitics, 24(4), 839–877. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14650045.2018.1521803>.
- Millar, G. (2014). Disaggregating hybridity: Why hybrid institutions do not produce predictable experiences of peace. Journal of Peace Research, 51(4), 501–514. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343313519465>.
- Mitchell, C., & Nan, S. A. (1997). Local peace zones as institutionalized conflict. Peace Review, 9(2), 159–162. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10402659708426044>.
- Mouly, C. (2013). The Nicaraguan peace commissions: A sustainable bottom-up peace infrastructure. International Peacekeeping, 20(1), 48–66. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2012.761833>.
- Newman, E. (2009). “Liberal” peacebuilding debates. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding (pp. 26–53). Shibuya-ku: United Nations University Press.
- Notter, J., & Diamond, L. (1996). Building peace and transforming conflict: Multi-track diplomacy in practice (Occasional paper number 7). Arlington: The Institute for Multi-Track Diplomacy.
- Odendaal, A. (2010). An architecture for building peace at the local level: A comparative study of local peace committees. New York: UNDP.
- Odendaal, A. (2012). The political legitimacy of National Peace Committees. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(3), 40–53. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.767601>.
- Odendaal, A., & Olivier, R. (2008). Local peace committees: Some reflections and lessons learned. Retrieved from http://www.i4pinternational.org/files/207/3.+LO CAL+PEACE+COMMITTEES.pdf
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029908>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2013a). Missing links: Peace infrastructures and peace formation. In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice (Volume Berghof handbook dialogue series no. 10) (pp. 22–29). Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- Richmond, O. P. (2013b). Peace formation and local infrastructures for peace. Alternatives: Global, Local, Political, 38(4), 271–287. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0304375413512100>.
- Ryan, J. (2012). Infrastructures for peace as a path to resilient societies: An institutional perspective. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(3), 14–24. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.774806>.
- Suurmond, J., & Sharma, P. M. (2013). Serving people’s need for peace: Infrastructures for peace, the peace sector, and the case of Nepal. In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice. Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- UNDP. (2013). Issue brief: Infrastructure for peace. Retrieved from: <https://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/librarypage/crisis-prevention-and-recovery/issue-brief-infrastructure-for-peace/>
- Unger, B., & Lundström, S. (2013). Introduction: On framing, setting up and supporting peace infrastructures. In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice. Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- UNSG. (2006). Progress report on the prevention of armed conflict: Report of the secretary-general. Retrieved from <http://www.ipu.org/splz-e/unga06/conflict.pdf>
- van Tongeren, P. (2011). Infrastructures for peace. In S. A. Nan, Z. C. Mampilly, & A. Bartoli (Eds.), Peacemaking: From Practice to Theory. Santa Barbara: Praeger.
- van Tongeren, P., Ojuelo, M. O., & Brand-Jabobsen, K. (2012). The evolving landscape of infrastructures for peace. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(3), 1–7. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.774793>.
- Verzat, V. (2014). Infrastructures for peace: A grass-roots way to do state-building? In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice. Berlin: Berghof Foundation.

Peace Journalism

Florian Zollmann

Newcastle University, Newcastle, UK

Synonyms

Conflict resolution; Conflict sensitive journalism; Constructive journalism; News and conflict; Peace; Peace and conflict studies; War

Definition

Peace journalism refers to a particular practice of journalism that aims to contribute toward peace in various conflict situations. Peace journalism merges aspects from conflict studies and journalism studies to enable a constructive model of journalism. Peace journalism provides a two-tiered approach: Peace journalism offers a framework to critique the shortfalls of traditional war journalism and it expounds a set of standards for practitioners to constructively report on conflict situations with a view toward achieving peace. Peace journalism could help to mitigate crises because it is based on constructive norms that enable journalists to report on the causes of societal problems and provide constructive strategies for social action and change. There are many actual examples of peace journalism especially in the alternative news media sphere.

Introduction

During the mid-1990s, peace journalism was established as a subfield in peace and conflict studies (Lynch and McGoldrick 2007, p. 248). The Norwegian peace researcher Johan Galtung initially introduced the concept in the 1970s to institutionalize “peace” as the major reference point for journalists (Hanitzsch 2007, p. 2). Peace journalism was further developed by journalists and scholars Jake Lynch and Annabel McGoldrick (2005, 2007) who systematically assessed how journalistic reporting practices can become more attentive to peace imperatives. Since then, many other works have advanced and refined the concept with an emphasis on either enhancing journalistic practices or critiquing the shortcomings of the professional mainstream news media (henceforth referred to as news media) (for an overview see Keeble et al. 2010). Peace journalism is set against the reporting practices and performances of the news media while it also goes beyond them in that it proposes new standards for journalism (Lynch and McGoldrick 2007, p. 248). But how does peace journalism differ from classic professional journalism? What are the defining features of peace journalism? And what needs to be done so that professional journalist can become more attentive to the peace journalism model? These questions will be answered in this entry. The next section will highlight the differences between war and peace journalism by way of offering a critical assessment of news reporting. The factors that explain why the news media tend to support discourses of war and violence will be briefly unpacked based on actual examples of reporting. Afterward, the peace journalism model will be discussed in more detail and with reference to scholarship. Finally, it will be assessed how the peace journalism model could be implemented in contemporary news practices.

War and Peace Journalism

Galtung (2013 [1998], p. 96) argues that conflicts may be viewed either in terms of a “high road,” focusing “on the conflict and its peaceful transformation,” or a “low road,” focusing “on the meta-conflict that comes after the root conflict, created by violence and war, and the question of who wins [original emphasis].” The high road perspective looks deeper at the conflict and its causes (society, economy, culture, history, and internal and external parties) aiming toward transformation. In contrast, the low road view treats conflict like a “zero-sum” game, thereby evaluating its symptoms (goals, war, battles, negotiations, casualties, winners, and losers) with a view toward which side is winning (Galtung 2013 [1998], pp. 96–97).

Journalism and the news media more broadly, Galtung writes, largely follow the low road which can also be described as war journalism (2013 [1998], pp. 96, 99). According to Galtung, journalists tend to regard conflicts as a sports competition and often back one side (2013 [1998], pp. 96–97). Hence, peace journalism was developed with a critical view toward how journalists and news media treat conflict and contribute to rather than mitigate war and violence. As Galtung (2013 [1998], p. 99) further argues: “The war focus in war journalism will polarize and escalate, calling for hatred and more violence [. . .].”

It is, in fact, well established, that the news media has supported discourses of war and military intervention (Carruthers 2000; Zollmann 2017). Consider the NATO intervention in Libya in March 2011: as studies have demonstrated, the US, UK, and German news media supported a NATO-led intervention to stop alleged human rights violations by the regime of former Libyan President Muammar al-Gaddafi against protestors in the city Benghazi (Zollmann 2017). This so-called “humanitarian intervention” turned out to be far more deadly than the violence that had preceded it and which was used as a pretext to intervene. According to one scholarly estimate by Alan J. Kuperman, “NATO intervention magnified the death toll in Libya by about seven to ten times” (2013, p. 123). In September 2016, the British Parliament’s House of Commons Foreign Affairs Committee published the findings of their investigation into the war in Libya. According to the report, “the proposition that Muammar Gaddafi would have ordered the massacre of civilians in Benghazi was not supported by the available evidence” (Foreign Affairs Committee 2016). The “Gaddafi regime had retaken towns from the rebels without attacking civilians in early February 2011,” the report stated (Foreign Affairs Committee 2016). Hence, the news media had facilitated a partisan and misleading discourse about Libya that led to an escalation rather than mitigation of violence in the fashion of war journalism – with disastrous effects for Libya. A further example constituted the reporting of the 2003 Iraq War. Iraq’s alleged possession of weapons of mass destruction (WMD) served as a political discourse to legitimize a full-scale US-UK invasion of Iraq outside of the legal limits set by the UN Charter. During the buildup to war, the US and UK news media – including so-called “quality” news outlets like the New York Times and the BBC – consistently reported that Iraq had the capability to launch WMDs against other countries (Edwards and Cromwell 2006; Friel and Falk 2007; Lewis et al. 2006). Yet, well before the actual invasion in March 2003, evidence by the United Nations Special Commission (UNSCOM) suggested that Iraq had already been disarmed by 1998 (United Nations 1999). But the news media had hardly reported the official UNSCOM evidence. As Susan D. Moeller (2004, p. 3) observes in a study of news media reporting of the Iraq War, “Most media outlets represented WMD as a monolithic menace” and “stenographically reported the incumbent administration’s perspective on WMD, giving too little critical examination of the way officials framed the events, issues, threats, and policy options.” Iraq War reporting consequently shared the properties that Galtung identified as war journalism: During the initial invasion phase, news media rallied around the frames provided by the US-UK governments while downplaying the narratives emerging from the Iraqi side as well as from United Nations expert opinion. Furthermore, news media emphasized “battle” and “war” at the expense of contextualizing the underlying economic and geopolitical interests that drove the US-UK war effort. And finally, when the “victory” of the US-UK side was reported in May 2003, the news media hardly interrogated how US-UK military action had caused substantial civilian deaths and destruction of infrastructure in Iraq.

How can this media performance be explained? Contrary to notions of press freedom and independence, research suggest that the news media has insufficient distance from state, economic, and military power. Restrictions imposed on the news media by the military during times of war, ideological factors such as patriotic rally round the flag effects as well as sourcing connections between journalists and politicians explain the proximity between news media and the state during times of conflict (for an overview see Zollmann 2017).

Peace journalism, thus, attempts to counterbalance the many shortfalls associated with the news media including its convention to produce war journalism. For instance, an example of peace journalism constitutes the Iraq War reporting by the independent journalist Dahr Jamail who traveled to Iraq as a freelance writer in 2004 (see Zollmann 2010). Jamail decided to neither rely on the US-UK administrations nor on the Iraqi government for the sourcing of his news stories about the occupation of Iraq. In the fashion of an “eye-witness” reporter, Jamail embedded himself within the Iraqi population in various regions of Iraq. Jamail was consequently able to assess journalistically how the Iraqi population was affected by the policies adopted by all sides in the conflict. This approach went beyond a dichotomized treatment of the conflict parties (usually presented as “us” and “them” in war journalism) by way of recognizing parties to the conflict in a more holistic way: Jamail identified the Iraqi government, the US-UK governments, the Iraqi population as well as different elements within the Iraqi society as potential parties to the conflict with different interests and needs. This approach enabled Jamail to highlight the external and internal dimensions of the conflict as well as how structural-cultural and -economic issues affected the population. Jamail’s reporting also stood out in that it carried critical voices who emphasized solutions. This peace journalism approach, then, highlighted structural causes of the conflict and provided avenues for peace. Significantly, and as this example demonstrates, peace journalism also entails a constructive journalistic component that goes beyond elastic reporting standards that emphasize notions like “objectivity,” “neutrality,” and “balance.”

The Features of Peace Journalism

There is no universally accepted conceptualization of peace journalism and different models are postulated in the literature (Hanitzsch 2007, p. 2). Galtung (2003, p. 179) provides the classic approach according to which peace journalism “tries to depolarize by showing the black and white of all sides, and to deescalate by highlighting peace and conflict resolution as much as violence.” Galtung (2003, p. 178) proposes the following categories for peace journalism:

Peace/Conflict Oriented

Peace journalism should explore the root causes of conflict in relation to diverging issues, parties, and goals (Galtung 2003, p. 178). These aspects, Galtung suggests, must be regarded as convergent and need to be accounted for by journalists in the sense of balancing the positions, interests, and needs of all sides in a conflict in a transparent fashion (Galtung refers to a “win-win” frame of journalism). Consequently, the voices of the different conflict parties should be featured in journalistic reporting with a focus on “empathy” and “understanding” leading to “[h]umanization of all sides”

(Galtung 2003, p. 178). Causes and impacts of conflict should be revealed in a holistic way and in relation to historical and cultural contexts (exploring conflict through space and time). Conflict and war should be regarded as a main problem: Peace journalism should, therefore, proactively aim to prevent further occurrences of violence and war. And finally, peace journalism should contextualize and highlight the effects of war and violence on society and culture (Galtung 2003, p. 178).

Truth Oriented

Peace journalism should debunk and reveal “untruths” or propaganda on “all sides” (Galtung 2003, p.178). This may entail investigations into the actors and organization who aim to benefit from war and violence as well as the actors and organizations who claim to facilitate “reconstruction, reconciliation and resolution” (Galtung 2003, p. 178).

People Oriented

The suffering of all parties and societies involved in a conflict should be prioritized and the reporting should focus on the effects of violence on civilians (Galtung 2003, p. 178). Such an approach should also provide significant space in the reporting about people affected by conflict whose voices tend to be marginalized. Additionally, the quotations by actors who engage as sincere “peacemakers” should be emphasized (Galtung 2003, p. 178). At the same time, peace journalism should name perpetrators of crimes on all sides of a conflict.

Solution Oriented

Peace journalism should crucially focus on reporting nonviolent societal initiatives of peace and conflict resolution to de-escalate and avert more violence. Rather than concentrating on “battle” and “war,” peace journalism should aim to highlight the consequences of conflict with a constructive as well as creative emphasis on “resolution,” “re-construction,” and “reconciliation” (Galtung 2003, p. 178).

Galtung suggests for journalists to implement the outlined components of peace journalism as part of their working routines.

Peace Journalism in Practice

Peace journalism seeks to update and transgress the classic journalistic reporting standards of “objectivity,” “neutrality,” and “balance” with a view toward disentangling the formations of conflict (Galtung 2003, p. 178; Lynch and McGoldrick 2005, p. 34, 2007, p. 256). Lynch and McGoldrick (2007, p. 255) suggest that peace journalism should draw from peace research and account for the “dynamics of conflict” as a means of further guaranteeing accurate reporting. According to Diana Francis, such dynamics relate to a conflict’s “history, recent causes and internal composition – the different parties, the nature of their involvement, their perspectives, positions and motivations, and the different relationships between them in terms of power, allegiance and interest” (cited in Lynch and McGoldrick 2007, p. 255). Lynch and McGoldrick (2007, p. 255) consequently argue that journalism which accounts for these factors will correspond more closely to the peace journalism model and will also be more accurate in its representation of events and issues. Additionally, Lynch and McGoldrick (2005, p. 34) emphasize an interventionist aspect of peace journalism: Journalists should consider the sourcing strategies, story angles, and effects of their work to capture how effective they may be in terms of advancing peace. In contrast, Hanitzsch (2007, p. 7) suggests that a significant amount of the peace journalism principles would actually be comparable with some of the major ideal qualities of classic journalism which include “to make conflicts appear transparent through background information, to give voice to the views of all rivaling parties, to expose lies, cover-up attempts and culprits on all sides and to report on the atrocities of war and the suffering of civilians.” Hanitzsch (2007, p. 7) writes that, like the ethical standards of “good” journalism, peace journalism practices cannot be implemented based on adjusting journalism norms on an individual, voluntary basis. Rather, the proponents of peace journalism should “address the structural constraints of news production” (Hanitzsch 2007, p. 7). These observations support studies that demonstrate how the peace journalism model has been far more effectively realized by noncommercial, alternative news media organizations as opposed to traditional news media providers (see Keeble 2010). Additionally, studies have shown how “good” journalism can entail many of the components of peace journalism (Zollmann 2010). As already outlined, news production is determined by commercial and organizational factors that explain many of the biases associated with war journalism. Hence, peace journalism standards can only be realized by truly independent media and should, thus, be advocated as part of wider media reforms. For instance, in the UK, there is a distinct media reform movement that seeks progressive changes in the commercial and political structures of the news media as well as in the journalistic standards of the profession (for an overview see Fenton et al. 2020). In fact, as part of media reforms, journalistic standards could be extended to account for constructive norms that enable journalists to report on the causes of societal problems and provide constructive strategies for social action and change (Beiler and Krüger 2018). Hence, media reform could address the journalistic standards codified by industry bodies and news organizations and change them to include peace journalism components. Additionally, media reform could realize the potential for more “good” journalism in the classic news media. Overall, such changes would likely enable peace journalism principles to be more comprehensively implemented across various news media.

Summary

This essay aimed to capture the classic elements of peace journalism as firstly established by Galtung and then refined by Lynch and McGoldrick. Peace journalism fuses aspects from conflict studies and journalism studies to enable a constructive model of journalism. Peace journalism aims to de-escalate war and violence and foster conflict resolution. Peace journalism provides a two-tiered approach: Peace journalism offers a framework to critique the shortfalls of traditional war journalism and it expounds a set of standards for practitioners to constructively report on conflict situations with a view toward achieving peace. There are many actual examples of peace journalism especially in the alternative news media sphere. In order that peace journalism can become a more widely established journalistic practice, significant reforms of the news media system are required.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Indigenous Approaches to Peace
- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Peace Journalism
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

References

- Beiler, M., & Krüger, U. (2018). Mehr Mehrwert durch Konstruktiven Journalismus? Idee des Konzepts und Implikationen zur Steigerung des Public Values von Medien. In N. Gonser (Ed.), Der öffentliche (Mehr-) Wert von Medien (pp. 167–191). Wiesbaden: Springer Fachmedien.
- Carruthers, S. L. (2000). The media at war. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Edwards, D., & Cromwell, D. (2006). Guardians of power: The myth of the liberal media. London: Pluto Press.
- Fenton, N., Freedman, D., Schlosberg, J., & Dencik, L. (2020). The media manifesto. E-book. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Foreign Affairs Committee. (2016). Libya: Examination of intervention and collapse and the UK's future policy options. [online] 9 September. London: Commons Select Committee. http://www.publications.parliament.uk/pa/cm201617/cmselect/cmaff/119/11905.htm#_idTextAnchor015. Accessed 10 Nov 2016.
- Friel, H., & Falk, R. (2007). The record of the paper: How the New York Times misreports US foreign policy. Paperback edn. London: Verso.
- Galtung, J. (2003). Peace journalism. Media Asia, 30(3), 177–180.
- Galtung, J. (2013 [1998]). High road, low road: Charting the course for peace journalism. In J. Galtung & D. Fischer (Eds.), Johan Galtung: Pioneer of peace research. Heidelberg: Springer.
- Hanitzsch, T. (2007). Situating peace journalism in journalism studies: A critical appraisal. Conflict and Communication Online, 6(2), 1–9.
- Keeble, R. L. (2010). Peace journalism as political practice: A new, radical look at the theory. In R. L. Keeble, J. Tulloch, & F. Zollmann (Eds.), Peace journalism, war and conflict resolution (pp. 49–68). New York: Peter Lang.
- Keeble, R. L., Tulloch, J., & Zollmann, F. (Eds.). (2010). Peace journalism, war and conflict resolution. New York: Peter Lang.
- Kuperman, A. J. (2013). A model humanitarian intervention? Reassessing NATO's Libya campaign. International Security, 38(1), 105–136.
- Lewis, J., Brookes, R., Mosdell, N., & Threadgold, T. (2006). Shoot first and ask questions later: Media coverage of the 2003 Iraq War. New York: Peter Lang.
- Lynch, J., & McGoldrick, A. (2005). Peace journalism. Stroud: Hawthorn Press.
- Lynch, J., & McGoldrick, A. (2007). Peace journalism. In C. Weibel & J. Galtung (Eds.), Handbook of peace and conflict studies (pp. 248–264). London: Routledge.
- Moeller, S. D. (2004). Media coverage of weapons of mass destruction. Center for International and Security Studies at Maryland: University of Maryland.
- United Nations. (1999). report of the first panel established pursuant to the note by the president of the security council on 30 january 1999 (s/1999/100), concerning disarmament and current and future ongoing monitoring and verification issues. 27 march 1999. <https://www.un.org/Depts/unmovic/documents/Amorim%20Report.htm>. Accessed on 9 Feb 2021.
- Zollmann, F. (2010). Iraq and Dahr Jamail: War reporting from a peace perspective. In R. Keeble, J. Tulloch, & F. Zollmann (Eds.), Peace journalism, war and conflict resolution (pp. 139–156). New York: Peter Lang.
- Zollmann, F. (2017). Media, propaganda and the politics of intervention. New York: Peter Lang.

Peace Measuring Approaches

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

[Global Peace Index \[GPI\]](#); Management of Sensitive Data; Negative peace; Positive peace

Defining the Problem

Can our understanding of peace and policies that lead to it be improved by measurement, and if so, just what should be measured? Historically, peace has largely been studied qualitatively based on philosophies that vary across cultures and individuals. In contrast, measuring peace requires defining it operationally, devising logical, measurable, reliable, and valid variables, and then weighting and combining them into a coherent index of peacefulness. Properly collected, analyzed, interpreted, and publicized, such data can help correct misconceptions, increase awareness of threats, improve understanding of the changing causes and nature of conflict, and lead to the development of policies that reduce aggression, terrorism, and war (Rosling 2018).

Efforts at Solution

Unfortunately, multiple operational definitions are possible and different actors have different goals and choose different things to monitor and measure (Bush 1998; UN High-Level Political Forum 2017). Historical models tend to explain the past in terms of an explicit or implicit philosophy, often resulting in unresolvable debate over the causes of a particular war or war in general. Those in government departments such as foreign affairs or defense and scholars in the social sciences tend to develop models intended to predict the future or guide policy. To do so, they need not identify every causative factor involved in a phenomenon. If the goal is to predict or to guide policy, factors that cannot be changed are irrelevant distractions. Furthermore, given two models of equal efficiency in identifying the most important factors to change, the one with the fewest components is preferable based on the principle of parsimony proposed by Ockham in the fourteenth century. The test is not whether there are other relevant factors – there always are – but how well a model achieves its purpose or purposes at what costs and with what unintended consequences.

To further complicate matters, there is reason to doubt the universality and long-term efficacy of any model aimed at affecting human behavior. Once it is known that a model is guiding policy, there is little to prevent individuals searching for ways to circumvent, exploit, or undermine it. In an amusing example of human opportunism, the British colonial government of India, concerned with the number of deaths by poisonous snake bites, offered a reward for every one killed. Quickly decimating the snakes, the locals soon were breeding, killing, and turning dead snakes in to collect the reward – leading to the term “cobra effect” for an unwanted and unintended result of a policy. More relevant to our topic, the unintended consequences of peace missions have sometimes been corruption, economic distortions, and sexual exploitation (Aoi et al. 2007). This is particularly true given the ever-changing nature of war. Russia and China now appear to have Mach 5 hypersonic missiles that can overwhelm all current defenses (the USA pioneered their development but terminated research in 2005 (Eaglen 2019)). Iran appears to be integrating terrorism and drones into an innovative strategy short of war but potentially equivalent in its results. The Chinese have developed quantum satellites that purportedly are hack-proof, while US satellites are susceptible to data breaches and co-opting into sending false information. In response, the USA now is discussing creation of a Space Force, an entirely new branch and type of armed service which if implemented will be imitated by others, further militarizing space.

China appears to be trying to completely change the post-WWII international order with its Belt and Road Initiative and by offering to build but then to control naval bases and ports at strategic spots around the world so that it potentially could deny access and services to vessels of other countries (Pillsbury 2016), a strategy conceptually similar to that of the sixteenth-century Portuguese in the Indian Ocean modernized by an aggressive, imperialistic autocracy that also is developing space war capabilities, hacking foreign computer systems, building a blue-water navy, developing anti-ship missiles and undersea sensors, and claiming international waterways such as the South China Sea as territorial waters based on its artificial islands. Singer and Cole (2016) have described one way a war combining such weapons might evolve. US President Trump's trade dispute is taking place in this larger strategic context that goes far beyond trade in importance but is seldom articulated or discussed.

Numerous studies have tried to identify characteristics that make a state prone to war. Collectively, the studies consider a vast number of possibilities. Shortly after WWI, Richardson (1960) studied the arms race that preceded and often is claimed to be a major cause of it. In fact, he concluded that the outcome of an arms race can range unpredictably from war through peaceful resolution to disarmament – not very helpful for policy making. Furthermore, his analysis was limited to WWI, with no study of other historical periods, cultures, or types of government. While it is true that massive arms expenditures preceded the war, nondefense spending increased even more, and nations such as Sweden also vastly increased arms spending but remained neutral. Finally, and decisively, subsequently obtained cabinet meeting minutes make clear that increased armaments did not determine but were required by German policies (Churchman 2013).

Unlike Richardson, instead of assuming a cause or studying a single war, Singer and Small (1993) collected all sorts of statistical data for wars from the fall of Napoleon through the mid-twentieth century and searched for independent variables correlated with the outbreak of war. That is, their study was a search for consistent empirical patterns rather than an argument for a particular one, inductive rather than deductive in approach. Similarly, Rummel (1968) correlated 235 cultural, demographic, economic, geographic, political, and sociological characteristics of nations with 13 measures of foreign conflict. None of the characteristics bore a statistically significant relationship between characteristics of states and war proneness. It does not seem a promising approach to understanding interstate war, although falsification makes a vital contribution to knowledge and theory development.

Therefore, researchers persist. Among organizations that currently collect data related to peacefulness, each with its own distinct focus and methods, are the:

Armed Conflict Database [ACD]
 Carnegie Endowment for International Peace [CEIP]
 Economist Intelligence Unit [EIU]
 International Development Research Centre [IDRC]
 Institute for Economics and Peace [IEP]
 International Development Evaluation Association [IDEA]
 International Institute for Strategic Studies [IISS]
 International Peace Institute [IPI]
 Interpeace U.S.A
 Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, University of Notre Dame Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees [UNHCR]
 One Earth Future
 Oxfam
 Stockholm International Peace Research Institute [SIPRI]
 United Nations (several agencies within it, independently)
 World Peace Foundation

Numerous other individuals and teams of scholars in universities, think tanks, and government agencies also are conducting their own research and developing their own policy suggestions as well. For example, the New Rule Sets Project at the US Naval War College is focused on the implications for peace of countries that seem full participants in globalization and those that seem to be left out (Barnett 2004). (See also the section on Peace through Prosperity in the entry in this volume on “► Search for Peace, the”.)

Johan Galtung

Johan Galtung (2008), often considered the father of peace studies, distinguished negative peace, the absence of violence, from positive peace possessing characteristics that serve the needs of the whole population and exhibits constructive means for resolving conflict.

Researchers have operationally defined and attempted to measure negative peace by selecting and combining indicator variables into a single index. One such effort, the Global Peace Index [GPI] measures a country's level of Negative Peace using three domains. The first, Ongoing Domestic and International Conflict evaluates a country's involvement in both internal and external conflicts. The second assumes that that low crime rates, minimal terrorist activity and violent demonstrations, harmonious relations with neighboring countries, a stable political scene and a small proportion of refugees is related to peacefulness. The third domain measures militarization based on indicators such as military expenditure as a percentage of GDP, ratio of armed services officers to population, and financial contributions to UN peacekeeping missions.

Additional Important Variables

Firchow (2018) argues that the majority of attempts at measuring peace use indicators that focus primarily on violence reduction and miss elements required for conciliation and peacebuilding after war. She suggests that current international peacebuilding efforts are not always effective because disproportionate attention is paid to reconstruction, governance, and development with little attention paid to community ties and healing that others have given careful consideration (Maynard 2000) and suggests moving toward an index based on something like The Institute for Economics and Peace's (2018) eight Positive Pillars of Peace:

- Citizen access to reliable, valid information from a free and independent media that leads to greater openness and well-informed citizens
- Trusted high-quality public and civil services from an efficient and effective government that upholds the rule of law
- Equitable distribution of resources such as health and education that promotes useful knowledge, productivity, political participation, increased social capital, and builds resilience and adaptability

- Fairly enforced, formally published laws fairly that strengthen basic human rights and freedoms and informal social and cultural norms that encourage tolerance among ethnic, linguistic, religious, and socio-economic groups and advance gender equality and workers' rights
- Good relations with other countries that tend to increase internal political stability, decrease defense expenditure, benefit business, and increase foreign investment, tourism and human capital inflows
- Low levels of corruption that enhance confidence and trust in institutions and reduces inefficient resource allocation often resulting in lack of funding for essential services
- Skilled human capital to improve economic productivity and foster widespread well-informed political participation
- Soundness of the business environment including formal institutions that support the private sector with a regulatory system conducive to competitiveness and productivity

Over time, improvements in these interrelated areas have led in some, not all, countries to attitudes that make violence less acceptable, institutions that are more responsive to social needs and provide nonviolent means of resolving grievances and collectively underpin and sustain peaceful societies (Autessere 2014). That is, positive peace tends to precede and lead to negative peace, both of which are elements of a peaceful society.

Data Lapses

Researchers have recognized that relevant quantitative data is not available on all variables for all countries so that qualitative variables are required to fill in gaps related to peace. This has led to efforts such as the Economist Intelligence Unit's [EIU] country analysis that employs country experts and economists to score seven qualitative indicators. Each analyst concentrates on two or three countries and, in conjunction with some 650 local contributors, develops a deep knowledge of a nation's political scene, the performance of its economy and the society in general.

Steven Pinker

Steven Pinker (2011) takes a broad approach to peace, presenting a massive amount of data that he argues proves violence of many types declined radically at five specific points and places in human history. Although many of his statistics are best guesses, most seem to be of the right magnitude. He attributes the reduction in violence to five major developments:

- The transition from tribal hunter-gathering societies to the agricultural civilizations with cities and governments that reduced chronic raiding and feuding (Keeley 1996).
- The rise of the nation-state that centralized authority, monopolized force, and developed infrastructure facilitating commerce that made foreigners more valuable alive than dead (Elias 1982).
- The Humanitarian Revolution during the Age of Reason and European Enlightenment providing wider education, empathy, and rational problem solving that resulted in organized efforts to abolish dueling, cruelty to animals, judicial torture, sadistic punishment, slavery, and superstitious killing (Hunt 2008).
- The ever-widening concept of human rights of the Rights Revolution from the 1950s to the present day.
- The Long Peace (1945–1989) following World War II in which the great powers and developed states stopped waging war on one another. The resulting rise of literacy, mobility, and global communications helped people to understand and become more sympathetic and tolerant of others unlike themselves (Gaddis 1989).

However, as suggested above with regard to historical models generating largely unresolvable and interminable debate, Pinker's work is not without both support and challenge. Scott (2018) writing in the tradition of the "noble savage" that dates at least to Tacitus emphasizes downsides to the emergence of civilization such as unfree labor. The many different ways that states emerged in different places and at different times especially outside Europe (Tilly 1992) seldom address the frequency, extent, and consequences of the resulting wars. During the so-called Long Peace following WWII over 200 conflicts took place (Singer and Small 1993, Wikipedia accessed 16 December 2019) meeting Singer's (1979) operational definition of war as a "military conflict waged between national entities, at least one of which is a state, which resulted in at least 1000 battle-deaths of military personnel." The majority of those that meet that definition took place in Asia and Africa. Many took place in postcolonial countries with boundaries originally designed to control people through divide and conquer strategies. Britain, France, Russia, and USA sometimes intervened for geostrategic reasons such as access to strategic resources, proximity to choke points in trade routes, or the US policy dating from the Truman presidency to "contain" communism (while carefully avoiding direct great power conflict that might trigger global nuclear war).

The post-Cold War world (1990-present) seems to be evolving into a multipolar world with China, India, and the USA as global powers and Brazil, Germany, Iran, Russia, South Africa, and Turkey as regional ones. In the past, multipolar situations have seen rapid changes in alliances to obtain advantage and maintain a balance of power in often futile hope of minimizing the number and severity of wars. Optimists believe that the current international system characterized by widespread if not universal freedom, prosperity, and peace will not only survive, but thrive. Pessimists respond that the decline of the USA is shifting the balance of power to China, an aggressive, imperialistic, totalitarian state that is developing space war and computer hacking and technological capabilities, building a blue-water navy, developing antiship missiles and undersea sensors, claiming currently international waterways such as the South China Sea as territorial waters based on artificial islands, and making widespread geostrategic basing arrangements with countries such as Myanmar, Pakistan, Somalia, and Greece. As in the 1930s, many democracies seem to lack the will to maintain international stability, the possible result being not peace and prosperity, but chaos and catastrophe.

Many causes of war in addition to polarity have been proposed, implying that no one set of policies will end war despite Pinker's optimism (Churchman 2013). Among those causes have been:

Arms races
 Balance of, preponderance of, and transition in power Cycles
 Distracting citizens from domestic discontents
 Ecological equilibrium Expected utility
 Form of government
 Ideology
 Insanity
 Jealousy
 Lack of peaceful means to resolve disputes Manifest destiny
 Nation-states
 Number of bordering states
 Personality of leader
 Preventive attack
 Pride Profiteering
 Race
 Relative deprivation Religion
 Reproductive success
 Resource shortages
 Season of the year
 Take or hold power
 Territorial imperative
 Trade or trade route chokepoints

Responsible Management of Sensitive Data

With respect to measuring peace, using data responsibility has two major dimensions: safeguarding individuals and making sensible policy decisions.

Oxfam taking into consideration numerous issues involved in individual data use by researchers and by states and implemented sought to ensure that data it collected would be done in a culturally and contextually appropriate manner, leading to its Responsible Data Policy in 2015 (<https://policy-practice.oxfam.org.uk/publications/oxfam-responsible-program-data-policy-575950>). Under this policy, Oxfam limits disaggregation, includes representation of relevant groups, and tries to ensure the accuracy, timeliness, and relevance of data collected. Individuals are informed of and voluntarily consent or refuse participation based on the use to be made of their information and are free to withdraw at any point. Oxfam ensures participants' right to privacy in handling of their data and recognizes its responsibility to protect the identity of those providing such data, unless otherwise outlined and agreed to as part of informed consent. To mitigate risk to participants, especially members of vulnerable populations, Oxfam limits collection of personal data to that necessary for each particular study, stores it securely, limits access to identified data records, and anonymizes data shared openly. Extra care is taken with data collection in conflicted and fragile states. If the data process involves minors, both their consent and that of their parents or guardians is required. The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child and UNICEF have similar protections for minors that can be found at (http://www.unicef.org/adolescence/cypguide/index_ethics.html) and (<http://www.ohchr.org/en/professionalinterest/pages/crc.aspx>). The impact on the validity and reliability of resulting reports rarely is considered.

Responsible use of data for policy decisions is more problematic. Some policy- and decision-makers distort, falsify, or misuse data to provide justification for preferred decisions already made. Mistakes can occur because information is incomplete, false, or uncertain, and failure to act can also prove to be a mistake. Decisions often have unintended consequences, there are numerous other parties making potentially contradictory choices, and secrecy, and intelligence gathering have long been factors and deception have been around at least since the Trojan horse. Countless examples exist. The Japanese took the USA by surprise at Pearl Harbor. Incredibly elaborate American and British efforts were successful in deceiving the Germans as to the timing and location of their landings in Sicily and Normandy (Brown 1975). Blinded by the assumption that the Germans in 1944 no longer were capable of mounting an offensive the Allies were taken completely by surprise in the Battle of the Bulge. The 1950 North Korean invasion of South Korea was a surprise (Fehrenbach 1963). Terrorists surprised the USA in 2001 when they weaponized commercial airliners. In all these cases, there were bits of intelligence that pointed toward a correct assessment but which were overlooked or discounted.

Ultimately, we all are dependent for ethical use of data on the intelligence and integrity of our leaders and bureaucrats, and thus on transparency and systems that make it possible to identify and replace those who fail.

Summary

Peace perhaps is perhaps best viewed as a quest requiring constant attention and imaginative adaptation of available methods to an everchanging economic, political, and technological environment. Different models may be needed for different types of government. Policies often have unintended consequences, some predictable, many not. Theoretical models intended to guide policy have limited life spans because people can and do find ways to manipulate them to advantage. There is no universal agreement as to what is ethical, and even if there were leaders can appear who will ignore the limits in hope of gaining either or both personal and national advantage.

Cross-References

- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Protection of Civilians
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations

- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Aoi, C., de Coning, C., & Thakur, R. (2007). Unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations. Tokyo: UN University.
- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland: Conflict resolution and the everyday politics of international intervention. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Barnett, T. (2004). The Pentagon's new map. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.
- Brown, A. (1975). Bodyguard of lies. New York: Harper & Row.
- Bush, K. (1998). Measure of peace: Peace and conflict impact assessment of development projects in conflict zones. Ottawa: International Research Development Centre.
- Churchman, D. (2013). Why we fight: The origins, nature, and management of human conflict. Lanham: University Press of America.
- Eaglen, M. (2019, September 5). Pentagon should take the lead on tech. Wall Street Journal, 56.
- Elias, N. (1982). The civilizing process: State formation and civilization. Oxford: Oxford Blackwell.
- Fehrenbach, T. (1963). This kind of war: A study in unpreparedness. New York: Macmillan.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gaddis, J. (1989). The long peace: Inquiries into the history of the cold war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Galtung, J. (2008). 50 years: 100 peace and conflict perspectives. Grenzach-Whylen: Transcend University Press.
- Hunt, L. (2008). Inventing human rights. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Institute for Economics & Peace. (2018). Global peace index: Measuring peace in a complex world. Sydney: Author.
- Keeley, L. (1996). War before civilization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Maynard, K. (2000). Healing communities in conflict. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Pillsbury, M. (2016). The hundred year Marathon: China's secret strategy to replace the United States as a global superpower. Adelaide: Griffin.
- Pinker, S. (2011). The better angels of our nature. London: Penguin.
- Richardson, L. (1960). Statistics of deadly quarrels. New York: Boxwood.

- Rosling, H. (2018). Factfulness. New York: Flatiron Books.
- Rummel, R. (1968). Domestic attributes and foreign conflict. In D. Singer (Ed.), Quantitative international politics. Glencoe: Free Press.
- Scott, J. (2018). Against the grain. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Singer, D. (1979). The correlates of war I: Research origins and rationale. Glencoe: Free Press.
- Singer, D., & Small, M. (1993). Correlates of War Project: International and Civil War Data, 1816–1992. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan.
- Singer, P., & Cole, A. (2016). Ghost Fleet: A novel of the next world war. New York: Mariner.
- Tilly, C. (1992). Coercion, capital, and European states. Hoboken: Wiley-Blackwell.
- UN High-Level Political Forum on Sustainable Development. (2017, July 20). Innovation in partnerships on how to measure peace? For what? For whom? New York: Author.
- Wikipedia (accessed 16 Dec 2019). List of Wars 1945–1989. San Francisco: Author.

Peace Mediation

- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Peace Negotiations

- ▶ In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda
- ▶ Sierra Leone

Peace Observation

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations

Peace Operations

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject

Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine

Emily Paddon Rhoads¹ and Marion Laurence^{2,3}

¹Department of Political Science, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, PA, USA

²Centre for International Policy Studies, University of Ottawa, Ottawa, ON, Canada

³Department of Political Science, University of Toronto, Toronto, ON, Canada

Definition

Peace operations are a central conflict management tool of the post-World War II international order. They are generally defined by their multilateral character and association with the “holy trinity” of peacekeeping principles: impartiality, consent, and the non-use of force except in self-defense. These core elements of peacekeeping doctrine were conceived during the Cold War when lightly armed missions were the norm and when peacekeepers were usually tasked with observing cease-fires and monitoring the implementation of interstate peace agreements. Since the end of the Cold War, peacekeeping more commonly occurs within conflict-affected states and alongside activities like peacebuilding, peacemaking, and peace enforcement. Many scholars and practitioners use the term “peace operations” to describe the complex, multidimensional missions where these activities overlap. The expansive goals of multidimensional peace operations have given rise to tensions around doctrine and core principles. These tensions are most pronounced when missions are tasked with the protection of civilians, state-building, and stabilization. They are largely a product of ongoing disagreements among states about the scope, form, and purpose of peace operations. In short, they are a reflection of politics at the micro-level, in the field contexts where peace operations are deployed, and at the macro-level, where doctrine is developed and decisions are made about mandates, funding, and staffing.

Introduction

Peace operations are a central conflict management tool of the post-World War II international order. Since 1948, the United Nations (UN) has fielded over 70 peace operations. Today, roughly 100,000 uniformed personnel, drawn from 122 countries, serve in 14 missions overseen by the UN Department of Peace Operations (United Nations Department of Peace Operations n.d.). UN peacekeepers are the second-largest military force stationed abroad, after the US military. A range of regional organizations are also actively involved in peacekeeping activities, including the African Union (AU), European Union (EU), and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) (Williams 2017, pp. 124–125). What are the principles, norms, and doctrine that guide peace operations? How do they shape peacekeeping practice and how have they evolved over time? What doctrinal challenges do peacekeepers confront in contemporary peace operations? What is the relationship between peacekeeping doctrine and politics?

This chapter explores these questions with a primary focus on UN peace operations given the organization's outsized influence on the development of peacekeeping as a practice. The UN is widely credited with the "invention" of peacekeeping when it deployed the UN Emergency Force in response to the 1956 Suez Crisis (Bellamy et al. 2010, p. 85). From a symbolic point of view, blue helmets are the archetypal peacekeepers. They are deployed at the behest of UN member states, they hail from all over the globe, and they operate under a common flag. When regional organizations deploy troops, they often derive legitimacy from their association with UN peacekeepers (Karlsrud 2019, p. 9). What is more, the legitimacy and legality of many regional operations are dependent on Security Council authorization under Chapter VIII of the UN Charter (Williams 2017, p. 126). In practical and logistical terms, the UN Secretariat plays a lead role in the development of peacekeeping doctrine. Defined as "an approved set of principles and methods" (Holmes 2001, p. 262), doctrine is intended to provide new as well as serving peacekeepers with a reference, a "set of guidelines" to inform practice and simplify decision-making amidst the confusion of war (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 3). The Secretariat is also instrumental in the identification of best practices as well as the development and dissemination of training materials. UN leadership in this area is particularly significant given that many regional organizations lack the capacity to develop their own standards for training and equipment for peace operations (Williams 2017, p. 128). In short, organizations like the AU, EU, and NATO put their own stamp on peace operations, but the degree to which such missions are accepted as "real" peace operations remains largely dependent on whether they respect the principles and precedents established by UN missions.

The chapter is divided into three main sections. The first section defines peacekeeping, traces its conceptual origins, and analyzes the evolving set of norms and principles that over time have determined what peacekeeping is and what it is not. The second section draws on empirical examples to highlight several key tensions within contemporary peacekeeping doctrine and practice. The third section broadens out the analysis to explore the relationship between principles and politics and to show how ambiguities in peacekeeping doctrine mirror ongoing disagreements about the scope, form, and purpose of peace operations. The chapter concludes with a look at lingering questions, overarching challenges, and directions for future research.

Defining Peacekeeping: Principles, Doctrine, and Practice

Unforeseen by the founders of the UN, the term "peacekeeping" does not appear in the organization's Charter. Instead, peacekeeping emerged from the interstices of the Charter. Famously conceptualized by Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjöld as "Chapter Six and a Half," peacekeeping balanced the pacific settlement of disputes provided for in Chapter VI and the use of force in cases of threats and breaches to peace in Chapter VII. Indeed, the creation of “peacekeeping” was an ad hoc response to a practical and political problem. Paralyzed by the Cold War divide, the permanent members of the Security Council were largely unable to reach general agreement on matters of international peace and security. The onset of the Cold War impeded the implementation of those provisions of the Charter which envisaged an ambitious collective security scheme designed, as the Charter’s preamble stated, “to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war” (United Nations 1945). However, under the leadership of Secretary-General Hammarskjöld, the UN established a role for itself in preventing and containing conflict through the use of lightly armed and impartial international military personnel.

During the Cold War, the primary function of these deployments was to prevent a local conflict from escalating into a larger war and potentially an East-West nuclear confrontation. This function was, as Mats Berdal observes, given “added urgency in the 1950s and 1960s by the gathering pace of decolonization and the often abrupt retreat from empire by the major European powers” (Berdal 2010, p. 179). Broadly speaking, UN peacekeepers’ main activities during the Cold War included monitoring of cease-fires, supervision of force disengagement, and interposition between belligerents in what were largely inter-state conflicts (Koops et al. 2015, pp. 113–260).

The Evolution of the “Holy Trinity”

During the Cold War, three core principles – often referred to as the “holy trinity” – came to be accepted as the bedrock of peacekeeping: impartiality, consent, and non-use of force (except in self-defense). Peacekeepers were expected to be impartial when making decisions and taking action (Paddon Rhoads 2016, pp. 48–55). They were expected to put aside particular preferences or interests vis-à-vis the conflict. To prevent potential biases and ensure the international character of an operation, the composition of missions was given careful consideration. As the UN has no standing army or standing police force, each mission has to be formed from scratch. During the Cold War, states that might have a particular interest in the conflict at hand, including former colonial powers and the permanent members of the Security Council, were disqualified from contributing personnel. Moreover, troop contributions by member states were voluntary and subject to host-state approval.

The principle of impartiality was closely linked to that of consent – that is, consent for the mission and Security Council mandate authorizing that mission. During the Cold War, Security Council resolutions reflected the peace or ceasefire agreement that parties to a conflict had reached prior to that mission’s deployment. By abiding by the terms explicitly agreed to by parties to a dispute, Hammarskjöld maintained that peacekeepers were unlikely to be “used to enforce any special political solution of pending problems or to influence the political balance decisive to such a solution” (Hammarskjöld 1958, para 166). Furthermore, peacekeepers were prohibited from “involvement in conflicts internal to sovereign states, as non-state actors were less likely to be reliable partners, and domestic disputes risked embroiling them in local politics” (Paddon Rhoads 2016, p.52).

Finally, peacekeepers were not to use force except in self-defense. This principle was based on the assumption that the conflict parties would comply with the agreement that provided the basis for a mission’s deployment, and thus the use of force was deemed unnecessary. Decisions to use force risked being perceived as partial, thereby undermining parties’ consent for a mission (Boulden 2005, p. 155). As a result, UN peacekeepers during this period were lightly armed and ill-equipped for combat. When Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim expanded the conditions under which force could be used to include “force in defence of the mandate,” the change had little impact on peacekeeping practice during the Cold War given that the tasks outlined in Security Council mandates were limited and had been agreed to by the parties (United Nations 1973).

During the Cold War, these principles came to define the majority of UN peacekeeping operations. There were a few notable exceptions such as the UN Operation in the Congo, 1960–1964

(Gibbs 2000; Doss 2014), but the norms of impartiality, consent, and non-use of force emerged out of practice and served as the normative foundation for most peacekeeping missions. It is worth noting, however, that they were not formally codified in doctrine. While the “holy trinity” enjoyed broad support, expressed through a series of policy documents, statements, and practices, member states resisted the adoption of formal doctrine.

The end of the Cold War ushered in a new era of UN peacekeeping as member states grappled with the proliferation of armed conflicts within states – what some scholars dubbed “new wars” (Kaldor 2006). The capacity of the Security Council to agree on action increased as the use of the veto lessened with the demise of superpower rivalry. The number of missions increased dramatically, with 20 new missions authorized between 1989 and 1994 alone (United Nations Department of Peace Operations n.d.). “Multidimensional” peacekeeping quickly burgeoned as the means by which the UN could address intrastate conflict (Doyle et al. 1997; Howard 2008). Compared to traditional peacekeeping operations, multidimensional missions took on a much wider range of tasks, including peacebuilding, conflict prevention, and the promotion of human rights. To capture this shift in scope and complexity, many scholars and practitioners embraced the term “peace operations” (Paris 2004, p. 18; Panel on United Nations Peace Operations 2000, p. iii).

Despite early optimism, the post-Cold War “surge” raised expectations for UN peacekeeping “beyond its capacity to deliver” (United Nations Department of Peace Operations n.d.). Blue helmets experienced a string of operational failures in the 1990s. In places like Rwanda and the former Yugoslavia, blue helmets confronted at best an unstable peace, at worst a brutal civil war and genocide. UN missions came under heavy criticism when peacekeepers failed to confront “spoilers” and prevent mass atrocities. According to the report of the Panel on UN Peace Operations, also known as the Brahimi Report, “no failure did more to damage the standing and credibility of UN peacekeeping in the 1990s than its reluctance to distinguish victim from aggressor” (Panel on United Nations Peace Operations 2000, p. ix). These setbacks were largely products of disjunctures between the new post-Cold War operational environment and the conceptual blueprint guiding peacekeepers.

Protection of Civilians

By the early 2000s, the Secretariat had launched a series of panels, reviews, and lessons learned exercises to address gaps in existing doctrine (United Nations General Assembly 1999, 2000; United Nations Security Council 1999). This process involved a concerted effort to reconceptualize core principles, provide a common conceptual framework for UN peace operations, and make protection of civilians (PoC) a central pillar of peacekeeping doctrine. The Brahimi Report is an important milestone in this regard. The authors assert that the “holy trinity” should “remain the bedrock principles of peacekeeping,” but they also insist that peacekeepers who witness violence against civilians “should be presumed authorized to stop it” (Panel on United Nations Peace Operations 2000, pp. ix–x).

Building on the Brahimi Report, the UN Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidelines (2008) – more commonly referred to as the “Capstone Doctrine” – develops this argument in more detail. Drafted by the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) and Department of Field Support (DFS), in consultation with member states, the Capstone Doctrine builds on lessons from the 1990s and aims to provide contemporary missions with “a clearer articulation of the doctrinal foundations of United Nations peacekeeping” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 8). Like the Brahimi Report, it foregrounds PoC as a core goal for UN peace operations. In doing so, it provides a fundamental reinterpretation of the “holy trinity.” Specifically, both documents articulate an “assertive” conception of impartiality that regrounds peacekeepers’ authority in a more expansive set of norms and principles – a basis for decision-making that privileges the promotion and protection of human rights (Paddon Rhoads 2016; United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 33). Impartiality, no longer understood as passive, now prescribes that “UN forces should implement their mandates without favour or prejudice to any party” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 33). Consent is also divided into two levels: strategic and tactical (2008, p. 19, 67). While the former remains a prerequisite for any peace operation, the latter is unnecessary in certain circumstances – forceful action should be taken against those who endanger civilians (Paddon Rhoads and Welsh 2019, p. 603). This reinterpretation of established principles was a way of maintaining continuity while incorporating PoC as a core element of peacekeeping. The increasing prominence of PoC in peacekeeping mandates over the last two decades also spawned the development of PoC-specific training materials, operational guidance, and policies (Mamiya 2016; Paddon Rhoads and Welsh 2019; United Nations 2015, 2017).

State-Building and “Stabilization”

The post-Cold War era has also brought a widespread conviction that peace operations can, and should, address the root causes of conflict – that they should “identify and support structures which will tend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to prevent a relapse into conflict” (Boutros-Ghali 1992, p. 468). In practice, this has involved a strong focus on host-state institutions. Most UN peace operations are tasked with supporting, and sometimes building, a framework of state institutions that can maintain order, uphold the rule of law, and safeguard the rights of citizens (Paris 2004). Critics are quick to point out that building a strong state is not the same as building durable peace (Newman 2009, p. 30). Nevertheless, the authors of the Capstone Doctrine list “strengthening the State’s ability to provide security, with full respect for the rule of law and human rights” as one of the core functions for multidimensional peace operations, and they note that blue helmets may be asked to “support the restoration and extension of state authority” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 23, 26). These expectations coexist uneasily with other elements of peacekeeping doctrine. State-building, protection of civilians, and respect for the “holy trinity” may go hand in hand, but they are not compatible in every situation. Existing doctrine does not make clear, for example, whether being authorized to use force in defense of the mandate allows peacekeepers to use force to defend the states they are charged with supporting (Aoi et al. 2017, p. 14).

The advent of “stabilization” operations provides a de facto answer to this question. A relatively new term in UN circles, the concept “stabilization,” gained traction in the mid-2000s, and by 2014 it appeared in the name of four UN missions: MONUSCO, MINUSMA, MINUSCA, and MINUSTAH. Yet its meaning remains ambiguous (High-Level Independent Panel on UN Peace Operations 2015, p. 30; Gilder 2019, p. 47; Andersen 2018, p. 10). In practice, stabilization is a “state-building construct”; it involves working directly with “states in crisis” to “restore order and stability in the absence of a peace settlement, by using force and other means to help national and local authorities to contain aggressors. . . and protect civilians, in the context of a larger peace process” (Aoi et al. 2017, p. 5; Aoi and de Coning 2017, p. 299). This definition is a product of induction, though, and the UN has shied away from defining the term. The concept has evolved out of practice, not a specific decision-making process. Many scholars argue that the UN’s understanding of “stabilization” draws heavily – if not explicitly – on Western militaries’ experiences with counterterrorism and counterinsurgency operations in Afghanistan and Iraq (Karlsrud 2019, p. 12; Curran and Holtom 2015, p. 3; Andersen 2018, p. 9). Still, there is “no internal document within the UN that attempts to explain what the stabilization concept means in the context of UN peacekeeping doctrine” (de Coning 2018, p. 87). This doctrinal void raises a host of questions about the relationship between state-building and stabilization, protection of civilians, and the “holy trinity” of consent, impartiality, and the non-use of force.

Points of Conceptual Friction

At first glance, many of the doctrinal changes described above might seem reasonable and relatively straightforward. In practice, however, personnel on the ground are still obliged to juggle competing norms and principles. This section draws on empirical examples to highlight persistent points of conceptual friction.

Existing doctrine for peace operations seeks to reconcile protection of civilians with the long-standing norms of consent, impartiality, and the non-use of force except in self-defense. Evidence from contemporary peace operations shows that, in practice, this can be difficult (Holt and Taylor 2009; Autesserre 2019; United Nations General Assembly, 7 March 2014). Specifically, as Paddon Rhoads and Welsh (2019, p. 603) write, “[t]here is confusion over what actions are permissible to implement the protection imperative and whether force can be used against one party without the mission being regarded as partial.” The latter has potential legal implications, as the sustained or intensive engagement by peacekeepers in armed hostilities in furtherance of a PoC mandate may result in the loss of their protected status under international humanitarian law. In addition, although operations authorized under Chapter VII are permitted to carry out enforcement action and the Security Council has explicitly stated that a PoC mandate applies “irrespective of the source of the threat” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations and Department of Field Support 2016, p. 19), this conflicts with DPKO’s affirmation that strategic consent is a requirement (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, pp. 31–33). Peacekeepers have grappled with this tension in Darfur (UNAMID), DR Congo (MONUC/MONUSCO), and South Sudan (UNMISS), mission contexts where host government forces have carried out atrocities or have been a major source of harm against civilians (Paddon Rhoads and Welsh 2019).

The UN’s state-building activities – especially its move toward stabilization operations – are also in tension with the norms of consent, impartiality, and the non-use of force except in self-defense.

According to Peter (2015, p. 353), there is a “doctrinal mismatch” between the “enforcement peacekeeping” of stabilization operations and the vision of peace operations outlined in the Brahimi report and the Capstone Doctrine. This discrepancy is most obvious around the use of force. In the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), for example, peacekeepers have worked with the Congolese military to conduct “targeted offensive operations” aimed at “neutralizing” specific adversaries in order to “make space for stabilization activities” (United Nations Security Council 2013). In doing so, critics argue that they are using force at the strategic/operational level (not just the tactical level), thereby overstepping the limits of robust peacekeeping outlined in the Capstone Doctrine (Kjeksrud and Vermeij 2017, p. 238). Siding with Congolese security forces to target specific armed groups also places considerable strain on the norm of impartiality, undermining peacekeepers’ capacity to serve as mediators and honest brokers for peace (Paddon Rhoads 2016, p. 189). Again, working with host governments to achieve the military defeat of certain armed groups goes beyond the UN’s stated commitment to penalizing “infractions” without “favour or prejudice to any party” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 33). Finally, consent is always fluid, but targeted offensive operations are generally not conducted with the consent of the parties against whom they are directed. The Mouvement du 23 mars (M23), one of the armed groups targeted by blue helmets in the DRC, did not accept peacekeepers’ efforts to “neutralize” it (Cammaert 2013, pp. 7–9). Providing direct military support to host states creates a situation where peacekeepers must operate without the consent of all parties to a conflict. These points of friction lead many observers to conclude that stabilization operations mark a clear departure from the UN’s historical commitment to consent, impartiality, and the non-use of force except in self-defense (Aoi et al. 2017, p. 2; Hunt 2017, p. 124; Kjeksrud and Vermeij 2017, pp. 233–239; Peter 2015, pp. 358–360).

Tensions also exist between PoC and the UN’s commitment to state-building and stabilization. In theory, the two goals can go hand in hand.

Uncertainty remains, however, about the extent to which “stabilization” and the extension of state authority are “viewed as means toward civilian protection ends, or simply as ends in and of themselves” (Hunt 2017, p. 114). Much of the guidance on PoC assumes that non-state actors are primarily responsible for attacks on civilians. The Capstone Doctrine notes, for example, that peace operations are often deployed in settings “characterized by the presence of militias, criminal gangs, and other spoilers who may actively seek to undermine the peace process or pose a threat to the civilian populations” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 34). Yet there is ample evidence showing that states themselves are often responsible for serious human rights violations. In Mali – a country where peacekeepers are charged with supporting the restoration of state authority – Malian security forces are accused of committing extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, torture, and arbitrary arrests (Human Rights Watch 2017). When blue helmets provide direct support to host-state security forces, they may be working closely with perpetrators of attacks on civilians. Using force to support host states can also put civilians at risk in a more immediate sense. If civilians are caught in the crossfire or subject to “revenge attacks” from armed groups as has occurred in the DRC, UN military action can “result in harm to the very people [it] is intended to protect” (Hunt 2017, pp. 115–116). In short, the UN’s commitment to state-building and stabilization sometimes operates at cross-purposes with its goal of protecting civilians from violence.

The final section explores the root causes of these tensions and contradictions within peacekeeping doctrine. It shows that they are linked to ongoing contestation among member states, UN officials, and other stakeholders.

Contestation and the Future of Peace Operations

The Capstone Doctrine begins from the observation that peacekeeping missions were historically guided by “a largely unwritten body of principles” (United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations 2008, p. 8). During the Cold War, there was broad agreement on the “holy trinity” of consent, impartiality, and the non-use of force except in self-defense, but there was little formal guidance explaining how to integrate them into the planning and conduct of UN peace operations. The post-Cold War era brought concerted efforts to standardize peacekeeping as a practice by providing blue helmets with clear guidance. For example, the incorporation of PoC as a central pillar of peacekeeping doctrine has involved repeated attempts to clarify the responsibilities of UN personnel (Bode and Karlsrud 2019, p. 16). These efforts have not yielded consistent practices, however, because UN member states disagree fundamentally about a host of related issues, including the degree of risk peacekeepers themselves should assume to protect civilians from violence (Bode and Karlsrud 2019, pp. 17–18; Abiola et al. 2017, pp. 153–154). Guidance for peace operations always coexists with national doctrine, and in some cases, troop-contributing countries prefer to maintain a degree of doctrinal ambiguity because it gives them more freedom to make case-by-case decisions about how their troops should deal with particular situations (Bode and Karlsrud 2019, p. 21).

Tensions and ambiguities in peacekeeping doctrine also reflect more abstract, conceptual disagreements among member states and other stakeholders. For instance, concerns about host-state consent for peace operations are often linked to an overarching preoccupation with Westphalian norms of sovereign autonomy and nonintervention (Yin 2017, p. 117). Finally, as Andersen points out, the Secretariat itself is also conflicted about new trends in UN peace operations. Some actors within the UN bureaucracy are “pushing back” against the perceived militarization of UN missions, adding another layer to ongoing contestation about the purpose and scope of peace operations (Andersen 2018, pp. 2–3, 18).

Together, these conditions make it difficult to resolve tensions between older and newer elements of peacekeeping doctrine. Efforts to arrive at consensus and clarity are hampered by the fact that vagueness and ambiguity frequently serve a political purpose (de Coning 2018, p. 88; Laurence 2019, p. 9, 18–19). To the extent that peace operations are a multilateral endeavor, they reflect the goals, preferences, and values of a diverse community. This means that principles and doctrine for peace operations are bound up with competing international norms and shifting global power dynamics (Paris 2014, p. 502). This was true historically, and it is still true today. Going forward, it will be important for scholars and practitioners alike to keep this in mind.

Cross-References

- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach
- ▶ Protection of Civilians
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Abiola, S., de Coning, C., Hamann, E., et al. (2017). The large contributors and UN peacekeeping doctrine. In C. Aoi, C. de Coning, & J. Karlsrud (Eds.), UN Peacekeeping doctrine in a new era (pp. 152–185). New York: Routledge.
- Andersen, L. R. (2018). The HIPPO in the room: The pragmatic push-back from the UN peace bureaucracy against the militarization of UN peacekeeping. International Affairs, 94(2), 1–19.
- Aoi, C., & de Coning, C. (2017). Towards a United Nations stabilization doctrine – stabilization as an emerging UN practice. In C. de Coning, C. Aoi, & J. Karlsrud (Eds.), UN Peacekeeping doctrine in a new era (pp. 288–310). New York: Routledge.
- Aoi, C., de Coning, C., & Karlsrud, J. (2017). Introduction: Addressing the emerging gap between concepts, doctrine, and practice in UN peacekeeping operations. In C. Aoi, C. de Coning, & J. Karlsrud (Eds.), UN Peacekeeping doctrine in a new era (pp. 1–30). New York: Routledge.
- Autesserre, S. (2019, January/February). The crisis of peacekeeping. Why the UN Can't end wars. Foreign Affairs (pp. 101–116).
- Bellamy, A. J., Williams, P., & Griffin, S. (2010). Understanding Peacekeeping. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Berdal, M. (2010). The security council and peacekeeping. In V. Lowe, A. Roberts, J. M. Welsh, et al. (Eds.), The United Nations security council and war: The evolution of thought and practice since 1945 (Vol. 1945, pp. 175–204). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bode, I. & Karlsrud, J. (2019). Implementation in practice: The use of force to protect civilians in United Nations peacekeeping. European Journal of International Relations, Online First, 25(2), 458–485.
- Boulden, J. (2005). Mandates matter: An exploration of impartiality in United Nations operations. Global Governance, 11(2), 147–160.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping. New York: United Nations.
- Cammaert, P. (2013). The UN intervention brigade in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. New York: International Peace Institute.
- Curran, D., & Holtom, P. (2015). Resonating, rejecting, reinterpreting: Mapping the stabilization discourse in the United Nations security council, 2000–2014. Stability, 4(1), 1–18.
- de Coning, C. (2018). Is stabilization the new normal? Implications of stabilization mandates for the use of force in UN peacekeeping operations. In P. Nadin (Ed.), The use of force in UN Peacekeeping (pp. 85–99). London: Routledge.
- Doss, A. (2014). In the footsteps of Dr Bunche: The Congo, UN peacekeeping and the use of force. Journal of Strategic Studies, 37(5), 703–735.
- Doyle, M., Johnston, I., & Orr, R. (1997). Keeping the peace: Multidimensional UN operations in Cambodia and El Salvador. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gibbs, D. (2000). The United Nations, international peacekeeping and the question of 'impartiality': Revisiting the Congo operation of 1960. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 38(3), 359–382.
- Gilder, A. (2019). The effect of 'stabilization' in the mandates and practice of UN peace operations. Netherlands International Law Review, 66(1), 47–73.
- Hammarskjöld, D. (1958). Summary study of the experience derived from the establishment and operation of the force: Report of the secretary-general A/3943. New York: United Nations.

- High-Level Independent Panel on UN Peace Operations. (2015). Uniting our strengths for peace: Politics, partnership and people. New York: High-Level Independent Panel on UN Peace Operations.
- Holmes, R. (2001). The Oxford companion to military history. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Holt, V., & Taylor, G. (2009). Protecting civilians in the context of UN peacekeeping operations: Successes, setbacks and remaining challenges. New York: United Nations.
- Howard, L. M. (2008). UN Peacekeeping in civil wars. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Human Rights Watch. (2017). Mali: Unchecked abuses in military operations. <https://www.hrw.org/news/2017/09/08/mali-unchecked-abuses-military-operations>.
- Hunt, C. T. (2017). All necessary means to what ends? The unintended consequences of the 'robust turn' in UN peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 24(1), 108–131.
- Kaldor, M. (2006). New and old wars: Organized violence in a global era. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Karlsruud, J. (2019). From Liberal peacebuilding to stabilization and counterterrorism. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 1–21.
- Kjeksrud, S., & Vermeij, L. (2017). Protecting governments from insurgencies: The Democratic Republic of the Congo and Mali. In C. de Coning, C. Aoi, & J. Karlsruud (Eds.), UN Peacekeeping doctrine in a new era (pp. 227–245). New York: Routledge.
- Koops, J. A., Tardy, T., MacQueen, N., et al. (2015). The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Laurence, M. (2019). An 'impartial' force? Normative ambiguity and practice change in UN peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 26(3), 256–280.
- Mamiya, R. (2016). A history and conceptual development of the protection of civilians. In H. Willmot, R. Mamiya, S. Sheeran, et al. (Eds.), (eds) Protection of Civilians (pp. 63–87). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Newman, E. (2009). 'Liberal' Peacebuilding Debates. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on Liberal peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Paddon Rhoads, E. (2016). Taking sides in peacekeeping: Impartiality and the future of the United Nations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Paddon Rhoads, E., & Welsh, J. M. (2019). Close cousins in protection: The evolution of two norms. International Affairs, 95(3), 597–617.
- Panel on United Nations Peace Operations. (2000). Report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations. New York: United Nations.
- Paris, R. (2004). At War's end: Building peace after civil conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Paris, R. (2014). The geopolitics of peace operations: A research agenda. International Peacekeeping, 21(4), 501–508.
- Peter, M. (2015). Between doctrine and practice: The UN peacekeeping dilemma. Global Governance, 21(3), 351–370.
- United Nations. (1945). Charter of the United Nations. Available at: <http://www.unwebsite.com/charter>
- United Nations. (1973). Report of the Secretary-General on the Implementation of the Security Council Resolution, S/11052/Rev.1.
- United Nations. (2015). Protection of civilians: Implementing guidelines for military components of United Nations peacekeeping missions. Ref. 2015.02. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2017). DPKO/DFS policy: The protection of civilians in United Nations peacekeeping. Ref. 2015.07. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations Department of Peace Operations. (n.d.). Our History. <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/our-history>.
- United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations. (2008). United Nations peacekeeping operations: Principles and guidelines. New York: United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations.
- United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations and Department of Field Support. (2016). Guidelines: Police Command in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations and Special Political Missions. New York.
- United Nations General Assembly. (1999). Report of the secretary general pursuant to general assembly resolution 53/35 – the fall of Srebrenica A/54/549. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations General Assembly. (2000). Comprehensive review of the whole question of peacekeeping operations in all their aspects A/54/839. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations General Assembly. (7 March 2014). Evaluation of the implementation and results of protection of civilians mandates in United Nations peacekeeping operations. Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services, A/68/787. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations Security Council. (1999). Report of the independent inquiry into the actions of the United Nations during the 1994 genocide in Rwanda S/1999/1257. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations Security Council. (2013). Resolution 2098 S/RES/2098 (2013). http://www.un.org/en/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=S/RES/2098\(2013\))
- Williams, P. (2017). Global and regional peacekeepers: Trends, opportunities, risks and a way ahead. Global Policy, 8(1), 124–129.
- Yin, H. (2017). China's doctrine on UN peacekeeping. In C. Aoi, C. de Coning, & J. Karlsruud (Eds.), UN peacekeeping doctrine in a new era (pp. 109–131). New York: Routledge.

Peace Process

- In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda

Peace Talks

- ▶ In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda
- ▶ Sierra Leone

Peace Through Prosperity

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Peace Through Strength

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Peace Through Tourism

Fabio Carbone
International Institute for Peace through Tourism,
New York, NY, USA
Coventry University, Coventry, UK

Definition

The peace-through-tourism nexus refers to the notion of tourism as social force that can potentially lead to a more peaceful and fairer world. In this sense, the practice of tourism is seen as mean to promote intercultural dialogue, cross-cultural understanding, cultural diversity, as well as equality and human rights.

This notion was initially based on the “contact theory” (Allport 1979), whereby the travel-induced contact between tourists and resident population positively influences individuals’ perceptions of other groups, increasing mutual understanding. Over time this belief has been criticized as somewhat simplistic.

A more complex approach to the potential causal relationship between tourism and peace has gained ground, denoting an ongoing ontological and epistemological maturation process of this subject. Nowadays, the theoretical extensions are indeed based on an integrated approach that goes beyond tourism, involving fields such as cultural studies, cultural heritage management, communication, geopolitics, international relations, and peace and conflict studies.

Introduction

Tourism is traditionally acknowledged as a social force for peace. In 1973 the Constituent Act and Statute of the United Nations World Tourism Organization (UNWTO) defined tourism as a vehicle of sustainable development and peace. Later on, on 1986 – International Year of Peace – was founded the International Institute for Peace Through Tourism (IIPT), with the aim to promote a vision of travel and tourism as the world’s first global peace industry and the belief that every traveler is potentially an “Ambassador for Peace.” In this sense, the association between peace and tourism has also been explored in the prism of international relations. In the scientific literature tourism is indeed indicated among the Track II diplomacy activities (Kim & Crompton 1990), and – more specifically – as a potential mean of cultural diplomacy (Carbone 2017).

Theoretically, peace through tourism refers to a body of analysis which suggests tourism may contribute to cross-cultural understanding, tolerance, and peace between community and nations (Blanchard & Higgins-Desbiolles 2013). The peace-through-tourism nexus summarizes the ideal of promoting human security through international citizenship. This discourse is mainly based on the assumption that traveling reduces cultural and psychological distances among people (Nyaupane et al. 2008) and as a result it positively influences international politics and fosters world peace (Edgell et al., 2008) by encouraging cooperation among nations (Askjellerud 2003; Causevic 2010). Nevertheless, this discourse does not define the causal relations underlying the process described. Indeed, objections have been raised about the chain of reasoning underlying this assumption of a sort of peace by tourism-induced osmosis (see, e.g., Brown 1989; Carbone 2019).

Tourism and Peace in the Academic Debate: A Controversial Association

The tourism-peace nexus represents a fascinating and controversial topic within the scientific community (see, among others, Burnett 1990; Becken & Carmignani, 2016; Farmaki, 2017; Carbone 2021; Tavares da Silva et al. 2021). Despite the existence of a conspicuous literature, this subject still appears fuzzy, and different interpretation exists of the topic itself (Carbone 2021).

At the beginning, much tourism scholarship was pervaded by unsubstantial normative assumptions that tourism and travel-induced contact increases understanding and interaction among people, leading to peace. Traveling – according to this view – eases negative prejudices and reduces sociocultural stereotypes through the direct contact with a different culture. Nevertheless, this assumption has been challenged – totally or partially – by empirical evidence from studies on host-tourist social dynamics (see, among others, the work by Fan et al. 2017; Tasci & Severt 2017).

On the one side, evidence suggests that the residents' attitudes are positively affected by host-tourist interaction (Eusébio, et al. 2018), and intergroup social contact can nurture mutual understanding (Li & Wang 2020; Litvin 2003). Nevertheless, on the other side evidence has also shown that tourism can have the effect of reinforcing cultural stereotypes about the places visited, rather than dissipating them. The study carried out by Sirakaya-Turk, et al. (2014) shows that tourist experience can paradoxically reinforce visitor's prejudices and stereotyped representations of host communities, rather than promoting a more careful and respectful approach toward local cultures. In this sense, Yang (2011) proves that stereotypical conceptions of minority people are sometimes reinforced by representations in ethnic tourism.

The same controversy exists with relation to the assumption of the positive effect on tourism in post-conflict areas or between antagonistic communities. The term “phoenix tourism” (Causevic & Lynch 2011) denotes the role of tourism normalizing relations and renewing a destination after conflict. However, it was demonstrated that studies demonstrate that also this assumption is – at least partially – unfounded. The research developed by authors such as Anastasopoulos (1992), Chen et al. (2016) and Farmaki et al. (2019) among others conclude that tourism cannot improve understanding between hostile communities, due to reasons such as: nationalistic sentiments, distrust and prejudice, political tensions, minimal government support, and competition over economic resources.

The state of the art of the debate on peace through tourism, and its development, was synthesized by Carbone (2021), who identifies three broad approaches through which scholars engage – and have engaged – with the tourism-peace nexus:

1. An abstract approach
2. A case-study-based approach
3. A complex approach

Today the scientific community urges on the necessity of a deeper look into the potential causal relation between tourism and peace. The latter, in turn, requires an interdisciplinary approach, particularly with the peace and conflict studies, in order to avoid simplifications and bias that would compromise the impact of any theoretical extension applicable to the real world (Carbone, 2021). Emphasis is given, for instance, to the potential contribution that tourism can make to the creation of a “peace culture” (Boulding, 2008: 1452) while responding to the urgent need to define ways of developing this potential in the context of peace education (Carbone, 2021).

This method of study of the possible causal relations between tourism and peace are leading to theoretical extension based on integrated approaches that include new elements making the bridge between tourism and peace. For instance, the study by Carbone (2021) advocates that the tourism sector is enabled to consider one of its main attractions, museums, as a center for peace education, dialogue, and – where required – reconciliation. In this sense, museums have the potential to sustain and enrich society at times marked by insecurity and increasing conflict, by stimulating a curiosity that is vital to understanding (Thomas, 2016). By doing so, tourism systems would practically and effectively start to include what in the context of peace and conflict studies Richmond (2013, p. 271) calls “Local Infrastructures for Peace,” defined as those institutions, mechanisms, resources, and skills used so that different groups can constructively interact with one another to address potential causes of actual or potential tension (socioeconomic, political, religious, ethnic, or religious differences, for instance).

Figure 1 portrays the system-thinking-driven blueprint suggested in the study about the dynamics underlying the association between peacebuilding and post-conflict tourism. Building on the four dimensions of peacebuilding, the blueprint highlights that it is possible to link tourism – as an economic sector – not only to the process of socioeconomic recovery in post-conflict societies, but also to the process of promotion of reconciliation and peace. This is made possible by the use of some components of the tourist system, namely tourist attractions such as museums, in general, and war-related attractions and war museums, in particular, as local infrastructures for peace. These would be spaces where both locals and tourists are explicitly encouraged to engage in relevant discussions for the active promotion of reconciliation and peace through curatorship solutions and specific activities. These components of the tourism system thus become the bridge between tourism activity and the peacebuilding process (the area in which the two rectangles overlap, in the figure).

“Tourism. Industry of Peace.” Is It?

As already mentioned, the UNWTO describes tourism as a mean to global peace, and the IIPT is committed since the 1986 to promote among the industry what D’Amore (1988) has designated as Peace Through Tourism, Fig. 1 Dynamics underlying the association between tourism and peace through the use of museums as local infrastructure for peace. (Source: Carbone 2021)

the “higher purpose of tourism.” Nevertheless, there are inherent obstacles to the realization of this ideal. Not least the strong, widespread neoliberal perception of the tourist phenomenon. Particularly from the supply side, indeed, the approach to tourism development, management, and promotion revolves mainly around the economic value of the tourism practice, largely neglecting its sociological and anthropological aspect.

Nevertheless, although part of the academic community wants to persuade us of the ability of tourism to dissipate sociocultural stereotypes, on the other hand industry itself often capitalizes on the existence of stereotypes (Walle, 1993). What is conveyed about different cultures within tourism marketing is intentionally structured around those stereotypes, somehow feeding the Western discourse on the “exotic other” (Suvantola, 2018). Indeed, although some forms of tourism are unquestionably more responsible and respectful than others (Maoz 2006), Bruner (1991) criticizes the fact that developing countries’ cultural displays serve as a mirror for Western fantasies, performances reflecting what tourists desire and expect to find.

It is possible to notice, thus, that tourism development practices based on this archetype have serious sociocultural and even economic negative implications, far distant from the ideal of peace through tourism. We need only to think of the overtourism, the uncontrolled growth of tourist presence that leads to open conflicts between tourists and resident population. The distance between the theoretical debate on the tourism-peace nexus and the praxis is even more evident in the commodification of human misery by tour operators worldwide: from the guided tours in the Brazilian favelas and Asian slums to those in the areas affected by natural disasters (e.g., the guided tours to the areas destroyed by the hurricane Katrina in New Orleans in 2005, and to the displaced community) and, recently, to the gathering areas of migrants and refugees and asylum seekers. These are the furthest things from the conceptual association between tourism and peace, aiming rather to meet the voyeuristic intents of the visitors (Fig. 2).

It is thus fair to indicate tourism as a potential mean to boost global understanding and a culture of peace. Though, it is important to be aware that such potential can only be realized in the presence of important preconditions which require also changes in the sociocultural perception of the phenomenon, both from the supply and demand side. First and foremost, it would be necessary to

Peace Through Tourism,

Fig. 2 German tourist walks with selfie stick along the beach promenade of Kos City where refugees camp until they get registered. (August 2015, Kos, Greece, Europe © Jörg Brüggemann / OSTKREUZ.

Retrieved from: <https://www.lensculture.com/articles/jorg-bruggemann-tourists-vs-refugees>) loosen the yoke that dogmatically binds tourism to economism and neoliberal approaches.

It is important also to notice three emblematic aspects, in this sense:

1. University tourism courses are normally afferent to faculties/departments of business and economics.
2. To date, undergraduate and postgraduate tourism curricula in higher education do not contain modules related, for instance, to geopolitics, international relations, or any other subject that would widen the students' understanding of tourism toward the tourism and peace debate. It is uncommon to find a graduate in tourism who heard about tourism and peace during his/her learning experience at the university.
3. Despite the UNWTO uses to indicate tourism as a mean to peace, in the context of the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) the official position of this special agency is as following:

Tourism has the potential to contribute, directly or indirectly to all of the goals. In particular, it has been included as targets in Goals 8, 12 and 14 on inclusive and sustainable economic growth, sustainable consumption and production (SCP) and the sustainable use of oceans and marine resources, respectively. (Source: <https://tourism4sdgs.org/tourism-for-sdgs/tourism-and-sdgs/>)

The official recognition of the role of tourism for the achievement of the SDG16 – Peace, justice, and strong institutions is thus lacking. Such a commitment would give a strong impulse to the debate and its real implications for the industry. With this in mind, it is worth to mention that – watching at this from the violence triangle by Galtung (1969) – it is not likely that tourism could contribute to the reduction of direct violence, but it certainly could make a valid contribution to the reduction of different forms of cultural violence, and indirectly even structural violence.

To this end, tourism should be associated to other areas such as education – formal, non-formal, and informal, heritage management, and intercultural dialogue, among others.

Summary

Tourism is traditionally understood as an activity of peace and for peace. It is assumed that conflicts (armed or not) are not beneficial to tourism, and likewise that tourism practice contributes to global mutual understanding and peace through the promotion of direct contact with different cultures. Nevertheless, a closer look at the subject disproves much of these assumptions.

An academic debate exists on the peace-tourism nexus, and the industry suggests through its top representatives – such as the UNWTO – the principle according to which tourism is a mean to peace. Nonetheless, strong limitations exist in both the industry and the academia's discourses.

To date, it is concluded that tourism represents only potentially a contribution to the creation of a culture of peace. There are preconditions for this potential to be realized. Theoretically, in order to make sense of the complex dynamics that the peace-through-tourism discourse underlies, it is necessary to link theories and practices from fields of research other than tourism – first and foremost peace and conflict studies. In practice, for tourism to effectively contribute to peace this knowledge should inform detailed guidelines to be shared internationally within the sector.

Furthermore, the industry should forge strong links with other sectors – from education to international relations, and from cultural heritage management to diplomacy, for instance. Finally, the economic approach and the neoliberal attitude toward tourism management and destinations development should leave room for more complex considerations regarding the role of tourism within the society and for the creation of a more peaceful and fairer world.

References

- Allport, G. W. (1979). The nature of prejudice. Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley.
- Anastasopoulos, P. G. (1992). Tourism and attitude change. Greek tourists visiting Turkey. Annals of Tourism Research, 19(4), 629–642.
- Askjellerud, S. (2003). The tourist: A messenger of peace? Annals of Tourism Research, 30(3), 741–744.

- Becken, S., & Carmignani, F. (2016). Does tourism lead to peace? Annals of Tourism Research, 61, 63–79.
- Blanchard, L. A., & Higgins-Desbiolles, F. (2013). Peace through tourism: Promoting human security through international citizenship. London: Routledge.
- Boulding, E. (2008). Peace culture. In L. Kurtz (Ed.), Encyclopedia of violence, peace, & conflict (2nd ed., pp. 1452–1465). Oxford: Academic Press.
- Brown, F. (1989). Is tourism really a peacemaker? Tourism Management, 10, 270–271.
- Bruner, E. M. (1991). Transformation of self in tourism. Annals of Tourism Research, 18(2), 238–250.
- Burnett, G. W. (1990). On the nature of peace in relationship to tourism: Three cases. The Tourist Review, 45(1), 2–7.
- Carbone, F. (2017). International tourism and cultural diplomacy: A new conceptual approach towards global mutual understanding and peace through tourism. Tourism. An International Interdisciplinary Journal, 65(1), 61–74.
- Carbone, F. (2019). Tourism and peace: a tool for global integration and peace. In L. Oosterbeek & L. Caron (Eds.), Resilience and Transformation in the territories of low demographic density: integrated methodologies of human and social sciences for integrated cultural landscape management (pp. 149–165). Macao: Instituto Terra e Memoria.
- Carbone, F. (2021). “Don’t look back in anger”. War museums’ role in the post conflict tourism-peace nexus. Journal of Sustainable Tourism, 1–19. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09669582.2021.1901909>
- Causevic, S. (2010). Tourism which erases borders: An introspection into Bosnia and Herzegovina. In O. Moufakkir & I. Kelly (Eds.), Tourism, Progress and Peace (pp. 48–64). Oxfordshire: CABI.
- Causevic, S., & Lynch, P. (2011). Phoenix tourism. Post-conflict tourism role, Annals of Tourism Research, 38(3), 780–800.
- Chen, C. C., Lai, Y. H. R., Prick, J. F., & Lin, Y. H. (2016). Tourism between divided nations. An examination of stereotyping on destination image. Tourism Management, 55, 25–36.
- D’Amore, J. L. (1988). Tourism – A vital force for peace. Tourism Management, 9(2), 151–154.
- Edgell, D. L., Allen, M. D., Smith, G., & Swanson, J. R. (2008). Political and foreign policy implications of tourism. In D. L. Edgell, M. D. Allen, G. Smith, & J. R. Swanson (Eds.), Tourism policy and planning (pp. 141–180). Boston: Butterworth-Heinemann.
- Eusébio, C., Vieira, A. L., & Lima, S. (2018). Place attachment, host–tourist interactions, and residents’ attitudes towards tourism development: The case of Boa Vista Island in Cape Verde. Journal of Sustainable Tourism, 26(6), 890–909.
- Fan, D. X. F., Zhang, H. Q., Jenkins, C. L., & Lin, P. M. C. (2017). Does tourist–host social contact reduce perceived cultural distance? Journal of Travel Research, 56(8), 998–1010.
- Farmaki, A. (2017). The tourism and peace nexus. Tourism Management, 59(Supplement C), 528–540.
- Farmaki, A., Khalilzadeh, J., & Altinay, L. (2019). Travel motivation and demotivation within political unstable nations. Tourism Management Perspectives, 29, 118–130.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6, 167–191.
- Kim, Y.-K., & Crompton, J. L. (1990). Role of tourism in unifying the two Koreas. Annals of Tourism Research, 17(3), 353–366.
- Li, F., & Wang, B. (2020). Social contact theory and attitude change through tourism: Researching Chinese visitors to North Korea. Tourism Management Perspectives, 36, 100743.
- Litvin, S. W. (2003). Tourism and understanding. Annals of Tourism Research, 30(1), 77–93.
- Maoz, D. (2006). The mutual gaze. Annals of Tourism Research, 33(1), 221–239.
- Nyaupane, G. P., Teye, V., & Paris, C. (2008). Innocents abroad: Attitude change toward hosts. Annals of Tourism Research, 35(3), 650–667.
- Richmond, O. P. (2013). Peace formation and local infrastructures for peace. Alternatives: Global, Local, Political, 38(4), 271–287.
- Sirakaya-Turk, E., Nyaupane, G., & Uysal, M. (2014). Guests and hosts revisited: Prejudicial attitudes of guests toward the host population. Journal of Travel Research, 53(3), 336–352.
- Suvantola, J. (2018). Tourist’s experience of place. USA: Routledge.
- Tasci, A. D. A., & Severt, D. (2017). A triple lens measurement of host–guest perceptions for sustainable gaze in tourism. Journal of Sustainable Tourism, 25(6), 711–731.
- Tavares da Silva, J., Breda, Z., & Carbone, F. (2021). Role and impact of tourism in peacebuilding and conflict transformation. USA: IGI Global.
- Thomas, N. (2016). The return of curiosity: What museums are good for in the twenty-first century.
- Walle, A. H. (1993). Tourism and traditional people: Forging equitable strategies. Journal of Travel Research, 31(3), 14–19.
- Yang, L. (2011). Ethnic tourism and cultural representation. Annals of Tourism Research, 38(2), 561–585.

Peace Within to Peace Without

► Islam and Peace

Peace Zones

► Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Peacebuilding

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Consonationalism and Peace After Conflict
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences
- ▶ Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach
- ▶ Police Reform and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia
- ▶ Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Peacebuilding = Consolidating Peace, Constructing Peace

- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus

Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

Dong Jin Kim
Irish School of Ecumenics, Trinity College
Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Civic values; Emancipatory peace; Everyday peace; Justpeace; NGOs; Reconciliation;

Strategic peacebuilding; The Korean peace process; Track two diplomacy

Definition/Description

The Korean peacebuilding case study has not been drawing substantial attention in peace and conflict studies scholarship. Given its extensive geopolitical dimensions, involving the Cold War legacy and nuclear weapons, it appears to be better suited for the field of international relations. However, there have been several South Korean civil society groups who built relationships with people in North Korea across the Demilitarized Zone, and promoted civic values for peace, in order to overcome the fragile armistice situation and build a sustainable peace on the Korean peninsula. Exploring the role of Korean civil society is expected to narrow the gaps in the Korean peace process, both in terms of knowledge and practice, and to add significant empirical substance to discussions in peace and conflict studies surrounding the potential of civil society for sustainable peacebuilding.

Introduction

Civil society has been regarded by many peace and conflict scholars as an intermediary between adversaries, and also between the elites and grassroots, to make breakthroughs in peace processes and to guarantee sustainability of peacebuilding (Lederach 1997). The realpolitik perspective appears to lower the expectation that top-level leadership would change their hardline position and pursue more than short-term political gains and elite interests, which are often disguised in the name of national security and national interest. The frequency of breakdowns in various peace processes seems to prove that high-level agreements lack sustainability. However, the bad record of high-level peace processes alone does not warrant civil society as the answer for sustainable peacebuilding. Despite the presence of civil society, most peace processes still appear unstable, and dominated by an elite agenda. Furthermore, compared to research on states, the role of non-state actors, including civil society, in peace processes has been understudied, leaving them not observable enough to modify mainstream international relations theories (Richmond 2011). In order to enhance knowledge of the potential of civil society in sustainable peacebuilding, and to improve theoretical and conceptual frameworks for recognizing when this potential is realized, peace and conflict studies have been amassing empirical case studies (Pearce 2001).

The Korean case study has not been drawing substantial attention, so far, in peace and conflict studies scholarship. Given its extensive geopolitical dimensions, involving the Cold War legacy and nuclear weapons, it appears to be better suited for the field of international relations. The fact that the Korean War was suspended by the Armistice Agreement of 1953, and the ceasefire has been kept without major clashes between North and South Korea, seems to be in line with mainstream international relations theories, particularly realism (Hwang 2011). However, a series of high-level negotiations, attempting to move forward from the armistice to a more lasting peace, broke down. Considering the mistrust among the conflict parties, and the recurrent use of provocative rhetoric and military posturing, the possibility of a resumption of war still exists. In order to overcome the fragile armistice situation and build a sustainable peace on the Korean peninsula, several South Korean civil society groups initiated relationship building with people in North Korea across the conflict line, and promoted civic values for peace, responding to the state narratives of national security and national interest (Kim 2019b). Exploring the role of Korean civil society is expected to narrow the gaps in the Korean peace process, both in terms of knowledge and practice, and to add significant empirical substance to the discussions in peace and conflict studies surrounding the potential of civil society for sustainable peacebuilding.

Peacebuilding and Civil Society

Former UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali's 1992 report, "An Agenda for Peace," was momentous for the international community in embracing the term "peacebuilding." In the report, Boutros-Ghali says: "Peacemaking and peacekeeping are required to halt conflicts and preserve peace once it is attained. If successful, they strengthen the opportunity for post-conflict peace-building, which can prevent the recurrence of violence among nations and peoples" (Boutros-Ghali 1992, p. 5). The background to the introduction of peacebuilding in Boutros-Ghali's report was the upsurge of various peace processes and their subsequent breakdowns in the early 1990s. However, the effectiveness and sustainability of international peacebuilding, since the 1992 report, have been questioned by several peace researchers. Their biggest concern has been the focus from the international community on liberal statebuilding, which appears to reduce peacebuilding to the top-down and external imposition of a political and economic structure, not a peace structure created by local populations (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013).

The concept of peacebuilding emerged in the 1970s during a process of critical reflection by peace and conflict scholars, Johan Galtung in particular, on international peace operations. According to Galtung, international peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts were relatively successful in achieving a cessation of physical violence, but not in achieving durable peace. In peacemaking, the sense of urgency to stop a war surpassed the need for reconciliation between people. Peacekeeping concentrated on maintaining the absence of physical violence, deferring discussions on how to address the root causes of conflict and animosity among conflict parties, leaving the possibility of regression to war. For this reason, rather than creating and maintaining a wall between conflict parties, building a structure for peace where people at multiple levels of societies are able to envisage alternative and positive relationships has been suggested for sustainable peace (Galtung 1976).

In light of the original proposal of the peacebuilding concept, the key criticism of mainstream international peacebuilding has been that building a structure for peace cannot be equivalent to copying and pasting standardized state institutions. In order for local people in conflict-affected societies to envision peaceful changes, they should be part of creating the blueprint for their future. This does not mean that everything about peacebuilding should be local but local context and the needs of the local people should be considered more seriously, rather than just enforcing a certain type of statebuilding as a panacea. Many international conflicts emerged in the process of building and aspiring to build nation-states, and a universal statebuilding prescription cannot be the answer to all these conflicts (Mac Ginty 2011). External and top-down solutions can be especially counterproductive because of the perception that these solutions represent the interests of former colonial powers, who continue to benefit in an unjust neoliberal world order (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). On top of that, too much focus on statebuilding tends to prioritize political agreements between elite groups, creating gaps between peace processes and the life of ordinary people in conflict-affected societies, paradoxically making the society not so liberal, and losing the sustainability of peace processes (Lederach 1997; Richmond 2008).

As a way of reducing the gaps in building peace, the middle-out approach of local civil society has been highlighted. The prospect of a peacebuilding role by civil society is related to the unique structure and position of civil society between top-down and bottom-up initiatives. Firstly, civil society is considered to be a sector on its own. This means that civil society peacebuilding could be relatively free from political standoffs in a high-level peace process. Due to their sectoral links, civil society would be able to build and maintain relationships with other conflict parties. Secondly, although civil society interacts with the economic sector, it does not appear to have an intention to make economic profit. Therefore, civil society could be an ideal actor in addressing the issues of peace dividends and social justice in peace processes. Finally, civil society is regarded as having different values from government; it does not have the ambition to run states. Civil society would be able to facilitate the engagement of people in peacebuilding, not by taking power to rule but by advocating civic values for peace (Lederach 1997; Spurk 2009; Wagle 1999).

However, in many conflict-affected societies, civil society would be frail or absent, and local people-focused and value-oriented civil society activities would tend to be suppressed in the name of national security and national interest. International peacebuilding and development organizations have been providing assistance in the formation and empowerment of local civil societies, but they have been criticized for creating power relations between donors and recipients, and propagating the neoliberal values of developed countries (Carey 2012; Richmond 2008). Although the main purpose of civil society groups would not be economic gain, they do need resources to sustain their work and, therefore, would be subject to funders. This lack of independence due to political pressures and financial constraints could make civil society an agency to assure civil compliance in top-down peace processes based on statebuilding prescriptions (Barnes 2005). For this reason, peace and conflict scholars argue that the prospect of civil society for sustainable peacebuilding is not based merely on the existence of civil society but in realizing the potential for civil society as a critical agency in resisting top-down, state-oriented peace processes, by advocating continuing reconciliation between ordinary people across conflict lines, and by promoting civic values for peace, based on everyday local contexts (Richmond 2011).

The Korean Peace Process

The Korean peninsula was divided by the USSR and the USA in 1945, following the line of the 38th parallel north, at the end of Japanese colonization. In 1948, the Republic of Korea (South Korea) was launched south of the line and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (North Korea) in the north. The incompatible statebuilding goals of North and South Korea, a unified Korean peninsula under a communist system and a unified peninsula under a capitalist system, became a root cause of the conflict, which escalated into war in 1950. The Armistice Agreement of 1953 achieved a suspension, but not the end, of the war (Cumings 2005). The Korean case seems to correspond well with Galtung's criticism on the limits of traditional peacemaking and peacekeeping, which is preoccupied on the absence of physical violence (Galtung 1976). The 1953 agreement created the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ) between the two Koreas, overseen by the Neutral Nations Supervisory Commission and the Military Armistice Commission. The DMZ suspended the movement of not only militaries but also civilians. In the years following the establishment of the DMZ, South and North Korea considered themselves to be at the frontline of the Cold War, and maintained hostilities and military readiness toward each other (Hamm 1999).

During the Cold War period, the political leaders in both North and South Korea used the unfinished war to rationalize their militaristic, authoritarian rules, reinforcing the enemy identity toward Koreans on the other side of the DMZ. In the early 1970s, influenced by the Sino-American rapprochement and the American-Soviet détente, secret peace negotiations began between the North and South Korean governments. The negotiations produced the Joint Communiqué between South and North Korea, which was announced on July 4, 1972 (The July 4 Joint Communiqué, 1972). The July 4 Communiqué initiated an ad hoc peace process, establishing the North-South Coordinating Commission and facilitating Red Cross meetings, but the process soon broke down, with the North and South Korean leaderships expressing their distrust of each other, and strengthening their dictatorship through the revision of their respective constitutions (Ko 2005). The lack of sustainability of the Korean peace process in the 1970s seemed to support the arguments on the limitations of high-level peace processes, in which top-level leadership has a tendency to prioritize short-term, elite interests.

The Korean peace process saw another breakthrough in the early 1990s in the atmosphere of the ending of the Cold War. A series of high-level talks since the late 1980s produced the 1991 Basic Agreement on Reconciliation, Non-aggression, Exchanges and Cooperation between North and South Korea, in which the two governments agreed to facilitate people's interaction and cooperation (The 1991 Basic Agreement 1991). However, the mistrust between the conflict parties, grown out of the recommencement of the US-South Korea military drill and the controversy surrounding the North Korean nuclear program, escalated tensions on the Korean peninsula once more (Kim 2006). The pledge by the North and South Korean governments on promoting interactions between people was finally realized following the first inter-Korean summit in 2000. For the first time since the division of the Korean peninsula, South Korean President Kim Dae-jung and North Korean Supreme Leader, Kim Jong-il, met in Pyongyang and issued a Joint Declaration on June 15, 2000 (The June 15 Joint Declaration, 2000). Since the June 15 Declaration, over two million Koreans have crossed the DMZ for various occasions, including humanitarian, development, and economic cooperation, sociocultural exchange, and tourism. Furthermore, approximately 16,000 separated family members were able to meet with their family (Burghart and Frank 2008).

However, when seemingly on course, the Korean peace process faced a series of impasses. The estranged relationship between the USA and North Korea, following the inclusion of North Korea in the list of "Axis of Evil" by US President, George W. Bush, in 2002, was exacerbated when North Korea made a statement that they had become a nuclear weapons state in 2005. The Six-Party Talks among the USA, China, Japan, Russia, and North and South Korea, to resolve the nuclear issues, made some progress, such as the September 19 Joint Statement in 2005, in which North Korea demonstrated willingness to give up their nuclear weapons program in return for energy assistance involving a provision of a light-water reactor (The September 19 Joint Statement, 2005). However, the lack of trust between the conflict parties, especially with regard to verification measures, suspended the Six-Party Talks indefinitely in the late 2000s (Pritchard 2007; Pardo 2014). Meanwhile, the inter-Korean relationship also deteriorated. In 2008, the newly elected South Korean President, Lee Myung-bak, proclaimed that North Korean liberal reform, based on market economy and universal human rights, and denuclearization should be preconditions for the continuation of inter-Korean cooperation. Lee called his new policy, Vision 3000, in which he pledged to raise the average income level of North Korea to $3,000 per capita, if North Korea implemented his institutional prescriptions (Kim 2008). North Korea immediately rejected Vision 3000. The Korean peace process became even more fragile after the sinking of a South Korean naval ship and the North Korean bombing of a South Korean island. The peace process finally broke down, with the introduction of the South Korean May 24 Measure, which suspended most South-North Korean exchange and cooperation projects, including cross-border civil society peacebuilding activities, in 2010 (Moon 2012).

Since the breakdown of the peace process, the tension on the Korean peninsula has surged to the extent that war seemed a possibility. The advancement of North Korean nuclear and missile technologies appeared to turn the Korean War into a potential nuclear war (Gause 2013). Although, in 2018 and in 2019, a series of the inter-Korean and the US-North Korea summits, between South Korean President Moon Jae-In and North Korean Chairman Kim Jong-Un, and between US President Donald Trump and Kim Jong-Un took a surprising turn of events and increased expectations for the resumption of the peace process, the inter-Korean exchange and cooperation projects remain on hold in 2020 (Choe 2020).

Peacebuilding Role of Korean Civil Society

Just like the concept of liberal peace, the concept of civil society could be seen as an imported or enforced perspective in the Korean local context. However, the formation of Korean civil society did not emerge through external intervention but in the process of resisting unjust state power (Duncan 2007). In 1919, millions of Koreans came out into the streets for nonviolent civil disobedience protests against Japanese colonial rule.

The organization of these protests gave birth to diverse social groups such as women's and labor movements (Masayuki 2007). The heritage of Korean people's movements under the Japanese state transformed into North and South Korean social groups, but with very different dispositions, reflecting the character of the divided states on the Korean peninsula. The North Korean government absorbed the spirit of people's resistance into the creation of a socialist dictatorship by claiming the public space for class struggles and retributive justice against the colonial legacy. On the other hand, the legitimacy of the South Korean dictatorship and unjust state power was continuously challenged by several social groups which formed South Korean civil society. Unceasing civil society action eventually achieved the democratization of South Korea in the late 1980s (Cumings 2007). Until the present time, there seems to have been no independent civic space between social sectors and the state in North Korea. However, South Korean civil society groups built, and are still trying to build, relationships with people in equivalent social sectors in North Korea, as well as promoting civic values for peace on the Korean peninsula.

Reconciliation Between People

Under the military dictatorship of Park Chung-hee (1961–1979), the prime concern of South Korean civil society was democratizing the South Korean state, rather than reconciling the two Koreas. Given that the justification of the dictatorship was based on the narrative of a national security threat from communist North Korea, civil society groups were very careful not to provide fodder to enable the authoritarian state to portray their movement as a communist-inspired activity. However, another military coup in 1979, and the military oppression and massacre of the May 18 Gwangju People's Uprising in 1980, brought an awareness to civil society that as long as the division of the Korean peninsula and armistice situation continued, the South Korean state could remain authoritarian under the ruse of national security (Weingartner 2003). This new awareness was conceptualized as the "division system" by scholars who were active members of civil society actions against the dictatorship. For example, one of the academics, Paik Nak-chung, described the Korean conflict using the concept of the division system that the conflict was “not just a conflict between two different states or regimes, but also a conflict between those who obtain their interests from the division and those who suffer from it” (Paik 2006, p. 81). Building on this new awareness and conceptual framework, several civil society groups, including religious groups, students, academia, and women’s groups, reached out to people in equivalent social sectors in North Korea, to promote a reconciliation, which would neutralize the national security rhetoric of the dictatorship (Kim 2019b).

One of the earliest initiatives to build relationships between North and South Koreans came from the religious civil society, ecumenical Christian groups in particular. Christians in South Korea have been considered a strong anti-communist and anti-North Korea group because of the discrimination and oppression of Christians in the process of land and social reforms following the formation of the North Korean socialist state (Kim and Ryoo 2002). The ecumenical group, under the umbrella of the National Council of Churches in Korea (NCCCK), was an integral part of the South Korean democratization movement, but it also maintained an anti-communist character until the 1970s. However, following the reappearance of a military dictatorship and the brutal state violence in Gwangju in 1980, the NCCCK requested the world ecumenical organization, the World Council of Churches (WCC), to provide a platform for the NCCCK to meet with their North Korean counterparts, the Korean Christian Federation (KCF). In 1986, the WCC organized a meeting of South and North Korean Christians in Switzerland. It was the first nongovernmental meeting between the two Koreas since the Armistice Agreement in 1953 (Kim 2017). At the beginning of the meeting, both South and North Korean participants were suspicious of ulterior motives and the true identity of each other, especially when they saw people strongly advocating the positions of their respective governments. However, as the meeting progressed, they were able to build trust, and a subsequent meeting in 1988 produced a joint statement on “Peace and Unification in the Korean Peninsula,” the first nongovernmental agreement between North and South Korea (Park 1998).

Before long, other civil society groups, such as the South Korean Women’s Associations United (KWAU), also initiated peace and unification movements and meetings with people in North Korea through their sectoral links. In 1991, representatives of the KWAU met with women representatives of the North Korean Supreme People’s Assembly (SPA) and the North Korean Committee for the Peaceful Reunification of Korea (CPRK) in Tokyo, Japan, in association with the New Japan Women’s Association (NJWA). The KWAU organized a subsequent meeting in Seoul, South Korea, in the same year, which was followed by a meeting in Pyongyang, North Korea, in 1992 and a meeting in Tokyo in 1993. As in the case of the meetings by the ecumenical Christian groups, the meeting by women’s groups also went through a period of building trust. Both North and South Korean women upheld the view of their respective governments regarding the issue of political unification. Their accounts about gender equality in their own society reflected the different relationships between these groups and their respective states: one recently became democratized; the other remained a dictatorship. However, they were able to find common ground on dealing with the issue of comfort women under the Japanese colonial rule, and advocated the women’s agenda being included in the peace process (Lee 1993; Kim 2009; Chung 2000). The ongoing relationship was helpful in organizing the 2002 South-North Korean Women’s Conference, which was to ensure that women would be able to participate in the peace process facilitated by the June 15 Declaration. More than 700 representatives from various women’s groups in North and South Korea attended the conference (Kim 2019a).

Meanwhile, North Korea went through a humanitarian crisis, beginning in the mid-1990s. The worsened economic situation following the collapse of the Soviet Bloc was aggravated by a series of natural disasters, causing a severe famine, which resulted in the deaths of approximately 5% of the entire population (Haggard and Noland 2005). When the North Korean famine became known to South Korean society, several civil society groups established humanitarian NGOs to provide aid to North Korea. The South Korean aid to North Korea had obvious security implications in the context of the Korean conflict, and the government strongly regulated NGO aid to vulnerable North Koreans. However, South Korean civil society groups advocated for aid to North Korea, not only as a humanitarian activity but also a peacebuilding practice to achieve reconciliation between the two Koreas (Kim 2016). South Korean NGO aid increased significantly, as the two Koreas entered a peace process following the inter-Korean summit in 2000. By 2007, more than 70 NGOs had registered with the government as having direct contact with their North Korean partners (Moon 2011). Before being suspended in 2010, the South Korean civil society humanitarian cooperation in North Korea had expanded and diversified into various sectors including food and agriculture, health and medical, and capacity building, leading to a dramatic growth in people-to-people contacts and relationship building across the DMZ (The Korea NGO Council for Cooperation with North Korea 2014).

Promoting Civic Values for Peace

While a growing number of civil society organizations initiated peacebuilding, the South Korean authoritarian state began the transition to a more democratic state in the late 1980s. The nationwide protest against the dictatorship in 1987, in which millions of people participated, facilitated this transition. The national referendum in 1987 for the revision of the constitution paved the way to the direct Presidential election. The democratization process at the time of the dismantlement of the Cold War appeared to show a weakening national security narrative of the divided states, and the transformed relationship between civil society and the state, from confrontation to counterbalance in diverse sectors of the society (Kim 2007).

However, much to the disappointment of South Korean civil society, despite the domestic political democratization, peacebuilding activities were still under strong state control, legitimated by the National Security Law (NSL). The NSL was created to protect South Korean citizens from existing threats of war, following the Armistice Agreement of 1953, but was more than often abused by the dictatorships to ban any criticism of the state (Eckert et al. 1991). Since the democratization, the NSL became the legal grounds to control people's interactions across the DMZ. Civil society leaders, who visited North Korea, or made contact with North Koreans without the permission of the state, were jailed or fined for violating the NSL. In order to overcome state restrictions and to democratize peacebuilding, South Korean human rights NGOs drew attention to civic values, enshrined in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and advocated civil society peacebuilding from the perspective of human rights (Park 1993).

Other civil society groups promoted civic values based on humanity and mutual respect, in order to neutralize security narratives of the state and to safeguard the democratic participation of citizens in peacebuilding. For example, the 1988 NCKK Declaration on Peace and Unification pointed out that human rights violations had been excused by both North and South Korean states by invoking the identity of the enemy against fellow Koreans, and the declaration called for reidentifying common humanity between North and South Koreans, who are partners in peacebuilding, through a peaceful civic engagement (Lee 2010). As well, several South Korean humanitarian aid NGOs, such as the Korean Sharing Movement (KSM) and Okedongmu Children in Korea, initiated public campaigns to change the "enemy" image of North Koreans, appealing to a common humanity. In 1998, these NGOs jointly organized "The International Day of Fasting for People in North Korea" on 25 April. Pope John Paul II, His Holiness the Dalai Lama, and former US President Jimmy Carter endorsed the campaign by also fasting on the day of the event. In due course, South Korean humanitarian NGOs also discovered that their activities had promoted humanity of South Koreans in North Korea (Kim 2019b). A South Korean NGO aid worker argues in an interview with a peace researcher: “If we help people who are in need, without hurting their self-esteem, they get to feel that we all share humanity and care about each other. I witnessed their hearts changing” (Kim 2019b, p. 203).

In the meantime, while promoting civic values for peace, based on human rights, common humanity, and mutual respect, several civil society organizations began to perceive that most social justice issues in the South Korean society, including social discrimination, gender inequality, economic disparity, and environmental degradation, were interconnected with conflict-affected social norms and ideas shaped by militarism. As a response to these norms and ideas, in the late 1980s, women groups, in collaboration with civil society organizations working for human rights of persons with disabilities, challenged the convention of the military dictatorship era, which had rewarded men’s compulsory military service with advantages in employment, thereby instigating the discrimination in the labor market against women and persons with disabilities (Moon 2005). The women’s movement also initiated campaigns for reducing the national defense budget. South Korean defense spending was more than 20% of the government expenditure until the early 1990s, as opposed to approximately 0.4% of the budget allocated for women’s welfare (Chung 2000). In 1989, the Citizen’s Coalition for Economic Justice (CCEJ) was launched to address the legacy of militarized industrialization under the authoritarian state and to realize the democratization of socioeconomic sectors as well as political sectors. The Korea Federation for Environmental Movements (KFEM), established in 1993, highlighted the need to repair the environmental damage caused by militarized industrialization. These diverse movements in democratized South Korea reaffirmed that disabling the division system is not just about unifying the divided states but also about transforming social norms in conflict-affected and militarized societies (Moon 2005).

The peacebuilding role of civil society appeared to gain momentum with the breakthroughs in the Korean peace process, such as the 1991 Basic Agreement, and the June 15

Declaration in 2000. However, civil society peacebuilding soon faced significant challenges, reflecting the downturn of the peace process and creating conflict within South Korean society. From the perspective of conservative politicians, militaries, and civil society groups, the development of North Korean nuclear and missile technologies was clear evidence that North Korea was still a great security threat to South Korea, and raised concerns that the promotion of peaceful values by civil society would weaken national security. There was also a debate within South Korean society about whether civil society efforts to change the image of North Korea from that of the enemy would negate the civil and political rights violations by the North Korean state, or even normalize the brutal nature of the regime (Suh 2007). The Vision 3000 policy of the South Korean government, in 2008, further polarized public opinion. From the viewpoint of civil society peacebuilding groups, South Korean imposition of state reform on North Korea only increased tension on the Korean peninsula, worsening national security and North Korean human rights situations. Therefore, reconciliation between the two Koreas would be the best option to resolve security concerns, and to facilitate the transformation of North Korean social norms by the North Koreans themselves (Suh 2013). But, for those who supported Vision 3000, North Korea could not be trusted as a partner in building peace, and increasing pressure on the North Korean state, such as a show of force through US-South Korea joint military exercises or international sanctions, would be the only option to protect South Korean national security and national interest and to potentially liberalize North Korea (Kim 2016).

The debate about North Korea continued to escalate to the extent that it was called the “South-South conflict” in South Korean society. The relationship between the state and civil society fluctuated, shadowing the ups and downs of the high-level peace process. For example, while civil society groups who had been engaged in peacebuilding lost access to government funding and state permission to visit North Korea in 2010, the civil society groups who endorsed hard-line North Korea policies were avored by the state (Moon 2014). The complete opposite situation occurred in 2018, when there was high hope for the resumption of the peace process following the US-North Korea summit and a series of inter-Korean summits. These recurring experiences raised an awareness in civil society about the need for reflection on the identity of civil society organizations, which were supposed to be independent from government and economic interests. Civil society also began to recognize the need to create a platform where diverse civil society groups with different opinions could discuss contesting values, norms, and ideas. There have been attempts by some civil society groups, such as the Korean Council for Reconciliation and Cooperation (KRCK), to build platforms for a “South-South Dialogue” on civic values in the Korean peace process. However, the affiliation of civil society groups with certain governments and political parties, especially regarding their position on North Korea, appeared to complicate the formation of this platform. The South Korean politicians continued to utilize the South-South conflict to win votes from those who supported their positions and thereby secure political power, while the North Korean state consolidated its nuclear and missile capability, as well as its authoritarian grip on its people, which keeps the division system strong, despite peacebuilding efforts by South Korean civil society (Kim 2019b).

Summary

The Korean conflict originated from incompatible political goals for nation statebuilding on the peninsula. The history of the Korean peace process demonstrates that top-down, state-oriented approaches to making, keeping, and building peace, where states dominate agendas at negotiation tables and control interactions between ordinary people, are unsustainable and that a peacebuilding approach based on the participation of people from multiple levels of society is required. Despite restrictions imposed by states and lack of limelight, diverse South Korean civil society groups have been engaging in peacebuilding activities. These groups contributed to the growth of contacts and relationship building between people across the DMZ, and to the transformation of social norms affected by conflict and militarism, through promotion of civic values for peace. When the high-level peace process made breakthroughs following the end of the Cold War, and these civil society peacebuilding activities expanded significantly, the experience of the South Korean civil society seemed to become empirical evidence that civil society could move people in the direction toward a sustainable peace.

However, regardless of the role of civil society, the Korean peace process broke down in 2010, exposing the limitations of civil society peacebuilding in the state-dominated peace process. Despite democratization in the late 1980s, South Korean civil society peacebuilding is still under strong regulation by the state, in the name of national security and national interest, making the civil society activities highly vulnerable to changes in high-level peace process. The South-South conflict showed how contesting values within civil society groups can make them dependent on the state, which have power to support or suspend their activities, by controlling access and funding. On top of that, the absence of civil society in North Korea constantly begs the question whether civil society peacebuilding can be possible in the first place, given the nature of the North Korean state.

In this regard, the Korean case study does not yet appear to be an addition of a successful empirical case to the theoretical and conceptual discussion of civil society peacebuilding, but it can still contribute to sharpening the existing conceptual understanding. As peace and conflict studies scholar, Oliver Richmond (2011), argues, the prospect of civil society for sustainable peacebuilding is not based merely on the existence of civil society but on the potential for civil society to be a critical agency, which would not be constrained by realpolitik. South Korean civil society showed the potential to become this critical agency. However, the current impasse in the Korean peace process demonstrates that civil society peacebuilding needs a continuous effort to achieve a more independent space from the state, and critical reflection on its distinctively normative identity. The bigger challenge would be the absence of civil society in North Korea. South Korean civil society peacebuilding efforts with people in equivalent social sectors in North Korea might be helpful in nurturing a civil society and promoting civic values in North Korea. However, as argued by critics of liberal peacebuilding and as in the case of the failure of Vision 3000, at the end of the day, North Korean citizens themselves should be the ones who initiate transformation of their social norms. A more autonomous and distinctively normative South Korean civil society could once again challenge the limitations of a top-down, state-oriented peace process. However, civil society peacebuilding would only reach its full potential as a critical agency in the Korean peace process, when people in North Korea are guaranteed mutual respect as peacebuilding partners in achieving reconciliation between the two Koreas and promoting civic values for peace in the Korean peninsula.

Cross-References

- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

Acknowledgments This work has received funding from the Irish Research Council and the European Union's Horizon 2020 research and innovation program under the Marie Skłodowska-Curie grant agreement No. 713279.

References

- Barnes, C. (2005). Weaving the web: Civil-society roles in working with conflict and building peace. In P. V. Tongeren, M. Brenk, M. Hellema, & J. Verhoeven (Eds.), People building peace II: Successful stories of civil society (pp. 7–24). London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping report of the secretary-general pursuant to the statement adopted by the summit meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992. UN Documents Gathering a Body of Global Agreements. https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/files/A_47_277.pdf. Accessed 16 Apr 2020.
- Burghart, S., & Frank, R. (2008). Inter-Korean cooperation 2000–2008: Commercial and non-commercial transactions and human exchanges (Vienna working papers on East Asian Economy and Society, Vol. 1, No. 1, pp. 1–28). Vienna: University of Vienna.
- Carey, H. F. (2012). Privatizing the democratic peace: Policy dilemmas of NGO peacebuilding. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Choe, S.-H. (2020, January 1). What Kim Jong-Un's latest threats say about his Trump strategy. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2020/01/01/world/asia/north-korea-kim-trump.html>
- Chung, H. (2000). Han'guk Yösöngt'ongirundongüi Hyönhwanggwä Kwache [The current situation and task of the Korean women's unification movement]. Women and Peace, 1, 162–204.
- Cummings, B. (2005). Korea's place in the sun: A modern history. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Cummings, B. (2007). Civil society in west and east. In C. K. Armstrong (Ed.), Korean society: Civil society, democracy and the state (pp. 9–32). New York: Routledge.
- Duncan, J. (2007). The problematic modernity of Confucianism: The question of “civil society” in Choson dynasty Korea. In C. K. Armstrong (Ed.), Korean society: Civil society, democracy and the state (pp. 33–52). New York: Routledge.
- Eckert, C. J., Lee, K., Lew, Y., Robinson, M., & Wagner, E. W. (1991). Korea old and new: A history. Seoul: Ilchokak Publishers.
- Galtung, J. (1976). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking, and peacebuilding. In Peace, war and defense: Essays in peace research II (pp. 282–304). Copenhagen: Christian Ejlert.
- Gause, K. E. (2013). North Korean leadership dynamics and decision-making under Kim Jong-Un. Arlington: CNA Analysis & Solutions.
- Haggard, S., & Noland, M. (2005). Hunger and human rights: The politics of famine in North Korea. Washington, DC: U.S. Committee for Human Rights in North Korea.
- Hamm, T. (1999). Arming the two Koreas: State, capital and military power. London: Routledge.
- Hwang, J. (2011). Rethinking South Korea's perception of the North Korean issue: In search of a new approach. Journal of Peace and Unification Studies, 3(2), 3–32.
- Kim, S. S. (2006). The two Koreas and the great powers. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Kim, S. (2007). Civil society and democratization in South Korea. In C. K. Armstrong (Ed.), Korean society: Civil society, democracy and the state (pp. 53–72). New York: Routledge.
- Kim, K. (2008). Lee Myung-Bak government's paradigm for foreign and security policy. Korea and World Affairs, 32(1), 5–15.
- Kim, J. (2009). Han'guküi Yösöngpyönghwa Undong [Korean women peace movement]. Kidokkyo Sasang, 608, 62–75.

- Kim, D. (2016). Aid to the enemy: Linking development and peacebuilding on the Korean Peninsula. The Pacific Review, 29(4), 473–498.
- Kim, D. (2017). Building relationships across the boundaries: The peacebuilding role of civil society in the Korean Peninsula. International Peacekeeping, 24(4), 515–537.
- Kim, D. (2019a). Beyond identity lines: Women building peace in Northern Ireland and the Korean Peninsula. Asia Europe Journal. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s10308-019-00551-5>.
- Kim, D. (2019b). The Korean peace process and civil society: Towards strategic peacebuilding. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kim, H., & Ryoo, D. (2002). Pukhanjonggyoŭi Saeroun Ihae [New understanding of the North Korean religion]. Seoul: Tasan'gŭljang.
- Ko, B. (2005). Nambukhan Kwan'gyeŭi Yöksachök Maengnak: Han'gukchönjaeng Ihu Hyönjaekkachi [The historical context of the Inter-Korean relationship: From the Korean War to the present time]. In Kyöngnamdaehakkyo pukhandaehagwön (Ed.), Nambukhan'gwan'gyeron (pp. 39–80). Paju: Hanul.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Lee, M. (1993). Nambuŷösonggyoryuŭi Hyönhwanggwa Chönman [The current situation and the prospect of South-North women's meetings]. Yösonggwa Sahoe, 4, 232–239.
- Lee, Y. (2010). 88 Sönön Chönhu Sigi NCKKüi T'ongirundonggwa Han'guk Kidokkyo [Before and after 88 declaration: NCKK unification movement and civil unification movement]. Han'guk Kidokkyo Yöksa Yön'guso Sosik, 89, 30–44.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Masayuki, N. (2007). March 1 and May 4, 1919 in Korea, China & Japan: Toward an international history of East Asian independence movements. The Asia-Pacific Journal: Japan Focus, 5(10), 1–7.
- Moon, S. (2005). Militarized modernity and gendered citizenship in South Korea. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Moon, K. (2011). The role of humanitarian NGOs: Impact on South Korean food aid policy towards North Korea from 1995–2007. Cranfield: Cranfield University.
- Moon, C. (2012). The sunshine policy: In defense of engagement as a path to peace in Korea. Seoul: Yonsei University Press.
- Moon, K. (2014). South Korean civil society organizations, human rights norms, and North Korea. Critical Asian Studies, 46(1), 65–89.
- Paik, N. (2006). Hanbandosik t'ongil, Hyönjae Chinhaenghyöng [The unification of the Korean Peninsula, present continuous]. Paju: Changbi.
- Pardo, R. P. (2014). North Korea – US relations under Kim Jong II: The quest for normalization? London: Routledge.
- Park, W. (1993). The national security law: The symbol of Korean human rights adversity. In Korea NGOs' Network for the UN World Conference on Human Rights (Ed.), Human rights violations under the national security laws in Asian countries (pp. 23–31). Seoul: Korea NGOs' Network for the UN World Conference on Human Rights.
- Park, K. (1998). Reconciliation reunification: The ecumenical approach to Korean Peninsula. Hong Kong: Christian Conference of Asia.
- Pearce, J. (2001). Civil society and peace. In M. Edwards (Ed.), The Oxford handbook of civil society (pp. 404–415). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Pritchard, C. L. (2007). Failed diplomacy: The tragic story of how North Korea got the bomb. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2008). Welfare and the civil peace: Poverty with rights? In M. Pugh, N. Cooper, & M. Turner (Eds.), Whose peace? Critical perspectives on the political economy of peacebuilding (pp. 287–301). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). Critical agency, resistance and a post-colonial civil society. Cooperation and Conflict, 46(4), 419–440.
- Spurk, C. (2009). Understanding civil society. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society & peacebuilding: A critical assessment (pp. 3–28). Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Suh, B. (2007). Controversies over North Korean human rights in South Korean society. Asian Perspective, 31(2), 23–46.
- Suh, B. (2013). Beyond silence and blaming: Revisiting South Korea's role in North Korean human rights. Asian Perspective, 37(1), 77–97.
- The 1991 Basic Agreement*. (1991, December 13). UN Peacemaker. <https://peacemaker.un.org/korea-reconciliation-nonaggression91>
- The July 4 Joint Communiqué*. (1972, July 4). UN Peacemaker. <https://peacemaker.un.org/korea-4july-communication72>
- The June 15 Joint Declaration*. (2000, June 15). UN Peacemaker. <https://peacemaker.un.org/koreadprk-southnorthdeclaration>
- The Korea NGO Council for Cooperation with North Korea. (2014). Overview of member organisations. The Korea NGO Council for Cooperation with North Korea. http://www.knccck.or.kr/eng/sub_0201.html
- The September 19 Joint Statement*. (2005, September 19). NCNK. https://www.ncnk.org/resources/publications/September_19_2005_Joint_Statement.doc
- Wagle, U. (1999). The civil society sector in the developing world. Public Administration & Management, 4(4), 525–546.
- Weingartner, E. (2003). The Tozanso process: An ecumenical contribution to the struggle for peace and justice in North-East Asia. In WCC Tosökwan Sochang Han'gukkyohoesacharyochip-Chosön'gürisütö-kyoyönmaeng p'yön (pp. 89–108). Seoul: Han'gukkitokkyoyöksayön'guso.

Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject

Marta Fernández and Lucas Guerra Institute of International Relations (IRI), Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro
(PUC-Rio), Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Synonyms

Hybrid peace; Liberal peace; Peace operations; Peacebuilding; Statebuilding

Description

The chapter presents postcolonial readings on peacebuilding operations, considering them reproducers of colonial dynamics and hierarchies in the contemporary international scene. Rather than presenting an unequivocal and fixed definition on “postcolonial subjects” in peacebuilding contexts, the chapter aims to highlight how these subjects are problematically produced and represented in international discourses and practices. Examples of peace operations in Haiti, Mozambique, and Somalia are briefly presented in order to illustrate the Eurocentric, colonial, and racist gazes that often-times inform peacebuilding imaginaries. Moreover, the chapter presents an introductory inquiring on the “local turn” and “hybrid peace” proposals, exploring some of their potentialities and limits. A new set of recommendations to scholars and practitioners working in peacebuilding emerges through the acknowledgment of (post)colonial inflections in peacebuilding processes.

Introduction

Traditionally, peacebuilding scholars and practitioners have deemed “postcolonial subjects” as irrelevant or even as problems to be overcome in order to ensure the effectiveness of statebuilding processes. (For more on the relations between peacebuilding and statebuilding processes, see Bhuta (2008) and also C. Wallis ▶ “Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding” and F. Kühn’s ▶ “Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity” chapters in this volume.) The understanding of these subjects, sometimes as passive and dependent, and sometimes as dangerous and violent, reproduces colonial imaginaries that inform contemporary peacebuilding operations.

Before seeking to know the truth or the essence of “postcolonial subjects” and trying to localize and fix them, we should ask ourselves how these “postcolonial subjects” have been constructed throughout history by Western discourses and practices. How, for example, have these subjects been produced by international peacebuilders in the cases of peace operations in Somalia and Haiti? In which ways might these representations affect the effectiveness of peace operations, as they did, for example, in the case of Mozambique?

By navigating through this set of questions and examples, our intention is not to provide an accurate perspective on who are the “postcolonial subjects” and how should they be effectively “managed” in peacebuilding contexts. Rather, we seek to turn attention to a necessary constant questioning to the power relations that embed peacebuilding scholars and practitioners in their privileges and protagonism. (For more on a postcolonial critique to international “protagonismo” in a peacebuilding context, see Sabaratnam (2017).) A new set of recommendations to peacebuilders emerges through the acknowledgment of these power positions and their implications in peacebuilding operations.

Postcolonial Accounts on Peacebuilding: Eurocentrism and the Production of “Postcolonial Subjects” in Peacebuilding Contexts

Postcolonial perspectives share the idea that the hierarchies of race, gender, class, sex, and others which structure the relationship between colonizers and colonized have persisted beyond the limits of formal colonialism (Darby and Paolini 1994; Quijano 2005). Political independence processes, in societies that had been subjected to colonialism and imperialism, have actually enabled the continuity of a set of discourses and practices whereby the West continues to dominate the spaces and bodies it has once colonized. As argued by Stuart Hall (2019[2000], p. 99), “the ‘postcolonial’ does not signal a simple before/after chronological succession. The movement from colonization to postcolonial times does not imply that the problems of colonialism have been resolved or replaced by some conflict-free era.”

Marta Fernández and Lucas Guerra: Funding by the Coordenação de Aperfeiçoamento de Pessoal de Nível Superior – CAPES – Brazil, Code 001.

In this sense, the reproduction of colonial power relations and hierarchies in contemporary global governance processes, as seen in the development field or in the international peace and security agendas, have been theme of important discussions (see Inayatullah and Blaney 2004). It is generally argued that these practices operate in a logic of “modernization,” promoting Western political, social, and economic governance as universal standards to which non-Western societies must conform (Krishna 2009). Thus, from a post-colonial perspective, peacebuilding operations might be seen as reproducing a “modernization” logic, as they aim to reconstruct so-called “fragile” states through the projection of good governance models, thereby effectively imposing a set of Western liberal norms (Jahn 2007).

Seen from this angle, peacebuilding operations are informed by a preconceived peace model that is shared among the main actors and international institutions involved in peacebuilding processes: the “peacebuilding consensus” (Richmond 2004; see also Rossone ▶ “Liberal Peace in Peace Operations” and Newman’s ▶ “Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order” chapters in this volume). According to this “consensus,” whose roots can be found in the modern political philosophy of the European Enlightenment (see Richmond 2005), a sustainable peace can only be achieved through the implementation of democratic governance institutions, the establishment of the rule of law, and a conducive environment for free market transactions. Considering this bias assumed by peacebuilding operations, post-colonial perspectives tend to conceive them as international interventions aimed to reshaping postcolonial societies in accordance with Western political, social, and economic governance standards (Jabri 2016; Sabaratnam 2017).

It is in this sense that postcolonial lenses read contemporary peacebuilding operations as reverberating echoes of modernization theory and even of the civilizing missions that have shaped formal colonialism. In fact, the resemblance between the “new” UN operations and past colonial enterprises is acknowledged even by scholars who subscribe to the “liberal peace” framework. This is the case, for example, of Roland Paris (2002), who argues that UN peacebuilding operations carry similar operational logics to the mission civilisatrice of the colonial era. From the author’s perspective, even though the language of “civilized” versus “uncivilized/barbaric” peoples has been abandoned, international peacebuilding efforts still operate in the “belief that the European imperial powers had a duty to ‘civilise’ their overseas possession” (Paris 2002, p. 638). Still, a particular governance model – that is, free market-oriented liberal democracy – is deemed as superior to all others. Therefore, peacebuilding operations continue the colonial process of transferring rules of “acceptable” – or “civilized,” as it used to be labeled – behavior to the domestic arena of conflict-affected states in the Global South. It should be noted, however, that Paris does not call into question the liberal-democratic model which, according to him, has been globalized through peacebuilding operations. Instead, his critique is aimed at the ways such model has been transferred to ‘less developed’ countries (see Paris 2004). In his perspective, for a state reconstruction process to be successful, it must focus firstly on building solid institutions and, only afterwards, on fostering democratic political participation and economic liberalization (Paris 2004).

In order to understand how these processes are authorized, one must look at the discursive construction of subject representations (Jabri 2013). In general, peacebuilders are represented as protagonists, as subjects whose agency is foregrounded, while postcolonial subjects in intervened societies are portrayed as passive, reactive, and marginally important to peacebuilding processes, if not as “threats” to these efforts (Chandler 2006; Sabaratnam 2017). As a consequence, postcolonial subjects continue to be entangled in power relations that constitute them as beings who are devoid of reason, intellectual capacity, morality, agency, and, ultimately, humanity. In the ongoing colonial imaginary, non-white and non-Western subjects once colonized by Europeans are still represented as inferior and backward in relation to Western white subjects. Such representation, in turn, provides the conditions of possibility for interventions aimed at converting these subjects to hegemonic international norms (see Jabri 2016; Gruffydd Jones 2015; Sabaratnam 2017).

Similar processes, through which the discursive construction of misrepresented non-Western subjects enable Western domination over them, are the central theme of the postcolonial analysis proposed by Palestinian literary critic Edward Said (1979). In his classic Orientalism, Said (1979) analyzes a set of academic and literary texts which, since the nineteenth century, have contributed to the construction of the “Oriental” subject as an irrational, depraved, and childish “Other,” as opposed to a Western “Self” portrayed as a rational, virtuous, mature, modern, and normal subject. “Orientalism,” in Said’s words (1979, p. 41), is “knowledge of the Orient that places things Oriental in class, court, prison, or manual for scrutiny, study, judgment, discipline, or governing.” However, such knowledge of the “Orient” does not stem from a direct access to facts about a region, but rather from an exercise of power whereby the “West” itself is shaped and builds its own authority over its “Other” (Said 1979).

This binary construction of antagonistic and essentialized identities, opposing the West/colonizer/developed to the “Rest”/colonized/underdeveloped, has privileged, since colonial times, the former as agents of civilization, progress, and modernization over the latter. From a postcolonial perspective, peacebuilding operations participate in this civilizing process and, in this sense, reproduce the hierarchical construction of subjectivities of the imperial past (Jabri 2010; Sabaratnam 2011). Thus, UN peacebuilding operations are informed by a hierarchical conception of subjectivity, which places the European/Western liberal “Self” in a position of agency and ability to protect while constructing the mostly non-Western protected ones as devoid of agency. In this vain, notions such as “failed states,” “good governance,” and “responsibility to protect” emerge, informing international peacebuilding with representations that legitimize interventionism through racist imperial hierarchical categorizations similar to the ones which guided colonialism (Gruffydd Jones 2015; Hill 2005; Jabri 2010). As Jonathan Hill (2005) notes, the “failure” of the “failed states” is measured in relation to the allegedly “success” of the modern European statehood model, deemed as a universal framework to be reproduced (or rather, imposed) worldwide.

Noting these strands of power relations reproduced in peacebuilding interventions, Meera Sabaratnam (2017) argues that they operate in the logic of the structural relations of “colonial difference.” Departing from “decolonial thinking” (see Quijano 2005; Mignolo 2011) perspectives, the author argues that contemporary interventionist processes – including peacebuilding operations – are inscribed in a global “colonial matrix of power.” (The “colonial matrix of power” is the concept used by decolonial thinkers to metaphorically highlight a new global pattern of power relations inaugurated with the colonial encounter (and subsequent invasion) between Europeans and Amerindians in 1492. Its main characteristics are the hierarchical classification of humanity through racial categories, the establishment of a narrative of European superiority and exceptionalism, and the onset of a modern capitalist interstate system. “Coloniality,” then, is the reproduction of this colonial matrix of power’ logics even after the end of formal colonialism (see Mignolo 2011).) One of the structuring characteristics of this “matrix” is the hierarchical classification of humanity, whereby Europe is positioned as the geocultural center of the “West” and of “modernity” while the non-European world is relegated to a marginal position of inferiority. Thus, from the outset of “modernity” – and its inevitable counterpart, “coloniality” – Eurocentrism has become the dominant lens for understanding and acting in the world. According to Sabaratnam (2017), since then, Eurocentrism has shaped predominant understandings on what and where politics is, on who produces legitimate knowledge about it, and on what types of responses are conceivable in that regard.

Morgan Brigg (2010) starts from a similar perception. In his critique of the “peacebuilding consensus,” the author argues that such practices are informed by a Eurocentric perspective according to which the main questions about political community and order are already resolved in favor of globalized liberalism. In Brigg’s words (2010, p. 339): “[t]o the extent that it does not critically reflect upon the cultural entailments of its heavily European heritage, peace and conflict studies implicitly privileges modern Europe as the moral, scientific, and political capital of the world, and risks serving as an agent of the liberal peace.” The fact that peacebuilding operations assume the centralized state model combined with liberal democratic ideals as a necessary and unquestionable goal limits our understanding of the possible (see Walker 1993) or our ability to imagine alternative and viable forms of political, social, and economic organization.

Along similar lines, Vivienne Jabri (2016, pp. 154–155) makes the important observation that: “when peacebuilders land in a zone of conflict, they do not emerge from a social vacuum, nor are their actions informed by the problems they confront afresh on the ground. Peacebuilders might be seen as the embodiment of global governance structures, the discourses and practices of which are mobilized towards the shaping of the future.” This observation indicates that peacebuilding practitioners often carry – consciously or not – Eurocentric understandings of what “peace” is and of how a political community should ideally function, in conformity with the Western liberal standards of statehood (Brigg 2010; Jabri 2016; Sabaratnam 2017).

Another expression of Eurocentrism in peacebuilding processes is found in the roles and associated expectations that are attributed to practitioners and local populations. Usually, expectations converge around a dichotomy: on one side is the “international” – composed of peacebuilding practitioners and experts and often equated with the “West” – which would hold the authority and legitimacy to dictate peacebuilding models and “roadmaps.” On the opposite side, there is the “local,” to which one attributes the expectation of compliance with these models or, at worst, the assumption that its actors will spoil their implementation (Hirblinger and Simons 2015; Jabri 2013).

In fact, as Oliver Richmond (2010) shows us, approaches to peacebuilding tend to assume that international agency is positive while local agencies are problematic. According to the author, “the space of the local, the everyday, and its attendant actors are often seen as sites of violence, poverty, illiberalism, and resistance [. . .] rather than varied and dynamic sites of politics in their own right from which institutions may emerge” (Richmond 2010, p. 683). This derogatory reading of difference conditions us to focus on the allegedly traditional and violent nature of postcolonial societies, seen as mere obstacles to UN’s efforts to rebuild and modernize their states. Such reading, in turn, prevents targeted societies from being included as active co-participants in these reconstruction processes.

The materialization of the dynamics abovementioned might be seen, for example, in Meera Sabaratnam analysis of contemporary international interventions in Mozambique. In her account, the relations between interveners and the “target society” reproduce a series of Eurocentric and colonial logics. Firstly, Sabaratnam (2017) notes a desire for protagonism on the part of the interveners – a sort of “ego” of intervention – which results in the centralization of activities by peacebuilders, with little integration of local communities. Relatedly, there is a sense of disposability of target states and societies, as if the time, activities, and material resources invested by them were irrelevant and undesirable. The third element perceived by the author is what she calls a politics of entitlement: a kind of appropriation by interveners over the spaces where they operate, producing relationships of privilege and reward (as seen, for instance, in the high salaries paid to international employees, with significant impacts on local markets). Finally, Sabaratnam points to the dependence that is often generated by large resource flows of international aid, rendering target states more permissive to donors' demands. Taken together, these elements undermine the effects generally promised by interventions: the establishment of strong state institutions, capacity-building, and local development (Sabaratnam 2017).

The same Eurocentric/colonial elements are identified by Haitian sociologist Franck Seguy regarding another peacebuilding operation: the United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH). According to the author, the peacebuilding interventions in Haiti have been so pervasive that, at a certain point, even Haitian public authorities were banned from entering certain territories, which had been ceded to transnational private enterprises as part of the "development" program proposed by the IMF and the World Bank within MINUSTAH's framework (Seguy 2014). The author also denounces the almost complete absence of Haitian entities in the meetings where MINUSTAH's reconstruction strategies were discussed. In fact, most of these meetings took place outside the country and, when on Haitian land, occurred in buildings with restricted access, being generally conducted in English, a language that is inaccessible to the majority of Haitian population (Seguy 2015). Moreover, Seguy (2015) highlights the dissonance between the luxury buildings occupied by peacebuilding organizations and the misery and precariousness experienced by most people in the country. The author also criticizes the fact that these organizations pay "blue-eyed foreign boys" salaries that are up to three times higher than those paid to Haitian officials for similar activities. The presence of thousands of high-wage international employees has led to rising prices in the housing market as well as for basic goods and services, further hindering the Haitian population's access to housing and food (Seguy 2015).

Actually, the reproduction of Eurocentric/colonial gazes on Haiti was already present before the deployment of MINUSTAH, in media editorials portraying racist and paternalistic narratives on the "childishness" and "incivility" of the Haitian society (Pressley-Sanon 2014). The mistreatment and misrepresentation of the "postcolonial subjects" in Haiti were also evident in the early military activities of MINUSTAH, in the slums of Bel Air and Cité Soleil. In these episodes, Haitian armed dissident groups were targeted as criminals and chased as such, before serious attempts of negotiation or integration to the peace process (Lemay-Hébert 2014; Pressley-Sanon 2014). Several rebel leaders were summarily executed, civilian casualties were reported, and the accusations of human rights violation in the Mission reached the OAS' Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (Lemay-Hébert 2014; Seitenfus 2016). In our perspective, this is exemplary of the inability of peacebuilders to recognize postcolonial subjects (or "target societies") as actual political subjects, instead ignoring or criminalizing their actions, as Jabri (2010) and Sabaratnam (2017) had already pointed out.

Mullings et al. (2010) also point to another racist/colonial trace expressed by MINUSTAH, this time in the context of the earthquake that destroyed the Haitian capital in 2010, while the Mission was fully active in the country. According to the authors, immediately after the earthquake, news and memos portraying the country's population as "dangerous," "irrational," and "violent" circulated among international organizations and agencies operating in Haiti, spreading an atmosphere of fear which in turn contributed to the late arrival of humanitarian aid in the outermost regions of the city. In addition, the authors argue that the priority of MINUSTAH's troops and US reinforcements arriving in the country at that moment was to contain the population within the country's borders so as to prevent refugee flows, rather than the provision of humanitarian aid. Considering these elements, Franck Seguy (2014) calls MINUSTAH an attempt to "recolonize Haiti," arguing that "racism lies in the onto-epistemological genesis of Haitian policies" (Seguy 2014, pp. 523–524). Pressley-Sanon (2014) and Mullings et al. (2010) also converge in pointing out the racist and colonial features found in MINUSTAH's operation in the country (see also Guerra 2019).

A similar perspective on the “recolonization” traces of UN peace operations had already been voiced in the 1990s, during the UNOSOM II (United Nations Operation in Somalia II). In that occasion, the Mogadishu Radio accused the UN and the United States of America of trying to establish a tutelage regime over Somalia. The charge was not without foundation. In an Editorial dating from July 23 of 1992, The New York Times claimed: “[i]f the only alternative to anarchy is a UN trusteeship then the Security Council needs to ponder the case.” Such a declaration resonated colonial and racist imaginaries that pervaded Western leadership discourses at the time, representing Somalia as a land of “lacks” (Fernández y García 2017). The then UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali, for example, claimed that:

Somalia is today a country without central, regional or local administration, and without services: no electricity, no communications, no transport, no schools and no health services. Throughout the country, there are incredible scenes of hunger, disease and dying children. (...) The absence of food is both the cause and the result of lack of security. (S/24343, para. 24 in Boutros-Ghali 1996, p. 174)

Similarly, the American Ambassador in Kenya, Smith Hempstone, alerted the United States not to send troops to Somalia, seeking to prevent the death of American soldiers in the hands of “natural-born guerrillas” (Hempstone 1992, p. 30). By localizing the causes of the Somali conflict in the allegedly deviant nature of the country’s native inhabitants, Hempstone reproduced the racist tone of the nineteenth-century Italian colonial discourses on Somalia (Fernández y García 2017). In the words of the Ambassador: “The Somali is treacherous. The Somali is a killer. The Somali is as tough as his country, and just as unforgiving. [...] In the old days, the Somalis raided for camels, women and slaves. Today they raid for camels, women, slaves and food” (Hempstone 1992, p. 30).

Such perceptions are in line with Sabaratnam’s (2017) analysis of contemporary interventions as manifestations of the “colonial matrix of power” that assumes Eurocentrism as a superior reference. The non-white, non-Western, and non-European subjects are relegated to positions of inferiority, whether as postcolonial subjects who are devoid of political subjectivity or as “abominations” and “threats” to Eurocentric “normality.”

Inquiring the “Local Turn” and Hybridization Processes in Peacebuilding: Postcolonial Contributions and Critiques

The aforementioned problematic marginalization of local actors (or “postcolonial subjects”) in peace operations under the “peacebuilding consensus” has already been critically scrutinized on different theoretical perspectives and case studies (Richmond 2010). Responsively, a new sensitivity on peacebuilding gradually emerged among scholars and practitioners, pushing for further attention to the need of including “target societies” as protagonists in peace processes. As a result, the political-institutional model embedded in peacebuilding operations has been subjected to critical evaluation, losing its unchallenged position of universal norm in relation to which all other forms of political, social, or economic organization are judged, punished, and/or adjusted (Richmond 2010). Consequently, the understanding of peacebuilding as a one-way process has also been challenged (Charbonneau 2009). More attention has been directed to the ways in which postcolonial subjects and international peacebuilders negotiate, resist, coopt, and transform peacebuilding contexts (see Jabri 2013; Mac Ginty 2010; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Richmond 2010).

Along these lines, terms like “local turn” and “hybrid peace” (see Boege’s chapter in this volume ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”) gain prominence in contemporary peacebuilding debates (see Mac Ginty 2010; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Richmond 2010). The central argument of this approach is that peacebuilding processes are not merely the imposition of “liberal peace” by external actors, but rather a relational dynamic involving agendas, understandings, and practices of international peacebuilders and of local community organizations at various levels (Jabri 2013). In a sense, “postcolonial subjects” in peacebuilding contexts get to be recognized as politically relevant, both in their interactions with peacebuilders and in their everyday practices (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). Fundamentally, it is understood that this new sensitivity tends to breed processes of peace “hybridization,” resulting in models that are neither entirely “traditional” nor entirely “liberal” but which emerge instead from the particularities of each context and society (Mac Ginty and Sanghera 2012).

In this regard, the contributions of postcolonial thinking also provide some interesting insights for reflection. In fact, discussions on “hybridism” have long been a central concern in postcolonial debates (see Bhabha 1997; Costa 2006). The contributions of Homi Bhabha (1997) are fundamental in these debates. Bhabha argues that the “conversion” of postcolonial subjects is continuously derailed by the fact that these subjects are not a “tabula rasa,” but rather a previously occupied terrain. Thus, any attempt at domination or colonization would always carry within it the possibility of subverting the original (Krishna 2009; Bhabha 1997). In Bhabha’s work, subversion is related to the sliding of the meaning of signs, and creative action is one that subverts, redefines the sign, from a locus of enunciation which is itself dislocated from closed representation systems. It is not an intervention informed by another existing system of representation, but rather one that emerges from the boundary, from a locus that is somehow outside totalizing systems of signification, and which is therefore able to introduce unease and to reveal the fragmentary and ambivalent character of any representation system (Costa 2006). With the concept of “hybridism,” then, the postcolonial critique aims to highlight the contingencies, heterogeneities, and complexities of postcolonial societies and subjects. No hegemonic project can succeed since, according to Bhabha (1997), such an enterprise is continuously fractured and subverted by its recipients.

Recognition of the hybrid character of postcolonial societies and subjects allows us to destabilize the dominant discourse in the realm of peacebuilding operations, which continues to reproduce colonial binaries and essentialisms and to identify the “Other” as “violent,” “backward,” “primitive,” and “failed” (see Richmond 2010). As highlighted by Kenneth Menkhaus (2006), the case of Somaliland is exemplary in this regard. For the author, Somaliland, a former British colony located in northwestern Somalia, reminds us that external statebuilding efforts may not be a necessary condition for the reconstruction of successful governance mechanisms, as international organizations tend to assume. In Somaliland, the main statebuilding agents were not external; instead, as noted by Tobias Hagmann and Markus Hoehne (2007, p. 23): “This statebuilding process occurred through cooperation between traditional authorities such as elders and sheikhs, politicians, former guerrillas, intellectuals and ordinary people who decided to put their guns aside and solve problems peacefully, and with only marginal external support from international organisations.”

According to Boege et al. (2009), Somaliland is an example of an emerging state grounded in a hybrid political order with significant social legitimacy, in which elders play a crucial role in governance. Michael Walls (2009) agrees that many of the processes found across Somaliland are based on traditional conflict resolution institutions, hybridized throughout history. He also claims that such institutions should neither be dismissed because of their innate conservatism, emphasized by mainstream discourses, nor should they be romanticized. To overcome this limitation in dominant discourse, Boege et al. (2010) propose a reconceptualization of so-called failed states as “hybrid political orders.” For them, such a move:

allows for a more neutral and nuanced understanding of the complex domains of power and authority in these societies, by widening the frame of reference from the functions and capacities of state institutions to also include the operation of customary and other non-state institutions in providing sources of social peace, justice, political representation, and participation. (Boege et al. 2010, p. 101)

Despite the optimism often present in the approaches to these “local turn” and “peace

hybridization” initiatives, it should be noted that these processes are not free from limitations and criticism (Sabaratnam 2013). A first important element in this regard is the fact that there is no consensus on what or who should count as “local” in peacebuilding processes (McCandless et al. 2015). Thus, often the “local” ends up being defined by interveners, according to their own agendas and understandings of what an ideal peacebuilding process is and who should be included in it (Chandler 2013; Hirblinger and Simons 2015). Analyzing the cases of the United Nations Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS) and the United Nations Operation in Burundi (ONUB), Hirblinger and Simons (2015) identify an instrumentalization of local actors according to political interests of intervening forces.

A second important element concerns the risks of romanticization and essentialization of the “local” where peace hybridization processes can take place. If, on the one hand, a postcolonial critique denounces the propensity of the peacebuilding literature to associate the “local” with “tradition” and, consequently, with “backwardness,” “disorder,” and “violence,” it is also aware of the opposite risk of romanticizing and praising the “local” (Lidén 2009; Kaplan 2009; Richmond 2010; Mac Ginty 2010). Thus, as highlighted by Thania Paffenholz (2015), there is often a tendency to construct the “local” as an idyllic, supposedly more legitimate and authentic dimension, the locus of a “greater truth” on how peace processes should be conducted. As a result, one can lose sight of power relations and oppressions reproduced at the level of local communities.

Another strand of critiques to the “local turn” and “peace hybridization” calls into question the very binary opposition between the “global” and the “local.” In this perspective, the notion of “local turn” tends to reproduce a conception of the “international” as a monolithic entity, generally conceived as the domain of the “Global North” or “West,” a dynamic locus of agency in the design and implementation of peace processes (Nadarajah and Rampton 2015). The “local,” in turn, continues to be frequently reproduced as an atomized locus, fixed and taken for granted, to which a depoliticized, passive, and strictly reactive role is attributed in relation to international agendas and practices (Jabri 2013; Nadarajah and Rampton 2015).

This kind of binary representation, often reproduced in approaches to a “hybrid peace,” echoes some problematic features noted by Arjun Appadurai (1988) in discourses opposing “natives” and “Westerners.” In these discourses, the “natives” are represented as authentic, pure, and fixed identities, while the “modern” Western societies are set apart from this possibility of authenticity, for their alleged complexity, dynamism, and diversity. In this sense, the “natives,” according to Appadurai (1988, p. 37): “are not only people who are from certain places, and belong to those places, but they are also those who are somehow incarcerated, or confined, in those places.” In contrast to these contained, incarcerated, and culturally isolated beings are the free-flowing Westerners. Taking up, over history, the roles of explorers, missionaries, anthropologists, administrators, and today, we might add, peacebuilding agents, Westerners have represented themselves as “the movers, the seers, the knowers,” in contrast to the natives immobilized by belonging to a “place” (Appadurai 1988, p. 37).

Having these problematic dichotomies in mind, there are approaches that defy the usual association between the “global” and domination, on one hand, and between the “local” and resistance, on the other, assuming a perspective which takes the “global” to reside within the framework of the “local,” as proposed by Phillip Darby (2004). In such a framework, there is the acknowledgment of the colonial involvement in the reconfiguration of local identities. The same might be said regarding the compliance of international peacebuilding agents in recent outbreaks of violence in postcolonial societies (see Lemay-Hébert 2014). In a similar logic, we may conceive that the “local” can also affect, negotiate, and modify “global” agendas and policies, constituting what Jabri (2013) calls the “postcolonial international.”

Finally, another critical strand of the “local turn” concerns the invisibility and silencing of historical and structural power relations. In this sense, critique is directed to the absence of historical accounts on colonialism, imperialism, and neocolonialism in analyses and prescription under the label of the “local turn” (De Heredia 2018; Sabaratnam 2017). Similarly, power hierarchies and relations that are fundamental to the structuring of the “modern international” – such as racism, capitalism, and patriarchy – are often invisible in approaches to the “local turn” (Chandler 2013; De Heredia 2018; Nadarajah and Rampton 2015). As a consequence, despite labeling themselves as critical, these approaches still reproduce and rely on Eurocentric, state-centric, (neo)liberal worldviews, subjectivities, and political responses (De Heredia 2018; Jabri 2010; Sabaratnam 2013).

Final Remarks

As seen in the set of perspectives, debates, and problems presented throughout this chapter, we consider that the issue of an ethical-political engagement with “postcolonial subjects” is central to theoretical and practical debates on peacebuilding. In this sense, we follow Meera Sabaratnam (2017) as she argues that a serious consideration of the various local actors in peacebuilding contexts as relevant political subjects can lead to deep structural changes in the ways these peace processes are (or are not) conceived and executed. However, we also agree with the author as she claims that, prior to these larger structural changes, small steps can be taken by scholars and practitioners in order to avoid colonial biases in their approaches to peacebuilding.

An essential step consists in the construction of bottom-up approaches, which take the experiences and standpoints of target societies regarding peacebuilding processes as their starting point (Sabaratnam 2017). This might involve peacebuilding hybridization processes which place target societies as protagonists in the formulation and implementation of peacebuilding policies, instead of merely including certain “local” segments in ways that fit interveners’ agendas.

Another step requires interveners and peacebuilders to be aware that the activities they perform are fundamentally political, rather than strictly “technical.” In this regard, practitioners should be more sensitive to the history of colonial interventions in societies in which they operate and to the ways their own actions can be interpreted in relation to these contexts. This means “racializing the international,” understanding it as an environment where colonial power relations are reproduced. Beyond efforts to amplify the voices of postcolonial subjects in peace operations (a step that is surely fundamental), an effective decolonization of peacebuilding processes requires this revisionism and self-criticism by peacebuilders themselves, as they usually possess the knowledge that is considered legitimate and the resources needed to turn this knowledge into political practices.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Islam and Peace
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions
- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

References

- Appadurai, A. (1988). Putting hierarchy in its place. Cultural Anthropology, 3(1), 36–49. Recuperado de <https://www.jstor.org/stable/656307>
- Bhabha, H. K. (1997). O Local da Cultura. Belo Horizonte: Editora UFMG.
- Bhuta, N. (2008). Against state-building. Constellations, 15(4), 517–542.
- Boege, V., Brown, A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2009). On hybrid political orders and emerging states: What is failing – States in the Global South or research and politics in the West? In M. Fischer & B. Schmelzle (Eds.), Berghof handbook for conflict transformation (Dialogue series, Vol. 8, p. 23). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.

- Boege, V., Brown, M. A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2010). Challenging statebuilding as peacebuilding: Working with hybrid political orders to build peace. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 99–115). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1996). The United Nations and Somalia: 1992–1996. New York: Department of Public Information, United Nations.
- Brigg, M. (2010). Capítulo 17, Culture: Challenges and possibilities. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 329–346). Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Chandler, D. C. (2006). Empire in denial: The politics of state-building. London: Pluto.
- Chandler, D. (2013). Peacebuilding and the politics of non-linearity: Rethinking ‘hidden’ agency and ‘resistance’. Peacebuilding, 1(1), 17–32. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756256>.
- Charbonneau, B. (2009, fevereiro). The colonial legacy of peace(building): France, Europe, Africa. Apresentado em Paper at the ISA’s 50th Annual Convention exploring the past, anticipating the future, New York. <https://www.prio.org/Publications/Publication/?x=4113>
- Costa, S. (2006). Desprovincializando a sociologia: A contribuição pós-colonial. Revista Brasileira de Ciências Sociais, 21(60), 117–134. <https://doi.org/10.1590/S0102-69092006000100007>.
- Darby, P. (2004). Pursuing the political: A postcolonial rethinking of relations international. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 33(1), 1–34.
- Darby, P., & Paolini, A. J. (1994). Bridging international relations and postcolonialism. Alternatives: Global, Local, Political, 19(3), 371–397.
- De Heredia, M. (2018). The conspicuous absence of class and privilege in the study of resistance in peacebuilding contexts. International Peacekeeping, 25(3), 325–348. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2018.1449650>.
- Editorial Desk. (1992, July 23). The hell called Somalia. The New York Times.
- Fernández y Garcia, M. (2017). Rethinking peacebuilding practices through the Somaliland experience. Review of African Political Economy, 44, 1–19.
- Gruffydd Jones, B. (2015). ‘Good governance’ and ‘state failure’: The pseudo-science of statemen in our times. In A. Anievas, N. Manchanda, & R. Shilliam (Eds.), Race and racism in international relations: Confronting the global colour line (pp. 62–80). New York: Routledge.
- Guerra, L. (2019). The “coloniality of peace”: Searching for (decolonizing) methods in the study of peace processes – The case of MINUSTAH. Working paper prepared for the Workshop Studying Humanitarian Interventions, USP, São Paulo. https://www.academia.edu/41444473/The_Coloniality_of_Peace_searching_for_decolonizing_methods_in_the_study_of_peace_processes_the_case_of_MINUSTAH.
- Hagmann, T., & Hoehne, M. V. (2007). Failed state or failed debate? Multiple Somali political orders within and beyond the nation-state. Politörbis. Zeitschrift zur Aussenpolitik, 42. <http://www.nccr-north-south.unibe.ch/Pages/Publication/659/Failed-state-or-failed-debate?-Multiple-Somali-political-orders-within-and-beyond-the-nation-state>
- Hall, S. (2019). The multicultural question [2000]. In D. Morley (Ed.), Essential essays/Stuart Hall. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Hempstone, S. (1992). Thinking three times before you embrace the Somali Tarbaby: An ambassador’s warning (Excerpts from U.S. Ambassador to Kenya). U.S. News & World Report.
- Hill, J. (2005). Beyond the other? A postcolonial critique of the failed state thesis. African Identities, 3(2), 139–154.
- Hirblinger, A., & Simons, C. (2015). The good, the bad, and the powerful: Representations of the ‘local’ in peacebuilding. Security Dialogue, 46(5), 1–18.
- Inayatullah, N., & Blaney, D. (2004). International relations and the problem of difference. New York: Routledge.
- Jabri, V. (2010). Capítulo 4, War, government, politics: A critical response to the hegemony of the liberal peace. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 41–58). Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jabri, V. (2013). Peacebuilding, the local and the international: A colonial or a postcolonial rationality? Peacebuilding, 1(1), 3–16. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756253>.
- Jabri, V. (2016). Post-colonialism: A post-colonial perspective on peacebuilding. In O. Richmond, S. Pogodda, & J. Ramovic (Eds.), The Palgrave handbook of disciplinary and regional approaches to peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jahn, B. (2007). The tragedy of liberal diplomacy: Democratization, intervention, statebuilding (Part II). Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 1(2), 211–229.
- Kaplan, S. (2009). Rethinking state building: Fixing fragile states. The Broker, 16(12).
- Krishna, S. (2009). Globalization and postcolonialism: Hegemony and resistance in the twenty-first century. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Lemay-Hébert, N. (2014). Resistance in the time of cholera: The limits of stabilization through securitization in Haiti. International Peacekeeping, 21(2), 198–213.
- Lidén, K. (2009). Peace, self-governance and international engagement: A postcolonial ethic of liberal peacebuilding. Working paper prepared for the ISA Convention, New York. <https://www.prio.org/Publications/Publication/?x=4113>
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Capítulo 18, Gilding the lily? International support for indigenous and traditional peacebuilding. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 347–366). Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Sanghera, G. (2012). Hybridity in peacebuilding and development: An introduction. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(2), 3–8. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2012.742800>.
- Mccandless, E., Abitbol, E., & Donais, T. (2015). Vertical integration: A dynamic practice promoting transformative peacebuilding. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 10(1), 1–9. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2015.1014268>.
- Menkhaus, K. (2006). Governance without government in Somalia spoilers, state building, and the politics of coping. International Security, 31(3), 74–106.
- Mignolo, W. (2011). The darker side of western modernity: Global futures, decolonial options. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Mullings, B., Werner, M., & Peake, L. (2010). Fear and loathing in Haiti: Race and politics of humanitarian dispossession. ACME: An International Journal for a Critical Geographies, 9(3), 282–300.
- Nadarajah, S., & Rampton, D. (2015). The limits of hybridity and the crisis of liberal peace. Review of International Studies, 41(1), 49–72. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0260210514000060>.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029908>.
- Paris, R. (2002). International peacebuilding and the “mission civilisatrice”. Review of International Studies, 28, 637–656.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Nova York: Cambridge University Press.
- Pressley-Sanon, T. (2014). Haitian (pre)occupations: Ideological and discursive repetitions: 1915–1934 and 2004 to present. Caribbean Studies, 42(2), 115–153.
- Quijano, A. (2005). Colonialidade do poder, eurocentrismo e América Latina. In E. Lander (Org.), A colonialidade do saber: Eurocentrismo e ciências sociais. Perspectivas latino-americanas (pp. 117–142). Buenos Aires: CLACSO.
- Richmond, O. P. (2004). The globalization of responses to conflict and the peacebuilding consensus. Cooperation and Conflict, 39(2), 129–150. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836704042865>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Richmond, O. (2010). Resistance and the post-liberal peace. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 38(3), 665–692.
- Sabaratnam, M. (2011). IR in dialogue... but can we change the subjects? A typology of decolonising strategies for the study of world politics. Millennium, 39(3), 781–803.
- Sabaratnam, M. (2013). Avatars of Eurocentrism in the critique of the liberal peace. Security Dialogue, 44(3), 259–278. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010613485870>.
- Sabaratnam, M. (2017). Decolonizing intervention: International statebuilding in Mozambique. London: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Said, E. (1979). Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.
- Seguy, F. (2014). A catástrofe de janeiro de 2010, a “Internacional Comunitária” e a reconstrução do Haiti. Tese (doutorado) – Universidade Estadual de Campinas, Instituto de Filosofia e Ciências Humanas, UNICAMP. Recuperado de <http://diversitas.fflch.usp.br/sites/diversitas.fflch.usp.br/files/tese-franck%20seguy.pdf>
- Seguy, F. (2015). Racismo e Desumanização no Haiti. Educere et Educare: Revista de Educação, 10, 16.
- Seitenfus, R. (2016). Reconstruir Haiti: entre la esperanza y el tridente imperial. Santo Domingo: Ediciones Fundación Juan Bosch.
- Walker, R. B. J. (1993). Inside/outside: International relations as political theory. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Walls, M. (2009). The emergence of a Somali state: Building peace from civil war in Somaliland. African Affairs, 108(432), 371–389. Recuperado de <http://library.africa-union.org/emergence-somali-state-build-in-peace-civil-war-somaliland-4>

Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation

Annika Björkdahl¹ and Stefanie Kappler²

¹Department of Political Science,
Lund University, Lund, Sweden

²Durham University, Durham, UK

Introduction

Where does peace take place? Almost all processes including war-making and peace-making take place in a specific local setting (Koopman 2011; Megoran 2011; Björkdahl and Kappler 2017; Björkdahl and Buckley-Zistel 2016). Post-conflict power relations in cities such as Sarajevo or Nicosia can be understood through “landscapes of power,” in which a variety of actors and stakeholders (re-)negotiate social relations. What is more, as material and emblematic assets, divided cities like Mostar or Belfast represent places in which identities are manifested, visualized, and compete spatially. An airbase such as the one in Dayton, Ohio, can be a place for peace negotiations, thus giving its name to a peace accord. Conflicts manifest themselves in places, as does peace. Yet, while divisions are often clearly legible in space, the legacies of the conflict often obscure the visible and tangible materializations of peace. Contemporary peacebuilding missions profess to bring about “peace”, but what exactly constitutes peace is seldom apparent to the people on the ground and at times only results in partial changes in urban and rural landscapes of power.

This section examines the interconnectedness between peace and space and place in order to understand where peace “takes place.” It suggests space and place to be vehicles through which peace and agency can be explored in the aftermath of violent conflict. The aim is to provide new insights into the transformation from war into peace by grounding the analysis of peace and peacebuilding agency in time and space. To do so, as we propose in previous research (Björkdahl and Kappler 2017), we explore the extent to which spatial transformation has taken place in a post-conflict setting as a marker of peacebuilding agency.

As there has been no sustained inquiry into the relationship of peace with space and place, spatial perspectives have received scant attention in the study of the contentious politics of peace. Spatial theory provides analytical concepts which have not yet been fully exploited in analyzing peacebuilding and conflict dynamics. Yet, the organization of space is significant for the structures and functions of peace and war. Thus, this section investigates peace as it is manifested in spatial practices, that is, in material and symbolic representation. The spatialization of peace and conflict studies is advanced through the following questions:

- Where do peace and conflict take place?
- How can we understand peace and violent conflict in spatial terms?
- How can “warscapes” become “peacescapes,” i.e., how are spaces and places tainted by conflict transformed to represent and manifest peace?
- How can peacebuilding agents be captured through a spatial analysis?

Definitions

Space and place are useful concepts to theorize peacebuilding agency. Space and place serve as vehicles through which peace and conflict can be explored. Following this, the transformation of space and place through processes of “place-making” and “space-making” practices can be understood through a focus on spatial agency. In this, we understand “place” as a material, physically manifested location, whereas “space” denotes its symbolic, ideational counterpart (cf. Björkdahl and Kappler 2017). While the material and symbolic dimensions are inextricably linked, we suggest that the analytical distinction between “place” and “space” helps us understand the frictions between the ways in which places are built, as opposed to understood and used, and thus the role that human agency plays in translating one into the other (Table 1).

Spatial Agency in Peacebuilding

Agency can be expressed in various ways and is situated in diverse enabling or disabling spaces and places (cf. Giddens 1984; Gregory 1981: 16). Agency may be exercised for driving change, but also to uphold status quo, and thus reproduce continuity. The notion of spatial agency is careful not to foreclose the constantly changing and multilayered expressions of agency. To explain social and material transformation, then, is to understand the interplay between space and place through the agency of those working in them. Agency can thus be seen as situated in the tension between place and space, and such spatial agency can be found in the capacity to transform place into space (through the (re-)creation of its meanings and possibilities) on the one hand and in the capacity to transform space into place (by rendering ideas into material reality) on the other hand. Such processes of transformation reflect the extent to which power relations, and thus conflicts and peace(s), are located in spatial practice. By situating peacebuilding agency in spatial practice, we point to the fluidities of agency in its ability to move between practices of peacebuilding and Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation, Table 1 Key terms and definitions

| Key term | Definition | Empirical examples |
|---|---|--|
| Place | Geographical location Has “material” properties, i.e., physicality Expresses a sense of belonging and is seen to provide a locus of identity Is the locus of complex intersections and outcomes of power geometries that operate across spatial scales, from the body to the globe | The Old Bridge in Mostar, Bosnia-Herzegovina The “ghost town” of Varosha, Cyprus The peace walls of Belfast, UK The Youth Cultural Centre Abrašević , Mostar, Bosnia-Herzegovina The “Sarajevo Roses”; in Bosnia-Herzegovina Robben Island, South Africa Mother Teresa Boulevard, Kosovo/a The buffer zone in Cyprus The District Six Museum in Cape Town, South Africa |
| Space | Is the ideational extension of physical presence, i.e., place Is the realm which extends to meanings and interpretations of place The product of interrelations and constituted through interactions A platform on which social relations can form and develop | Peace Reconciliation Bi-communalism Anti-apartheid Inter-ethnic collaboration Conflict transformation Conflict prevention Memory |
| Spatial agency | Is situated at the intersection between place- and space-making Refers to the capacity to transform place into space (through the (re-)creation of its meanings and possibilities) Refers to the capacity to transform of space into place (by rendering ideas into material reality) | International and regional organizations restructuring urban landscapes of peace and conflict State elites restricting access to zones of protest NGOs rebranding places of conflict for communal use Community-based organizations engaging in urban protest Artists redesigning public spaces |
| Space-making – turning place into space | The process of making a physical place relevant and meaningful to societal and political discourses The enactment, use, and interpretation of a place by turning it into a space that is meaningful to its users and audiences | The Occupy Buffer Zone Movement in Cyprus, which aimed to overcome the existence of a buffer-zone dividing the North and the South of Nicosia and the Island of Cyprus The redrawing of the peace walls in Belfast to change the symbolic boundary lines into zones of contact and cooperation |
| Place-making – turning space into place | Refers to the processes of geographically anchoring an abstract idea in a material location Locating an abstract idea such as peace in a material place | The idea of reconciliation between Bosnian Croats and Bosniaks translated into a physical place by rebuilding the Old Bridge in Mostar Giving the idea of a Kosovo/a state physical presence at the Boulevard of Mother Teresa in Pristina through the erection of monuments Finding a mnemonic anchor for the Good Friday/Belfast Agreement at the Maze/Long Kesh Prison, Northern Ireland |

Table adapted from Björkdahl and Kappler (2017)

conflict-inducing dynamics. Places are never pre-determined as either conflictive or conciliatory, but always have the potential to host practices related to peace and conflict, even at the same time. In that sense, bridges can act as dividing spaces as much as walls can bring people together.

The bridge across the river Ibar in Mitrovica, Kosovo/a, for instance, has long served as a border in the divided town, whereas the militarized buffer zone in Nicosia, Cyprus, is increasingly seeing the presence of NGOs engaged in peace work. A spatial analysis of peacebuilding scenarios thus points to the continuous ambiguity of agency in its ability to activate a variety of discourses and practices. Thus, the ability to transform space into place and vice versa is a clear marker of agency, particularly against the background that “space” does not necessarily equal “place.” However, the agency deployed “in-between” determines what kind of place is produced from imaginary spatial ideas, or, alternatively, what kinds of imaginary spaces emerge from a physical construction of a place. Such processes are always dependent on the kinds of agency that surround the contested landscapes of (post-)conflict zones and reflect the different interests at stake in negotiating the economic and sociopolitical structures of power at play.

Place-Making

Place, as a material phenomenon, expresses a sense of belonging and is seen to provide a locus of identity. Thus, it defines who is “in place” and who is “out of place” (Creswell 1996, 2004). Contemporary politics of peace are “held in place” by sites. Place may stabilize and give durability to social structures such as peace and rearrange post-conflict power relations. In a sense, place can sustain both imagined peace(s) and the materialized everyday peace by routinized daily practices, and by embodying the meanings ascribed to them. Place is thus where peace and conflict affect people in their everyday and it matters to people’s experience of conflict dynamics and peacebuilding. Place produces power, reflects and reinforces hierarchy, and hosts power-laden social relations. Thus, place is the locus of complex intersections and outcomes of power geometries that operate across many spatial scales, from the body to the globe.

Specifically, peace and peacebuilding are enplaced and constituted in part through location, material form, and their imaginings (cf. Appadurai 1995). Place-making refers to the processes of geographically anchoring an abstract idea in a material location. Places are made as people ascribe a physical venue to abstract social ideas and norms. Thus, it is possible to read agency from the process during the course of which actors are able to give physical presence to an ideational space. The more relevant and visible a place can be made, the more powerful it will be in the transformation of people’s everyday lives. In a sense, a place is a space filled with people, things, practices, and representations. People ascribe attributes and qualities to places; ours or theirs; safe or dangerous; public or private; unfamiliar or known; accessible or inaccessible.

Space-Making

Space, in our definition, is the symbolic and ideational counterpart to place. It denotes the meanings and interpretations that accompany any spatial practice. In that, it is a product of social interactions and their associated understandings of a particular locale. Space-making, therefore, describes the complex ways in which materiality is given meaning in a specific context and from the perspective of the surrounding actors. Space-making is therefore a process that takes as its point of departure the physical and material place and, through meaning-making processes, transforms the former into an abstract, ideational social space. Space can be viewed as the imaginary counterpart to place. It is the ideational extension of physical presence, i.e., place. In the words of de Certeau (1984: 117), “space is a practiced place.” How the construction of a new set of monuments, for instance, is received locally, nationally, or globally, is indeed not a given, but a process of ambivalent outcomes through spatial negotiations. Understanding such negotiations as they take place in peacebuilding contexts can therefore be an important step in analyzing the competing agendas that meet in a given arena of peacebuilding.

Summary

Peace and conflict represent two sides of the same coin and often take place in parallel. In the midst of violent conflict there are islands of peace, and in times of peace there are outbreaks of violent conflict. By applying a spatial perspective, this section is able to capture the mutual constitution of material place and symbolic space in our reading of sites where peacebuilding takes place. It becomes clear that the politics of transition from war to peace and the transformation of warscapes into peacescapes can be read spatially. Based on our earlier work on spatial transformation (Björkdahl and Kappler 2017), the section evidences that processes of peacebuilding unfold in place-specific forms and spatial combinations. The complexity of spatial practices as situated in a jigsaw of human agency thus blurs the distinction between “warscapes” and “peacescapes” and shows that the function and outcomes of spatial peacebuilding is always a result of the engagement of a variety of peacebuilding agents.

Cross-References

- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Appadurai, A. (1995). The production of locality. In R. Fardon (Ed.), Counterworks: Managing the diversity of knowledge (pp. 208–229). London: Routledge.
- Björkdahl, A., & Buckley-Zistel, S. (2016). Spatialising peace and conflict: Mapping the production of places, sites and scales of violence. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Björkdahl, A., & Kappler, S. (2017). Peacebuilding and spatial transformation. Peace, space and place. London/New York: Routledge.
- Creswell, T. (1996). Place/out of place: Geography, ideology, and transgression. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Creswell, T. (2004). Place: A Short Introduction. Malden: Blackwell Publishing Ltd.
- de Certeau, M. (1984). The practice of everyday life. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Giddens, A. (1984). The constitution of society. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Gregory, D. (1981). Human agency and human geography. Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers, 6(1), 1–18.
- Koopman, S. (2011). Let’s take peace to pieces. Political Geography, 30(4), 193–194.
- Megoran, N. (2011). War and peace? An agenda for peace research and practice in geography. Political Geography, 30(4), 178–189.

Peacebuilding Consequences

Gëzim Visoka

Dublin City University, School of Law and Government, Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

Peacebuilding · Consequences · Intentionality · Responsibility

Synonyms

Peacebuilding; Consequences; Intentionality; Responsibility; Liberal peace

Definition

This chapter examines the consequences of peacebuilding interventions. It argues that contemporary peacebuilding interventions are not capable of reaching intended goals, anticipating and preventing the undesirable consequences of its actions, and taking responsibility for such consequences. Accordingly, the kind of peace that emerges in conflict-affected societies is not a product of what is intended but what both insider and outsider agents have failed to achieve. This not only has repercussions for the prospects of sustainable peace but also exposes fundamental flaws within the entire peacebuilding enterprise. It reveals the limits of power and knowledge and unearth the power of uncertainty, surprise, and uncontrollability. In probing the consequences of peacebuilding interventions, this chapter both offers a conceptual critique and provides empirical and illustrative insights to expose the problems and tensions underlining peacebuilding in contemporary politics.

Introduction

Over the past two decades, peacebuilding (along with state-building and development) has been one of the main tools used by the international community to mitigate insecurity and expand the frontiers of democracy and neoliberal economy (Doyle and Sambanis 2006). Rooted in Western interventionism, liberal peace currently dominates mainstream peacebuilding practices. Core assumptions of liberal peace hold that establishing peace and building a liberal state will produce a stable peace. However, the record of contemporary liberal peacebuilding praxis so far indicates a mixture of success and failure (Campbell et al. 2011; Jett 1999). In terms of success, liberal peacebuilding has contributed to initiating post-conflict political, economic, and social recovery processes, such as establishing new constitutional and institutional frameworks, developing electoral choice, and setting up basic public services (Diehl and Druckman 2010). However, since its inception, liberal peacebuilding has fallen short in establishing conditions for sustainable peace as most of the recipient societies continue to suffer from insecurity, weak democracy, fragile peace, and contested and fragmented sovereignty (Richmond 2010; David 1999). To this situation contributed also local peace and state capturing structures, which are primarily tuned to blocking peace consolidation (see Visoka 2020a). Arising from this self-fulfilling liberal prophecy, the external, long-term, and unintended impact and consequences have been ignored and overshadowed (Visoka 2016a). A broad spectrum of consequences and omissions, which could be of a negative nature with long-term consequences and collateral implications, often remain unexplored. This represents a significant concern for understanding the power of agency, the lineages of impact, and the capacity to govern social affairs.

Due to its inherent interventionist nature and desire for stability and control, peacebuilding interventions have to reengineer post-conflict societies with political and economic models that did not fit the local context and culture and the democratic will of the people (Chandler 2010; Richmond 2011; Visoka 2017). Western approaches to peacebuilding have given priority to translating external needs into internal obligations while suppressing internal needs by imposing regimes of rights (see Doyle 2005). Liberal peace promotes compliance and subservient political culture in post-conflict societies. In certain instances, liberal peace works against pluralist, participatory, and deliberative democracy. This is primarily done to maintain overall stability and avoid public deliberations as a forum that could lead to violent confrontation between different ethnic groups and pose challenges to the unquestionable authority they exercise directly and indirectly over post-conflict societies (Visoka 2017). By its nature, liberal peace tends to remove political agency from local political institutions, weakening their capacity to develop and implement locally engrained policy, thereby creating a culture of dependency, domination, and inequality. Asymmetric power; the imposition of a political, economic, and social system; unaccountable practices; and the positionality of colonial exploitation, expressed by Western-dominated states, organisations, and NGOs, have left post-conflict societies exposed to multiple consequences, failures, and anomalies (Richmond 2014). By putting a primary emphasis on short-sighted immediate results and relying on externally positioned intentions, most of the peacebuilding organizations have ignored the possible negative and long-term consequences. Within this realm, local and alternative approaches to peacebuilding are underestimated and neither sufficiently promoted nor incorporated in the national peace processes.

The success of peacebuilding is often measured based on the universality and validity of liberal intentionality (Pushkina 2006). The very idea of appearing to contribute to global peace and security, democracy and development, and conflict prevention is perceived to be a sufficient basis for enacting and justifying the global legitimacy of leading international peacebuilding actors (Charlesworth and Coicaud 2010). Similarly, good performance is praised based on the immediate outputs that do not encounter broader long-term impact and subsequent consequences, which can be produced directly and indirectly by peacebuilding endeavours. Ultimately this is the wrong approach (Fast and Neufeldt 2005). However, measuring peacebuilding success based only on good intentions risks disincentivizing efforts to reach intended effects. This does not mean though that, on the contrary, bad intentions might produce good consequences. The short-sightedness of using immediate impact and outcomes as the grounds for assessing and justifying liberal interventions is nothing less than a deceptive reading of social reality in conflict-affected societies. For these reasons, consequences should ontologically be given higher consideration, and consequences should certainly become the measure against which agency is legitimized and responsibility is assigned. In fact, noble intentions count for little when they cause more harm than good. So, the paramount agency of peacebuilding organizations should not only be limited to their good intentions, but their validity should also be based on their ability to achieve intended outcomes, to anticipate the potential harmful and negative consequences of their purposive actions, and to undertake preventive measures where and when possible. A new ontology of critical consequentialism is needed, which reverses the dominant discourses, reveals the discontent and discontinuity between intentions and consequences, and excavates the specificity and exteriority of consequences.

Within peace and conflict studies, both liberal and critical approaches to peacebuilding have not yet been able to address the consequences of peacebuilding due to ontological and epistemological differences (see Richmond 2019). Proponents of liberal peacebuilding have predominantly ignored peacebuilding consequences, as that would be seen as a self-defeating prophecy and an undesired refutation of their theoretical and policy propositions. This is exemplified by the fact that the spectrum of consequences that emerges from peacebuilding operations is often excluded from the measurement indicators. The mainstream indicators of peace that rely on technocratic and routine logics of performance and impact assessment are unsuitable to measure sensitive and complex questions related to unintended consequences (Mac Ginty 2012). In particular, the contemporary politics of impact assessment dictated by the material dominance of donors and power holders, coupled with an inadequate assessment of peacebuilding consequences, have contributed to the ignorance of the different types of long-term consequences that peacebuilding interventions have produced in conflict-affected societies. The liberal peace research agenda is more prone to tackle questions related to the removal of obstacles and the creation of conditions for enforcing the liberal peace, rather than looking for alternative perspectives or critically engaging with the consequences of their prior wrongdoings. On the other hand, critical approaches to peacebuilding have focused on decoupling the shortcomings of liberal peace, setting a new expanded interdisciplinary peace research program, and undertaking an emancipatory perspective to empower local agency. The examination of unintended consequences by critical approaches is utilized as an empty signifier and as a safe way of criticizing while not antagonizing mainstream peacebuilding machinery, unintentionally thus neutralizing blame and responsibility for the consequences of the intentional actions of liberal peace (Visoka 2016a).

These analytical and policy inadequacies have left peacebuilding consequences under-researched and conceptually ambiguous. The paradigmatic contempt between liberal and critical approaches has affected the ontological positionality and has determined what counts as consequences and how to portray them in academic and policy discourse. This certainly illustrates why there is a lack of understanding of unintended consequences in peace, security, and development theory and praxis. But to overcome these epistemic and practical anomalies, there is a need for methodological and epistemological pluralism, the need for analytical flexibility to overcome the entrenched logic of research programs, and the need to pursue new frontiers of critique to capture the impact of peacebuilding actualities and its consequences.

The present chapter engages with the adverse impact of peacebuilding in conflict-affected societies by critically examining the intentionality, consequences, and responsibility of current international interventions. The linkage between intentionality, consequences, and responsibility is crucial as it captures the metaphysics, politics, and normative validity of peacebuilding. The examination of consequences requires tracing back key triggering actions. Behind each action, there is a dose of intentionality, which represents the starting point of a cycle and is influenced by previous knowledge, experiences, and events. The identification of consequences enables the retrospective examination of the factors that led to its formation, especially the presence of intentionality, anticipation, and preventability. This helps to understand social actualities and to attribute specific and relational responsibility for the consequences to responsible agents (as individuals and collectives). The complex interaction of these aspects enables us to embrace and harness the complexity and discontent of contemporary peacebuilding actualities, where intentionality does not match with actions taken, the consequences remain unaccounted for, and the appropriate assignment of responsibility is almost inexistent.

Combining a conceptual discussion with empirical examples, this chapter offers insights on the extent to which existing approaches to peacebuilding are not capable of reaching intended goals, anticipating and preventing the undesirable consequences of their actions, and taking responsibility for such consequences. This not only has repercussions for the prospects of sustainable peace but also reveals peacebuilding as a camouflaging enterprise. This indeed constitutes the immorality of peacebuilding – a particular form of governing political affairs without care and self-constraint for the harm of their intentional conduct. Peacebuilding interventions risk delaying building of peace. Good intentions are not translated into good effects. The peacebuilder’s “will to peace” remains immanently incomplete. As such, peacebuilding can unintentionally take on the function of peace-wrecking. Seen from this perspective, the societal fabric in conflict-affected societies is not a product of what is intended but what both insider and outsider agents have failed to achieve. To illustrate the consequences of peacebuilding intervention, the chapter explores the unintended consequences of police reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the unprevented consequences for building the rule of law in Kosovo, and the unanticipated consequences of security sector reform in Timor-Leste.

This chapter proceeds by first examining the question of intentionality, anticipation, and preventability in the context of peacebuilding. It then examines the spectrum of unintended, unanticipated, and unprevented consequences, illustrated by concrete examples from conflict-affected societies, as well as interrogates the key critical encounters that shape peacebuilding actualities in the field. The chapter then looks at the failure of peacebuilding organizations to take responsibility for their wrongdoings, highlighting the current practices and the ethical limitations of the UN and other regional actors involved in peacebuilding. The chapter concludes with a number of critical reflections on why current peacebuilding interventions are seen as impossible to building a sustainable and just peace.

Peacebuilding Purpose: Intentionality, Anticipation, and Prevention

As part of broader global security apparatus, peacebuilding operates on the premises of Western-rooted frameworks of governing security and social affairs through rationality, mechanisms of predictability, preemption, alertness, preparedness, and reaction. They represent complex mechanisms to govern complexity with the sole purpose of reaching intended goals and achieving intended consequences. These intended goals of protecting and promoting a liberal way of life enshrine power, norms, values, and material interests (see Finnemore 2004). So, at the heart of peacebuilding lucidity are intentionality, anticipation, and prevention. Intentions and intentionality have a central role in understanding social life (Searle 1983, pp. 79–80). Intentions are a key ingredient of a socially constructed world. Individual and collective intentions are supposed to guide human conduct and reflect the articulation of agency. They are seen as the normative, intellectual, and principal feature of human ability to act in accordance with certain goals, ideas, desires, and objectives that guide action. In a correlative sense, intentions shape human subjectivity, they shape social actions, and they produce consequences, and they serve as the basis against which responsibility can be assigned. Declared intentions are created through a speech act and linguistic process which is conditioned in materiality. They are essential for guiding what Searle calls “word-to-world,” which are constituted in the first place by the reversed dialectic of forming intentions from experience (Searle 2010, p. 11). For instance, a social institutional reality is created by the linguistic representation of declared intentions.

Declared intentions outlined in peace agreements, UN documents, and other policy documents constitute the bedrock of liberal peacebuilding ideology and represent the reference point against which the construction of reality in post-conflict societies is investigated (see Paris 2004). Liberal intentionality is manufactured in the shape of liberal normativity. The normativity of liberal peacebuilding lies within the idea of building peace, by building democratic state institutions, addressing the root causes of conflict, establishing the rule of law and an impartial justice system, promoting human rights, and developing an open market-oriented economy. However, these liberal peace intentions reflect collective intentions, which implicitly contain self-interest as well as strategic, secret, and hidden intentions of different peacebuilding organizations, thereby creating a complex web of incompatibilities, contradictions, and chaos. Declared intentions do not operate in vacuum. They are connected with some other intentions and are also correlated with a set of abilities, capacities, dispositions, and ways of doing things and know-how that mediates the translation of intentions into practice (Searle 2010, p. 31).

As much as peacebuilding intentions represent a collective will and desire to contribute to installing a liberal peace in a post-conflict society, they also represent the self-interest of outsider agents. The superficially consensual nature of peacebuilding intentions hides deeply rooted disagreement, which affects the political will, the adequacy of actions, and levels of concern for the consequences. Above all peacebuilding intentions are often euphemisms, stating something that is neither truly intended nor expected to be achieved. These declared intentions are often precisely in Orwellian sense, a “clear language of insincerity. . .when there is a gap between one’s real and one’s declared aims” (Orwell 1968, p. 137). Discourse on the rule of law, democratic policing, sustainable peace, and justice is often invoked broadly to leave space for maneuvering and modifying the measurement of progress and success. They are more reflections of what is ought to be said rather than what was truly intended. This creates confusion and hides the ingredients against which the social and political outcomes of actions are products of intended and anticipated actions.

A number of examples illustrate these paradoxical caveats of liberal intentionality. The liberal peace intentions in Bosnia outlined in the Dayton Peace Accords were more oriented towards ending the conflict than building peace. The inadequacy of this intentionality was later unraveled with the fact that this peace agreement became the key impediment to peacebuilding and overcoming the ethnic impasse in the Bosnia. Similarly, the intentionality of the EU Police Mission (EUPM) in Bosnia was not only focusing on building a democratic, unified, effective, and accountable police force but also showing the ability of the first joint European crisis management mission to deploy abroad. Success was determined with deployment ability, rather than the fulfilment of declared intentions and its subsequent impact on Bosnian society. While in Kosovo, the basis of the declared intentions was a UN Security Council Resolution (1244 (1999)), each state and organization involved in Kosovo tried to advance their national interests, either through funding conditionality or indirectly through their people that were part of UN structures. Found in this web of multiplicity of intentionality, UN officials in Kosovo undertook actions based on instincts rather than determined along clear policy lines and intentions, because otherwise the process of making and agreeing upon collective intentions would paralyze the entire peacebuilding enterprise (Covey et al. 2005). In Timor-Leste, the UN formulated the declared intentions for Timor-Leste largely according to “template logic,” drawing on the structure of the UNMIK (UN Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo) and under internal tensions including short time for preparing the mission, a shortage of staff within the UN Secretariat, and disagreements between UN-DPKO and UN-DPA over the internal responsibilities within the UN. This decontextualization of supposedly universal liberal intentions was not helpful for Timor-Leste.

In the formation and application of intentions, anticipation plays a crucial role. The human agency of planning makes anticipation necessary to guide intentional action (Bratman 2007). Accordingly, anticipation is about the governmentality of the future – about securing, controlling, and disciplining the present and the future. Anticipation seeks to engage with the unknown and uncertain future with the justification of preempting, preparing for, and preventing threats to the present and/or desired state of being of individuals and collectivities (Anderson 2010, pp. 778–779). While the anticipation of intentions is complicated but predictable, the pattern of outcomes and consequences is even more complex as there are multiple complex factors to interact with each other in a nonlinear pattern that makes the anticipation of consequences very complex (Perrow 1986). For policymakers and realist security scholars, anticipation represents a necessary check to reduce the present and future unknowns. Countries such as the USA and the UK have developed sophisticated anticipatory practices, combining conventional contingency planning and scenario-building rooted in fragments of empiricism with more imaginary and intuitive attempts to anticipate the future. However, the ethical and practical consequences of anticipatory governance are the major concerns for critical security scholars, as anticipation practices represent a form of reconstructing the present and imposing an inexistent future with devastating repercussions on human freedom, security, justice, and well-being (Aradau and Van Munster 2011).

In the context of peacebuilding, the UN is often troubled by a weak and ineffective anticipatory governance system. In the past, the absence of early warning and anticipatory mechanisms was considered one of the functional causes of the UN’s failure to prevent the genocide in Rwanda and Bosnia (UN High-Level Panel 2004, p. 34). Following the trends of global security governance in the past decade, the UN has tried to set in place early warning and anticipatory governance, which is much weaker compared to what is used by powerful states. There are many examples of UN peacebuilding operations, illustrating inadequate strategic planning and lack of local knowledge (CSDG 2003, p. 18). For instance, the UN has invoked extensively the discourse of anticipation as a process of learning from the past, adjusting to present and anticipating future requirements. The 2000 Report of the Panel on UN Peace Operations called explicitly for creativity and imagination when approaching future peacebuilding operations. In achieving this, the UN has looked for solutions to the material aspects of anticipation, such as equipment, cash, and information assets (UN 2000, p. 15). The UN has tried to build an institutional architecture evident with the Peacebuilding Commission with the sole purpose of engaging in “early warning through preventive action to post-conflict peacebuilding” (UN High-Level Panel 2004, p. 83). However, relying on remote and detached “expert” knowledge and on periodical inadequate public polls, the UN has performed badly in anticipating and preventing conflict recurrence. UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon recently admitted that “despite years of investment, we are still far from having predictable and effective mechanisms for rapid deployment” (UN 2014). The complex bureaucracy and the remote hierarchies of decision-making have made knowledge-sharing and decision-making a slow and ineffective process. In the context of peacebuilding, anticipation takes place through external blueprints, routine thinking, and mindsets, which are often remote from the local context, knowledge, and micro-dynamics and everyday societal relations (UN 2009, p. 8). This has limited the UN's ability to adjust its intentionality to actions compatible to local contexts based on a well-grounded understanding and anticipation of local dynamics.

The availability of early warning mechanisms is insufficient without analytical capacity to identify deviations from the course of the implementation of intentions and the emergence of a spectrum of consequences. Zartman (2001, p. 331) argues that an important step in preventive action is the cultivation of an early awareness rather than early warning, which combines looking for distant problems, the ability to identify available warning signals, and the capacity to engage in an analytical understanding of the possibilities for prevention. Conventional predictability can be a self-fulfilling prophecy, where a perceived threat can generate more threats, and fear can generate more fear, and resolving problems can generate more problems. Equally important, the nonlinearity of social processes poses a significant challenge to anticipation, which is more affiliated with linear systems, as there can be no direct or constant relationship between agents and structures (Mitchell 2009, p. 90; Chandler 2013). Of course, repeating the same action will not lead to the same outcome, as universal liberal intentionality will not produce the same effects in all post-conflict contexts to which it has been applied.

Critical approaches to peacebuilding have engaged indirectly with the question of predictability through exploring emancipating scenarios, where the positionality, interest, and embedded identity of external agents transcends to engage with other unknown, dislocated fields, and possible futures (see Visoka and Musliu 2019). In particular, critical scholars have identified the subordination of local context, knowledge, and interests as a source of failure to reach the intended goals (Chandler 2010). This is based on the conviction that outsider agents have largely ignored insiders' knowledge on the grounds that it is primitive and not useful for building peace in post-conflict situations, as it is rooted in distinct cultures and ethnicity, which were the sources of conflict in first place (Fontan 2012). Reversing this discourse, critical scholars consider local knowledge an important aspect, which needs to be explored and considered as a precondition for social emancipation seen as key to promoting a sustainable peace, a stable polity, and the social contract in post-conflict societies.

However, local people often treat knowledge as a contingent form of knowing and learning that remains contextual, not replicable. Calls for decolonizing peace could lead to the further suppression of insider agents, as extracting knowledge will be an all-encompassing hegemonic activity of anticipation. The outsider agents, ranging from security advisers, peacebuilders, development workers, and business consultants to researchers and scholars, disembark in post-conflict places to extract the knowledge of the insider agents (Visoka 2018). Outsider agents extract insider's knowledge to inform policies, planning, evaluation, and reengagement of the outsider agents in post-conflict societies (UN 2010, p. 7). Knowledge extraction is used as a weapon of the powerful to dominate, rule, and control further the subjugated, suppressed, ignored, and exploited insider agents (Aradau and Van Munster 2012). This type of knowledge extraction could be considered unethical and produce harmful consequences for the insider agents, because insider's knowledge is often extracted to inform policies, planning, evaluation, and reengage outsider agents in post-conflict societies. So, the invocation of decolonized methodologies, such as participatory action research, sociological, ethnological, and anthropological approaches, and narrative analysis enable an all-encompassing hegemonic unweaving of the local from any sphere of autonomous, undiscovered, and secure form of enablement (Smith 2012; Visoka and Musliu 2019). Unintentionally, critical scholars result in revealing the most intimate, hidden, and complex forms of agency articulated by insiders in their everyday secure zone of survival and interaction. Consequently, the UN and other international organizations gradually are exploiting this decolonized knowledge to increase the chances of success during interventions in conflict-affected places. This is evident with the increasing discourse on local ownership, participatory development, resilience, and local infrastructure for peace (Odendaal 2013; UN 2009).

In the context of peacebuilding, the core liberal intentions seek to prevent the recurrence of conflict by addressing its root causes. In this realm, anticipation is a mediating mechanism to conflict prevention. Prevention and preventability is one of the most important aspects of reflective agency. Prevention occurs when an action is invoked to prevent certain effects from occurring, or reversing the course of consequences (Zartman 2001, p. 4). Prevention presupposes that something is or can be prevented, which can be an observable development, an anticipated course of action, and foreseen consequences (Bratman 2000, pp. 35–61). To enact prevention, there should be an awareness and knowledge of the potential consequences of action and nonaction. The subject of prevention is often a harmful risk, which tends to occur based on anticipatory reasoning and deviate from the satisfaction of intentions and achievement of intended outcomes (Zartman 2001, p. 313). One of the most important and fruitful dimensions of prevention is its role to correct human intentionality and action. Ben Anderson (2010) argues that preemption, precaution, and preparedness are types of preventive action. While precaution is engaged during the middle of a reversible process, preemption takes place even before the event occurs. The value of precaution is, as Anderson (2010, p. 778) argues, “to care for a valued life by neutralising threats to that life.” Preparedness is the stage after the consequences have occurred and resiliency is built to respond to future recurrences. Beyond this, prevention seeks to engage in anticipating future possible consequences and to undertake actions before they become immanent. While this might sound reasonable, in the context of peacebuilding prevention operates on different properties.

Conflict prevention is widely acknowledged in peacebuilding practices. In peace and conflict situations, the awareness of preventative action is altered due to the errors of international decision-making in multiple past ethnic conflicts, as well as harmful effects and multiple failures of multitrack diplomacy (Lund 2002, p. 159; Novosseloff 2000). It is also argued that “while there is much talk of ‘prevention,’ anticipating problems before they overwhelm us is not a strength of our species and even less so of the system of states” (Weiss 2012, p. 225). The UN has tried to utilize preventive diplomacy to prevent escalation of conflicts, but this has produced mixed results. Despite previous failures, preventive action remains unattractive to policymakers, as it does not represent an immediate threat and necessity, and is seen as a costly endeavor without immediate rewards. Different experiences show that moving from early warning to early action is difficult. For instance, the UNDP in Kosovo had advanced early warning system, but it was largely ignored by the UN and local government around the time when ethnic violence recurred in 2004. There is a high likelihood that previously gathered information was not taken seriously by decision makers and properly analyzed, a lack of coordination and separate systems of secrecy and intelligence impede early warning, and the presence of hidden intentions and conflicting political objectives obstructs the accumulation of sufficient political will for action (Rupesinghe and Anderlini 1998, pp. 79–81).

However, the question of prevention and preventive measures at later stages of peacebuilding remains unexplored, if not entirely ignored. It is presumed that prevention should take place only before the conflict escalates or ends. The prevention of consequences is possible but is conditional on a number of factors. Prevention to avoid and/or reduce harmful effects is contingent on the adequate timing of action, possession of authority, good judgement based on solid knowledge, empathy, and due diligence. According to Jervis (1997), the unintended effects can be reduced, if not eliminated, when people constrain each other, when there is an understanding of how the system works, and when multiple sequential and simultaneous actions are undertaken, operating with multiple layers of intentions. Within such a scenario, Jervis (1997, p. 591) maintains that “actors must do several things” to prevent certain outcomes from occurring. Although the responsibility for unintended consequences cannot be removed, this is morally and practically relativised when “active measures are taken to prevent or minimise the negative side-effects” (Reichberg and Syse 2004, p. 43). Within the realm of containing and managing the emergent consequences, it is suggested to develop “system feedback through institutionalised monitoring and evaluating mechanisms, and constantly adjusting our planning and operations . . .” (Aoi et al. 2007, p. 275).

So far, peacebuilding actors have justified and legitimized their interventionism on the grounds of promoting good intentions of building sustainable peace, as well as trying to uphold its global governmentality by trying to utilize anticipatory governance to prevent and deescalate conflicts and influence outcomes in conflict-affected places. However, the normative impetus and praxis have not produced intended outcomes, thereby contributing directly and indirectly to a world of its unmaking, which is made of consequences that are shaped by both international and local agency around critical turning points, intentional events, and remote nonevents.

Peacebuilding Consequences as the Results of the Results of Results

Social actualities in post-conflict societies are mainly dominated by various consequences as emerging features of purposive interactions between insider and outsider agents operating in the institutional, public, and everyday realm of post-conflict habitus. So, attempts to build peace often do not manage to achieve the intended outcomes. Insider and outsider agents engaged in peacebuilding are repeatedly unable to control the outcome of peace processes. The social world is constructed in negation and collusion of individual and collective intentionality, through the interaction of agents with different discursive figurations, power ratios, and material strengths. In the context of conflict-affected societies, the state of peace represents the influence of everyone and nobody, whereby various consequences take the form of social unknowns, surprises, and the prevalence of errors and an incomplete trajectory from will to effect. For this reason, the disentanglement of peacebuilding consequences of requires both conceptual clarity and empirical processual rigor. The emergence of consequences shows the complex figuration and hybridisation of peacebuilding processes (Visoka 2016a). The spectrum of consequences occurs in a cascading logic of emergent features. They follow a non-linear pattern between the intended impact and the consequences that emerge, often transcending the social field and affecting other fields of social interactions (see Hurley 2009). The processes are not only influenced and driven by the international actors, but also local actors and factors play an essential role in shaping the nature of processes. Peacebuilding organizations often witness the emergence of effects they don't want, they don't have the ability to know, and they cannot prevent their occurrence. What we encounter as consequences are nonlinearly assembled aspects of different fields. They are the result of the results of results.

While peacebuilding consequences might be shaped by the interaction of local and international agents and structures, they cannot be reduced to the properties of these units (see Anderson 1999). So, a differentiated account of peacebuilding consequences brings more conceptual clarity and empirical accuracy. Based on this, three types of consequences can be unpacked: unintended consequences, unanticipated consequences, and unprevented consequences. The three types of consequences are differentiated based on the criteria of the absence of their affirmative attribution – the unfulfillment of intention, anticipation, and prevention. This is the essence of their discursive formation. Ontologically, this form of social analysis could be referred to as “anti-agency analysis.” These different types of consequences are often negative consequences. Differentiation is essential for reconstructing theoretical and empirical knowledge on the spectrum of consequences and also for guiding pragmatically reality-adequate critique and practice (Buzan and Albert 2010, p. 2).

Unintended consequences can be defined as those consequences that have emerged as a result of the direct action of peacebuilding organizations, which are not goal-oriented and are not intended by the agents, and as such fall outside of the scope of intentionality and declared intentions (see Schneckener 2010). Unanticipated consequences are defined here as those consequences that have emerged, which were neither anticipated nor foreseen, or predicted by peacebuilding organizations (see Merton 1936). Unprevented consequences refer to those consequences that have occurred as a result of inaction by the agents of peacebuilding either at the stage before the effect is created or during an early stage of development, when the consequence would have been preventable and avoidable. The unpreventability of consequences is measured and assessed within the agential realm and possibility of the agents, which includes the availability of authority, and the presence of alternative possibilities for action (Campbell et al. 2010, p. 2).

The disentanglement of peacebuilding practices in conflict-affected societies provides important empirical insights on the unintentional making of social and political fabric. To explore this, I have examined the local unintended consequences of police reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the unprevented consequences of the emergence of Serb parallel structures in Kosovo, and the unanticipated consequences of security sector reform in Timor-Leste. Police reform, as part of security sector reform, has been one of the main components of liberal peacebuilding praxis in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Chandler 2006, p. 338). Both UN and EU missions have been declared successful and were highly praised for their performance. However, the spectrum of consequences they produced has remained largely ignored and under-researched (Visoka 2016b). The UN Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) and International Police Task Force (IPTF) tried to build a democratic police, downsize the police forces, Westernize the local culture of policing, and build an independent and publically accountable police structure. The UN tried to reform local police forces without challenging the operation of multiple, overlapping, and fragmented police forces at the entity and cantonal level. However, this policy of legitimizing the existing mono-ethnic police structures led to multiple unintended consequences that later became the main obstacles to peacebuilding.

First, the formation of multiple police structures left room for nationalist political interference and control over the operation of police forces and the instrumentalization of police to impede the implementation of Dayton Peace Agreement. Second, the rushed process for completing the certification of police officers disregarded criminal records and illegal activity among police officers (Holbrooke 1999, p. 338). Third, ineffective screening and certification of local police facilitated the reluctance of local police to investigate criminal offences and human rights abuses committed against minority returnees. Fourth, new police forces served as the main impeders for the identification and prosecution of war crimes, while many suspects themselves hid within police structures (Human Rights Watch 2006). Numerous examples point out the failure of local police to execute court orders, apprehend, or arrest war crimes suspects (Amnesty International 2003, p. 21). Fifth, the prolonged and mismanaged police reform process has unintentionally nurtured widespread organized crime, corruption, and informal economic practices, whereby police forces, in cooperation with ethnic elites, have been involved in criminal activity (Brady 2012, p. 19). In 2003, it was estimated that almost 50% of the Bosnian economy was based on the black market (Brady 2012, p. 18). Finally, local police forces coordinated their activities with nationalist factions, which led to human rights abuses against the minority refugee returnees, impeded the formation of new mixed and secure communities, and delayed the provision of basic public order and safety essential for social peace, political freedom, gradual reconciliation, coexistence, and economic development.

So, by agreeing to preserve old policing structures, international peacebuilders unintentionally contributed to practices such as the following: allowing political interference into law enforcement structures; informal policing and cooperation with criminal groups; protecting war criminals and obstructing transitional justice; and spreading human insecurity, human rights abuses, and discrimination against IDPs, minorities, and women. The international community did not intend this spectrum of consequences, but it came as a direct result of the mistakes made during the initial stages after the war. These consequences were further nurtured by insufficient international coordination and a lack of cooperation, resources, and knowledge to comprehend the harmful effects that the police reform would bring. These unintended consequences later became the main obstacle to the peace process and delayed Bosnia's EU integration dynamics.

In Kosovo, the peacebuilding and state building process was challenged at the outset by Serb local groups, which resisted international rule and contested Albanian dominance in post-conflict Kosovo (Visoka 2016a). These resistance groups supported by the Serbian government created their parallel security, justice, education, healthcare, and administrative services. While the UN and NATO had the knowledge, authority, and resources to prevent the emergence of these Serb parallel structures, they did not challenge them for the sake of stability. However, these structures produced multiple consequences, which were preventable but intentionally were not prevented from occurring. First, the failure to prevent the emergence and development of Serb parallel structures between 1999 and 2001 led to the creation of a frozen conflict in the north, where the UNMIK failed to extend its authority and the rule of law, and the KFOR was unable to maintain security and ensure the freedom of movement. Second, the emergence of Serb parallel structures led to the creation of institutional and legal parallelism, which created social confusion, social disobedience, disorder, and informality. Third, the activity of Serb parallel structures has undermined international and domestic efforts to build peace, consolidate state institutions, and find common ground for ethnic reconciliation in Kosovo after 1999. By preventing the return of forcefully displaced persons, these structures maintained divisive ethnic geographical boundaries and minimized contact and opportunities to tackle common problems and overcome past divisions (KIPRED 2012).

These consequences shaped significantly the political developments in Kosovo, whereby previous nonactions created a new chain of consequences, which multiplied, complicated, and constrained further opportunities for building peace (Visoka 2017). Accordingly, unprevented consequences prevented peacebuilding in Kosovo. Such unprevented consequences have effectively prolonged the international presence in Kosovo and undermined their authority and legitimacy, delayed the establishment of effective and functional institutions, hindered the establishment of civic peace and ethnic reconciliation, and undermined socioeconomic development. The failure of the international community to take preventive measures illustrates how the lack of sensitivity for the consequences, despite the availability of authority, resources, and knowledge, created a mess and ultimately failed to achieve their declared intentions. The emergence of these consequences was unintentionally unprevented revealing the morale and seriousness of peacebuilding as well as the weak agency of the UN, NATO, and EU to remain loyal to the declared intentions and the obligations taken on behalf of the international community and the local population (see Visoka and Richmond 2017). It shows "the triumph of the lack of will" to take timely and appropriate measures to prevent negative consequences in their field of responsibility. While the UN might have chosen non-action to prevent any larger scale conflict, this has counter-intuitively prevented peace in the long run. In this case, post-conflict "conflict prevention" has become "peace prevention."

The examination of the unanticipated consequences of security sector reform in Timor-Leste also reveals the uncontrollable nature of the peacebuilding process. Driven by good intentions to bring stability and develop a solid security structure, six subsequent UN peace missions worked to establish from scratch and then strengthen the police and defense forces in Timor-Leste. However, the recruitment process for the police and defense forces, along with inappropriate capacity building for new security forces and the absence of clear institutional framework and democratic oversight of security forces, led to a number of unanticipated consequences. The first and most visible and influential unanticipated consequence that has emerged as a result of the security sector development was the violence in April and May 2006, which resulted in 38 fatalities, the burning of 1,650 houses, and the internal displacement of around 150,000 people (Scambary 2011, p. 66). The events of April and May 2006 were unanticipated consequences of early anticipatable developments. An important point of reference here is the fact that the UNTAET (UN Transitional Administration in East Timor) suffered from inadequate strategic planning, prior to its establishment in Timor-Leste, and particularly lacked the necessary anticipatory context-driven understanding of how to handle security sector reform and how best to accommodate ex-combatants within Timor-Leste (CSDG 2003, p. 18). The lack of early communication between the UN and local leadership created mutual misunderstandings and reduced their ability to anticipate the outcomes of each action undertaken. The UNTAET's strategic direction for developing the security sector was flawed due to a lack of expertise regarding the local language, culture, context, and local power dynamics.

Second, failed security sector reform led to the development of an ineffective police service, which did not perform their intended primary tasks but engaged in controversial, abusive, and unaccountable practices (UN 2004, p. 9). Failure to institutionalize and establish civilian oversight systems for the police resulted in impunity and human rights abuses perpetrated by police officers on the civilian population (Visoka 2016a). Third, as a consequence of the exclusionary process of developing the defense and police forces, as well as the inappropriate provision of security and enforcement of the rule of law, a large number of spoiler groups emerged consisting of disaffected former FALINTIL fighters intermeshed with criminal and clandestine groups, which threatened everyday peace, undermined state institutions, and nurtured communal division and conflict (Rees 2002, p. 153).

In Timor-Leste, unanticipated consequences occurred as a result of the lack of early communication and mutual understanding between local and international stakeholders regarding their intentions and political positions (Visoka 2016a). These unanticipated consequences reduced the ability of peacebuilding organizations to anticipate the course of consequences arising from their purposive actions. Lack of engagement with the local context, language, and culture reduced the UN's ability to capture local dynamics and orient strategically its actions towards the avenues that would produce intended results. Furthermore, the "permanent temporality" of the UN presence reduced the desire and ability of agents to foresee the consequences of their actions. The 2006 violence was not anticipated by the UN's contingency planning and exit strategy. Although most of the consequences were not anticipated, there was evidence that early acts of violence and confrontation between the police and defense forces, as well as the poor institutional and operative performance of the police, left room for acts of violence to be suspected. Ignoring these acts had a detrimental effect on the state of peace in Timor-Leste.

The spectrum of unintended, unanticipated, and unprevented consequences is often triggered by the interaction of complex incompatibility between an extensive mandate and a large list of declared intentions. This is further exacerbated by the typically short period of time to prepare the mission, limited advanced planning, the unavailability of resources, a lack of political willingness at various decision-making levels to implement the declared intentions, confusions between self-interest and objective normativity, and the prevalence of short-term approaches to processes and outcomes coupled with an ignorance of long-term effects. The examination of peacebuilding consequences in Bosnia, Kosovo, and Timor-Leste highlights a number of critical encounters that have contributed to the emergence of bad consequences (Visoka 2016a). First, timing plays a crucial role. The temporality of peacebuilding operations and the short-term involvement of agents do not provide space for the clarity and stability that are essential for predictability, planning, and cautious operations. The contingency and short time frame of operations in post-conflict societies gives insufficient attention to the spectrum of consequences and especially to anticipation and prevention among peacebuilding organizations. Against this background, short-term consequences are more important than the long-term impact. This logic is based on the need to provide evidence for good performance, which can be measured with reference to short-term objectives and achievements. Consideration of long-term performance and quality assurance is compromised due to the need for results that can be measured immediately. Tomorrow's consequences are ignored. A preoccupation with entry strategies and the establishment and maintenance of peacebuilding missions arguably overshadow concerns with long-term consequences. However, ignoring the long-term impact and consequences of peacebuilding paves the way for the failure of peacebuilding efforts in post-conflict societies and delays the consolidation of peace at the expense of the local population.

Second, there is a dialectical relationship between the duration of peacebuilding and the spectrum of consequences. The duration of UN peacebuilding operations has an impact on the willingness of international actors to care about the consequences of their actions, the establishment of relations with local political factions, and how they approach the local context, culture, and needs. The collateral scope of the spectrum of consequences prolongs the efforts for peacebuilding and exhausts the constructive conflict resolution momentums. While the ambiguity and contingency of short missions produces certain consequences, a long-term presence creates consequences related to creating a culture of dependency, externally generated local political legitimacy, and the promotion of irresponsible politics. On the other hand, the spectrum of consequences examined in this essay has effectively prolonged the international presence, undermined their authority and legitimacy, delayed the establishment of effective and functional institutions, hindered the establishment of civic peace and ethnic reconciliation, and undermined socioeconomic development. The longer the problems dragged on in Bosnia, Kosovo, and Timor-Leste, the higher the costs became for the international presence in these countries. Equally, the prospects for overcoming state fragility and normalization became weaker, and it became harder to escape the cycles of conflict to reach economic stability and social peace.

Third, peacebuilding organizations have largely ignored local knowledge arguing that it is primitive, illiberal, and not useful for building peace in post-conflict situations, as it is rooted in divided cultures and ethnicities that were the source of conflict in first place. When peacebuilding organizations are far removed from the local communities, they have weaker local knowledge, lower capacity, and less ability to anticipate, prevent, and reduce the harm of peacebuilding interventions. Furthermore, the dislocated loyalty, absence of empathy with local people, and their culture, as well as the primacy of materialism (concerns for professional career and high salaries), serve as distractions that undermine the potential of peacebuilding. Foreign workers frequently see post-conflict societies as an attractive career move, bringing high salaries, and diplomatic privileges and immunities. They often do not interact with insider agents in an empathetic manner but typically behave as privileged individuals who believe themselves superior to insider agents, thereby undermining local cultural practices and ignoring local knowledge. Foreign workers often create their own habitus in post-conflict societies, interact only among themselves, and avoid the everyday life and complex reality of post-conflict people. Diplomats and senior officials of peacebuilding organizations are among the most influential agents that shape political processes in post-conflict places (Visoka 2020b). They are primarily interested in advancing the interests and agenda of their respective institutions or seconding states, with little empathy for the legacies they leave behind in post-conflict societies. Under such conditions, consideration for the potentially harmful effects of peacebuilding decisions and actions is virtually nonexistent.

Fourth, the spectrum of consequences also emerges from short-sighted and historical routines of thinking and acting within the same repetitive dynamic for different types of situations and circumstances. The hierarchies of bureaucratic decision-making reduce the ability for engaging in heuristic thinking, exploring alternative pathways, or anticipating the possible consequences of peacebuilding programmes. Uncertainty regarding peacebuilding consequences cannot be tackled by formality, because consequences are dislocated across a broad network of social fields, which are difficult to capture within routine and formalized procedures. The emergence of unanticipated consequences is facilitated by a number of factors, including the following: faulty assumptions, the “template” logic of problem-solving, the tendency for the universal application and decontextualization of policy tools and mechanisms, inaccurate information, and flawed situational and analytical knowledge. The processes of adaptation, learning, and change are often very slow and are often not part of peacebuilding practices. Consequences are also influenced by the common flawed assumption generally shared by international actors that liberal peacebuilding, which produced intended outcomes in the past, will have the same outcome in all post-conflict contexts. When transferred to a different post-conflict society, best practices and lessons learnt from other contexts might not work as intended and expected.

Last but not least, the spectrum of consequences also emerges as a result of the absence of coordination between different international peacebuilding organizations. Among different peacebuilding organizations, there are tendencies for domination, hierarchical supremacy, and diverse interests, which reduce honest knowledge-sharing regarding the consequences of peacebuilding (Ricigliano 2003). The battle for coordination and consent between field-based operations, their headquarters, and other international community stakeholders consumes a considerable portion of strategic thinking and planning time available to international peacebuilders. Such frictions reduce the ability of field-based peacebuilders to anticipate and prevent the consequences of their actions. The complex hierarchy of peacebuilding decision-making erodes the possibility for key decision makers to listen and act upon the early warning signs communicated by field-based peacebuilders. For example, in Bosnia, the IFOR/SFOR (Implementation Force/Stabilisation Force) was unwilling to assist IPTF by providing security for the return of refugees, which resulted in the permanent entrapment of hundreds of thousands of refugees and IDPs outside their home communities. This also had a negative spillover effect onto the composition of electorates and community representation, leading to the dominance of nationalist parties and delayed reconciliation. Equally, in Kosovo, the KFOR (Kosovo Force) acted independently from UNMIK’s authority, as did the EU and OSCE in their semi-independent operation as UNMIK pillars. In Timor-Leste, the UNTAET was not in control of the INTERFET (International Force East Timor). Recently, the UN Secretary-General admitted that UN should “focus on better coherence and coordination, clarity on roles and responsibilities, coherent integrated strategies, stronger partnerships among key actors, and a move towards greater predictability and accountability” (UN 2009, p. 8).

The Carelessness of Peacebuilding and (UN)accountability

Current peacebuilding organizations reject taking responsibility for the spectrum of consequences, arising from their purposive actions, and show little concern for their wrongdoings and the mess they leave behind in post-conflict societies (Visoka and Doyle 2014). This is evident from the absence of appropriate mechanisms to address the responsibility for taking wrong decisions and actions, for failing to uphold their obligations, and for causing social harm. Nevertheless, the dislocated nature of consequences (in time, place, and scope of authority) complicates imputing the right proportion of responsibility to the responsible agent (see Erskine 2003).

Contemporary peacebuilding missions operate without appropriate responsibility safeguards. This is partially affected by the politics of unaccountable international governance evident from the diplomatic privileges and immunities, which protect actors from legal and political responsibility, and from the indirect political power they exercise over internal and external forces. This is exacerbated by the ineffective system of national balance among the UN staff members in sending troops to peace operations and the prevalence of the clientelist politics of donor countries (Visoka and Doyle 2014). In the current reality, there is no adequate approach to allocate responsibility for the spectrum of consequences, whether intended or unintended, anticipated or unanticipated, avoided or unprevented. Internal disciplinary mechanisms, frequent changes of personnel in charge of political decisions, and the loosely defined and partially implemented codes of conduct render internal accountability in peacebuilding organizations a technocratic necessity rather than a genuine attempt to ensure the responsible behavior of agents. The absence of legal and institutional mechanisms to hold international actors responsible can be explained as arising from the desire of power-holders to avoid mirroring the ethos of democratic responsibility prevalent in their own home country and to preserve the political and practical supremacy over the local subjugated agents. This partially explains the international unwillingness and ineffectiveness when dealing with allegations of human rights violations by international civilian and military personnel in post-conflict settings. Above all, it shows the prevalence of the tendency to uphold authority while avoiding responsibility, which speaks for the moral maturity and agential character of international governance.

For example, the international presence in Bosnia was one of the most extreme examples of post-conflict international governance, which had an executive mandate without appropriate responsibility mechanisms (Caplan 2005, pp. 463–476). Despite its supreme and executive authority, the international community in Bosnia has not developed any political or legal mechanism for allocating responsibility for the outcomes and consequences of their decisions and actions. Contrary to the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, where the international community had extensive authority but no responsibility mechanism, in Kosovo there were two mechanisms, which were quasi-judicial attributability and answerability mechanisms (Visoka 2012). However, these mechanisms were ineffective serving power rather than justice. Accordingly, international peacebuilding organizations in Kosovo have not taken responsibility for the unprevented consequences examined in this chapter, nor have they been held accountable by any institutionalized body at the local or international level (Visoka and Doyle 2014). Therefore, it is important to outline the responsibility of each organization for the consequences caused by their nonaction to prevent the emergence and development of Serb parallel structures in Kosovo, which breached local and international laws for over a decade. In Timor-Leste, six consecutive UN missions have avoided taking responsibility for the unanticipated consequences of their purposive actions while exercising absolute authority, alongside the unsupportive local culture of tolerating impunity at the institutional level and prioritizing forgiveness at the societal level. In Timor-Leste, the UN exercised authority without a clearly defined mandate and without taking responsibility for their actions and the related consequences.

These examples signify the nature of post-conflict governance, where democracy is preached but not practiced by the international community and authority is exercised without taking responsibility for the consequences. The responsible agents (collective and individual) are not held responsible for the consequences. Applying responsibility is almost impossible in this complex web of multiple actors, dislocated decision-making, organizations with high personnel turnovers, and the passage of time. While it is unrealistic to expect that international peacebuilding missions will retrospectively accept to be held accountable for the consequences of their actions, at the very least problematizing the issue of responsibility for consequences could serve to redirect the future conception of peacebuilding practices – moving from “authority-without-responsibility” to “authority-with-responsibility.” This suggests that there is a case to redefine the current nature and extent of responsibility, to reduce normative entitlements, and to reshape the legitimacy of international peacebuilders, as well as to critically review the extent to which such missions function in accordance with democratic standards. From the perspective of moral and consequentialist logic, the legitimacy and authority of the UN should be conditional on their willingness to accept responsibility for the spectrum of consequences produced by their purposive decisions and actions. In particular, the failure to prevent consequences, despite possessing the necessary authority, capacity, resources, and knowledge, presents a strong case and moral imperative to allocate the responsibility.

Summary

Current peacebuilding practices are characterized by a mismatch between good intentions and bad consequences. What were intended as liberal solutions to conflict outcomes often gave rise to other problems and triggered new illiberal responses and dynamics. A discussion of intentionality, consequences, and responsibility as guiding conceptual devices for assessing the impact of peacebuilding shows the complexity, multiplicity, nonlinearity, contingency and limitations of human agency, rationality, and materiality. International peacebuilders try to avoid encountering the unintended and negative impacts of their actions. The ontological politics of ignoring the consequences of peacebuilding are related to the desire to preserve the undeserved moral legitimacy of peacebuilding organizations while suppressing true encounters of failure and the desire to exercise power, to maintain dominant hierarchies of order, and to achieve externally constructed intentions. This indeed constitutes the immorality and carelessness of peacebuilding. Ignoring the registration of peacebuilding consequences leaves social events poorly explored, excludes impunity from responsibility, and dismisses the meaningful and corrective reformation of individual and collective agency. Moreover, peacebuilding consequences call into question the utilitarian good that liberal peacebuilding brings to post-conflict societies, revealing the disproportionality of good intentions and harmful consequences. Peacebuilding risks becoming a camouflaging enterprise, where intended outcomes are not pursued sufficiently, the potential pitfalls are not anticipated, the known irregularities are not prevented, and responsibility for the consequences is evaded. Current cultures and practices of peacebuilding are enshrined in Western ontologies and patronizing attitudes towards the local subjects, are driven by self-interest, are careless about the consequences of their actions, and shun responsibility for any harmful consequences.

The evidence presented above illustrates that liberal peacebuilding in the broader sense is neither capable of building a sustainable peace nor dealing with its consequences for a number of reasons including the following: peacebuilding's inherent pathologies related to normative and organizational inconsistencies; the linear and universalist repertoire of peacebuilding toolkits and rulebooks; undemocratic methods of operation; an orientation towards problem-solving; and a detachment from local needs, culture, and knowledge. Seen from the perspective of complex systems, current practices of building peace in post-conflict societies can be referred to as linear peacebuilding, whereby the desired outcomes are projected and predicted, and the implementation tends to follow logical frameworks and action plans, with evaluation being projected in a suitable fashion. In practice, liberal peacebuilding is projected prior to an intervention by agents who are detached from the place and context of engagement, thereby operating with insufficient knowledge regarding cultural sensitivity and local dynamics. Liberal peacebuilding disregards the contingent and contextual nature of events but rather applies technocratic considerations and anticipates practices based on comparison, embedded assumptions, the logic of "template thinking," and projecting expectation. Driven by the fallacy of efficiency and professionalism, adapting this projected linearity to local circumstances is seen as an organizational and competitive weakness. However, liberal peacebuilding does not leave space for preventive measures nor is it suitable in precautionary terms.

Peacebuilding should accept the persistence of uncertainty, the multiplicity of futures, the contingency of agency, the evaluative and incomplete nature of power, and the necessity for reflexive flexibility and the need to adjust policymaking process and institutional arrangements. Greater attention should be paid to the cultural sensitivity and nonlinearity of peacebuilding programs, the contextual suitability of the methods applied, and the strategic thought process that is invoked. A culture of precautionary reasoning should be installed throughout the life cycle of peacebuilding programs. Consideration of the potential consequences and side effects should be incorporated before, during, and after a peacebuilding program is implemented. If the spectrum of consequences is only encountered during the stage of program evaluation, it could be too late. Peacebuilding consequences are deeply contextual, and standardizing the lessons learnt may not be an effective tool for sharing knowledge. An understanding of the complexities of the uncertain consequences produced by any peacebuilding actions can lead to improving ethical practices and can increase the likelihood of delivering on the declared intentions. However, accepting and legitimizing uncertainty provides a perennial escape route for decision makers to explain why their best intentions failed to deliver. Equally, considering the risk of producing unintended consequences could mobilize the ability of peacebuilding actors and organizations to anticipate, prevent, and, when necessary, change or reverse the course of actions to avoid producing unintended consequences arising from their purposive actions. Under the conditions of the perceived risk of consequences and liability, peacebuilding agents and organizations can incentivize evaluating the outcomes and reflexively engaging in their peacebuilding activities – while preserving the emancipatory potential, freedom, equality, plurality, and coexistence with difference.

A critical impact assessment of peacebuilding shows that good intentions do not flow seamlessly into good actions and even less seamlessly into good outcomes. The rocky road to sustainable peace is dark and full of bends, twists, and turns. A systematic critique on the subject of the intentionality, consequences, and responsibility related to peacebuilding can articulate a new local critical perspective on peacebuilding. Although this reveals negative impacts, it can also serve as a cry to improve human agency, a call for change, and a call to be careful with peacebuilding, because it affects human lives and changes social structures. Surveying the mess created by past attempts to build peace, it is difficult to save liberal peacebuilding. New and less harmful alternative approaches to peacebuilding need to be developed to enshrine the right and responsibility to advance the cause of peace from a pluralist ontology and epistemology that accommodates difference and encounter complexity.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace

References

- Amnesty International (AI). (2003). Bosnia-Herzegovina: Shelving justice - war crimes prosecutions in paralysis (AI index: EUR 63/018/2003). London: Amnesty International.
- Anderson, M. B. (1999). Do no harm: How aid can support peace-or war. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Anderson, B. (2010). Preemption, precaution, preparedness: Anticipatory action and future geographies. Progress in Human Geography, 34(6), 778–779.
- Aoi, Ch, de Coning, C., & Thakur, R. (2007). Conclusion: Can unintended consequences be prevented, contained and managed? In C. Aoi, C. de Coning, & R. Thakur (Eds.), Unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations (pp. 268–279). Tokyo: United Nations University.
- Aradau, C., & Van Munster, R. (2011). Politics of catastrophe: Genealogies of the unknown. London: Routledge.
- Aradau, C., & Van Munster, R. (2012). The securitization of catastrophic events: Trauma, enactment, and preparedness exercises. Alternatives, 37(3), 227–239.
- Brady, S. (2012). Organized crime in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Sarajevo: Centre for Security Studies.
- Bratman, M. E. (2000). Reflection, planning, and temporally extended agency. The Philosophical Review, 109(1), 35–61.

- Bratman, M. E. (2007). Structures of agency: Essays. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Buzan, B., & Albert, M. (2010). Differentiation: A sociological approach to international relations theory. European Journal of International Relations, 20(10), 315–337.
- Campbell, J. K., et al. (Eds.). (2010). Action, ethics, and responsibility. Cambridge, MA: The MIT Press.
- Campbell, S., Chandler, D., & Sabaratnam, M. (Eds.). (2011). A liberal peace? The problems and practices of peacebuilding. London: Zed Books.
- Caplan, R. (2005). Who guards the guardians? International accountability in Bosnia. International Peacekeeping, 12(3), 463–476.
- Chandler, D. (Ed.). (2006). Peace without politics? Ten years of international state-building in Bosnia. London: Routledge.
- Chandler, D. (2010). Race, culture and civil society: Peacebuilding discourse and the understanding of difference. Security Dialogue, 41(4), 369–390.
- Chandler, D. (2013). Peacebuilding and the politics of nonlinearity: Rethinking ‘hidden’ agency and ‘resistance’. Peacebuilding, 1(1), 17–32.
- Charlesworth, H., & Coicaud, J. M. (Eds.). (2010). Fault lines of international legitimacy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Covey, J., Dziedzic, M., & Hawley, L. (Eds.). (2005). The quest for viable peace: International intervention and strategies for conflict transformation. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace.
- CSDG. (2003). A review of peace operations: A case for change. London: Conflict, Security and Development Group.
- David, C. P. (1999). Does peacebuilding build peace? Liberal (Mis)steps in the peace process. Security Dialogue, 3(1), 25–41.
- Diehl, P. F., & Druckman, D. (2010). Evaluating peace operations. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Doyle, M. W. (2005). Three pillars of the liberal peace. American Political Science Review, 99(3), 463–466.
- Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Erskine, T. (Ed.). (2003). Can institutions have responsibilities? Collective moral agency and international relations. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Fast, L. A., & Neufeldt, R. C. (2005). Envisioning success: Building blocks for strategic and comprehensive peacebuilding impact evaluation. Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 2(2), 24–41.
- Finnemore, M. (2004). The purpose of intervention: Changing beliefs about the use of force. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Fontan, V. (2012). Decolonizing peace. Doerzbach: Dignity Press.
- Hoolbrooke, R. (1999). To end a war. New York: Random House.
- Human Rights Watch (HRW). (2006). Looking for justice: The War crimes chamber in Bosnia and Herzegovina, 18, 1(D). Sarajevo: Human Rights Watch.
- Hurley, P. (2009). Beyond consequentialism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jervis, R. (1997). Complexity and the analysis of political and social life. Political Science Quarterly, 12(4), 569–593.
- Jett, D. (1999). Why peacekeeping fails. New York: Palgrave.
- KIPRED. (2012). Grass-root approaches to inter-ethnic reconciliation in the Northern Part of Kosovo. (Policy paper series 2012/03). Prishtina: KIPRED.
- Lund, M. S. (2002). From lessons to action. In F. Hampson & D. Malone (Eds.), From reaction to conflict prevention: Opportunities for the UN system (pp. 159–184). Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2012). Routine peace: Technocracy and peacebuilding. Cooperation and Conflict, 47(3), 287–308.
- Merton, R. K. (1936). The unanticipated consequences of purposive social action. American Sociological Review, 1(6), 898–902.
- Mitchell, S. (2009). Unsimple truths: Science, complexity and policy. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Novoseloff, A. (2000). Revitalizing the United Nations: Anticipation and prevention as primary goals. Foresight, 2(1), 95–111.
- Odendaal, A. (2013). A crucial link: Local peace committees and national peacebuilding. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace.
- Orwell, G. (1968). Politics and the English language. In S. Orwell & I. Angos (Eds.), The collected essays, journalism, and letters of George Orwell. New York: Harcourt.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Perrow, Ch. (1986). Complex organizations: A critical essay (3rd ed.). New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Pushkina, D. (2006). A recipe for success? Ingredients of a successful peacekeeping mission. International Peacekeeping, 13(2), 133–149.
- Rees, E. (2002). Security-sector reform and transitional administrations. Conflict, Security and Development, 2(1), 151–156.
- Reichberg, G., & Syse, H. (2004). The idea of double effect – In war and business. In L. Bomann-Larsen & O. Wiggen (Eds.), Responsibility in world business: Managing harmful side-effects of corporate activity (pp. 17–38). Tokyo: UN University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (Ed.). (2010). Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2014). Failed statebuilding: Intervention, the state, and the dynamics of peace formation. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2019). Human rights and the development of a twenty-first century peace architecture: Unintended consequences? Australian Journal of International Affairs, 73(1), 45–63.

- Ricigliano, R. (2003). Networks of effective action: Implementing an integrated approach to peacebuilding. Security Dialogue, 34(4), 445–462.
- Rupesinghe, K., & Anderlini, S. N. (1998). Civil wars, civil peace: An introduction to conflict resolution. London: Pluto Press.
- Scambray, J. (2011). Anatomy of a conflict: The 2006–7 communal violence in Timor-Leste. In V. Harris & A. Goldsmith (Eds.), Security, development and nation-building in Timor-Leste: A cross-sectoral assessment (pp. 59–79). London: Routledge.
- Schneckener, U. (2010). Unintended consequences of international statebuilding. In C. Daase & C. Friesendorf (Eds.), Rethinking security governance: The problem of unintended consequences (pp. 62–81). London: Routledge.
- Searle, J. R. (1983). Intentionality: An essay in the philosophy of mind. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Searle, J. R. (2010). Making the social world: The structure of human civilization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, L. T. (2012). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and indigenous peoples. London: Zed Books.
- United Nations (UN). (2000). Report of the panel on United Nations peace operations, UN Doc. A/55/305-S/2000/809, 21 August.
- United Nations (UN). (2004). Progress report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor, UN Doc. S/2004/888, 9 November.
- United Nations (UN). (2009). Report of the Secretary-General on peacebuilding in the immediate aftermath of conflict, UN Doc. A/63/881–S/2009/304, 11 June.
- United Nations (UN). (2010). Report of the Secretary-General on peacebuilding in the immediate aftermath of conflict. UN Doc. A/64/866–S/2010/386, 16 July.
- United Nations (UN). (2014). Secretary-General's remarks at the security council open debate on "United Nations peacekeeping: Regional partnership and its evolution", New York, 28 July.
- Visoka, G. (2012). The 'Kafkaesque accountability' of international governance in Kosovo. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 6(2), 189–212.
- Visoka, G. (2016a). Peace figuration after international intervention: Intentions, events and consequences of liberal peacebuilding. London: Routledge.
- Visoka, G. (2016b). Peace is what we make of it? Peace-shaping events and 'non-events'. Peacebuilding, 4(1), 54–70.
- Visoka, G. (2017). Shaping peace in Kosovo: The politics of peacebuilding and statehood. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Visoka, G. (2018). Agents of peace: Place, identity and peacebuilding. In C. Agius & D. Keep (Eds.), Identity making, displacement and rupture: Performing discourses of belonging, place and being (pp. 71–87). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Visoka, G. (2020a). Everyday peace capture: Nationalism and the dynamics of peace after violent conflict. Nations and Nationalism, 26(2), 431–446.
- Visoka, G. (2020b). International intervention and relational legitimacy. In O. P. Richmond & R. Mac Ginty (Eds.), Local legitimacy and international peacebuilding (pp. 44–68). Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Visoka, G., & Doyle, J. (2014). Peacebuilding and international responsibility. International Peacekeeping, 21(5), 673–692.
- Visoka, G., & Musliu, V. (Eds.). (2019). Unravelling liberal interventionism: Local critiques of statebuilding in Kosovo. London: Routledge.
- Visoka, G., & Richmond, O. P. (2017). After liberal peace? From failed statebuilding to an emancipatory peace in Kosovo. International Studies Perspectives, 18(1), 110–129.
- Weiss, T. G. (2012). What's wrong with the United Nations and how to fix it. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Zartman, W. (Ed.). (2001). Preventive negotiation: Avoiding conflict escalation. New York: Rowman & Little Field Publishers.

Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach

Walter Lotze
Harvard Kennedy School of Government,
Boston, MA, USA

Synonyms

PCRD; Peacebuilding; Post-conflict reconstruction and development; Post-conflict recovery

Introduction

In recent decades, understandings of peacebuilding have been significantly influenced by former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali's 1992 report An Agenda for Peace. This conceptual framework attempted to chart the way forward on thinking within the United Nations and among member states that addressing conflict in the world should focus on three phases of engagement. First, the United Nations would prevent conflict, through preventive diplomacy or other means (conflict prevention). Second, where this failed or was not possible, the organization would work to attain peace agreements and deploy missions to support the implementation of these agreements (peacemaking and peacekeeping). Third, where peace agreements were in place and hostilities had ceased, the United Nations would support the consolidation of peace and prevent a relapse into conflict (peacebuilding) (United Nations 1992).

Peacebuilding approaches in the United Nations and the African Union have to a degree both evolved from this basis, but they have also developed in distinct ways in the decades since. In the United Nations, peacebuilding is generally understood as efforts designed to assist countries and regions in their transitions from conflict and to reduce the risk of relapse into conflict, by strengthening national capacities for conflict management and laying the foundations for sustainable peace and development (United Nations 2019). A more structured approach to the organization's peacebuilding efforts has been developed from 2005 onward, following the establishment of the Peacebuilding Commission, the Peacebuilding Fund, and the Peacebuilding Support Office. In the context of the African Union, the approach to peacebuilding, both conceptually and operationally, has evolved in a somewhat different direction, driven both by the organization's own evolution from the mid-2000s onward and by its initial experiences in addressing peace and security matters on the African continent.

The AU's Peacebuilding Policy Framework, Main Concepts, and Toolbox

The Constitutive Act of the African Union, which was adopted in July 2000, paved the way for the Organisation of African Unity to transition into the African Union, and laid the foundation for the future work of the organization at the continental level. The Constitutive Act outlined the objectives of the African Union, among which were the promotion of peace, security, and stability on the African continent (African Union 2000, p. 5). To give meaning to this particular objective, African states in 2002, the year in which the African Union was officially established, adopted the Protocol Relating to the Establishment of the Peace and Security Council of the African Union (PSC Protocol). The Protocol did two important things. First, it provided for the establishment of the Peace and Security Council, a 15-member body mandated to address threats to peace and security in Africa, with membership being both rotational and representative of the five agreed geographic regions of the continent. Second, the Protocol envisioned that the Council be supported in its work by the Chairperson of the AU Commission, a Panel of the Wise, a Continental Early Warning System, an African Standby Force, and a Special Fund (African Union 2002, p. 5). This has since evolved into what is now commonly called the African Peace and Security Architecture, which entails the tools and mechanisms through which the Assembly of the African Union or the Peace and Security Council can prevent, respond to, and manage crisis and conflict situations in Africa. The architecture consists of early warning (through the Continental Early Warning Mechanism and similar arrangements at regional levels), prevention (good offices by the Chairperson or the Panel of the Wise, or mediation efforts by appointed envoys), operational deployments (the deployment of peace support operations, security operations undertaken by coalitions of member states, or other forms of operational deployments), peacebuilding efforts (through the post-conflict reconstruction and development framework, and by deploying political and technical missions), and a dedicated financing mechanism to fund these peace and security initiatives, known as the Africa Peace Fund.

The Protocol took a specific view on how peacebuilding was to be understood in the African context, and in the work of the African Union, by outlining that the role of the Council in post-conflict situations was to assist in the restoration of the rule of law; the establishment and development of democratic institutions; and the preparation, organization, and supervision of elections. A differentiation was made however between situations where hostilities were still ongoing and situations where hostilities had ended. In contexts of ongoing hostilities, priority was to be given to measures designed to reduce the impact of the conflict on the social and economic conditions of the affected populations. In contexts where hostilities had ended, priority was to be given to the implementation of peace agreements which had been negotiated; the political, social, and economic reconstruction of the society and government institutions; the implementation of disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration programs; the resettlement and reintegration of refugees and internally displaced persons; and assistance to vulnerable persons, including children, the elderly, women, and groups specifically affected by the conflict (African Union 2002, p. 22).

In 2006, the African Union published its Policy on Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development, the first guidance on how peacebuilding efforts in the African context were to be undertaken. While using the provisions of the PSC Protocol as its foundation, the policy framework noted that it was important to go even further by making a distinct link between peacebuilding, post-conflict reconstruction and development, and long-term sustainable development (African Union 2006, p. 1). A shift was therefore made, whereby the AU understanding of peacebuilding as had been formulated in the PSC Protocol was now expanded to also include physical reconstruction and post-conflict economic recovery, in support of accelerating long-term development in a country emerging from conflict. Here, then, the AU explicitly linked its peace and security agenda with its development agenda, with the post-conflict reconstruction and development policy framework serving as a bridge connecting the two.

Accordingly, the organization defined its version of peacebuilding, subsequently known as post-conflict reconstruction and developments, as follows:

A comprehensive set of measures that seek to: address the needs of countries emerging from conflict, including the needs of affected populations; prevent escalation of disputes; avoid relapse into violence; address the root causes of conflict; and consolidate sustainable peace. PCRD is conceived within the African vision of renewal and sustainable development and while its activities are integrated, and many must be pursued simultaneously, they are envisaged in the emergency (short-term), transition (medium-term) and development (long-term) phases. (African Union 2006, pp. 4–5)

The policy framework outlined five core principles for all post-conflict reconstruction and development work, these being (1) African leadership; (2) national and local ownership; (3) inclusiveness, equity, and nondiscrimination; (4) cooperation and cohesion; and (5) capacity-building for sustainability. The policy also envisioned six broad areas of engagement (security; humanitarian/emergency assistance; political governance and transition; socioeconomic reconstruction and development; human rights, justice, and reconciliation; and women and gender) and outlined the activities which the organization could undertake in each field when engaging in a conflict or post-conflict setting (African Union 2006, p. 5). The inclusion of humanitarian and emergency assistance in the PCRD policy was somewhat unusual, as traditionally the provision of humanitarian assistance had been a distinct area of engagement, not tied to political or development agendas. Nevertheless, the AU argued that delivering humanitarian assistance could provide key linkages to larger peacebuilding efforts and that “while focusing on urgent life-saving and life-sustaining assistance, humanitarian assistance must link with the subsequent phases of the post-conflict reconstruction and development process” (African Union 2006, p. 13).

In the years since the adoption of the PCRD policy, several steps have been taken by the AU Commission to be able to implement the policy, based on the direction of the Chairperson, the Peace and Security Council, or the Assembly. First, a Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development Unit was created within the Peace and Security Department of the Commission, to give dedicated attention and follow-up to the PCRD agenda politically and to plan and supervise PCRD implementation in conflict and post-conflict contexts. Second, the AU Commission undertook a series of multidisciplinary assessments to countries in conflict or emerging from conflict, to lay the foundations for the planning of structured engagements in each particular context. Third, funds were mobilized and allocated for the implementation of Quick Impact Projects (QIPs) and Peace Strengthening Projects (PSPs), which would enable the delivery of rapid, tangible peace dividends to communities emerging from conflict while the longer-term peacebuilding and post-conflict reconstruction efforts got underway. Fourth, the African Solidarity Initiative was established, designed to mobilize technical cooperation and other forms of assistance among African countries in support of PCRDR activities, whereby African states with relevant experience and resources would help other African states emerging from conflict. Fifth, Liaison Offices were established in conflict and post-conflict countries, to enable the AU to have more sustained presence and engagement in priority countries. It should be noted that while the establishment of these offices was not purely for the purpose of PCRDR efforts, they were viewed as a key entry point for both conflict prevention and peacebuilding efforts in priority countries. And finally, the AU has in recent years either mandated the establishment of small political missions to replace peace support operations that have drawn down in countries where the organization has determined that a sustained political presence to support PCRDR efforts was required or deployed technical support missions with explicit PCRDR mandates.

While a number of activities were undertaken since the adoption of the PCRDR policy, these were often found to lack sufficient strategic coherence, conceptual clarity, and operational guidance. Accordingly, in 2018 the AU Commission released a Guidelines Note for the Implementation of the African Union Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development Policy. The guidelines attempted to bring greater conceptual clarity to how the AU's peacebuilding efforts were to be understood and how these were to be implemented in practice. They also served to refine the contexts in which such efforts would be undertaken. Specifically, the AU's PCRDR efforts going forward were to be undertaken (1) when there was a settlement to a crisis, (2) when a peace agreement was in place, and (3) when an internationally recognized government, or a party that considered to be legitimately in control of an affected territory, cooperates with the AU, a sub-regional organization, the United Nations, and/or another security initiative to promote stability (African Union 2018, p. 11). The guidelines also for the first time offered specific guidance on roles, responsibilities, and work processes for PCRDR efforts undertaken by the African Union, or for similar efforts at the level of subregional organizations, member states, and civil society organizations wishing to make use of, and operate within the context of, the AU PCRDR framework.

The AU has therefore over the years developed an increasingly complex set of tools and mechanisms to implement the peacebuilding provisions of the PSC Protocol and the PCRDR policy, enabling the Chairperson of the Commission, the Peace and Security Council, and the Assembly to actively follow-up and take timely decisions on peacebuilding issues in conflict and post-conflict countries. In practice, the AU's record of peacebuilding activities and interventions has only slowly been evolving in recent years and is continuously being refined. Key insights and lessons are being drawn from the organization's initial set of experiences, and what the organization takes from these will be crucial toward determining the way forward when it comes to peacebuilding in Africa.

Initial Peacebuilding/PCRDR Efforts and Lessons Learned

Even before the African Union's peacebuilding architecture started to take shape, the organization committed itself to supporting post-conflict reconstruction efforts in Sudan, by supporting the implementation of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement which was being negotiated for that country. In 2003, 2 years before the agreement was signed and 1 year after the African Union was formally launched, an African Union Ministerial Committee for PCRDR for Sudan was formed. It was mandated to assess, in consultation with the parties to the peace agreement, the scale and scope of requirements in post-conflict Sudan; to mobilize African support for post-conflict reconstruction and development needs; and to sensitize all external stakeholders on the post-conflict and reconstruction needs of Sudan (African Union 2019a).

Following its initial focus on Sudan, the African Union undertook multidisciplinary assessment missions to other countries emerging from conflict, including to the Central African Republic (2006), Liberia (2009), Sierra Leone (2009), the Democratic Republic of the Congo (2010), Burundi (2010), Sudan (2011), and again the Central African Republic (2016) (African Union, 2019). Over the subsequent years, Liaison Offices were also established in Burundi, Chad, the Central African Republic, the Comoros, Côte d'Ivoire, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Libya, Madagascar, Sudan, South Sudan, and the Western Sahara (African Union 2019b). Funding for QIPs was also mobilized for projects in Liberia, Côte d'Ivoire, the Comoros, and South Sudan (African Union 2019a).

The African Union's focus on the political and local aspects of peacebuilding was in line with evolving thinking on sustaining peace in the long term and with moving away from programmatic and technical responses. However, as some observers have argued, in the first decade of implementation the organization's PCRD efforts suffered from a preoccupation with resource mobilization and PCRD projects and were not sufficiently focused on the core value it could have added, the focus on African solidarity, and mobilizing resources for the continent from within the continent (de Carvalho et al. 2016, pp. 5–6).

Steps toward reinforcing the African Union's political role in peacebuilding processes in fragile contexts were made in later years when the organization deployed political missions mandated to support the consolidation of peace following the handover of African Union peace support operations to the United Nations in Mali and the Central African Republic. In Mali, the AU Mission for Mali and the Sahel (MISAHEL) was established in 2013, and in the Central African Republic, the AU Mission for Central Africa and the CAR (MISAC) was established in 2014, after the African Union had handed over peacekeeping responsibilities to the United Nations in both countries.

A new innovation was also launched in 2018, when the African Union deployed the first so-called technical support mission in the Gambia (known as the AU Technical Support to the Gambia, AUTSTG), an operation specifically designed to undertake conflict prevention and peace-strengthening measures within the context of the organization's peacebuilding efforts.

The establishment of these missions was an important signal of the increasing importance which the organization was giving to its political role and leverage in support of sustained progress toward peace in countries where it had deployed and drawn down its own peace support operations, or where a specific type of operational deployment in support of PCRD objectives was required. These experiences continue to yield important lessons for peacebuilding and the implementation of the AU's PCRD policy. In the Central African Republic, for instance, one review drew five important lessons (de Carvalho and Lucey 2016). First, the impact of the African Union in its peacebuilding efforts could be seen most clearly in its convening capacity. Second, the African Union's mandate to engage on PCRD activities in the CAR was not sufficiently defined to maximize the organization's impact in this area. Third, despite growing interest in the role of the organization in the country, African Union-led initiatives were not sufficiently linked. Fourth, coordination between the African Union presence in the country and the Commission could have been stronger. And fifth, the African Union and other international actors, in particular the United Nations, could have enhanced their coordination to better support peacebuilding efforts in the CAR. Interesting lessons are also emerging from the organization's efforts in the Gambia. Instead of opening a liaison office or deploying a political mission, the African Union chose to deploy a small, technical support team staffed by personnel seconded from its member states, focused on supporting the Gambian authorities in the rule of law, democracy, transitional justice, and the transformation of the security sector. Whether the approach will be replicated in other settings going forward remains to be seen.

In recent years the cooperation between the African Union and the United Nations on peacebuilding has also been strengthened. In 2016 the UN Peacebuilding Fund for the first time financed the conduct of African Union activities, when it supported the deployment of African Union human rights observers to Burundi (African Union 2016a). Both organizations have subsequently been exploring modalities to deepen the working relationship between the two organizations with regard to peacebuilding and PCRDR efforts in numerous countries.

The Way Forward

The African Union has increasingly worked both to develop conceptual clarity and a policy framework guiding its approach to post-conflict reconstruction and development and has been accumulating an increasingly diverse set of experiences in the application of the PCRDR mechanisms and tools which have been developed in African countries in conflict or emerging from conflict. The lessons from these experiences will be key toward shaping the manner in which the organization's PCRDR efforts will evolve in the future. Several aspects may be revisited in the years to come.

First, greater conceptual clarity could be beneficial. The African Union's PCRDR work is not always well understood by member states, by outside actors, or by stakeholders involved in PCRDR efforts in priority countries. A clearer articulation of how the organization views peacebuilding, and how it sees its own role in this process, could be useful. Tied to this is a need for broader strategic linkages to the aims and objectives of the organization. The African Union is, for instance, working to Silence the Guns by 2020 and is targeting an ambitious development agenda through what is known as Agenda 2063. Linking PCRDR efforts more clearly to these agendas, and outlining the interlinkages between these various efforts, could be useful.

Second, clearly articulating and reinforcing those areas where the African Union has the greatest added value in peacebuilding processes could serve to strengthen the role and impact of the organization in its efforts. This would allow the organization both to focus its resources and to leverage its impact. Investing in, and clearly demonstrating the value which the African Solidarity Initiative can bring, both politically and as a platform whereby African states provide technical assistance to other African states could prove an important added value to peacebuilding efforts in Africa going forward.

Third, the establishment of the mandated peacebuilding bodies in the African Union could prove an important debate going forward. Although a PCRDR subcommittee of the Peace and Security Council should have been established, this has to date not been made operational. The African Union Multi-Dimensional Standing Committee on PCRDR is also not yet in place (African Union 2016b, p. 3). Establishing these bodies could contribute toward greater political guidance and oversight of PCRDR activities and greater member states buy-in and support for specific initiatives. Such bodies could also prove useful counterparts for engagement with external stakeholders, such as the UN Peacebuilding Commission.

Fourth, ways of strengthening internal cohesion on peacebuilding issues may need to be explored. In 2016 a PCRDR Task Force was established to do this, and the impact has been positive so far. Nevertheless, strengthening coherence and coordination within the AU Commission, between the Commission and field presences and between the African Peace and Security Architecture and the African Governance Architecture on peacebuilding and PCRDR matters would enable the African Union to strengthen its impact overall.

Fifth, reinforcing cooperation and coordination between the African Union and the African sub-regional organizations (the so-called Regional Economic Communities [RECs] and Regional Mechanisms [RMs]) could prove useful. In 2008 a Memorandum of Understanding on cooperation in peace and security was signed between these organizations, and specific mention of cooperation in the area of PCRDR was made. The implementation of these efforts has however not been consistent to date and may receive additional attention going forward.

And sixth, reinforcing cooperation and coordination with other stakeholders engaged in supporting peacebuilding efforts in Africa could prove beneficial. In particular, the United Nations, the European Union, the World Bank, and the African Development Bank have emerged as key peacebuilding actors in various African conflict and post-conflict countries. Developing the institutional modalities for working together on peacebuilding and PCRD efforts in the country would enable greater coherence and unity of effort and would also enable the African Union to leverage its own efforts in those countries where it is actively supporting peacebuilding processes.

References

- African Union. (2000). Constitutive Act of the African Union. Addis Ababa: African Union.
- African Union. (2002). Protocol relating to the establishment of the African peace and security council. Addis Ababa: African Union.
- African Union. (2006). Policy on Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development (PCRD). 1 July.
- African Union. (2016a) Press release on PBF support to AU in Burundi: UN peacebuilding fund finances African Union human rights observers in Burundi. 3 May 2016. Available at: <http://www.peaceau.org/en/article/press-release-on-pbf-support-to-au-in-burundi-un-peacebuilding-fund-finances-african-union-human-rights-observers-in-burundi>
- African Union. (2016b) “Remarks by Dr. Alhaji Sarjoh Bah, Head Crisis Management and Post Conflict and Reconstruction Division, at the AU Commission Roundtable on Developing a Roadmap and Inter-Departmental Task Force for the Implementation of AU PCRD Policy”. 18 May 2016. Available at: <http://www.peaceau.org/uploads/task-force-statement-final-ii.pdf>. African Union, 2006. Policy on Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development (PCRD).
- African Union. (2018). Guidelines note for the implementation of the African Union post-conflict reconstruction and development policy. October.
- African Union. (2019a). African Union Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development (PCRD). Accessible at: <http://www.peaceau.org/en/page/70-post-conflict-reconstruction>. Last updated 23 Nov 2015.
- African Union. (2019b). “AU Liaison Offices”. Accessible at: <http://www.peaceau.org/en/page/103-liaison-offices>. Last updated 25 Oct 2016.
- de Carvalho, G., & Lucey, A. (2016). “Fractured peacebuilding in the Central African Republic – Lessons for African Union engagement”. Institute for Security Studies. Policy brief no 87. July.
- de Carvalho, G., de Coning, C., & Ahere, J. (2016). “The African Union (AU) Post Conflict Reconstruction and Development (PCRD) Framework: The First Ten Years”. Background Paper. AU PCRD Workshop. 19–21 October 2016. Available at: https://www.academia.edu/31289523/The_African_Union_AU_Post-Conflict_Reconstruction_and_Development_PCRD_Framework_The_First_Ten_Years
- United Nations. (1992). “An Agenda for peace – Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping. Report of the secretary-general pursuant to the Statement adopted by the Summit Meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992”. A/47/277 – S/24111. 17 June.
- United Nations. (2019). Peace and security. 31 August. Available at: <https://www.un.org/en/sections/issues-depth/peace-and-security/>

Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality

David Chandler

University of Westminster, London, UK

Introduction

Twenty years of international peacebuilding have demonstrated a shift from liberal internationalist hopes for new externally constructed post-conflict domestic orders to a more realist or pragmatic view of the powers of external interveners. Rather than separate case studies, this entry considers the changes in the understanding of the peacebuilding project itself: tracing the shift from the liberal internationalist assumptions of the late 1990s to the pragmatic realism of today. It does this through the lenses of EH Carr’s classic work The Twenty Years’ Crisis, UN policy thinking on the problematic assumptions of international peacebuilding, and the diagnoses in David Lake’s (2016) book The Statebuilder’s Dilemma, which sets out three pragmatic alternatives. The entry concludes that all three of these alternatives can be seen in practice today.

Twenty Year’s Crisis

The shift from “utopian” to “realist” or pragmatic approaches to peacebuilding cannot be grasped without quickly describing the rise of peacebuilding in the decade of the 1990s. In this decade, the framework of international sovereignty and of nonintervention rapidly corroded, opening up a new international agenda based on the blurring of domestic and international realms. Peacebuilding was no longer a matter of international relations based on sovereign equality but one premised on the selective opening up of the domestic realm to international regulation and external conditionalities. While the UN Secretary-General's 1992 Agenda for Peace introduced the concept of "post-conflict peacebuilding" as an ad hoc extension of international peacekeeping (UN 1992), it was not until after the interventions in the wars of the breakup of the former Yugoslavia and the establishment of formalized international peacebuilding regimes that the UN was able to clarify the meaning of peacebuilding and the transformed nature of its relationship to international peacekeeping.

The September 2000 UN Millennium Assembly confirmed the need for a fundamental reform of UN peacekeeping operations. This reform was shaped by the "utopian" liberal internationalist discourse that had cohered throughout the 1990s, no longer strictly bound by traditional "realist" "state-centered" principles, such as nonintervention and state sovereignty. The UN Secretary-General's Millennium Report, "We the Peoples," started the formal process of revising the UN's approach to peace operations after criticism of UN peacekeeping failures in Rwanda, Bosnia, and Sierra Leone in the 1990s and NATO action over Kosovo which bypassed Security Council controls. As the Millennium Report noted in its introduction: "No shift in the way we think or act can be more critical than this: we must put people at the centre of everything we do" (UN 2000a, p. 7). The report noted that a "new understanding of the concept of security is evolving" (2000a, p. 43). International security during the Cold War was "synonymous with the defence of territory from external attack" and was bound up with the principle of state sovereignty and its corollary of nonintervention (UN 2000a, p. 43).

However, the post-Cold War conception of international security was to be different: "The requirements of security today have come to embrace the protection of communities and individuals from internal violence," far from upholding sovereignty and the principle of nonintervention the demands of international security were deemed to necessitate a fundamental rethinking of the UN's strategy (2000a, p. 43). The Secretary-General described this new strategy as a "more human-centered approach to security" as distinct from the previous "state-centered" approach (ibid.). This Report was followed by the Brahimi Report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations, detailing further proposals for reform, which was ratified at the UN Millennium Summit in New York in September 2000 (UN 2000b).

This entry analyzes the 20 years of international peacebuilding, since the highpoint of optimism with the international protectorates of Bosnia and Kosovo in the late 1990s. In doing so, it is useful to reflect upon EH Carr's classic work on international relations theory and interwar history, The Twenty Years' Crisis 1919–1939: An Introduction to the Study of International Relations (Carr [1939] 1981). Carr's book was originally intended to be titled Utopia and Reality (Cox 2001, p. xi) (which the publishers found to be too abstract) indicating that the 20 years' crisis of the title was not merely about a series of problems or an ongoing set of issues, but rather concerned a secular trend, a contestation between two approaches and a shift from one way of thinking to another: from an idealist, utopian, abstract, morality-based view of liberal universalism to a more strategic, pragmatic, and interest-based "science" of realism, starting from the world as it exists rather than how we would like it to be. The suggestion of the analysis here is that peacebuilding is now understood as having taken a similar trajectory, starting off as a liberal (today most commentators would also say idealist or utopian) project and ending up in a "realist" or pragmatist mode of resignation and disillusionment.

Carr himself had little at stake in this shift, apart from to highlight that it indicated the ideological nature of international relations itself as a discrete body of thought, which he saw as merely a pseudo-discipline, aping other social sciences and designed to rationalize the exercise of power of dominant nations over weaker ones (Cox 2001, p. xiii). Likewise, there is little to celebrate in the end of liberal peacebuilding as an international framework of problem-solving: the shift from a “utopia” of externally engineered transformation to a “reality” of pragmatism and monitoring from EU agencies keen to keep both Bosnia and Kosovo at arm’s length (Kosovo is still excluded from visa liberalization and both are a long way from formal EU integration). The shift in fortunes of international peacebuilding in Kosovo – from the exaggerated, even hubristic, demands for transformation to an idealized liberal model under direct management of the UN and NATO to today’s arm’s-length management and mediated and indirect regulation through a host of often ad hoc international agencies – reflects broader trends of international intervention, where agencies often retreat to aerial drones and crowdsourced monitoring from afar (Lynch 2016; Pugliese 2016; Duffield 2019).

Carr’s study started with the triumphalism of the US entry into international politics at the Versailles peace conference following the First World War, and he clearly had little sympathy for the moral crusading liberal idealism in the cause of US interests, personified by US President Woodrow Wilson. The interwar period of The Twenty Years’ Crisis was the story of the collapse of liberal international idealism, which was dealt a major blow by the world economic collapse of 1929 that rekindled open inter-imperialist rivalries, leading rapidly to the resumption of World War. The 20 years’ crisis of international peacebuilding does not have the drama on the world scale of the interwar period but holds some similarities to Carr’s story of disappointment and disillusionment in liberal internationalism driven by a “voluntarist” moral idealism in the service of power politics. The repeat of a new internationalist moral moment with the end of the Cold War was also short-lived and contested, and the new “realism,” that is, the upshot of failures of the grand schemes of international intervention, can equally be seen as a sterile deterministic “codification of the status quo.”

However, there are, of course, major differences. Carr’s The Twenty Years’ Crisis was driven by the breakdown of the fragile international order established with the League of Nations, damaged by US isolationism and the exclusion of major powers Germany and the Soviet Union. The auspices for success for international peacebuilding, under a US, UN, and NATO guided international order in the 1990s, seemed much more promising. Ironically, it was not international rivalries that undermined liberal interventionist dreams of international peacebuilding as much as a grand retreat from the international sphere itself. This retreat can be articulated in the words of Carr as “consistent realism,” a realism that “fails to provide any ground for purpose or meaningful action” (Carr 1981, p. 86). The idealism of the 1990s may have evaporated but no positive vision has taken its place.

The End of Statebuilding

In 2000, at the height of the United Nation’s confidence in the transformation of the international agenda, in the Brahimi Report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations, presented by the United Nation’s Secretary-General, Section A, “Defining the elements of peace operations,” defined the new concept of peacebuilding in these terms, as:

...activities undertaken on the far side of conflict to reassemble the foundations of peace and provide the tools for building on those foundations something that is more than just the absence of war. Thus, peacebuilding includes but is not limited to reintegrating former combatants into civilian society, strengthening the rule of law (for example, through training and restructuring of local police, and judicial and penal reform); improving respect for human rights through the monitoring, education and investigation of past and existing abuses; providing technical assistance for democratic development (including electoral assistance and support for free media); and promoting conflict resolution and reconciliation techniques. (UN 2000b, p. 3)

The definition was kept open with a non-inclusive list of examples of international peacebuilding responsibilities listed, covering a wide range of institutional capacity-building measures covering everything from the legal and political system to education and health and welfare.

In 2019, peacebuilding is no longer a term on the international agenda. Even the United Nations has shifted away from the use of this terminology. The UN's shift away from peacebuilding to much more flexible and pragmatic approaches stems from a rejection of the interventionist approaches developed and popularized in the 1990s and now seen to be based on "supply-driven templates and an overly technocratic focus on capitals and elites" and counterproductively increasing "the risk of unintentionally exacerbating divisions" (UN 2015a, p. 12). In fact, the UN report of the advisory group of experts for the 2015 review of the United Nations Peacebuilding Architecture went as far as to state that mistakes had resulted from no less than "a generalized misunderstanding of the nature of peacebuilding" itself (UN 2015b, p. 7). Instead, pragmatism has increasingly become the order of the day with the call for "more realistic and contextualized political strategies" (UN 2015a, p. 13).

Peacebuilding has been eased off the policy agenda on the grounds that there is no longer the assumption of clarity in terms of problems or solutions, as the UN's High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations review stated "there is no linear path to peace" (UN 2015a, p. 18); "complex linkages" and interconnections between actors and intervening agencies mean that the UN needs less focus on "template mandates and missions" and instead more emphasis upon fluid and flexible "situation-specific" strategies (ibid, p. 23). The idea that external actors can either develop solutions or implement them on their ground has been undermined by the reality that "conflicts have become more complex, increasingly fragmented and intractable" (UN 2015b, p. 7).

The UN no longer wants to set itself up as the external expert and manager of processes of transitional "peacebuilding" but rather seeks to increasingly situate itself as part of domestic processes of support and facilitation. This pragmatic approach, working with and through local processes:

...demands that United Nations personnel in the field engage with and relate to the people and communities they are asked to support. The legacy of the "white-SUV culture" must give way to a more human face that prioritizes closer interaction with local people to better understand their concerns, needs and aspirations. (UN 2015a, p. 30)

The UN has thus moved to distance itself from "peacebuilding" and toward stressing peace as sustainability and local legitimacy rather than as an externally led transformation conforming to preconceived goals and attained through externally managed social and political engineering:

Peacebuilding is not State-building... Countries emerging from conflict are not blank pages and their people are not "projects". They are the main agents of peace. However, the international approach is often based on generic models that ignore national realities... Efforts to sustain peace must build upon [local] institutions and the resilience and reconciliation processes of local communities, and not undermine them... When countries set out their priorities and they enjoy strong national support, they must be respected. Too often they are not. (UN 2015a, p. 48)

Peacebuilding has been rejected by the UN because it has been understood to be too linear and too reductionist. Today it may be alleged that "peacebuilding" is not "statebuilding" but this has not always been the case and the two concepts seem to be intimately connected and are often used interchangeably, largely because the UN itself conceptualized peacebuilding as the building or rebuilding of states. "Statebuilding as peacebuilding" made a lot of easy assumptions that something that was broken could be easily fixed, returning societies to the status quo or establishing a new one on the basis of the liberal institutions of democracy, the rule of law, and market efficiency. The focus upon liberal institutional frameworks was the cornerstone of peacebuilding conceived as a liberal internationalist project. This project is now over.

Today, the UN argues that the focus on building liberal institutions was mistaken for two key reasons (UN 2015b, p. 17). First, that rather than peacebuilding occurring after conflict, problems have to be engaged with along an "arc" or continuum, from prevention to reconstruction: sustaining peace is a complex process not a set of discrete linear stages, calling for different institutional operations and sets of expertise. Second, and relatedly, peacebuilding had implied that peace could be built according to some universal set of policies to be implemented, rather than through engaging in complex, interrelated, and crosscutting policy concerns which are always going to be case specific, involving going beyond policy and expertise “silos” in order to “unite the peace and security, human rights and development ‘pillars’ of the UN” (UN 2015b, p. 8). In short, the policy space of what was called “peacebuilding” no longer exists as a distinct set of goals, techniques, practices, and expertise, separate to UN activities put in a more holistic policy context of the UN’s Sustainable Development Goals (UN 2015b, p. 57). The “crisis” of peacebuilding seems to have been resolved through the development of a new pragmatist consensus.

The “Hubris” of Liberal Peacebuilding

From the position of looking back from 2019, the initial assumptions of international peacebuilding seem to have been the product of accident, of hubris, and of a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of peace, of politics, and of the unintended consequences of external policy interventions. This did not seem to be the case in the late 1990s when the policy discourse of peacebuilding was central to what was seen to be a new liberal international order, with the end of the Cold War division. In the closing years of the Cold War and into the early 1990s, the UN began to extend post-conflict missions and peacekeeping mandates of ceasefire monitoring in ways which began to be openly political, interfering directly in civilian matters including constitutional, judicial, and electoral reforms, for example, in the UN-led missions deployed in Namibia, Angola, El Salvador, Cambodia, and Mozambique (see Doyle and Sambanis 2006).

With the end of the Cold War, there was a new sense of optimism regarding the international liberal order, and the idea of peacebuilding began to formalize with the UN Secretary-General’s Agenda for Peace report of 1992. Paragraph 17 of the report argued that while the state was the central institution, “The time of absolute and exclusive sovereignty, however, has passed; its theory was never matched by reality” (UN 1992). Paragraph 59 claimed, under the rubric of the new concept of “peacebuilding,” that the UN could have the authority to directly intervene in the political process providing “support for the transformation of deficient national structures and capabilities, and for the strengthening of new democratic institutions.”

The rise and fall of peacebuilding was premised on the blurring of the key binary boundaries of international society: the boundaries between peace and war and between sovereignty and intervention. Peace was no longer primarily a matter of the international, an issue concerning interstate relations, but migrated to being a problem of domestic politics. At the same time, the domestic matter of peace became internationalized as the boundaries between sovereignty and intervention blurred. This double blurring of the boundaries of international politics constituted the 20 years’ crisis of peacebuilding played out in Bosnia, Kosovo, and beyond.

The extension of international authority to intervene in the management of post-conflict peacebuilding was reinforced in the Secretary-General’s follow-up position paper, the Supplement to the Agenda for Peace, in 1995. Here it was argued that international intervention must extend “beyond military and humanitarian tasks and must include the promotion of national reconciliation and the re-establishment of effective government” (UN 1995, Para 13). In the position paper, under the section headed “Post-Conflict Peace-Building,” for the first time, the UN Secretary-General envisaged the possibility of new forms of UN temporary protectorates with the goal of peacebuilding:

In a country ruined by war, resumption of such activities may initially have to be entrusted to, or at least coordinated by, a multifunctional peacekeeping operation, but as that operation succeeds in restoring normal conditions, the programmes, funds, offices and agencies can re-establish themselves and gradually take over responsibility from the peace-keepers, with the resident coordinator in due course assuming the coordination functions temporarily entrusted to the special representative of the Secretary-General. (UN 1995, Para 53)

The stage was set for the 20 years of crisis the moment the Secretary-General's conception of peacebuilding with the goal of liberal institution-building was fully implemented for the first time, following the post-war elections in Bosnia-Herzegovina, when the temporary international mandates were extended and civilian control over the peacebuilding process taken over by international appointees in February 1997. The hubris of the late 1990s reached its highpoint when the UN gave its formal imprint to the international protectorate in Kosovo in 1999. The Western Balkans were the crucible through which peacebuilding was developed, tested, and renegotiated and the confidence of the late 1990s quickly waned with the over extension of the belief in external responsibility for overseeing post-conflict political processes of reconstruction with the lack of a coherent "exit strategy" in the Balkans and then the debacles of Afghanistan and Iraq.

Today, there is an emergent consensus over what has gone wrong with peacebuilding over the last 20 years. In both policy-making and academia, there has been a reappraisal of the peacebuilding paradigm: one which has sought to rationalize and to a certain extent excuse and legitimate the policy errors. It appears that the lesson being learned is the lesson of pragmatism, that peace cannot be exported as a set of policies, institutions, and practices. That to do so, in the words of leading US scholar David Lake, is "criminally stupid" (2016, p. ix) or "astounding in its audacity" (2016, p. 197). Lake's monograph The Statebuilder's Dilemma: On the Limits of Foreign Intervention (published in late 2016) is a clear and representative example of the current acceptance of pragmatist approaches and serves here as a basis for discussing their implications.

Pragmatism could be understood as a "realist" response to the liberal idealism of international peacebuilding. According to Lake, the problematic is simple – peacebuilding only came into existence as a liberal project with the end of the Cold War in 1990. Prior to then, the USA and the Soviets were keen to support loyal regimes, and there was no conception of peacebuilding as the external promotion of liberal institutional frameworks. "Liberal statebuilding, beginning with the end of the Cold War, elevated the goal of building legitimate states and premised strategy on the belief that democracy and free markets would be sufficient to legitimate a government in the eyes of its people" (Lake 2016, p. 6). It is worth quoting Lake's formulation of the problem:

The liberal model of statebuilding so widely applied in the post-Cold War period was not selected because it was a tried and true method. Rather, it was an ideology that fit an emerging academic paradigm on the positive role of limited political institutions that, in turn, reflected the euphoria of the "end of history" moment. Contrary to the prevailing wisdom, however, legitimacy is not inherent in institutions in general nor only in institutions with representative qualities. Institutions are not "strong" or accepted by society simply because they are institutions. This puts the proverbial cart before the horse. . . . This is the mistake of nearly all statebuilders in recent decades, and of all institutionalist scholars, who have placed inordinate faith in the legitimating power of democratic institutions. . . .

The arrogance behind this particular theory of politics, however, grew out of our own time. Given the world in 1991, as history was just ending, how could democracy, free markets, and limited but effective states not be "good things" – and why should all good things not go together? In the end, the model said more about the statebuilders than about statebuilding. (2016, p. 198)

We can see a simple inversion of liberal peacebuilding understandings: exporting institutions and legal frameworks makes no sense and ignores the social basis of governing legitimacy – establishing hybrid orders where the state has no de facto purchase on society or further destabilizing society by offering enrichment opportunities to elites, etc.

Here, Lake sets up the liberal peacebuilding framework as an accident of the historical moment and liberal overconfidence in the 1990s. A policy mis-step that was always destined to fail as it was based more on our naïve idealism than any understanding of the world. In the terminology of popular French sociologist Bruno Latour, it now appears that really "We Were Never Liberal Peacebuilders" (see Latour 1993). Peacebuilding it seems was just an unfortunate and accidental mistake. This is both a problematic and apologetic or self-serving interpretation of the end of the peacebuilding paradigm as will be considered below.

The Pragmatic Apologia

Pragmatism, as a critique of peacebuilding, problematizes the idea of institution-building both from the “top-down” and from the “bottom-up.” Pragmatic positions are critical both of the idea that international experts could develop institutional solutions that could just be exported or imposed by external actors and also of the idea that deeper social, economic, or political external “engineering” might enable liberal institutional frameworks to work without frictions. These “liberal” framings assume that external actors can shape social and political processes and outcomes on the basis that power works in a linear or cause-and-effect manner (i.e., that certain policy interventions will lead to certain desirable results or outcomes). Pragmatist positions tend to resist the idea that there are preset or prepackaged “off-the-peg” solutions to universal or generalizable “problems”; instead problems should be grasped in their concrete and relational context. From a pragmatic perspective, Western interests in creating liberal democracies or ideological desires to spread liberal values therefore need to be tempered by a much greater appreciation of “realism.”

This “realist turn” inverts the international peacebuilding paradigm, starting from the problem rather than from the Western or international provision of “solutions” or external goals. This inversion is powerfully expressed through the view that there is a paradox or contradiction at the heart of the peacebuilding program. The more there is an attempt to shape outcomes based on external interests or values, the less likely it is to succeed: “. . .the greater the interests of the statebuilder in the target country, the less likely statebuilding is to succeed in building a legitimate state that can survive on its own into the indefinite future” (Lake 2016, p. 2). The pragmatic paradox is interesting in that it is not just a critique of the limits and difficulties of exporting liberal institutions; it also suggests that to do so is inherently problematic, making the situation worse. Lake argues that “current practice reveals great faith in externally led social engineering” (2016, p. 1):

The existing literature emphasizes getting national political institutions “right.” This emphasis recurs both at the deep level of politics, where observers and practitioners identify predatory institutions as the root evil, and at the surface, where analysts debate the proper strategy and tactics of statebuilding. This concentration on institutions implicitly accepts and is premised on a particular theory of state legitimation, one grounded in liberalism. Institutions are, no doubt, important. But in this focus the underlying social cleavages that undermine institutions and ultimately bring down states are ignored. (2016, p. 11)

In this, now consensual, critique, Lake echoes the current perspective of the UN, cited at the opening of this article, against the idea that external preferences or blueprints could be exported or imposed. The UN describes this externally led or “top-down” approach as a “template” culture or “the so-called ‘Christmas tree mandate’ dilemma, where template language for many tasks routinely appears in mission mandates” (UN 2015a, p. 60). The pragmatic paradox appears to be that the more “enthusiastic” reformers are to transform other societies, the more they risk unintentional consequences, which could be counterproductive. The pragmatic lesson is that “less can sometimes be more” and that peace cannot in fact be built by good intentions of external do-gooders but needs to be understood in more “local” and “organic” ways. This shift toward the “pragmatic” or the “organic” is also prefigured in more critical policy and academic work which suggests that peacebuilding is a complex organic process of self-organizing adaptation and resilience. For example, Cedric de Coning, a leading policy analyst, concludes that:

...when international peace interventions try to engineer specific outcomes, they produce the opposite effect of that which sustaining peace aims to achieve; they generate on-going instability, dependence and fragility, because such interventions undermine self-organisation and thus resilience. A complexity-informed approach to self-sustainable peace suggests that peacebuilders limit their efforts to safeguarding, stimulating, facilitating and creating the space for societies to develop resilient capacities for self-organisation. (de Coning 2016, p. 167)

Thus, the pragmatic alternative seeks to move away from external or universal goals and looks for more “organic” metrics that could serve as a guide instead, such as local “legitimacy,” starting with the existing social and political order rather than “universal” views of desirable liberal institutional frameworks. It is important to focus on how the actually existing society works, rather than Western ideals. Pragmatism works with what there is rather than imposing liberal goals and aspirations. As Lake states:

My approach differs from the prevailing institutionalist view. . . institutionalists are fundamentally liberals, in the classic sense of this term, who believe the legitimacy of the state follows from democracy and free markets. . . [T]his liberal model of statebuilding is itself deeply flawed and has repeatedly failed to provide the legitimacy necessary for successful statebuilding. . . legitimacy follows from social order, not the other way around as in the prevailing model. (2016, p. 17)

For this doyen of US policy-making academia, the pragmatist framing thus neatly inverts the “top-down” and “liberal” paradigm of international peacebuilding. In what is now the established consensus on the death of the peacebuilding moment, it is suggested that intervention guided by liberal universalist understandings could only make conflict situations worse (see, e.g., Etzione 2016).

Despite the fact that existing conditions are far from ideal, the new consensus seems to be that, no matter how bad things are, international peacebuilding interventions will fail to make a positive difference. Both policy-makers and radical critics increasingly agree that accepting the status quo can often be better than attempts at any positive transformation. Thus disillusionment with international intervention has been given coherence and even a positive spin by pragmatic and “organic” approaches, which have strongly reinforced the potentially dangerous and self-satisfying understanding that “they” are not ready for liberalism. Thus even radical critiques of Western hubris and liberal certitude have been played out against the backdrop of “their” unsuitability for modern liberal frameworks of governance.

The error of Western policy-makers then becomes merely that of naïvety and overconfidence in “their” capacities and abilities to be like “us.” This definitely softens the “critical” blow and enables pragmatic approaches to salve

Western policy consciences. Today it appears that the real “crime” of international peacebuilders is that of caring too much. As Lake put it: “The limits of external statebuilding are reached precisely when the statebuilder cares the most about the future policies of the failed state” (2016, p. 16). “Caring too much” implies that peacebuilders want to go too far and too quickly, in essence, attempting to short-cut the “organic” process of building sustainable peace.

The Return of Realism

The pragmatist critique of international peacebuilding goals leaves three general policy options. Lake sets up the first option as that advocated by Stephen Krasner, of “good enough governance,” where the international community enforces a minimal set of rights standards and key international security threats are dealt with and stability was seen as more important than democracy (2016, p. 201). This perspective could be seen as pragmatism in its everyday usage and as a return to Cold War clientelist regimes:

This is the direction in which US policy, at least since Iraq, has been trending under President Obama: target individual terrorists and organizations but avoid large-scale interventions, even into such clearly failed states as Libya, and tolerate authoritarian leaders who promise stability, as with the military in Egypt after the coup against President Mohamed Morsi. (Lake 2016, p. 202)

The second option is that of a “neutral” peacebuilding intervention (2016, p. 203) where concern is focused on building up organic processes of social formation. Interestingly, Lake suggests that this is a highly unlikely possibility as, even if there could be any “objective” or “neutral” ideal solution, a multilateral framework would still rely on “interested” states, which would pervert any process to their own ends or would attract little international support (2016, p. 204). The “organic” option, of working with the resources and capacities available rather than seeking to direct and shape policy processes, similarly takes peacebuilding off the policy agenda, making peacebuilding a marginal preoccupation of nongovernmental agencies, concerned with community development and social welfare.

Lake's preference is for the third option, which involves little direct international intervention, instead focusing on providing indirect institutional incentives while enabling a discursive framing of self-government and decision-making autonomy for the target state:

... focus instead on creating an international environment conducive to indigenous state formation. Through the use of carrots and sticks, states might shape incentives for fragile states by making access to the security and economic benefits of the Pax Americana, in general, or the European Union, in particular, contingent on domestic groups settling their differences, agreeing on a social order, and governing themselves effectively. (2016, p. 21)

It is noticeable that the only option of the three with the goal of supporting liberal peacebuilding goals, formally the sine qua non of the peacebuilding project, is one that does not involve any direct policy intervention in the states and societies concerned but rather governance from a distance. The two options that could be seen to be involved in domestic political processes only operated at the margins, either with a concern with international security threats and instability or with building community capacities: neither of these approaches aims at supporting liberal institutional frameworks of markets, democracy, rights, and the rule of law.

Conclusion

Perhaps in considering the shifting nature of peacebuilding over the last 20 years in Bosnia and Kosovo, all three of these pragmatic options can be seen to be in effect. Clientelist security concerns are evident: NATO maintains a military headquarters in Sarajevo still supporting the domestic authorities with transition and the European Union Force; in Kosovo, NATO's KFOR presence includes around 4000 troops in 2 regional bases – Camp Bondsteel and Camp Villaggio Italia – headquartered in in Camp Film City, Pristina. NGO-led social or “neutral” capacity-building takes place via international donor funding across the social sector, often coordinated between the European Union Offices in Sarajevo and Pristina with major development agencies, while the key pragmatic mechanism is the arm's-length program of “indigenous state formation” through the “carrots and sticks” of the long and complex provisions and processes of the European Union Stabilization and Association Agreements. In the turn to realist and pragmatist understandings, peacebuilding as a major paradigm of international policy-making is doubly erased: firstly, in being reinterpreted as a momentary accident or misunderstanding and, secondly, in discussions of alternatives that betray little of the legacy of previous doctrines.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Carr, E. H. (1981). The twenty years' crisis 1919–1939: An introduction to the study of international relations. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Cox, M. (2001). Introduction. In E. H. Carr (Ed.), The twenty year's crisis 1919–1939: An introduction to the study of international relations. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- De Coning, C. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience: International Policies, Practices and Discourses, 4(3), 166–181.
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Duffield, M. (2019). Post-humanitarianism: Governing precarity in the digital world. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Etzioni, A. (2016, March 30). Back to nation building? Huffington Post. Available at: https://www.huffingtonpost.com/amitai-etzioni/back-to-nation-building_b_9576390.html
- Lake, D. (2016). The Statebuilder's dilemma: On the limits of foreign intervention. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Latour, B. (1993). We have never been modern. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Lynch, C. (2016, March 23). How to crowdsource the Syrian cease-fire. Foreign Policy.

- Pugliese, D. (2016, February 9). Traditional peace-keeping not enough to maintain a Syrian deal: UN report looks to satellites, crowdsourcing. National Post.
- United Nations. (1992). An agenda for peace, preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping: Report of the secretary-general pursuant to the statement adopted by the summit meeting of the security council on 31 January 1992. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (1995). Supplement to an agenda for peace: Position paper of the secretary-general on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2000a). Millennium report of the secretary-general, “we the peoples”: The role of the United Nations in the 21st century. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2000b). Brahimi report, report of the panel on United Nations peace operations, United Nations general assembly security council, 21 august. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2015a). Uniting our strengths for peace: Politics, partnership and people, report of the high-level independent panel on United Nations peace operations. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2015b). The challenge of sustaining peace, report of the advisory group of experts for the 2015 review of the United Nations peacebuilding architecture. New York: United Nations.

Peacebuilding–Development Nexus

Erin McCandless
School of Governance, University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa

Keywords

Peacebuilding · Development · Paradigms ·
Nexus · Security and development

Synonyms

Development = economic growth; Peacebuilding = consolidating peace, constructing peace

Definition

Peacebuilding and development intersections in scholarship and practice span disciplines, time and space, worldviews, and policy agendas and practice areas. This reflection examines the “nexus” through various paradigms of peacebuilding and development that have dominated scholarly thinking and international policy and practice, exploring the ways that they intersect with one another. Unsurprisingly, it reveals that the nature of the nexus is profoundly shaped by the orientation of each peacebuilding, or development, paradigm in focus. Specific paradigms depicting the nexus and orienting policy and practice are then discussed that frame actual and emergent areas of consensus and action in international politics.

Introduction

There are many ways to frame a discussion about the peacebuilding–development nexus. At the most basic level, one can look at how peacebuilding intersects with or impacts development, and alternatively, how development intersects with or impacts peacebuilding. Paradigmatic perspectives inform how these intersections are understood and resultingly, guide action.

Peacebuilding and development have, since the 1990s, been explicitly aligned in scholarship and practice. This alignment has been referred to as an evolving disciplinary field, drawing upon two interdisciplinary scholarly fields (McCandless and Abu-Nimer 2012) and as a sub-discipline of peace studies (McCandless 2007, p. 59). There is also a strong movement by development practitioners to examine the nexus in practice, as the work of Oxfam, Cordaid, Overseas Development Institute, and many other international development and aid organizations and government agencies reveal. In practice, the well-known quote by Boutros Boutros-Ghali, former United Nations (UN) secretary general in the 1992 Agenda for Peace, “[t]here can be no peace without economic and social development, just as development is not possible in the absence of peace” provided early recognition of this nexus. However, operationalizing these linkages has proven more difficult (McCandless and Abu-Nimer 2012). This undoubtedly has much to do with the paradigmatic assumptions and debates underpinning both fields, challenging agreement around the core meaning and orientation of the nexus.

Acknowledging that there are many conceptualizations of both peacebuilding and development, the following concepts are offered, drawing on considerable scholarly and policy consensus, with a critical orientation. Peacebuilding can be understood as a process aimed at facilitating the sustaining of peace and the prevention of the recurrence of violence and conflict by addressing root causes and effects of conflict, through reconciliation, political and economic transformation, and the forging of a common vision of society that takes all segments of the population into account. This conceptualization draws upon the 2016 UN Security Council and General Assembly resolutions on preventing violent conflict and sustaining peace (A/RES/70/262 and S/RES/2282). It is worth highlighting that after decades of circling and debate on meaning, in particular around whether or not addressing root causes is involved (McCandless 2020b), policy consensus is settling in a more holistic notion that does recognize this imperative as part of sustaining peace.

Equally acknowledging the many rich conceptualizing efforts of development, the notion that “Sustainable development is development that meets the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs,” as expressed in Our Common Future (Brundtland Commission 1992) gets at the heart of the challenge. The Agenda for Sustainable Development (Agenda 2030) – adopted by all UN member states sets out a universal agreement and agenda to “create conditions for sustainable, inclusive growth” and shared prosperity, to end poverty in all its dimensions, combat inequality within and among countries, and to build peaceful, just, and inclusive societies. It reinforces (as did the Agenda for Development 1997) the interlocking nature of economic, social, and environmental dimensions and the need for critical awareness around the “conscious choices in terms of the trade-offs, synergies, and spin offs” created by any intervention (2015, p. 1).

The evolution and orientations of these concepts reveal their drive to ever-greater holism where each is moving to further encompass the other. While on the one hand, this suggests their synergy, and the very basis and need for the study and practice of the nexus; on the other hand, it potentially undermines the ability to maintain critical thinking and engagement about the relationship between, and impacts each agenda has on the other.

Paradigmatic Approaches to Peacebuilding and Development

This section explores the nexus through the framing of paradigms in both peacebuilding and development – how they have been theoretically conceptualized and how they have played out in policy and practice. First, peacebuilding paradigms are discussed, and their relationship to development explored. Then, development paradigms are discussed, and their relationship to peacebuilding explored. The sections consider both dominant paradigms, and the emergent, resistant ones.

Peacebuilding Paradigms and the Development Nexus

Key paradigms that have framed peacebuilding thought and practice come from structural and liberal traditions. This section starts by considering these two paradigms, and their intersections with development. It then turns to discuss innovations emerging over the last decade. Resistance to liberal peacebuilding in particular has fueled innovation, pushing the paradigmatic boundaries in new and important directions. (This section builds upon the framework developed by McCandless and Donais (2020) that lays out “generations of thought” in peacebuilding policy and practice.) It also draws from a review of peacebuilding and economic recovery linkages McCandless (2009).

Structural and Liberal Peacebuilding

According to McCandless (2020b), structural perspectives on peacebuilding have focused over the decades on understanding and framing conflict as rooted in asymmetrical power relations and uneven processes of development, and peacebuilding as a process of transforming systems and structures accordingly. (Others have used the term structural peacebuilding not as a body of thought, but nonetheless in consistent ways – to describe, i.e., as a transformative process “of changing structures of violence to structures of peace.” (Montiel 2001, p. 1), generally engaging Galtung’s work on structural violence, the absence of which is structural peace (Galtung 1969).) A stream of thinkers shaping peace studies in the twentieth century – including Johan Galtung, Elise Boulding, Adam Curle, and Ed Azar – broadly sought to frame peace in this way, with concerted attention to issues of equitable development and distributive justice as deeply relevant for transforming conflict at its roots. Global South scholars have tended to support this line of thought. Hansen (1988) argued that dominant conceptions rooted in minimalist concerns such as the absence of physical violence did not serve Africa. For most scholars he suggested, the peace and development problematic are deeply intertwined; peace involves transforming national and international social systems to address the structural legacies and ongoing policies driven by Northern institutions driving inequalities between the North–South relations (See chapter “► Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding”).

The 1990s saw a resurgence of structuralist-oriented theories through literatures on the political economy of conflict, and war economies. These engaged issues of motives in war, i.e., greed or grievance (Collier and Hoeffler 2004), criminality and profiting from peace, power asymmetries within and across societies, and the natural resource dimensions of war (Pugh 2005; Ballentine and Nitzschke 2005; Duffield 1998; Keen 1997).

Liberal peacebuilding proffers a much different perspective on its relationship with development. This agenda, from its origins in liberalism itself, assumes that broadening and deepening of liberalization of the economy (i.e., through rapid marketization) and politics (elections) provides a consummate pathway to peace. With roots in classical philosophy, liberal peacebuilding arose with and through liberal triumphalism that accompanied the fall of the Soviet Union. At the same time, it was shaped by wider neoliberal trends dominating international financial institution policy interventions, resulting in lack of attention to the state and its institutions and an undermining of fragile local economies (Brückner and Ciccone 2010; Castillejo 2014). This was eventually acknowledged: countries emerging from conflict and fragility require robust institutions to drive and achieve development (Paris 2004). More widely, as observed by critical scholars, liberal peacebuilding did not achieve intended results of forging a pathway to sustaining peace and inclusive development. This was due to its framing around Western models and assumptions about what development and recovery should look like, which did not take root naturally in fragile post-conflict settings and did not foster a nationally owned vision (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Pugh 2005; Paris 2004).

Innovations in Peacebuilding Paradigms

There are other paradigmatic perspectives, or “generations of thought” (McCandless 2020b) emerging in the peacebuilding discipline that engage with development less directly, yet they potentially offer transformative directions for the peacebuilding–development nexus. The “local turn” in peacebuilding that has arisen in the wake of disillusionment with liberal peacebuilding and its outcomes orients attention towards local people, dynamics, contexts, and narratives (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013) (See chapters “► Local Peacebuilding” and “► Everyday Peace”). This “turn” is important for achieving a more context-relevant, demand-driven peace that serves development, and conversely, development that serves peace. Hybridity as a paradigmatic lens through which to orient peacebuilding efforts has also gained traction, addressing weaknesses in liberal peacebuilding by its focus on understanding how the heterogeneity within society manifests through competing claims to authority, legitimacy, and power (See chapter “► Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”). A hybridity lens in peacebuilding offers means to explore development in ways that organically and endogenously arise and exist within particular settings, and the multidirectional means for such interaction (Mac Ginty and Sanghera 2012).

Despite a host of critiques oriented towards liberal peacebuilding, this agenda still forms the core of a dominant policy approach – though one combining liberalism with more concerted attention to addressing its uneven impacts on people and the environment. This is reflected perhaps most clearly in the adoption of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development.

Development Paradigms and the Peacebuilding Nexus

Development paradigms similarly generate and illustrate great debate. There is a tendency to conflate economic growth with development, arguably due to uncritical assumptions driving policy and thought – that the former will simply result in the latter. As Amartya Sen (1988, p. 13) suggests, “there are many other variables that also influence the living conditions, and the concept of development cannot ignore the role of these other variables.”

Liberalism and Marxism

Development paradigms and related policy agendas over time, as with the peacebuilding terrain, have broadly revealed a Marxist/liberal divide, with paradigms reflecting one, the other, or an effort to chart a middle path. On the liberal side, global development agendas came into practice through post-World War II reconstruction, which sought to ensure macroeconomist stability, though with a Marshall Plan which cushioned adverse effects on vulnerable populations and helped to support the building of needed infrastructure to catalyze development. Modernization in the 1950s–60s followed, steeped in uncritical assumptions about the supremacy of Western capitalism, suggesting that traditionalism impeded economic investment and growth. “Growth with Equity” in the 1970s recognized the structural marginalization of large population segments around the world, sought to balance modernization with benefit – and technology – sharing, promoting decentralization, and participation.

This did not last long; in the 1980s–1990s a more conservative strand of economic liberalism – neoliberalism – came fully to fruition. A “Washington Consensus” informed ideology drove a change in international financial institution (IFI) policy and practice. The new structural adjustments programs (SAPS) sought full liberalization of market and finance in the spirit of unbridled capitalism. Assuming this policy approach would ensure wealth, would “trickle down” and correct social service–related deficiencies in the long run, the outcomes proved opposite. Not only did the policies, implemented widely across Africa and Latin America in particular, increase poverty and inequality across settings, they did not even achieve their main policy goal: economic growth (See chapter “► Conflict and Hunger”). These policies and their impacts also undermined civil and political liberties and national ownership of development, fueling social discontent, violence, and conflict (McCandless and Karbo 2011; Cheru 2002; Walton and Seddon 1994).

Marxism and Marxist-inspired critical theories grew in parallel to their liberal counterparts over the twentieth century to inform development paradigms in the Soviet Union and China, followed by Cuba, North Korea, Laos, and Vietnam, among others. Originating from mid nineteenth century work of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, Marxists view the development problem as following from the exploitative class relations arising from the contradictions at the point of production within capitalism, which tend to result in extreme inequality and uneven geographical development. In this framework, social conflict is structurally embedded within the divergent ownership of the means of production and the social relations of production and reproduction.

The solution is class struggle and other forms of anti-capitalist activism (i.e., women’s rights, radical ecology, anti-racism, anti-imperialism) to achieve socialism – the social ownership of the means of production and erosion of profit as a core logic. This struggle, once successful, would generate what was often referred to as “socialist harmony.” For Marxists, underlying economic conditions – usually divided into the process of capital accumulation and the class structure – “determine the quality and the life of ideology, philosophy, culture, and psychology” or what is known as the superstructures (Lumumba-Kasongo 2017, p. 39). Marxism as an umbrella theory of all radical leftist theories has an ideology of organizing a new society (a just society according to the exploited, oppressed, and dominated people’s and ecologies). To get there, a the “progressive methodology” (Lumumba-Kasongo 2017, p. 39) for attaining peace would encompass unifying anti-capitalist struggles from below linking up, led by the working class, but unifying with other fractions.

While Marxism was employed as a political and developmental paradigm in various countries and regions in the twentieth century, a critical variant – dependency theory – grew among third-world intellectuals in the 1960s–80s, especially in Latin America, and as a critique of modernization theory. Proponents saw conflict and crisis in Marxist terms around the contradictions in capitalism and exploitative class relations occurring globally and underdevelopment occurring as a result (De Santo et al. 1990). The development problem for dependency theorists lies in the underdevelopment of developing countries (Rodney 1972) – a result of resources flowing from the periphery of poor states or regions to wealthier ones. This a critical development paradigm, and informed development planning in Brazil, for example, under Lula, while import substitution policies (ISIs), at the heart of theories prescriptions, were pursued in countries around the world. These theories are consistent with Global South peace scholars of the structural peacebuilding tradition, i.e., Hansen above, who insist that achieving peace necessitates addressing the structural legacies and ongoing policies driven in and through global institutions dominated by select Northern governments.

Human Development, Sustainable Development, and Other Innovations

Efforts at innovation or finding new paradigmatic pathways have flourished in recent decades, often veering towards development placing humans (human development) or the environment (sustainable development) at the core – and invariably drawing on liberal and Marxist/critical paradigms to chart a middle path.

Human development as conceived by its founder Mahbub ul Haq (2003) is the idea of enlarging all human choices, be they social, cultural, economic, or political. This paradigm emerged in the 1980s, offering an alternative to the dominant (neo)liberal economic growth paradigm. With roots in the teachings of Aristotle, Immanuel Kant, Adam Smith, and Karl Marx, it is a holistic and integrated paradigm expanding the notion and measure of well-being. It seeks to combine economic concerns of growth with those of distribution, access to livelihoods, and equality on the one hand, with political concerns, including personal freedoms and rights, and democratic governance, peace, and security on the other (UNDP 2006).

Human development was promoted by others including Amartya Sen and Paul Streeten and was adopted by UNDP in the 1990s to inform its development strategy and programming. The human development index (HDI) was created to enlarge the way well-being is measured, challenging the dominant growth-focused measure of well-being, the World Bank’s gross domestic product (GDP). The paradigm can be seen informing various UN development agendas that followed, including the Agenda for Development in 1994, and even the current Agenda for Sustainable Development. Within these development frameworks the links to peace and peacebuilding have become increasingly evident, while the holistic conception itself shares much with structural approaches to peacebuilding, and the conception of positive peace.

While human development did not attain wider appeal per se, the rising awareness of the failure of SAPS instigated some movements within the IFIs towards more human-centered capitalism, while simultaneously movements were growing within and outside these institutions for greater attention to the environment. Pro-poor development (Battaglia et al. 2011) and associated IFI Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSPs) took over from SAPS – the preparation of which served as a new form of aid conditionality. They did not, however, address the macroeconomic framework in play, which critics have viewed as the obstacle to transformation (Cheru 2002).

Similar concerns have been shared about the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development – adopted by all United Nations member states in 2015 (McCandless 2016). While there are critics aplenty of the SDGs – especially coming from critical schools of thought and practice in relation to each substantive goal area, this framework undoubtedly goes farther than any globally agreed framework before to address issues at the heart of societal and global transformation. Drawing from other environmentally oriented development paradigms, it endeavors to bridge the divide between human and sustainable development approaches. This 2030 Agenda also places peace as a key priority area cutting across the framework identified in the preamble, while also featuring SDG 16 – a goal to foster peaceful, just, and inclusive societies. Goal 16 is also broadly viewed as an enabler of all the other goals.

Other innovations and approaches that may constitute emerging or past paradigms of development on the one hand and peacebuilding on the other undoubtedly exist, suggesting the complexity and breadth of the nexus in theory and in practice. Presently, for example, we are seeing rising discussion around the role of rising powers, including the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa), in peacebuilding (Call and de Coning 2016). The approaches of these countries in general, like Global South scholars as discussed above, tend to view peacebuilding as much more part and parcel of development, effectively assuming that inclusive development will foster peace.

The Nexus in Practice

In an opening issue of a journal devoted to exploring this nexus, the journal of Peacebuilding and Development, Peter Uvin (2002) outlined seven “paradigmatic shifts” in the relationship of the two enterprises. Representing a scale of status quo to more radical efforts, these were identified as:

development (in the form of economic growth) axiomatically reduces conflict; conditionality; post-conflict assistance; do no harm; conflict prevention; human security; and global system reform. Uvin argued, fitting with the period, that the development industry was primarily operating from the paradigms of post-conflict assistance and do no harm. This was consistent with the expansion of peacekeeping operations at the time, where United Nations multidimensional missions were taking on a wealth of responsibilities across security, political, rule of law, human rights, protection of civilians, and other areas, becoming cognizant that achieving intended results was far more difficult than anticipated. Some more progressive agencies, he argued, were moving into conflict prevention and human security, while global system reform was generally limited in the development sector – with the exception of concerted attention to the Kimberly process. A key conclusion, he found, was that attempts to put the nexus into practice were limited by the weak knowledge base and ethical foundations upon which the work rests.

Coming on two decades later, this nexus analysis retains considerable cogency, although there are adaptations within each, and arguably new emergent paradigms defining this nexus. It is also the case that they all vary in value depending on the actor concerned. With the rising acceptance of the changed face of conflict and its links with fragility and violence (United Nations – World Bank 2018; OECD 2016; McCandless 2020a), there is more policy consensus on the need to reprioritize conflict prevention. The push for this has gained traction on the basis of awareness within the multilateral system that fighting endless and intractable wars is too costly (United Nations – World Bank 2018). While there is an acknowledgment that addressing exclusion – a key driver of violence and conflict – is paramount – finding consensus among member states to act on issues at the core of conflict prevention will remain profoundly challenging (McCandless 2020b) (See chapter “► R2P and Prevention”). Global system reform remains strong, focused increasingly on climate change, while issues of food sovereignty, debt cancellation, natural resource justice, and generally reforming the global trade and finance architecture that drives uneven development hold continuing prominence. Over this period, there have also been the momentous nonviolent revolutions brought by social movements through the “Arab Spring.” These movements were driven by a people rising up against oppressive regimes and failing development. While it is clear that concerted attention is required to economic issues of global system reform to ensure these transitions to democracy are sustainable, international attention remains squarely on supporting a move to political liberalism within these countries.

Other paradigms engaging this nexus that have arisen include peacebuilding in development policy frameworks (illustrated by Agenda 2030, and numerous prior efforts within the UN and bi- or multilateral efforts), inclusion, as an increasingly adopted norm in peacebuilding, development, and vis-à-vis the nexus, statebuilding, a policy approach oriented towards building the capacity of the state, which grew in part as a counterbalance to liberal peacebuilding (McCandless 2014), and fourthly the humanitarian-development-peace nexus (HDP). This last paradigm, while not new, is gaining concerted traction with the global COVID-19 pandemic. It arises out of the awareness that responding to the nature and scale of crises today requires an ever-deeper commitment to understanding and addressing these linkages (See chapter “► Conflicts and Natural Disasters”).

Summary

The peacebuilding–development nexus constitutes a profoundly rich area of thought and varied practices. While the importance of this nexus has been acknowledged at the highest policy levels, there remain significant challenges in forging coherence around agreed meaning of this nexus, given the dynamic, contested terrains between paradigms in peacebuilding, development, and the nexus. Peacebuilding and development are ultimately constructivist endeavors (Donais and McCandless 2017); they need to respond to the historical circumstances and needs of particular populations in space and time.

While there are no one-size-fits-all formulas for understanding and supporting this nexus, structural engagement and intervention is needed to address root causes of conflict and fragility across societies. These more often than not stem not only from internal causes but from structural legacies, i.e., colonialism and slavery, and ongoing marginalizing tendencies of globalization, war, climate change, and disaster, among others, which do not observe borders and tend to hit the most vulnerable the hardest. As such, peacebuilding scholars can and should continue to shape this nexus in ways that raise evidence-based awareness about the interconnections, and that provide insight into approaches that hold greater promise for inclusive peace and development outcomes.

Cross-References

- Conflict and Hunger
- Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- Everyday Peace
- Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- Local Peacebuilding
- R2P and Prevention
- Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Ballentine, K., & Nitzschke, H. (2005). Profiting from peace: Managing the resource dimensions of civil war. Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner.
- Battaglia, L., Bellù, G. L., Dieng, C., & Tedesco, I. (2011). Development paradigms and related policies. Issue Papers, 6. https://scholar.google.com/scholar?hl=en&as_sdt=0%2C5&q=Battaglia%2C+Bell%2C+B9%2C+Dieng+%26+Tedesco%2C+2011&btnG=
- Brückner, M., & Ciccone, A. (2010). International commodity prices, growth and the outbreak of civil war in Sub-Saharan Africa. The Economic Journal, 120(544), 519–534.
- Brundtland Commission. (1987). Report of the world commission on environment and development: Our common future. <http://www.un-documents.net/our-common-future.pdf>

- Call, C., & de Coning, C. (2016). (Eds.), Rising powers and peacebuilding: Breaking the mould? (p. 243–272). Switzerland: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Castillejo, C. (2014). Promoting inclusion in political settlements: A priority for international actors? Norwegian Peacebuilding Resource Centre Report. https://scholar.google.com/scholar?hl=en&as_sdt=0%2C5&q=Promoting+inclusion+in+political+settlements%3A+a+priority+for+international+actors&btnG=
- Cheru, F. (2002). African renaissance: Roadmaps to the challenge of globalization. New York: Zed Books.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2004). Greed and grievance in civil war. Oxford Economic Papers, 56(4), 563–595.
- De Santo, C. P., Lindblade, Z., & Poloma, M. (1990). Paradigms of development. Indianapolis: Wesley Press.
- Donais, T., & McCandless, E. (2017). International peace building and the emerging inclusivity norm. Third World Quarterly, 38(2), 291–310.
- Duffield, M. (1998). Post-modern conflict: Warlords, post-adjustment states and private protection. Civil Wars, 1(1), 65–102.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Hansen, E. (1988). Africa: Perspectives on peace and development. London: United Nations University and Zed Books.
- Haq, M. U. (2003). The human development paradigm. In S. Fukuda-Parr & A. K. Shiva Kumar (Eds.), Readings in human development (pp. 17–34). New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Keen, D. (1997). A rational kind of madness. Oxford Development Studies, 25(1), 67–75.
- Lumumba-Kasongo, T. (2017). Contemporary theories of conflict and their social and political implications. In T. Lumumba-Kasongo & J. Gahama (Eds.), Peace, security and post-conflict reconstruction in the great lakes region of Africa (pp. 29–48). Oxford/Senegal: African Book Collective/CODESRIA.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peacebuilding: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Sanghera, G. (2012). Hybridity in peacebuilding and development: An introduction. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(2), 3–8.
- McCandless, E. (2009). Peacebuilding and economic recovery. Peacebuilding Initiative, Humanitarian Policy and Conflict Research (HPCR), Harvard University & HPCR International. www.peacebuildinginitiative.org.
- McCandless, E. (2020a). Beyond liberal and local peacebuilding: Alternative for addressing the complexity of conflict and fragility in Africa. Africa Insight, 49, 20.
- McCandless, E. (2020b). Peacebuilding. In C. Butcher & M. C. Hallward (Eds.), Understanding international conflict management. London: Routledge.
- McCandless, E. (2016). Civil society and the 2030 agenda: Forging a path to universal sustainable peace through policy formulation. In D. Cortright (Ed.), Civil society, power and building peaceful and inclusive societies. Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield Press.
- McCandless, E. (2014). JPD: Fostering critical peacebuilding and development scholarship and action. Peace Review, 26, 4.
- McCandless, E. (2007). Emergence of peacebuilding and development: Scholarship and practice. In M. E. King & E. Sall (Eds.), Peace research for Africa: Critical essays on methodology (pp. 40–53). Geneva: UN University for Peace.
- McCandless, E., & Abu-Nimer, M. (2012). JPD in transition: Critical reflections on the state of our field. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(1), 1–6.
- McCandless, E., & Karbo, T. (2011). Economic policy, conflict and peace. In Conflict, peacebuilding and development: A critical reader and compendium. Geneva: UN University for Peace. http://www.upeace.org/pdf/5CREADER_webpages.pdf.
- McCandless, E., & Donais, T. (2020). Generations of constructing peace: The constructivism paradigm and peacebuilding. In H.F. Carey (Ed.) Peacebuilding paradigms. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Montiel, C. J. (2001). Toward a psychology of structural peacebuilding. In D. J. Christie, R. V. Wagner, & D. A. Winter (Eds.), Peace, conflict, and violence: Peace psychology for the 21st Century. Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall.
- OECD. (2016). States of fragility 2016: Understanding violence. Paris: OECD Publishing.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Pugh, M. (2005). The political economy of peacebuilding: A critical theory perspective. International Journal of Peace Studies, 10(2), 23–42.
- Rodney, W. (1972). How Europe underdeveloped Africa. London: Bogle L'Ouverture Publications.
- Sen, A. (1988). The concept of development. Handbook of Development Economics, 1, 9–26.
- United Nations Development Programme. (2006). The human development concept: Support package to HDR focal points. New York: UNDP, HDR Office.
- United Nations – World Bank. (2018). Pathways for peace: Inclusive approaches to preventing violent conflict. Washington, DC: World Bank Group.
- Uvin, P. (2002). The development/peacebuilding nexus: A typology and history of changing paradigms. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 1(1), 5–24.
- Walton, J. K., & Seddon, D. (1994). Free markets and food riots: The politics of global adjustment. Cambridge, MA: Blackwell.

Peaceful Transformation

► Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Peacekeeping

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/
Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Peacekeeping – Conflict Stabilisation

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping – Crisis Management

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping – Peacebuilding- Peace Operations

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Inputs – Assessing Approaches

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Mission Objective – Mission End State

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Missions – Peacekeeping Operations

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Operations – Protection of Civilians

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Outputs – Measuring Peace

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacekeeping Sovereignty – Host Government Responsibilities

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Peacemaking

- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo

Ramadan Ilazi
PAVE Project, Prishtina, Kosovo
Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

Ahtisaari Plan · Brussels Dialogue · Ethnic conflict · EU mediation · Rambouillet Accords · Yugoslavia

Introduction

Following the signing of the Dayton Agreement that ended the Bosnian War on December 14, 1995, many in the international community thought that their troubles with the Balkans were coming to an end. Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic was hailed as a peacemaker for having signed the agreement. However, throughout this process, the issue of Kosovo was largely ignored. In March of 1989, Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, through a campaign of terror, had stripped Kosovo of its status as an autonomous province of Serbia which included comprehensive self-government rights, as well as voting rights in the rotating federal presidency of Yugoslavia. This led to massive protests by Albanians. Tim Judah (2008, p. 67) notes that “During the unrest thousands of police poured in from outside the province, and widespread repression, arrests, and imprisonments followed, coupled with hundreds of new laws and regulations that needed to be passed to integrate Kosovo back into Serbia.” This started a chain of events that would escalate into a full-blown war by 1997/1998.

The report by the Independent International Commission on Kosovo (2000, p. I) holds that “[t]he revocation of Kosovo’s autonomy in 1989 was followed by a Belgrade policy aimed at changing the ethnic composition of Kosovo and creating an apartheid-like society.” Howard Clark (2000) provides a comprehensive account of how this apartheid-like system actually functioned in practice. Ethnic Albanians in Kosovo responded to repressive measures of Milosevic regime in a series of non-violent actions to assert their rights. Initially former members of the Kosovo Assembly that were removed after 1989 approved a statement on July 2, 1990, that declared Kosovo a Republic in Yugoslavia (Archive 1990), and 2 months later, on September 7, they met in secret in the town of Kaçanik and adopted the Constitution of the Republic of Kosovo (Kushtetuta e Kaçanikut 1990). Both documents were considered illegal by Serbia and not recognized. Members of Kosovo’s academia formed a political movement called the Democratic League of Kosovo (LDK) to pursue a political non-violent path toward independence of Kosovo and organized a parallel system of governance and service structures for citizens, including education and healthcare. The independence referendum of September 1991 showed overwhelming popular support with 99% voting in favor. In 1992, Kosovo elected former chairman of the Writers’ Union of Kosovo, Dr. Ibrahim Rugova, as the president of the country – that had been recognized only by Albania – in an election considered illegal by Serbia. These efforts formed the so-called peace track to achieve independence of Kosovo. However, hopes for the success of the peaceful efforts started to fade by the mid-1990s. By 1995, a growing frustration with the lack of reactions to continued oppression and violation of human rights against ethnic Albanians in Kosovo (see the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA)) appears with sporadic attacks against Serbian police. The response of the Yugoslavian and Serbian security apparatus was brutal, and in this context, we can trace three events that led to the internationalization of the Kosovo War and the subsequent involvement of international community to find a peaceful solution to the Kosovo issue.

The first was the “Prekaz massacre” on March 5, 1998, where more than 50 members of the family of the KLA leader Adem Jashari were killed in a campaign of shelling by the Serbian forces, which provoked the reaction of the international community, and the UN adopted Resolution 1160 on March 31, 1998, condemning the use of force and adding economic sanctions against Yugoslavia (UN Security Council 1998a, b). The second was the Abri e Eperme/Gornje Obrinje massacre of September 26, 1998, with 21 members of a same family brutally killed, including women and children. Human Rights Watch (n.d.-a, b, para. 2) report states that “More than two hundred villages were destroyed and at least 300,000 people were internally displaced. Most of the estimated 2,000 people killed through September were civilians.” This time, the response of the international community was harsher, and the UN adopted Resolution 1203 on October 24, 1998, that established the Kosovo Verification Mission (KVM) to verify the compliance of Yugoslavia and Serbia with the previous UN resolutions (UN Security Council 1998a, b). The resolution was a follow-up by what can be called as the first agreement between the Yugoslav/Serbian authorities, and the international community on Kosovo reached on October 16, 1998, the so-called Milosevic-Holbrooke agreement (Gow 1998). The third was the Reçak massacre of January 15, 1999, where 45 ethnic Albanian civilians were brutally executed. This massacre was verified by the KVM personnel who visited the village on January 16 and stated that the dead were unarmed civilians, which was later confirmed by a team of pathologists from Finland (Bellamy 2002). Human Rights Watch (1999) directly blamed the Serbian special police forces and the Yugoslav army for the massacre. The next section examines how international community approached the situation in an effort to find a peaceful resolution of the war.

The Rambouillet Peace Conference

The Raçak massacre dramatically shifted the approach of the international community toward the war in Kosovo. Albanians and Serbs were invited to participate in a peace conference in Paris, France, in order to find a peaceful resolution to the war. The geography of the peace conference for Kosovo had a purpose of its own. The war in Bosnia and Herzegovina was ended by a peace agreement signed in the USA, so having the peacemaking efforts to end the Kosovo War take place in France was meant to show that the Europeans were ready to take a responsibility and leadership in solving the crisis in their own front yard (Weller 1999).

The proximity talks were held in the Castle of Rambouillet in southwest of Paris from February 6 until February 23, 1999, co-chaired at the macro-level by French and UK ministers of foreign affairs, while the actual process of negotiations was facilitated by three negotiators appointed by the Contact Group (Contact Group was a format of meeting between key states on the issue of the crisis in the Balkans and usually included the USA, the UK, France, Germany, Italy, and Russia): Christopher Hill on behalf of the USA, Wolfgang Petritsch on behalf of the EU, and Boris Mayorski on behalf of the Russian Federation. In addition to this, there was a group of legal experts who did much of the practical and day-to-day work to negotiate the proposals for settlement between the parties (Weller 1999). Delegations were accommodated in the Castle of Rambouillet and had dedicated and separated space to work, and they were not allowed to leave the grounds of the castle (ibid.).

The talks in the Rambouillet were largely based on the so-called Hill Plan proposed in early 1998 by then US envoy for the Balkans Christopher Hill, which would have restored the pre-1989 status of Kosovo as an autonomous province while postponing a decision on the final status for 3 years. Parties were also presented by the Contact Group with a set of nonnegotiable principles to guide the settlement which included immediate end of violence, the settlement would be temporary, and final status would be solved after 3 years, release of political prisoners, creating self-government in Kosovo, organization of elections by the OSCE in Kosovo, cooperation with the international community, etc. Delegations were offered written proposals on particular aspects of the settlement, and they could comment on the respective documents, but such comments could not contradict the nonnegotiable principles (Weller 1999).

By February 23, 1999, the text of the agreement had been finalized. What was termed as Interim Agreement for Peace and Self-Government in Kosovo – Rambouillet Accords – offered substantial autonomy to Kosovo, a Constitution which regulated self-government with rights on a wide range of issues, including education and healthcare, and an Assembly, President, Government, and Constitutional and Supreme Court (UN Security Council 1999a, b). With respect to security, it would be provided by NATO through an international military force called KFOR, while the Yugoslav and Serbian security elements would be obliged to leave Kosovo, with the exception of Border Guard Forces, which would have limited authority, equipment, and personnel (1500 members). Kosovo Liberation Army would be demobilized and disarmed. Local police institution would be established. Kosovo would guarantee representation and special rights, and protections to minority communities in Kosovo, especially the Serbs. An international mission would be established to oversee implementation of these arrangements, while after 3 years, an international conference would take place to determine the future status of Kosovo.

The proposed agreement was unacceptable to both delegations, so they were offered additional time for consultations back home, and March 15 was set as a new date for reconvening in Paris to sign the agreement. For the Albanian delegation, the agreement did not ensure independence of Kosovo. The Yugoslav/Serbian delegation rejected the majority of the document, but a particular provision that would allow NATO troops in Kosovo and enable them free movement throughout Yugoslavia is widely argued to be the justification why the delegation refused the agreement. However, according to Tim Judah (2008), Milosevic never tried to negotiate this provision out of the agreement, and had he done so, he would have succeeded. According to Bellamy (2002, p. 145), this opportunity was offered to Milosevic on March 8, 1999, by senior European leaders, including German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer who met with Milosevic directly in Belgrade to offer “the opportunity to renegotiate the implementation aspects of the agreement,” but this was also refused.

When the delegations returned in Paris on March 15, this time meeting at the Centre Kléber, Kosovo-Albanian delegation confirmed their readiness to sign the proposed accords, convinced by a provision in the agreement that roughly stated that the future status of Kosovo would be decided after 3 years on the basis of the “will of the people” which it was interpreted to mean a referendum would be organized. The Yugoslav/Serbian delegation offered an entirely new counterproposal to what was already negotiated, and, moreover, the proposal was against the non-negotiable principles set forth at the start of the talks back in February. On March 18, the Kosovo-Albanian delegation officially signed the Rambouillet Accords, in a ceremony witnessed by the US and European leaders, but not by the Russian representative Boris Mayorski. The Yugoslav/Serbian delegation officially refused the accords.

International community through the Contact Group had threatened the use of force should the peaceful efforts to resolve the conflict fail. However, this was meant as a threat to back up diplomatic efforts, and at the time, no one believed it would come to the need to actually deliver on this threat. Diplomatic efforts in order to convince Milosevic to sign the deal continued, and new concessions were offered, but without any results. The last such effort was made on March 22, when the US envoy for the Balkans Richard Holbrooke met with Milosevic in Belgrade to give him directly the message that if he will leave Belgrade without an agreement, that would lead to a bombing campaign from NATO (Holbrooke 1998; PBS n.d.-a, b).

Fearing the potential for another Srebrenica massacre, and considering the situation in Kosovo a threat to international peace and security, on March 24, 1999, NATO forces initiated an air campaign against Yugoslav and Serbian targets code-named “Operation Allied Force,” which ended after 78 days and resulted in the capitulation of Yugoslavia/Serbia and withdrawal of the military and paramilitary forces from Kosovo. According to the Human Rights Watch (n.d.-a, b, para. 19), “as few as 489 and as many as 528 Yugoslav civilians were killed in the ninety separate incidents in Operation Allied Force,” while Serbian government estimates say that “at least 2,500 people died and 12,500 were injured” (Nikolic 2016, para. 10). Adam Robert (1999) analyzes the debates over legality and legitimacy of NATO’s first war.

The Vienna Talks on the Future Status of Kosovo

Following the Military Technical Agreement between the International Security Force (“KFOR”) and the Governments of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and the Republic of Serbia that ended NATO bombing and the Kosovo War (NATO 1999), the UN Security Council adopted Resolution 1244 on June 10, 1999, largely imposing the Rambouillet Accords, giving NATO authority over the security in Kosovo while establishing the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) to implement a comprehensive peacebuilding project and administer the area until the final status would be decided (UN Security Council 1999a, b). By 2003, the interim period of 3 years mentioned in the Rambouillet Accords to start the status talks passed. But given the context in the international community at the time, the UN was not ready to deal with this issue. Therefore, in December 2003, the UN introduced the “standards before status” policy, which basically conditioned the beginning of the process of deciding the final status of Kosovo on the fulfillment of eight standards, each containing specific requirements: functioning democratic institutions, rule of law, freedom of movement, sustainable returns and the rights of communities and their members, economy, property rights, dialogue, and Kosovo protection corps (UN Security Council 2003). These conditions formed the building blocks of the overall efforts of the UN and other Western agencies of promotion of liberal democracy as a panacea for conflict resolution and sustainable peace. However, in March 2004, riots erupted, and the Serbian community and their cultural heritage in Kosovo were attacked by organized groups belonging to ethnic Albanian population (UN 2004). Lack of clarity over the future of the country was seen as one of the triggers of the violence. Special Envoy of the UN Secretary-General, Ambassador Kai Eide, argued that the standards were very ambitious objectives for Kosovo, and there was a need for a proper process that would resolve the status issue in order to achieve further progress (UN Security Council 2004). In his subsequent report in 2005, Ambassador Eide submitted a second report to the UN Security Council on the question of ripeness of the situation to begin status talks for Kosovo, and he argued that status talks should start, despite the challenges (UN Security Council 2005).

Following a Presidential Statement from the UN Security Council, endorsing the status talks (UN 2005), the UN Secretary-General on November 1, 2005, appointed former Finnish President Martti Ahtisaari as Special Envoy to lead the negotiations, tasked to reach a political settlement on the future status of Kosovo. The choice of President Ahtisaari as a mediator was logical, since he was the only negotiator to have a positive record in dealing with Milosevic as explained in previous paragraphs. The negotiations started in Vienna, Austria, on February 20, 2006, and unlike the proximity talks at the Rambouillet Conference, these were direct talks and marked the first time the two sides (Albanians and Serbs) met since the war. However, from the start of the talks, it became clear that because both parties entered the negotiations with diametrically opposed positions, achieving a mutually acceptable solution to Kosovo’s future status would be impossible. Kosovo-Albanians wanted nothing short of independence, which was a red line for the Serbian delegation, who offered substantial autonomy for Kosovo within Serbia. The main argument of the Serbian side was based on the principle of sovereignty and territorial integrity (Weller, The Vienna Negotiations on the Final Status for Kosovo 2008). However, for the Kosovo-Albanians, returning under Serbian rule was unimaginable and tantamount to war.

After intensive negotiations for over a year, in March 2007, President Ahtisaari submitted his report to the UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, where he states that “Reintegration [of Kosovo] into Serbia is not a viable option' and 'Continued international administration is not sustainable,' and therefore he concludes "that the only viable option for Kosovo is independence, to be supervised for an initial period by the international community" (UN Security Council 2007a, b). The report included a "Comprehensive Proposal for the Kosovo Status Settlement" commonly known as the "Ahtisaari Plan," which encompassed all aspects of organization of the future state of Kosovo, practically prescribing the future Constitution of Kosovo. The Ahtisaari Plan defines Kosovo as a multiethnic state and provides extensive rights and strong protection for non-majority (Albanian) communities (UN Security Council 2007a, b). These rights included representation in all 3 branches of the government, including 20 guaranteed seats in a 120-strong Kosovo Assembly, as well as the so-called double majority principles on adopting laws and changes to laws that are important for non-majority communities, such as the law on language use, law on cultural heritage, law on local elections, etc. With respect to representation in the government and judiciary, which are specified in the Kosovo Constitution, which is based on the Ahtisaari Plan, at least two government ministers need to come from the non-majority communities, while at least 15% of the judges in the Supreme Court and appeal courts need to come from non-majority communities (Constitution of Kosovo 2008). The Ahtisaari Plan also provides protective zones for the cultural and religious sites of the Serbian community.

However, because the Plan proposed that the future status of Kosovo should be independence, it was vehemently rejected by Serbians and Russians who threatened to veto the Plan if it was presented before the UN Security Council for a vote. Following this, Contact Group countries (France, Germany, Italy, Russia, the UK, the USA) agreed to establish a new diplomatic initiative, called Troika, as a last effort to try and convince Kosovo and Serbia to reach a deal. Members of "Troika" were Wolfgang Ischinger, a German who represented the EU, Frank Wisner who represented the USA, and Alexander Botsan-Kharchenko who represented Russia. Troika had a time frame of 120 days for additional negotiations for a deal, and the new rounds of talks started in August of 2007, but at the end of the process, Troika reached the same conclusion as President Ahtisaari did that both parties had diametrically opposed positions on the issue of status and conclude that "[n]either side was willing to yield on the basic question of sovereignty" (UN Security Council 2007a, b, p. 4). Russia reflected the position of Serbia, and although they were part of the Troika process, they still refused to accept the Ahtisaari Plan, because of Serbia. In the absence of a deal, and in close coordination with the US and key EU Member States, Kosovo declared its independence on February 17, 2008. From Serbia's point of view, this was a unilateral step on the side of Kosovo. Recognition of the independence of Kosovo by the US and EU Member States was conditioned with the implementation of the Ahtisaari Plan, which was clear in the recognition letters.

However, although the independence of Kosovo – according to the country's Ministry of Foreign Affairs – has been recognized by 116 states (MFA n.d.), the lack of a deal, or a divorce agreement, with Serbia, has produced two major consequences for Kosovo: first, it has affected consolidation and integration of Kosovo in international society as a fully pledged sovereign state, because Russia would block any attempts of Kosovo for membership in the UN, and, second, there are five EU Member States (Cyprus, Greece, Slovakia, Spain, and Romania) that do not recognize Kosovo's independence, and this has become a key obstacle for European integration process of Kosovo, which is a national priority for all countries of the Western Balkans. While all these five states have justified their position of nonrecognition on the basis of implications for their internal politics, they also have signaled that if a deal will be reached between Kosovo and Serbia on the issue of the status, they would change their position. This situation placed the European Union at the best position to lead the third attempt for reaching a negotiated agreement between Kosovo and Serbia.

Dialogue for Normalization of Relations Between Kosovo and Serbia

Following the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) that Kosovo's declaration of independence did not violate international law (ICJ 2010), the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution that acknowledges the opinion of the ICJ and "welcomes the readiness of the European Union to facilitate a process of dialogue between the parties" (UN 2010). The dialogue for normalization of relations between Belgrade and Prishtina or as it is commonly referred the "Brussels Dialogue" started in 2011, with the purpose "to promote cooperation between the two sides, help them achieve progress on the path to Europe and improve the lives of the people" (EEAS 2016, para. 1).

The initial phase of the dialogue started in March 2011 until March 2012, between senior officials from Kosovo and Serbia, and was mediated by EEAS Councilor Robert Cooper. This phase is commonly referred to as the technical dialogue and focused on tackling practical issues between the two countries, and a number of agreements were reached such as agreement to exchange of liaison officers, whose offices are located in the EU buildings in Prishtina and Belgrade; agreement on custom stamps which enabled trade between Serbia and Kosovo; agreement on cadastral records; agreement on integrated border management; and agreement on recognition of university diplomas (Gashi and Novakovic 2017). The approach of the EU in this phase was to try and get the parties to agree on issues that were of mutual interest for their citizens to address and by doing so shaping a culture of compromise and agreement-making between the parties that would come in aid when dealing with more complex political issues between Kosovo and Serbia. Agreements reached in the Brussels Dialogue are officially called conclusions, and there are tripartite implementation working groups with members from Kosovo, Serbia, and the EU.

The high-level dialogue, or the "political dialogue" as it is commonly referred, started in October 2012 and has continued since, and it is facilitated directly by the EU High Representative for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy, and it involved the political leaders from both countries, initially at the level of the Prime Ministers of Serbia and Kosovo. This phase of the dialogue managed to produce the first ever agreement to be accepted by both parties called "First Agreement of Principles Governing the Normalisation of Relations" which initiated on April 19, 2013, by the Prime Ministers of Kosovo and Serbia (Government of Kosovo 2013). Major section of the agreement is dedicated to the establishment of the association/community of the Serb Majority Municipalities, but the other significant point of this agreement is the commitment of Serbia and Kosovo not to block each other in their process of integration in the EU (point 14).

However, despite the agreement being held as historic, it has failed to produce meaningful results in the ground, and its major section about the establishment of an association/community of Serb municipalities has not been implemented. Overall, concerning the EU-facilitated dialogue, Gezim Visoka argues that "... the dialogue produced domestic political resistance, hesitation, and uncertainty in Kosovo and Serbia. Both sides have questioned the viability and the potential risks that such a process would bring to their national interests" (Visoka 2017, p. 189).

Summary

In summary, each peacemaking process on Kosovo produced a new situation that moved toward conflict resolution, but two decades later, the conflict between Kosovo and Serbia is not yet fully resolved, and the UN continues to be present in Kosovo, albeit without meaningful authority and in very small numbers. With respect to the UN post-conflict peacebuilding approaches, Kosovo case seems to suggest that while the UN can be effective, notwithstanding criticism, in institution building, developing the necessary infrastructure for restoring normality, organizing elections and the democratic process, and promoting civil society, when it comes to addressing more complex political issues which are often at the heart of most conflicts, the UN is itself not a decisive actor, but permanent Member States of the Security Council dictate the outcome (Cronin 2002). The failure of the UN Security Council to approve the recommendation and the report on the status of Kosovo, although authored by UN's own Special Envoy President Ahtisaari, has created the conditions for frozen conflict in Kosovo and perpetuated uncertainty about the future among Kosovo citizens.

References

- Archive. (1990, July 2). Retrieved from archive: https://archive.org/details/deklarata_kushtetues
- Bellamy, A. J. (2002). Kosovo and international society (1st ed.). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Clark, H. (2000). Civil resistance in Kosovo (1st ed.). London: Pluto Press.
- Constitution of Kosovo. (2008, April 9). Kosovo assembly. Retrieved June 19, 2019, from http://kuvendikosoves.org/common/docs/Constitution_of_the_Republic_of_Kosovo_with_amend.I-XXV_2017.pdf
- Cronin, B. (2002). The two faces of the United Nations: The tension between intergovernmentalism and transnationalism. Global Governance, 8(1), 53–71.
- EEAS. (2016, March 1). EU facilitated dialogue: Belgrade – Pristina relations. Retrieved from European External Action Service (EEAS): https://eeas.europa.eu/headquarters/headquarters-homepage/82/about-european-external-action-service-eeas_en
- Gashi, S., & Novakovic, I. (2017, September). FES. Retrieved June 6, 2019, from <http://library.fes.de/pdf-files/bueros/belgrad/13820.pdf>
- Government of Kosovo. (2013, April 19). Office of the Prime Minister/Documents. Retrieved June 3, 2019, from http://kryeministri-ks.net/wp-content/uploads/docs/First_agreement_of_principles_governing_the_normalization_of_relations_April_19_2013_Brussels_en.pdf
- Gow, J. (1998). Kosovo after the Holbrooke-Milosevic agreement. What now? The International Spectator, 33, 17–22.
- Holbrooke, R. (1998). To end a war. New York: Random House.
- HRW. (1999, January 29). Human rights watch. Retrieved June 9, 2019, from <https://www.hrw.org/news/1999/01/29/human-rights-watch-investigation-finds-yugoslav-forces-guilty-war-crimes-racak-kosovo>
- HRW. (n.d.-a). Human rights watch. Retrieved May 20, 2019, from <https://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/kosovo/Obrinje6-02.htm>
- HRW. (n.d.-b). Human rights watch. Retrieved from The crisis in Kosovo: <https://www.hrw.org/reports/2000/nato/Natbm200-01.htm>
- ICJ. (2010, July 22). International court of justice. Retrieved June 5, 2019, from <https://www.icj-cij.org/files/case-related/141/141-20100722-ADV-01-00-EN.pdf>
- Judah, T. (2008). Kosovo: What everyone needs to know (1st ed.). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kim, J. (1999). Kosovo conflict chronology: September 1998–March 1999. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service Report for Congress.
- Kushtetuta e Kaçanikut. (1990, September 7). Retrieved from voice of Albania: <https://www.kultplus.com/trash-egimia/kjo-eshte-deklarata-kushtetuese-e-2-korrikut-1990/>
- MFA. (n.d.). Foreign policy/list of recognitions. Retrieved from Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Kosovo: <http://mfaks.net/al/politika/484/lista-e-njohjeve/484>
- NATO. (1999, June 9). Basic documents. Retrieved July 10, 2019, from NATO: <https://www.nato.int/kosovo/docu/a990609a.htm>
- Nikolic, I. (2016, March 24). Balkan transitional justice. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2016/03/24/serbia-remembers-nato-bombing-victims-03-24-2016/>
- PBS. (n.d.-a). Retrieved from Frontline: <https://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/kosovo/interviews/holbrooke.html>
- PBS. (n.d.-b). PBS Frontline. Retrieved May 20, 2019, from <https://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/kosovo/interviews/talbott.html>
- Roberts, A. (1999). Retrieved from Columbia University: <http://www.columbia.edu/itc/sipa/S6800/courseworks/NATOhumanitarian.pdf>
- The Independent International Commission on Kosovo. (2000). The Kosovo report: Conflict, international response, lessons learned. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- UN. (2004, 13 April). UN Press Release. Retrieved May 17, 2019, from <https://www.un.org/press/en/2004/sc8056.doc.htm>
- UN. (2005, October 24). UN. Retrieved May 17, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BFCF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/Kos%20SPRST%202005%2051.pdf>
- UN. (2010, September 9). United Nations. Retrieved June 5, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BFCF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/ROL%20A%20RES64%20298.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (1998a, March 31). United Nations Security Council files. Retrieved June 10, 2019, from <http://unscr.com/files/1998/01160.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (1998b, October 24). United Nations Security Council files. Retrieved June 10, 2019, from <http://unscr.com/files/1998/01203.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (1999a, February 23). Peace agreements. Retrieved July 10, 2019, from United Nations peacemaker: https://peacemaker.un.org/sites/peacemaker.un.org/files/990123_RambouilletAccord.pdf
- UN Security Council. (1999b, June 10). Peace agreements. Retrieved July 9, 2019, from United Nations peacemaker: <https://peacemaker.un.org/kosovo-resolution1244>

- UN Security Council. (2003, December 10). Retrieved May 5, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/Kos%20Standards.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (2004, November 30). Security Council report. Retrieved May 17, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/kos%20S2004%20932.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (2005, October 7). Retrieved May 17, 2019, from <https://undocs.org/S/2005/635>
- UN Security Council. (2007a, March 26). UN Security Council. Retrieved June 17, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/Kosovo%20S2007%20168.pdf>
- UN Security Council. (2007b, December 4). UN Security Council. Retrieved May 19, 2019, from <https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/Kosovo%20S2007%20723.pdf>
- Visoka, G. (2017). Shaping peace in Kosovo: The politics of peacebuilding and statehood (1st ed.). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Weller, M. (1999). The Rambouillet conference on Kosovo. International Affairs, 75(2), 211–251.
- Weller, M. (2008). The Vienna negotiations on the final status for Kosovo. International Affairs, 84(4), 659–681.

challenges researchers to try and understand conflict and violence not only from the less contentious perspectives of the victims or the analytically less entangled perspective of bystanders or outsiders but also from the viewpoint of those who planned and enacted the violence. Recent research on perpetrators has shifted its focus down the hierarchy to increasingly studying low-level perpetrators, engaging with these men and women across various different cases in order to try to understand their motivations for perpetration. Furthermore, perpetrator research focuses on perpetrators in post-violence societies, studying how they reintegrate into society, how transitional justice mechanisms deal with them, as well as how their actions are remembered societally and constructed in cultural representations of them. As such, perpetrator research attempts to untangle the various actions that these men and women are involved in and reconstruct the meaning that they have at the time and in retrospect both for the perpetrators themselves and for the societies in which they acted.

Peacetech

- ▶ Technology and Peace

Performance

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Perpetrator Research

Timothy Williams
 Department of Political Science, Bundeswehr University Munich, Munich, Germany

Definition

Perpetrator research has become an important sub-discipline of peace and conflict studies. It

Perpetrator Research: An Evolving Agenda

While for a long time victims' perspectives on violence were privileged, there is an increasing consensus that engaging with perpetrators' perspectives is also fundamental for our understanding of violence dynamics and their aftermath. While perpetrator perspectives can be morally more problematic, analytically they are vital for a fuller comprehension of how violence unfolds and what it means for post-violence societies. As such, some of the key questions that perpetrator research grapples with include:

- Why do otherwise ordinary men and women participate in atrocities?
- How do post-violence societies deal with the perpetrators in judicial, political, cultural, or other terms?
- How do societies reintegrate the people who committed atrocities?
- How are the acts of perpetration remembered and represented?

This emerging research agenda finds its antecedents in the biographical research on high-level perpetrators in the Holocaust that was conducted from the 1950s onward. In the 1990s research opened up to an interest in the low-level perpetrators, the men and women who actually implemented the violence and sustained the system that allowed the Holocaust to occur. In the early 2000s, perpetrator research became more diversified in various ways. First, it turned its focus beyond the Nazi regime to also study perpetrators in the genocides in Rwanda, Cambodia, and Bosnia as well as perpetrators of atrocities in civil wars and authoritarian regimes around the world. Second, it began to more systematically not just study perpetrators during the violence itself but engage with their post-violence journeys, particularly in interaction with transitional justice processes and different forms of societal dealing with the past. Third, representations of perpetrators and their significance for cultural heritage came into view. Fourth, feminist approaches to studying perpetrators have become more pronounced, drawing attention to how gendered differences exist throughout all the topics of perpetrator research. This increasing establishment of perpetrator research in the academic community manifests itself visibly in the increasing numbers of special issues and edited volumes dedicated to the study of perpetrators (see, e.g., Jessee 2015; Smeulers et al. 2019; Williams and Buckley-Zistel 2018), as well as in the foundation of a Perpetrator Studies Network which has organized several conferences and in 2017 launched the Journal of Perpetrator Research.

While perpetrator research does engage with perpetrators of various crimes, there is a preponderance on the study of perpetrators of genocide. This is, on the one hand, understandable as genocide is purportedly the “crime of crimes” and the most violent of crimes; however, at the same time many of the individual acts that these perpetrators engage in are no different to the acts that perpetrators in other crimes engage in. For example, the killing of civilians in genocide bears significant similarities to massacres in the context of civil war, or the killing of political opponents under repressive, authoritarian regimes. While there are also studies of perpetrators in other types of violence, these studies are seldom positioned explicitly in the realm of perpetrator research, and much less often are they comparative in nature, leading to disparate knowledge production in various fields.

This entry will first discuss some ethical and methodological issues in conducting perpetrator research and discuss how disaggregation of perpetration into actions allows a more nuanced and complex understanding. Subsequently, the entry will discuss several main topics in perpetrator research: the motivations of perpetrators to participate in violence and the violence dynamics; the dynamics in post-violence societies, particularly surrounding transitional justice efforts and within the context of the politics of memory; the way perpetrators are represented culturally; and the gendered dynamics that surround perpetrators during and after violence. Finally, two cases that have received an overwhelming amount of attention in the literature will be briefly discussed here: the Holocaust and the 1994 genocide against the Tutsi.

Approaching Perpetrators: The Ethics and Methods of Perpetrator Research

Perpetrator research spans various disciplines from philosophy to literature, sociology to law, psychology to history, and anthropology to political science, among others. As such, there is no set methodological canon across these disciplines, but most research on perpetrators focuses on archival documentation or fieldwork with perpetrators. Archival documents are predominantly generated either by the perpetrators themselves – official communications, policies and directives, as well as personal diaries, letters, or memoirs – or through transitional justice processes, in the form of investigation documents, court documents, truth commission hearings, or reports. Fieldwork for the most part consists of in-depth interviews with perpetrators, sometimes using an oral historical methodology, other times more thematic, while some researchers engage in longer-term ethnographic field stays; other researchers also engage in large sample surveys with perpetrators. Beyond this, innovative work is conducted on the cultural representations of perpetrators in memorialization processes, literature, exhibitions, plays and dance performances, and other similar cultural activities.

While the challenges and shortcomings of archival research and studies on cultural representations resonate with the relevant debates in the respective fields of the researchers (often history), given the burgeoning amount of fieldwork conducted, an interdisciplinary discussion of methodological challenges and ethical questions that are specific to research on perpetrators has begun. Particularly salient are discussions on issues regarding how testimony is to be interpreted, the question of the veracity that perpetrator interviews can generate, and how to deal with incentives to lie in interviews, as well as the nature of truth, the difficult access to perpetrators, as well as ethical questions of what to do with incriminating evidence when this is disclosed during interview or how to do justice to “do no harm” and other ethical principles in ensuring that the research avoids a stigmatization of the perpetrator in the community or hampers potential reintegration or reconciliation, as well as potential danger to researchers (Fujii 2009; Schmidt 2017; various articles in Jessee 2015).

Perpetration as Action and as Complex

One key development in perpetrator research sees the object of study disaggregated analytically into individual acts of perpetration, comprehending violence inherently as action (Gudehus 2018). This enables one to go beyond assumptions that actors need be consistent in their actions over time, allowing for motivations to vary and engagement with the violence to fluctuate. Furthermore, the types of actions can vary over time, with an individual engaging in acts of perpetration at one point of time, being a bystander at another, or even rescuing at times. This disaggregation is important as it allows an understanding of the perpetration in the broader context of the situation in which it occurred, rendering the subjective understanding of the act of perpetration more comprehensible for researchers. This is furthermore important as it reflects the diverse recollections of the past that the perpetrators themselves hold.

Disaggregation also allows for a more nuanced perspective regarding the complexity of perpetrator roles and the agency that various individuals acquire in violence settings. Erin Baines (2009) pioneered the concept of complex political perpetrators using the example of Dominic Ongwen who was abducted and recruited as a child soldier, thus clearly demarcating him as a victim, and yet he also rose through the ranks, himself committing a multitude of atrocities, including abducting children to be soldiers; it was through these acts of perpetration only that he was able to develop the agency to overcome his own victimhood. Erin Jessee (2017) also discusses various forms of complex political actors during the Rwandan genocide whose experiences include variable combinations of perpetration, rescue, and victimhood from different ethnic perspectives (see also Fujii 2009). Discussions of agency thus become more nuanced and insightful as they can deal better with fluctuating conditions and constraints (Williams 2018).

Violence Dynamics and Perpetrator Motivations

One of the key questions discussed within perpetrator research is what motivates these individuals. While there is a relatively broad consensus that these are ordinary men and women, aberrant neither psychologically nor in their personalities, “extraordinary only by what they did not by who they were” (Waller 2002, 8) and that only more complex explanations that embrace multiple motivations can fully capture the diversity of perpetration (Anderson 2017).

Within the plethora of motivations, one can differentiate – drawing on the terminology of social identity theory – between motivations that are focused on the ingroup of the perpetrators and the outgroup of the victims or are rooted in opportunistic intentions (for this systematic approach, see Williams forthcoming). The most prominent motivation rooted in perpetrator ingroup dynamics is obedience to authority, as well as social dynamics between peers – notably the desire for conformity and peer pressure – that provide strong motivations for people to participate in violence as they seek to maintain positive relations with their peer group and identify strongly with their comrades and friends in the group (Browning 2001, 174; Fujii 2009; Kühl 2014, 148; McDoom 2013). Another motivation – often claimed by perpetrators themselves as it allows them to displace responsibility for their actions – is the threat of coercion that may have motivated many in the Holocaust but was not actually very credible but was considerably more credible in Rwanda and Armenia, and particularly in Cambodia under the totalitarian Khmer Rouge.

Motivations that focus on the victim outgroup include different types of emotions and ideologies. While hotly contested in the 1990s “Goldhagen debate” (Browning 2001; Goldhagen 1996), the consensus today is that many perpetrators are not motivated by ideology. Nevertheless, ideology can take on a number of other important roles, such as providing moral justification for the acts of violence, providing dehumanization of the victims, or construction of them as a threat, explored in most nuances by Jonathan Leader Maynard (2014). Emotionally, individuals can be motivated to participate in genocide as the emotions change their perception of the context and realign their interests, most prominently, fear, resentment, hatred, rage, disgust, etc.

Finally, opportunistic motivations mean that individuals hope for some form of personal gain from their perpetration, for example, forwarding their career, receiving the opportunity to loot and steal, receiving benefits for being members of the group like better food or working conditions, or eliminating political rivals or resolving personal conflicts that predate and are unrelated to the genocide (Gross 2003). Furthermore, the thrill of doing something otherwise forbidden can be motivating, as can the sadistic pleasure of causing pain to others.

Many more motivations and other conducive factors also exist, but it would go beyond the scope of this entry to discuss them all. It is noteworthy, however, that there are many psychological factors that are particularly facilitative of someone participating but that do not actually motivate the individuals (see in particular Waller 2002; Williams forthcoming).

Furthermore, most of the literature that focuses explicitly on perpetrators’ motivations considers predominantly participation in genocide or similar mass atrocities; however, there are also studies that look at radicalization trajectories into terrorism, motivations to join and fight in rebel groups or militias, or why soldiers engage in sexual violence.

Post-Violence Dealing with Perpetrators

An important further field within perpetrator research is constituted by perpetrators’ post-conflict trajectories, particularly as they interact with societal dealing with the past in various forms of transitional justice; most studies focus on the perpetrators themselves, while others focus more strongly on how perpetrators are even constructed in post-conflict societies. These questions are of particular relevance because the perpetrators’ positions in society can be instructive in understanding the potential for post-violence reconciliation or the risks of potential re-ignition of conflict.

On a more individual level, scholars have studied how perpetrators deal with their past participation in atrocities, for example, through the development of shame or guilt after the end of the Holocaust (Kellenbach 2013; Tames 2016). As such, there is a keen interest on how this dealing with their personal past impacts reintegration, as well as its impact on the next generations and particularly how perpetrator children can relate to their parents (Jeftic 2019; Tames 2016). These post-conflict trajectories are important for understanding how the perpetrators themselves make sense of their past and cope with what they have done and what ramifications this has on their mental health and that of their families.

How perpetrators come to narrate their own personal histories, as well as the social history of their countries, particularly diverging accounts vis-à-vis the post-conflict narratives propagated by the state, is also in focus. For example, work studies how perpetrators claim victimhood for themselves or attempt to redefine debates on national reconciliation (Jessee 2017; Manning 2015). Of particular interest here are child soldiers who can be seen as both victims and perpetrators (Drumbl 2012). These diverging narratives about the conflict and their own role in them can have serious repercussions for post-conflict repair, as responsibility and culpability are attributed differently and it can become difficult or impossible to find a narration of the past that is acceptable to different parts of society and thus could possibly provide the foundation for a reconciliation process.

The complexity of perpetrators as victims resides not only in their own perceptions but also in how they are discussed and constructed socially, here particularly in how they and their responsibility are depicted during their trials (Rauschenbach et al. 2016; Skjelsbæk 2018) and truth commissions (Anderson 2018; Renner 2015) or at memorials. As such, perpetrator constructions play into these societal debates on responsibility and have important impact on whether perpetrator self-representations are deemed acceptable or not. While in most cases perpetrators will tend to be demonized, there are more complex allocations of victimhood and perpetration in others. For example, former Khmer Rouge in Cambodia almost all self-identify as victims, a narrative that is also accepted in parts of society and that is reinforced by the transitional justice process as former Khmer Rouge can even become civil parties and claim reparations as complex political victims (Bernath 2016).

Cultural Representations of Perpetrators

While Adorno famously suggested it were barbaric to write poetry after Auschwitz, today there are still some questions about whether representation is even possible in light of the horror of genocide itself or whether it can even occur without sensationalization. Nonetheless, mass violence, genocide, and other atrocities are represented culturally, and among them we find depictions of perpetrators across literature, film, visual art, memorials, and other cultural media (for an overview, see various chapters in Rau 2013).

One piece of literature that has received particular recent attention is Jonathan Littell's (2009) novel The Kindly Ones. This novel unsettlingly portrays the perspective of an SS officer during World War II and the Holocaust, raising questions of whether such an "honest" portrayal risks rationalizing and excusing the acts. Other scholars argue that there is more potential in this unsettling taking on the perpetrator perspective for honing critical sensibilities. For example, the book's visual objects and perpetrator images or "the aesthetics of excess" (Sandberg 2014) tie into broader discussions regarding the role of empathetic engagement with narratives of perpetrators in fictional literature (McGlothlin 2016).

Also, in cinematic representation of mass atrocity, a humanized version of perpetrators is often presented in which an understanding for the perpetrator is developed, and moreover even the trauma of the perpetrators is increasingly present (Morag 2013). As such, these cultural representations of perpetrators as "ordinary" men and women tie strongly into academic understandings of the individuals who become perpetrators, although potentially it could be detrimental to the overall understanding of the destructive nature of the acts they engage in.

Finally, perpetrators and their acts of perpetration also play a role in exhibitions or at memorial sites or in civil society memory projects, where representations of perpetrators are analyzed in their connection to broader memory politics and the ascription of responsibility (Knittel 2014). Here, responsibility and roles are ascribed through the way the exhibitions are curated and tie into the broader post-violence narratives discussed above.

Gendered Understandings of Perpetrators

An important development in the study of perpetrators is a more nuanced understanding of gendered dynamics during violence, as well as in the aftermath of violence dealing with the past and in the representation of these perpetrators. A prominent entry into the topic argued that women are portrayed variously as mothers, monsters, or whores (Sjoberg and Gentry 2007), providing a useful analytical lens for much other work. For example, women perpetrators are often sexualized (Heschel 2004), playing into Sjoberg and Gentry's topos of a whore, something that does not occur for male perpetrators.

Given different constraints on their agency and differing, gendered expectations toward what roles are deemed appropriate for women and men, women participate in genocide in different ways (Brown 2017) and are allocated different roles in militant organizations, too (Eggert 2018). Nonetheless, gender analyses also reveal how women do also engage in sexual violence during war, even though stereotypical ascriptions allow only for women to be victims (Sjoberg 2016).

This gendered differentiation continues in post-genocide societal dealing with the past and have, for example, impeded investigation and prosecution of women involved with the SS (Heschel 2004).

Perpetrators in the Holocaust

In a similar vein to genocide studies, memory studies, victimology, and other sub-disciplines, perpetrator research is deeply anchored in and has emerged from debates surrounding the study of the Holocaust. The Holocaust is paradigmatic in almost all research on perpetrators and remains emblematic in representations of any violence, especially in representations of perpetrators. Nonetheless, or perhaps because of this, literature on the Holocaust is often also separate from much of the other literature on perpetrators, particularly in the more historical approaches.

First dealings with perpetrators in the context of the Holocaust focused strongly on biographical approaches, primarily with a focus on high-level perpetrators but with some mid-level perpetrators being portrayed, too. In the 1990s, the focus turned more strongly to the lower-level individuals who had implemented the Holocaust, the men (and sometimes women) who had been the cogs in the machine. While deeply controversial, the "Goldhagen debate" (Browning 2001; Goldhagen 1996) was key in establishing this field of interest that has led to the broad interest in low-level perpetrators in academia, as well as cultural representations of them in various media.

The Holocaust was implemented by a wide array of actors, all of whom have received some attention in the literature. The most prominent actors – both in terms of popular perceptions and cultural depictions, as well as academic attention – are concentration and extermination camp staff, SS officers responsible for the gas chambers, and crematoria that have become representative of the Holocaust itself. Naturally, there are perpetrators active prior to the extermination at the camp and the individuals involved in consolidation and ghettoization, deportation, transportation, as well as the legal framework behind these, and the logistics that enabled them are key perpetrators who have been studied. More broadly, other bureaucrats and technocrats have been studied as perpetrators in the wider system of planned violence. Reserve police battalions conducted much of the killing in areas from which deportations were not easily possible, constituting another important perpetrator group that has been studied in-depth not only in the context of the Goldhagen debate but also since. Furthermore, there has been an increasing focus also on auxiliary troops, sometimes called trawniki, who were recruited from areas under Nazi occupation or from prisoner-of-war camps and who were often allocated the most disturbing and distressing tasks. Finally, there has been some attention paid to perpetrators within the local populations under Nazi rule, men and women who under Nazi duress or only with their tacit approval committed atrocities against the local Jewish population. This field of research has come under strong political attack from nationalistic governments in Eastern Europe (particularly Poland), as some politicians suggest that this is a minimization of German responsibility and a displacement of blame for the Holocaust to Polish (or other) individuals.

In disciplinary terms, the field of Holocaust research is dominated by historians, although there are interesting and important interventions from a broad array of disciplines, depending on the topic (see, e.g., Kühl 2014). While in-depth interviews with perpetrators have been conducted by some researchers, the vast majority of research is based on archival documents, sometimes from the bureaucratic structures of the government, police force, and concentration camp system but most often also documentation created in the context of post-Holocaust trials of the perpetrators, the investigations that were conducted for these, and the testimony these individuals gave.

Given the amount of trials that have been conducted, these trials and the shifts in international criminal law that they have provoked have also been the focus of considerable research, as have the many and manifold representations perpetrators have received in the media and cultural projects since the end of the Holocaust.

Perpetrators in the 1994 Genocide Against the Tutsi

Another well-studied case of perpetrators is in the context of the 1994 genocide against the Tutsi in Rwanda. In stark contrast to the research on the Holocaust, there are few studies that focus on individual perpetrators and their biographies, instead focusing much more strongly on the low-level perpetrators and the killing groups they were involved with. This is due partly to the fact that the genocide occurred at a time when this shift in focus was already happening in the study of the Holocaust but also because of the nature of the violence.

In Rwanda, violence was mandated and ordered by the Hutu extremists who seized power in the aftermath of President Habyarimana's airplane being shot down, but its implementation was considerably less top-down and state-driven than in the Holocaust. The violence was organized by the state, and the mandate for violence was clear through extensive radio and print propaganda, as well as through state structures that were ordered to participate, but the actual killing was conducted only partly by state personnel such as the military and gendarmes; instead youth militia, so-called interahamwe, who had been trained for this purpose over the past years, as well as large groups of civilians mobilized more or less spontaneously, were responsible for the vast majority of the killing. Killing occurred at the very local level at roadblocks, at people's homes, or in hunts across the hills and marshes of the country. As such, it is these localized dynamics that have been at the focus of research on perpetrators in Rwanda, rather than individual people responsible for the violence (Fujii 2009; McDoom 2013; Straus 2006).

Genocide in Rwanda has been dealt with in a vast array of ways, beginning with judicial handling of various cases at the UN-mandated International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda, within the national justice system, as well as in the Gacaca court system, in which more than 1.9 million cases were tried. This comprehensive dealing with perpetrators is unprecedented for any other case and has led to much research on how perpetrators have been treated within the various justice systems, as well as how their crimes have been construed. Furthermore, the Rwandan government has engaged in a far-reaching program for unity and reconciliation that includes many activities such as re-education programs and labor programs that aim to re-introduce convicted perpetrators back into society after their releases, as well as many education programs for young people and others across society. As such, the government is extremely active in shaping the memory discourse around perpetrators in the country, and this hands-on approach as well as many of the programs has been discussed critically in the literature on dealing with the past in Rwanda (Jessee 2017).

Most research on perpetrators in the country is conducted drawing on in-depth interviews with perpetrators themselves (Brown 2017; Fujii 2009; Jessee 2017; Straus 2006), sometimes also survey-based data collection (McDoom 2013; Straus 2006). This is more feasible for the Rwandan context, first, given that the genocide is not as far passed as the Holocaust and thus there are many individuals with whom it is possible to speak (theoretically at least, whether it is politically possible and if they will engage is a different matter) and, second, given that there is considerably less written documentation from the time of the genocide itself and its judicial aftermath.

Summary

Research on perpetrators has matured over the past couple of decades and will likely continue to establish itself within peace and conflict studies. With this expansion comes a normalization of the field and an acceptance of its research objectives. This is certainly important, and much has been gained by re-humanizing perpetrators and overcoming demonizing representations of these men and women in order to actually understand them and their actions. At the same time, the moral ambiguities in perpetrator research should not be completely neglected or forgotten, and it serves as a brief reminder here that for all the explanatory power that perpetrator research provides, the intention behind this is never to rationalize, justify, or legitimate the actions of the perpetrators but solely to fathom and explain.

This expansion of perpetrator research is also important as prevention is not possible without coming to terms with and understanding perpetrators, their motivations and actions, as well as what the violence means to them in retrospect. While this assumption of the importance of studying perpetrators to inform prevention work is a core rationale routinely vocalized by perpetrator researchers, relatively little research has actually been undertaken to translate the insights of the past years of perpetrator research into lessons learned for prevention. As such, the impact of perpetrator research in prevention practice remains limited and will continue as such until more work on microlevel prevention strategies is undertaken.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice

References

- Anderson, K. (2017). Perpetrating genocide. A criminological account. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Anderson, M. E. (2018). Perpetrator trauma, empathic unsettlement, and the uncanny: Conceptualizations of perpetrators in South Africa's truth commission special report. Journal of Perpetrator Research, 2(1), 95–118.
- Baines, E. (2009). Complex Political Perpetrators. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 47(2), 163–191.
- Bernath, J. (2016). 'Complex political victims' in the aftermath of mass atrocity. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(1), 46–66.
- Brown, S. E. (2017). Gender and the genocide in Rwanda. Women as rescuers and perpetrators. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Browning, C. (2001). Ordinary men. New York: Harper Collins.
- Drumbl, M. (2012). Reimagining child soldiers in international law and policy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Eggert, J. (2018). Female fighters and militants during the Lebanese civil war: Individual profiles, pathways and motivations. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism 1–30.
- Fujii, L. A. (2009). Killing neighbours: Networks of violence in Rwanda. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Goldhagen, D. J. (1996). Hitler's willing executioners. London: Abacus.
- Gross, J. T. (2003). Neighbours. London: Arrow.
- Gudehus, C. (2018). Violence as action. In Perpetrators and perpetration of mass violence. Dynamics, motivations and concepts (pp. 36–57). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Heschel, S. (2004). Does atrocity have a gender? Feminist interpretations of women in the SS. In J. M. Diefendorf (Ed.), Lessons and legacies VI: New currents in holocaust research (pp. 300–321). Evanston: Northwestern University Press.
- Jeftic, A. (2019). Social aspects of memory. Stories of victims and perpetrators from Bosnia-Herzegovina. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Jessee, E. (2015). Introduction. Approaching Perpetrators. Conflict and Society, 1(1), 4–8.
- Jessee, E. (2017). Negotiating genocide in Rwanda. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kellenbach, K. (2013). The mark of Cain. Guilt and denial in the post-war lives of Nazi perpetrators. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Knittel, S. (2014). The historical uncanny: Disability, ethnicity, and the politics of holocaust memory. New York: Fordham University Press.
- Kühl, S. (2014). Ganz normale Organisationen. Berlin: Suhrkamp.
- Leader Maynard, J. (2014). Rethinking the role of ideology in mass atrocities. Terrorism and Political Violence, 26(5), 821–841.

- Littell, J. (2009). The kindly ones. New York: HarperCollins.
- Manning, P. (2015). Reconciliation and perpetrator memories in Cambodia. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 9(3), 386–406.
- McDoom, O. (2013). Who killed in Rwanda's genocide? Journal of Peace Research, 50(4), 453–467.
- McGlothlin, E. (2016). Empathetic identification and the mind of the holocaust perpetrator in fiction: A proposed taxonomy of response. Narrative, 24(3), 251–276.
- Morag, R. (2013). Waltzing with Bashir: Perpetrator trauma and cinema. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Rau, P. (2013). Our Nazis: Representations of fascism in contemporary literature and film. <https://doi.org/10.3366/edinburgh/9780748668649.001.0001>.
- Rauschenbach, M., Staerklé, C., & Scalia, D. (2016). Accused for involvement in collective violence: The discursive reconstruction of agency and identity by perpetrators of international crimes. Political Psychology, 37(2), 219–235.
- Renner, J. (2015). Producing the subjects of reconciliation: The making of Sierra Leoneans as victims and perpetrators of past human rights violations. Third World Quarterly, 36(6), 1110–1128. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1047197>.
- Sandberg, E. (2014). 'This incomprehensible thing': Jonathan Littell's the kindly ones and the aesthetics of excess. Cambridge Quarterly, 43(3), 231–255. <https://doi.org/10.1093/camqtly/bfu015>.
- Schmidt, S. (2017). Perpetrator's knowledge: What and how can we learn from perpetrator testimony? Journal of Perpetrator Research, 1(1), 85–104.
- Sjoberg, L. (2016). Women as wartime rapists. Beyond sensation and stereotyping. New York: NYU Press.
- Sjoberg, L., & Gentry, C. E. (2007). Mothers, monsters, whores: Women's violence in global politics. London: Zed Books.
- Skjelsbæk, I. (2018). Perpetrators of sexual violence in armed conflict. In T. Williams & S. Buckley-Zistel (Eds.), Perpetrators and perpetration of mass violence. Dynamics, motivations and concepts (pp. 151–168). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Smeulers, A., Weerdesteijn, M., & Holá, B. (Eds.). (2019). Perpetrators of international crimes theories, methods, and evidence. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Straus, S. (2006). The order of genocide. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Tames, I. (2016). Ashamed about the past: The case of Nazi collaborators and their families in post-war Dutch society. In S. Bird, M. Fulbrook, J. Wagner, & C. Wienand (Eds.), Reverberations of Nazi violence in Germany and beyond: Disturbing pasts (pp. 47–64). London: Bloomsbury.
- Waller, J. (2002). Becoming evil: How ordinary people commit genocide and mass killing. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Williams, T. (2018). Agency, responsibility, and culpability: The complexity of roles and self-representations of perpetrators. Journal of Perpetrator Research, 2(1), 39–64.
- Williams, T. (forthcoming). The complexity of evil. Modeling perpetration in genocide. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Williams, T., & Buckley-Zistel, S. (2018). Perpetrators and perpetration of mass violence. Dynamics, motivations and concepts. Abingdon: Routledge.

Phenomenological Peace

Hartmut Behr and Liam Devereux
Newcastle University, Newcastle, UK

Definition

Phenomenological peace responds to the longstanding and pressing issue of difference in peacebuilding theory and practice. The multitude of attempts to engage and “solve” the question of difference is reasoned by the empirical circumstance that differences, whether religious, social, political, or economic, are at the root of conflicts. Phenomenological peace perceives difference(s) in a non-essentialized way and posits this approach as the only way to view, and basis from which to act upon, differences that is conducive to peaceful relations. This is because all essentialist or essentializing perceptions of difference, such as those underpinning liberal and post-liberal peace, establish a hierarchy between different groups and require their subordination to one reified, universal script. This causes and triggers, rather than resolves, conflict. Phenomenological peace is based on a philosophical reading of the problem of difference which sees difference and the subsequent question of the construction of “otherness” as irreducible, experiential foundations of all social and political relations. Phenomenological approaches suggest that a non-essentialized understanding of difference(s) can render difference(s) as positive social and political forces. When framing the question of peace as a question of difference, two interrelated problems emerge which, although they cannot be fully explicated in the scope of this entry, must be alluded to. These consist of the following: first, the legacy of thinking difference in Western philosophy and political theory establishes hierarchical and thus unpeaceful relations among individual people and conflict parties; and, second and related, the tradition of phenomenological thinking, beginning in the early twentieth century, opens up alternatives to rethink and reconceptualize difference and subsequently for peace thinking and peace practices. The innovative character of phenomenological peace is that difference(s) and “otherness” are conceptualized as a matter of our perception, and thus as open to transformation, rather than as possessing fixed substances and identities that could be grasped, stigmatized, or acted upon.

Introduction

Next to liberal and post-liberal peace, a third concept for thinking through peace and peace-making is phenomenological peace. The conceptualization of phenomenological peace harks back to the philosophical tradition of phenomenology and is mainly informed by the oeuvres of Georg Simmel, Alfred Schütz, Martin Heidegger, Emmanuel Lévinas, and Jacques Derrida. In the center of phenomenological peace stands the problem of difference. Phenomenological peace is built around the questions of how to think and act upon differences. Peace is thus fundamentally perceived as an engagement with “the” “other,” both theoretically and practically. According to phenomenological peace, every vision and practice of peace needs to reflect upon the question of difference, “otherness,” and the concrete “other” who is ultimately the one together with whom peace must be built. Whether we as individuals, citizens, political activists, politicians, or most importantly as conflict parties act in a peaceful way, or less so, depends on our relation to our fellow humans. Thus, phenomenological peace always articulates (as) a relation to the “other.” The main argument of phenomenological peace is that non-essentialist ways of thinking and acting upon difference(s) are more conducive to peaceful relations than essentialized visions of difference. The second, subsequent argument holds that, in practical terms, a non-essentialist way dealing with difference surmounts in the maxims of political dialogue and optionality. These conceptions are empathetic for differences, embracing their free articulation, and steadily moving to and provoking the edges of established rationalities. There are two important basics of phenomenological peace: first, difference is a fundamental human condition and irreducible experience of political and social life; and second, difference and “otherness” are not the same and cannot be equated because “otherness” is already a particular perception and construction of difference (why “otherness” or “other”).

Phenomenological peace shares the critique of liberal peace in common with post-liberal peace, especially relating to the universalization of liberal individualism and the Western model of state-building. But phenomenological peace is also critical with post-liberal peace, particularly with regard to its essentialization and binary construction of differences as its language of “the local” reveals (conceived in opposition and/or in a hybrid relation to the “international”). Phenomenological peace, in contrast to “liberal” and “post-liberal” peace, allows us to see difference(s) as positive, and not as an obstacle to peace. This stands in sharp contrast to all notions which try to eliminate differences by imposing some universal identity and political and social order onto conflict parties under which they are required to unify, or which essentialize differences within and between them. Phenomenological peace, in contrast, regards difference and plurality as a fundamental human condition and political experience which must be accounted for in peacemaking. Phenomenological peace provides a distinct conceptualization of difference in a non-essentialist manner. Further to its ontological critiques of both liberal and post-liberal peace, phenomenological peace is reasoned in epistemological terms by the conceptual stalemate of “liberal” and “post-liberal” peace studies, a result of their shared theoretical terrain which emerges from the misperceived reading of Immanuel Kant’s Towards Perpetual Peace (see below under “Background: Academic”). Their misperceptions suggest, also in epistemological terms, the need for rethinking peace and an alternative to both liberal and post-liberal peace.

Background: The Rationales for Phenomenological Peace

Political-Ontological Impasse of “Liberal” and “Post-Liberal” Approaches

Peace studies and the practices of peacebuilding are persistently overshadowed by the notion of the “liberal peace.” Since the end of the Cold War, the “liberal peace” has been the prevailing peacebuilding model on a global scale, presented as the standard and orthodox venture for the establishment of sustainable peace. Although there are many complexities and varieties in both its scope and application, including its modification in recent decades to incorporate human rights concerns and the growing influence of NGOs, the “liberal” peace has endured as a conceptual vehicle for interventionist practices of Western states and their generalized standards for peaceful order. Although they differ from context to context, the imposition of Western political structures and the subjugation of difference are common features. The “liberal peace” is best understood as a mode of peacebuilding guided by the paradigm of liberal internationalism, manifest practically as a global experiment in social engineering which transplants Western models of social, political, and economic organization into sites of conflict in order to contain and prevent conflict. Drawing upon Boutros Boutros-Ghali’s An Agenda for Peace, alongside the neoliberal notions which underpin the Washington Consensus, liberal peacebuilding rests on conceptions of liberal-internationalist thought, on liberal institutionalism, and on Democratic Peace Theory (DPT). It is predicated upon the argument that the ideological intention of capitalist economic cooperation and the restraint that liberalism puts on states in their foreign policies can lead the way to world peace. The term liberal in the notion of the “liberal” peace refers to assumed origins in the Western history of political thought, most notably through a particular reading of Immanuel Kant (see below under “Background: Academic”).

Since the 1990s, however, the merits and dominance of the “liberal” peace have been deeply contested within both the academic literature and the international system. Despite its own particular objections toward post-liberal peace, phenomenological peace shares much of the critique of “liberal peace” made by “post-liberal” scholars. The appraisals directed against “liberal” peace are manifest as a diverse series of critical frameworks that deconstruct and challenge its underlying political assumptions and practices. The main features of this body of critique can be broken down into two main areas which are shared by phenomenological peace: an opposition, firstly, to the universalization of Western individualism and, second, to Western modes of state-building.

Critiques, such as those posited by Oliver Richmond, Mark Duffield, and Michael Pugh, see “liberal” peacebuilding in part as the application of a standardized liberal social and political model that has been guided by an emphasis on individual autonomy. This can be seen, in practice, in the building of state institutions and their focus upon democracy, the rule of law, human rights, and capitalist market economies, established through the mechanisms of the state and market. It aims to establish a balance between individual freedom and regulation through international organizations, NGOs, and free market forces. This universalizes Western individualism over different forms of agency (e.g., guided by a prioritization of notions such as family, community, or seniority), considering the former as an essential component of sustainable peace and the latter as carrying problematic ideological and cultural baggage.

The second mutual opposition is to be found in a shared contention of the application of Western models of state-building. The notion of unstable or “weak” states as a driving force for conflict, beginning in the 1990s and escalating with the events of September 11, engendered a focus on state-building from many within the international community. This merged with practices of liberal peacebuilding through DPT, attempting to establish strong, effective Western liberal democratic states in areas of weak governance in order to pave the way for sustainable peace.

However, the “liberal” universalization of Western individualism and state-building and their “post-liberal” criticisms are only two political-ontological variations of a similar universalization and essentialization of Western conceptions of difference as “otherness.” This is most observable through discussions pertaining to the “local turn,” a key aspect within “post-liberal” peace. The “local turn” is best understood as an attempt to decolonize knowledge concerning peace and peacebuilding, giving credence to locally based agencies within a conflict or post-conflict environment based upon the idea of everyday emancipatory practices that emerge from existing local agency. Such a project hopes to encapsulate the small-scale, practical mobilizations for peace which occur in the context of everyday life, through which the “local” is conceived as opposed to the “international,” ideologically and institutionally. This demonstrates, on the one hand, a distinct concern with situated, context-specific knowledges and practices; yet on the other hand, however, the “local turn” serves as a new form of essentializing difference(s) through the binary constructions of the “local” and the “international.” Such a construction is predicated on, and results in, three problematics: to begin with, the assumption that there are an identifiable, unified “local” and “international”; second, that these are placed in opposition to each other through their a priori stigmatization and terminological and conceptual definition; and, finally, subsequent to their stigmatization and objectification, that they are left in an indifferent and disengaged relation to each other, very often leading to the romanticizing of “the local,” because “post-liberal” peace has no yardstick to critically compare different localities and world-views, other than reproducing liberal imaginaries themselves. (A yardstick that phenomenological peace provides in form of a research hypothesis; see below at the end of the section on “Phenomenological Philosophy: The Conceptual Background of Phenomenological Peace.”)

Employing a genealogical perspective toward the development of “post-liberal” peace scholarship, the essentialization of difference, mainly in the form of a “local”-“international” dichotomy, can be seen to have emerged over time and appears as a result of the reception and dynamics of early works of Richmond, rather than the initial ideas behind these works. However, the reception of ideas is not independent of their formulation in the first place. And even though there is inevitably some loss of control over ideas once they are published, the anti-essentialist character of the “local”-“international” differentiation could, and should, have been made clearer when the notion of the “local” was introduced into peace studies in the mid-2000s, including a more reflective engagement with the philosophical character of the question of difference(s) and its culturally diverse ontologies. Richmond’s attempt to bridge the “local”-“international” divide through Foucauldian terminologies of institutional and discursive power constellations, finally resulting in the “post-liberal” idea of hybridity, does not provide a sufficiently deep engagement and explication of (culturally specific) ontologies of difference, needed to conceptualize the relation between the “local(s)” and the “international(s)” as might have been intended.

Next to these political-ontological impasses of “liberal” and “post-liberal” peace, however, is also an epistemological stalemate (see next section), which points to the necessity to rethink and reconceptualize peace, necessitating the search for novel alternatives to both. Phenomenological peace is proposed as such an alternative (see next and next-but-one section).

Academic: The Epistemological Stalemate of “Liberal” and “Post-Liberal” Peace Studies

The “liberal” peace and its “post-liberal” critiques are to a large extent epistemologically speaking two sides of the same coin. Perhaps ironically, the critical scholarship remains firmly within the theoretical terrain mapped out by the “liberal peace.” This terrain has been developed through a shared reading of Immanuel Kant, which has its origins in Democratic Peace Theory (DPT). This “liberal” reading of Kant is adopted by “post-liberal” scholars and is a focus of their critique; however, such critique is directed not against its conceptual foundations but against its political consequences (see previous section). “Critical” “post-liberal” scholars have not gone back to Kant to scrutinize the interpretations of DPT and have not provided an alternative or novel reading of Kant, one which could serve to unpack such liberal interpretations, but have instead (blindly) accepted and built upon them. Their (shared) reading and use of Kant, however, constitutes an arrogation of Kant's ideas. This is to be understood as the taking or claiming of ideas presumptively and without justification. This arrogation refers to the engagement with Kant's Towards Perpetual Peace (1795), an engagement which is pursued through a selective and negligent application of his arguments, showing indifference to their original context. Such selective use demonstrates little regard for the wider context of Kant's arguments and the position of the ideas contained therein as part of a larger, necessary whole.

Within contemporary peace studies, and for its advocates and critics alike, "the liberal peace" is seen as the prevailing peacebuilding model. Its central aim is understood as replicating liberal institutions, norms, and political, social, and economic systems across the globe in post-conflict environments as part of a standardized and regimented attempt to create sustainable peace. Liberal peacebuilding is predicated upon the idea of the pacifistic benefits as an inherent aspect of the liberal democratic state. As a result, liberal peace is commonly understood as a mode of peacebuilding guided by the paradigm of liberal internationalism, manifest as the transplantation of Western understandings and practices of social, political, and economic organization into post-conflict environments in order to engender stability and prevent further outbreaks. The foundations of the "liberal peace" emerged from DPT, a notable and foundational thinker of which is Michael Doyle. DPT began from the empirical argument that democracies rarely go to war and planted its theoretical roots in the work of Immanuel Kant, most importantly and nearly exclusively in his essay Towards Perpetual Peace: A Philosophical Sketch. His interpretations eventually became a policy prescription, leading to the practical understanding of liberal democracies as essentially pacifistic forces in international relations. In this capacity, Kant's Towards Perpetual Peace has become a primary citation and conceptual reference within the arguments within both the "liberal" and "post-liberal" literature.

The "post-liberal peace," along with the manifold critical camps which are associated with this adversarial position, posits itself in antithesis to the orthodoxy of the liberal peace, attempting to dissect and challenge its underlying assumptions and practices, in some quarters outrightly rejecting its totalizing assumptions and terminologies. However, since the "liberal" and the "post-liberal" peace reading of Towards Perpetual Peace is both negligent, ignoring the Appendixes and Preliminary Articles which form a necessary part of Towards Perpetual Peace, and selective, containing only specific, appropriated aspects of the Definitive Articles contained therein, this reading is problematic and undermines the "liberal" and "post-liberal" theoretical basis and conceptual validity. It portrays Kant as the author of concrete laws for peace, rather than as elaborating upon the conditions for the possibility of peace. Kant is cited, but not sighted. Regarding the "post-liberal," this shared basis serves to diminish its critical capacity. It prevents critical arguments from "going beyond" the theoretical confines of the "liberal peace," affecting the scope and capacity of critique. As a result, such critique attacks a hypostatized notion of the liberal peace, articulated within its own confines, and, therefore, cannot fully realize its aim of moving beyond such restrictive considerations. It has limited itself to the dichotomous stigmatizations of "liberal"/"post-liberal" and Western (or "international")/"local." The polarized nature of critique epistemologically situates this critical perspective within the understandings of the object of its critique. Instead of focusing on contextualized, situated understandings and practices of conflict and/or peaceful order, it focuses on the limited and problematic notion of the liberal peace itself.

The effect of this arrogation demonstrates the questionable theoretical foundation of "liberal" arguments in Kant's writing, as well as that "post-liberal" interpretations blunt the critical potential of their arguments by limiting their ability to go beyond the theoretical confines of the "liberal" peace. Such critiques take for granted the understandings of peace and peacebuilding which have been drawn from the arrogant reading of Kant by "liberal" peace studies, and, although adopting a critical stance toward their policy implementation in the form of international invention, they thus reproduce the central theoretical tenets of the “liberal” peace. They fail to engage with concrete populations on their own terms, and, although employing the rhetoric of the “everyday” and the “local,” the basis of their critique remains predicated upon a reflection of the understandings of “liberal” peace. When critiquing practices in context, their critique is an attack on an essentialized and hypostatized form of “the liberal peace,” with which, however, they ironically share a central theoretical understanding and premise. This limited articulation thus fundamentally restricts the capacity of the “post-liberal” to realize its goal, as claimed, of a truly pluralist reflection upon alternative conceptions and practices of peace. This is the epistemological nature of the conceptual stalemate of current “liberal” and “post-liberal” peace studies.

If critique remains within the theoretical terrain of the “liberal peace,” it will at best peer through the keyhole but remain unable to open the door. This reveals the necessity of rethinking the epistemology of peace and peacebuilding. We must move beyond reductive dichotomies, their naturalizations, and hypostatization without theoretical predications (such as “liberal” or “post-liberal”). The task of peace studies should not be to reform and rescue the project of “liberal” or “post-liberal” peace, but to begin to search for alternatives outside their restrictive dichotomy. An alternative, third concept of peace and peacebuilding is needed epistemologically and politically-ontologically. We must genuinely rethink peace and re-examine practices of peacebuilding. The elaboration of “liberal” and “post-liberal” readings of Kant is, however, beyond the remits of this entry; nevertheless, it should be subject to sustained scrutiny in order to avoid the aforementioned arrogations. A guiding framework for the development of an alternative conceptual agenda does not try to rescue, go back to, nor critique within the confinements of Kant. It would involve the recognition and adoption of different, novel, and, in current peace studies, yet unused theoretical traditions for rethinking and reconceptualizing peace. Such a framework might reach out, taking the diverse perceptions of identities and worldviews of conflict parties and other involved agents into account, rather than imposing the dichotomous conceptualizations of either “liberal” and/or “post-liberal” or “international” and “local” upon them. In order to escape this dichotomy, the work by Giorgio Shani, Jeremiah Alberg, and Alexander Hinton (2019) about Rethinking Peace or the Special Issue on Peacebuilding and the Politics of Difference, edited by Pol Bargaés-Pedreny and Xavier Mathieu (2018), points toward encouraging directions. A particularly promising way seems to consider peace along the themes of translation, memory, dialogue, and difference. To conceptualize and research the latter seems to be of outstanding significance, as difference(s) appear(s) as the root cause(s) of conflicts. Such a search must explore so far conceptually neglected philosophical traditions, Western and beyond. A rich tradition of philosophical thinking is represented, for instance, by the chapter on “Peace and Proximity” by the French philosopher Emmanuel Lévinas (1984). Here, Lévinas brings the relation between both difference and peace, as well as between politics and ethics, to our attention. Following his arguments, an ethics of empathy is necessary in peacebuilding politics which does not regard differences as obstacle to peace and thus as something to overcome and to assimilate under one universal script, but rather as positive political and social forces that have to be accounted for in sustainable and legitimate visions and practices of peace.

Phenomenological Philosophy: The Conceptual Background of Phenomenological Peace

We can now expand our reasoning into phenomenological philosophy, concretely to the works of Georg Simmel, Alfred Schütz, Martin Heidegger, Lévinas, and Jacques Derrida and their contribution to rethinking peace. Their conceptualizations of difference and “otherness” emphasize that difference and “otherness” are, on the one hand, intrinsic to human thought and agency. This problematization occurs, on the other hand, against the background of their respective approaches to temporality. It is in the context of temporalized ontologies of difference where we find the possibility to conceive of difference in a non-essentialist way. Every attempt to essentialize difference(s) undermines their (possibility of) permanent transformation, not least their transformation from reasons of conflict to positive forces for peaceful change.

The advantage of temporalized ontologies lies in their normative strength over essentializing readings of politics. We find in temporality the conditions of the possibility to avoid naturalized and reifying ontologies of social relations. And, because most, if not all, social and political theorizing as well as concrete forms of human agency are a consequence of the way in which we perceive and look at the world and ourselves, the question of ontology, its normativity, and its epistemological consequences is crucial. “The understanding of being,” so Lévinas emphasizes, “is not a purely theoretical act, but (...) a fundamental event where one’s entire destiny is at issue; and, is not simply that between clear and obscure knowledge, but is a difference which reaches unto the very being of man (...) this understanding of being is itself being – it is not an attribute, but man’s mode of existence” (1996a, p. 16, 17). Thus, the question of ontology, its normativity, and its epistemological consequences has immediate practical implications for thinking peace and peacemaking.

In Simmel, “the” “other” is – reflecting his temporal and transformative mode of thinking difference – a “sociological form” in opposition to a natural something. Simmel’s concept of a “sociological form” implies that “the” “other” is always constructed. Simmel uses the same notion of a “sociological form” with regard to borders. This example illustrates what is at stake here. He describes borders not as natural, but as social (i.e., as constructed and imagined) “facts” with, however, enormous social and political consequences. Thus, the characterization of something as a “social fact” does not de-emphasize its factuality and actuality; rather it emphasizes its imagined, transformative, and changeable being instead of its assertion as something “natural.” In analogy to the problematic of difference and “otherness,” we can say according to Simmel that “the” “other” exists a priori only as an empty category but becomes socially and politically real only through constructions and actual practices. Due to “the” “other” being a “sociological form,” we can further conclude with Simmel that “otherness” is both an immanent situatedness of the “self” and a construction in the discourses and narratives of every social group. Every individual and every group are mutually always both the subject (of the creation/imagination/stigmatization) and the object (of becoming created/imagined/stigmatized by another individual or social group as) of “otherness.” “The” “other” and “otherness” thus imply proximity and distance at the same time.

Schuetz, who is like Simmel an early sociological constructivist, discusses the figure of “the” “other” as the immigrant. For him, “otherness” is perceived as, and framed within, the concrete encounter between the stranger and a social group. This encounter is, as Schütz argues, a situation for interpretation from both sides. The “situation of approaching” is fundamental since it is here where established and familiar social systems of knowledge become challenged and are at stake to collapse. They are questioned by the stranger and his/her different ways of thinking, speaking, and behaving. Therefore, the stranger appears as a “man without a history,” i.e., in relation to the group he/she approaches, or which approaches him/her. The stranger appears without having any history due to his/her lack of tangibility. Without any stable classification by the group, he/she has no identity in relation to the group.

In Lévinas, several traditions of phenomenological thinking appear to be brought together. We find important influences from Edmund Husserl and Martin Heidegger but also crucial ideas from Simmel and Schütz. Plenty of references to all of them can be found in his oeuvre. Stating those interrelations, however, must not distract us from one fundamentally important aspect: whereas the thoughts of Simmel, Schütz, and Heidegger are influenced by Husserl’s concept of the intentionality between noesis and noema, i.e., between the “subject” and “object” of knowledge, and consequently by the idea of reciprocity, Lévinas’s thinking breaks radically with this notion. This departure from intentionality has important influences on the perception and thinking of difference(s). Difference and other humans do not appear any more as an object of knowledge. Whereas modes of thinking about difference and “otherness” from Greek antiquity to present day operate on the assumption that difference and “otherness” are tangible and knowable, Lévinas abandons this assumption. He argues that by abandoning the idea of intentionality, “the” “other” – l’Autre – is finally set free from the totalitarian grip of Western political and philosophical thinking. The idea of intentionality, he argues, always subsumes and violates the “other” under systems of knowledge production and under own epistemological assumptions. This would result in intellectual and practical acts of seizure. Thereby, “the” “self” claims to know and to understand “the” “other” and thus would objectify and essentialize him/her as well as the difference(s) experienced. Contrary to this, “the” “other” and difference(s) are, according to Lévinas, “ungraspable.” The relation to “the” “other” is not primarily one of mutuality and reciprocity anymore.

One consequence of Lévinas’s refusal of the idea of intentionality is that “otherness” approaches us from infinity, i.e., from a borderless somewhere that Lévinas aspires to decipher and to express via a linguistic turn refraining from all kinds of essentializing and noesis-noema-dependent vocabularies and imaginaries. The main practical meaning of this important decipherment and turn is to avoid attempts to define, thereby essentialize, and envision “the” “other” as something dualistically opposite the/a “self.” Saying this does not intend to abolish the importance of our experiences of difference(s); the exact opposite is the case, namely, to conceive of difference(s) in a non-essentialist and de-essentializing way. “Otherness” appears then as a constructed and procedural probability of difference, not as initial or natural. We can thereby recognize that what appears as difference(s) is/are a genuine part of human experience. Their representation as “otherness” is, however, only one possibility of their articulation: a possibility which has, however, no reality beyond language and images. The intellectual and practical challenges then consist of finding appropriate linguistic and visual articulations of this initial experience that are non-essentialist and non-essentializing. In this situation, everyone is different, is “the” “other,” a circumstance which highlights the perspectivity inherent in all attempts to find appropriate articulations of difference(s).

In declining intentionality, Lévinas creates the basis for the possibility of an unprecedented thinking of openness. Setting the “thing observed” free from assumptions, and delivering the categories of its cognition – precisely through breaking with the idea of intentionality and its transcendental correlation between observer and thing – Lévinas develops this liberation and the related idea of a dialogical toward the “other” (rather than claiming knowledge of the “other”). It is thus precisely the abolishment of intentionality (i.e., of claims and assumptions to know and to be able to represent) which creates a relation of each “self” toward the “other”; but, we have to ask, as Lévinas puts it: How is this relation-less relation (this rapport sans rapport)? Here the argument can receive important support through Derrida’s notions of “advent.”

Derrida’s notion of “advent” provides more specific ideas with regard to openness and to what it is that is to come from there. His notion of “advent” is most explicit in his writings about democracy and Europe (the latter especially in The Other Heading, 1992). In both cases, the political event – i.e., “democracy” or “Europe” – is not yet here as he says, but something “that remains to be thought and to come” (Derrida 1993, p. 19). Derrida uses the French à venir and survenir to describe this situation of “yet to be.” The French survenir links with Derrida’s emphasis on temporality. This nuance, however, seems lost in the English translation “to come about” (as in Psyche. Inventions of the Other; 2007, p. 24): the distinct meaning of survenir is that something (an event) comes about suddenly, unexpectedly, and unpredictably. This terrain or space from where the event is coming is unknown and undefinable and shall be kept undefined.

To keep this terrain undefined, and thus to preserve the suddenness of the event (of democracy, of Europe, and, for our matters, of difference(s) is purposeful, since it will preserve its temporality and (possibility of) transformation. To do otherwise, i.e., to foreclose the openness and namelessness of the terrain from where the event is coming from, would mean “to totalise, to gather, versammeln” (Derrida 1997, p. 13). It would be a form of “monogenealogy” (Derrida 1992, p. 10) and depend upon and reproduce the “contagious or contaminating powers of a reappropriating language, (...) the language of the Same that is foreign or allergic to the Other” (Derrida 2007, p. 155). To preserve openness, namelessness, and dialogue and thereby the (chance of) transformation and finally the conditions of peace as non-preconceived social relations is crucial. It means to prevent totalitarianism, essentialism, and egocentrism.

This choice for preserving a critical and dialogical space is, according to Derrida, grounded in the aporetic experience of the impossible. It proposes a reading of the question of “otherness” and difference as Dasein, i.e., as not an entity or essence, but rather as a relational being-possible and becoming-possible (according to Heidegger, das Möglichsein and das Möglichwerden), as a being which is always unstable and multiple. The “aporetic experience of the impossible” assumes the intrinsic disunity of, and differences within, all things (histories, identities, cultures, institutions, groups, and individual psyches) as well as the proactive elaboration on, and widening of, respective disunities and their mutual tensions as critical practice. What Derrida calls deconstruction and différance (an activity of “temporization” and “spacing”; Margins of Philosophy, 1982, 9) is important here as they refer to deferrals, dislocations, and disruptions of all things (mainly identities in our regard) due to their intrinsic disunities, contradictions, and tensions. Derrida notes:

“There is no culture or cultural identity without this difference within itself” (Derrida 1992, p. 9, 10); or: ‘(The) identity of a culture is a way of being different from itself; a culture is different from itself; language is different from itself; the person is different from itself.’ (1997, p. 13)

The Lévinasian question asked above – How is this relation-less relation? – receives an answer

here. The aporia (impasse) of unity and essence as both an ontological and a normative demand asks and seeks for the opening up of dialogical spaces that make possible to think the impossible (as the unknown, intangible, unintentional, undefinable, or unpredictable). The impossible is here understood as unknown what “the” “other” may be and as the terra incognita from where the “other” may come from. The ontological and normative demand thus is neither to work within the framework of totalities nor to work against them, or to move out of the impasse (i.e., to either accept their rationalities or to oppose and destroy them from outside). Instead, it demands the disruption of totalities by elaborating on, widening, and negotiating their inherent tensions and disunities through non-appropriating dialogue. Such disruptions finally articulate the condition for the relation toward and between differences.

Summary of Phenomenological Philosophy as Novel Grounding for Peace Studies

- Phenomenological Peace consists in the:
 - (a) Deconstruction and de-essentialisation of perceptions of “self” and “other”.
 - (b) Perception of difference(s) and “otherness” as temporal, transformative, and discursively produced.
 - (c) Opening-up of alternative spaces for the articulation difference(s) and the advent of the “other,” where we find both the limits of, and conditions for, for a peace as
 - (d) Positive and free re-articulation of and dialogue about difference(s).
- By way of a proposition/hypothesis: The lesser the degree of essentialist attributions to difference(s) and the lesser essentialist perceptions and definitions of “otherness,” the less likely the outbreak of conflict and the more conducive this is for peace, conflict solution, and reconciliation.

(continued)

- The added value of phenomenological peace: Phenomenological philosophy puts us in a position to understand and conceptualise differences as something positive. Their acknowledgement and free articulation are the avenue to peace and reconciliation, rather than their elimination or submission. Thus, differences are not obstacles to peace, but their free articulation and acknowledgement are conducive to peaceful social and political relations.

The propositions posited by phenomenological peace culminate, therefore, in the practice of a dialogue for peace, which requires a considered research methodology and means of practical application. Therefore, a certain degree of operationalization, in order to enable and facilitate the uncovering of the conditions of peaceful order, is necessary. This is where the notion of optionality becomes an expansive element to phenomenological peace. While phenomenological peace is the basis for optionality, optionality serves as the methodological means through which the ideas of phenomenological peace are operationalized. Firstly, optionality serves to assist phenomenological peace as a research method which both determines the parameters of research and functions as the means by which the results gained from such research are interpreted and analyzed. Secondly, applied practically as the amalgamation of the manifold notions within phenomenological peace, optionality is employed as a series of theoretically reinforced guidelines for the establishment and maintenance of peaceful order, helping to create and manage a space in which the theoretical components of phenomenological peace can be put into operation.

Future Directions for Phenomenological Peace

Research

To begin with, optionality determines new research parameters which define the research questions and outline research methods. A research agenda following the phenomenological approach to peace is primarily focused on the empirical exploration of perceptions of difference(s) and “otherness.” Here, the mutual perceptions of conflict parties, along with the perceptions of local and international NGOs and state actors are central. The following research questions are vital:

- How are perceptions of difference and “otherness” discursively framed in peacebuilding, peace negotiation, and conflict reconciliation processes?
- Are difference(s) and the “other” seen as “natural” enemies, are their characteristics essentialized (according to ethnic, national, religious, political, gender, and other criteria), and are they stigmatized a priori?
- What patterns follow “self”-“other” relations and definitions?
- Can distinct features of the “self”-“other” relation be learned from successful peace processes, peace negotiation, and conflict reconciliation? And vice versa, can failed peace negotiation, peace processes, and conflict reconciliation be traced back to distinct perceptions and framings of “self”-“other” relations?
- How and through what channels can a phenomenological approach to peace be communicated with conflict and warring parties?

Before a direct discussion of optionality, the tenets of phenomenological peace must be elucidated in relation to its research questions. One main idea of empirical research following the phenomenological approach is that any explanation of social and political phenomena must be grounded in the “meaning structure” of those studied. This notion refers to the web of meanings that are constituted by actors. Meanings, in other words, attain meaning in relation to other meanings. These processes of meaning constitution and construction at the social and individual level can be studied empirically. This means that actors’ perspectives and self-understandings are central to any analysis. A wide range of mainly qualitative research tools such as discourse analysis, intertextuality, participant observation, non- or semi-structured and narrative interviews, and the analysis of policy documents; of performing arts, literature, music, lyrics, and pamphlets; and of popular culture can be applied in order to identify and study respective meaning structures. But, too, quantitative methods shall not be excluded. They are particularly worthwhile when complemented with interpretivist methods, such as digital discourse analysis that allows us to explore huge amounts of texts followed by the interpretation of longitudinal patterns of discursive transformations.

A second main idea of phenomenological research is that any study of meaning structures is an interpretation of these structures and not, in the social science sense, an explanation that would identify, and result in, causal explanations. This has been termed succinctly by Alfred Schütz “first-order” and “second-order” constructions, i.e., that the meaning structures and worldviews of political and social actors are constructions (of first order) and any scholarly statements on these constructions are themselves constructions (of second order). This is because we all live in a world of permanent construction, reproduction, and transformation of meaning, and both researchers and people to be studied are bound to a specific context in their meaning constructions. However, the starting point of research must be the ordinary social and political life of people.

The results of the phenomenological study of the construction of difference and of “self”-“other” relations in conflict and post-conflict scenarios are subjugated to a subsequent assessment and evaluation according to the hypothesis formulated above. This is a huge advantage and strength of phenomenological peace research that its philosophical grounding enables us to process empirical results by the way of clear practical conclusions, asking how our empirical findings relate to the hypothesis (formulated above) that the lesser the degree of essentialist attributions to difference(s), the less likely the outbreak of conflict and the more likely peaceful relations, conflict solution, and reconciliation. We may well find that empirical patterns of the construction of difference among conflict parties reveal essentialist constructions, indeed perceptions such as along the lines of “archenemy,” naturally given identities, gendered or national identities, or strongly held religious beliefs; and this does not surprise, is there but conflict in the first place. However, the phenomenological approach to peace would not support any politics of abolishing those differences, an attempt that would result in even more violence. A phenomenological approach views its main practice in the de-essentialization of respective constructions. This is a permanent project that is neither teleological in that it would presuppose a certain end goal, nor would it define “peace,” nor can it readily be implemented. Its main focus is on the deconstruction of essentializing meaning structures. But it is also proactive in performing all kinds of de-essentialization in order both to prevent conflict and to mitigate conflict once it is virulent. Such proactive strategies relate to the performance of arts (e.g., music; see in this regard the Min-On Music Research Institute in Tokyo [<https://www.min-on.org>]); the incorporation of multi-perspectives in school and higher education; or the value of cultural exchange. But activities that contribute to de-essentializing language, visualization, or agency are principally unlimited, and our imagination is and should be open and creative.

Here, optionality becomes a useful methodological and practical addition to phenomenological peace. The conceptual framework of optionality emerges from phenomenological thinking concerning peace. It operates as a practical mindset through which research parameters are delineated, and research is conducted. In this sense, it is the operationalization of phenomenological peace. In other words, optionality determines what the research is looking at, and what it is looking for. As an operationalized conceptual framework, optionality is thus employed to study what institutions and people imagine the process and nature of peaceful order to be. The search parameters for such an endeavor are determined by the conceptual character of optionality itself as the conceptual conditions, which enable and facilitate a space for open and unobstructed dialogue and deliberation. This is intended to be a perennial process and space within which the conditions for dialogue and deliberation are maintained. Optionality is intended not as the reflection of a concrete, preexisting practice in the “real world,” which will be discovered and observed and is ready to be implemented, but as the conceptual conditions for sustainable peaceful relations, reflecting the philosophical differentiation between the concrete possibility (the occurrence) of something and the condition of the possibility of something.

This resonates with the central aspects of phenomenological peace which form the basis of optionality. The first of these stems from “the encounter” in Schütz, recognizing the meeting between “self” and “other” as one of “approaching,” where the understanding of the other is, from both sides, predicated on interpretation. This relates directly to the assertion that phenomenological peace must be grounded in the meaning structures of those studied, and those who participate in existing and proposed dialogical spaces. This provides the first research principle for phenomenological peace, namely, the interrogation and interlocution of different situated ontologies and epistemologies in concrete conflict contexts. This is a research practice established on the idea of the encounter between the researcher and researched as one of “approaching.”

This is further reinforced by the second aspect of phenomenological peace, built upon Lévinas’ refusal of intentionality. Through this refusal, Lévinas posits difference and “otherness” as intangible experience; one cannot, and should not, claim to “know” the other, and any attempt to do so is built on essentialisms and impositions in an attempt to define and fix the unknowable and transformative. We must, therefore, conduct any research concerning the interrogation and interlocution of different ontologies and epistemologies with an ethics of humility toward those who possess alternative understandings, manifesting in the research tools and methods applied and their steady reflection in the research process itself. This is manifest as an openness toward these different perspectives, one which stands in stark opposition to any assumptions, impositions, and essentialisms, which could deny or reduce this quality of the unknown and the inherently perspectivist nature of the other.

The aporia of unity and essence in Derrida provides a further theoretical contribution to reinforce the notions of interpretation, opposition to imposition, and the resultant necessity of openness to difference within any encounter. Derrida expands upon the need for such openness by outlining the requirement of thinking about the “impossible.” By this, Derrida refers to the unknown nature of the “other” and their perspectivity, suggesting we cannot accept totalities, or any attempt to remove this apparent obstacle, and instead must create dialogical spaces to elaborate tensions and disunities between us as a condition of our relation to the other. This provides an additional research focus upon dialogue.

The core of optionality, therefore, centers upon the interrogation and interlocution of different ontologies and epistemologies in concrete conflict contexts in a manner profoundly sensitive to the particularities of distinct/unique contexts and perspectives. Research practices should therefore follow the notions of humility, openness, and an opposition to imposition, assumption, and essentialization. This is what is understood by optionality as the framework for the development of concrete methods. Optionality also determines what a research agenda for phenomenological peace is looking for. In this sense, the focus is upon situated knowledges. The examination of different ontologies and epistemologies in conflict contexts requires the study of what people within those contexts imagine peaceful order to be, in terms of both its process and nature. Optionality does not prescribe nor instrumentalize such visions, but instead is the conceptual means through which they themselves can become part of a process of peace, being guided by the conceptual and practical notion of peace as a de-essentializing project.

Political Implications

Phenomenological peace also informs political practice in two ways: first, with regard to pedagogy and, second, with regard to reconciliation. While the first practical, pedagogical implication is conflict-preventive, the second aims at post-conflict reconciliation.

The main focus of the pedagogical practice consists foremost in the cultivation of dialogue across and about differences. Phenomenological peace does not regard it as helpful for conflict prevention to eliminate or unify difference(s) simply because differences belong irreducibly to human (and political, social, and cultural) affairs and cannot be abolished. They are first experience and the question of their ethical conduct is first philosophy. Differences have thus to be approached in a positive way, and the phenomenological approach enables us to do so through the dialogical practice of naming, negotiating, openly articulating, and discussing them without any preconceptions. Such dialogue produces and reproduces difference(s) while regarding them in the phenomenological tradition as transformative, non-fixed identities, as fluent and temporal. Such perception counters preconceptions of difference, liberating them from the negative stigmatization.

The practice of dialogue has to be cultivated and practically established. In other words, the phenomenological approach to peace has to be proposed to conflict parties and peacebuilders alike through all kinds of dialogical forums, e.g., in the form of workshops, through cultural, sport, and art events, or assemblies. In this sense it is interesting to look at the statements of General Petraeus, commanding general of the US forces in Afghanistan from 2010 to 2011, about his support of negotiations with the enemy and the Taliban (Interview in Over the Horizon (OTH), on February 11, 2019; <https://othjournal.com/2019/02/11/general-petraeus-exclusive-on-emerging-threats-negotiating-with-the-taliban-and-more/>, accessed 06/11/2019). Phenomenological peacemaking demands the deliberation of differences at the borderline of, and if needed also beyond, our own moral positions.

Yet, for dialogue to take place and produce the liberation from negative stigmas, it requires all parties to be willing engagers in the dialogue (or, speaking with Lévinas, empathy is needed as a fundamental requirement for dialogue), unified in approaching difference in a positive way. An example from everyday peacemaking practices (rather than high politics as the aforementioned example) that illustrates this is The Marian Chace Foundation (<https://adta.org/marian-chace-found> ation) and their projects of dance and movement as therapy-based violence prevention programs. They demonstrate that dance could be an effective tool for reducing and limiting the aggressive behaviors of school students who took part in their projects that used dance and movement therapy in groups to enable a nonverbal dialogue between children experiencing conflict. This facilitated an understanding of their differences to overcome violent behaviors. However, if the students had been unwilling to engage in this creative dialogue, it would have been an ineffective approach to encourage the exploration of difference and rather could have resulted in further violence.

Phenomenological peace also informs post-conflict peacebuilding practices with regard to reconciliation. Its emphasis on the practice of dialogue opening itself up to questioning and negotiating own worldviews and their underlying ideologies and moralities requests the establishment of reconciliation forums which enable such dialogue. In those forums grievances and traumata caused by previous violence are communicated. Such exchanges often reproduce trauma as suffered atrocities are, while giving testimony, experienced a second time. As Derrida argues in relation to forgiveness, such forms of dialogue must be open for the advent of the impossible, i.e., they must be practically unconstrained by protocol and regulation. They must enable unexpected forms of anguish as documented by Antjie Krog in her Country of My Skull. Such forms of dialogue cannot and must not be squeezed in, and limited by, institutional protocol and timeframes. They must be open for the utterance and communication of grievances, trauma, and future visions. These requirements push dialogue always to the limits of own rationalities and moralities of the participants. In this sense, it is genuine and existential.

Another example of the interference of court procedures and legal understandings with actors' different perceptions is narrated by Alexander Hinton in The Justice Facade: Trials of Transition in Cambodia. The understandings and procedures of the International Criminal Court (ICC) and the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) were and are in conflict with Cambodian Buddhist understandings of mind, body, and equanimity. Frequently the encounter of survivors and their family members with notions and practices of global justice was overlain by everyday understandings of transaction with the dead that resulted, for example, in ceremonies and prayers in the court rooms. Justice was thus less about the living than about achieving calm with the “restless mind” of the dead.

In its second manifestation as a practically applicable amalgamation of phenomenological peace, optionality provides the defining and limiting conditions of a space for open and unobstructed dialogue. This is manifest as the interrogation and interlocution of different ontologies and epistemologies within the contexts of concrete conflicts and between conflict parties. Although this may begin as a process of reconciliation after a period of conflict, it is intended as a perennial process and, therefore, as a preventative force regarding future conflicts. The term “optionality” refers to the establishment and maintenance of a plurality of “options” in both speech and action. It is intended to embody the commitments to openness made by phenomenological peace through the acknowledgment and facilitation of difference, temporality, and the disruption of totalities through the creation of an “optional” space for dialogue. However, the understanding of dialogue which optionality seeks to enable and maintain must be outlined. It is this practice of dialogue and the space in which it is practiced, which defines optionality as a practically applicable amalgamation of phenomenological peace.

Dialogue can be broken down into four crucial aspects: these are listening, speaking, pushing the edges of our own rationalities, and a non-hierarchical, informal structure. To begin with, a successful dialogue must be built upon listening. This, however, is not the simple listening which one might pursue in relation to an everyday conversation, but one conditioned by the phenomenological arguments outlined. Therefore, such a practice of listening requires the openness toward each encounter and patience toward the narratives and perspectives within such a dialogue. The second aspect of dialogue is speaking. This is the means through which alternative narratives and perspectives are articulated and the way in which differences are vocalized. Both these aspects of dialogue are, to a large extent, conditioned by the third aspect: pushing the limits of our own rationalities. When we listen to the vocalization of the perspectives and understandings of other people, refusing essentialisms and maintaining openness, we must push the limits of what we think as “normal,” “established,” and “coherent,” in order to realize Lévinas’s refusal of intentionality and Derrida’s concerns regarding the aporia of unity and essence. The final aspect of dialogue is that it must be nonhierarchical and open with regard to its structure, and cannot be formalized through protocol or timeframes. Any such structuring would inherently serve as a limitation, one which would be imposed externally, and thus affect the unhindered unfolding of knowledge. It would curtail the openness of dialogue and apply conceptions of dialogue which were not those held by the conflict parties involved. The management of dialogue in this manner would turn a space for open, reflexive, and “optional” dialogue into a training seminar in the “right” way to talk and act. This is precisely what phenomenological peace, and its application as optionality, strives to avoid, as it would inevitably manifest as the suppression of difference, which is precisely what must be avoided in order to establish any condition of peace.

Cross-References

- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
- ▶ Post-conflict Nation-building

Acknowledgements We want to thank in particular the Rotary Peace Fellows at International Christian University ICU, Tokyo, for the discussions during the Autumn Term 2019 and their comments on draft versions of this entry.

References

- Avruch, K., & Black, P. W. (1991). The culture question and conflict resolution. Peace & Change, 16(1), 22–45.
- Bargués-Pedreny, P. (2017). Connolly and the never-ending critiques of liberal peace: From the privilege of difference to vorarephilia. Cambridge Review of International Affairs, 30(2–3), 216–234.
- Bargués-Pedreny, P., & Mathieu, X. (2018). Beyond silence, obstacle and stigma: Revisiting the ‘problem’ of difference in peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, Special Issue, 12(3), 283.
- Behr, H. (2014). Politics of difference – Epistemologies of peace. London/New York: Routledge, (‘Global Horizons’ Book Series, ed. by RBJ Walker and Richard Falk; 2015 paperback).
- Behr, H. (2018). Peace-in-difference: A phenomenological approach to peace through difference. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 12(3), 335–351.
- Behr, H. (2019). Peace-in-difference: Peace through dialogue about and across difference(s) – a phenomenological approach to rethinking peace. In A. L. Hinton, G. Shani, & J. Alberg (Eds.), Rethinking peace. Discourse, memory, translation, and dialogue (pp. 174–190). London: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Derrida, J. (1992). The other heading. Reflection on today’s Europe, Translated by Pascale-Anne Brault and Michael B. Naas, Introduction by Michael B. Naas, Bloomington, Indiana State University Press.
- Derrida, J. (1993). Aporias. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Derrida, J. (1997). Deconstruction in a nutshell. A conversation with Jacques Derrida, edited. and with a commentary by John D. Caputo, Fordham University Press.
- Derrida, J. (2001). On Forgiveness. In On cosmopolitanism and forgiveness, Translated by Mark Dooley and Michael Hughes, with a preface by Simon Critchley and Richard Kearney, pp. 25–60, London: Routledge.
- Derrida, J. (2007). Psyche: Inventions of the other (Vol. I). Stanford: Stanford California Press.
- Galtung, J. (1967). Theories of peace. A synthetic approach to peace thinking. Oslo: International Peace Research Institute.
- Gupta, G., & Chattopadhyaya, D. P. (Eds.). (1998). Cultural otherness and beyond. Leiden/Boston: Brill.
- Heathershaw, J. (2008). Unpacking the Liberal peace: The dividing and merging of peacebuilding discourses. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 36(3), 597–621.
- Hinton, A. (2018). The justice Façade: Trials of transition in Cambodia. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hinton, A. L., Shani, G., & Alberg, J. (2019). Rethinking peace. Discourse, memory, translation, and dialogue. London: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Inayatullah, N., & Blaney, D. L. (2004). International relations and the problem of difference. New York/London: Routledge.
- Krog, A. (1998). The country of my skull. New York: Three Rivers Press.
- Lévinas, E. (1985). Ethics and infinity. Pittsburgh: Duquesne University.
- Lévinas, E. (1996a). Ethics and first philosophy. In A. T. Peperzak, S. Critchley, & R. Barnasconi (Eds.), Basic philosophical writings. Bloomington/Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Lévinas, E. (1996b). Peace and proximity. In A. T. Peperzak, S. Critchley, & R. Barnasconi (Eds.), Basic philosophical writings. Bloomington/Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Molloy, S. (2017). Kant’s international relations: The political theology of perpetual peace. Michigan: University of Michigan Press.
- Richmond, O. (2008). Peace in international relations. London/New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. (2009). A post-liberal peace: Eirenism and the everyday. Review of International Studies, 35, 557–580.
- Schütz, A. (1944). The stranger: An essay in social psychology. The American Journal of Sociology, 49(6), 449–507.
- Simmel, G. (1908). ‘Exkurs über den Fremden’ (‘Excursus on the Stranger’). In Soziologie: Untersuchungen ueber die Formen der Vergesellschaftung (pp. 509–512). Berlin: Duncker & Humblot.
- Simmel, G. (1992). Soziologie: Untersuchungen über die Formen der Vergesellschaftung. Frankfurt/Main: Suhrkamp.

Photo-elicitation

- ▶ Auto-photography

Photography

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Photography and Peace

Frank Möller
Tampere Peace Research Institute,
Tampere University, Tampere, Finland

Description

Peace photography is derivative, illustrative, and constitutive of peace: it is dependent on definitions of peace; it exemplifies preexisting understandings of peace; and it shapes and diversifies viewers' understandings of peace beyond established and taken-for-granted ones. Peace photography is a pluralistic concept. Indeed, different forms of peace require different forms of visual representation just as do different positions on a social group's trajectory from war to peace. Conversations about different peace photographs – i.e., different photographs that individuals or groups of people regard as depictions of peace – help understand underlying notions of peace as well as the political and social conditions from which these notions emerge. Given that visual images never operate on observers in isolation, it will be very difficult to establish causality between a given photograph and peace. It is, therefore, more productive to conceive of the relationship between photographs and peace as an episodic relationship. Given the extent to which visual images dominate social life, it is reasonable to assume that nowadays this relationship is stronger than ever before. However, it is largely unexplored in peace research. Visual education should therefore be included in peace research curricula and selected photographs should regularly be designated as peace photographs so as to take the visual turn in the social sciences seriously and to recognize and capitalize on the peace potentialities of visual images.

Peace and Photography

Definitional Issues

Reflecting recent trends in image production and dissemination, photography nowadays is a “meta-network of machines, politics, culture, and ways of collective seeing” (Paglen 2011, p. 68). Ways of collective seeing include collective blindness: things we do not see, for a variety of reasons, or things we do see without, however, grasping their meanings and importance. Photographs of peace are a case in point. They are everywhere but seldom registered as such. As a distinct genre in photographic discourses, peace photography – in contrast to war photography – does not exist and literature on the connection between photography and peace is conspicuous mainly by its absence. Dictionaries of photography include discussion of war photography (Herschdorfer 2018) but have little to say on peace photography. One of the reasons for the invisibility of peace in photography is photography's fascination in discourse and practice with violence. Another reason is the complex nature of the relationship between photography and peace. A third reason is lack of general agreement on the definition of peace making agreement on the definition of a photography of peace difficult.

There is a huge body of work on the connection between photography and violence (Wilkes Tucker et al. 2012). War photography, for example, is a major component of photojournalism, much discussed in the literature on photographic representation. However, photography is always about the seen and the unseen: photographs “reinforce the invisibility of some things by overtly focusing on others” (Smith 2013, p. 14). By focusing on war and violence, then, photojournalism contributes to the invisibility of peace. Traditional attempts to photograph peace include portraits of “statesmen and major political events” (Morris-Suzuki 2005, p. 103) in connection with commemorations or peace treaties. Recent work on peace photography is more ambitious. Allan, discussing photography as an ingredient of peace journalism, demands “the rearticulation” by means of photography “of visions of the world in the service of human rights and social justice” (Allan 2011, p. 163). Here, the issue is not mere documentation but advocacy. Ritchin (2013, p. 123) laments the absence of “a more developed photography that explores in some depth the move from pain to its resolution, creating reference points for those striving to move forward” and presents numerous examples of how such a photography might look like. However, in photographic discourses, core concepts such as violence, peace, and conflict remain largely undefined. Yet, definitions of peace do not necessarily make things easier: for example, a negative understanding of peace as absence of physical violence would result in an almost unlimited number of photographs that would seem to qualify as photographs of peace, thus making peace photography as a concept largely useless. On the other hand, a positive understanding of peace as everything that is good and desired is utopian and cannot, therefore, be photographed.

Core Conceptual Aspects

Standard approaches in photojournalism reference peace negatively by depicting its absence (Linfield 2010; Mehrez 2019). In accordance with standard operating procedures in photojournalism, the purpose of such depiction can be mere documentation. However, it can also reflect the photographer's assumption that by showing what war and violent conflict look like when photographed, solidarity and compassion with the victims of violence may be produced and political engagement be triggered, ultimately ending violence. Yet, political responses to images of violence are notoriously unpredictable. They depend, among other things, on the overall political and cultural configurations within which images are circulated (Perlmutter 1999), contextualization by means of text and layout (Ritchin 1999; Morris 2011), and the degree of visual socialization readers bring with them to the process of reading an image. Furthermore, not every photograph that appears, in retrospect, to be an anti-war photograph was intended as such (Hariman and Lucaites 2007, p. 368 note 73). Ethical problems inherent in photojournalism are profound and well explored in the literature. They include re-traumatization and revictimization as well as exploitation and misrepresentation of the people depicted (Reinhardt et al. 2007; Sontag 2003). By visualizing violence, conventional photojournalism both contributes to the impression that the world is a violent place and exposes itself to accusations according to which the photographic act is, in itself, a violent and exploitative act, albeit, some authors argue, a necessary one (Kennedy and Patrick 2014; Roberts 2014; Solomon-Godeau 1991).

Photojournalism documents events including "war, conflict, or atrocity" (Lisle 2011, p. 877) and looks for both a given event's decisive moment and its adequate transformation into photographic form. Proximity to "action" is key here. In contrast, aftermath photography is interested in the visualization of "what remains" of the event once it is – or seems to be – over (Saltzman 2010, p. 131). It is interested in the legacies of violent conflict. While photojournalism references peace by showing violence, aftermath photography references (the continuation of) violence by showing seemingly peaceful conditions. Much aftermath photography focuses on landscapes, ruins, and material objects, thus avoiding ethical problems in connection with photographs of human suffering. Aesthetically, it is often closer to art photography than to photojournalism. Ironically, such photography is often referred to as post-conflict photography although its intention is precisely to show that a given conflict is not (yet) over, even if acts of physical violence do not occur anymore. Aftermath photography refers back to the original violent event (Baker and Mavlian 2014) and revisualizes it in terms of the "event-as-aftermath" (Roberts 2014). In selected aftermath photographs, the original event is extended up to the present but the main reference point is the original event, not its transubstantiation into inherently more peaceful forms of social interaction. Thus, from a peace perspective, aftermath photography – despite its many merits (see Lisle 2011) – does not take advantage of all its possibilities. Aftermath photography and the meanings discursively assigned to it fail to mobilize all of the genre's inherent peace potentialities.

Focusing on the legacies of physical violence (including traumatic memories), aftermath photography does not normally make the step from aftermath to peace (see, however, <http://theaftermathproject.org>). Neither does it understand the aftermath of violence as an event in its own right – the "aftermath-as-event" (Möller 2019, pp. 151–157) – the "event-ness" of which lies in the absence of physical violence and some degree of detachment from the original event, enabling people in a forward-looking perspective to engage in activities they would otherwise not be capable of engaging in. Such activities can be photographed, visually decoupling the aftermath from the original event (without ignoring its existence and consequences), documenting everyday life, and anticipating peace. The aftermath may lead, at some point, to peace and this process can be photographed. A good example for such an approach to peace photography is Rineke Dijkstra's series "Almerisa," documenting the adaptation of the subject depicted, Almerisa, who came from then war-torn Bosnia, to a more peaceful life in the Netherlands. Moving from an unstable plastic chair to a solid wooden chair symbolizes Almerisa's growing sense of stability and security in her new environment, photographically captured in Dijkstra's work and corroborated by Almerisa. However, the process from aftermath to peace is not irreversible and it can fail but failure can be photographed, too.

Research on the connection between photography and peace – visual peace research – thinks with photography about peace (Möller 2013, 2019). It is inspired by a twin question: how can peace be represented visually, and how can such representation contribute to peace? While sharing many questions with similar approaches in international relations (Bleiker 2018) and security studies (Vuori and Saugmann Andersen 2018), it is particularly interested in the uses and operations of visual images in peace processes, peace building, mediation, and reconciliation. Illustrating a process of peace consolidation, peace photography can show a given social group's trajectory from the original event to the event-as-aftermath, from the event-as-aftermath to the aftermath-as-event, and from the aftermath-as-event to peace. "Every post-war society can be analyzed as to its location on this trajectory at any given point in time and as to its movement along the trajectory over time. Such analysis can be aesthetic or political or, ideally, both" (Möller 2019, p. 31). Peace photography deviates from conventional photojournalism in its focus on process, rather than icon, enabling visual insights into long-term developments.

Recent research suggests that peace photography is derivative, illustrative, and constitutive of peace. It is derivative of peace in that it follows from and is dependent on definitions of peace; it is illustrative of peace in that photographs may exemplify preexisting understandings of peace; and it is constitutive of peace in that photographs may shape, expand, enrich, and diversify viewers' understandings of peace beyond established and taken-for-granted ones. Thus, there is a creative tension between the illustrative and the constitutive function of photographs (Möller 2019, pp. 48–49). Peace photography is a pluralistic concept, acknowledging that different forms of peace require different forms of visual representation just as do different positions on the above trajectory from war to peace. Owing to the context dependence of meanings assigned to any given photograph, the search for a universal peace photograph may be in vain. However, conversations about different peace photographs – i.e., different photographs that individuals or groups of people regard as depictions of peace – may help understand underlying notions of peace as well as the political and social conditions from which these notions emerge. Given that visual images never operate on observers in isolation – they are always part of wider cultural and political configurations – it will be very difficult to establish causality between a given photograph and peace. It is, therefore, more productive to conceive of the relationship between photographs and peace as an episodic relationship, as "multilayered, concurrent, loosely structured arrangement" characterized by coexistence and simultaneity rather than causality (Taylor 2003, p. 274). It is a reasonable assumption that nowadays this relationship is stronger than ever before, given the extent to which social life is dominated by visual images (Bleiker 2018).

As an epistemological medium, photography is arguably most effective with regard to the visualization of everyday peace: ordinary people going about their business without resorting to violence. Such peaceful everyday interactions take place after violence, as in many aftermath scenarios, but also during violence (Möller and Shim 2019). Instead of appearing as victims of violence devoid of own agency, many individuals and social groups aim to maintain a somewhat normal life in adverse circumstances, cultivating peaceful social interactions rather than subscribing to the dynamics of violence. Such activities and photographs thereof may reflect "a minimalist interpretation" of everyday peace (Mac Ginty 2014, p. 555) but even such minimalism “involves considerable innovation, creativity and improvisation. It rests on considerable agency at the individual and group levels” (Mac Ginty 2014, p. 555). Due to its conventional interest in the spectacular, the extraordinary, and the iconic, photojournalism does not normally put much emphasis on everyday activities; it fails to represent important ingredients of (everyday) life, thus contributing to their invisibility. Yet, many photojournalists (including some of the most famous ones) were and still are interested in both “the everyday overturned” – war and violence – and the “temporality of the everyday” – the continuation of ordinary life in adverse circumstances (Dell 2010, p. 46). The reduction in photographic discourses of their work to representations of violence is a feature of discourse, not photographic practice (Roberts 2012, p. 9). It is, therefore, a part of visual peace research to rediscover and appropriate existing photographic work as peace photography so as to identify and establish a visual pedigree of such photography and de-marginalize it in public perception (Möller 2019, pp. 89–103).

Photography has traditionally been a form of image production characterized by unequal power relationships between the photographers and the subjects depicted. However, photography can also be addressed in terms of participation and coproduction (Delgado 2015; Harper 2012) with emphasis on the production process of an image rather than on the resulting image. Such a photographic understanding and practice alter the power relations inherent in the photographic act in the sense that the process of an image coming into being is implemented and experienced together, connecting the photographer intimately with the subjects depicted or transforming people who have formerly been represented by others into producers of their own image. Becoming agents of one’s own image is especially important if we understand everyday peace as including “adequate visual representation – defined as visual representation perceived as adequate by the subjects depicted ... – as the lack thereof contributes to anxiety and lack of peace of mind, in particular in highly mediatized environments” (Möller 2019, p. 36). Social media offers many possibilities for people to become agents of their own image and citizen photography – as an ingredient of citizen journalism – has challenged photojournalism quite successfully (Allan 2017; Ritchin 2013). However, reaching out beyond one’s own peer group is difficult because digitization and algorithms channel and direct data flows and every image has to compete for attention with a seemingly unlimited number of images. Furthermore, images published on social media do not necessarily have to promote peace.

In 2008, Kelsey and Stimson observed “a widening rift between the models we had inherited for understanding photography and the new social and material conditions of the early twenty-first century” (2008, p. vii). If anything, this rift is even bigger now than it was then, given the speed and scope of technological developments in digitization and computation and the resulting changes in our understanding of and approaches to photography. These changes cannot be grasped solely by reading and adapting the classics of photography literature. They require taking seriously photography as a “meta-network” (Paglen) which operates with and on people fundamentally different from the operation of images in the analogue age. Furthermore, “the necessity of reading photographs, not just the text surrounding them” (Ritchin 1999, p. 41), clashes with short attention spans typical of digitization, rendering in-depth engagement with images – even selected ones – difficult and facilitating belief in what we are told to see rather than in what we see in fact.

Aims and Achievements of Peace Photography

What may peace photography achieve? Since exaggeration and hyperbole are regular ingredients of photography discourses since the inception of photography, some degree of caution and modesty seems to be in order. Despite claims to the opposite, however, photography is still strong in creating feelings of compassion and solidarity among audiences (Campbell 2014). Yet, as Johnson (2011) shows, the politics of compassion differ considerably from the politics of solidarity. Historically, photographic images not only contributed to the emergence of solidarity with distant people suffering from violations of human rights (Brothers 1997) but also to the invention and acceptance of the idea of human rights in the first place (Sliwinski 2011). Referring back, in times of violence, to earlier conditions when peaceful interactions still prevailed may convince individuals and groups of people that violence is not inevitable and that peace may be reconstituted once violence stops. The same impression may result from photographs of “non-violent conflict resolution in situations that formerly would, in all likelihood, have resulted in violence” (Möller 2019, p. 31). Visualizations of post-conflict cooperation between former enemies may help transform cultures of violence into cultures of peace. Furthermore, as discussed above in the context of everyday peace, photography – without changing the overall political conditions – can help the people depicted maintain or build “a sense of themselves, of their world, of their place in the universe” (Linfield 2010, p. 187). The “moment when the experience of violence stops being the single most important reference point for individuals and groups of people formerly exposed to violence” can also be photographed, thus contributing to “the development of expectations of peace (while simultaneously acknowledging that this is not a linear process)” (Möller 2019, p. 31). Conversations about “different interpretations of the same image and different representations of the same subject – peace – can result in fruitful and constructive dialogue” about both peace and photography (Möller and Shim 2019, p. 253).

Visual peace research thinks with and about photography and with photography about peace, thus expanding and diversifying our understanding of peace. It challenges established limits of both representation and visibility. And it does so ideally in a nonhierarchical manner aiming at dialogue, understanding, and acknowledgement of difference. While peace photography shares many of the above aims with other forms of representation, three features of visual representation are worth singling out here. First, pictures co-represent the general and the particular: they “reiterate the general forms in which the particular is contained” and by so doing visualize “the commonalities of being human” (MacDougall 1998, p. 246). Secondly, one of the things that differentiates photography from both painting and the special genre of art photography is the surround, i.e., those unintended ingredients of a photograph that appear in the margin or background regardless of the photographer’s intentions (Elkins 2011, p. 124). The surround “is often enough unwanted,” noted only “when it helps identify the place the photograph was taken, or when it adds a general atmosphere” (Elkins 2011, p. 117). However, the surround may also add something that challenges or undermines the intended message of a photograph. For example, in an image’s surround peaceful activities may be visible even if the center of the image shows acts of violence. Thus, and contrary to Elkins (2011, p. 124), the surround may advance our knowledge of the subject. Thirdly, photography is “uniquely fitted to mediate” what Thompson calls “the pathetic understanding of an other” (2013, p. 78) with pathema referring to “experience passively received: acquiescence to what is seen” (Thompson 2013, p. 14). That these three features do not figure prominently in most discourses on photography is a shortcoming of discourse rather than one of photography.

Summary

Peace photography is interested in process, not icon; it prioritizes representations of peace, not violence; and it focusses on everyday peace, not on the big questions of peace among nations. Peace photography aims to visualize peace processes, peace building, mediation, and reconciliation. It shies away neither from the seemingly unspectacular and mundane nor from a minimalistic understanding of peace. Indeed, photography is arguably most effective with regard to the visualization of everyday peace. Peace photography is dependent on definitions of peace and it exemplifies preexisting understandings of peace. However, it may also help diversify viewers’ understandings of peace beyond established ones. As a concept, peace photography should be thought of in the plural (peace photographs), reflecting what Dietrich (2002, p. 54) calls “peaces” and acknowledging that different forms of peace require different forms of visual representation. Conversations about different peace photographs tell us a lot about underlying conceptions of peace. Peace photography has a verbal element in the sense that it is to some extent discursively constructed by people referring to selected images as peace photographs, thus helping to establish peace photography as a photographic genre in its own right.

Although “we still must learn how to become spectators of images” (Emerling 2012, p. 165), visual socialization is not a regular ingredient of peace research in theory and education. Many introductions into peace and conflict research have very little to say about the visual construction of peace. As a result, we still must learn how to become self-reflective and self-critical spectators of images. In particular, we must learn how to become spectators of images of peace. A first step in such a learning process would be regular inclusion of visual education in peace research curricula. A second step would be regular designation in academic discourse of (selected) photographs as peace photographs: peace photography as a concept requires people doing it; doing peace photography includes referring to images as peace photographs and, by so doing, contributing to the emergence of peace photography as a distinct photographic genre. A third step would be identification of existing images, including images routinely referenced as conflict photographs, as peace photographs so as to establish a visual pedigree of such photography and de-marginalize it in public perception. Peace researchers have to take seriously the visual turn in both the social sciences and the societies which peace research claims to analyze. We cannot blame photography for our failure to recognize and capitalize on the peace potentialities of visual images.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

References

- Allan, S. (2011). Documenting war, visualizing peace: Towards peace photography. In I. S. Shaw, J. Lynch, & R. A. Hackett (Eds.), Expanding peace journalism: Comparative and critical approaches (pp. 147–167). Sydney: University of Sydney Press.
- Allan, S. (Ed.). (2017). Photojournalism and citizen journalism: Co-operation, collaboration and connectivity. London/New York: Routledge.
- Baker, S., & Mavlian, S. (Eds.). (2014). Conflict • time • photography. London: Tate Publishing.
- Bleiker, R. (Ed.). (2018). Visual Global Politics. London/New York: Routledge.
- Brothers, C. (1997). War and photography: A cultural history. London/New York: Routledge.
- Campbell, D. (2014). The myth of compassion fatigue. In L. Kennedy & C. Patrick (Eds.), The violence of the image: Photography and international conflict (pp. 97–124). London/New York: I.B. Tauris.
- Delgado, M. (2015). Urban youth and Photovoice: Visual ethnography in action. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Dell, S. (2010). Mediation and immediacy: The press, the popular front in France, and the Spanish civil war. In C. Young (Ed.), The Mexican suitcase: The rediscovered Spanish civil war negatives of Capa, Chim, and Taro (Vol. 1: The history, pp. 37–49). New York/Göttingen: International Center of Photography/Steidl.
- Dietrich, W. (2002). Farewell to the one peace. Peace Review, 14, 49–55.
- Elkins, J. (2011). What photography is. New York/London: Routledge.
- Emerling, J. (2012). Photography: History and theory. London/New York: Routledge.
- Hariman, R., & Lucaites, J. L. (2007). No caption needed: Iconic photographs, public culture, and Liberal democracy. Chicago/London: University of Chicago Press.
- Harper, D. (2012). Visual Sociology. London/New York: Routledge.
- Herschdorfer, N. (Ed.). (2018). The Thames & Hudson Dictionary of photography. London: Thames & Hudson.
- Johnson, J. (2011). ‘The arithmetic of compassion’: Rethinking the politics of photography. British Journal of Political Science, 41(3), 621–643.
- Kelsey, R., & Stimson, B. (2008). Introduction: Photography’s double index (a short history in three parts). In R. Kelsey & B. Stimson (Eds.), The meaning of photography (pp. vii–xxxii). Williamstown: Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute.
- Kennedy, L., & Patrick, C. (Eds.). (2014). The violence of the image: Photography and international conflict. London/New York: I.B. Tauris.
- Linfield, S. (2010). The cruel radiance: Photography and political violence. Chicago/London: University of Chicago Press.
- Lisle, D. (2011). The surprising detritus of leisure: Encountering the Late Photography of War. Environment and Planning D: Society and Space, 29, 873–890.

- MacDougall, D. (1998). Transcultural cinema. Edited and with an introduction by Lucien Taylor. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mehrez, A. (Ed.). (2019). Don McCullin. London: Tate Publishing.
- Möller, F. (2013). Visual peace: Images, spectatorship and the politics of violence. Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Möller, F. (2019). Peace photography. Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Möller, F., & Shim, D. (2019). Visions of peace in international relations. International Studies Perspectives, 20, 246–264. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isp/eky014>.
- Morris, E. (2011). Believing is seeing (observations on the mysteries of photography). New York: Penguin.
- Morris-Suzuki, T. (2005). The past within us: Media, memory, history. London/New York: Verso.
- Paglen, T. (2011). Untitled. Aperture, 204, 67–68.
- Perlmutter, D. D. (1999). Visions of war: Picturing warfare from the stone age to the cyber age. New York: St. Martin's Griffin.
- Reinhardt, M., Edwards, H., & Duganne, E. (Eds.). (2007). Beautiful suffering: Photography and the traffic in pain. Williamsburg: Williams College Museum of Art/Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Ritchin, F. (1999). In our own images. New York: Aperture.
- Ritchin, F. (2013). Bending the frame: Photojournalism, documentary, and the citizen. New York: Aperture.
- Roberts, H. (2012). War photographers: A special breed? In A. Wilkes Tucker & W. Michels with N. Zelt (Eds.), War/photography: Images of armed conflict and its aftermath (pp. 8–15). Houston/New Haven/London: Museum of Fine Arts/Yale University Press.
- Roberts, J. (2014). Photography and its violations. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Saltzman, L. (2010). What remains: Photography and landscape, memory and oblivion. In J. Blessing & N. Trotman (Eds.), Haunted: Contemporary photography I video I performance (pp. 126–137). New York: Guggenheim Museum Publications.
- Sliwinski, S. (2011). Human rights in camera. Chicago/London: University of Chicago Press.
- Smith, S. M. (2013). At the edge of sight: Photography and the unseen. Durham/London: Duke University Press.
- Solomon-Godeau, A. (1991). Photography at the dock: Essays on photographic history, institutions, and practices. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Sontag, S. (2003). Regarding the pain of others. New York: Farrar, Straus & Giroux.
- Taylor, D. (2003). The archive and the repertoire: Performing cultural memory in the Americas. Durham/London: Duke University Press.
- Thompson, J. L. (2013). Why photography matters. Cambridge, MA/London: The MIT Press.
- Vuori, J. A., & Saugmann Andersen, R. (Eds.). (2018). Visual security studies: Sights and spectacles of insecurity and war. London/New York: Routledge.
- Wilkes Tucker, A. & Michels, W. with Zelt, N. (2012). War/photography: Images of armed conflict and its aftermath. Houston/New Haven/London: Museum of Fine Arts/Yale University Press.

Photovoice

- ▶ Auto-photography

Pluralist Photography

- ▶ Auto-photography

Polarized Cities

- ▶ Divided Cities

Police Reform and Peacebuilding

Yoshiaki Furuzawa
Hiroshima City University, Hiroshima, Japan

Synonyms

DDR; Local Security; Peacebuilding; Rule of Law; Security-Development Nexus; SSR

Introduction

While the policy field known as peacebuilding is rather “new” – An Agenda for Peace (1992) is usually seen as a turning point for peacebuilding literature – assistance to police forces is not a “new” phenomenon. During the Cold War, police reform assistance programs were used as tools by recipient governments to improve their surveillance and persecute their political opponents within the context of the East-West divide (Call and Barnett 2000). Due to its potential link to human rights violations, assisting police forces was once perceived as taboo in the international development discourse, and the police were perceived as part of the problem. Within the peacebuilding discourse, however, the police were no longer perceived as part of the problem, but rather part of the solution.

During the Cold War, the division of labor between development assistance and humanitarian assistance was rather clear: “[armed conflict] was treated as an unfortunate occurrence, forcing development workers out and humanitarian in – an order to be reversed when the conflict was over and conditions were safe for normal development work to resume” (Uvin 2002, p. 5). However, as the timing of third-party intervention “broadened” following the end of the Cold War (Miall et al. 1999, p. 186), the international community had to engage in initiatives to work “in” and/or “on” conflict rather than work “around” conflict. It was this response to an operational necessity to bridge the gap between humanitarian assistance and development aid that brought about the term “peacebuilding.”

Peacebuilding is defined as “an action to identify and support structures which will tend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid a relapse into conflict” (UN 1992). It is composed of two tasks – a short-term task of ending violence and preventing a relapse into war and a long-term task of constructing a self-sustaining peace – and is composed of activities to address political, economic, psycho-social, and security deficits (Miall et al. 1999, pp. 188, 203). The emergence of peacebuilding as a policy field led to the security/development nexus where the perception is that development is ultimately impossible without stability, and, at the same time, security is not sustainable without development. In short, security began to be perceived as one of the essential public goods like education, public health, and clean water. Within this context, police reform is expected to address security deficits and establish a rule of law in postconflict and transitional societies.

Police reform is an important tool to dismantle the privatization of security at the domestic level. As Clapham depicts, “the development of wholly ‘public’ systems of security provision is often unattainable” especially in postconflict and transitional countries, and that means “the effective choice is between degrees or types of privatized security systems” for a majority of ordinary people (Clapham 1999, pp. 23–24). Under these circumstances, security is provided on an exclusionary basis, often in the interests of maintaining the status quo favored by whoever is in power. And those excluded may respond by further privatization: that is, by arming themselves. Dismantling the exclusionary privatized security system resembling that of a patron-client relationship is important in the process of police reform to make safety and social order one of the public goods. Thus, “the question is no longer whether the international community will assist” the police reform abroad, but “how well it will do the job” (Bayley 2006, pp. 13–14).

The aim of this entry is to deepen understanding about police reform by asking the following questions: What can be expected at the beginning of police reform? Who are involved and what is provided as a police-reform package? What are the lessons learned and challenges ahead? This entry will mainly refer to a case study of Sierra Leone – a classic case of postwar peacebuilding led by the international community during the 1990s to the 2000s – since it would be easier for readers to follow the discussion of a specific example. It will be an interesting case to retrospectively look back at, since the case of Sierra Leone is often referred to as a successful story of security sector reform in postconflict societies.

What Can Be Expected at the Beginning of Police Reform?

Police reform may look different depending on the contexts in which it will take place. Police reform takes place both in countries where governments are being replaced following armed conflict, government collapse, and/or international imposition and in countries undergoing peaceful and/or postauthoritarian transition. Because the police forces undergoing reform in postconflict and transitional societies require different attention, police reform has to pay attention to different needs of local police forces in each context. Some may be politicized and tarnished with records of human rights abuses due to their involvements in a conflict, while others may be almost nonexistent after years of conflict (Hansen 2002). While some may only require advice, others may need institutional reconstruction, and a few may require the international community to temporarily take over the daily policing tasks from the local authority, as in the case of Kosovo and East Timor, which is known as executive policing (Dwan 2002).

In the case of Sierra Leone, the police force inherited by the newly democratically elected government in 1996 was not only suffering from damages from the civil war, but also from decades of political mismanagement. During the conflict, many police stations in areas contested by the rebels were looted and/or burned down. Offender records – including fingerprint files and crime evidence – were missing and/or destroyed in most police stations (United Nations 1999). By 1996, only six of the 23 largest police stations in the country had sufficient equipment to communicate with other police stations. Among 17 stations without a central communications network, only a handful had working two-way radio systems to contact officers in the field. By the mid-1990s, the main police-training facility at Hastings, as well as other regional training centers in the provincial capitals of Bo, Kenema, and Makeni, was severely damaged due to rebel attacks, resulting in suspension of training of new recruits. Police officers also had to purchase their own supplies, including uniforms (Republic of Sierra Leone 1998). By the time a peace agreement was signed in 2002, the Sierra Leone Police (SLP) suffered an overall reduction of almost 30 percent – from a high of 9317 to a low of 6600 (Meek 2003). These are some examples of how the SLP was affected by the conflict, and an important question that needs to be asked here is why were the police attacked during the conflict?

A major reason is that the SLP was perceived as a symbol of government authority by the rebel group known as the Revolutionary United Front (RUF). The SLP was deliberately targeted by the RUF in rural areas because of its close association with previous regimes. For example, following the 1992 coup d'état, the entire management of the SLP – a total of 19 senior police officers including the Inspector General – was “retired” in one day and replaced by those who were loyal to the new government (Republic of Sierra Leone 1998). And similar changes took place following each coup d'état in the 1990s, erasing the institutional memory. It is also said that new recruits who joined the force during the conflict were hand-picked based on their political allegiance. Changes in government were reflected in the management and affected appointments as well as recruitments. The root of political mismanagement, however, can be traced much further back to colonial times.

For colonial governments, as Killingray (1986) puts it, “the maintenance of law and order meant taking firm action to deal with any threat to the continuing system of rule imposed by the British”; thus, police forces in colonial Africa “did not exercise functions similar to those of European or modern police forces” (Killingray 1986, pp. 413, 425). A dual system of laws was established: European law and “customary” law. While the former was enforced by the colonial government, the latter was the responsibility of the native authority, and local tribal police forces were responsible for “traditional rules.” Sierra Leone was no exception.

In the case of Sierra Leone, while the modern SLP was established with the announcement of the Police Act in 1964, inception of the SLP dates to the Sierra Leone Police Force in the Crown Colony established in 1894. The Sierra Leone Police Force was, however, geographically limited to the Crown Colony to protect British interests, and the provinces, later to be referred as Protectorate (from August 1896), were policed by the Court Messengers. The Court Messengers were “the Protectorate Police” (Jeffries 1952, p. 199), and they still exist today as the Chiefdom Police. The Sierra Leone Police of the Colony decided to formally extend into the Protectorate in 1954, and the two forces have coexisted since then (Furuzawa 2018). A fundamental feature of both the Sierra Leone Police Force of the Crown Colony – from which the SLP takes its origins – and the Court Messengers of the Protectorate is that both colonial security institutions (in particular, the former) were created not to defend the inhabitants, but to assist foreigners exploiting the country. Despite this complex policing structure in the country, the Chiefdom Police were not, however, originally a target of the assistance provided by the international community, since they were not technically a part of the police force.

In Sierra Leone, rebuilding the police from damages of a decade-long conflict was necessary, but that was not sufficient on its own due to the historical political mismanagement of the force dating back to colonial times. This was the starting point of the police reform in Sierra Leone.

Who Are Involved and What Is Provided as a Police-Reform Package?

Police reform may also look different, depending on the range of actors involved. Various actors are involved in the process of police reform, ranging from nongovernmental organizations, national police forces, national governments, and private security/military companies to international organizations. Each actor, however, has its own strengths and weaknesses in carrying out police reform. For example, United Nations Peacekeeping Operations (PKO) are “neither designed nor equipped to engage in longer-term institution and capacity-building efforts” (UN DPKO/DFS 2008, p. 28). In Mozambique, the actual “police reform” efforts following the withdrawal of the UN mission concerning police reform were bilateral: Police training in Mozambique was conducted by the Spanish Guardia Civil. In Sierra Leone, with funds from the United Nations Development Program and the UK’s Department for International Development, the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone constructed police stations and training centers. In Kenya, the Office of the President asked London-based INGO Saferworld to provide assistance in the efforts to promote community policing in the country (Furuzawa 2011b).

The police reform in Sierra Leone can be divided into two phases: UK-led Police Reform (1996–2002) and PKO-led Police Reform (2002–2005) (Furuzawa 2011a, 2017). In contrast to the early (and realistic) concentration on its capital, Freetown, in the initial UK-led efforts, police reform gradually broadened its target areas to rural areas in the later PKO-led efforts (Albrecht and Jackson 2009).

UK-Led Police Reform: CPDTF and CCSSP (1996–2002)

Police reform in Sierra Leone started in the midst of armed conflict, despite occasional disruptions from the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council coup (May 1997 to February 1998) and the attack by RUF (January 1999) after Ahmad Tejan Kabbah became the president following the election in February 1996. The Government of Sierra Leone (GoSL) led by Kabbah showed its commitment to the police reform on numerous occasions. For example, Article 25 of the Abidjan Accord signed in November 1996 stated that “[t]he police force shall be strengthened to ensure that the rule of law is upheld throughout Sierra Leone.” It was also Kabbah who appointed Sama Banya in June 1996 to chair a committee to “review the conditions of service of Republic of Sierra Leone Police Force, the Force’s public image, its recruitment and staffing policies, and functional capabilities and administrative structure” (Republic of Sierra Leone 1998, p. 37). Upon receiving a request from the GoSL, the Commonwealth Secretariat sent a small group of advisors in March 1996; however, all reform initiatives were halted temporarily due to the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council coup.

In July 1998, the Commonwealth Secretariat formed a Commonwealth Police Development Task Force (CPDTF) comprised of senior police officers from Canada, the UK, Sri Lanka, and Zimbabwe. The CPDTF was tasked to assist the GoSL in putting together a plan to rebuild the SLP. CPDTF activities can be divided into quick-impact activities and long-term activities (Horn et al. 2006). As a part of the quick-impact activities, the CPDTF used a part of their initial budget of USD 900,000 to purchase necessities for the police force. For example, the CPDTF purchased medicines and vitamins for the police hospital – since many officers were ill – and a full uniform for all officers, which were not provided during the conflict. The CPDTF also provided bicycles, vehicles, and a basic radio-communication system.

The CPDTF also focused its activities on obtaining commitments from relevant Sierra Leonean stakeholders, as well as setting a direction for police reform. This was done by drafting a new police charter and mission statement to mark a new beginning for the SLP. In August 1998, personally endorsed by President Kabbah, the new police charter was announced, which clarified the government’s expectations for the police, affirmed the importance of equal opportunities and human rights, and ended with a phrase which became the new motto for the police: “a Force for Good in Our Nation”. The newly drafted police mission statement also delineated the importance of professionalism, human rights and freedoms, and responding to local needs – which would later be termed “local-needs policing” within the context of Sierra Leone, rather than the often-used “community policing.”

While the conceptual documents and agreements achieved could not be undone, many of the achievements were lost in an attack by the Revolutionary United Front in January 1999. Police stations were burned down, vehicles destroyed, and it is said that 250 SLP officers were murdered during the attacks, together with 375 of their family members (Meek 2003). Despite the attack, police reform continued. In consultation with the CPDTF, the GoSL appointed an expatriate senior police officer – CPDTF leader Keith Biddle, a British national – as Inspector General of the SLP in November 1999. This appointment was made to develop a new generation of leadership within the SLP (Horn et al. 2006).

In October 2000, the CPDTF was transformed into the Commonwealth Community Safety and Security Project (CCSSP). The focus of the CCSSP remained the same as that of the CPDTF, that is, to “re-establish the Sierra Leone Police as an effective and accountable civilian police service” (Short 2002). The CCSSP provided training and management support, with a close working relationship with Biddle. The CCSSP allocated its budget toward training senior police officers at the UK Police Staff College at Bramshill from 2001. A ten-week course called the International Commander’s Program was provided for three years to Sierra Leonean officers, including Brima Acha Kamara, who later succeeded Biddle in June 2003.

Supported by both the GoSL and CCSSP, Biddle made difficult – however necessary – decisions toward police reform. The decision was made to reduce the number of SLP ranks from 22 to 10 by clarifying and redefining the roles and responsibilities. A new Executive Management Board, the highest decision-making body, was established to introduce a culture of open debate and a sense of team within the SLP leadership. New departments and units were also created such as the Complaint, Discipline, and Internal Investigations Department (a new internal accountability structure responsible for following up on complaints from the public about police misconduct) and the Family Support Unit (a new unit to handle increasing cases of domestic violence between ex-combatants and their so-called “wives” who were struggling to regain their freedom, originally called the Domestic Violence Unit).

PKO-Led Police Reform (2002–2005)

The conflict officially ended in Sierra Leone in January 2002. A peace agreement was signed, but significant areas of the countryside were not under the direct control of the GoSL. The SLP needed to increase its size from 6000 to 9500 personnel in order to cover the whole country. This required training at least 1000 new recruits per year until 2005. Furthermore, the basic ability of officers to carry out day-to-day policing was lacking due to the decade-long conflict. Both the CCSSP and United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) – especially its police component then known as the Civilian Police (CIVPOL), now referred to as the United Nations Police (UNPOL) – were expected to provide on-the-job mentoring and monitoring at the Police Training School and throughout the country for newly deployed officers. Handing over the post of SLP Inspector General from British officer Keith Bidle to Sierra Leonean Brima Acha Kamara in June 2003 also brought a change of approach by Commonwealth advisers, whose role became less directive and more supportive (Horn et al. 2006). With the United Nation's increasing commitment to ensure an eventual withdrawal of its peacekeeping force, the responsibility for police reform shifted from the CCSSP to UNAMSIL at this time.

Up to 2002, the police component of UNAMSIL remained modest in size, since UNAMSIL was mainly involved in Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR) of ex-combatants. Starting with a deployment of three officers with a limited monitoring mandate in 1999, it rose to six observers in February 2000 and then 30 additional officers to prepare for the 2002 elections based on the Security Council Resolution 1400 of March 2002. Thus, the Security Council Resolution 1436 of September 2002, which authorized the deployment of up to 170 CIVPOL to "advise and assist" the SLP, was a pivotal change in terms of police reform. The Security Council Resolution 1436 authorized a larger force to expand its activities beyond Freetown and into rural areas. The changing function of CIVPOL to take part in the police reform is closely linked to the plans for the drawing down of UNAMSIL. UNAMSIL closely worked with the SLP to maintain order and security in key points in the country; thus, rebuilding the SLP was a necessary condition for its withdrawal from the country.

By July 2004, UNAMSIL assisted in the re-opening of regional training centers in Makeni, Kenema, and Bo. One of the main achievements of UNAMSIL was its success in recruiting and training more than 3500 local police officers (UN 2005). UNAMSIL also helped the SLP re-establish their presence in critical areas of the country, such as the eastern part, that were very hostile to the police during the conflict. In a joint effort with a team from the Commonwealth, UNAMSIL was able to increase the SLP strength

Police Reform and Peacebuilding, Table 1 SLP personnel distribution by region (as of June 2, 2008)

| Region | Male | Female | Total |
|--------------|-------------|-------------|-------------|
| West | 4599 | 1117 | 5716 |
| North | 1220 | 153 | 1373 |
| South | 948 | 125 | 1073 |
| East | 1247 | 153 | 1400 |
| Total | 8014 | 1548 | 9562 |

Source: Created by author based on African Human Security Initiative (2009), p. 16

to its prewar strength of 9500 officers (see Table 1). The GoSL was able to take over country-wide security primacy from UNAMSIL in September 2004, which was followed by the CCSSP ending in June 2005, and the withdrawal of UNAMSIL in December 2005.

In summary, the contributions of the UK-led police reform between 1996 and 2002 can be observed in (i) setting the direction for the police reform, (ii) training a new generation of senior personnel within SLP, and (iii) carrying out organizational restructuring within the SLP, such as establishing an internal accountability measure. While reform efforts predominantly had to take place in Freetown before signing of the peace agreement in 2002, the PKO-led police reform between 2002 and 2005 was able to (i) increase presence of the SLP in rural areas by raising the force size up to 9500 and (ii) handing back policing responsibility to Sierra Leoneans, which can be symbolized by both the appointment of the Sierra Leonean Inspector General in June 2003 and the withdrawal of UNAMSIL in December 2005.

Unintended Consequences of Police Reform

Retrospectively looking at the case study of Sierra Leone – a classic case of postwar peacebuilding led by the international community during the 1990s to the 2000s – what lessons can we draw from this experience? How can police reform in Sierra Leone be evaluated? To put it differently, what were intended and unintended consequences of police reform in Sierra Leone? From one perspective, “[g]iven the low level at which reform began, the achievement [of police reform in Sierra Leone] is praiseworthy” (Horn et al. 2006, p. 121). One may recall the early days of police reform in Sierra Leone. For instance, when police reform advisers returned to the country in April 1999 after the coup d’état, they reported that “the SLP does not have primacy for the maintenance of law and order and are unlikely to be able to achieve police primacy from the military and paramilitary forces in the near future” (Horn et al. 2006, p. 115). Between 2000 and 2005, the international community spent approximately $27 million in order to (re)establish a police force, which resulted in a successful handover of daily policing tasks from the United Nations PKO to the local police force in 2005. It is a benchmark that should be applauded. Baker, however, pointed out that despite improved public trust and effectiveness of the SLP, actors other than the police and military still provide most forms of security in Sierra Leone (Baker 2006, p. 45). How should we perceive this comment by Baker?

Retrospectively, there seem to be at least two unintended consequences of the police reform in Sierra Leone. Two unintended consequences are both related to targets of the assistance provided by the international community. First, with the CCSSP closing down in June 2005 and the PKO withdrawing in December 2005, police reform efforts were handed over to a newly created Justice Sector Development Program (JSDP), which was implemented by the British Council as a five-year contract by DFID that commenced in March 2005. JSDP was different from previous police reform efforts, not only because it was designed to be led by the GoSL, but because police reform became a component of the justice sector-wide reform. In short, the “sector-wide” mandate of JSDP was different from that of the “institutional mandate” of previous police reform efforts (Howlett-Bolton 2008, p. 9). JSDP was based on the understanding that the development of the police was achieved “at the expense of the other justice institutions” and took “a coordinated sector-wide approach” (Howlett-Bolton 2008, p. 5 and p. 6).

Second, in order to foster perception of a justice sector-wide approach as well as to develop a long-term government strategy, JSDP assisted in drafting a policy framework in 2008 known as the Justice Sector Reform Strategy and Investment Plan 2008–2010 (JSRS-IP). JSRS-IP stipulated “a coherent, prioritized and sequenced set of activities to reform the operations of the justice system in Sierra Leone” with four main goals to be achieved: (i) safe communities, (ii) access to justice, (iii) strengthened rule of law, and (iv) improved justice service delivery (Republic of Sierra Leone 2008, p. v and p. vi). Within these four goals, the police reform falls in the first category of the “safe communities,” and JSRS-IP emphasized the key role of the SLP in keeping communities safe. However, within the same category, JSRS-IP also included “activities to strengthen the performance and supervision of Chiefdom Police,” which were never regarded as a target of assistance before 2005 (Republic of Sierra Leone 2008, p. vi) (see Table 2).

The Chiefdom is the basic unit of local administration in Sierra Leone, and the Chiefdom police are responsible for policing in the provinces (Furuzawa 2018). Chiefdom police officers work in each chiefdom and are under the command of the Ministry of Local Government and Rural Development, separate from the national police. This shift to incorporate Chiefdom Police took place because “the formal justice system [was] inaccessible to an estimated 70% of the population,” while Chiefdom Police were “often more accessible at the community level than their SLP counterparts” (Republic of Sierra Leone 2008, p. 4 and p. 15). In Sierra Leone, this shift in thinking was portrayed as focusing on both the “supply side” as well as the “demand side” of justice delivery (JSDP 2008, p. 4). This resulted in placing more emphasis on informal justice systems and alternative dispute resolution mechanisms.

These were not intended results of police reform efforts and constituted a sea change for the SLP. The case of Sierra Leone reminds us that (i) the police alone cannot maintain the rule of law and (ii) there is a gap between police reform policy and the reality on the ground – that is,

Police Reform and Peacebuilding, Table 2 Provinces/Districts and Chiefdom Police (as of March 14, 2017)

| Province | District | Population | Size of chiefdom police | | |
|---------------------|--------------------|------------|-------------------------|----------|-------|
| | | | District | Province | Total |
| Northern | Bombali | 606,183 | 110 | 392 | 1,013 |
| | Koinadugu | 408,097 | 78 | | |
| | Port Loko | 614,063 | 73 | | |
| | Tonkolili | 530,776 | 80 | | |
| | Kambia | 343,686 | 51 | | |
| Eastern | Kenema | 609,873 | 116 | 290 | |
| | Kono | 505,767 | 89 | | |
| | Kailahun | 525,372 | 85 | | |
| Southern | Bo | 574,201 | 86 | 331 | |
| | Bonthe | 200,730 | 83 | | |
| | Pujehun | 345,577 | 65 | | |
| | Moyamba | 318,064 | 97 | | |
| Western area | Western Area Urban | 1,050,301 | | | |
| | Western Area Rural | 442,951 | | | |

Source: Revised Table 1 from Furuzawa (2018)

police are not necessarily the only policing actor in the context of postconflict and transitional societies. How should we understand these unintended consequences?

Back to Square One: Why Police?

In reviewing the trends of security sector-related policies – including police reform – Ball and Hendrickson identified that policy discussion is “influenced by a normative framework and a standard set of assumptions about how ‘reforming’ countries should organize and operate their security sectors,” which “tends to be prescriptive (and technical) in nature, focusing more on outcomes and modalities for delivering assistance” (Ball and Hendrickson 2009, pp. 37–38). Furthermore, Olonisakin et al. also added that “[t]here is a tendency to strategically deal with supply-side issues relating to justice and security provision by the state,” which result in “[focusing] on formal structures, and far less on informal ones” (Olonisakin et al. 2009, pp. 24–25). This literature is questioning the underlying assumption of security sector reform, including police reform, within peacebuilding. These questions echo the experience in Sierra Leone.

From one perspective, safety and public order is considered one of the public goods. Hence, the first task of peacebuilding may be “to restore the monopoly as a foundation and precondition for all further institution-building efforts” (Paris 2004, pp. 206–7). But is there only one way to maintain order in a state? Can there not be other alternatives? Is it a task of the international community to make a decision on behalf of postconflict ad transitional countries – taking out possible alternatives – to provide a universal model of statehood? From a different perspective, however, the state itself is “a historically contingent reality,” and one can argue that “[W]estern commentators and policymakers have difficulty imagining any other form of viable political community than the state as it is understood in the West” (Williams 2010, p. 60). This illustrates that peacebuilding “is far less multidimensional than previously thought,” underpinned by “the same epistemic knowledge base, ontological view of the world and methods” (Richmond 2009, p. 69). In short, peacebuilding – including the police reform – needs to go beyond the one-size-fits-all prescription, and to “[think] about peace beyond the liberal state mechanism (rather than using peace to propagate liberal states)” (Richmond and Franks 2009, p. 212).

While the policy discussion tends to be prescriptive and technical in nature and focuses on formal structures, Ebo points out that, in the context of sub-Saharan Africa, “statutory forces are not the sole providers of security” (Ebo 2007, p. 47). Bruce stresses that “it is necessary to take seriously the fact that the idea of state police as providers of security on the Western model is generally not valid in Africa” (Bruce 2021, p. 26). Baker further concurs that “[w]hatever was true of Europe when [Max Weber] wrote, it is not an accurate description of Africa today” (Baker 2010, p.12). While it is important not to be overly romanticize the “local” (Mac Ginty 2008, pp. 120–21), they are all emphasizing the importance of contextualizing the police reform.

The case of police reform in Sierra Leone, particularly the shift that took place from supporting only the SLP to including the Chiefdom Police, can pose a question concerning the nature of the peace which contemporary peacebuilding is in the process of creating. The case of police reform in Sierra Leone echo points made by scholars, which can be interpreted within context of police reform as a question about equating the concepts of police and policing (Marenin 1996), that is, whether nonstate policing actors in postconflict and transitional societies should be treated as a hurdle to be overcome or as a partner to be welcomed in maintaining the public order. Put differently, police reform may need to acknowledge that “very different knowledge systems and political ordering mechanisms are already in place” (Richmond 2011, p. 50). This “very different knowledge systems” is often portrayed by the term “legal pluralism” (Griffiths 1986).

Some peacebuilding policy studies – including police reform – often assume and start their discussion as if postconflict and transitional societies are empty canvases. On the contrary, policing structures in postconflict and transitional societies are quite complex. While a final decision should be made by the government concerned and the people of that country, policy planners will need to be prepared to answer the following questions: What kind of messages will be sent to conflict protagonists by assisting state policing in a given context? Is it not necessary to consider utilizing nonstate policing actors on the ground? If a decision is made to exclude them, what will that mean in the long run? If a decision is made to incorporate them, how can state policing and nonstate policing be balanced? Borrowing a phrase from a Kenyan friend, police reform policy needs to be able to respond to a simple question, why police?

Summary

The beginning of police reform will be different depending on each context, and police reform may also look different depending on the range of actors involved. Importance of police reform within peacebuilding seems to be widely accepted. For example, since the 1990s, the international community has acknowledged the importance of creating an “effective” police force that operates under the rule of law and respects human rights (e.g., Handbook on Police Accountability, Oversight, and Integrity by the United Nations (2011), 10 Basic Human Rights Standards for Law Enforcement Officials by the Amnesty International (1998)). However, as illustrated in the case of Sierra Leone, unintended consequences of police reform in post-conflict and transitional societies are questioning the underlying assumption of police reform itself and are yet to be examined fully.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Sierra Leone

Funding This research was supported by the Japan Society for the Promotion of Science Grant-in-Aid for Scientific Research (C) (Grant Number: 19K01505).

References

- African Human Security Initiative. (2009). Sierra Leone: A country review of crime and criminal justice, 2008. Institute for Security Studies.
- Albrecht, P., & Jackson, P. (2009). Security system transformation in Sierra Leone, 1997–2007. Global Facilitation Network on Security Sector Reform.
- Baker, B. (2006). The African post-conflict policing agenda in Sierra Leone. Conflict, Security & Development, 6(1), 25–49.
- Baker, B. (2010). Security in post-conflict Africa: The role of nonstate policing. CRC Press.
- Ball, N., & Hendrickson, D. (2009). Trends in security sector reform: Policy, practice and research. King's College London.
- Bayley, D. H. (2006). Changing the guard: Developing democratic police abroad. Oxford University Press.
- Bruce, D. (2021). The African police accountability agenda in the 2020s: Continuity and disruption. African Policing Civilian Oversight Forum.
- Call, C., & Barnett, M. (2000). Looking for a few good cops: Peacekeeping, peacebuilding and CIVPOL. In T. T. Holm & E. B. Eide (Eds.), Peacebuilding and police reform (pp. 43–68). Frank Cass.
- Clapham, C. (1999). African security systems: Privatisation and the scope for mercenary activity. In G. Mills & J. Stremlau (Eds.), The privatisation of security in Africa (pp. 23–45). South African Institute of International Affairs.
- Dwan, R. (2002). Executive policing: Enforcing the law in peace operations. Oxford University Press.
- Ebo, A. (2007). The role of security sector reform in sustainable development: Donor policy trends and challenges. Conflict, Security & Development, 7(1), 27–60.
- Furuzawa, Y. (2011a). Keisatsu kaikaku shien [Police reform: Written in Japanese]. In T. Ochiai (Ed.), Afurika no funso kaiketu to heiwa kochiku: Sierra Leone no keiken [Conflict resolution and peacebuilding in Africa: A case of Sierra Leone] (pp. 157–171). Showado Publishing.
- Furuzawa, Y. (2011b). Two police reforms in Kenya: Their implications for police reform policy. Journal of International Development and Cooperation, 17(1), 51–69.
- Furuzawa, Y. (2017). Sierra Leone no chieftdom keisatu ni miru kokka no katachi [Chieftdom police reform and statehood in Sierra Leone: Changing characteristics of security sector reform (1996–2015): Written in Japanese]. Kokusai Anzenhosho [International Security], 45(2), 75–90.
- Furuzawa, Y. (2018). Chieftdom police training in Sierra Leone (2008–2015). Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 13(2), 106–110.
- Griffiths, J. (1986). What is legal pluralism? Journal of Legal Pluralism, 24, 1–55.
- Hansen, A. S. (2002). From Congo to Kosovo: Civilian police in peace operations. Oxford University Press for the IISS.
- Horn, A., & Olonisakin, F., with Peake, G. (2006). United Kingdom-led security sector reform in Sierra Leone. Civil Wars, 8(2), 109–123.
- Howlett-Bolton, A. C. (2008). Aiming for holistic approaches to justice sector development (Security system transformation in Sierra Leone 1997–2007 working paper no.7). Global Facilitation Network for Security Sector Reform.
- Jeffries, C. (1952). The colonial police. Max Parrish.
- Justice Sector Development Program. (2008). Justice sector development program: Demand-side strategy – civil society and citizen involvement in justice sector reform. JSDP.
- Killingray, D. (1986). The maintenance of law and order in British colonial Africa. African Affairs, 83(340), 411–437.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Traditional and indigenous approaches to peacemaking. In J. Darby & R. M. Ginty (Eds.), Contemporary Peacemaking (2nd ed., pp. 120–130). Palgrave Macmillan.
- Marenin, O. (1996). Changing police, policing change: International perspectives. Garland Publishing.
- Meek, S. (2003). Policing Sierra Leone. In M. Malan, S. Meek, T. Thusi, J. Ginifer, & P. Coker (Eds.), Sierra Leone: Building the road to recovery (pp. 105–116). Institute for Security Studies.
- Miall, H., Ramsbotham, O., & Woodhouse, T. (1999). Contemporary conflict resolution (1st ed.). Polity Press.
- Olonisakin, F., with Ikpe, E., & Badong, P. (2009). The future of security and justice for the poor: A 'blue-sky' think piece. Prepared for UK Department for International Development, CSDG policy studies paper no. 21.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge University Press.
- Republic of Sierra Leone. (1998). Report of the Dr. Banyan committee on the Republic of Sierra Leone police force. Republic of Sierra Leone.
- Republic of Sierra Leone. (2008). Government of Sierra Leone justice sector reform strategy and investment plan 2008–2010. Republic of Sierra Leone.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). Beyond liberal peace? Responses to 'backsliding'. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding (pp. 54–77). United Nations University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). The rule of law in liberal peacebuilding. In C. L. Sriram, O. Martin-Ortega, & J. Herman (Eds.), Peacebuilding and rule of law in Africa (pp. 44–59). Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P., & Franks, J. (2009). Liberal peace transitions: Between statebuilding and peacebuilding. Edinburgh University Press.
- Short, C. (2002, November 26). Response to question from John Barrett. UK Parliament. Accessed on 20 Oct 2009.
- United Nations. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping [Reports of the secretary general pursuant to the statement adopted by the Summit Meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992]. UN Doc. A/47/277-S/2411.

United Nations. (1999). Fifth report of the secretary-general on the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone. S/1999/237.

United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations/ Department of Field Support (2008). United Nations Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidelines. DPKO.

United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone. (2005). Fact sheet 3: Human rights and rule of law. UN Department of Public Information.

Uvin, P. (2002). The development/peacebuilding nexus: A typology and history of changing paradigms. Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 1(1), 5–24.

Williams, A. J. (2010). Reconstruction: The missing historical link. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 58–73). Palgrave Macmillan.

Political Decentralization

- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention

Political Demography

- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict

Political Islam

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Islam and Peace

Political Missions

- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Political Settlements

- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Politics of Passportization and Territorial Conflicts

Ramesh Ganohariti

School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Extraterritorial citizenship; Extraterritorial naturalization; Military intervention

Description

The term passportization became prominent following the 2008 Russo-Georgian war and has been defined as the mass conferral of citizenship to the population of a particular foreign territory by distributing passports, generally within a relatively short period (Artman 2013; Nagashima 2019).

Passportization falls within the broader policy of extraterritorial naturalization, which numerous states have conducted. What makes passportization unique and dangerous are its consequences. Russia justified its military interventions in Georgia, and to an extent in Ukraine, by arguing that it had a responsibility to protect and defend its citizens (Medvedev 2008), who only recently had become Russian citizens.

Theoretically, passportization as a policy can be carried out by any state, but its current usage is almost exclusively used to refer to Russia's distribution of passports in post-Soviet de facto states and disputed territories from the early 2000s. Given the limited international condemnation/sanctions, Russia's actions have/can embolden it (and other states) to use passportization as a precursor for intervention in neighboring states. Thus, while passportization itself is not illegal (Natoli 2010), it can be used as a tool to justify intervention and transform contested territories into de facto Russian spaces inside de jure territory of a neighboring state (Artman 2013; Littlefield 2009). Thus, while most states use territorial claims to substantiate citizenship, Russia has used passportization to justify territorial claims in its neighborhood (Mühlfried 2010).

Introduction

States may use a combination of coercive and noncoercive tools to respond to and gain an upper hand in territorial disputes that they are involved in. One relatively new tool used to influence territorial conflicts is that of passportization via mass-scale extraterritorial citizenship/naturalization. The first part of the entry will discuss the phenomenon of passportization and its place within the international legal framework. Following, the entry will discuss how Russia has used passportization as a tool for geopolitical ambitions in Georgia and Ukraine.

Passportization

The policy of extraterritorial citizenship is nothing new, and states have used it to maintain ties with diaspora or reengage with kin whose ancestors originate from the states (Agarin and Karolewski 2015) and in some cases has been used as an extraterritorial minority protection tool (Kolstø 1993; Pogonyi 2017). However, such acts have not always been positively received in the countries that are affected by these policies.

Every sovereign state has the exclusive right to decide who it chooses to confer citizenship to, but they should avoid abusing this right and use it for political goals (OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities 2008, pp. 19–20). The Bolzano/Bozen Recommendations on National Minorities in Inter-State Relations further notes that the granting extraterritorial citizenship can become contentious when states proactively engage in en mass extraterritorial conferral of citizenship to a “specified group of individuals or in substantial numbers relative to the size of the population of the State of residence or one of its territorial subdivisions” (OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities 2008, pp. 19–20). Furthermore, when granting extraterritorial citizenship, states must ensure that there is a genuine link between the state and the individual who is conferred with citizenship (Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala) 1955). Thus, mass conferral of citizenship, without the consent of the host state goes against the principles of good neighborliness, challenges sovereignty, and threatens international peace and security (OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities 2008, p. 7). However, this is only a norm, and international law does not constrain states from issuing preferential extraterritorial citizenship provided that they do not interfere with the sovereignty of other states (Spiro 2017, p. 640).

A term closely related to the phenomenon of extraterritorial citizenship/naturalization is passportization. Historically, the term was largely absent in the English language. However, in Russian, it was used to refer to the process of the Soviet authorities requiring all citizens to possess identity documentation (i.e., internal passports) starting from the 1930s (Lyubarsky 2002; Potemkina and Kuznetsova 2014). Passportization, in its current usage, became prominent following the 2008 Russo-Georgian war, which was justified by the duty to protect Russian citizens in the region. Within this context, it has been defined as the “mass conferral of Russian citizenship on the population of particular [foreign] territories by distributing Russian passports” (Nagashima 2019, p. 188), generally within a short period. While passportization can be carried out by any state, its current usage is almost exclusively used to refer to the acts of Russia undertaken in post-Soviet de facto states and disputed territories from the early 2000s. Note that the older definition of passportization continues to be used in certain instances and can be used to refer to actions of de facto state authorities who undertake the documentation and issuance of “national” passports to residents living under their control. Thus, de facto states use passports as another tool for displaying sovereignty and creating a citizenry.

Until 31 December 2000, former Soviet citizens had automatic access (via a simple declaration) to citizenship under the 1991 citizenship law (Salenko 2012, p. 14; Shevel 2012, pp. 113, 127), and ex-soviet citizens living in Abkhazia and South Ossetia maintained Soviet (internal) passports which were used to cross the border into Russia. However, with the decision to replace Soviet passports by 2004 (Salenko 2012) and the entry into force of a new citizenship law in July 2002 which was expected to restrict access to citizenship (Shevel 2012), there was an active uptake in Russian citizenship by Abkhazians (Nagashima 2019). Under the new law, only those born on the territory of the Russian Federation and former Soviet citizens that remained stateless would have simplified access to citizenship, with the latter pathway added as a compromise to parliamentarians who demanded a more expansive/inclusive definition of the “nation” (Shevel 2012, p. 130). That said, many residents perceived that the new law would eliminate or complicate the possibility to acquire Russian citizenship (Krivenyuk 2002; Nagashima 2019, p. 190). This forthcoming change prompted the Congress of Russian Communities in Abkhazia, a nationalist organization, to act as an intermediary and assist in the passport application process before entry into force of the new law (Khashig 2002; Nagashima 2019, p. 188). From 1 June 2002, the organization collected passport applications across Abkhazia and handed them over to the Russian Ministry of Foreign Affairs branch in Sochi. While as of June 2002, approximately 20% or 70,000 Abkhazians had Russian citizenship; by July 2002, over 220,000 or 70% had Russian passports; and by January 2003, it was above 80% (Khashig 2002; Krivenyuk 2002; Littlefield 2009, p. 1473; Nagashima 2019, p. 188). While most passports were issued before the entry into force of the new citizenship law, many residents of de facto states remained eligible and continued to acquire Russian citizenship due to the loophole which allowed former USSR citizens who were still stateless to acquire citizenship (Shevel 2012, p. 130). Interestingly, Russian authorities later found the 2002 legislation to be too restrictive and over the years they have amended it to simplify access for certain categories of people (Ganohariti 2020a; Shevel 2012, p. 141).

Despite passportization occurring in Abkhazia, Nagashima’s (2019) investigation shows that passportization in South Ossetia began only 2 years later. In July 2003, approximately 55% of the population had Russian passports, with the majority acquiring them (under the 1991 law) in Russia after having fled the 1992 conflict (Bargov as cited in Kusov 2002). However, on 25 May 2004 following the incorporation of Adjara by the Saakashvili administration, the Russian MFA began distributing Russian passports to the South Ossetian population (Illarionov 2009, pp. 55–59). By June 2004, the number of citizens was above 95% (Nagashima 2019, p. 189), with the new acquisitions occurring under the statelessness loophole of the 2002 citizenship law. In contrast, passportization never occurred in Transnistria since the number of new citizens has been relatively constant (about 10,000 new citizens per year), but Russia has used citizenship to influence domestic politics in Transnistria (Nagashima 2019, pp. 194–196). Thus, Nagashima (2019, p. 190) argues that the passportization policy in South Ossetia contradicted the restrictive nature of the 2002 citizenship law and this was not a component of the Kremlin’s citizenship policy. Rather passportization has been applied ad hoc in reaction to domestic and geopolitical developments and security concerns such as the Chechen conflict, the 2002 US involvement in Georgia, and potential NATO membership of Georgia (Illarionov 2009; International Crisis Group 2008).

Thus, while the acquisition of citizenship had occurred in the de facto states before 2002, it is the number and speed at which new passports were issued, that makes Russia’s actions between 2002 and 2004 to be considered as passportization. Looking at the drastic increase of citizens, it is clear that without the logistical support of Russia, such a large number of passports could not have been issued (Glanin 2002). Furthermore, unlike recognized countries affected by extraterritorial citizenship policies, acquisition of Russian passports was actively encouraged by de facto state authorities (Artman 2013, p. 690). People saw the acquisition of a Russian passport to be beneficial as it brought higher pensions, travel opportunities, and security guarantees (Artman 2013, pp. 690–691; Ganohariti 2020b; Mühlfried 2010, pp. 9–10).

The main question concerning Russia's passportization is its legality. In short, determination and conferral of nationality remain within the domestic jurisdiction of states. That said, states may not forcefully impose nationality and the international community is not obliged to recognize the nationality if it fails to meet the genuine link criteria (Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala) 1955, pp. 25–26; Natoli 2010, pp. 405–406, 411). However, in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, Russian nationality was never imposed, and since the local population had continuously opposed the Georgian state and had closer links with Russia an argument can be made for the naturalizations meeting the genuine link connection. Therefore, “there does not seem to be a legal basis under international nationality law for saying it cannot” (Natoli 2010, p. 413).

However, other states are not obliged to recognize the conferral if it goes against “international conventions, customary international law and the principles of law generally recognised with regard to nationality” (European Convention on Nationality 1997, Art. 3; Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws 1930, Art. 1). Critiques argue that Russia's actions in Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and later Ukraine do not meet the genuine link criteria and is exorbitant (Allison 2009, p. 179; IIFFMCG 2009b, p. 289; Peters 2019), as possession of Soviet citizenship cannot be taken to be a sufficient condition for granting Russian nationality. Furthermore, de jure residents of the contested territories had automatically acquired Georgian citizenship following Soviet dissolution, even if in practice many did not have Georgian documents to prove it (Littlefield 2009, pp. 1471–1473; Mühlfried 2010, p. 9). Russian officials overlooked this fact and justified their actions on humanitarian grounds, by allowing “stateless people” living in the post-Soviet space to acquire Russian citizenship (following 2002) (Littlefield 2009, p. 1473; Mühlfried 2010; Nagashima 2019, p. 190). Furthermore, according to the Georgian (and Ukrainian) perspective, these conferrals cannot be recognized to be legal under international law. Thus, Georgia (and Ukraine) argues for the non-recognition of Russian nationality and passports conferred to individuals living in the “occupied territories” (IIFFMCG 2009a, pp. 147–148, 2009b, pp. 155–179; MFA Ukraine 2019; Open Society Justice Initiative 2018; Zayets et al. 2018). Having provided a brief background into (the legality of) passportization, the following section will explore how Russia has used passportization as a tool to militarily intervene in Georgia and Ukraine.

Territorial Conflict: The Cases of Georgia and Ukraine

Russia has provided several legal arguments to justify its involvements in Abkhazia, South Ossetia, Crimea, and Eastern Ukraine; this section will focus on the use of citizenship as a tool to advance territorial goals in the near abroad (see Allison 2009).

In 2008, when Russia intervened in Georgia, one of the justifications used was the constitutional and legal obligation to protect citizens in South Ossetia following Georgian military aggression (Medvedev 2008; Guseynov and Demidenko 2009). Even prior to the conflict, Russian officials and institutions had made statements that they were duty-bound to protect their citizens from Georgian aggression (Illarionov 2009). This legitimization was seemingly grounded in the right of individual and collective self-defense enshrined in the UN Charter and the notion of responsibility to protect (Littlefield 2009; Natoli 2010). Thus, passportization provided the basis for Russia's justification for the use of military action against Georgia to protect Russian citizens, as a result of which it was able to claim de facto sovereignty over the territory (Artman 2013, p. 691; Littlefield 2009, pp. 1476–1477). In the case of Abkhazia, Russia argued its intervention to have been preemptive in nature, based on the belief of an imminent attack by Georgia (IIFFMCG 2009b, pp. 291–294).

However, such justifications have limited standing under international law. First, Russia's core argument of self-defense or collective self-defense as a result of Georgian aggression has little legal basis as the territory of the Russian Federation was not attacked nor is there a general right of intervention in support of opposition groups in a foreign state (Allison 2009, p. 177). Rather, it could be argued that the granting of Russian citizenship was used to “justify in advance and indirectly the use of force to defend an entity that cannot be defended directly since (as a result of South Ossetia’s and Abkhazia’s non-state status) Russia cannot claim it is responding to their appeals for collective self-defence in the sense prescribed in the UN Charter” (Allison 2009, pp. 179–180).

Second, even if individuals possess the citizenship of a kin-state, generally speaking, it is their state of residence that is primarily responsible to protect them (OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities 2008, p. 20). However, due to the armed conflict between Georgia and South Ossetian “separatist,” in Russia’s view, Georgia was unable to display its ability to protect the residents of South Ossetia who Georgia legally considered to be its citizens (International Crisis Group 2006, p. 9), thus further aiding Russia’s justifications.

Third, states have limited jurisdiction over their citizens abroad and there exists no customary law concerning the right to protect, and states may intervene only in exceptional circumstances in a localized and proportionate manner (Allison 2009, pp. 178–179). This tied with the absence of Security Council authorization and not satisfying R2P conditions such as the seriousness of the threat, proportionality, and last resort make Russia’s claim difficult to substantiate (Allison 2009; IIFMCG 2009b, pp. 283–289; International Crisis Group 2008, pp. 28–29). Furthermore, the intervention “was not really about the protection of civilians as expected by the R2P concept, but protection of [Russian] nationals” (Allison 2009, p. 185). Rather passportization was a (convenient) tool that could then be used to justify military intervention (Natoli 2010). Also, Russia may be argued to have abused the rights doctrine which refers to “exercising a right for a purpose other than the purpose for which the right was created” (Kiss 2006). Thus, according to Natoli (2010), by using passportization and the claim of protecting nationals to militarily intervene in a neighboring state Russia “violated international law and therefore the international community should not recognize Russia’s right to protect the citizens of South Ossetia on the basis of their being Russian citizens” (p. 416).

Furthermore, Russia’s intervention and subsequent recognition of Abkhazia and South Ossetia had broader geopolitical ambitions, which contradicts the protection of human/citizen rights argument since states cannot intervene in other states to further geopolitical interests under the clout of protecting human rights (Allison 2009; Littlefield 2009, p. 1471; Mühlfried 2010, p. 13). The mass conferral of citizenship was part of a longer process of gaining effective control in contested territories by creating a legal relationship between Russia, the naturalized persons, and the territory where they lived (Artman 2013). Russia’s relations with Abkhazia and South Ossetia were based on security and geopolitical considerations. Russia feared the “Adjara scenario” in Abkhazia or South Ossetia resulting in a change in the status quo, and “turning Abkhazians and South Ossetians into Russian citizens seemed to offer a way of consolidating Russia’s informal grip on the de facto states” (Artman 2013, p. 689). Thus, even though Russia’s actions may not have been legal under international law, they nevertheless were effective in meeting its goals (Littlefield 2009, p. 1475).

Allison (2009) maintains that Russia by using normative and legal arguments concerning the protection of citizens abroad was able to challenge the interpretation of customary international law, particularly in the post-Soviet space. This has resulted in possible new pathways in changing Russia’s (and the world’s) understanding of sovereignty and territorial integrity. Particularly, the defense of citizens abroad argument to support these citizens’ right to not only internal self-determination but also external self-determination undermines the principle of territorial integrity in neighboring states (Allison 2009, p. 186). Allison further argues that Russia’s actions and justifications were used to test international reaction and to become a norm entrepreneur in relativizing the idea of territorial sovereignty to its benefit. The limited nature of international condemnation (including sanctions) clearly emboldened Russia's subsequent interventions in Ukraine in 2014.

While exact numbers are unavailable, Russia distributed passports in Crimea and Eastern Ukraine prior to the annexation/integration of Crimea (Artman 2014; Cuvelier 2018; Grigas 2016). That said, note that passportization can be both an argument for intervention and a consequence of it. The latter was the case in Crimea, where passportization largely occurred after its annexation/integration (TASS 2014) when all permanent residents in Crimea were recognized as Russian citizens (Open Society Justice Initiative 2018). Thus, the defense of citizens justification is not fully applicable to Crimea. Rather, the post-facto distribution of passports has helped entrench Russian presence in the peninsula.

Russia has continued to distribute passports in Eastern Ukraine, particularly after April 2019 when President Putin simplified naturalization procedures for residents of Donetsk and Lugansk. This simplification resulted in half a million Ukrainians naturalizing in 2019, almost double that of 2018 (Burkhardt 2020). Russia argues that this initiative is humanitarian and aims to facilitate mobility for those who are unable to renew their Ukrainian passports, but both Ukraine and the European Union have condemned these actions (Burkhardt 2020). Thus, while Russia has not officially intervened militarily in Eastern Ukraine and stands by the Minsk process, the ongoing passportization does not exclude an Abkhazia/South Ossetia or Crimea scenario in the region.

Summary

While passportization itself may not be illegal, as discussed, what is important are its repercussions. The literature shows that passportization has become an important (but not the only) soft-power tool used to entrench Russia's presence in contested territories (Allison 2009; IIFMCG 2009a, b; Illarionov 2009; International Crisis Group 2008). Particularly, passportization has become part of the repertoire of patron state support of de facto states. However, as argued by Nagashima (2019), passportization policy has not been uniform and has been applied reactively based on domestic and geopolitical developments. As observed in Abkhazia and South Ossetia (unlike Transnistria), passportization provided a casus belli for foreign intervention since Russia could use the justification of protection of citizens to infringe the territorial integrity of Georgia (Artman 2013, pp. 691–692; IIFMCG 2009b, pp. 288–289; Littlefield 2009, pp. 1462–1463). Thus, passportization was used to infringe upon state sovereignty and undermine the de jure sovereign's attempt to consolidate its territory (Littlefield 2009, p. 1473; Mühlfried 2010, p. 12). This tool was used to create exceptional spaces and transform contested territories into “de facto ‘Russian’ spaces” even before military intervention (Artman 2013, pp. 682–684; Littlefield 2009, p. 1474), with Russia's borders becoming blurred by weakening the connection between territory and citizenship (Mühlfried 2010, p. 12), and thus challenge the existing citizen-state-territory relationship.

Given the limited international condemnation, Russia's actions may embolden it and other states in the future to use passportization as a precursor for intervention and could provide a justification for Russia to militarily intervene in Transnistria or Eastern Ukraine. Alternatively, passportization maybe a “safe”/legal middle-ground for states wishing to maintain influence in their neighborhood, without outright military interventions (as seen by the current case of Transnistria or Eastern Ukraine) (Burkhardt 2020).

Cross-References

- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Russia and Frozen Conflicts in the Post-Soviet Space
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

References

- Agarin, T., & Karolewski, I. P. (Eds.). (2015). Extraterritorial citizenship in postcommunist Europe. London and New York: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Allison, R. (2009). The Russian case for military intervention in Georgia: International law, norms and political calculation. European Security, 18(2), 173–200.
- Artman, V. M. (2013). Documenting territory: Passportisation, territory, and exception in Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Geopolitics, 18(3), 682–704.
- Artman, V. M. (2014, March 14). Annexation by passport. Aljazeera. <http://america.aljazeera.com/opinions/2014/3/ukraine-russia-crimeapassportizationcitizenship.html>
- Burkhardt, F. (2020). Russia's "Passportisation" of the Donbas. SWP Comment, 41. https://www.swp-berlin.org/fileadmin/contents/products/comments/2020C41_Donbas.pdf
- Convention on Certain Questions Relating to the Conflict of Nationality Laws. (1930).
- Cuvelier, M. (2018). Passportization in international law: Theory and practice of large scale extraterritorial conferrals of nationality. Gent, Belgium: Universiteit Gent.
- European Convention on Nationality. (1997).
- Ganohariti, R. (2020a). Between politics and geo-politics: Russia amends its citizenship law. GLOBALCIT. <https://globalcit.eu/between-politics-and-geo-politics-russia-amends-its-citizenship-law/>
- Ganohariti, R. (2020b). Dual citizenship in de facto states: Comparative case study of Abkhazia and Transnistria. Nationalities Papers, 48(1), 175–192.
- Glanin, I. (2002, August 13). Так похоже на Россию . . . В Абхазии почти не осталось грузинских граждан [So similar to Russia . . . There are almost no Georgian citizens left in Abkhazia]. Vremya.
- Grigas, A. (2016). How soft power works: Russian passportization and compatriot policies paved way for crimean annexation and war in Donbas. Atlantic Council. <https://www.atlanticcouncil.org/blogs/ukrainealert/how-soft-power-works-russian-passportization-and-compatriot-policies-paved-way-for-crimean-annexation-and-war-in-donbas/>
- Guseynov, V., & Demidenko, S. (2009). Тезисы о некоторых политических и военно-стратегических аспектах августа-2008 [Theses on some political and military-strategic aspects of August 2008]. In (Eds.), Вооружённый конфликт в Южной Осетии и его последствия [Armed conflict in South Ossetia and its consequences]. Moscow: Krasnaya Zvezda.
- IIFMCG. (2009a). Report – Volume I. https://www.mpil.de/files/pdf4/IIFMCG_Volume_I2.pdf
- IIFMCG. (2009b). Report – Volume II. https://www.mpil.de/files/pdf4/IIFMCG_Volume_II1.pdf
- Illarionov, A. (2009). The Russian leadership's preparation for war, 1999–2008. In S. Cornell & S. F. Starr (Eds.), The guns of August 2008: Russia's war in Georgia (pp. 49–84). Armonk, New York and London: M.E. Sharpe.
- International Crisis Group. (2006). Abkhazia Today (Issue Europe Report 176).
- International Crisis Group. (2008). Russia vs. Georgia: The fallout (Issue Europe Report 195).
- Khashig, I. (2002, June 27). Abkhaz Rush for Russian Passports. Institute for War & Peace Reporting. <https://iwpr.net/global-voices/abkhaz-rush-russian-passports>.
- Kiss, A. (2006). Abuse of Rights. In Max Planck Encyclopedias of International Law. Oxford Public International Law. <https://opil.ouplaw.com/view/10.1093/law:epil/9780199231690/law-9780199231690-e1371?rskey=yDGE7c&result=1&prd=MPIL#>
- Kolstø, P. (1993). The new Russian diaspora: Minority protection in the soviet successor states. Source: Journal of Peace Research, 30(2), 197–217.
- Krivenyuk, A. (2002, August 31). В Абхазии за месяц стало на 150 тысяч российских граждан больше [Abkhazia gains 150 thousand Russian citizens in a month]. Novoe Vremia.
- Kusov, O. (2002, June 26). Письмо Аслана Масхадова. Будет ли отобранный у чешского гуманитарного фонда ксерокс стал видеодоказательством успешной операции федералов [Letter from Aslan Maskhadov. Will there be a "positive" peace in Chechnya? How a photocopier taken from a Czech humanitarian fund provided video proof of the successful operation by the federals]. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty. <https://www.svoboda.org/a/24201854.html>
- Littlefield, S. (2009). Citizenship, identity and foreign policy: The contradictions and consequences of Russia's passport distribution in the separatist regions of Georgia. Europe-Asia Studies, 61(8), 1461–1482.
- Lyubarsky, K. (2002, December). Паспортная система и система прописки в России [Passport and registration system in Russia]. Demoscope Weekly. <http://www.demoscope.ru/weekly/2002/093/axiv01.php>
- Medvedev, D. (2008). Statement on the situation in South Ossetia. President of Russia. <http://en.kremlin.ru/events/president/transcripts/1042>
- MFA Ukraine. (2019). Statement of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Ukraine on the provocative and unlawful decision by Kremlin to issue Russian passports to Ukrainian citizens in occupied territories. <https://mfa.gov.ua/en/news/72086-zajava-mzs-ukrajini-shhodoprovokativnogo-ta-zlochinnogo-rishennya-kremlya-pro-vidachu-rosijsykih-pasportiv-gromadyanam-ukrajini-na-okupovanih-teritorijah>
- Mühlfried, F. (2010). Citizenship at war: Passports and nationality in the 2008 Russian-Georgian conflict. Anthropology Today, 26(2), 8–13.
- Nagashima, T. (2019). Russia's passportization policy toward unrecognized republics. Problems of Post-Communism, 66(3), 186–199.
- Natoli, K. (2010). Weaponizing nationality: An analysis of Russia's passport policy in Georgia. Boston University International Law Journal, 28, 389–417.
- Nottebohm Case (Liechtenstein v. Guatemala). (1955). p. 4
- Open Society Justice Initiative. (2018). Human rights in the context of Automatic Naturalization in Crimea.

<https://www.justiceinitiative.org/publications/human-rights-context-automatic-naturalization-crimea>

- OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities. (2008). The Bolzano/Bozen recommendations on national minorities in inter-state relations & explanatory note. The Hague: OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities.
- Peters, A. (2019). Passportisation: Risks for international law and stability – Part II. <https://www.ejiltalk.org/passportisation-risks-for-international-law-and-stabil-ity-part-two/>
- Pogonyi, S. (2017). Europeanization of kin-citizenship and the dynamics of kin-minority claim-making: The case of Hungary. Problems of Post-Communism, 64(5), 242–256.
- Potemkina, M. N., & Kuznetsova, I. V. (2014). Паспортизации городского населения СССР в 1930-х гг [Passportization of the urban population of the USSR in the 1930]. Istoriya i Arkheologiya, 4(46), 167–174.
- Salenko, A. (2012). Country report: Russia. In EUDO Citizenship Observatory. Fiesole, Italy: European University Institute.
- Shevel, O. (2012). The politics of citizenship policy in post-soviet Russia. Post-Soviet Affairs, 28(1), 111–147.
- Spiro, P. (2017). Multiple citizenship. In A. Shachar, R. Bauböck, I. Bloemraad, & M. P. Vink (Eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Citizenship (pp. 621–643). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- TASS. (2014, September 11). ФМС: 98% жителей Крыма получили российские паспорта [Federal Migration Service: 98% of Crimean residents received Russian passports]. <https://tass.ru/obschestvo/1434245>
- Zayets, S., Martynovskyy, R., & Svyrydova, D. (2018). Right to nationality (citizenship). Crimea Beyond Rules: Thematic Review of the Human Rights Situation Under Occupation, 3, 1–52.

Popular Protest

► Popular Protest in Palestine

Popular Protest in Palestine

Marwan Darweish and Andrew Rigby
Center for Trust Peace and Social Relations, Coventry University, Coventry, UK

Synonyms

Anti-colonial struggles; BDS; Civil resistance; Israeli occupation; Liberation struggles; Palestine; Popular protest; Unarmed resistance

Introduction

Defenders of Israel's expropriation of Palestinian lands rely on various narratives to legitimize their territorial expansion and associated dispossession of Palestinians. One of the dominant motifs upon which they have relied is that of Palestinians as barbaric terrorists that threaten the security of the Jewish people living within Israel (Shehada 2020). There has been a long history of unarmed Palestinian resistance to the Zionist project, and it is the aim of this chapter to outline the main features of this history, from its first manifestations in the late nineteenth century up until the recent past.

Palestinian Resistance to the Establishment of the Israeli State, 1880–1948

In this section we trace the thread of Palestinian unarmed resistance against the expropriation of their land and the threat to their livelihoods posed by Jewish migration prior to the establishment of the state of Israel. What becomes clear is that the struggle against the Zionist project during the latter years of the nineteenth and the first half of the twentieth century was dogged right from the start by factionalism and division, which reflected in part the fractured nature of Palestinian society. This handicap was exacerbated by the weakness of external sources of support.

Palestinian Protest Against Jewish Immigration Under the Ottomans

Jewish migration to Palestine, in order to establish a homeland, commenced in the 1880s, at which time the Jewish community in Palestine numbered around 24,000, 5% of an estimated overall population of 500,000. By the end of the second wave of Zionist-inspired immigration in 1914 their number had risen to 85,000 (Mandel 1976, p. xxiv). As early as 1886, there were reports of clashes between the newcomers and the peasants evicted from the newly purchased land (Kayyali 1970, p. 10). Palestine at that time was part of the Ottoman Empire, and as early as 1891 Palestinian notables were voicing their protests in petitions to the capital, Constantinople.

By the end of the Ottoman period of rule, a pattern of protest had formed. The traditional landowning families saw Zionism as a threat to their position and responded by appealing to the authorities, as came naturally to those whose traditional role in the patron-client structure that characterized Palestinian society was to act as intermediary between the Ottoman authorities and the ruled. The more polemical forms of protest (newspaper articles, leaflets, and the like) were the domain of the middle-class professionals, particularly journalists and students who were most vocal in their opposition, the more directly confrontational modes of protest aimed at disrupting the territorial acquisitions of the incomers, which was primarily the response of those who were the direct victims of Zionist land purchases – the peasantry (Rigby 2010, p. 6). As Kayyali (1970, p. 61) has summarized the situation prior to the establishment of British military rule in Palestine in 1917:

within the ranks of the nationalist movement in Palestine, the notables performed the role of the diplomats; the educated middle classes that of the articulators of public opinion; and the peasants that of the actual fighters in the battle against the Zionist presence.

British Military Administration, 1917–1920

In November 1917, the British government affirmed in the Balfour Declaration its support for the establishment of a homeland for the Jews in Palestine, provided that nothing should be done to prejudice “the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine” (Khalidi 1997, p. 65). When news of the declaration reached the Palestinians, it led to a new awareness of the need to organize. A Muslim-Christian Association (MCA) was established as a counter to Jewish organizations, with branches around the country alongside new youth clubs and other organizations. There were renewed campaigns in the local press urging people not to sell land to the Jewish migrants, and a national day of protest to mark the first anniversary of the Balfour Declaration was held on November 2, 1918. A few days earlier, the British military commander, Allenby, had announced the establishment of an interim military administration over Palestine following the defeat of the Ottoman Empire.

At this time the Arabs still believed they had an assurance from the British about self-government, and there was considerable support among the Palestinian political elite for a union with Syria under the rule of Sharaf Hussein’s son Faisal. Therefore, a formal announcement on February 27, 1920 that Britain intended to implement the Balfour Declaration provoked a number of demonstrations, with businesses closing down and protest petitions handed in to the authorities by representatives of the various MCAs (Porath 1974, p. 96.). The proclamation of Faisal as King of the Arab Kingdom of Syria, a few days later on March 7, 1920, was the occasion for another series of demonstrations in Palestine. The protests spilled over into violence, with attacks on Jewish passersby and stores and open threats to use force as a means of preventing the realization of the Zionist project. The following month, on April 4, 1920, there were further disturbances with clashes that left a number of Arabs and Jews dead and several hundred wounded (Porath 1974, p. 97).

British Mandate in the 1920s

Once the British received the League of Nations Mandate, the focus of Palestinian pressure was to convince their new rulers to abandon their commitment to a Jewish national home. However, the efficacy of their entreaties, deputations, petitions, and protest actions was weakened by a number of factors, not least the fractures within the Palestinian political elite and the society as a whole.

Examining the first decade of British civilian rule in Palestine through the prism of unarmed resistance a number of features become apparent.

1. “Spontaneous” clashes between peasantry and Jewish settlers – for the peasantry who experienced eviction through Jewish land purchases, the immediate response was anger and resentment that could lead to clashes with those directly responsible for their dispossession. But these clashes were localized. At no point were there serious attempts to create a nationwide movement of active resistance based on the peasantry.

2. The absence of a national leadership – the main reasons for the failure to develop a truly active national movement were twofold. First, the world view of the peasantry was very localized. They had no experience of coordinating collective action with those beyond their own village. Secondly, there was no “national leadership” to lead and direct them along such a path. There was a major fracture between two of the most notable and influential Jerusalem-based families, the Husaynis and the Nashashibis, which militated against the emergence of a unified leadership. Furthermore, the urban political elite and the peasantry occupied completely different life worlds. In the words of Sayigh (1979, pp. 14–15),

Not only did the indigenous ruling class have no experience of mass leadership, but the individual notable would never attempt such a course since it would only jeopardise his access to government, and it was on this access that his influence and status depended. (Sayigh 1979, pp. 14–15)

3. The commitment to negotiation – throughout the Mandate period, the main impulse of the Palestinian political elite was to continue in the role they had traditionally performed under the Ottomans by representing their own interests and those of their clients to the authorities. They were most at home as members of delegations to the British or the League of Nations, demanding the revocation of the Balfour Declaration, an end to Jewish migration and land purchases, and the establishment of representative self-government in Palestine.
4. Symbolic and polemical resistance – in the absence of any national-level popular movement of unarmed resistance, there was a plenitude of collective forms of symbolic and polemical protest (Rings 1982, p. 153 & 162). Regular items in the press urged people to oppose the Zionist attempts to establish a homeland in Palestine. Imams spread the message at Friday prayers in the mosques. Strike days were observed to mark the anniversary of the Balfour Declaration and commemorate other days of national historical significance (see chapter ► “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”).
5. The timidity of the Palestinian political elite – in 1922, the British announced plans to establish a legislative council with very limited powers. At a congress held in Nablus in August 1922, it was resolved to boycott the upcoming elections. The boycott was effective, and the legislative council never met. But when, in the spring of 1923, it was proposed that leverage should be exerted on the British by withholding tax payments, this was rejected by the landowners who feared the punitive fines and other sanctions the British threatened to impose.
6. The slippery slope from unarmed protest to violence – whenever large numbers of Palestinians were mobilized for protest marches and the like, there was an ongoing risk of violence erupting. In 1921 there were riots in Jaffa which spread to other parts of the mandate territory. Order was eventually restored, leaving nearly a hundred dead and over two hundred wounded, Palestinians and Jews alike. However, it is relevant to note that the disturbances shook the British authorities, who determined to limit the rate of Jewish migration, which resulted in several years of relative quiet between 1922 and 1928.
7. Religion and resistance – the calm of those years 1922–1928 was superficial, nothing had changed in terms of the basic dynamics and the threat to the Palestinians, and it did not take much to spark off another round of clashes. Through 1928 religious tensions had been rising as the Jews sought to extend their right to worship at the Western Wall, just adjacent to the al-Haram ash-Sharif housing the Al Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock. Rumors abounded that the Jews had designs on the space. On August 15, 1929, Zionist extremists at the Western Wall provoked a counter-demonstration by Palestinians. The perceived threat to one of their most sacred spaces enabled the Palestinian leadership to cast the struggle in a religious light, and thereby mobilize those who had remained untouched by secular appeals to nationalism. The next Friday, August 23, 1929, worshippers emerging from Al Aqsa Mosque attacked the Jewish Quarter in the Old City. The violence spread, with the Palestinian political leadership remaining aloof. The next day 67 Jews had been slaughtered in Hebron, despite the efforts of many Palestinian families who opened their homes to shelter Jewish residents of the city, thereby saving over 400 lives (Omer-Man 2011). The final death toll was 133 Jews and 116 Arabs, with over 500 wounded.

1930–1936: From Unrest to the First Palestinian Uprising

The harsh measures meted out by the British in the aftermath of the 1929 clashes, with collective punishments on whole villages and neighborhoods, caused added bitterness and strengthened the hand of those calling for violence. The tension continued to rise through the 1930s, with a worsening economic situation and the suffering of the Palestinians exacerbated by the rising tide of Jewish immigration, new land purchases, and the Jewish boycott of Arab labor. Clashes between Palestinians and Jews increased in frequency and seriousness, and on April 20, 1936, the call went out for a national strike. To enhance coordination an Arab Higher Committee (AHC) was formed with Haj Amin Husayni at its head. This was the start of the first Palestinian Uprising which lasted from 1936 to 1939 (see chapter ► “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”).

The Palestinian Revolt, 1936–1939

There were two phases to the uprising. The first lasted for 6 months from April to October 1936. This was a period when the dominant forms of resistance were overwhelmingly unarmed: protest marches and demonstrations, strikes and boycotts, and noncooperation and civil disobedience. These were complemented by attempts to involve wider constituencies of support such as the leaders and the citizens of neighboring Arab states. By July, the Nablus district was in full revolt, with Nablus at the center. Matters were far beyond the control of the nominal Palestinian political leadership, who were coming under increasing pressure from citrus-growers to end the strike so that the citrus harvest could be gathered (Kayyali, p. 292). The problem was how to find a face-saving way out so that it did not appear as if the leadership was submitting to the threats of the British. It was agreed that if the Arab leaders issued an appeal to end the strike, then their wishes would be followed. The appeal was duly made on October 10, 1936, and the AHC called for an end to the strike that same day.

Following the cessation of the strike, the British appointed a Commission of Inquiry led by Lord Peel. Its report, published in July 1937, proposed partition and was rejected out of hand by the AHC. Then on September 26, 1937, a British district commissioner was assassinated in Nazareth. The British responded quickly, outlawing the AHC and arresting its members. This marked the outbreak of the second phase of the uprising. A protest strike was called and by mid-October, armed bands were roaming the countryside attacking Jewish settlements, destroying railway stations and cutting communication lines. Jewish paramilitary groups such as Irgun responded in kind. According to one British official, “[b]y September 1938 the situation was such that civil administration and control of the country was, to all practical purposes, non-existent” (Porath 1977, p. 238). However, with the passage of time the uprising began to degenerate on the Palestinian side into an internecine struggle. A British teacher based in Bir Zeit observed that in early 1939, the rebellion seemed now to be turning into a struggle between the two Arab political parties: the Mufti’s faction, who had organised it and who commanded the loyalty of the great majority of Arabs, and the Nashashibis, who hoped to get the power away from them by making up to the British.

More and more the rebellion was tending to degenerate from a national movement into squabbles between rival rebel bands. Bir Zayt, like many other villages, was no little better than a hornets’ nest of long-standing family feuds, stirred up afresh in the hope of getting some advantage through the help of this or that party of rebels. (Porath 1977, pp. 254–255)

When one looks at the key factors that led to the collapse of the uprising we encounter once again the fundamental weaknesses that undermined the Palestinian struggle.

1. The vested interests of the notable families in Palestine meant that as the revolt intensified, so their paramount aim became one of defending their property, wealth, status, and influence. They prioritized the protection of their personal and family interests above that of the nation.
2. To a significant degree the dominant political class that comprised the Palestinian leadership believed it was imperative to maintain good relations with the British mandate administration, so that they might exercise their powers of persuasion at negotiating tables. Again and again, representations were made to the British, delegations sent to London, and memoranda scripted. They failed to grasp the absolute commitment of the British to the Zionist project of establishing a Jewish national home in Palestine.
3. The economic impact of the general strike was limited in part because there was a whole sector of society (the Jewish) that continued to work and provide for the basic needs of their population. The real suffering was borne by the strikers themselves.
4. The Palestinians suffered from a severe asymmetry of leverage power, which they were unable to rectify. Their appeals for intervention from Arab and Muslim leaders beyond Palestine fell on deaf ears.
5. Brutal suppression of the revolt by the British was extreme and Palestinian paid high price for the revolt (see chapter ► “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”).

The Period of Partition: 1939–1949

The British declared war on Germany on September 3, 1939. In Palestine the Arab population was relatively quiescent. The members of the AHC were in exile or jail, and the local-level cadres who were not in prison were exhausted and demoralized. The Jewish population in Palestine was driven by concern about the plight of the Jewish population in Europe. They were encouraged by their leadership to volunteer for the British military, and the Hagana (Defence) force coordinated its actions with the British forces, while using every opportunity to build up its infrastructure and resources.

By 1945, the British were exhausted and war weary. The Jews, on the other hand, were desperate to channel every possible Jewish refugee from Europe to Palestine in order to create facts on the ground and prove the necessity of a Jewish homeland. Much to their anger, the British stood by their pre-war commitment to maintain quotas on immigration, which provoked a violent reaction from the Jews. A state of emergency was declared and around 100,000 British troops were stationed in Palestine to combat the threat of Jewish armed struggle (Darweish and Rigby 2015). On February 25, 1947, the British announced they were handing over the responsibility of Palestine to the United Nations (UN). During June and July of that year, the UN Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) carried out its enquiries. It was boycotted by the Arab League, which had been established in 1945 and to whom the enfeebled AHC had handed over its negotiating rights. On August 1947, UNSCOP issued its majority report recommending partition, and on November 2, the UN General Assembly passed Resolution 181 in favor of partition. The Jews were delighted and the Arabs were appalled. Fighting began almost immediately, and what followed in the subsequent months was a slow degeneration into civil war.

By the end of October 1948, the Israeli army controlled 77 percent of the former Palestinian territory. A final comprehensive ceasefire was agreed on January 7, 1949, and over the following months a series of armistice lines were agreed between Israel and its Arab neighbours setting borders which were to last virtually unchanged until 1967. The defeat for the Palestinians was total. Over 400 villages had been destroyed or rendered uninhabitable. Around 75–80% of the Palestinian population had been displaced and dispossessed, and the social, economic, and political fabric of their society destroyed (Pappe 2006, p. 131). The Gaza Strip was under Egyptian military rule, while Jordan annexed the West Bank. In the new state of Israel all immigration restrictions were lifted for Jews, who flooded in and took over the properties of their previous Palestinian owners. Israel celebrated victory while the Palestinians mourned the catastrophe (Nakbha) that had overcome them.

Reviewing this period of partition, it seems as if the fate of the Palestinians had moved out of their hands. Bigger forces were at play – the British, the United Nations, and a vigorous and driven Zionist movement whose goal, a Jewish state, was acknowledged as legitimate by the major powers of the USA and the Soviet Union. The Palestinians had emerged from the 1936–1939 revolt exhausted and demoralized, divided and dispirited. They handed over their representation in the international arena to the newly formed Arab League, but their Arab neighbors faced their own challenges as newly independent states and failed dismally to live up to the trust invested in them by their Palestinian cousins. It is almost as if the Palestinian experience of these years followed the pattern of a Greek tragedy, where the tragic outcome is an inevitable result of the protagonists' weaknesses.

Palestinian Resistance, 1948–1987

The Lost Years of the 1950s

Between the disaster of 1948 and the establishment of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) in 1964 there was virtually no significant public manifestation of Palestinian resistance of any sort and most form of resistance they expressed was quiet and hidden in its nature. The reasons for this are not hard to find:

1. Dispersal, dispossession, and division – Palestinian society had been devastated and fragmented by the defeats of 1947–1948, which were in fact the culmination of a long chronology of failure.
2. The trauma of loss – while they were scattered and separated from each other, Palestinians were also disempowered by the deep trauma and shock suffered by those with a deep attachment to place who found themselves uprooted, no longer a majority in their own homeland but relegated to minority and subordinate status in states that were not their own.
3. Faith in pan-Arabism – another reason the Palestinians were so quiescent through the 1950s was their identification with the ideology of pan-Arabism.
4. The priority of economic survival – for most Palestinians reduced to poverty and subordinate status in their new anomic conditions, the priority was survival, particularly economic survival.

Palestinians in Israel: Quiet Forms of Resistance

After the establishment of the state of Israel, about 160,000 Palestinians remained within the borders of the newly established state living as an alien group within the land that was once their own (Darweish 2020). They witnessed the destruction of their socioeconomic institutions and way of life and were subjected to military rule for almost two decades. In many ways they were a “forgotten people” but it would be wrong to view them as mere passive victims of fate during those first decades of life in the new state of Israel. They engaged initially in quiet forms of resistance to preserve what autonomy they could find as they strove to survive in the face of the harsh living conditions that accompanied their displacement and dispossession.

In many ways, the Arab minority within Israel in the years immediately following the Nakbha could be depicted as what Bayat has called a “social nonmovement,” or “collective actions of noncollective actors” (Bayat 2013, p. 15). Types of “quiet resistance” activities were undertaken by individuals and their families rather than by unified groups:

1. Determination to stay in on their homeland – the destruction of hundreds of entire villages and the accompanying infrastructure resulted in a humanitarian crisis. Perhaps the “quietest” form of resistance was the determination and resilience of the Palestinians to stay in their homeland whatever the suffering incurred (Darweish 2020).
2. Resistance through cultivation – large areas of land were confiscated or designated as closed military areas to which entry by Palestinians were restricted. However, local people found ways to circumvent the restrictions in order to cultivate the land to which they retained access as they were aware that Israel would confiscate any land left uncultivated.

3. Culture, identity, and resistance – Palestinians in Israel expressed to the occupation by various forms of symbolic resistance aimed at preserving their culture and identity. In 1949, the village of Umm al-Fahim was handed over to Israel by the Jordanian forces. The residents were then instructed to celebrate the arrival of the Israeli army through singing and dancing. As an expression of resistance and defiance of this, older women sang songs expressing their sorrow and anger rather than joy. This was an early instance of the manner in which Palestinians in Israel expressed their opposition to the Israeli military rule through songs and other cultural forms of resistance. The Arab and Palestinian culture became a means to highlight their national identity (Darweish and Sellick 2017).
4. Resistance to restrictions on movement – Israel imposed curfews and other measures as a way of controlling the movement of Arab residents. In response the targets of such measures explored ways to bypass the controls (see chapter ▶ “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”).

The Emergence of the Palestine Liberation Organization and the Israeli Occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, 1964–1987

In 1950, Yasser Arafat, a student in Cairo, set up a “Union of Palestinian Students” with some friends. A short while later in Beirut a medical student, George Habash, set up another student group, the “Arab National Movement.” Grass-roots organizations were also being established in the Gaza Strip, and by the mid-1950s there was the beginning of a network of nationalist organizations, all of them very small and weak. It was out of this network that the main resistance organization, Fatah, emerged and became the dominant force within the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) which was formed in 1964. In 1967, the debacle of the “Six-Day War” and the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza rang the death knell of the Palestinian faith in pan-Arabism as a vehicle for liberation and boosted the fortunes of Fatah, which became the prime agency of the Palestinian national movement.

Looking back on the period prior to the first intifada through the lens of unarmed popular resistance, a number of features can be highlighted:

1. The glorification of armed struggle – it was with the rise of Fatah and the PLO that we witness the growth of the iconic figure of the Palestinian fighter with a Kalashnikov rifle that became the symbol of Palestinian resistance in subsequent decades. A Palestinian state was to be achieved through “armed struggle,” and the gun became the symbol of power and resistance.
2. Palestinians as victims – Palestinian history was presented as a narrative of heroic struggle against Zionism and by a people betrayed by traditional leaders and perfidious Arab states. One consequence of this worldview was that in the context of such asymmetric power relationships, the Palestinians could be absolved from responsibility for their failures.
3. The portrayal of defeat as triumph – Rashid Khalidi has pointed to a related peculiarity of the Palestinian experience: the manner in which failures came to be portrayed as victories, or at least as heroic perseverance against impossible odds (Khalidi 1997, p. 196).
4. Shifts in the Palestinian political center of gravity – during the years when the PLO, and Fatah in particular, was a burgeoning force, the Palestinian political center of gravity shifted. After 1967, the move was from the territories that were once part of the Palestine Mandate to the refugee communities and camps in Jordan, and after 1970 to Lebanon. It was the refugees who were seen by the PLO as potential recruits for the armed liberation struggle. This focus on the refugees distanced the PLO from the Palestinians in the occupied territories, a separation heightened by the problems of communication after the 1967 war and the ensuing Israeli occupation.

Palestinians in Israel: From Quiet Resistance to Audible Protest

By early 1960s, Palestinians in Israel started to move on from quiet and to a large extent hidden forms of resistance to more audible and open forms of protest and resistance. The overt purpose of the military rule was to maintain political and social segregation and control of the Arab community in Israel. The only political party that sought to involve both Jewish and Arab members as equals was the Israeli Communist Party (ICP) which was established in 1948. The ICP was a key vehicle for early campaigns against the restrictions and discriminatory practices imposed on the Arab population within Israel. As such the ICP and Al Arad movement played an important role not only in the struggle for full equality for the Arab minority but also in the maintenance of an Arab national identity and consequently they became the political home of leading Arab intellectuals, writers, and poets.

The 1967 war and Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip had the paradoxical effect of uniting Palestinians from both sides of the Green Line after years of separation. It enabled Palestinians in Israel to renew family relations and commercial links that had been severed since 1948, but this new situation also exposed Palestinians in Israel to the Palestinian national movement and its PLO-led struggle in the occupied Palestinian territory. In addition, Palestinians who had been living outside Israel had their first opportunities to understand the experience of Palestinians living within the state. This so-called "reunification" led to growing recognition of Palestinians' shared but differentiated history, as well as to a burgeoning consciousness of the Palestinian national identity they held in common (Şâyigh 1997; Rouhana and Sabbagh-Khoury 2011).

1. During the 1970s, Palestinians in Israel witnessed the emergence of new movements and civil society organizations which sought to articulate and represent their interests. One of the many groups that emerged was the National Committee for the Defence of Arab Lands (NCDAL) which was formed in 1975 as a coalition of various political groupings and community-based organizations in an effort to oppose land confiscations by the state. The NCDAL called for the first national strike by Palestinians in Israel on "Land Day" on March 30, 1976, during which six protesters were killed by the Israeli police (Darweish and Sellick 2017). After years of military rule and relatively quiet resistance, Land Day represented the first act of mass, organized, civil resistance by the Palestinians inside Israel against discrimination and the ongoing expropriation of their land.

After years during which Palestinians had been effectively ostracized by the PLO leadership and Arab states, the Land Day protests marked a significant acknowledgment that the Palestinian minority within Israel was part of the Palestinian nation. Their acts of hidden, uncoordinated, and quiet resistance against military rule and oppression had been transformed into new forms of open, widespread, organized, and nonviolent resistance that Israel, the PLO, and the Arab states could no longer ignore.

Palestinians in the Occupied Territories Prior to First Intifada

The message for the Palestinians in the occupied territories embodied in all these developments became clear: stay steadfast and eventually you will be liberated as a consequence of the pressure generated by the PLO and its allies outside. In essence their allotted role was a passive one. In truth, the space available for organizing any form of collective resistance to the occupation was severely circumscribed. Any signs of opposition to the occupation met with severe repression by Israel.

The emergence of any coordinated leadership that could organize resistance to the occupation within the Palestinian territories was hampered by the Israeli tactic of deporting any suspected resistance leader, but it was also exacerbated by the suspicions of the external PLO leadership regarding potential rivals to its own leadership position. Denied the opportunity to express themselves openly in any overtly political organization, activists within the occupied territories established other vehicles for education and mobilization. Student and professional associations, trade unions, women's societies, social and cultural associations, and other grassroots organizations were formed. They served as agencies for both offensive and constructive resistance – organizing and mobilizing the people while also providing the basic services that were not provided by the Israeli occupiers. As a consequence, these grassroots organizations gained the allegiance of the majority of the Palestinian population, and as such constituted the nucleus of an alternative structure of authority and power to rival that of Israeli military government see chapter ► [“Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)”].

In 1987 the Palestinian Communist Party was finally admitted into the ranks of the PLO. This display of unity provided a necessary basis for coordination and cooperation between the different nationalist factions within the occupied territories which became manifest with the outbreak of the first intifada.

The First Intifada: December 1987–October 1991

In looking at the first intifada through the lens of popular unarmed resistance it is useful to distinguish two phases – from late 1987 through to early 1990, and the subsequent period through to the Madrid Peace Conference of October 1991.

Phase One: December 1987–1990: Horizontal Escalation of the Struggle

The outbreak of the uprising came as a surprise to the leadership of the PLO in their headquarters in Tunis. They were even more surprised by its scale and its coordinated nature. This was achieved through the creation of a Unified National Command (UNC) representing the different political factions. This clandestine body attempted to coordinate the resistance through regular communiqués and leaflets. The UNC was supported by an organizational infrastructure of popular committees which were formed in villages, towns, and refugee camp, and together they took on the character of an embryonic state – coordinating activities and administering the provision of basic services. With such an organizational framework, organically linked to the different sections of Palestinian society, the months following the outbreak of the intifada saw a mass social mobilization – a horizontal escalation of the struggle which embraced all sectors of society.

The authority of the UNC and the popular committees was revealed during the first phase of the intifada by the solidarity of the response to strike calls and the instructions to merchants to restrict their opening hours to the mornings on nonstrike days. Moreover, as part of its attempt to undermine the authority of the Israeli occupiers, the UNC called on all those Palestinians who worked for the Israeli administration to resign. Those who ignored such instructions faced sanctions. Palestinians referred to this process as “cleaning out our national home” (Rigby 1997) (see chapter ► “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”).

Less visible than the confrontations was the constructive work that was integral to the first phase of the intifada. As people began to suffer economic hardship as a consequence of the calls to disengage from the Israeli economy, the loss of income through strikes, and the boycott of Israeli produce, so families began to develop their household economy in their efforts to become more self-reliant, cultivating vegetable plots and rearing poultry. Women's committees were particularly active in promoting new forms of home-based economic activity. Homes were also the base for the clandestine education classes that were held as a means of countering the Israeli closure of schools and colleges.

In 1989 a Palestinian political activist in a refugee camp in the West Bank gave voice to the sense of solidarity and hope for the future he was feeling during what was the height of the popular unarmed resistance:

Everyone helps each other . . . all the people have the same way now, the same struggle against the occupation – from the children to the old men, all the same, they want to get rid of the occupation. One soul through many bodies, through many voices (Rigby 1991, p. 41).

Phase Two: Post-1990 Deterioration

By the summer of 1990 it was clear that much of the vigor and drive of the uprising had gone. There were a number of reasons for this:

1. The relative failure of disengagement and non-cooperation – Palestinians hoped that by their direct opposition and noncooperation they would raise the costs of the occupation to such a level that the Israelis would consider withdrawing. The weakness was that historically Israel has sought the territory of the Palestinians, not the people. In a nutshell, Israel did not require Palestinian cooperation to maintain the occupation, and this seriously weakened the impact of the unarmed resistance.
2. The escalating costs of resistance – furthermore, it turned out that in many ways the Palestinians were more dependent on Israel than the other way round. Israel could find replacements for the Palestinians who withdrew their labor, the Palestinians could not find alternative sources of employment and income. Moreover, Israel remained the only source for many of the basic necessities of life within the occupied Palestinian territories. Therefore, as the months passed the costs of resistance borne by everyday Palestinians rose, while Israel showed no weakening of its resolve.
3. The weakness of “shame power” and the appeal of “vertical escalation” – were two dimensions to the Palestinian leverage power in relation to the Israeli public – the attempt to convert and persuade by means of their preparedness to suffer for their just cause (shame power) and the attempt to force Israel to consider withdrawal by increasing the costs of continued occupation. Unfortunately, these two dimensions – conversion and coercion – do not rest easily together. Thus, the vulnerability to shame power of the many liberal Israelis uneasy about the morality of occupation could be (and was) negated by any act of Palestinian violence resulting in injury and death for Israelis. The dominant emotion within Israel, then as now, was fear, and any act of violence triggered that fear of a people surrounded by hostile neighbors who believe that their very survival as a nation and a state depends on the maintenance of their military strength and to show signs of weakness would be suicidal (see chapter ► “Pacifism and Peace”).
4. The fragmentation of resistance and the weakening of political control – one of the strengths of the intifada lay in the coordination between the different political factions achieved through the UNC and the popular committees’ structure. However, by 1990 not only were the tensions between the different factions increasing in the light of the perceived weaknesses of the unarmed struggle and the temptations of vertical escalation, but the majority of the experienced cadres who had been able to maintain cohesion in the struggle had been apprehended and imprisoned (or deported) by the Israelis.
5. Third parties and the impact of external events – Palestinians lacked the resources to affect the self-interest of the USA and other international actors and thereby push them to intervene constructively in the conflict. This was highlighted by the American response to Iraq’s invasion of Kuwait in August 1990, which led directly to the first Gulf War to expel the Iraqis from occupied Kuwait. During this conflagration the hardship and the suffering of the Palestinians intensified, as did their bitterness. By mid-1991, more Palestinians were being killed by their fellow Palestinians than by the Israelis, as anger and resentment turned against those suspected of collaboration and “betrayal” of the uprising (Rigby 1997, p. 54).

Palestinians in Israel: The Impact of the First Intifada

Palestinians within Israel were quick to show their solidarity with the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip after the outbreak of the first intifada. A general strike was called on December 21, 1987, designated as “peace day.” The Palestinian leadership in Israel issued a statement affirming their engagement: “The events in the occupied territories directly concern the Arabs in Israel as an inseparable part of the Palestinian people and as citizens of the state of Israel. We proclaim our full solidarity with the struggle of this people, our people, against Israeli occupation” (Al-Ittihad, December 20, 1987). The strike call met with a solid response in the Arab towns and villages, accompanied by protest marches and demonstrations that led to clashes with the police and the arrest of over a hundred protesters. The strike actions and demonstrations in support of their compatriots continued throughout the early years of the intifada, with the largest taking place in Nazareth with a reported 50,000 participants (Darweish and Rigby 2015). Support also took on a more substantive form, with a number of the communiqués of the intifada leadership being printed in Arab-owned printshops within Israel. In addition, people organized relief committees for the provision of humanitarian aid and supplies for delivery across the Green Line.

The intifada had a significant impact on the Palestinians within Israel. There was a deep sense of pride and admiration for their fellow nationals resisting the Israeli occupation. It strengthened the sense of shared identity with those living in the occupied territories. It also served as an example and a stimulus for their own struggle, feeding into a new sense of empowerment and solidarity.

The Oslo Process, September 1993–September 2000

In the aftermath of the Gulf War, an attempt was made to kick-start an Arab–Israeli peace process. It commenced in October 1991 with a conference in Madrid which led, eventually, to the September 1993 signing of the Israeli–Palestinian Declaration of Principles on Interim Self-Government Arrangements, the “Oslo Accords.” The rhetoric of the preamble was, with hindsight, hyperbolic. The reality that unfolded on the ground was a salutary experience for all those who dared to dream of the “just and lasting and comprehensive peace settlement” alluded to in the Declaration. As Derek Brown observed in 1994,

“The Palestinian flag flies over the Gaza Strip and Jericho, but Israel holds the boundaries, dictates the security policy and, to a large extent, controls the economy, of the autonomous areas” (The Guardian, July 25, 1994).

What followed was a cycle of violence fueled on the Palestinian side by a growing sense of frustration at the lack of any substantive progress towards the realization of any significant “peace dividend.” It was also driven by those Islamist political groups who considered the Oslo Accords a sellout. On its part, Israel continued to negotiate from its position of strength, imposing its demands on its weaker partner and resorting to targeted assassinations, collective sanctions, new expropriations of land for settlements, and other “facts on the ground,” while ratcheting up the pressure on the Palestinian Authority (PA) to deal with the “terrorists.”

The result was an “Interim Agreement” signed on September 28, 1995 that became known as “Oslo II.” It divided the West Bank into three administrative divisions categorized as Areas A, B and C, each to enjoy a different degree of Palestinian self-government: Area A, covering 4% of the West Bank, was under exclusive Palestinian control. In Area B, covering 25% of the West Bank, Palestinians were to exercise civilian authority while Israel continued to be in charge of security. Area C covered the remaining two-thirds of the West bank and was designated to remain under exclusive Israeli control (Shlaim 2010, p. 202). The combined impact of these developments was to bring about a set of conditions that undermined the possibility of launching any new mass-based unarmed resistance movement against the occupation.

1. The PA that had been tasked by Israel and its international backers with controlling dissent within the Palestinian community. Hence, they were directly involved in maintaining the occupation (Roy 2007, p. 245).
2. The dominant Palestinian political and socio-economic strata were developing vested interests in the status quo of occupation.
3. The breakup of the West Bank into different zones increased the socio-geographical fragmentation of the Palestinians, not least because of the obstacles to free movement created by the Israeli road-building program.

4. The leverage power over Israel that could be exerted by Palestinian noncooperation was minimal as Israel reduced its reliance on Palestinian labor and markets.
5. There was a lack of potential leaders of any coordinated unarmed popular movement. The cadres from the intifada followed different trajectories, but two career paths were common. Some joined the new PA, while others established or joined nongovernmental organizations concerned with themes like democratization and peacebuilding, invariably funded by foreign donors keen to promote peaceful coexistence (Herzon and Hai 2005).

The Second Intifada

The Al Aqsa Intifada began in September 2000 following Ariel Sharon’s provocative entry into the Haram Al-Sharif area (Temple Mount). But the deeper cause was the buildup of frustration, resentment, and anger resulting from 7 years of a peace process that only served to deepen Palestinian dispossession and deprivation while strengthening the Israeli occupation. The malfunctioning of the PA and the cronyism that was its dominant feature only served to deepen the feeling that “something must be done.”

The rapid militarization of the uprising reflected to some degree the emergence of a younger and more militant generation of cadres who were influenced by the example of Hezbollah in Southern Lebanon, whose guerrilla tactics had succeeded in forcing Israel to withdraw in May 2000. Thus, it was that within a short while every Palestinian faction, secular and Islamic, had spawned its own armed militia, each seeking to contribute to the collapse of the occupation through violent confrontation and armed struggle. Among these, the armed wing of Hamas reemerged and took the fight beyond the borders into Israel itself. The suicide bombings inevitably brought about massive Israeli retaliation. Amidst the carnage and the associated destruction of the socioeconomic fabric of Palestinian society, there was no space for any large-scale unarmed resistance, by contrast with the first intifada.

The main points of contrast between the first and the second intifada are summarized in the table below (Table 1).

Palestinians in Israel – the Impact of the Second Intifada

On September 30, 2000, the Palestinian leadership in Israel called for a general strike to protest the killing of Palestinians in the Al Aqsa compound in Jerusalem the previous day. Demonstrations spread across the Arab towns and villages in northern Israel over the following days. The response of the Israeli police was harsh. They used live ammunition, resulting in the death of 13 protesters (Darweish 1991). It was as if the Green Line had disappeared. As Graham Usher reported at the time, “what pulled Palestinians out onto the streets of their villages was televised murder – relayed again and again on Arab TV – of 12-year-old Mohamed Al-Dorra at the Netzarim junction in Gaza after 45 minutes of continuous Israeli army fire. And what put rocks into their hands was the lethal response of the Popular Protest in Palestine, Table 1 Main points of contrast between the first and the second intifada

| First intifada | Second intifada |
|---|--|
| Predominantly unarmed resistance | Predominantly armed/violent resistance |
| Mass civilian involvement | Civilians confined to “support” functions |
| Cohesion and unity via popular committees | Fragmentation with power to local militias |
| Predominantly secular | Enhanced confessional character |
| Attempts to influence Israeli publics through dialogue of words and actions, shame, power, etc. | Attempts to influence Israeli publics through intimidation and fear |
| Active support from Israeli peace groups | Limited role for Israeli peace groups in context of suicide bombings/terror attacks |
| Significant international support and third-party pressure for peace settlement | Particularly after September 11, 2001, resistance viewed through the lens of “war on terror” |

Israeli police, for whom there has never been a Green Line as far ‘their’ Palestinians are concerned” (Usher 2000).

The strength of the response reflected not only the level of support for those Palestinians resisting the occupation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, but it also grew from the deep sense of frustration felt by the Palestinian minority at the discriminatory treatment they experienced as marginalized second-class citizens of Israel. Indeed, the lethal force used by the Israeli police only served to highlight the manner in which the whole community was discriminated against (White 2012, pp. 80–81). As Ilan Pappé (2011, p. 234) noted,

If one can summarize the Palestinian take on what lay behind October 2000, it would be to say that this was an institutional use of state power to deliver a message to a fifth of its population: be docile and accept your status as second-class citizens, or encounter the wrath of the army and security forces.

A new development of this period was the emergence of Israeli solidarity groups composed of Arab and Jewish citizens of Israel opposed to the construction of the separation wall.

The Separation Wall and the Reemergence of Unarmed Popular Resistance

The suicide bombings and associated targeting of Israeli civilians provided the Israeli government with the rationale to justify their decision to embark on the building of a physical wall between the West Bank and Israel “to keep the bombers out” according to Israel’s claim (Darweish and Rigby 2015). Construction commenced in the spring of 2002, and by September 2003 it had become a focus of international attention. It was clear that while the Israeli government justified the wall in terms of the security needs of Israeli civilians, its route was also determined by the desire to expropriate even more Palestinian territory and impose an additional layer of suffering on the Palestinians. Within a very short time it had impacted deleteriously on the lives of tens of thousands of Palestinians who were denied access to their fields, prevented from reaching their places of work, and forced to travel circuitous routes and negotiate armed checkpoints to get to their land, school, university, or medical center. It was the imposition of such a new, direct, and visible challenge to their well-being that provoked a wave of popular unarmed resistance among those most directly affected.

Looking back over the period of popular resistance between 2003 and 2014, it is clear that at no stage was there anything comparable to a mass movement of protest. What occurred was a series of localized centers of active unarmed resistance against the construction of the wall or the threat of land expropriation from Israeli settlements. At the height of the popular resistance during 2010–2011, there was a maximum of 40–50 villages and neighborhoods where there was some form of organized unarmed resistance against the ongoing occupation (Darweish and Rigby 2015). The centers of resistance changed over time, and as the construction of the wall progressed new “hot spots” emerged. Some of these pockets of resistance, such as Budrus and Bil’in, gained an international profile during the peak of their resistance, but this declined with the passage of time.

In 2013, a senior political figure in the Bethlehem area identified some of the weaknesses of the unarmed protest aimed at ending the Israeli occupation of Palestinian territory:

If there was a massive popular resistance, there is a possibility of success. . . . But some of the leaders have a personal interest in the status quo. . . . So this is part of the cycle of mistrust. People want to see their leaders to the fore, as an example to people on the ground. . . . At the moment popular resistance is very localised, every Friday the same few villages, the same thing. It is not popular as it does not include the mass of people. If we were serious we would make life hell for the settlers, blocking the roads, making the soldiers work. That would be popular resistance. (Darweish and Rigby 2015, p. 2.)

Lack of Social Solidarity as Main Reason for Weakness of Contemporary Popular Unarmed Protest

It has become clear to informed observers that a major reason for the weakness of the recent unarmed resistance to the expansion of the Israeli occupation is the erosion of any significant sense of social solidarity among Palestinians during the first decades of the twenty-first century. There have been many reasons for this deepening of the horizontal and vertical divisions within the Palestinian population, among which are:

1. The geopolitical fracturing that took place as part of the Oslo process with the division of the West Bank into Areas A, B and C
2. The blockages to easy communication and movement between areas – particularly between the West Bank and the Gaza Strip
3. The political fractures – particularly the division between Hamas and Fatah which reached its nadir in 2007 when Hamas took control of the Gaza Strip by force
4. The economic impoverishment of large numbers of Palestinians who can no longer find employment in Israel, resulting in them prioritizing the satisfaction of basic needs above participation in a common struggle for some distant goal like the end of the occupation
5. The widespread disillusionment with the cronism and corruption that has permeated the PA, and which has fed a country-wide lack of trust in those seeking to act as leaders
6. The harsh Israeli punishment and sanctions against the activists in the popular protest against the wall

The Important Role of Third-Party Solidarity: Grounds for Hope

Perhaps the most significant feature of the post-second intifada period of popular resistance has been the increased involvement of “internationals” as accompaniers, coparticipants in actions, and as “activist tourists” expressing their solidarity through their presence. The significance of these overseas activists has been threefold.

1. By their presence they created a kind of protective shield for Palestinian protesters.

2. They established linkages between Palestinians and wider activist networks around the world.
3. On their return home they act as powerful advocates of the Palestinian cause among networks and groupings in their own countries.

One outcome of this trend has been an expansion of the international grassroots movement of solidarity with the Palestinian struggle. This loose “movement of movements” has been one of the prime vehicles for implementing a Palestinian initiative that emerged out of a meeting of Palestinian civil society organizations in July 2005 – the call for a worldwide boycott, divestment, and sanctions (BDS) campaign against Israel (Barghouti 2011).

There would appear to be increasing numbers of people around the world who do think that the continued Israeli occupation of Palestinian lands and the “blockade” and virtual imprisonment of the citizens of the Gaza Strip constitutes a gross and unacceptable violation of basic human rights and international law about which “something must be done” (Darweish and Rigby 2018). In this, there are grounds for hope. On their own the Palestinians lack the leverage power to cause the Israelis to change their stance and seek a substantive and self-sustaining peace, but we have now moved into an age where transnational social movements do exercise an influence on publics around the world and hence upon political leaders and decision-makers (Keck and Sikkink 1999). There is no reason why the BDS campaign and related movements should not grow into such a force for change (Darweish and Rigby 2018).

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Pacifism and Peace
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

References

- Barghouti, O. (2011). BDS: Boycott, divestment. In Sanctions – The global struggle for Palestinian rights. Chicago: Haymarket Books.
- Bayat, A. (2013). Life as politics: How ordinary people change the Middle East. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Darweish, M. (1991). Palestinians in Israel. In Rigby Living the Intifada. London: Zed Books.
- Darweish, M. (2020). “This is our home: Everyday resistance of the Palestinians in Israel 1948–1966”, Resistances: Between theories and the field, (Ed) Murru, S & Polese, A, Roman & Littlefield, London.
- Darweish, M., & Rigby, A. (2015). Popular protest in Palestine: The uncertain future of unarmed resistance. London: Pluto.
- Darweish, M., & Rigby, A. (2018). The internationalisation of nonviolent resistance: The case of the BDS campaign. Journal of Resistance Studies, 4(1), 45–71.
- Darweish, M., & Sellick, P. (2017). Everyday resistance among Palestinians living in Israel 1948–1966’. Journal of Political Power, 10(3), 353–370.
- Herzon, S., & Hai, A. (2005). What do people mean when they say “people-to-people”? Palestine-Israel Journal, 12–13(4), 8–15.
- Kayyali, A. (1970). The Palestinian Arab Reactions to Zionism and the British Mandate, 1917–1939, University of London, Doctoral thesis.
- Keck, M. E., & Sikkink, K. (1999). Transnational advocacy networks in international and regional politics. International Social Science Journal, 51(159), 89–101.
- Khalidi, R. (1997). Palestinian identity: The construction of modern national consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Mandel, N. J. (1976). The Arabs and Zionism before World War I. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Omer-Man, M. (2011). This week in history: The 1929 Hebron Massacre. Jerusalem Post, 26 August.
- Pappe, I. (2006). A history of modern Palestine. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Pappe, I. (2011). The Forgotten Palestinians: A History of the Palestinians in Israel. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Porath, Y. (1974). The Palestinian-Arab national movement, 1918–1929. London: Frank Cass.
- Porath, Y. (1977). The Palestinian Arab National Movement: From riots to rebellion, 1929–1939. London: Frank Cass.
- Rigby, A. (1991). Living the intifada. London: Zed Books.
- Rigby, A. (1997). The legacy of the past: The problem of collaborators and the Palestinian case. East Jerusalem: PASSIA.
- Rigby, A. (2010). Palestinian resistance and nonviolence. East Jerusalem: PASSIA.
- Rings, W. (1982). Life with the enemy: Collaboration and resistance in Hitler’s Europe 1939–1945. Garden City: Doubleday.
- Rouhana, N. N., & Sabbagh-Khoury, A. (Eds.). (2011). Palestinian in Israel: Reading in history, politics and society. Haifa: Mada Al Carmel Arab Centre for Applied Social Research.
- Roy, S. (2007). Failing peace: Gaza and the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. London: Pluto.
- Sayigh, R. (1979). Palestinians: From peasants to revolutionaries. London: Zed Books.
- Şāyigh, Y. (1997). Armed struggle and the search for state: The Palestinian national movement, 1949–1993. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Shehada, M. (2020). Israel calls all Palestinian resistance “terrorism”. That’s not just racist – it’s dangerous. The Jewish Forward, 13 February.
- Shlaim, A. (2010). Israel and Palestine: Reappraisals, revisions, refutations. London: Verso.
- Usher, G. (2000). Uprising wipes off Green Line. Al-Ahram, n. 503, October 12–18.
- White, B. (2012). Palestinians in Israel: Segregation, discrimination and democracy. London: Pluto Press.

Positionality

- ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research

Positive Peace

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches

Post-Conflict

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Sierra Leone

Post-Conflict Elections

Benjamin Reilly
School of Social Sciences, University of Western Australia, Crawley, WA, Australia

Definition

Elections are central to peacebuilding, but poorly timed elections may have negative consequences for the consolidation of both peace and democracy. This chapter examines key issues of electoral timing: how soon to hold elections following hostilities, whether to sequence national- and local-level polls, and which models of electoral system and administration are most appropriate in post-conflict environments.

Since at least the end of the Cold War, elections have been an integral element of post-conflict peacebuilding. Indeed, international norms often seem to consider no other avenues for conferring legitimacy and authority on a new government, and for concluding international support missions. Elections also have broader effects on the post-conflict environment including the development of political parties, government stability, and the reconciliation of former warring groups. Decisions on electoral processes are therefore linked to many of the broader objectives of state reconstruction and liberal peacebuilding.

This chapter provides an overview of the relationship between elections and post-conflict peacebuilding. It will examine the timing of post-conflict elections; the sequencing of local, regional, and national elections; specific electoral systems; and electoral administration. Electoral democracy in any society will be affected by the choices taken in each of these areas. But in a post-conflict environment, the stakes are heightened. Domestic and international actors typically face acute time and resource pressures, with choices in one area constraining or enabling options in another. Policymakers need to be aware of these trade-offs and, importantly, tailor their choices to the specific needs of the situation in order to achieve the best long-term outcomes.

The Challenges of Elections in Post-conflict Countries

Conflict transformation is inherent to the appeal of elections. Elections are not a means of resolving conflicts, but rather of allowing them to be expressed by peaceful and rule-bounded processes. By moving “from bullets to ballots,” elections ideally provide a means of taking social conflicts out of the realm of armed violence and into institutionalized, constitutional procedures. While peacebuilding is not assured, in theory the application of free elections allows the rule of law to prevail over the rule of the gun.

This approach to conflict transformation helps explain the centrality of elections to post-conflict peacebuilding, but also raises numerous political choices and dilemmas. One is the relationship between the electoral process and a new political order. Should elections precede the writing of a new constitution, so as to confer democratic legitimacy on that process via a widely representative constituent assembly, as was the case in Nepal in 2008 shortly before the monarchy was abolished? Or should they take place only once the rules of the game are clearly established, as argued by reformers in Egypt during the Arab Spring uprising that commenced in 2010, fearful of the likely consequences of Islamist parties gaining power?

These are not abstract questions. In Nepal, successive attempts to agree on a new constitution prior to 2015 were stymied precisely because the electoral process was unable to deliver a workable and cooperative majority in the constituent assembly. In Egypt, after the 2011 revolution and fall of President Hosni Mubarak, liberal groups worried that elections held before a new constitution guaranteeing basic rights and freedoms would lead to the dominance of the Muslim Brotherhood. They were proved all too correct – leading to a 2013 military coup and the return of the generals to power.

International policymakers must also confront the issue of whether to support elections, particularly when international “boots on the ground” are involved via a peacekeeping mission. Timing of the first post-conflict elections is often a particular concern. Because successful elections often form part of an “exit strategy” for international interventions, initial post-conflict elections typically take place within a short-term time frame, reflecting a desire on the part of international actors to disengage from their commitments and demonstrate success to domestic publics (Reilly 2008; Caplan 2012). For instance, the timing of the November 1996 elections in Bosnia, the first to be held under the Dayton Accord, were dictated less by events on the ground than the Clinton administration's desire to show progress in the Balkans before mid-term elections in the United States (Reilly 2008, 167).

More diffuse temporal concerns also encourage premature elections. Building and consolidating a representative democracy is a long-term process, but the domestic political pressures weighing on states which usually oversee and implement international peacebuilding missions are almost all short term. Quick results are required. An early establishment of home-grown institutions, such as representative legislatures and multi-ethnic peace and security forces, is needed to create both the shell of a functioning state and a legitimate body politic for the international community to deal with. But financial pressures push many electoral assistance missions to scale back their immediate presence and reduce the levels of their assistance as soon as it is minimally feasible to do so (Lyons 2005).

All of this places considerable pressure on the post-conflict election timetable, and frequently leads to elections being held as early as possible in the life of a peacekeeping mission in order to create some kind of legitimate government – a pressure which in Iraq led to elections being held in 2005, in the absence of public security and in the face of a boycott from one of the country's main religious groups, the Sunni. Such “premature” elections have become the norm in post-conflict environments. Researchers have found that the time between a conflict ending and an election has halved since the end of the Cold War: prior to 1989, an average of 5.6 years passed before post-conflict countries held their first election; since 1989, this has fallen to 2.7 years (Brancati and Snyder 2013, 823). During the “electoral boom” of the 1990s and 2000s, most of these post-conflict elections were conducted in states with little or no prior democratic experience, generating lots of activity but limited lasting democratic dividend (Flores and Nooruddin 2016).

A constrained timetable also places great pressure on electoral administration. Elections are extremely complex national events which require the mobilization of the adult citizenry and massive allocations of resources, typically culminating in a single-day event which affects the entire country. Few other peacetime events are comparable. Meaningful elections also require significant investment of time as well as the human and financial capacity to establish a legal framework; build institutional and administrative structures; design and implement voter education and training programs; identify and procure materials; conduct voter registration, staff polling stations, and counting centers; and of course provide the overarching security needed to implement all of this.

Despite this, both local and international policymakers are often attracted to quick elections in the aftermath of a civil war or other major conflict. This short-term bias leads to several recurring pathologies: premature post-conflict elections typically leave insufficient time for democratic forces to emerge, making it more likely that elections are fought out by nationalist or ethnic parties than by policy-driven ones; undue weight is typically accorded to administrative ease in the choice of electoral systems, with potentially debilitating consequences for accountability and governance; inclusion and descriptive representation are privileged over other goals such as competitiveness and accountability; and questions of longer term governability are too often overlooked.

A striking example of this final problem is the recent proliferation of post-election power-sharing deals struck between warring parties in the aftermath of disputed elections, such as the 2008 deal in Kenya to resolve the political, economic, and humanitarian crisis that erupted after the incumbent Mwai Kibaki was declared president over his opponent Raila Odinga (who eventually became prime minister). After an eruption of violence across the country, a dual-executive system which allowed both men a share in power was enshrined, creating in effect a “semi-presidential” system in which both the president and the prime minister were vested with executive power. Similar arrangements in Zimbabwe in 2009 and more recently in Afghanistan were also makeshift solutions to post-election impasses. These kinds of political fixes themselves often become the subject of dispute in countries with weak institutions and social mistrust. By entrenching political divisions into the constitution through the creation of dual-executive systems, such approaches privilege short-term fixes to post-election disputes over longer term governability. A clear example was the 2014 pact in Afghanistan between the top vote-getter, Ashraf Ghani, who became president, and Abdullah Abdullah, named as chief executive, following a deeply compromised election which featured fraud on both sides (Mason 2014). Political compromise in such cases comes at the cost of cohesive governance.

Nonetheless, elections remain central to post-conflict peacebuilding, especially in regards to negotiated peace deals in which the international community is involved. A recent survey of such peace agreements found that half of them stipulated elections, mostly within 3 years of the deal but some within a year or less (Caspersen 2017, 110). Domestically, political actors tend to make judgments about the wisdom of early elections based on their perceived prospects and balance of power. For international donors, elections provide a tangible sign of progress, while emerging global norms favoring negotiated settlements and localization of authority in the period following a conflict have also contributed to this trend (Brancati and Snyder 2011).

A key issue is the relationship between repeated elections and post-conflict governance. Some scholars have argued for the idea of “democratization by elections” (Lindberg 2009), in which even flawed and partially competitive elections can, when iterated over time, contribute to greater democratization even under unpropitious circumstances. Africa’s democratic success stories such as Ghana or Senegal are cited as examples, although critics argue that elections per se had little causal impact (Bogaards 2013). In relation to some of the most high-profile cases of post-conflict elections of the past decade such as Iraq and Afghanistan, it could be argued that repeated elections have actually had the opposite effect, with flawed or fraudulent electoral processes contributing to political stalemate, institutional decay, and a growing crisis of governance (Reilly 2013a).

It needs to be stressed that unlike elections in stable established democracies, the purpose of elections in post-conflict environments is rarely to effect a change in the holders of power. Uncertainty of outcomes, the hallmark of genuinely democratic polls, is often less important than the act of holding the polls themselves. Indeed, genuine uncertainty in terms of who will win elections can be acutely destabilizing in fragile, high-profile contests. Rather, elections are more often of symbolic importance, signaling to both domestic and international audiences that the cloak of legitimate government authority has been restored – an essential step in the process of state reconstruction. By enshrining a political order centered on rules-based competition for office rather than open warfare, elections in post-conflict settings are a means to channel the expression of societal conflicts within formal politics rather than through armed violence.

Timing and Sequencing

Because they play both substantive and symbolic roles, there is nearly always pressure to conduct elections as soon as possible following a period of violent conflict, as noted above. One peace agreement, in the southern Philippines Autonomous Region of Mindanao, called for elections within a week (Caspersen 2017, 82). At the same time, it has become increasingly accepted in the scholarly if not the policy world that early elections held in polarized environments tend to expose deep social cleavages, which can make the process of post-conflict peacebuilding more difficult. Indeed, in some cases, free and fair elections can actually undermine rather than reinforce the development of the post-conflict democratic order (Flores and Nooruddin 2016).

A case in point is Cambodia’s breakthrough 1993 elections conducted by the United Nations Transitional Administration in Cambodia (UNTAC), which was at the time the largest and most ambitious peacekeeping and democratization mission the UN had ever undertaken. After conducting a technically near-faultless election, the realities of power politics were exposed in the immediate post-election period, once it became clear that the incumbent Prime Minister Hun Sen's party had gained fewer seats than the opposition (51 seats to 58 seats, respectively, in the 120-seat assembly), leaving no party with a working majority. Amid threats of renewed civil war, a hastily brokered deal saw a power-sharing coalition featuring "co-prime ministers" from the two parties installed – an arrangement which proved highly unstable in practice and fell apart completely in 1997, when Hun Sen routed his opponents to claim power alone. By then, UNTAC had long-since departed – it had declared the peaceful holding of the election as evidence of the success of the mission, despite leaving Cambodia a deeply defective quasi-democracy. Hun Sen remains in power to this day (Peou 2004).

This model was to set the stage for subsequent internationally sponsored elections throughout the 1990s. In some cases, such as Bosnia and Kosovo, international forces did not depart following the initial elections, but rather installed themselves as a kind of ongoing quasi-administration. While long-term UN or EU administrations remain in a few hotspots, in most interventions outside Europe, the "minimal security, quick elections, and departure" model was prevalent. This necessitated holding elections relatively early in the post-conflict cycle, giving both domestic and international actors a political and symbolic marker of progress that could be used as the justification to begin turning power over to local forces.

In Iraq, for instance, the rationale to hold quick elections after the US-led invasion of 2002 was both substantive (the need for a Constituent Assembly to draft a new constitution) and symbolic (to demonstrate the validity of the prevailing American policy of transforming Iraq into a bastion of democracy in the Middle East). But significant domestic pressure from local elites, such as Grand Ayatollah Ali Al-Sistani, for national polls to be conducted as quickly as possible led to elections being held in early 2005 in the absence of popular security and in the face of a Sunni boycott – a decision which arguably hindered rather than helped the longer-term process of democratization. A similar combination of local and international pressures was evident in East Timor in 2001, where the UN administrator Sérgio Vieira de Mello was under pressure from Fretilin, the party of the resistance struggle, to hold elections before other parties could organize to challenge it. The role of local elites is always central to the success of post-conflict democratization (Berdal and Zaum 2012; Zürcher et al. 2013).

Despite such pressures, comparative experience suggests problems with elections held immediately following a conflict, with the partial exception of those accompanied by highly intrusive peacekeeping missions which essentially take over the state (Fortna 2008). Frequently, such elections can become a de facto contest between former warring armies masquerading as political parties. This can hamper the development of peacetime politics in deeply divided societies even years after the war ended – as demonstrated by the regular re-election of ethnic hard-liners in Bosnia, where nationalist parties and elites have not only prospered, but sought to use the democratic process to press for sectarian objectives under the rigid ethnic power-sharing provisions of the Dayton Accord (Hulse 2015).

So when should post-conflict elections be held? An extended process of consultation and local-level peacebuilding, in which some of the real interests and concerns that provoked the conflict are addressed in a step-by-step fashion before elections take place, may offer better prospects for a peaceful transition in post-conflict societies. Ideally, a period of 2–3 years between the end of a conflict and the holding of elections should be seen as a minimum, based on the examples of both Kosovo and East Timor, where a multi-year period of transitional administration took place before the first elections were held (Reilly 2008, 2011). This timeline has received support from a study of post-conflict elections, which found that elections held in the first year following a cessation of hostilities drastically shortens the time till conflict relapse, as do elections held in the second year. It was not until 3 years after conflict cessation that elections ceased to impact on conflict recurrence (Flores and Nooruddin 2012).

Such extended international commitment, however, is unrealistic for the majority of post-conflict states (Ponzio 2011). Indeed, pressure to hold elections quickly after peace has been restored is likely to remain a recurring theme of international interventions. This is in part due to the symbolic issues noted earlier: the “signaling” role of elections remains important for the news media and other Western policy consumers, so the mere holding of elections is usually taken as an indicator of political progress. However, flawed elections can have the reverse effect, as in the 2009 presidential election in Afghanistan where major electoral fraud during Hamid Karzai’s presidency was effectively ignored by the international community, precipitating serious divisions within the UN agencies responsible. This led to a very public disagreement between UN Special Representative to Afghanistan Kai Eide and his deputy, Peter Galbraith, over the UN’s response to fraud in the elections. Galbraith was eventually removed from his position by the Secretary-General, Ban Ki-moon. At the same time, the substantive value of providing international actors with a legitimate local counterpart as quickly as possible is undeniable. One recent study found that first elections were more likely to succeed when elements of the new political order, such as transitional power-sharing government or amnesty for past offences, were put in place before elections were held (Joshi et al. 2015).

A separate but related issue is the sequencing of national and sub-national elections. Several prominent transitions have chosen to start with municipal elections before national ones, using local polls as a trial run in the hope of privileging bread-and-butter concerns such as service delivery above fraught disputes over history or identity (Paris 2004). In Kosovo, for instance, local elections held soon after the cessation of hostilities in 2000 (less than 1 year after the war concluded) helped weaken the power of parties associated with the Kosovo Liberation Army while strengthening moderates in Ibrahim Rugova’s Democratic League of Kosovo, allowing for the creating of representative municipal assemblies in a first-step towards institution-building (Hysa 2004). Local elections can also provide good tutelage for election officials under less scrutiny than high-profile national elections, where stakes are higher, media attention is greater, and mistakes can quickly escalate into a crisis.

Elsewhere, local consultation processes preceding national elections allowed some breathing room for local and international actors. An example is East Timor’s National Consultative Council (which served as predecessor to the elected Constituent Assembly), held in 1999 in the immediate post-conflict period, two years before national elections, and offered a degree of accountability and representation to the local population. In Afghanistan, the emergency Loya Jirga (“Grand Assembly”) held in June 2002 following the overthrow of the Taliban similarly provided a degree of representation without requiring the organization of large-scale elections. By contrast, the 2010 local elections in the Democratic Republic of the Congo had little positive impact on the highly flawed presidential elections conducted the following year. And the very act of holding subnational elections before national ones can also strengthen separatist parties with territorial bases, as occurred prior to the breakup of Yugoslavia (Brancati 2009).

This diversity of experience is reflected in the academic literature, with some scholars arguing that holding national elections before regional ones generates incentives for the creation of national, rather than regional, political parties – and hence that the ideal process of election timing is to start at the national level first (Linz and Stepan 1996). Others support holding local elections before national ones as a trial run in the hope of privileging service delivery above fraught disputes over history or identity (Paris 2004). While administratively more difficult, simultaneous national and local elections may be the best option for political development, as they “can facilitate the mutual dependence of regional and national leaders . . . by developing an integrated party system” (Diamond 1999, 158).

Electoral Systems

The choice of electoral system is perhaps the most important institutional decisions that any post-conflict democracy (and indeed any democracy) has to make. Electoral systems are fundamental to the operation and consolidation of democratic governance, having a direct impact on issues such as the development of the party system, linkages between citizens and their leaders, political accountability, representation, and responsiveness. In post-conflict societies, they can also play a particular role in shaping the incentives facing political actors – for example, the rewards which may accrue to them by choosing to emphasize policy rather than personality in their campaigns, or whether to politicize or downplay ethnic cleavages in their rhetoric – with long-term consequences for the operation and consolidation of democratic governance. These variables make the choice of electoral system one of the most important political decisions taken in the immediate post-war period.

An electoral system is designed to do three main jobs. First, it determines how votes cast are translated into seats won in a legislature, presidency, or other representative body. Second, electoral systems act as the conduit through which the people can hold their elected representatives accountable, allowing more direct or more distant channels of accountability based on their design. Third, different electoral systems present incentives for those competing for power to couch their appeals to the electorate in distinct ways. In post-conflict societies, for example, where language, religion, or ethnicity may represent a fundamental political cleavage, particular electoral systems can reward candidates and parties who act in a cooperative, accommodatory manner to rival groups; or they can instead reward those who appeal only to their own group, which typically leads to problems of ethnic outbidding (Reynolds et al. 2005).

Electoral systems are often categorized according to how proportionately they operate in translating votes cast by electors into seats won by parties. A typical three-way structure divides such systems into plurality-majority, semi-proportional, and proportional representation (PR) systems:

- Plurality-majority systems prioritize local representation via the use of small, single-member electoral districts, rather than national-level proportionality. Among such systems are plurality (first-past-the-post), run-off, block, and alternative vote systems.

- By contrast, proportional representation (PR) systems use larger multi-member districts and typically deliver more representative outcomes. These include “open” and “closed” versions of party list PR, as well as “mixed-member proportional” and “single transferable vote” systems.
- Semi-proportional systems offer other approaches, including the “mixed” models by which part of the parliament is elected via PR and part from local districts, a common choice in many new democracies over the past decade.

One of the great political science debates of the 1990s and 2000s concerned which electoral systems are most appropriate for promoting peaceful politics in divided societies. Two schools of thought predominate. The scholarly orthodoxy has long argued that some form of PR is all but essential if democracy is to survive the travails of deep-rooted divisions. The tendency of PR to produce multi-party systems and hence multi-party parliaments, in which all significant segments of the population can be represented, including women and minorities, is seen as especially important in promoting more consensual post-conflict politics (Lijphart 1995; McEvoy and O’Leary 2014). By contrast, an alternative approach argues for systems which work to break down the political salience of social divisions rather than foster their representation. Examples include majority systems enabling voters to indicate their preference between candidates or that require candidates to demonstrate widespread geographical support in order to be elected. Such “centripetal” approaches endorse cross-ethnic incentives and broad-based parties that do not simply replicate ethnic divisions in the political process, allowing space for new, more productive policy cleavages to emerge (Horowitz 1985; Reilly 2016).

In practice, elections conducted under UN auspices have almost all favored PR, usually in its simplest closed-list, large-district form. Major transitional elections in Namibia (1989), Nicaragua (1990), Cambodia (1993), South Africa (1994), Mozambique (1994), Liberia (1997), Bosnia (1996), Kosovo (2001), East Timor (2001), Iraq (2005), and Burundi (2005) were all conducted predominantly under party-list PR, often with the entire country forming a single-electoral district. This has strengths and weaknesses. On the one hand, depending on the number of candidates that are returned in each district, such systems tend to have a high level of proportionality and therefore lower barriers to entry. This can play an important role in ensuring minorities and marginal groups can be heard and their genuine power enhanced. On the other hand, such PR systems place few restrictions on chauvinist or ethnic parties, including those which are thinly veiled versions of former warring armies, as they require very little local organization and can deliver seats to parties which command only a small fraction of the vote. This may help explain the ambiguity of scholarly studies which have found that both proportional and majoritarian systems can be effective in maintaining peace in post-conflict elections, depending on the nature and form of social cleavages and the extent to which former combatants are able to transform themselves into political parties (Reynal-Querol 2002; Sisk 2009; Bogaards 2015).

Timing and sequencing issues are again important here. In practice, the adoption of large-district PR in post-conflict countries has often been dictated more by administrative convenience under time pressure, such as the wish to avoid demarcating individual electoral districts and producing separate ballot papers for each district, than by deeper concerns about political development. In many post-conflict environments, national PR offers the only feasible way to hold elections quickly, as a uniform national ballot can be used and no electoral districts need be demarcated, simplifying the process of voter registration, vote counting, and the calculation of results. In Liberia in 1997, for example, population displacement and the lack of accurate census data led to the abandonment of the old system of single-member majoritarian constituencies in favor of PR with a single national constituency (Lyons 1998, 182).

However, abandoning local representation in this way creates other problems, providing little or no geographic link between voters and their representatives. This can lead to difficulties in political accountability and responsiveness between elected politicians and the electorate. Many new democracies – particularly those in agrarian societies (Barkan 1995) – have much higher demands for constituency service at the local level than they do for representation of all shades of ideological opinion in the legislature. In addition, PR systems such as those used in East Timor, Iraq, and Liberia, where the whole country was effectively one constituency, tend to reward political fragmentation, encouraging fractionalization rather than aggregation, as the “quota” required for election of a single seat is so small – sometimes, less than 1% of the total vote.

As one survey noted, nationwide PR is:

the most permissive system . . . politicians can join small parties, establish new ones, or split an existing one, safe in the knowledge that even a small percentage of the votes will bring some seats in the legislative assembly. For the same reason, voters feel safe to vote for such parties, and their votes make the minimal success of small parties a sort of self-fulfilling expectation. (Taagepera and Qvortrup 2012, 252)

The result is often a fragmentation of existing parties and a multiplication of smaller ones, creating real problems for post-conflict governance.

Some scholars therefore argue that PR systems at transitional elections should be modified to encourage a higher degree of geographic and personal accountability – such as by having members of parliament represent territorially defined districts, or by allowing voters to choose between candidates not just parties (Reilly 2013b). Such “open list” systems would, for instance, have enabled voters in Bosnia to choose candidates espousing policies of their preference rather than those simply placed by the party at the top of their list, some of them former warlords. But “open list” systems are far from panaceas, and can also have detrimental effects on other aspects of political development, such as party-building. The introduction of open list voting in Indonesia has seen a rapid deterioration in party institutionalization, as the locus moved from inter- to intra-party competition for votes, and celebrities started to colonize winning slots on the party ticket (Aspinall 2010).

A popular choice in many transitional democracies in recent years has therefore been for “mixed” systems, in which part of the legislature is elected on a national level by PR, and part from single-member districts, so that both proportionality and accountability are present to some degree. But this also has a problematic record – it was the system used for the 2006 elections for the Palestinian National Authority (which it was hoped would favor the incumbent Fatah party but led to a Hamas victory), and the same year in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (which resulted in a highly fragmented parliament), and also to elect Nepal’s 2008 Constituent Assembly (which also proved unworkable). The judicial annulment of the 2012 Egyptian election was also a result, in part, of the mixed system chosen, as was also the case in Libya in 2014. These problems can be ameliorated to some extent by “mixed member proportional” models, as used in Germany and New Zealand, which ensure that over proportionality is maintained.

One implication from this potted history is that policymakers may need to consider using different systems for first-time post-conflict elections than in subsequent ones (Reilly and Reynolds 1999). For example, the administrative and inclusionary benefits of large-scale PR for first-time elections are clear, but might be tempered at later elections by a move towards more multifaceted systems which allow a great range of voter choice. This could include systems which give greater local or regional representation, or more open choices between candidates. Indonesia, for instance, moved from a closed list PR system elected at a provincial level for its post-Suharto 1999 elections to a more localized system a decade later, in a move which had costs as well as benefits (Aspinall 2010). For questions of timing and sequencing, the key message is that electoral systems appropriate in the immediate aftermath of a conflict may not be those best suited to subsequent democratic consolidation.

Election Administration

Elections are a unique area of public governance: large-scale national events that require substantial state capacity, demonstrated rights of speech and association, rule of law, and sufficient infrastructure and security to allow all adult citizens to participate. Of course, these are precisely the facilitating conditions which tend to be lacking in post-conflict countries. As a result, post-conflict elections also require different models of election administration to those used in peaceful and developed democracies. These models vary widely: some countries locate responsibility for the administration of elections within a government portfolio like the interior or home affairs ministry; in others, the body responsible for running elections is created anew for each electoral event; while in cases of post-conflict peacekeeping, the international community itself may take responsibility for running the elections.

In post-conflict environments, it is critically important that elections are run not by the government but by some form of independent electoral commission. Comparative experience, including several global studies of electoral management,¹ leaves little doubt that independent and permanent electoral management bodies represent a clear best practice in terms of electoral administration (López-Pintor 2000; International IDEA 2006). Their perceived neutrality from political interference lends credibility and integrity to the electoral process – a crucial determinant of a successful election. As such, establishing an independent electoral commission should be one of the first steps in a transitional electoral timetable. However, issues of timing and sequencing impact here too: elections held under scheduling pressures are more likely to be conducted by ad hoc or temporary outfit than by a well-resourced, permanent electoral management body.

Conflict-zone elections also affect the composition of electoral management bodies. In some countries, electoral commissions comprise apolitical electoral officials, but in others they are the domain of judges, confusing the separation of powers. In the United States and other important cases, they are formed by the political parties contesting the elections themselves. Problems with these models in some important recent transitional elections (for example, the 1999 elections in Indonesia, and the failed 2011–12 elections in Egypt) as well as established democracies (for example, the 2000 presidential elections in the United States) have highlighted their propensity for politicization and deadlock, further underlining the importance of careful composition of electoral management bodies.

¹Rafael López-Pintor, Electoral Management Bodies as Institutions of Governance (New York, NY: UNDP, 2000); International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance, Electoral Management Design: The International IDEA Handbook (Stockholm: International IDEA 2006).

The comparative evidence, then, suggests that independent commissions run by non-partisan civil servants are a preferred model of electoral administration. By contrast, party-based commissions have a strong tendency to split along party lines. In Haiti, for example, the Provisional Electoral Council was made up of representatives of the political parties and hence divided by partisanship, with internal mistrust and divisions preventing efficient administration (Nelson 1998). In Cambodia, by contrast, a non-partisan electoral commission was widely seen as one of the outstanding elements of the entire UN mission (Austin 1998). Non-partisan commissions were also a prominent and successful aspect of UN missions in Namibia and in East Timor. This model also allows the commission to respond to changing circumstances: in East Timor, the 2001 election held under UN administration included three international members and two Timorese on the commission, while the proportion was reversed for the commission that oversaw the 2002 presidential election that took place at the time of the new country's independence.

Another perennial issue for post-conflict election administration is how to handle internally displaced people and refugees. Because electoral districts and polling places are typically drawn and allocated on the basis of voter registration records, post-conflict elections will often be constrained by the availability of basic demographic data. Problems of population displacement and the lack of accurate census data also work in favor of a proportional system with a single national constituency, as such systems do not tie voters to specific electoral districts. This was the system used at South Africa's first post-apartheid elections in 1994, in part because of doubts about the reliability of population data – but which, by breaking the geographical link with voters and insulating the African National Congress from unified competition, has undermined the development of South African democracy ever since.

One solution to this problem is to abandon the idea of an electoral roll altogether, a strategy followed by several of the transitional elections discussed in this chapter. Alternately, countries moving towards a first election (or first in a long time) typically need to conduct a national census before elections can be held. For instance, as part of its extended political transition, Myanmar held a (widely criticized) national census in 2014, its first for several decades, in preparation for its transitional 2015 elections, which were won in a landslide by the former opposition National League for Democracy led by Aung San Suu Kyi. The Myanmar census also revealed major population changes between regions including shifts in the relative population shares of some ethnic groups – a highly contentious issue in ethnically diverse states, with politically fraught consequences (Horowitz 1985).

Population shifts and displacements are typical of conflict-zone elections, and further complicate questions of electoral system design, election timing, and the sequencing of local and national polls. They also constrain the choice of electoral system, creating a circular process of cause and effect. Most electoral models require accurate demographic data and population registers, but these are often absent in post-conflict settings. Post-conflict societies ideally need local representatives who can focus on service delivery – but the most viable electoral models compatible with the flawed demographic data common in post-conflict settings, such as national party-list PR, provide little or no ties between a member and a geographic area. Post-conflict elections are thus often stuck between the longer term needs of political development and the short-term demands of a minimally acceptable electoral process.

Summary

Issues of election timing, sequencing, and systems exert considerable pressure on post-conflict peacebuilding – including on the likelihood of conflict recurrence. Fundamental challenges of election administration, electoral system choice, and political party development are all influenced by the demands and attenuated timetables that typify post-war reconstruction efforts. Similarly, the timing of the initial post-conflict elections – specifically, whether to hold these elections quickly, or wait until basic security and services are in place – represent a perennial chicken-and-egg dilemma. The sequencing of local, regional, and national elections, and the coordination of these elections with the choice of a new constitution, also impact directly upon the prospects of a viable post-conflict democracy emerging.

Recent studies show that the international community can play a crucial role, both in terms of assistance to first- and second-time elections, and to a more substantive “positive” peace, in which issues of social justice and inclusion are taken seriously. As long as all sides to a conflict are included in the electoral process, the positive role of external actors in offering security guarantees to prevent both pre-electoral violence and post-election exclusion and discrimination is clear (Cederman et al. 2013). Election observation backed by foreign donors with credible coercive inducements via foreign aid also appears to be useful in building a liberal peace (Matanock 2017). At the same time, however, the past decade has seen shift in practice towards more “hybrid” and localized models of peacebuilding and away from the interventionist United Nations assistance missions that prevailed during the 1990s (Richmond 2015). The subtle but unmistakable drift away from demanding “free and fair” elections which meet international standards to merely holding “credible” ones, in order to reduce the burden on the international community and take account of local realities, is one example.

This shift towards a less interventionist and more locally-led approach to post-conflict elections is to be welcomed, but may also be indicative of the declining priority attached to elections at a time in which democracy is increasingly under threat worldwide. While enormous international resources have been spent organizing, assisting, and monitoring elections around the world in recent decades, it has also become clear that elections themselves cannot build state capacity or ensure enlightened leadership. Indeed, competitive elections by their nature tend to highlight social cleavages and emphasize areas of difference rather than commonality, and can actually make the basic tasks of government more rather than less difficult, particularly in transitional states where conflict recurrence is always possible. At the same time, by channeling conflict into rule-bounded competition and creative avenues for all segments of society to be represented in government, elections remain essential in the transformative process by which positive peace is created.

Cross-References

- ▶ Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Voting Systems

References

- Aspinall, E. (2010). Indonesia: The irony of success. Journal of Democracy, 21(2), 20–34.
- Austin, R. (1998). UN peacekeeping: Cosmetic or comprehensive? In R. Thakur (Ed.), Past imperfect, future uncertain: The United Nations at fifty (pp. 64–84). Basingstoke: Macmillan Press.
- Barkan, J. (1995). Elections in agrarian societies. Journal of Democracy, 6(4), 106–116.
- Berdal, M., & Zaum, D. (Eds.). (2012). The Political Economy of Statebuilding: Power after Peace. London and New York: Routledge.
- Bogaards, M. (2013). Reexamining African elections. Journal of Democracy, 24(4), 151–160.
- Bogaards, M. (2015). The choice for proportional representation: Electoral system design in peace agreements. Civil Wars, 15(S1), 71–87.
- Brancati, D. (2009). Peace by design: Managing intrastate conflict through decentralization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Brancati, D., & Snyder, J. (2011). Rushing to the polls: The causes of premature postconflict elections. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 55(3), 469–492.
- Brancati, D., & Snyder, J. (2013). Time to kill: The impact of election timing on postconflict stability. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 57(5), 822–853.
- Caplan, R. (Ed.). (2012). Exit strategies and state building. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Caspersen, N. (2017). Peace agreements: Finding solutions to intra-state conflicts. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Cederman, L.-E., Gleditsch, K. S., & Hug, S. (2013). Elections and ethnic civil war. Comparative Political Studies, 46(3), 387–417.

- Diamond, L. (1999). Developing democracy: Towards consolidation. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Flores, T., & Nooruddin, I. (2012). The effect of elections on postconflict peace and reconstruction. Journal of Politics, 74(2), 558–570.
- Flores, T., & Nooruddin, I. (2016). Elections in hard times: Building stronger democracies in the 21st century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Fortna, V. P. (2008). Peacekeeping and democratization. In A. Jarstad & T. Sisk (Eds.), From war to democracy: Dilemmas of peacebuilding (pp. 39–79). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Horowitz, D. L. (1985). Ethnic groups in conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hulsey, J. (2015). Electoral accountability in Bosnia and Herzegovina under the Dayton framework agreement. International Peacekeeping, 22(5), 511–525.
- Hysa, Y. (2004). Kosovo: A permanent international protectorate? In E. Newman & R. Rich (Eds.), The UN role in promoting democracy: Between ideals and reality (pp. 296–297). Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- International IDEA. (2006). Electoral management design: The international IDEA handbook. Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance.
- Joshi, M., Melander, E., & Quinn, J. M. (2015). Sequencing the peace. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 61(1), 4–28.
- Lijphart, A. (1995). Multiethnic democracy. In S. M. Lipset (Ed.), The encyclopedia of democracy (pp. 853–865). Washington, DC: Congressional Quarterly Press.
- Lindberg, S. (2009). Democratization by elections: A new mode of transition. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Linz, J. J., & Stepan, A. (1996). Problems of democratic transition and consolidation: Southern Europe, South America, and post-communist Europe (pp. 98–107). Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- López-Pintor, R. (2000). Electoral management bodies as institutions of governance. New York: United Nations Development Program.
- Lyons, T. (1998). Peace and elections in Liberia. In K. Kumar (Ed.), Postconflict Elections, Democratization and International Assistance. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Lyons, T. (2005). Demilitarizing politics: Elections on the uncertain road to peace. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Mason, C. (2014, September 23). Fraud and Folly in Afghanistan. Foreign Policy, <http://foreignpolicy.com/2014/09/23/fraud-and-folly-in-afghanistan/>
- Matanock, A. (2017). Electing peace: From civil conflict to political participation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McEvoy, J., & O’Leary, B. (Eds.). (2014). Power sharing in deeply divided places. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Nelson, S. (1998). Haitian elections and the aftermath. In K. Kumar (Ed.), Postconflict elections, democratization and international assistance. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war’s end: Building peace after civil conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Peou, S. (2004). The UN’s modest impact on Cambodia’s democracy. In E. Newman & R. Rich (Eds.), The UN role in promoting democracy: Between ideals and reality (pp. 258–281). Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Ponzio, R. (2011). Democratic peacebuilding: Aiding Afghanistan and other fragile states. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Reilly, B. (2008). Post-war elections: Uncertain turning points of transition. In A. Jarstad & T. Sisk (Eds.), From war to democracy: Dilemmas of peacebuilding (pp. 157–181). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Reilly, B. (2011). Understanding elections in conflict situations. In D. Gillies (Ed.), Elections in dangerous places: Democracy and the paradoxes of peacebuilding (pp. 3–18). Montreal/Kingston: McGill-Queen’s University Press.
- Reilly, B. (2013a). Elections and post-conflict political development. In M. Berdal & D. Zaum (Eds.), The political economy of post-conflict statebuilding: Power after peace (pp. 33–47). London/New York: Routledge.
- Reilly, B. (2013b). Political parties and post-conflict peacebuilding. Civil Wars, 15(S1), 88–104.
- Reilly, B. (2016). Centripetalism. In K. Cordell & S. Wolff (Eds.), The Routledge handbook of ethnic conflict (2nd ed., pp. 278–288). London/New York: Routledge.
- Reilly, B., & Reynolds, A. (1999). Electoral systems and conflict in divided societies. Washington, DC: National Academy Press.
- Reynal-Querol, M. (2002). Ethnicity, political systems and civil war. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 46(1), 29–54.
- Reynolds, A., Reilly, B., & Ellis, A. (2005). Electoral system design: The new international IDEA handbook. Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance.
- Richmond, O. (2015). The dilemmas of a hybrid peace: Negative or positive? Cooperation and Conflict, 50(1), 50–68.
- Sisk, T. (2009). Pathways of the political: Electoral processes after civil war. In R. Paris & T. Sisk (Eds.), The dilemmas of state building: Confronting the contradictions of postwar peace operations (pp. 196–224). London/New York: Routledge.
- Taagepera, R., & Qvortrup, M. (2012). Who gets what, when, how – Through which electoral system? European Political Science, 11(2), 244–258.
- Zürcher, C., Manning, C., Evenson, KD, Hayman, R, Riese, S, Roehner, N (2013) Costly Democracy: Peacebuilding and Democratization after War. Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Post-Conflict Nation-Building

Catherine Arthur
Humanitarian and Conflict Response Institute,
University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Commemorations; Heritage; State-building;
National identity formation

Definition of Nation-Building

Nation-building is the construction and institutionalization of the official national identity and heritage of a population within a nation-state. Nation-building differs from state-building, which is dedicated to the establishment of political infrastructure and the governing institutions of the state. While the two processes overlap, they are mutually supportive, and interdependent to some extent; nation-building focuses primarily on the symbolic components of the nation-state and its cultural, national identity. The primary objective of this process is to foster unity in the population's inherent diversity and build imaginings of a nation-state with which all can identify, and to which there is a subsequent sense of allegiance. In other words, nation-building is a process by which a sense of national unity and cohesion is fostered within the political unit of the state. This internal national unity enables a level of stability for the state, a requirement to be considered a strong and "successful" member of the international community. Consequently, nation-building is a highly important, though often overlooked, process of post-conflict reconstruction. As a process, it is complicated further in postcolonial contexts and in states recovering from intrastate, ethnic conflict where identities connect to political violence and culture and conflict resolution can be contentious. This renders the process integral not only to post-conflict reconstruction but peacebuilding efforts.

Nations and Nationalism

Under an official identity and heritage, it is possible to unite many thousands of people in a sense of shared nationhood, however, within post-conflict contexts the challenges to nation-building are heightened by the multitude of experiences of violence. Potential challenges to processes of both state- and nation-building include both practical and ideological issues: from effective governance and a strong economy, to the ways in which community and authority are defined, and how the practical and ideological issues overlap. The challenges are perhaps even more apparent in post-conflict states where intrastate violence had formerly been perpetrated along ethnic or ethno-nationalist lines. In order to understand these challenges better and to grapple with the fundamentals of nation-building, it is first necessary to briefly deconstruct "nationalism" and expose the various components of "nations" and nationhood; what is being built?

Nations are broadly defined as "a large body of people united by common descent, history, culture, or language, inhabiting a particular country or territory" (OED, 2020). Within the scholarship on nations and nationalism, these components are generally accepted but there is much debate over the creation and reproduction of nations. How they came into being and how they have endured through the ages is the crux of the divide in the dominant theoretical approaches to nations and nationalism: Modernism and Ethnosymbolism.

Modernist thought generally posits that nations and national identities are constructed phenomena, emerging out of processes of modernization and industrialization, and forged with the express intention of organizing and governing populations. It argues that post-Industrial Revolution, nation formation was conceived of to maintain control and order in the midst of accelerated processes of industrialization, urbanization, and capitalism (see Özkirimli, 2017, pp. 81–153). Prior to this era, Modernists argue that people and communities were largely organized along kingdom, religious, or local community lines and it was only following events such as the French Revolution that peoples were organized into nations as we understand them today.

Leading theorists include Ernest Gellner, Eric Hobsbawm, and Benedict Anderson, and each stresses different social and cultural tools that are utilized to assist in the construction of nations. For example, education, tradition (symbols, cultural artifacts and emblems, and rituals), and language and print media, respectively (see Gellner, 2006; Hobsbawm, 2013; Hobsbawm & Ranger, 2013; Anderson, 2006). Later contributions such as Michal Billig's seminal work, Banal Nationalism (1995), furthered these arguments by identifying the everyday symbols, practices, and performances of nationhood that permeate social life within nation-states, inculcating a sense of loyalty and positive identification at a subconscious level and assisting in the reproduction of nations in seemingly banal ways. Billig's assertion is that the everyday consumption of and participation in nationalist symbols, rituals, and discourses sanctioned by the state or political leadership with the intention of fostering unity and allegiance is a fundamental way in which constructed nations are able to continue to exist. In sum, as Hobsbawm asserts, "nations do not make states and nationalisms but the other way round" (1990, p. 10).

Emerging as a critique of Modernist approaches, Ethnosymbolism posits that nations are premodern, ancient ethnic communities that have endured through centuries. Led by Anthony D. Smith, Ethnosymbolists argue that these "ethnies" have been able to preserve their unique ethno-cultural identities through symbols, myths, traditions, values, and memories passed down through oral histories (Smith, 1991, 1993, 2009, 2013a, 2013b; Armstrong, 1982, pp. 6–9). The critique of Modernism stemmed from the perceived inability of a constructivist approach to account for ethno-cultural communities that claim nationhood and a premodern collective history. Ethnosymbolists instead argue that the phenomenon of nationalism, as the guiding ideology of national communities, is modern but could not have come into being if nations did not previously exist.

Though the two approaches differ on this significant point, the core recognized elements of nationhood are common to both: a shared national identity; common cultural heritage; a shared history; usually a common language; and a sense of attachment to a homeland. These tenets of a national community and its identity are inextricably connected to, and problematized within, processes of nation-building. Thus, if we are to better understand nation-building as a pillar of post-conflict reconstruction, it is useful to underline the main components that make nations and nationalisms, so that we can identify them more clearly in the material practices of post-conflict nation-building and the challenges they face. Considering the contemporary nature of much post-conflict nation-building in the international arena today, a Modernist approach is most appropriate for its analysis, since we explicitly see processes of constructing and producing nationhood take place in real time. Indeed, the deliberate and ideology-driven nature of these processes demonstrates most clearly how institutionalizing nationalism is conducted with the express intention of creating and sustaining nations.

To institutionalize is "to establish (something, typically a practice or activity) as a convention or norm in an organization or culture" (OED, 2020), and in the context of nation-building this translates as nationalism becoming the normalized ideology of the national community. Traditions, customs, and cultural practices become the culture of the nation-state in principle. This process of post-conflict reconstruction can thus be seen as a formalization of Gellner's notion of "high culture" (2006, pp. 34–37) through education and an enactment of Hobsbawm's "invented traditions," which "seek to inculcate certain values and norms of behaviour by repetition, which automatically implies continuity with the past" (Hobsbawm, 2013, p. 1). Through this lens, we are able to delineate the various intricate components of nation-building and reveal the complexities that are inherent in attempts to unify large, diverse groups of people under one identity. This paper begins with a consideration of the ways in which conflict complicates national identity construction and nation-building processes. It then identifies some of the core elements of nationhood that are commonly institutionalized and explain their powerful role in community formation. The paper will then focus on the primary symbolic ways in which nationhood is institutionalized, through performative and visual symbols. In doing so, it is possible to elucidate the various practices of and challenges to post-conflict nation-building, and the politics of fostering the unity and allegiance of the national community within the nation-state, and the challenges therein.

Post-Conflict Challenges to Nation-Building

Nation-building has been a prominent global political phenomenon of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. Following the era of decolonization, numerous nation-states established themselves as independent actors in the international community across the Global South. In the years following the Cold War, former Soviet bloc states declared themselves as distinct nations with unique characters and identities and gained self-determination. A great many of these new nation-states achieved their independence through violence, and the “youngest” nation-states in the world still undergoing nation-building attest to this: South Sudan, Kosovo, Montenegro and Serbia, and Timor-Leste. As with all processes of post-conflict reconstruction, legacies of the violence and division pose significant challenges to nation-building, not least of all because the ultimate goal is to foster a sense of unity, kinship, and shared heritage. Indeed, if we consider the significant unlikelihood of a sense of cultural, ethnic, or even political homogeneity within a collective that has not experienced violence, legacies of conflict then inevitably compound challenges to nation-building. The various elements of nationhood that are institutionalized through this process and managed through state apparatus can directly relate to causes of hostilities (identity politics and othering), and grievances can threaten a recently established peace. Since national identity and nationalism are emotive phenomena, capable of inciting violence itself (Stern, 1995) – we need to only consider Northern Ireland and the Balkan states to illustrate this fact, the delicate nature of nation-building cannot be underestimated, nor can the rewards be reaped with its success.

A primary area to consider carefully in any process of post-conflict reconstruction (whether state- or nation-building) is the internal demographics of the new nation-state. If the conflict was ethnic or ethno-nationalist in nature and former enemies are expected to coexist peacefully under one shared identity, the problematics are evident and the task of unifying such a population can be herculean. Since ethnic conflict is defined along identity and cultural lines (Ross, 2007, pp. 17–27; Ross, 2000), the nature of nation-building becomes highly sensitive. To avoid reigniting tensions between different ethnic groups, the role of the state becomes prominent and a less emotive, more civic nationalism is preferable to institutionalize (for example see Hayward & Komarova, 2014). Civic nationalism, as André Lecours asserts, does not equate cultural homogeneity with nationhood. This conception of the nation insists on the territorial and legal dimensions. It does not define the nation using cultural markers but [...] makes the individual's commitment to that political-legal framework the only requirement for membership (2000, pp. 154–155).

In principle, civic nationalism aims for inclusivity and consideration of internal demographic. On this particular point, state-building can complement nation-building and mitigate potential problems, for example, through the way in which different ethnic groups are represented formally in the political-legal framework. By establishing an electoral system that allows for equal representation and acknowledgment of the different groups' identities, it is possible to facilitate peaceful coexistence while establishing the foundations of one, unified national community within the new civic nation-state. Much has been written on the different forms of electoral systems that could facilitate this coexistence, and the different models of democratic government for multiparty, multicultural representation. These include consociationalist governments, with electoral systems based on proportional representation (PR), as was established in post-conflict Northern Ireland and Bosnia-Herzegovina, and national-cultural autonomy models offer opportunities for peaceful coexistence in divided societies (in particular, see Lijphart, 1977a, 1977b, 2012; Nimni, 2007). While these have been implemented relatively successfully in practice, it should be noted that consociationalism has received much criticism for permeating ethnic divisions and entrenching differences along voting lines. For example, Matthijs Bogaards (2013), Joel Selway and Kharis Templeman (2012) argue that the evidence to support PR and consociationalist or power-sharing models contributing to peace in post-conflict societies is weak. Nevertheless, no significant alternative has been proposed or implemented, rendering the consociational model the most appealing, contemporary post-ethnic conflict structure of government to ensure stability.

Establishing governance systems and bodies is critical to any state formation, yet in order for people to engage positively with political structures, electoral systems, and the state, that sense of allegiance and identity needs to be simultaneously instilled. Even when civic nationalism is the goal of nation-building, a clear, civic collective identity is needed to foster a sense of political community. Consequently, there are key components of the new nation-state that need to be officially institutionalized and enshrined to help this process. Once a shared identity has been established, it is then possible for this sense of collectivity to permeate other areas of state life, structures, and policies, and thus establish Gellner's "high culture."

National Community, Narratives, and Identity

At the heart of nation-building is the construction and institutionalization of an official national identity. If we understand a nation to be a type of community, a group of people who "have something in common with each other, which [...] distinguishes them in a significant way from the members of other putative groups" (Cohen, 1985,

p. 12), then the core distinguishing feature is an identity or national character that sets the nation apart. Indeed, names and identities – a sense of "who we are" – is crucial "not only for self- and other-identification, but also as expressive emblems of the collective 'personality'" (Smith, 1993, p. 50). By anthropomorphizing the abstraction of "the nation" and giving it a name, character, and personality, such communities can begin to attach greater emotion and value to it. Simultaneously, the nation then gives a sense of value to its individual members in return; as Smith argues,

The primary function of national identity is to provide a strong 'community of history and destiny' to save people from personal oblivion and restore collective faith. To identify with the nation is to identify with more than a cause or a collectivity. It is to be offered personal renewal and dignity in and through national regeneration (1991, p. 161).

Consequently, this profound sense of belonging and value that comes with national identification is a primary contributing factor to the emotive nature of nationalism, and thus nation-building. Even for those individuals who identify less intensely or emotionally with their national community, there will inevitably be some connection or identification because of the innate benefits of group membership for humans, such as increased self-esteem and feelings of security (McCrone & Bechhofer, 2015, p. 10; see Stern, 1995; Jenkins, 2004).

Yet in order for individuals to actually identify as a collective through a common identity, and gain the national consciousness that is crucial for the nation's very existence (Smith, 1993; Connor, 2004), the abstraction of "nation" and nationhood must be made tangible. Indeed, for the practical processes of post-conflict nation-building to take place and become institutionalized, there must first be something concrete to embed in the state's structures and culture. National identity narratives consequently become the foundation stone of nation-building, since it is within and from these narratives that identity and all aspects of nationhood are articulated and become real. As Craig Calhoun asserts, "nationalism is partly a matter of narrative construction, the production (and reproduction and revision) of narratives locating the nation's place in history" (2007, p. 45). These national identity narratives inculcate collective, positive identification based on a belief in the sharing of the unique, national character (Arthur, 2019, p. 9).

The foundation of national identity narratives is an official version of the national history, since "the sense of 'whence we came' is central to the definition of 'who we are'" (Smith, 1991, p. 22). At the head of nation-building processes, the political leadership is highly influential in writing "official" histories and consequently has great political power. They have power to construct a version of the past in a way that presents imaginings of the nation (and even perhaps themselves) in a positive light, which often then reflects the power dynamics within the state since, in a Foucauldian sense, "discourse can be both an instrument and an effect of power" (Foucault, 1976, p. 100). This writing of history is deliberately and ideologically undertaken with the intention of fostering loyalty through pride in the nation's past endeavors, glories, victories, and conquests. In this way, just as there is rarely one "true" version of history, the recounting of histories is never neutral or objective (Said, 2000). This particular aspect of nation-building is perhaps the most powerful since it renders those in political leadership capable of influencing how the past is understood and thus how the present and future are imagined, but also because it underpins the various other symbolic aspects, as will be discussed. Histories are central to the forging of national consciousness, positive identification processes, and thus nation-building because they influence the relationship between the national community, the homeland, and the state. Laura-Jane Smith notes, "the past is valued and understood differently by different peoples, groups or communities and how the past is understood validates or not a sense of place" (2006, p. 80). A significant source of this value, social capital, and validation comes from the state; when a version of history is endorsed and even promoted by the state, it gains a sense of authority, fact, and truth. One of the most subtle but most powerful ways in which this can take place is when national histories are enshrined in official, state-sanctioned symbolic forms. These include constitutions, performative symbols (including national holidays, commemorative events, and national anthems), and physical, visual symbols such as national flags, monuments, and even everyday items such as postage stamps. This is the focus of the following sections since the symbolic aspects of post-conflict reconstruction constitute some of the most critical elements of nation-building. Though often overlooked, the symbolic is crucial to forming a sense of community but simultaneously is often directly related to the fundamental sources of tension that led to the conflict.

Constitutions

In "new" states undergoing post-conflict nation-building, nationalist narratives are outlined by the state in various ways (as explored below). A cornerstone of nation-building is the drafting and institutionalization of the new nation-state's constitution. Constitutions are instrumental in nation-building, akin to the "mission statement" of the national community. Though they are primarily considered a facet of state-building, they have a powerful, symbolic function that is reflected in the narratives they enshrine. Joanne Wallis argues that "Constitutions can play a role in nation building by recognizing and organizing the popular sovereignty of the people; establishing binding, reciprocal relationships among them; and serving as an expression of their self-determination" (2014, p. 30). If we recall that nationalism is the ideology under which a nation strives for self-governance or self-determination, this is key. Wallis continues, "they often identify shared characteristics, values, aspirations, symbols, and principles that build a sense of national identity capable of constituting a political community" (2014, p. 30). Thus, constitutions are one of the clearest examples of the nationalist narratives that are fundamental to establishing a sense of national identity and community.

In post-conflict nation-states, the values and identities enshrined in constitutions can emit a powerful message that can seek either to directly address the previous violence or reconcile former enemies in this transitional period. For example, the constitution of the Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste explicitly references the “colonisation and illegal occupation” of the past that led to the conflict, articulated in emotive, nationalistic language that acknowledges “the sacrifice of thousands of lives [...] [and] all martyrs of the Motherland” (RDTL, 2007, p. i). Conversely, the constitution of Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) avoids similarly emotive language and instead outlines the collective political identity as one that is democratic, peaceful, and egalitarian in its multiethnicity, [Bosniaks, Croats, and Serbs,] Holding that democratic institutions, based on respect for human rights and freedom best produce harmony among themselves and their communities. Rejecting the violence of war. Wishing to contribute towards peace promotion. Desiring to support individual liberty and to develop a free market. (Constitution of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, 1994, p. ii)

The nature of the conflict in these two contexts is key; while Timor-Leste experienced incredible violence at the hands of the foreign occupying powers of Portugal and then Indonesia, the conflict that took place in Bosnia-Herzegovina was internal and ethnic in nature. If the intention of constitutions and their narratives is to forge close emotional bonds among the population, then these discursive strategies are logical. It is powerful to enshrine emotive narratives of martyrdom and sacrifice as inspiration for the nation, and it is unproblematic in the case of the East Timorese people fighting foreign powers for their freedom. In the Bosnian case, it is a prudent strategy to omit any reference to ethnic communities or identities, and instead focus on the post-conflict future, in which all can share in the benefits of peace. In sum, we see how past violence shapes narratives and imaginings of the future “nation” as community and the nature of the violence determines the narrative presented, since all identities enshrined in constitutions seek to unite those within through a carefully constructed representation of the past.

While it may be the case that many or even the majority of citizens never read their national constitution or be familiar with the ideas or identity exactly as outlined in its text, this component of post-conflict state- and nation-building sets the tone of national identity narratives at the state level. Constitutions are, to an extent, symbolic documents of national identity narratives. Hobsbawm argues that it is through numerous invented traditions and symbolic forms that national identity is embodied and brought to citizens in a more relatable way. If we consider constitutions as discursive symbols of identity, we see how they complement and coincide with a canon of symbolic forms that are required to build nations and a sense of nationhood.

Symbolic Forms of Nationhood

Performative Symbols of Nationhood

Symbols are essential for the existence of nations since they are the visible, physical, and perceptible forms that objectify and embody the abstractions of national identity, including the national community’s history (Arthur, 2019, pp. 14–18). Consequently, the selection and institutionalization of core symbols is a fundamental component of nation-building. By embodying and making identity tenets more real, it is possible to engage many thousands of individuals in processes of positive identification with the nation. They can wave the flag, sing the anthem, celebrate the heroes, and in doing so, they can actively share in and participate in a national identity and heritage with others. Symbols enable Anderson’s “imaginings” of community to take place, offering a visual or sensory referent, and unite diverse populations under one identity. This is crucial in any state but of critical importance in post-conflict contexts, where it is possible that in processes of nation-building, one identity aims to unite former enemies in the same community. Though challenging, unity is possible and national symbols are central to this since “[the nation] must be personified before it can be seen, symbolized before it can be loved, imagined before it can be conceived” (Walzer, 1967, p. 84). Within the category of the symbolic, there are broadly two types of national symbols to institutionalize: performative and visual.

Performative “symbols,” or symbolic performances of national identity, are important elements of nation-building. These include national anthems, national holidays, commemorative days, and perhaps religious festivals and sporting events in those contexts where religion and sport constitute distinguishing markers of identity (Elgenius, 2011, p. 2). These performances of nationalism are points in time that remind members of the nation of their identity, their history, and the fact that they share these with the rest of the national community. Habitual reminders of identity through such invented traditions are powerful in forming and sustaining nations in nation-building, which is necessarily a process of “formalization and ritualization, characterized by [...] imposing repetition” (Hobsbawm, 2013, p. 4). Performative symbols are institutionalized through their official addition to the calendar and after often quite explicit celebrations of nationhood. Through music, communal celebrations, and shared ritualized experiences, performative symbols encapsulate the essence of nationalism and instill in citizens a sense of membership, belonging, and respect.

In post-conflict societies, the challenges of transition are apparent, and the creation of performative symbols like national days and ceremonies can provide a source of contention. In deeply divided societies recovering from ethnic conflict, it is most challenging to construct national history narratives that are representative of, and appealing to, all ethnic communities residing in the new nation-state. For example, in post-conflict Bosnia-Herzegovina, 25 November is officially celebrated as “Statehood Day,” but is challenged by some. This national day attempts to enshrine the historical narrative that sees this as the moment of inception of the modern state; commemorates the ZAVNOBiH (the State Anti-fascist Council for the National Liberation of Bosnia-Herzegovina) and the stance taken against fascism in the 1940s; and revives the idea that Bosnia-Herzegovina belongs equally to each ethnic community (Ćustović, 2018, p. 127). The intention to unite the population is clear, however, the version of history that sees the emergence of the modern state on this date in 1943 has been challenged by Serbian politicians. They do not believe that the Bosniak nation existed at that time, and so see nothing of import to commemorate (Mønnesland, 2012, pp. 256–259). In post-genocide Rwanda, there is a national day to commemorate the lives lost on genocide against the Tutsi Memorial Day (Republic of Rwanda, 2021). This institutionalized commemorative day has been largely successful, with national and local media outlets dedicating their broadcasts and coverage to the day on 7 April, though research has suggested that commemorations have been exclusive in nature, and have overlooked the lives lost by moderate and innocent Hutus in the violence (Zorbas, 2004, pp. 39–40). These examples highlight the challenges of commemorations, performative symbols, and of institutionalizing a unified national identity in post-conflict contexts. Once more, the nature of the conflict is important to note; it is most challenging to represent and appeal to various ethnic groups in a state that has previously experienced internal ethnic conflict, and which now seeks to reconcile former enemies, victims, and perpetrators.

Yet in post-conflict societies that do manage to institutionalize national holidays, which are unchallenged and promote engagement with the majority of the population, we see the power and unifying influence that this symbolic performance can have. For example, in Timor-Leste there are numerous national days that commemorate important dates and figures in official narratives of the past: Nicolau Lobato National Holiday; Veteran’s Day; Popular Consultation Day; Proclamation of Independence Day; and Restoration of Independence Day (RDTL, 2020). Though there are still members of the national community who once identified with former occupier Indonesia and even collaborated and fought with them, these national days are now widely celebrated and have not been publicly challenged or critiqued. Here, we see how these holidays represent an official history that glorifies and honors the liberation struggle, and an identity of a people who fought foreign powers to gain their freedom. Despite the challenges to these performative symbols in post-conflict and deeply divided societies, they are considered an integral part of nation-building and are consistently enshrined as commemorations of an official national past. The most powerful elements of these public performances are their repetition (consistent and habitual reminders of nationhood and collective awareness) and their sense of longevity through a connection with the past (Hobsbawm, 2013), giving an impression of resistance to change and challenges which in turn leads to a sense of security and comfort in convention (Elgenius, 2011, p. 3). Thus the success of national holidays attests not only to the strength and appeal of the official national history narrative it represents, but to the potential unifying function of symbols. Performative symbols like national holidays can literally and physically bring people together to share in positive identification with their common history and heritage.

A further performative symbol of nationhood is the national anthem, which is the musical and discursive articulation of the values, character, and ideals of the nation (Gilboa & Bodner, 2009). Abril defines anthems thus:

A national anthem is a unique musical work in that it functions primarily as a malleable symbol of a bounded geographical region. [...] An anthem can only be brought to life through performance, where it is then filled with meaning which extends beyond the notes, silences, and words. The music is interpreted and realized by the performer(s), situated in a sociocultural and historical context, and reconstructed by the listeners – who might also be the performers (2007, p. 73).

Indeed, it is perhaps the participatory nature of national anthems as performative symbols that renders them so powerful. Members of the national community can engage in the performance of inspirational music and simultaneously sing the same words as potentially millions of others, whom they do not know. In this way, anthems assist in the imagination process that Anderson argues is key to the formation and reproduction of nations:

each communicant is well aware that the ceremony he [sic] performs is being replicated simultaneously by thousands (or millions) of others of whose existence he [sic] is confident, yet of whose identity he [sic] has not the slightest notion (Anderson, 2006, p. 35).

Engaging in anthem singing (often in ceremonies and national festivities, which themselves are inherently public and popular phenomena) is an emotive and physical action that is symbolic in its ability to give form to cultural and symbolic capital, and make abstractions of nationhood tangible.

National anthems can be considered as “invented traditions” in that they are inherently modern symbolic phenomena, becoming standardized and popular in Europe in the nineteenth century (Elgenius, 2011, p. 141). Typically, they are rousing melodies with emotive lyrics that invoke past glories, often militaristic or violent in nature, and outline aspirations for the future of the nation, often with explicit reference to the members of the national community coming together and even familial ties. For example, the themes of war and sacrifice typify many anthems including the “Star-Spangled Banner” (“the rocket’s red glare, the bombs bursting in air”) and La Marseillaise (“may their impure blood flow in our fields”), and Deutschland über alles illustrates the common, familial language and hopefulness that is used in national anthems (“unity and rights and freedom [...] let us strive for it together, brotherly with heart and hand”) (cited in Elgenius, 2011, p. 143; 145). Not only are the lyrics intended to be emotive and inspiring in performance, but they are also yet another articulation of nationalist narratives and so also represent the national character and an official version of the national past.

The militant and proud character of such older anthems established a global tradition that has been adopted by many “younger” nation-states as part of nation-building, for example post-colonial nation-states. Once again, we see in these contexts how a history of violence and the nature of it shape history narratives, and subsequently the national identity that is represented. Postcolonial Angola and Timor-Leste, for example, both refer explicitly to “the heroes” of the national liberation struggles, to freedom as a defining characteristic of the nation, and to having “vanquish[ed] colonialism [...] imperialism, the enemy of people” (RDTL, 2021; Governo de Angola, 2021). These particular examples illustrate clearly the ways in which a nation's history and heritage, marked by the violence of colonialism, become symbolically enshrined in its national anthem in a way that glorifies the national character and inculcates "the undivided loyalty" of its citizens in its performance (Elgenius, 2011, p. 141). The postcolonial, post-independent state celebrates its unique character and liberation from former oppressors and, in doing so, also seeks to inspire similar celebration from its citizens. This serves as a foundation of national identification and as a unifying force in the diverse national community. The power of this unifying lyrical force is only underlined and expounded when set to rousing music and performed as a collective.

States that have experienced intrastate, ethnic conflict inevitably face challenges when adopting a new post-conflict national anthem, particularly in institutionalizing the lyrics. Indeed, considering the typically militant nature of many national anthem lyrics, it would be inappropriate and likely contentious to enshrine an anthem of this nature – rendering the performative symbol divisive when instead its aim is to unite. Testament to such challenges are the cases of the national anthems in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo. The lyrics to the Bosnian national anthem were not finalized and enshrined until 2009, a full decade after the melody was composed in June 1999, precisely because of the critical, interethnic deliberation and attention required (Baltic Insight, 2009; Elgenius, 2011, pp. 145–6). In the interim ten-year period, the Bosnian anthem was solely instrumental but it was institutionalized nonetheless; this attests to the importance attributed to and recognition of the symbolic power of anthems as components of nation-building, but underlines the criticality of deciding on the right, or most diplomatic lyrics. Once the wording was finalized, concluding with the intended rousing line "We're going into the future together," it continued to spark controversy because of its avoidance of mentioning the ethnic communities and territories of Bosnia-Herzegovina, rendering it difficult for citizens to identify with it (Kovacevic, 2018). The lyrics of the anthem have not been approved by the state parliament and continue to be contested to the present day (Kovacevic, 2018).

Similarly, it was with sensitivity to potential tension in mind that the Kosovan national anthem was adopted as an instrumental piece and does not have lyrics, over a decade after Kosovo declared independence in 2008. The fear, or sensitivity to potential tension, is encapsulated by the composer of the melody Mendi Mengjiqi, who stated that "the song should not imply loyalty to any particular ethnic group" (cited in Elgenius, 2011, p. 145). Preparing for independence and beginning processes of nation-building, the anthem was one of the initial performative symbols to be considered in 2008. In an attempt to ensure the democracy of the decision, the composition of the anthem was put to a national competition. Parliamentary groups and members of parliament voted on the contenders (a decision which itself was criticized because the anthem was not put to the popular vote), and the winning melody, "Europa," was approved and enshrined on 11 June 2008 (Balkan Insight, 2008a, b). As processes of nation-building continue, identity and history narratives will develop and emerge that are sensitive to the ethnic violence of the past, and when this happens it is possible that the national anthem of Kosovo will have lyrics. Adding words to the anthem renders this performative symbol more powerful as members of the national community will be able to participate and sing together. The combination of senses engaged, together with communal performance, makes anthem singing an important unifying symbolic performance of nationhood, and could potentially serve post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding processes in Kosovo, if done sensitively and well.

Visual Symbols of Nationhood

Visual national symbols are perhaps the most obvious markers of identity and are the signs that nations use to represent themselves to the rest of the world. The visual symbols that are officially enshrined by the state in formal processes of nation-building include national flags, emblems/crests, and monuments and statues, often the representation of national heroes and key historic figures. Perhaps adding to the power of visual symbols is their ability to be incorporated into performances of nationalism. For example, the national anthem is traditionally sung while directly facing the national flag in Japan, and the American “Pledge of Allegiance” is a daily ritual centered round the flag, followed by singing “the Star-Spangled Banner.” Key monuments are also incorporated into commemorative performances of nationalism, such as the ceremonies around the Cenotaph in London on Remembrance Sunday in the UK. Crests and emblems appear on official forms and legal documents, and are visible on the cover of passports. Consequently, the creation of visual symbols as part of nation-building processes is key to the institutionalization of a national identity, history, and heritage. Visual symbols are the embodiment of these abstractions and can be incorporated into the most formal, international performances of nationhood at sporting events, music competitions, etc., as well as the most “banal” aspects of everyday life (Billig, 1995), including food packaging, postage stamps, and even clothing.

National flags are primary visual symbols and for good reason. They are universally recognized and, as Gabriella Elgenius notes, national flags are “not only a piece of cloth fluttering in the wind; it makes claims to a historic territory, independence and nationhood” (2011, pp. 2–3). In processes of nation-building, the design and creation of national flags is deliberative and seeks to enshrine in their symbolism the core tenets of national identity narratives. The various colors, shapes, and components of national flags are each ascribed as specific symbolic meaning to reflect such narratives that outline the origins of the nation, the new nation-state, and its values and identity. For example, the Irish tricolor is comprised of three blocks of color, equal in size and shape; the green represents the Catholic population in the Republic of Ireland, the orange represents the Protestant, Unionist population, and the white symbolizes peace that is hoped to prevail between the two. The flag was designed and chosen as the official symbol of the Irish Free State in 1916, following the Easter Rising. The symbolism of this flag not only provides insight into the history of the island of Ireland and the violence that brought about the new Republic, but makes a statement of intent for peaceful relations in the future. Indeed, the choice of a tricolor composition of the flag is reflective of revolutionary origins; following the French Revolution in 1789, tricolour flags as national symbols were adopted by many new states that emerged through similar processes throughout the nineteenth century.

In post-conflict nation-building processes, flag design and construction is also intended to represent the identity, history, and heritage of the nation, and those aspects deemed to be most important by the political leadership at the time. Upon closer scrutiny of the official symbolisms of national flags in such states, the national identity and history narratives become clear. For example, the role of the anti-colonial, revolutionary movement in Angola is enshrined as central to its history in the symbolism of the flag. The flag was adopted in 1975 following the war for independence, and was designed by the former national liberation movement, the Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (MPLA). As is common in numerous postcolonial states, the color red of the Angolan flag symbolizes “the blood shed by Angolans during the colonial oppression, the fight for national liberation and the defence of the Homeland” (Governo de Angola 2021, Translation my own). Black symbolizes the continent of Africa, and the yellow used to depict a machete, five-pointed star, and a cog, represents the richness of the land (Governo de Angola 2021). Thus, the violent anti-colonial struggle is explicitly written into the symbolism of this national symbol as a representation of the nation’s history, and thus reflects official notions of national identity. Weapon imagery is common in national symbolism of postcolonial flags and crests to represent a history of violence or conflict. For example, Mozambique and Guatemala respectively depict an AK47 and swords and rifles to represent the armed struggle for independence. More implicit in the symbolism of the Angolan flag is the ideological history of the MPLA. The MPLA was Marxist in its revolutionary, anti-colonial ideology and though the national flag of Angola is different to that of the party in the 1970s, there are some visual allusions to this leftist leaning. The positioning of the machete, overlying the half cog, is distinctly reminiscent of the hammer and sickle symbol of Communism, and the small five-pointed star is also associated with socialist symbolism. These examples demonstrate the commemorative function of symbolizing national identity and history narratives, and how the nation's past can be immortalized in its primary visual symbol.

The aspirations of a nation can also be enshrined in visual symbols such as national flags. In post-conflict societies that remain deeply divided along ethnic and ethno-nationalist lines, enshrining one narrative of a unified national past can be an almost impossible task, as evidenced in the discussion of performative symbols. Consequently, a focus on future-oriented values and imaginings, avoiding points of contention, can be the preferred approach to constructing symbolisms in nation-building processes. The example of post-conflict Kosovo is perhaps most illustrative of this aspirational narrative, and of the tensions and sensitivities that must be considered in flag design. In a process as unusual as that of creating a national anthem, the Kosovan national flag design was put to an open competition because of the highly politicized nature of national identity formation, and to ensure some degree of popular participation (Cosentino, 2015, p. 608). Interestingly, certain color combinations and emblems were banned from use in the competition, precisely because of their associations with different ethnic groups. A combination of red and black was prohibited because of its symbolic connection to ethnic Albanians, for example, as was the eagle (Cosentino, 2015, p. 608). The final flag that was adopted is blue with the map of Kosovo superimposed in gold, above which are six white stars that represent each of the ethnic groups of the state – Albanians, Serbs, Bosniaks, Roma, Turks, and Gorani (Cosentino, 2015, p. 610; Albertini, 2012, pp. 22–34). The outline of the land provides a neutral focal point in the center of the flag; the image of a homeland that can be shared by all is a powerful nationalist trope and indicates an appeal to all ethnic communities to find a sense of home and belonging therein. Interestingly, this is a strategy that was similarly employed in ethnically divided Cyprus and the creation of the Cypriot flag in 1960 (Republic of Cyprus, 2021), though poignantly before the ethnic violence had broken out. Parity of recognition of the ethnic communities in Kosovo is representative of the inclusive ethos of the new state, seeking to avoid ethnic tensions related to the past conflict. The choice of colors is interesting in that the blue and gold combination, coupled with stars, is suggestive of Kosovo's aims to accede to the European Union – a suggestion only strengthened by the national anthem, "Europa." Again, we see how a focus on future ambitions and hopes is used to shape national identity narratives and shift attention away from a contentious past, marked by conflict. The Kosovan flag exemplifies how (former) tensions and sensitivities pose challenges to nation-building, common in post-conflict and deeply divided societies, and how the construction of visual national symbols is as politicized and deliberative as other formal processes of post-conflict reconstruction.

In addition to formal state-led processes, the reproduction of nationalism at an everyday level through visual symbols is another crucial, though often overlooked, aspect of nation-building. The reproduction of nationalism involves the maintenance of unity, self-governance, and stability as a nationalist and political community, enduring across generations. Indeed, in line with Gellner's argument for the naturalization of nationality, Özkirimli asserts that "it follows that the national cannot be subsumed by that which is 'symbolic'; it is also constituted in the volatile settings of everyday life" (2017, p. 222). Indeed, it is in the realm of the everyday where the symbolic and the banal intersect and produce some of the most common reproductions of national identity in modern nation-states. Following the formal, top-down processes of institutionalizing symbols of nationhood, reproductions of official symbols (primarily visual symbols, due to ease of reproduction) become embedded in everyday life at a local level, and constitute powerful tools for maintaining that sense of unity within the population. Depictions of national flags, icons, cultural symbols, heroes, and historic figures are commodified and mass-produced with the intention of permeating everyday life for citizens. Some of the most common ways this has typically been done is through postage stamps, banknotes and currency, and food packaging (for example, see McGuinn, 1991; Hoyo, 2010; Raento & Brunn, 2005; Penrose, 2011; Andersson, 2020). With these everyday visual reminders of nationhood, the intention is that over time, the population will become accustomed to ideas and feelings of belonging, membership, and unity within the nation. To establish these feelings and a sense of “mindless remembering” (see Billig 1995) is to consolidate processes of nation-building and ensure unity and stability for the nation-state in the long term.

Nation-Building as Fundamental to State Life

Nation-building is fundamental to the success of post-conflict reconstruction processes for several reasons. First, it is in the successful establishment of a common, collective identity and history that former enemies can be reconciled within the political unit of the state, and make sense of a difficult past. This is not without challenges and in some cases, it is necessary to avoid all mention of periods of the past that are sources of contention. Second, if this is done successfully and the symbolic components of nationhood can be institutionalized in a meaningful way, this process can provide unity and stability, and complement peacebuilding. This is possible as the emotional ties to a common identity can assist in reducing internal tensions where ethnic identities are transcended by the new, national identity.

Claudia Derichs argues, nation-building is pervasive and must underpin other aspects of state life in order to achieve this goal of unity: “it is [...] an extensive process that includes a large number of policy measures and which can come to the fore in quite different policy areas” (2005, p. 46). We see how national identities, histories, and heritages are reflected in the life of the state in certain policy areas and structures. If we recall the core defining tenets of nations – a shared identity, history, heritage, and culture, inclusive of language and religion – then we can more easily identify the policy areas that reflect contemporary imaginings of nationhood. A clear example of this is the official language policy of a new state, enshrined in the Constitution and applied in state structures. The official language of the state is the language used in parliaments, the courts, national media platforms, and by the majority of the population for much of the time (Language can be a primary marker of national identity in some cases, though not all. An interesting case of a nationalist movement that has arguably not considered language to be central is the self-determination movement in occupied Kashmir. Idreas Khandy (2021) argues not only has language not been a marker of nationalism but that contemporary nationalists are bound together despite the multiple languages that are spoken by many Kashmiris based on its unique historical, political, and cultural context.). In those contexts where language does serve as a marker of national identity, it is through exercising linguistic abilities that it is possible to explicitly, publicly make a statement about that identity. The example of Catalonia and its official use of Catalan within the devolved autonomous region in Spain illustrates this well. Unsurprisingly, language policy is also contentious in areas that have experienced colonialism and conflict. Post-independence, postcolonial states must decide whether or not to institutionalize the language of the former colonial oppressor, an indigenous mother tongue, or both, as was the case in Timor-Leste (see Arthur, 2018). In post-conflict Northern Ireland, the Irish Language Act is a source of continued tension as recognition of Irish Gaelic in a region of the UK is a symbolic act that many in the Protestant-Unionist communities have challenged, to the point of collapsing the devolved government (see Mitchell, 2018; Carroll, 2021). In this particular policy area, we see how connected issues of national identity can emerge. Thus the sensitivity that is afforded to institutionalizing symbols is also needed in post-conflict zones that see certain language practices as contentious and symbolic in themselves.

Linked to the policy area of official language is diplomacy and foreign relations. In many post-colonial nation-states, the language of the former colonial oppressor is not discarded but adopted as an official language for the benefits it reaps in international relations. Common language capabilities between states can help facilitate political cooperation and positive diplomatic relations, and in this respect it is possible to see symbolic decisions having strategic and practical motivations. These benefits have been formally recognized by organizations such as the Comunidade dos Países de Língua Portuguesa (CPLP; Community of Portuguese-speaking Countries), the members of which were all former Portuguese colonies. Considered to be an “institutional emanation of the idea of Lusophony” (Mormul, 2020, p. 191), the CPLP brings together states that share in their colonial heritage and which seek to collaborate in the international area. While this organization has been criticized for its primary association with a Luso-African identity, as well as its failure to fully realize the economic potential of cooperation thus far (Mormul, 2020), the CPLP illustrates the practical and indirect outcomes of language policy decisions and the extent to which processes of nation-building do underpin state life, both at national and international levels.

Education is a further, perhaps yet more important policy area that is underpinned by processes of nation-building. Gellner (1982) argues that formal education that was standardized in the post-modern era was one of the primary contributing factors to the emergence of nations. Education is crucial because it not only shapes future generations of the nation, but it sets the standard of accepted “truths” and the way in which it is delivered. As Derichs notes, “a ‘classic’ example of associating nation-building with an important policy area is education policy” (2005, p. 46). The language in which lessons are delivered, the version of history that is printed in school textbooks, and the decision (or not) to teach religion(s) are all reflective of the official national identity narratives that the state promotes and thus the future nation it wishes to see. Educational institutions, defined broadly, can also encompass public museums and heritage sites that present an official, accepted version of the past built into the national landscape. The politicized nature of museums and heritage sites, and the way in which official history narratives reflect contemporary power dynamics is common to states with a history of violence (for example, Cambodia, Vietnam, Northern Ireland, post-apartheid South Africa, post-dictatorship Indonesia, and Spain) and is a further area of state life that must be dealt with sensitively to promote reconciliation, healing, and unity.

To illustrate how political and changeable “official” versions of history can be, there is perhaps no clearer example than the case of the Auschwitz-Birkenau compound in postwar Poland. Following the end of the Second World War, accounts of the atrocities that took place in the camps varied as a result of the changing political leadership. The Communist government in Poland under the former Soviet Union presented history in a way that was sympathetic to the state ideology and Polish nationalism, overlooking the specific targeting of Jews that the camps are now widely associated with (Young 2009, pp. 51–53). Indeed, it was only following the collapse of the Soviet Union that the name of the preserved compound and its museum was changed from “the International Monument to the Victims of Fascism” to its post-Cold War “Monument to the Victims of the Auschwitz Concentration Camp” (Young, 2009, p. 52; Young, 1994). As heritage sites reflect power dynamics and political leaderships across time (see Logan and Reeves, 2009), we see how important history and heritage are to nationalist narratives. An awareness of this dynamic is therefore critical in understanding the politics of fostering unity and allegiance in post-conflict contexts, the role of culture and conflict resolution, and how such narratives can pose challenges to reconciliation and reconstruction processes.

Further scholarly consideration of the importance of nation-building is required if we are to grasp the core challenges to peacebuilding and reconciliation in societies divided by identity. The cultural and symbolic aspects of nation-building are much more than the final touches to post-conflict reconstruction, only added after the important structural and political changes are made. They are fundamental to and interdependent with processes of state-building, since the imaginings of commonality and nationhood are essential to fostering unity and thus stability within the political unit of the state. Moreover, in divided societies and states recovering from internal, ethnic conflict, it is the symbols and elements of nationhood that must be prioritized, precisely for the sensitivity they require and for the fact that they underpin numerous policies and areas of everyday, state life. In attending to these elements of nation-building, post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding processes are more likely to be sustainable and successful in the long term.

Summary

In sum, nation-building is the institutionalization of an official national identity, culture, and heritage of a state. This formalized process of embedding nationhood, identity, and collectivity into state structures is evidenced primarily in cultural artifacts and rituals, such as national flags, constitutions, anthems, and national holidays. However, nationhood is infused into all aspects of social life and state policy in a deliberate effort to instill a sense of belonging and thus loyalty in the state's population. If successful, nation-building can foster this sense of community and with it, significant unity, cohesion, and stability within the state. It is for this reason that nation-building is a crucial aspect of post-conflict reconstruction, albeit one that is often overlooked. Nation-building draws attention to those cultural and identity-focused aspects of social life that can be contentious, and seeks to address the challenges that they raise, particularly in post-colonial and post-ethnic conflict contexts. However, it is precisely in these contexts that nation-building is most complicated and contentious. As we have seen, even when constitutions and anthems are carefully constructed to sensitively deal with past violence, they can be challenged and sources of continued tension between ethnic groups. This is perhaps because the aim of nation-building is to achieve an almost impossible task; to represent the identities and ideals of a multitude of diverse individuals, within one political space. The ongoing, long-term nature of this process, however, requires us to wait to see how successful these attempts have been, and to watch as they evolve and adapt to changing political circumstances.

Cross-References

- ▶ Bosnian Genocide
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Grounded Nationalism
- ▶ Identity and Political Violence
- ▶ Mozambique
- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

References

- Abril, C. R. (2007). Functions of a national anthem in society and education: A sociocultural perspective. Bulletin of the Council for Research in Music Education, 69–87.
- Albertini, M. (2012). Kosovo: An identity between local and global. Ethnopolitics Papers, 15, 1–34.
- Anderson, B. (2006). Imagined communities. London: Verso.
- Andersson, H. (2020). Nature, nationalism and neoliberalism on food packaging: The case of Sweden. Discourse, Context & Media, 34, 1–10.
- Armstrong, J. (1982). Nations before nationalism. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.
- Arthur, C. (2018). From Fretilin to freedom: The evolution of the symbolism of Timor-Leste's national flag. Journal of Southeast Asian Studies, 49(2), 227–249.
- Arthur, C. (2019). Political symbols and national identity in Timor-Leste. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Baltic Insight. (2009, February 23). Bosnia anthem gets lyrics after 10 years. Available at: <https://balkaninsight.com/2009/02/23/bosnia-anthem-gets-lyrics-after-10-years/>. Accessed 10 Feb 2021.
- Baltic Insight. (2008a, June 11). Kosovo approves anthem with no lyrics. Available at: <https://balkaninsight.com/2008/06/11/kosovo-approves-anthem-with-no-lyrics/>. Accessed 10 Feb 2021.
- Baltic Insight. (2008b, June 9). “No Debate” over Kosovo national anthem. Available at: <https://balkaninsight.com/2008/06/09/no-debate-over-kosovo-national-anthem/>. Accessed 10 Feb 2021.
- Billig, M. (1995). Banal nationalism. London: Sage Publication.
- Bogaards, M. (2013). The choice for proportional representation: Electoral system design in peace agreements. Civil Wars, 15(1), 71–87.

- Calhoun, C. (2007). Nations matter: Culture, history and the cosmopolitan dream. London: Routledge.
- Carroll, Rory. (2021, June 14). Irish language row threatens to derail Northern Ireland government. The Guardian. Available at: <https://www.theguardian.com/politics/2021/jun/14/irish-language-row-threatens-to-derail-northern-ireland-government>. Accessed 02 Aug 2021.
- Cohen, A. P. (1985). The symbolic construction of community. London: Routledge.
- Connor, W. (2004). The timelessness of nations. Nations and Nationalism, 10(1–2), 35–47.
- Cosentino, D. (2015). Designing the identity of a new state: Kosovo flag. The Design Journal, 18(4), 607–612.
- Constitutional Assembly of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina. (1994). Constitution of the federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (Official Gazette of the Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina 1/1994).
- Čusto, A. (2018). Bosnia-Herzegovina and the cultural memory of Bleiburg. Croatian Political Science Review, 55(2), 111–130.
- Derichs, C. (2005). Shaping the nation – Ideological aspects of nation-building. In J. Hippler (Ed.), Nation-building: A key concept for peaceful conflict transformation? (pp. 42–54). London: Pluto Press.
- Elgenius, G. (2011). Symbols of nations and nationalism: Celebrating nationhood. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Foucault, M. (1976). The history of sexuality: Volume I, an introduction. London: Penguin Books.
- Gellner, E. (2006). Nations and nationalism (2nd ed.). Oxford: Blackwell Publications.
- Gilboa, A., & Bodner, E. (2009). What are your thoughts when the national anthem is playing? An empirical exploration. Psychology of Music, 37(4), 459–484.
- Governo de Angola. (2021). Símbolos Nacionais. Governo de Angola: Portal oficial do Governo da República de Angola. Available at: <https://governo.gov.ao/ao/angola/simbolos-nacionais>. Accessed 08 Feb 2021.
- Hayward, K., & Komarova, M. (2014). The limits of local accommodation: Why contentious events remain prone to conflict in Northern Ireland. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism, 37(9), 777–791.
- Hobsbawm, E. (1990). Nations and nationalism since 1780. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hobsbawm, E. (2013). Introduction: inventing traditions. In E. Hobsbawm & T. Ranger (Eds.), The invention of tradition (pp. 1–14). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hobsbawm, E., & Ranger, T. (Eds.). (2013). The invention of tradition. Cambridge University Press.
- Hoyo, H. (2010). Posting nationalism: Postage stamps as carriers of nationalist messages. In J. Burbick & W. Glass (Eds.), Beyond imagined uniqueness: Nationalisms in contemporary perspectives (pp. 67–92). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jenkins, R. (2004). Social identity. London: Routledge.
- Khandy, I. (2021). No place for “Kashmiri” in Kashmiri nationalism. Nations and Nationalism, 27(1), 260–278.
- Kovacevic, Danijel. (2018, February 7). Bosnia’s national anthem remains lost for words. Balkan Insight. Available at: <https://balkaninsight.com/2018/02/07/new-attempt-that-bosnia-anthem-gets-lyrics-02-06-2018-2/>. Accessed 10 Feb 2021.
- Lecours, A. (2000). Ethnic and civic nationalism: Towards a new dimension. Space and Polity, 4(2), 153–166.
- Lijphart, A. (1977a). Democracy in plural societies: A comparative exploration. Yale University Press.
- Lijphart, A. (1977b). Majority rule versus democracy in deeply divided societies. Politikon: South African Journal of Political Studies, 4(2), 113–126.
- Lijphart, A. (2012). Patterns of democracy: Government forms and performance in thirty-six countries. Yale University Press.
- Long, C., & Reeves, K. (Eds.). (2009). Places of pain and shame: Dealing with ‘difficult heritage’ (pp. 68–81). London: Routledge.
- McCrone, D., & Bechhofer, F. (2015). Understanding national identity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- McGuinn, B. R. (1991). Ethno-nationalism and international relations in soviet Azerbaijan. Journal of Political Science, 19(1), 69–89.
- Mitchell, David. (2018, October 31). DUP’s red lines are based on a self-destructive Britishness many unionists don’t share. The Conversation. Available at: <https://theconversation.com/dups-red-lines-are-based-on-a-self-destructive-britishness-many-unionists-dont-share-105916>. Accessed 02 Aug 2021.
- Mønnesland, S. (2012). Disputes over national holidays: Bosnia and Herzegovina 2000–2010. In L. Šarić, K. Gammelgaard, & K. R. Hauge (Eds.), Transforming national holidays: Identity discourse in the west and south Slavic countries, 1985–2010 (pp. 251–270). Amsterdam: John Benjamins Publishing Company.
- Mormul, J. (2020). The Community of Portuguese Language Countries (CPLP) and the Luso-African identity. Politeja, 17.5(68), 191–213.
- Nimni, E. (2007). National-cultural autonomy as an alternative to minority territorial nationalism. Ethnopolitics, 6(3), 345–364.
- Oxford English Dictionary (OED). (2020). Available at: <https://www.lexico.com/en/definition/nation>. Accessed 24 Apr 2020.
- Özkirimli, U. (2017). Theories of nationalism: A critical introduction (3rd ed.). London: Red Globe Press.
- Penrose, J. (2011). Designing the nation. Banknotes, banal nationalism and alternative conceptions of the state. Political Geography, 30(8), 429–440.
- Republic of Cyprus. (2021). Presidency: State Symbols. Available at: <https://www.presidency.gov.cy/cypreresidency/cypreresidency.nsf/All/B7AD4D1F2BDB1334C22585D200366A38?OpenDocument&highlight=symbols>. Accessed 22 Mar 2021.
- Republic of Rwanda. (2021). Government of Rwanda: Holidays. Available at: <https://www.gov.rw/holidays>. Accessed 28 Jan 2021.

- República Democrática de Timor-Leste (RDTL). (2007). Constituição República Democrática de Timor-Leste/ Konstituisaun Repúblika Demokrátika Timór-Leste Nian. Dili: Direcção Nacional dos Direitos de Cidadania.
- República Democrática de Timor-Leste (RDTL). (2020). National Holidays in 2020. Government of Timor-Leste. Available at: <http://timor-leste.gov.tl/?p=23415&lang=en>. Accessed 28 Jan 2021.
- República Democrática de Timor-Leste (RDTL). (2021). National Symbols: National Anthem. Government of Timor-Leste. Available at: <http://timor-leste.gov.tl/?p=34&lang=en&lang=en>. Accessed 08 Feb 2021.
- Raento, P., & Brunn, S. D. (2005). Visualizing Finland: Postage stamps as political messengers. Geografiska Annaler: Series B, Human Geography, 87(2), 145–164.
- Ross, M. H. (2000). Creating the conditions for peacemaking: Theories of practice and ethnic conflict resolution. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 23(6), 1002–1034.
- Ross, M. H. (2007). Cultural contestation in ethnic conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Said, E. W. (2000). Invention, memory, and place. Critical Inquiry, 26(2), 175–192.
- Selway, J., & Templeman, K. (2012). The myth of consociationalism? Conflict reduction in divided societies. Comparative Political Studies, 45(12), 1542–1571.
- Smith, L. (2006). Uses of heritage. New York: Routledge.
- Smith, A. D. (2009). Ethnosymbolism and nationalism: A cultural approach. Routledge.
- Smith, A. D. (1991). National identity. Penguin Books.
- Smith, A. D. (2013a). Nationalism and modernism. London: Routledge.
- Smith, A. D. (2013b). Nationalism: Theory, ideology, history (3rd ed.). Polity Press.
- Smith, A. D. (1993). The ethnic sources of nationalism. Survival, 35(1), 48–62.
- Stern, P. C. (1995). Why do people sacrifice for their nations? Political Psychology, 16(2), 217–235.
- Wallis, J. (2014). Constitution making during state building. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Walzer, M. (1967). The facsimile fallacy. American Review of Canadian Studies, 12(2), 82–86.
- Young, J. E. (1994). Texture of memory: Holocaust memorials and meaning. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Young, K. (2009). Auschwitz-Birkeau: The challenges of heritage management following the cold war. In W. Logan & K. Reeves (Eds.), Places of pain and shame: Dealing with 'difficult heritage' (pp. 50–67). London: Routledge.
- Zorbas, E. (2004). Reconciliation in post-genocide Rwanda. African Journal of Legal Studies, 1(1), 29–52.

Post-Conflict Reconstruction

- Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka

Post-Conflict Reconstruction and Development

- Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach

Post-Conflict Recovery

- Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach

Post-Conflict Timor-Leste

Catherine Arthur
Humanitarian and Conflict Response Institute,
University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Colonialism; Conflict; East Timor; Genocide; Military occupation; Peacebuilding; Timor Lorosa'e

Definition

On May 20, 2002, Timor-Leste officially declared independence and was welcomed into the United Nations (UN) as its newest member state. This was a day of widespread national celebration since self-determination had been hard won through much struggle and violence, after centuries of Portuguese colonialism and a brutal, repressive military occupation by Indonesia that lasted for 24 years. This long history of foreign occupation has shaped the culture, identity, and politics of the East Timorese in complex ways, presenting unique challenges to the state in the post-conflict, transitional years.

Timor-Leste: A Brief Historical Overview

The island of Timor is located in the Pacific Ocean between Indonesia and Australia, and the state of Timor-Leste is comprised of the eastern half of the island and the Oecusse enclave in the West (part of Indonesia). Timor-Leste, or East Timor, is mountainous and typically experiences a dry season from May to November, with monsoon season from December to April, giving the region a tropical climate and a terrain characterized by jungles. The population of Timor-Leste is estimated to be 1.4 million, and it is the youngest nation-state of Southeast Asia. Despite its small size, the island of Timor has been of great importance and interest to outside actors for centuries. For this reason, Timor-Leste constitutes a microcosm of complex political issues stemming from its history, shaped by the legacies of colonialism and conflict.

Pre-colonial Timorese society was structured around its various kingdoms, each ruled by a traditional king (liurai) and organized by clan and family ties, ethnicity, and language groups (Kammen 2003, 2010; Hägerdal 2006). The liurais represented the reigning lineage and ruled over the atan (workers or slaves) and the datos (the nobility) (Carneiro de Sousa 2001, p. 187; Butcher et al. 2015). Taylor notes that the “kingdoms were neither unified nor centrifugal combin[ing] loosely-knit localized territorial groups in a general hierarchy of clans” (1991, p. 2). The relationship between the clans, the organization of the kingdom, and social life were all determined by the exchange of luliks (sacred objects) and goods. From the bottom up to the top of the kingdom, tribute was paid and a hierarchical society based on principles of reciprocity functioned. These principles underpinned an East Timorese cosmology, something that has endured to the present day. Indeed, reciprocal binaries are central to contemporary beliefs that universal harmony is dependent on reciprocity, balance, and exchange. Rituals and custom for births, marriages, harvests, and burials all reflect this need for exchange and balance between the realms of the living and the ancestral spirits to maintain cosmological order (e.g., see Trindade 2011, 2015; Traube 1986; Bovensiepen 2009, 2014; Grenfell 2012). Day and night, male and female, and land and sea must all be balanced. Failure to respect this balance through the incorrect performance of rituals is believed to have real negative consequences, for example, illness, death, crop failure, violence, or disaster (Close 2017; Trindade 2011, 2014; McWilliam 2007). Thus, the spiritual realm is perceived as very much related to and influential on the material world, and ritual is the medium through which balance is maintained and respect for ancestral spirits shown. This particular cosmological framing has endured through the centuries, shaping societal relations and order from the pre-colonial to the present day.

Before the arrival of the Dutch and Portuguese colonial powers, the island of Timor was crucial to trading networks in Asia, connecting Southeast Asia with India and China from at least the early C15th, and a valuable source of sandalwood (Taylor 1991; Hägerdal 2007, p. 3). By the early C16th, the Portuguese colonial powers had claimed the eastern half of the island as their own, sending Dominican missionaries first before establishing a mercantile and military presence there. The Dutch colonial powers had occupied Indonesia and the surrounding archipelago, including the western half of the island of Timor. For the following 450 years, the eastern half of the island – Timor-Leste – was ruled by Portugal. The kingdom system still formed the basis of social order and the liurais administered for the colonizers, with good and bad working relationships developing throughout. The approach and attitude toward Timor were common in Portugal’s other colonies; there was the express intention of undermining indigenous identities and eradicating “backward” superstitions; fostering portuguesismo [Portuguese-ism/ization] (Duarte 1988, pp. 36–37); and the complete economic exploitation of the territory, its resources, and people (see Taylor 1999, p. 11). This exploitation was accelerated in the latter part of the colonial era under the Estado Novo of the Salazar dictatorship from 1926, although briefly interrupted during the Japanese occupation of the island during World War II (1941–1943) (see Goto 2003, pp. 24–38).

Interestingly, by the end of the World War II and after the withdrawal of the Japanese, Portuguese Timor remained firmly under colonial rule with no signs of a nationalist, anti-colonial movement developing, unlike other southeast Asian colonial territories that had similarly been occupied by Japan, such as Burma, Malaya, and Indonesia (see Gunn 2001, p. 11). In the post-war period, orders from Portugal for forced labor intensified, as attempts were made to reconstruct the colony in the wake of the destruction left by the Japanese. There was an intensification of the cultivation of cash crops, especially coffee, which is still a major export from Timor-Leste today. Members of the small Timorese educated elite were recruited into the lower echelons of the colonial administration. However, when armed resistance began in Portugal's African colonies, there was no similar movement in Portuguese Timor.

Following the Carnation Revolution and the deposition of the Salazar regime in April 1974, the Portuguese state began a process of decolonization and the East Timorese people began to organize to decide their own future after centuries of foreign rule. While Portugal was resolved to devolve power back to its colonies, the focus of decolonization was primarily centered on the African colonies of Angola and Mozambique. In Timor-Leste, the same process was not implemented or completed; the departure was abrupt, and the unstable political conditions led to internal conflict (CAVR 2005, pp. 13–16; Molnar 2010, pp. 37–42). In the wake of the withdrawal of the colonial administration, a brief and bloody civil war broke out in the summer of 1975 (see Hoadley 1976). The civil war resulted from divisions over the future governance of the nation-state between the two principle political parties, Fretilin (Frente Revolucionária do Timor-Leste Independente) and the UDT (União Democrática Timorense). Fretilin was fundamentally anti-colonial and nationalist, seeking an independent republic free from outside influence. The UDT sought some more executive power but wanted a continued association within a federation with Portugal. A third political party, Apodeti, was in favor of integration into Indonesia, though it was small and had minimal popular support (see Molnar 2010, pp. 37–45).

Fretilin emerged as the victors of the war and formed the first government of an independent Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste (RDTL), declared on November 28, 1975. However, that independence was short-lived; after only a few days Indonesia invaded Timor-Leste in full force. There had been Indonesian incursion troops on the ground as early as September, and by October armed attacks had begun, including the killing of five Australian and New Zealander journalists on the 16th of October, who had filmed the beginning of the invasion. Now known as the “Balibo Five,” they wanted to expose the illegal aggression and violence but were executed before they could smuggle the footage out (see Saul 2009; Jolliffe 2009). The military occupation that ensued lasted for almost a quarter of a century, until September 1999. Indigenous languages, culture, and custom had been outlawed; Indonesian law, specifically the Pancasila policy, and education were enforced; and the express intention was for the East Timorese population to either conform or be eradicated. In the face of this repression and violence, the East Timorese people who had previously been divided along the partisan lines of the civil war united in resistance to the common enemy of Indonesia. The resistance movement was comprised of different wings: the armed wing, the Falintil (Forças Armadas de Libertação Nacional de Timor-Leste); the clandestine wing, comprised of much of the civilian population, who fed and sheltered the Falintil guerrillas; the youth and student movement; the active diaspora community, who lobbied abroad in Portugal and Australia; and the political leadership, Fretilin (see Pouyé 2005; Cabral and Martin-Jones 2008; Ramos-Horta 1987; Pinto and Jardine 1997a, b).

The indiscriminate violence and repression perpetrated by the Suharto regime during this period resulted in mass human rights violations, forced displacement and starvation, and genocide (CAVR 2005, pp. 146–148; Dunn 2012; Kiernan 2002 and 2017). The final figures of lives lost are contested, and many families are still in search of the disappeared and remains of missing loved ones (see Kinsella and Blau 2013; Kent 2016). However, the final report from the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (CAVR) conducted in Timor-Leste in the transitional years following the occupation states that the Indonesian military forces were responsible for the deaths of at least 180,000 East Timorese (CAVR 2005, p. 146); in other words, about one quarter of the population at the time. Accounts and testimonies have been extensively documented by CAVR, established in 2001 under the UN Transitional Administration of East Timor (UNTAET), as well as by numerous scholars, activists, and lobbyists for independence (e.g., see Pilger and Munro 1994; Jardine 1999; Hainsworth and McCloskey 2000; Jolliffe 2009; Robinson 2009).

After 24 years of resistance and struggle, the East Timorese people were finally given a referendum on independence on September 30, 1999, under the auspices of the UN. Despite significant intimidation and aggression from the Indonesian troops and militias on the ground, an overwhelming majority of East Timorese (78.5%) went to the polls and voted in favor of independence. Indonesia conceded and withdrew from the island, though not before completing “Operation Clean Sweep,” a scorched earth pogrom designed to devastate the infrastructure, the people, and the land (Chawla 2001, p. 2293). Street-by-street arson attacks left 95% of buildings, homes, and roads in rubble, and within days of the ballot, around 70% of the country’s physical infrastructure had been destroyed (Chopra 2000, p. 27). Consequently, the task of rebuilding and restoring the independent nation-state was challenging, even with the assistance of numerous UN peacebuilding and state-building missions, international donors, and aid agencies. Nevertheless, Timor-Leste officially regained its independence on May 20, 2002, joining the UN as a member state and finally enjoying the self-determination that had been denied for centuries.

Legacies of Colonialism and Conflict

As a result of its long history of foreign influence and occupation, the modern nation-state of Timor-Leste continues to deal with enduring legacies of colonialism and conflict. This is evidenced in the very ways in which the nation defines its history, heritage, and an East Timorese identity. Popular and state narratives of the history of island are characterized by an “insider-outsider” binary, primarily in relation to foreign occupying powers. Precolonial histories are rooted in tales of ancestors and the ancient kingdoms, though there is little documentation from this period (Babo-Soares 2003, p. 57). From the first encounters with the European colonial powers through the centuries of Portuguese rule, histories are typified by the ‘occupied-occupier’ dichotomy. The distinction between the foreign Other and the East Timorese was amplified under the Indonesian occupation, when the occupied East Timorese were the “rain-nian” (owners of the land) and the oppressed, and Indonesia constituted the violent, foreign oppressor (Babo-Soares 2003, p. 264).

Articulating history in this binary way, centered round the Timor oan (people of Timor) and outside occupation and interference, has contributed to the defining of a contemporary national identity. “East Timorese-ness” is defined as the capacity of the people to endure extreme hardship, suffering, and sacrifice (terus) in the long struggle (funu) for self-determination and freedom from foreign influence (see Arthur 2019). This identity is imagined to be as old as the struggle itself, which united the nation through the long colonial period, referred to as the “500-year funu” (Gunn 2001, p. 3), intensified under Indonesian rule. In the post-independence state, the fight against foreign occupation is over, and the struggle is now believed to be one against poverty and the socio-economic and political challenges of the modern world (Arthur 2019, pp. 171–172). Thus, both colonialism and conflict have shaped the very core of an East Timorese identity, even to their representation in the national flag (see Arthur 2016, 2019, pp. 37–69). It is perhaps not surprising that such an identity is profoundly felt and resonates so strongly with the vast majority of the population, since the legacies of both are still very much in evidence in everyday social and political life.

Language: Portuguese

The legacies of Portuguese colonialism are perhaps most clearly manifest in the use of language and practice of faith. Portuguese is enshrined in the Constitution as one of the official state languages of Timor-Leste, alongside the indigenous lingua franca, Tetun (RDTL 2007, Article 13.1). It is the language of parliament, of the law, and it is taught to school children from an early age. Despite the apparent connotations of the language with a former colonial oppressor, there are several significant and symbolic reasons for the new state to privilege cultural ties to Portugal in the post-independence state. Indeed, it was influential in shaping East Timorese nationalism during the Indonesian occupation. Even though it was the language of a foreign occupier, the Portuguese language and culture that had been imposed on Timor-Leste for centuries suddenly became strategically used to differentiate the East Timorese from the Indonesian occupiers.

First, it was a practical way of communicating secretly in a language that was not widely understood by the Indonesian military who policed and patrolled the half island. Second, Portuguese and indigenous language were outlawed under Indonesian rule, and so its use was a symbolic and practical form of resistance (Leach 2017, p. 91). Third, embracing Portuguese was simultaneously a rejection of Indonesia in terms of national identity and culture. This was key because the Suharto regime's argument for integration was founded on assumption that Timorese and Indonesians belonged to the same nation and were "brothers," separated by the European colonizers (Robinson 2009, p. 46; Leach 2017, pp. 87–88; Hull 1999; Gunn 2001). Reacting against this, the leadership of the resistance movement embraced their Portuguese heritage and incorporated into notions of "East Timorese-ness," arguing that their unique history, including experiences of Portuguese colonialism, was proof that Timor-Leste was a distinct nation with the right to self-determination.

The extent to which this strategic embracing of Portuguese was incorporated into East Timorese imaginings of nationhood is evidenced in its persistence in the post-independence state. Not only did it have historic practical value but Portuguese has now gained some symbolic value and is esteemed by the state. The Constitution stipulates that "The Democratic Republic of East Timor shall maintain privileged ties with the countries whose official language is Portuguese" (RDTL 2007, Article 8.3). Common experiences of colonialism and cultural heritage contribute toward this privileging of Lusophone states, as well as shared contemporary political interests. This symbolic valorization of Portuguese has also been advantageous for the young nation-state as it establishes itself in the international community. The Community of Portuguese Language Countries (CPLP) is a collective of Lusophone states, founded in 1996 and consisting of Portugal and its former colonies. It was established with the aim of promoting collaboration in the areas of economics, education, health, and scientific research; defense; culture, sports, and media; and diplomatic relations (CPLP 2020). Timor-Leste joined in 2002 when it gained independence and the benefits of such collaboration are significant for a young nation-state that is still recovering from the devastation left by the Indonesian occupation. A further key objective of the CPLP is also to promote and disseminate the Portuguese language across the world; this in itself is perhaps representative of the role that this cultural legacy of colonialism has been given in East Timorese society. Once used as a force of control and a marker of European "superiority," the Portuguese language has now been strategically appropriated by the East Timorese nation and utilized to its benefit as a tool in the continued national "struggle" that is now against poverty and toward development.

Religion: Roman Catholicism

A further prominent legacy of colonialism in Timor-Leste is the widespread adherence to the Roman Catholic faith, initially brought to the island by Portuguese Dominican friars in the early sixteenth century. 97.6% of the population of Timor-Leste identify as Catholics (IndexMundi 2020), and the faith has become fused with an indigenous belief in ancestral spirits and cosmology (Bovensiepen 2009). Though Catholicism was originally associated directly with the former colonizers, over the centuries it has come to coexist with East Timorese animist beliefs and is now considered to be an integral part of a national identity. Similar to the Portuguese language, the Catholic faith only gained real significance in uniting the nation during the Indonesian occupation, and it is because of this role that is considered to be so important today.

In the 1970s, the number of East Timorese who practiced the faith was relatively low. In the final years of the Portuguese administration, around one quarter of the population identified as Catholic. This number grew exponentially following the Indonesian invasion, from 27.8% to 90% in 1999 when the UN stepped in (Simonsen 2006, p. 557). The exceptionally high conversion rates under the Indonesian occupation can be explained in several ways. First, the Christian religion was an important signifier of difference between the occupied and the Muslim Indonesian occupier and underlined the strategic connection to their Portuguese heritage (Carey 1999, p. 87). This was a crucial way to undermine Suharto's argument that Timor belonged to Indonesia and shared the same heritage, while still obeying to the law of Pancasila that stipulated that all citizens must adhere to a monotheistic faith (see Weatherbee 1984; Arthur 2019, pp. 80–86). Second, the Catholic Church offered substantial practical support to the resistance movement in occupied East Timor, providing food, shelter, information for guerrillas and civilians, and vital medicines (Hodge 2013, pp. 151–157). Third, the emotional and spiritual support that the East Timorese people found in the Catholic Church throughout the occupation was a powerful motivator to continue to resist and gave much solace and comfort to the suffering (Hodge 2013, p. 159). In the later years of the occupation, the Catholic Church showed some solidarity with the resistance movement and the cause of self-determination when Pope John Paul II visited the half island in 1989. To a majority Catholic population, this visit was highly significant and gave much moral support and hope to those who had felt like the outside world had forgotten them (see Kohen 2001; Arthur 2019, pp. 86–89). Following his visit, the Pope received reports of the violence that continued at the hands of the Indonesian military and the Vatican's stance toward Indonesia hardened further. Strong statements of condemnation were issued that helped to raise awareness of the situation and consolidate support for the independence movement around the world (Kohen 2001, p. 50).

As a result of its role in aiding the resisting East Timorese nation, the Catholic Church has been specially acknowledged in the Constitution of Timor-Leste, which “values the participation of the Catholic Church in the process of national liberation” (RDTL 2007, Article 11.2). The preamble pays specific homage to the Church and highlights the suffering that was endured with the people throughout the occupation: “In its cultural and humane perspective, the Catholic Church in East Timor has always been able to take on the suffering of all the People with dignity, placing itself on their side in the defense of their most fundamental rights” (RDTL 2007, p. viii). When we consider that East Timorese nationalism is founded on the concepts of struggle and suffering in the name of independence, it becomes clear why the Catholic faith has become so integral to identity and societal life in the post-independence state. Both religion and language were two of the primary cultural legacies of Portuguese colonialism that have endured through the centuries but which have become “Timor-ised,” incorporated into an indigenous culture and identity and now rendered fundamental. This was articulated succinctly by former President and then Fretilin representative to the UN during the occupation, José Ramos-Horta: “If you take away Portuguese language and religion, there is no such thing as East Timor” (cited in Leach 2017, p. 87).

Legacies of Conflict

Timor-Leste's transition from a state of conflict to peace has been far from smooth, and the effects of the conflict are still keenly felt in East Timorese society today. As the Indonesian military left and the UN peacekeepers arrived in September 1999, there was indiscriminate violence and destruction perpetrated in retribution for the pro-independence vote, including killings and forced displacements of civilians and attacks on UN staff on the ground (see Robinson 2001; Tanter et al. 2001; Bartu 2001). Once the violence had subsided, the UN's peacebuilding and state-building missions began in earnest. The missions that were undertaken in Timor-Leste from 1999 until the UN's departure in 2012 were the United Nations Assistance Mission in East Timor (UNAMET); United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISSET); United Nations Office in Timor-Leste (UNOTIL); and the United Nations Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT).

Peacebuilding and the UN

Peacebuilding under the UN is deemed to have been largely successful, however, not without serious challenges posed by a typically Western approach. This approach was incompatible and inappropriate within the cultural context of Timor-Leste for numerous reasons and resulted in limited trust and confidence from the East Timorese people in the initial years. In particular the UNTAET mission, which was established in October 1999 to administer the state and assist in the transition to full self-determination, was widely criticized for adopting a “one size fits all” approach to peacebuilding and disregarding the existing social structures, cultural associations, and indigenous values (DeShaw Rae 2009, p. 119). There was a lack of knowledge of local languages and culture; this was very problematic when communicating and “teaching” foreign Western concepts such as democracy, human rights, women’s rights, and development to a population that had limited experience of democratic self-rule (Molnar 2006, p. 346; Hohe 2002). Frustrations in this area were compounded by the UN staff’s lack of knowledge of traditional gender norms and roles, rooted in pre-colonial cosmology and custom. Without a firm understanding of the cultural context and tradition, the implementation of a Western-style system of governance, with little consultation from the population or leadership, staff also demonstrated a lack of respect for traditional authority figures and structures (liurais and village elders), both spiritual and secular. Considering the recent context of the occupation, this was a catastrophic move; under Indonesia, tradition and custom were outlawed, and sacred ritual objects and buildings were violently destroyed by the military (see McWilliam 2005). The withdrawal of Indonesia from the territory thus signaled the return of the East Timorese way of life, its valued traditions, and the freedom to embrace and practice their customs once more. By undermining and thus indirectly delegitimizing the respected traditional leaders and beliefs, the UN’s actions cast doubt over this freedom and added to the mistrust felt by the East Timorese people, adding to the challenges of peacebuilding (Morison 2010, pp. 180–183).

One area of governance that proved to be particularly challenging to implement but which the UN addressed by engaging with the local population was justice. From its inception, there was wide mistrust in not only the UN but the institutions it sought to establish and the bureaucracy they brought. Consequently, the East Timorese people turned to their existing traditional justice and reconciliation methods that had been practiced for centuries and which retained greater popular legitimacy. One such practice is Nahe Biti, “unrolling the mat,” which is a customary method of resolving local level disputes, presided over by a village elder. In a Nahe Biti hearing, the disputing parties are brought together to present their cases to the elder and the local community. Judgment is passed by the elder, and a penalty is issued, and the process is concluded by ritual sharing of drinks and food (Mac Ginty 2008, pp. 153–154; Mac Ginty 2010, p. 404; Close 2017). Due to the cultural significance and legitimacy that this practice had for the East Timorese people and as a result of the numbers of people who turned to more traditional means of resolving local level minor legal issues, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission incorporated it into its methods in 2002. This was intended partly to reduce the volume of smaller cases that the judiciary had to deal with but also to improve popular engagement with the Commission (Mac Ginty 2010, p. 404). This proved to be successful and presents a clear example of the need for local participation in peacebuilding, as well as the criticality of knowledge of the cultural context in which international peacebuilders operate to their success (see Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). Nahe Biti has since been adopted at a national level to deal with much larger disputes, such as the 2006 Crisis that saw widespread violence, looting, and riots across the country (see Close 2017, pp. 138–139).

The 2006 Crisis

One of the most significant challenges to peacebuilding and post-conflict reconstruction in Timor-Leste was the now infamous “2006 Crisis.” This was the worst period of violence that the nation-state had experienced since the withdrawal of Indonesia and saw 38 people killed and over 100,000 people displaced (Arthur 2019, p. 23; Scambary 2009; Van der Auweraert 2012). The crisis began within the national army; there had been perceived discrimination within the ranks in terms of promotion and opportunities felt by soldiers from the western regions of the country and their frustrations led to a strike. The state responded poorly, with much tension between the then Fretilin government and President Xanana Gusmão, and the strike ended with hundreds of the petitioning soldiers dismissed. This sparked outrage and a group of soldiers known as “the Petitioners” instigated widespread civil unrest and violence. The crisis constituted a period of intense political instability, with assassination attempts on the lives of both the President and Prime Minister, and was resolved in 2008 after, and Australian peacekeeping troops had been deployed (Arthur 2019, p. 213; Goldsmith 2009; Anderson 2006).

The root causes of the 2006 Crisis are arguably manifold but the origins in the perceived discrimination along regional lines, between western and eastern region soldiers, are to be found in the post-independence state’s valorization of the resistance movement and the struggle against Indonesia. As explored below, social prestige is given to those East Timorese who are believed to have contributed the most to the independence struggle. In the build up to the crisis, there was an assumption that those from the eastern regions of Timor-Leste had been more directly involved in the struggle, whereas the western regions had produced fewer veterans. As such, the perceived discrimination came from a sense that the soldiers from the east of the country were privileged and afforded better employment conditions and opportunities than those from the west. The 2006 Crisis is one extreme example of how this state valorization of the national liberation struggle has contributed to the complex social and political relations of the post-independence state and which has ironically caused much division therein.

Internal Fractures: Valorizing the Resistance

Following the official declaration of independence in May 2002, processes of state- and nation-building, governance, and transition to a state of peace began in earnest and were faced with the task of tackling the legacies of the conflict. These were many and manifold: in the absence of a common enemy, different experiences of the recent conflict created divisions across East Timorese society, largely centered round notions of victimhood and honor for veterans. Due to the very recent nature of the Indonesian occupation, the new nation-state was founded on and sustained a social hierarchy that honored the resistance movement and its leadership above all else, specifically the Fretilin party and the Falintil veterans, for their role in leading the national liberation movement (see Leach 2002; Hill 2002, pp. 61–92).

The respect for the resistance movement has been institutionalized, enshrined in the Constitution, and is widely supported by the vast majority of the population. There have been both symbolic and material payments of respect. For Fretilin, respect is shown in the ballot box, and the party has enjoyed electoral success as either the government or the influential main opposition party (King 2003). Falintil veterans have been honored with their own government advisory body, the Council of National Liberation Combatants, and national holidays. These holidays include Falintil Day (August 20), National Veterans Day (March 3), Memory Day (December 7), and the Nicolau Lobato National Holiday (December 31, which commemorates the death of the first President of Timor-Leste (during the brief independent period of 1975) and the first leader of the Falintil (Leach 2017, pp. 212–213). In practical terms, veterans have received pensions as payment for their service to the nation. The veteran’s payment scheme has been highly controversial because of the initially narrow definition of “veteran” (female guerrillas and members of the clandestine resistance wing were excluded) and the vast amounts that were being paid to a select few in a country suffering economically following the conflict (Niner 2013; Kent and Kinsella 2015; Kent and Wallis 2014; Wallis 2015; Roll 2018). The pensions were far above the average wage and other social security benefits, contributing to both an economic divide and an atmosphere of discontent that some contributions to the struggle were valued over others.

Victim's Organizations

The exclusive definition of who is deserving of honor and respect has sparked divisions for reasons other than the material compensation for sacrifice. Since 2002, numerous victims' groups, such as the 12 November Committee, Novi Novi, Mate Restu, Rate Laek, and the Association of Ex-Prisoners (ASSEPOL), have organized and lobbied the government for recognition (Arthur 2019, p. 94). The victims' groups are largely constituted of the families of those who died or were disappeared under the occupation and argue that victims of violence made the ultimate sacrifice for the nation and should be recognized as such. Their lobbying has resulted in two significant developments and limited success: the Santa Cruz Massacre monument and a proposed reparations law. The 12 November Committee successfully lobbied the government to build a commemorative monument to the Santa Cruz massacre, one of the worst of the Indonesian occupation and a turning point in the liberation struggle (see Arthur 2019, pp. 94–97; Blau and Fondebrider 2010). However, a full decade had passed from the initial petition for recognition and the final unveiling of the monument, suggesting that commemorations of victimhood have not been prioritized by the state. The reparations law proposed by victims' groups seeks financial compensation for the victims of human rights abuses under the occupation and has been repeatedly rebutted by parliament (Leach 2017, p. 212). This is perhaps due to the fact that the majority of the population would be able to claim compensation under this legislation, practically impossible for a state with a limited budget and challenging reconstruction project. Recommendations for symbolic recognition in place of remuneration have been made (ICTJ 2010); however these are also yet to be formally considered by the government (Harson 2014).

Women and Conflict

Women's experiences of the conflict in Timor-Leste have been somewhat marginalized and overshadowed by men. This is typical of many (post-)conflict zones, and the issue is further compounded in an East Timorese context, where custom and tradition dictate social order and are based on traditional gender norms that privilege men (Niner 2011). As such, women have experienced the post-independence years differently and continue to deal with the legacies of the conflict in a personal capacity, in addition to the wider implication for East Timorese society as a whole.

During the Indonesian occupation, women were both victims of violence and heroes of the resistance movement, though there is yet to be full state acknowledgment of this fact. Throughout the 24 years of violence, an unknown number of women were raped, tortured, and coerced into long-term sexual relationships with members of the Indonesian military. Rape was used by the Indonesian military as a strategic weapon of war; it was used as an interrogation technique and to "breed more Indonesians" within the occupied territory but also as a "reward" for soldiers to boost morale (Mason 2005, p. 744). Of the hundreds of reported cases of sexual violence, 26% were instances of what it referred to as "sexual slavery" (CAVR 2005, p. 116). CAVR's report found that women and young teenagers were coerced into a number of different kinds of relationships that constituted sexual slavery. In some cases, a military officer lived with a woman and her family, or the woman was held in a house rented by the military. In others, women were detained in military bases where they were treated as the sexual property of a number of men. In a traditionally conservative and patriarchal society, where a woman's virtue is a large part of her value, to be raped was a source of immense shame for both the woman and her family. Consequently, many women kept their violations secret and never spoke out about sexual violence against them, for fear of being ostracized (Mason 2005; Niner, pp. 424–425). Such fears are not unfounded; many women who spoke out or who had children conceived in sexual violence were disowned by their families and communities because of the shame (Kent 2016, pp. 39–42).

The Truth and Reconciliation Commission in Timor-Leste gave special mention to the experiences of women and their need for dedicated attention because of the violence perpetrated against them. It highlighted that women who had been violated experienced strong symptoms of trauma and recommended and conducted “healing workshops” with victims (CAVR 2005, pp. 40–41). In a Catholic society that traditionally views sex and a woman’s chastity to be taboo, this recognition was not inconsequential. However, since the Commission ended, its liberal human rights discourse has been overtaken by a more traditional, conservative, and nationalist narrative that has reverted to and consolidated male-based traditional structures (Kent 2016, p. 40; Niner 2011).

During the conflict, women were not just victims of violence but perpetrators of it as well. During the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste, women had active roles in the resistance movement, both fitting with and challenging traditional gender roles. They were tasked with mending uniforms; cooking and preparing the guerrilla army’s food; passing messages to the Clandestine front; taking care of war orphans and running crèches; establishing and running literacy campaigns, health, and welfare programs; and defending their country with arms. Though downplayed, the armed participation of women in the struggle was significant, and their numbers were many; along the Indonesian border, there was a women’s military unit of over 100 (Franks 1996, p. 158; Hill 1978). Female combatants of the Falintil and resistance movement were critical to its ultimate success, and yet there is still no formal government policy on recognition of their services. A separate women’s policy would be required since they do not qualify for the existing veteran’s pension scheme (Cavanough 2018). In addition to the symbolic importance of such a policy, the financial compensation would afford many women economic independence and empowerment, no small feat in a society where inequality and lack of opportunity is highly gendered.

Following the occupation and the return to indigenous traditions and customs that had been outlawed by Suharto, there has been a notable trend of East Timorese women occupying subservient positions in family and society under the prevalence of more traditionally patriarchal gender roles and norms (Niner 2011). There is evidence to suggest that this is the case; however, there is evidence of the gains made for gender equality and women’s empowerment. In the post-independence years, young girls’ attendance and participation in school have steadily increased, with particular progress made following the 2010 government initiative to address the gender gap in education (Pekular 2019). Notably, women’s participation and representation in national and local politics and civil society have increased dramatically in the post-conflict state and offers positive signs for gender equity in the country (Wigglesworth 2012; Wigglesworth 2013; Niner 2017; Trembath and Grenfell 2007; Wigglesworth, 2010).

Generational Divisions

Recognition and recompense are highly significant sources of social divisions, disaffection with the government, and instability in the new nation-state. Compounded by the cultural legacies of colonialism, issues of recognition have also contributed to social divisions along generational lines in the post-independence state. In the years following 2002, distinctions between three main generational groups emerged; the “Generation of ‘75””; the Geração Foun (the “new” generation); and the “Independence Generation” (Arthur 2016, p. 176; Ramos-Gonçalves, 2012, p. 4). Generational differences and groupings are based on differences of education; cultural-linguistic backgrounds; and recognized contributions to the liberation struggle.

The “Generation of ‘75,” raised under Portuguese colonialism, has been privileged as a result of its leadership of the national liberation struggle from Indonesia and has subsequently held positions of state leadership since 2002. This older generation has institutionalized its Lusophone heritage and monopolized nation-building, constructing ideas of “true” East Timorese-ness based on their own identity, including the Portuguese language. The younger Geração Foun (the “new generation”), who grew up under Indonesia, have consequently been marginalized. Their cultural-linguistic and educational background is seen to delegitimize their membership in the nation (90% of this group speak Bahasa Indonesia and less than 3% claimed fluency in Portuguese in the initial independence years) (Leach 2003, p. 144), and their contributions to the liberation struggle have been overlooked. Numerous youth and student organizations that contributed greatly to the wider and external efforts of the resistance movements, such as RENETIL (Resistência Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste), OPJLATIL (Organizasaun Popular da Joventude Louriku Assuain de Timor Leste), and the LEP (Liga dos Estudantes Patriotas) (see Fox and Babo Soares 2000, p. 63), are not afforded the same respect and honor, either symbolically or materially, as the Falintil veterans. The negative outcomes of the generational divide include high youth unemployment; underrepresentation in national politics; cultural alienation; increased participation in martial arts groups and gangs; and waves of emigration.

Since 2002, many thousands of East Timorese have migrated for work as a result of limited prospects at home and the majority of them belong to the Geração Foun. Significantly, these younger East Timorese have migrated in part because of the cultural alienation from the nation-state but also because of encouragement from the government through labor migration schemes outlined in the National Employment Strategy (RDTL 2017, pp. 116–130). The migration destinations specified by the government are primarily members of the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), with many living and working (temporarily and permanently) in South Korea, Indonesia, and Australia (Wigglesworth and Fonseca 2016; Wigglesworth and dos Santos 2018). Additionally, an estimated 16–19,000 East Timorese have migrated to the UK as EU citizens, travelling on Portuguese passports (Wigglesworth 2016; Wigglesworth and Boxer 2017, 2019; Peake 2013). Many work to earn money to send home – their contributions to the nation-building project and new struggle against poverty – and believe that their sojourn in the UK is temporary until they can return home.

Contemporary National Politics in Timor-Leste

East Timorese national politics is often lively and unpredictable; there have been nine governments since independence was declared in 2002, including numerous coalitions; the 2006 national crisis that threatened the state leadership itself; corruption scandals and accusations of nepotism that go to the very top of government itself (see Gunn 2010; Shoesmith 2011; Niner 2016); and tensions with neighboring Australia over espionage claims and rights to the lucrative oil and gas reserves, legally belonging to Timor-Leste and much needed to bolster its economy. Personality clashes have led to emergency elections and cross-party alliances between the most unexpected bedfellows, with the most recent parliamentary crisis put on hold only to respond to the global pandemic, COVID19 (Leach 2020). Yet personal clashes are not the sole source of political drama, and, similar to other aspects of social life in Timor-Leste, the present is very much guided and influenced by the past.

The dominance of the independence struggle from Indonesia in East Timorese society is in part due to the recent nature of the conflict and the fact that the violence is very much retained within living memory for many. The fact that the struggle and resistance movement have been enshrined within the nation-state has enabled former resistance leaders to dominate national politics since 2002 and ensures their positions of leadership in the future (Arthur 2019, pp. 137–138). Although there are over 25 political parties in Timor-Leste’s young and lively democracy, it is common for parties to be either led by a former resistance leader (and campaign on that platform) or to make some symbolic connection to the struggle (Arthur 2019, pp. 171–202).

State commemoration and valorization of the liberation struggle have been conducted in such a way as to enable a monopolization of nation-building to legitimize the continued leadership of a select few in the post-independence state (Leach 2002). These individuals had prominent roles in the liberation struggle, either in Fretilin and the first government of 1975 or in the Falintil. Key figures include José Ramos-Horta (founding member of Fretilin, the East Timorese Foreign Minister during the occupation, Prime Minister 2006–2007, and President 2007–2012); Mari Alkatiri (founding member of Fretilin and its Minister for Political Affairs in 1975, the current Secretary General of the party, and Prime Minister 2002–2006, 2017–2018); José Maria Vasconcelos aka Taur Matan Ruak (former Commander of the Falintil, President 2012–2017, and Prime Minister 2018–2020); Francisco “Lu Olo” Guterres (former Falintil guerrilla, President of the Fretilin party, President of the National Parliament 2002–2007, and President of the state 2017–2020); and Kay Rala Xanana Gusmão (Commander in Chief of the Falintil, President of Timor-Leste from 2002–2007, and Prime Minister from 2007–2015). Gusmão, an undisputed national hero figure (Arthur 2019, pp. 137–168), officially retired from politics in 2015 but has lingered in an advisory capacity and indirectly through his political party, the CNRT, and may even return as PM in 2020 (Leach 2020). A cult of personality, or personality politics, has consequently typified East Timorese politics since the return to independence (McWilliam and Bexley 2008, p. 69; da Silva 2008).

Yet in recent years, there has been some shift in the power dynamics of electoral politics and popularity. In response to the pervasive generation gap and the frustration of younger East Timorese with the dominance of the older “Generation of ‘75,” there has been increasing popular support and votes for younger candidates. In particular, KHUNTO (Kmanek Haburas Unidade Nasional Timor Oan) has gone from very modest beginnings in 2011 to becoming a significant political player in a short time. In the 2012 parliamentary elections, the party won only 2.9% of the vote; however, in 2017, its vote share increased and KHUNTO won five seats in parliament (Aspinall and Scambary 2017). This gain affords the party relatively significant influence as a key faction of the coalition government in a parliament where obtaining a majority has proven to be challenging in recent years (Leach 2020). KHUNTO is unique in that it has no ties to former resistance leaders and is led by younger East Timorese, running on a platform that combines indigenous tradition and spirituality with an independent voice that criticizes corruption and nepotism of the older generation’s parties (Aspinall and Scambary 2017). The party’s recent increase in popular support is not enough to rival the more established parties led by key figures such as Gusmão, Alkatiri, and Taur Matan Ruak, but it is enough to suggest that change is possible and that, in a generation’s time, East Timorese politics could be very different.

Cross-References

- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Grounded Nationalism
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Post-Conflict Elections
- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions
- ▶ Youth and Peacebuilding

References

- Anderson, T. (2006). Timor Leste: The second Australian intervention. Journal of Australian Political Economy, The, 58, 62–93.
- Arthur, C. (2016). Painting their past: The Geração Foun, street art and representing notions of “East Timorese-ness”. Sojourn: Journal of Social Issues in Southeast Asia, 31(1), 173–206.
- Arthur, C. (2019). Political symbols and national identity in Timor-Leste. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Aspinall, E., & Scambary, J. (2017, November 3). Fighting corruption with spiritual power in East Timor. New Mandala. <https://www.newmandala.org/fighting-corruption-spiritual-power-east-timor/>. Accessed 12 Apr 2020.
- Babo Soares, D. (2003). Branching from the trunk: East Timorese perceptions of nationalism in transition. (Doctoral thesis submitted to the Australian National University).
- Bartu, P. (2001). The Militia, the Military, and the People of Bobonaro. In R. Tanter, M. Selden, & S. R. Shalom

- (Eds.), Bitter flowers, sweet flowers: East Timor, Indonesia and the world community (pp. 73–90). Sydney: Pluto Press.
- Blau, S., & Fondebrider, L. (2010). Dying for independence: Proactive investigations into the 12 November 1991 Santa Cruz massacre, Timor Leste. The International Journal for Human Rights, 15, 1–26.
- Bovensiepen, J. (2009). Spiritual landscapes of life and death in the central highlands of East Timor. Anthropological Forum, 19(3), 323–338.
- Bovensiepen, J. (2014). Paying for the dead: On the politics of death in independent Timor-Leste. The Asia Pacific Journal of Anthropology, 15(2), 103–122.
- Butcher, J., et al. (2015). Chapter two: Timor-Leste. In Timor-Leste: Transforming education through partnership in a small post-conflict state (pp. 9–22). Rotterdam: Sense Publishers.
- Cabral, E. & Martin-Jones, M. (2008). Writing the resistance: Literacy in East Timor 1975–1999. International Journal of Bilingual Education and Bilingualism, 11(2), 149–169.
- Carey, P. (1999). The Catholic Church, religious revival and the nationalist movement in East Timor, 1975–98. Indonesia and the Malay World, 27(78), 77–95.
- Carneiro de Sousa, I. (2001). The Portuguese colonization and the problem of East Timorese Nationalism. Lusotopie, 426, 183–194.
- Cavanough, E. (2018, May 16). Timor-Leste's forgotten female rebels: Will women's role in Timor-Leste's fight for independence ever be truly recognized? The Diplomat. <https://thediplomat.com/2018/05/timor-lestes-for-gotten-female-rebels/>. Accessed 13 Apr 2020.
- Chawla, S. (2001). Shaping East Timor: A dimension of United Nations peacekeeping. Strategic Analysis, 24(12), 2291–2303.
- Chopra, J. (2000). The UN's Kingdom of East Timor. Survival, 42(3), 27–39.
- Chopra, J. (2002). Building state failure in East Timor. Development and Change, 33(5), 979–1000.
- Close, S. (2017). Indigenous east-Timorese practices of building and sustaining peace. In H. Devere, K. Te Maihãroa, & J. P. Synott (Eds.), Peacebuilding and the rights of indigenous peoples (pp. 131–142). Cham: Springer.
- Comissão de Acolhimento Verdade e Reconciliação (CAVR). (2005). Chega! The report of the Commission for Reception Truth and Reconciliation in Timor Leste Executive Summary. Dili: CAVR. <https://www.etan.org/news/2006/cavr.htm>. Accessed 09 Mar 2020.
- Comunidade dos Países de Língua Portuguesa (CPLP). Organization. <https://www.cplp.org/id-2595.aspx>. Accessed 02 Apr 2020.
- Da Silva, K. (2008). Reciprocity, recognition and suffering: Political mobilizers in independent East Timor. Vibrant, 5(2), 156–178.
- Duarte, J. B. (1988). Timor-um grito. Odivelas: Pentaedro Publicidade e Artes Gráficas Ltda.
- Dunn, J. (2012). Genocide in East Timor. In S. Totten & W. Parsons (Eds.), Centuries of genocide: Essays and eye-witness accounts (pp. 293–330). London: Routledge.
- Fox, J., & Soares, D. B. (Eds.). (2000). Out of the ashes: Destruction and reconstruction of East Timor. Goolwa, SA: Crawford House Publishing.
- Franks, E. (1996). Women and resistance in East Timor: The centre, as they say, knows itself by the margins. Women's Studies International Forum, 19(1–2), 155–168.
- Goldsmith, A. (2009). “It wasn't like normal policing”: Voices of Australian police peacekeepers in operation serene, Timor-Leste 2006. Policing and Society, 19(2), 119–133.
- Goto, K. (2003). Tensions of Empire – Japan and South-east Asia in the Colonial and Post-Colonial World. Singapore: Singapore University Press.
- Grenfell, D. (2012). Remembering the dead from the customary to the Modern in Timor-Leste. Local-Global: Identity, Security, Community, 11, 86–108.
- Gunn, G. C. (2001). The five-hundred-year Timorese Funu. In R. Tanter, M. Selden, & S. R. Shalom (Eds.), Bitter flowers, sweet flowers: East Timor, Indonesia and the world community (pp. 3–14). Sydney: Pluto Press.
- Gunn, G. C. (2010). Timor-Leste in 2009: Cup half full or half empty? Asian Survey, 50(1), 235–240.
- Hägerdal, H. (2006). Servião and Belu: Colonial conceptions and the geographical partition of Timor. Studies on Asia, 3(1), 49–64.
- Hägerdal, H. (2007). Rebellions or factionalism? Timorese forms of resistance in an early colonial context, 1650–1769. Bijdragen tot de Taal- Land- en Volken kunde, 163(1), 1–33.
- Hainsworth, P., & McCloskey, S. (Eds.). (2000). The East Timor question: The struggle for independence from Indonesia. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Harson, S. (2014, December 23). Slow justice for atrocity victims in Timor-Leste. UCA News. <https://www.ucanews.com/news/slow-justice-for-atrocity-victims-in-timor-leste/72676>. Accessed 08 Apr 2020.
- Hill, H. (1978). FRETILIN: The origins, ideologies and strategies of a nationalist movement in East Timor. Melbourne: Otford.
- Hill, H. (2002). Stirrings of nationalism in East Timor, Fretilin 1974–1978: The origins, ideologies and strategies of a nationalism movement. Sydney: Otford Press.
- Hoadley, S. (1976). East Timor: Civil war – Causes and consequences. Southeast Asian Affairs, 411–419. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/27908293>.
- Hodge, J. (2013). The catholic church in Timor-Leste and the Indonesian occupation: A spirituality of suffering and resistance. South East Asia Research, 21(1), 151–157.
- Hohe, T. (2002). The clash of paradigms: International administration and local political legitimacy in East Timor. Contemporary Southeast Asia, 24(3), 569–589.
- IndexMundi. Timor-Leste: Religions. IndexMundi. <https://www.indexmundi.com/timor-leste/religions.html>. Accessed 06 Apr 2020.
- International Centre for Transitional Justice (ICTJ). (2010). Unfulfilled expectations victims' perceptions

- of justice and reparations in Timor-Leste*. Brussels: ICTJ Brussels.
- Jardine, M. (1999). East Timor: Genocide in paradise. Berkeley: Odonian Press.
- Jolliffe, J. (2009). Balibo. London: Scribe Publications.
- Kammen, D. (2003). Master-slave, traitor-nationalist, opportunist-oppressed: Political metaphors in East Timor. Indonesia, 76, 69–85.
- Kammen, D. (2010). Subordinating Timor: Central authority and the origins of communal identities in East Timor. Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde, 166(2–3), 244–269.
- Kent, L. (2016). Sounds of silence: Everyday strategies of social repair in Timor-Leste. Australian Feminist Law Journal, 42(1), 31–50.
- Kent, L., & Kinsella, N. (2015). A Luta Continua (The struggle continues): The marginalization of East Timorese women within the Veteran's Valorization Scheme. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 17(3), 473–494.
- Kent, L., & Wallis, J. (2014). 'Timor-Leste's Veterans' Pension Scheme: Who are the beneficiaries and who is missing out?'. The State, Society & Governance in Melanesia Program (SSGM) Brief, 1–2. <https://doi.org/10.25911/5f20073ef001b>.
- Kiernan, B. (2002). Cover up and Denial of genocide: Australia, the USA, East Timor and the aborigines. Critical Asian Studies, 34(2), 163–192.
- Kiernan, B. (2017). Genocide and resistance in Southeast Asia: Documentation, Denial, and justice in Cambodia and East Timor. London: Routledge.
- King, D. (2003). East Timor's founding elections and the emerging party system. Asian Survey, 43(5), 745–757.
- Kinsella, N., & Blau, S. (2013). Searching for conflict related persons in Timor-Leste: Technical, political and cultural considerations. Stability, 2(1), 1–14.
- Kohen, A. S. (2001). The Catholic Church and the Independence of East Timor. In R. Tanter, M. Selden, & S. R. Shalom (Eds.), Bitter flowers, sweet flowers: East Timor, Indonesia and the World Community (pp. 43–54). Sydney: Pluto Press.
- Leach, M. (2002). Valorising the resistance: National identity and collective memory in East Timor's constitution. Social Alternatives, 21(3), 43–47.
- Leach, M. (2003). "Privileged Ties:" Young people debating language, heritage and national identity in East Timor. Portuguese Studies Review, 11(1), 137–150.
- Leach, M. (2017). National identity and nation-building in Timor-Leste. New York: Routledge.
- Leach, M. (2020, February 24). Back to the future in Dili. Inside Story. <https://insidestory.org.au/back-to-the-future-in-dili/>. Accessed 13 Apr 2020.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Indigenous peace-making versus the liberal peace. Cooperation and conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security dialogue, 41(4), 391–412.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- McWilliam, A. (2005). Houses of resistance in East Timor: Structuring sociality in the new nation. Anthropological Forum, 15(1), 27–44.
- McWilliam, A. (2007). Introduction: restorative custom: ethnographic perspectives on conflict and local justice in Timor. The Asia Pacific Journal of Anthropology, 8(1), 1–8.
- McWilliam, A., & Bexley, A. (2008). Performing politics: The 2007 parliamentary elections in Timor Leste. The Asia Pacific Journal of Anthropology, 9(1), 66–82.
- Molnar, A. (2006). "Died in the service of Portugal": Legitimacy of authority and dynamics of group identity among the Atsabe Kemak in East Timor. Journal of Southeast Asian Studies, 37(2), 335–355.
- Molnar, A. K. (2010). Timor Leste: Politics, history, and culture. London: Routledge.
- Mason, C. (2005). Women, violence and nonviolent resistance in East Timor. Journal of Peace Research, 42(6), 737–749.
- Morison, M. (2010). Democratisation and Timor Leste after UNTAET: Towards participatory intervention. Hatene kona ba Compreender Understanding Mengerti, 24(3), 179–184.
- Niner, S. (2011). Hakat klot, Narrow steps: Negotiating gender in post-conflict Timor-Leste. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(3), 413–435.
- Niner, S. (2013). Bisoi: A veteran of Timor-Leste's Independence Movement. In S. Blackburn, & H. Ting (Eds.), Women in Southeast Asian Nationalist Movements (pp. 226–249). Singapore: National University of Singapore Press.
- Niner, S. (2016, February 17). Xanana Gusmão: Of paintballs and power. Inside Story. <https://insidestory.org.au/of-paintballs-and-power>. Accessed 15 Mar 2020.
- Niner, S. (2017, July 21). Women and power in Timor's elections', New Mandala. <http://www.newmandala.org/women-power-timors-elections/>. Accessed 13 Apr 2020.
- Peake, G. (2013). Beloved land: Stories, struggles, and secrets from Timor-Leste. London: Scribe Publications.
- Pekular, M. (2019, June 22). Bridging the gap: Girls' education in Timor-Leste'. The Borgen Project. <https://borgenproject.org/bridging-the-gap-girls-education-timor-leste/>. Accessed 13 Apr 2020.
- Pilger, J., & Munro, D. (1994). Death of a nation: The Timor conspiracy. Central.
- Pinto, C., & Jardine, M. (1997a). East Timor's unfinished struggle: Inside the Timorese Resistance. Boston: South End Press.
- Pinto, C., & Jardine, M. (1997b). Inside the East Timor resistance. Toronto: James Lorimer & Company.
- Pouyé, R. (2005). "Shadow States?" State building and national invention under external constraint in Kosovo and East Timor (1974–2002). Questions de recherche, 13, 1–60.
- Ramos-Gonçalves, M. (2012). A Língua Portuguesa e o conflito intergeracional em Timor-Leste. In R. Teixeira E Silva, Y. Qiarong, M. Espadinha, & A. Leal (Eds.), III

- SIMELP: A formação de novas gerações de falantes de português no mundo* (pp. 1–15). Macau: Universidade de Macau.
- Ramos-Horta, J. (1987). Funu: The unfinished Saga of East Timor. Lawrenceville: The Red Sea Press.
- República Democrática de Timor-Leste (RDTL). (2007). Constituição República Democrática de Timor-Leste / Konstituissau República Demokrátika Timór-Leste Nian. Dili: Direcção Nacional dos Direitos de Cidadania. Available in English at: http://timor-leste.gov.tl/wp-content/uploads/2010/03/Constitution_RDTL_ENG.pdf. Accessed 01 Apr 2020.
- República Democrática de Timor-Leste (RDTL). National employment strategy 2017–2030 (2017). Available in English at: <http://timor-leste.gov.tl/wp-content/uploads/2017/07/National-Employment-Strategy-2017-20301.pdf>. Accessed 09 Apr 2020.
- Robinson, G. (2001). With UNAMET in East Timor – An Historian’s personal view. In R. Tanter, M. Selden, & S. R. Shalom (Eds.), Bitter flowers, sweet flowers: East Timor, Indonesia and the World Community (pp. 55–72). Sydney: Pluto Press.
- Robinson, G. (2009). “If you leave us here, we will die”: How genocide was stopped in East Timor. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Roll, K. (2018). Street level bureaucrats and post-conflict policy-making: Corruption, correctives, and the rise of veterans’ pensions in Timor-Leste. Civil Wars, 20(2), 262–285.
- Saul, B. (2009). Prosecuting war crimes at Balibo under Australian law: The killing of five journalists in East Timor by Indonesia. Sydney Law Review, 31, 83–120.
- Scambray, J. (2009). Anatomy of a conflict: The 2006–2007 communal violence in East Timor. Conflict, Security & Development, 9(2), 265–288.
- Shoesmith, D. (2011). Timor-Leste: On the road to peace and prosperity?. Southeast Asian Affairs, 2011(1), 321–335.
- Simonsen, S. G. (2006). The Authoritarian temptation in East Timor: Nationbuilding and the need for inclusive governance. Asian Survey, 46(4), 575–596.
- Tanter, R., Selden, M., & Shalom, S. R. (2001). East Timor faces the future. In R. Tanter, M. Selden, & S. R. Shalom (Eds.), Bitter flowers, sweet flowers: East Timor, Indonesia and the World Community (pp. 243–272). Sydney: Pluto Press.
- Taylor, J. G. (1991). Indonesia’s Forgotten war: The hidden history of East Timor. London: Zed Books.
- Taylor, J. G. (1999). East Timor: The price of freedom. London: Zed Books.
- Traube, E. (1986). Cosmology and social life: Ritual exchange among the Mambai of East Timor. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Trembath, A., & Grenfell, D. (2007). Mapping the pursuit of gender equality. Globalism Institute, RMIT University.
- Trindade, J. (2011). Lulik: The core of Timorese Values. Communicating New Research on Timor-Leste Conference. Dili.
- Trindade, J. (2014). Matak-malirin, Tempu Rai-diak and Halerik: Expressions of what Timorese longed for in life. In H. Loney (Ed.), Understanding Timor-Leste 2013 (Vol. II, pp. 55–59). Timor-Leste Studies Association & Swinburne Press.
- Trindade, J. (2015). Relational dimensions within Timor-Leste Customary Society. In 5th Timor-Leste Studies Association Conference. Dili: National University of Timor-Lorosa’e.
- Van der Auweraert, P. (2012). The 2006 crisis in Timor-Leste: A brief background. In Ending the 2006 internal displacement crisis in Timor-Leste: between humanitarian aid and transitional Justice. Geneva: IOM. <https://doi.org/10.18356/0f94cb96-en>. Accessed 13 Apr 2020.
- Wallis, J. (2015). Assessing the implementation and impact of Timor-Leste’s Cash Payment Schemes. In S. Ingram, L. Kent, & A. McWilliam (Eds.), A new era? Timor-Leste after the UN (pp. 235–249). Acton: Australian National University Press.
- Weatherbee, D. E. (1984). Indonesia in 1984: Pancasila, politics and power. Asian Survey, 25(2), 187–197.
- Wigglesworth, A. (2010). Young Women and gender dimensions of change in Timorese civil society. In Hatene kona ba Compreender Understanding Mengerti (pp. 242–247). Dili: Universidade Nasional Timor Lorosa’e.
- Wigglesworth, A. (2012). Dreaming of a different life: Steps towards democracy and equality in Timor-Leste. Elipsis, 10, 35–53.
- Wigglesworth, A. (2013). Community leadership and gender equality: Experiences of representation in local governance in Timor-Leste. Asian Politics & Policy, 5(4), 567–584.
- Wigglesworth, A. (2016). Brexit and Timorese workers in the UK. Institute of Development Studies. <https://www.ids.ac.uk/opinions/brexit-and-timorese-workers-in-the-uk/>. Accessed 10 Apr 2020.
- Wigglesworth, A., & Boavida dos Santos, A. (2018). Timorese migrant workers in the Australian Seasonal Worker Program. Australasian Aid Conference, Canberra.
- Wigglesworth, A., & Boxer, L. J. (2017, June) Transitional livelihoods: Timorese migrant workers in the UK. DevPolicy Blog.
- Wigglesworth, A., & Boxer, L. J. (2019). Positioning for their future: Timorese migrant workers in the UK. Papers on Social Representations, 28(1), 101–120.
- Wigglesworth, A., & Fonseca, Z. (2016). Experiences of young Timorese as migrant workers in Korea. Australasian Aid Conference, Canberra.

Post-Liberal Peace

► Liberal Peace and Its Critiques

Postliberal Peacebuilding

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

Post-Soviet Conflict

- ▶ Russia and Frozen Conflicts in the Post-Soviet Space

Postwar

- ▶ Sierra Leone

Postwar Cities

- ▶ Divided Cities

Power Structures

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Power-Sharing

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict

Prisoners' Dilemma

David Churchman
 California State University Dominguez Hills,
 California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Summary

Prisoner's Dilemma is an early mathematical method for choosing whether or not to cooperate based on the relative benefits of the payoffs expected from the choices made by two opponents.

In a lecture at Stanford University in 1950, Albert Tucker gave Merrill Flood and Melvin Dresher's mathematical model of cooperation and conflict its now familiar structure and name, Prisoners' Dilemma (Poundstone 1992). In Tucker's scenario, a district attorney, sure of the guilt of two suspects but lacking sufficient evidence for conviction, seeks a confession. Isolating the suspects, each is told they have a choice to confess or not. If both refuse, the district attorney will book them on petty charges, and they will receive minor sentences, B. If both confess, they will receive moderate sentences, C. But, if only one confesses, then the confessor will receive the most lenient sentence of all, A, while the one who refused will get the toughest sentence of all, D. That is, $A < B < C < D$. The situation looks like this:

| | | | |
|--------------|-------------|----------------|-----------|
| | | (Prisoner One) | |
| | | (Not Confess) | (Confess) |
| Prisoner Two | Not Confess | B (B) | D (A) |
| | Confess | A (D) | C (C) |

If the prisoners trust one another completely, neither will confess. If not, Prisoner One should compare $(B)+(D)$ with $(A)+(C)$ and confess or not based on the smaller total (because all prisoners presumably prefer short sentences presumably to long ones). Prisoner Two will do the same based on $B+D$ and $A+C$.

A mathematical "game" like this with a finite number of players and strategies will produce the same optimal solution no matter how many times it is "played." Axelrod (1984) pitted pairs of researchers familiar with Prisoners' Dilemma against one another in an unknown number of repetitions (but averaging 151). Anatol Rapoport obtained the best score by always cooperating on the first round and then imitating his opponent on each subsequent round. Once the opponents figured out what they were doing, they cooperated. Axelrod concluded from this result that this was one way cooperation evolves naturally.

With a view toward ending war or keeping the peace, Prisoners' Dilemma analysis has directly impacted policy (Marshall 1991). It played a part in the decision to employ the atomic bomb to end World War II. During the Cold War, Thomas Schelling (1960) applied it to determining the number of missiles needed to ensure that both the USSR and the USA would continue to choose Cold over hot war. In the 1970s it was influential in the decision to remain in South Korea and in the 1980s in overcoming opposition to deploying Stinger. Recently, analysis of the terrorist threat concluded that there are too many targets (every plane, ship, embassy, and consulate, every business at home and abroad, every reservoir, bridge, school, shopping center and sports facility, and more, each requiring four 42-hour a week security shifts) to defend. Thus, the optimal post-9/11 strategy – easier said than done – was to destroy al-Qaeda training bases, cut off their financing, infiltrate their networks, and eliminate their state support, if any.

Cross-References

► Culture and Conflict Resolution

References

- Axelrod, R. (1984). The evolution of cooperation. New York: Basic Books.
- Marshal, A. (1991). On not confusing ourselves: Essays on National Security Strategy in honor of Albert and Roberta Wohlstetter. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Poundstone, W. (1992). Prisoner's dilemma: John von Neumann, game theory, and the puzzle of the bomb. New York: Doubleday.
- Schelling, T. (1960). The strategy of conflict. New York: Oxford University Press.

Private Peacemaking and Dialogic Approach to Mediation

Marko Lehti
Tampere Peace Research Institute, Tampere University, Tampere, Finland

Introduction

Peace mediation (also referred to as conflict or international mediation) is customarily defined as a process that begins with the prospective mediator (a third party) being invited to work for a peaceful (re)resolution of an armed conflict, (Wallensteen and Svensson (2016, p. 12)) presupposed to be “acceptable, impartial, and neutral” (Bercovitch 2007, p. 166; United Nations (UN 2012)). Broadly speaking, peace mediation can be understood as “a process of conflict management, related to but distinct from the parties’ own negotiations, where those in conflict seek the assistance of, or accept an offer of help from, an outsider (whether an individual, an organisation, a group, or a state) to change their perceptions or behavior, and do so without resorting to physical force or invoking the authority of law.” (Bercovitch 2007, p. 167). A conflict transformation perspective departs from a resolution and agreement-centric focus, and approaches peace mediation from a broad and inclusive perspective as a peace-seeking exercise that includes different forms of third-party intervention to support the peaceful transformation of violent conflict by sustaining dialogic interaction among parties to conflict (Lehti 2019, p. 97).

Peace mediation has a twofold reputation. On the one hand, it is presented as the most cost-efficient way to address armed conflicts in peaceful terms. On the other hand, it is seen as a somewhat conservative practice of peace diplomacy, executed mainly by retired diplomats. Both impressions, as always, manage to encompass only a narrow understanding, neglecting the multiplicity of peace mediation. In the past decades, peace mediation was dominated, in particular, by states. However, during the past two decades agency and the scope of peace mediation has expanded far beyond the narrow corridors of official diplomacy. The engagement of multiple nongovernmental actors into the field of peace diplomacy has contributed to a new kind of pragmatic approaches to peace, and transformed conventional mediation practices. Private peacemaking refers to the activity of nongovernmental actors that supplement official peace diplomacy.

Mediation as Peace Diplomacy

The term “mediation” was launched into the sphere of peace diplomacy in 1948 when the United Nations appointed Swedish Folke Bernadotte as the United Nations mediator in Palestine. Peace mediation developed as a specific and regulated practical tool of international diplomacy in the post-Second World War era, although the early roots of international peace diplomacy can be dated back to the era of the League of Nations. During the first decades after the Second World War, the UN was the primary provider of mediation, while leading powers (the USA, the UK, France, Soviet Union, and China) also held important roles. The UN could mandate individual mediators such as Bernadotte, Ralph Bunche, or Olof Palme and in some cases, UN secretary-generals acted as mediators themselves (e.g., Dag Hammarskjöld) (Greig and Diehl 2012, pp. 62–70; Svensson and Wallensteen 2010; Wallensteen and Svensson 2016). The Camp David negotiations (1978) between Israel and Egypt, mediated by then president of the USA Jimmy Carter and his team, are an excellent example of mediation executed by a great power during the Cold War period. Only leaders of states—those of Egypt and Israel—were allowed to participate and contribute to negotiations in isolated settings, even though it was the fate of the Palestinian people that was in the balance. The mediator, President Carter, utilized the power of the USA to persuade parties to achieve a conclusion that was favorable for the USA (Quandt 2016). At the time, international peace mediation was exclusively limited to the sphere of state diplomacy.

In the mid-1990s, the world witnessed a peace mediation boom, and the number of mediation cases skyrocketed from 30 cases in the 1970s and 1980s to roughly 170 cases per year (Greig and Diehl 2012, pp. 62–70). The boom was one consequence of a remarkable normative shift within the international order, that is, the emergence of the era of liberal peace(building), which made peace interventions an indispensable obligation of the international community. During the Cold War era, a majority of violent conflicts ended in a military victory for one party, but, as a consequence of this new mediation-friendly environment, armed conflicts increasingly ended in a negotiated agreement (Coleman 2012, p. 65; Eriksson and Kostić 2013b, p. 162). The development during the past decade was paradoxical. The number of peace mediation actors has steadily increased including several new official actors, such as small states and international organizations. Further, an increasing number of non-governmental actors have adopted peace mediation into their agenda. Simultaneously, mediation has become a more professionalized field. Despite all of these developments addressing both quantity and quality of mediation, there have been fewer agreements achieved in track 1 peace negotiations during the past few years. In the era of new world disorder, the internationalization of armed conflicts is on the rise, and intrastate conflicts are more often entangled in great power rivalry and power–political interests, further hindering the resolution of conflicts and, in particular, decreasing options for track 1 negotiations. The space for international peace mediation has become limited as a result of the increasing power–political rationale. Great powers are less willing to invest in soft forms of peace diplomacy. An example of this is Syria, an intrastate conflict that has become entangled in great power struggles with the USA, Turkey, Russia, Iran, and Saudi Arabia, with alliances and power interests in a state of dynamic change.

Peace practitioners are in increasing terms worried about that mediation is becoming ineffective because prevailing practices and tools of mediation and dialogue “were created for traditional inter- and intrastate conflicts.” (Pentikäinen 2015, p. 67.) In an increasingly complex landscape of internationalized asymmetric conflicts mediation practice has preserved its focus primarily on “conflict as a struggle between armed groups”; even in current messy wars “armed groups generally comprise marginalized actors who could never achieve their ambitions in a peaceful context” and who often benefit economically from fighting. Indeed, it was crudely noted that focusing on armed groups mediation “does little to address the problems of the suffering population.” (Adapting to a new conflict landscape, Oslo Forum (2016).) Since mediation still seen to represent the best option for third-party intervention and because even there “where mediation fails to settle a conflict, mediators can still secure important, lifesaving wins,” a new, more inclusive, and holistic approach to mediation has been called for by several practitioners. (Martin Griffiths, Foreword to Alert 2016!, p. 9; Oslo Forum (2016).)

If peace mediation is examined beyond a quantitative criterion (the number of signed agreements) and focuses on more qualitative criteria, which measure the durability and sustainability of peace, the track record on favorable outcomes is limited. The conventional practices of mediation have been developed during the Cold War years to fit into an interstate context, while during past three decades a great majority of armed conflicts have been asymmetric, intrastate conflicts in which state has lost “the monopoly on the legitimate use of physical force in a given territory,” and the sole legitimacy to make agreements (Winter 2012). The definition of the main parties involved in violent conflicts has become a highly complicated exercise in comparison with the simplicity of interstate wars since parties lack an official legitimate position. For example, in the Syrian war, the Carter Center has recognized hundreds of armed groups with loose, fluid, and rapidly changing relations with one another. (MSN report no. 7. See more about new multiple agency in new wars Kaldor (2006).) The confusion regarding who the parties of the war are, and thus who should be allowed to participate in peace negotiations are characteristic of asymmetric wars.

This constellation has set a profound challenge for Westphalian peace diplomacy since states want to preserve their monopoly for diplomacy, despite the nature of asymmetric wars calling for a more flexible approach (Aggestam and Björkdahl 2009, pp. 17–18; Fixdal 2012). Major powers have remained particularly suspicious in engaging nonstate actors in peace negotiation even when there are several nonstate warring parties. That was case in the Bosnia in the 1990s, but also in the Ukraine in the 2010s. The situation looks a bit different if examined from the perspective of the small state-led or the UN-led peace mediation processes, but the major challenge is how peace mediation can address the diversity and contingency of actors, and how it should recognize legitimacy of those actors.

From the perspective of classical mediation practice, the plurality of primary parties has been regarded as highly challenging for the success of peace talks, since a simple negotiation setting with a limited number of actors can better be managed, and is easier to achieve a quick result. Within complex asymmetric conflicts, classical mediators have aimed for simplicity by limiting the number of negotiating partners and looking for bilateral settings, thereby consciously denying the challenges of agency often experienced in asymmetric, scattered, and fragmented settings (Paffenholz and Ross 2015, pp. 28–29). Following that principle, Lakhdar Brahimi, the United Nations and Arab League Special Envoy to Syria until 14 May 2014, aimed to create a simplified negotiation setting between the opposition and the government in Syria. The Geneva-based negotiations under the leadership of Staffan de Mistura predominantly continued with the same strategy, even if in diversified ways. The diversity, fragmentation, and heterogeneity of the rebel side was thus attempted to be explained away, and several other actors like the Kurds have been excluded. (UN Mediation in the Syrian Crisis; MSN report no. 7.) In some cases, but not certainly in all, due to the exclusive nature of bi-party negotiations, it has been possible to achieve a cease-fire in a relatively short time; however, simultaneously, the two-party model “ultimately led to reduced legitimacy” of the peace process as civic society actors have mostly been sidelined from the early phase of peace talks. Some mediation cases in particular are accused of failing because of their incapability to also engage nonfighting parties that were regarded more as secondary to armed groups (Höglund and Svensson 2009, pp. 183–185; Destradi and Vüllers 2012). It seems obvious that the applied criteria for participation in the mediation process could have drastic influences throughout the whole peace process and may constitute a major obstacle to achieving sustainable peace as exclusive peace mediation setting omits inclusivity and local ownership of the process that may diminish legitimacy of the peace agreement. This would explain why too often violence escalates again only a few years after signing agreements.

Peace diplomacy (as well as diplomacy in general) is fundamentally based on regulated, resilient, and stubborn practices and presuppositions that all resist reform. Changes in the field often occur slowly as official diplomacy operates within a conventional structure, focusing on traditional procedures and learning through experiences. Demand for revising mediation practices has arisen mainly from a pragmatic perspective. During the past two decades, peace diplomacy has tried attaching to new asymmetric conflicts, integrating mediation goals into liberal peace norms. How to build more locally owned, inclusive peace processes is a principle which cannot be ignored in any mediation effort (Paffenholz and Ross 2015). Still, adaptation of new norms into peace mediation practice and the renewal of official practices of peace mediation have been slow to take place. Simultaneously, new non-governmental actors have managed to expand peace mediation beyond Westphalian diplomacy and better address, in their practices, normative challenges of inclusivity and local ownership.

Peace Mediation Beyond Negotiations

Conventional definitions comprehend mediation solely as a means of active assistance in (official) negotiations among parties pursuing an agreement or other kind of compromise. Nonetheless, it is also possible to understand, more broadly, peace mediation as a particular nonviolent format of third-party intervention that pursues “improving efficacy and quality of transforming” violent conflicts towards peace. This may but also may not require the achievement of agreements, and it does not necessarily require traditional negotiations but “a major service of mediation is helping adversaries communicate with each other, even when they are engaged in deadly conflict.” (Kriesberg 2015, pp. 10, 13–14). A narrow perspective characteristic to conventional peace diplomacy comprehends peace mediation as a resolution-seeking exercise and particular negotiation-supporting techniques looking for achieving a compromise between the incompatible interests of the conflicting parties. From a broader and more comprehensive perspective, peace mediation refers also to third-party activity that changes the perceptions or behaviors of conflicting parties in relation to violent conflict. Peace mediation can also be understood within a broader spectrum of dialogues and peace support which encompasses more than just (diplomatic) negotiations among selected political and military leaders, including and placing an emphasis on civic society processes. From this perspective, peace mediation becomes a necessary component at all stages of a conflict cycle to support conflict transformation: before, during, and after the violence (Francis 2002, pp. 10–11; Ropers 1995, p. 22).

Peace mediation is diversely approached and comprehended by academics. If mediation is understood within a conflict management perspective, as a particular tool adapted to negotiations, scholars are interested in how to develop engagement within the negotiation setting more efficiently (Bercovitch 2002, 2007; Bercovitch and Gartner 2008), with a focus on the mediator’s personal styles as well as studying practical styles of mediation (Svensson and Wallensteen 2010; Wallensteen and Svensson 2016). According to Zartman’s ripeness theory, based on conflict a management tradition, mediation is presented as an appropriate tool only when the primary parties of conflict are ready for it, and when they recognize that they cannot achieve their goals by violent terms anymore (Cantekin (2016, pp. 80–81). Transformative understanding contests this simplified model of the conflict cycle and suggests that a conflict peace mediators’ task is to prime peace even when parties are not yet willing. Further, this understanding suggests that within asymmetric conflicts the status of the primary party is always contested and constantly transforming. A new broader understanding of peace mediation would shift the interest of mediation research from the negotiation process to peace intervention and ask how mediation practices and agency can be constructed in complex, contingent, and particular peace processes. The success of a peace mediation is traditionally measured by the creation of a peace agreement. This approach omits the question of the durability of a peace agreement and examines success solely through the frame of “negative peace.” New approaches to mediation prioritize questions of agency, impartiality, inclusivity, and local ownership and are interested in how peace mediation addresses “the long-term processes that shape the outcome of peace,” thus discussing peace mediation within the frame of a liberal peace critique (Eriksson and Kostić 2013a, pp. 9, 17).

Nongovernmental Actors Within Multiparty Peace Process

Many of recent mediation efforts can be defined as multiparty and multitrack peace diplomacy. There are several kinds of third-party actors – big and small states, international and regional organizations, and “widespread presence of religious, humanitarian and development NGOs”—that have created the complex and contingent field of peacemaking (Crocker et al. 2002, pp. 228–230). One of most remarkable changes in the peace mediation field has been the drastic increase in the number of nongovernmental third-party actors who have adopted a more central and diverse role in peace processes. There is no regulated term that would cover all nongovernmental peacemakers, and the most obvious would be call them just nongovernmental peace mediators or, like Dunn and Kriesberg, transnational organizations (TO) that have adopted peacemaking as their raison d’être (Dunn and Kriesberg 2002).

The term “multiparty mediation” refers to this diversity of mediators and how their simultaneous actions or sequential actions are combined and coordinated. Beside multiparty, many current peace processes can also be described as multitrack mediation that transforms operational structures “from monolithic, centralised, hierarchical and rigid toward more delayed and flat organisations in virtually all sectors of life.” (Piiparinen and Brummer (2012, p. 13). See also Crocker et al. (2002, pp. 228–230).) With the increase of potential third-party actors “the international playing field of mediation is becoming increasingly crowded” and with the complexity of the peace mediation field the questions of cooperation and coordination have become crucial (Piiparinen and Brummer 2012, p. 13). Nonetheless, it is impossible to avoid competition among potential third-party actors because competitive attitude arise from the necessary efforts of nongovernmental actors to secure the role of mediator through procuring funds and recognition. However, mutual trust is easier and indeed more essential to achieve within the operational level. Even if multiparty mediation increases complexity in peacemaking, “it can help build the momentum required to help push peace negotiations to settlement and provide leverage and other key assets to a peace process.” (Crocker et al. 2015, pp. 382–383.)

The emergence of nongovernmental peacemakers is associated with a broader development of the growing sector of transnational NGO actors (TOs) and, in particular, so-called humanitarian organizations. TOs are “NGOs operating internationally and they may be multinational in their membership and leadership, as international NGOs (INGOs) are generally considered to be, or they may be based in one country and conduct their activities in other countries as well.” (Dunn and Kriesberg 2002, p. 194.) The history of TOs dates back to the nineteenth century. In the beginning, the TOs were predominantly associated with humanitarian assistance without any commitment to any political or development goals and agendas. The International Committee of the Red Cross founded in 1863 is the earliest example of this kind of humanitarian transnational organization taking an active role in the war zone. In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the transnational NGOs gained a remarkable role in the growing sector of humanitarian aid, development, and human rights. The Biafra war 1967–1970 was an epoch-making conflict as some of humanitarian TOs intervened without an official mandate, and eventually their humanitarian assistance within the rebel site was crucial for prolonging fighting, indicating clearly that humanitarian aid also has political consequences and cannot be completely neutral (Foley (2010; Casey 2016, pp. 167–208. About the Biafra war Yarrow 1978; Lehti (2019, pp. 56–57)).

Humanitarian aid and peace support remained separate for decades. Since the 1990s, in the era of liberal peace(building), many former humanitarian and development-centric NGOs reoriented themselves towards peacebuilding, and often these approaches merged (Foley 2010). The emergence of transnational organizations with a particular niche in peacemediation has been a characteristic phenomenon belonging predominantly to the 2000s and 2010s. They are different in background and size: there are organizations having a background in humanitarian aid and development, particular faith-based organizations that are community based with a transnational agenda, and nonprofit organizations founded solely for peace mediation. All of these organizations compete for external funding which enables their peace activity. Financing is received primarily from public sources. Thus, they cannot be regarded as fully independent from official actors and political interests.

Besides the rise of humanitarianism and the emergence of the international nonprofit sector, the changes in peace diplomacy are also entangled with the privatization of functions previously regarded as a sole monopoly of sovereign states. Big powers have, in recent years, even allocated parts of warfare and security sectors to private companies. Privatization of some parts of diplomacy is part of the same phenomena. Blurring the line between official and nonofficial is not just managed by states, but by the emergence of a nonprofit sector and growth of humanitarian policy which has created new spaces of peace diplomacy that transnational organizations have filled (Régnier 2011). Peace diplomacy executed by nongovernmental actors is, in essence, transnational and asymmetric as it includes the agency of actors, and expands peace diplomacy beyond the spheres of Westphalian diplomacy. Rules, roles, and definitions within these new multitrack fields of peace and humanitarian diplomacy are primarily shaped in everyday practices by participating organizations.

In organizational terms, private peacemaking organizations have grown in size and status, establishing the basis of their funding. Although the number of nongovernmental actors involved in peace mediation has increased, their numbers still remain relatively small in comparison with NGOs in peace building, civil crisis management, and conflict prevention. Further, it is not possible to present clear listings because most of the non-governmental organizations are not strictly engaged in mediation, but rather in various forms of mediation support activities. Nonetheless, it is a widely shared view that there are, at present, four big private peacemaking organizations in the field – the HD Center, the CMI, the Bergh of Foundation, and the Carter Center. It is important to note that this situation may change quickly, and the list also depends upon the perspective in question (Lehti 2019, p. 48).

Nongovernmental peacemaking organizations can be roughly divided into two groups: private diplomacy organizations and faith-based organizations (FBO). Two groups are, however, overlapping – as is membership in two umbrella organizations: Mediation Support Network (MSN) founded in 2008 and the Network for Religious and Traditional Peacemakers (Network) founded in 2013. Even if their approach to peace mediation practice is in many ways rather similar, these labels – private diplomacy and faith-based organization – are good indicators of certain differences in their self-identification as well as in their normative basis, which also reflects their comprehension regarding their contribution and position in the peace process.

Within conflict resolution, the technical term “track 1.5 diplomacy” has often been used in situations in which nonofficial actors work in supporting official processes. In many ways, private diplomacy is a better term which encompasses this new grey zone, linking official peace diplomacy. Private diplomacy actors are often involved in enabling track 1 mediation by engaging with members of the political elite. Private diplomacy actors primarily gain their legitimacy as mediators through their established and recognized status within the international peace diplomacy field (Lehti 2019, pp. 108–117).

Faith-based organizations have long heritage in peacemaking, for example, the Quakers, the Mennonites, and Catholic Sant’ Egidio. Indeed, all these organizations have continued to be active in peacemaking. However, several new organizations have now entered the field. The religious element often explains the dedication of FBOs to peace in general, but their mediation and dialogue approach do not necessarily have a particular religious dimension. However, as religious and indeed religious-based extremism have become a more important dimension of current transnational conflicts, FBOs have been more ready to deal with religious actors and questions entangled within religion and faith. At the operational level, FBOs have often, but not exclusively been engaged with civil society actors (Ibid., pp. 117–123).

By increasing the number of nongovernmental peacemakers, the field of peace mediation has become professionalized and, for their staff, mediation appears as a career choice. There has been an enormous investment in the training capacities and professional guidelines. Indeed, they have brought a new kind of brainstorming energy invested in the revision of the organizations' strategic thinking including in-depth analysis of the essence and objectives of peace processes, as well as rethinking appropriate means and approaches of peace mediation and reassessments of their role as peacemakers (Ibid., pp. 105–106).

Private Peacemaking

Nongovernmental peacemakers may take three different roles in peace processes: offering advisory services and mediation support, the facilitation of various kind of formal and informal dialogue processes, and actual mediation. Mediation support may include, for example, capacity building, training support, advisory services, and so on. If the objective of this kind of mediation support is to change the attitudes towards violence of parties in the conflict and to enable peaceful transformation, they should still be regarded as peace mediation. This kind of instrument is a recognizable part of almost every operation, but they may also serve as an entry point to other roles in a peace process. Private peacemaking may support the larger, internationally coordinated process, or they may have separate private platforms for mediation and dialogue. Organizing and facilitating various kind of informal dialogue processes, some of them confidential and some of them more public, have become the primary form of private peacemaking. Most of these processes are looking for increasing inclusivity and legitimacy of peace processes, but also for opening up new paths and horizons for peace. There are only a few examples in which private actors have taken on the role of the main mediator for an internationally recognized conflict, as these duties are often reserved for state or international organizations. The role of CMI and HD in Aceh (Shea 2016), or Sant' Egidio in Mozambique as a chief mediator is merely exception in the practice rather than an example of a trend (Lehti 2019, pp. 59–60).

Private peacemakers appeared at first to be pondering and seeking their role and agenda within the state-dominating field, but during the past two decades they have transformed themselves from purely assisting towards a complementary actor (Strimling 2006, p. 96). Nongovernmental actors have expanded peace mediation beyond track 1 and opened up completely new fields for peace mediation. Instead of just distinguishing between different tracks it may be more helpful to make a distinction between, on the one hand, official (states and IOs) and nonofficial (private) actors, and, on the other hand, between formal (mandated) and informal mediation activities (see Table 1). Classical track 1 mediation represents a formal mandated mediation by an official third party. A great deal of a mediation literature concentrates on this particular field. Formal activity by unofficial actors or

Private Peacemaking and Dialogic Approach to Mediation, Table 1 Peace mediation actors and approaches (original Lehti 2019, p. 42)

| | Official actors (states, IO) | Unofficial actors (NGOs, nonprofit organizations) |
|--------------------------------|------------------------------|--|
| Formal/mandated mediations | Track 1 mediation | Supporting and complementing track 1 processes |
| Informal/nonmandated mediation | Enabling track 1 mediation | Peace mediation beyond mediation (e.g., dialogues, mediation support, capacity building) | informal activity by official actors can be regarded primarily as processes targeted at supporting and enabling track 1 negotiations or formal, mandated peace processes. This is the primary target of private diplomacy. Informal, mostly nonmandated activities by unofficial actors (predominantly track 2 mediation) have been steadily increasing, but this has remained the least studied field within peace mediation literature. This has been mostly a field of private peacemaking, expanding the scope of participations and new practices of mediation beyond conventional negotiations. The great majority of private peacemaking can be described as peace mediation, but within their conceptual fluidity and flexibility of nongovernmental actors' approach to peace interventions, the question about the definition of mediation loses its meaning, or indeed turns into a question of whether it is necessary, or to what point it is relevant, to make clear distinctions between mediation, peacebuilding, conflict resolution, and dialogue.

The role of private peacemaking has become increasingly crucial while the shortcomings of official diplomacy in responding to the complex crises have become evident. Informal peace diplomacy is too often presented only as reinforcing and complementing state-centric official peace diplomacy rather than examined according to its potential role of influencing peace processes on its own terms. Nongovernmental peacemakers emphasize that they are able to mediate when it is not possible to mediate (Lehti 2019, p. 125). Thus, they can act where official mediation is not possible and gain the parties' acceptance to introduce some mediating elements to the process. Private actors are often "better placed to open discreet channels of communication and serve as 'incubators' for creating a climate of dialogue." (Oslo Forum 2015). They can also act where stakeholders do not want mediation and dialogue processes, at least not those that are internationally supervised. These are cases where there is a clear need for support, but conflict parties or main stakeholders do not, often for political reasons, want to officially acknowledge the need for a dialogue process. The involvement of private peacemaking is also invisible in comparison to UN-mandated process, and the main stakeholder – usually the hosting state – may then still cherish the idea of ownership of the process (Lehti 2019, pp., 126–127).

The unofficial nature of private actors' work is particularly relevant in the early stages of a process and in breaking deadlocks but they "can also reinvigorate a stuttering process by bringing in new thinking and actors." (Oslo Forum 2015). Private peacemaking could bring elements of conflict prevention to mediation in situations that official mediation cannot enter because private actors' involvement does not legitimize and delegitimize power structures in the same way that official processes do, and thus they can act more quietly and invisibly, and cross boundaries that official actors cannot. Therefore, private actors have the potential to work more efficiently to prevent escalation and become involved in potential conflict situations before the conflicts have been internationally recognized. It seems that this preventive mediation is still for them a new and partly unused but fully recognized dimension of their work. Indeed, "[preventing] violent conflict from erupting" is the best way of building peace but that requires the existence of early-warning systems that allowed recognition of the early signs (Lehti 2019, pp. 201–202; Väyrynen et al. 2018, pp. 31, 39).

Nongovernmental actors can more freely choose the people with whom they work, and what kind of dialogue they facilitate, while the actors who are part of the officially recognized process have their hands tied. The "unofficial nature" of private peacemaking makes it possible to work with groups that are marginalized or even excluded from the official process. Instead of a formal position, private peacemaking is emphasizing informal legitimacy that local actors have, since the ability to sell agreement and transformation to the public at large is dependent on that. This shift from formal to informal legitimacy contests the primacy of mostly elite-driven peace processes since long-term change would not take place if the process and agreements do not have the support of the population at large (de Waal 2014).

For private peacemaking, the mandate is no longer as dominant and determining a prerequisite as it used to be, and attitudes towards mandates have become more practical and flexible. In some cases, a mandate is needed, and in other cases it is not. Or, a mandate can be achieved after entering into the process, if one's own role and the conflict dynamic is changing. Instead of a mandate, nongovernmental peacemakers now search for alternative entry points to a particular peace process or conflict situation that cannot no longer be seen as internationally given, but it always has to be based on an invitation from a local actor. The inviting party can be a local NGO or other local actor instead of a state or other official authoritative agent. A classical mandate given by an international organization or the conflict parties themselves is always a binding legal document that sets strict and nonnegotiable frames for a mediator. A local invitation, on the other hand, gives the third party more freedom and the flexibility to define the goals and agenda of the process, and to update and refocus them throughout the process when changing conflict dynamics require it (Lehti 2019, pp. 135–136). Emphasis of local invitation and local partnership strengthen local ownership of process and enable better-to-learn expectations and needs of local people.

Towards Dialogic Mediation

The dialogic approach best describes the new fresh, revolutionary informal peace diplomacy executed by certain private peacemakers. The dialogic mediation differs from that of negotiation in fundamental terms. Negotiation situations are based on announced positions, and there are various solutions available to address incompatibilities. At a certain point, negotiations reach a point where no one can move without someone else benefiting from that move. Negotiations are changing power positions. By contrast, dialogic processes are about transforming perceptions. In addition to negotiated agreements “resolving complex conflicts and building sustainable peace require profound changes of attitude, relationship, and behavior among individuals and groups” that is what private peacemaking is chasing up (Strimling 2006, p. 96).

Transformation is an apt concept that increasingly describes nongovernmental peacemakers' view of the whole peace process. The transformative approach to (peace) mediation practice contests the conventional frame of conflict management, and thus has substantial consequences for the framing of (peace) mediation goals and practices. Nonetheless, the private peacemakers are far from a uniform group in this regard and their understanding of what the relationship is between mediation and transformation, and how drastic terms old premises of mediation should be revisited diverge between organizations as well as between individual staff members. Transformation and resolution are not seen as either/or option, but instead it emphasized how conflicts “not only need to be resolved, but also transformed” and therefore mediation and transformation should be seen “as mutually entangled processes.” (MSN report no. 5.) Some of peacemakers have a more conventional understanding to differentiate between resolution and transformation and it is seen as a question of difference in temporal engagement to whole peace process. Then transformation is something requiring long-term process as mediation is short-term intervention. Alternative approach comprehends transformation as a way of understanding the whole peace process combining multiple overlapping and intertwining processes. Peace process is then no longer comprehended as linear processes; rather, it is acknowledged that peace processes experience pauses, advances, and ruptures that reflect the complexity and unpredictability of conflict itself. Transformation process cannot be (externally) designed and transformation does not have any generalized pattern nor any necessary pre-given phases and its end goal should be as open-ended as possible. Because of this dynamic setting, there cannot be fixed positions or grand plans of management (Lehti 2019, pp. 205–215). If it is not possible to verify clear causal and linear relationships between particular actions of peacebuilders and their output to the conflict dynamic, the whole strategic thinking process from planning to goal setting, and from design to evaluation, needs to be revisited.

Instead of overall, all-encompassing planning, what some peacemaking organizations now call for is an adaptive approach that emphasizes humility, a multinarrative understanding, and an obviously flexible and protean approach (de Coning 2018). The various overlapping conflicts and peace processes require private actors to fit their strategic planning to this highly contingent and erratic setting. To meet these challenges is to try to hit a moving target as described by one private organization. A transformative approach has made private peacemakers more aware of the limits of their own ability to influence the whole peace process as well as contest ability of remain completely neutral. Tolerance towards the limited possibility to design peace projects as well as the ability to express creativity to cope with unpredictable changes and uncertainties are seen as new virtues of peacemakers, since in complex settings it is not possible to execute rational linear planning and solution-centric methods. Peacemakers need to recognize that even how well designed in detail, a plan does not automatically lead to peace, and that some seemingly minor contribution may have significant consequences from long-term perspective. Core skills of peacemaker are then the ability to pick, recognize, and engage local partners that could carry the process. (Eronen 2016).

With dialogic mediation, private peacemakers have met ethical questions that have not been essential in official mandated mediation processes. Beyond official mandates, the question of participation and the legitimization of the mediator's role has become a more complicated and contingent process. With whom should they cooperate and how should they engage with local partners? Does inclusion of particular partners exclude others? How does this act of selection contribute to the whole peace process?

Applying this kind of approach into practice is far from an easy exercise since several principal conventions and practices of peace diplomacy are so firmly and so deeply grounded in conventions of rational management. Even if the ultimate goal is long-term transformation, in day-to-day operations the time perspective has to be of a shorter term and indeed local parties often expected clear goal settings (Lehti et al. 2019, pp. 20–21). Then, peacemakers should concentrate on looking at how particular interventions can contribute to the transformation process and move the peace process forward as a “precision strike,” particularly when there is a glitch, a halt, or a setback in the peace process. The task of the mediator is therefore to set the ball rolling by supporting the process and by increasing the capabilities of the conflict parties to carry on the transformative process. The intervention is successful if it creates a snowball effect and leads self-sustainable local processes and practices (Lehti 2019, pp. 179–189).

By transformative shift, the organization of dialogue processes has gained increasing significance in private peacemaking as dialogues allow for better addressing to demands of inclusivity and local ownership. National Dialogues (ND) represents official and mandated format of peace dialogues focusing on power sharing at the national level. Beside ND there has been increasing amount of transformative dialogues “that has evolved from technical thematic dialogues, civil society dialogues, international dialogues and ongoing confidential negotiations.” (Siebert 2014) The transformative dialogues are often informal and civic society centric in regard to the issues as well as to participation. Transformative dialogues can be roughly divided into two kind of dialogues according their approach to inclusivity: participatory and targeted (see Table 2). In practice, many dialogues may have elements from both but, in general, the division highlights quite fundamental differences in design, objectives, and practice. The inclusivity of the peace process constitutes an omnipresent and uncontested normative basis of all private peacemakers' aims, but what inclusivity requires and how it can be operationalized differs among organizations and, indeed, divides the processes of dialogues to participatory and targeted.

Participatory dialogues refer to public dialogues with broad participation and targeted to confidential processes with carefully targeted participation. Participatory dialogues gain bottom-up legitimacy for the peace process by increasing societal participation. These kinds of dialogues

Private Peacemaking and Dialogic Approach to Mediation, Table 2 Transformative dialogues (original Lehti 2019, p. 201)

| | Participatory dialogues | Targeted dialogues |
|-----------------------|---|--|
| Third-party role | Facilitative, passive | Enabling, active |
| Agenda | Externally and/or locally set | Locally set |
| Objective | Societal inclusion, legitimacy of peace process | Perception change, breaking deadlocks |
| Connection to track 1 | Complementary or parallel | Complementary or supportive |
| Participation | Open, emphasis on local invitation | Confidential, actively handpicked by third party | aim to engage with social groups like women or youth often marginalized from official processes. In some cases, the question is more about capacity building, but in other cases private peacemakers are focusing on assisting, for example, engagement of local women organizations to crucial public dialogue platforms.

The targeted dialogues focus on engaging certain selected persons or groups that are presumed to have a crucial role for transformation. They may be used as a tactical tool for breaking deadlocks, engaging new actors in the peace process, and facilitating the envisioning of a more peaceful future, in particular when the official negotiation forum is stalled. Even there may be a link to the official peace process but a link rarely appears visible and public. As confidential processes, targeted dialogues are reminiscent of the mediation process, but instead of a problem-solving emphasis targeted dialogues recognize problems to open up new horizons for the future.

All in all, beyond old conventional frames, there has been the development of a new pragmatic approach to mediation that can be called a dialogic one. The dialogic approach is not a uniform and coherent tool, but it is possible to detect certain main characteristics. Indeed, it is still perhaps at a certain level more an ideal model than a systematically operationalized practice, even if there are efforts to make it the latter. Dialogic approach or dialogic mediation draws from theories on transformation and complexity. Dialogic mediation is founded on a focus on dialogue, long-term change and sustainability, and local ownership. It emphasizes context specificity, localized approaches, and the fluidity and flexibility of concepts and approaches, and derives from local actors' invitation rather than official mandates. Dialogic mediation suitably describes a new kind of interaction between a third party and the parties in conflict, but the same approach can also be labeled a post-management approach since it determinedly departs from the hegemonic rationalistic conflict management framework and its emphasis on incompatible interests. It has contested the meaning of a central symbolic signs of management approach and in particular be aware of controversial role of peace agreements that was previously regarded an uncontested goal of mediation. Emphasis is now more on transformation, rather than resolution. Resolutions are still needed in goal-oriented fieldwork, but the peace process as a whole is understood as a long-term transformation process.

From a broader perspective, it is not just the question of change of practice and agency but a fundamental redefinition of what peace is all about. Conventional mediation has been heading towards negative peace in the form of cease-fire or other agreements that end actual fighting. Within the liberal peace frame, mediated peace has been understood to include some pre-given and universal normative goals like respect of democracy and human rights. Dialogic mediation recognizes messy, contingent, and context-specific makeup of peace. It emphasizes the community's ability to self-organize, and thus prefers self-sustainability of peace that within the complex system emerged "from messy political processes embedded deep within the cultural belief systems of the societies in question." (Brusset, de Coning and Hughes 2016, p. 4.) As peace mediation is about working for peace, revisiting what peace is all about necessarily revisits the whole scope of peace mediation practice and indeed opens up, from the third-party perspective, the fundamental question of how transformation towards this kind of open-ended peace can be best supported. This indeed indicates a radical paradigmatic change that has been so far primarily pragmatic. Nonetheless, even if in an ideal world dialogic mediation are seen to enable more locally designed processes, in practice there are still obvious pitfalls in execution as norms and practices of liberal peace are so deep rooted.

Cross-References

- ▶ Asymmetrical Warfare
- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Mediation

References

- Aggestam, K., & Björkdahl, A. (2009). Introduction: War and peace in transition. In K. Aggestam & A. Björkdahl (Eds.), War and peace in transition: Changing roles of external actors (pp. 15–31). Lund: Nordic Academic Press.
- Alert 2016! Report on conflicts, human rights and peacebuilding. Barcelona/Icaria: Escola de Cultura de Pau.
- Bercovitch, J. (2002). Introduction. Putting mediation in context. In J. Bercovitch (Ed.), Studies in international mediation. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bercovitch, J. (2007). Mediation in international conflicts: Theory, practice and developments. In I. William Zartman (Ed.), Peacemaking in international conflict: Methods and techniques, revised edition. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Bercovitch, J., & Gartner, S. S. (2008). New approaches, methods and findings in the study of mediation. In International conflict mediation: New approaches and findings (Security and conflict management). London: Routledge.
- Brusset, E., de Coning, C., & Hughes, B. (2016). Introduction. In E. Brusset, C. de Coning, & B. Hughes (Eds.), Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation (pp. 1–16). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cantekin, A. (2016). Ripeness and readiness theories in international conflict resolution. Journal of Mediation & Applied Conflict Analysis, 3(2), 75–90.
- Casey, J. (2016). The nonprofit world. Civil society and the rise of nonprofit sector. Boulder/London: Kumarian Press.
- Coleman, P. (2012). The value added of smaller states in peace mediation: Smart peace. In T. Piiparinen & V. Brummer (Eds.), Global networks of mediation: Prospects and avenues for Finland as a peacemaker. Helsinki: The Finnish Institute of International Affairs.
- Crocker, C. A., Hampson, F. O., & Aall, P. (2002). Two's company but is there a crowd? Some hypotheses about multiparty mediation. In J. Bercovitch (Ed.), Studies in international mediation. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Crocker, C. A., Fen O. H., & Pamela A. (2015). The Shifting Sands of Peacemaking: Challenges of Multiparty Mediation. International Negotiation, 20, 3.
- de Coning, C. (2018). Adaptive peacebuilding. International Affairs, 94(2), 301–317.
- de Waal, A. (2014). Violence and peacemaking in the political marketplace. Legitimacy and peace processes. From coercion to consent. Accord an International Review of Peace Initiatives, 24, 17–20.
- Destradi, S., & Vüllers, J. (2012). The consequences of failed mediation in civil wars: Assessing the Sri Lankan case (Working paper no. 202). German Institute of Global and Area Studies (GIGA).
- Dunn, L. A., & Kriesberg, L. (2002). Mediating Intermediaries: Expanding Roles of Transnational Organizations. In J. Bercovitch (Ed.) Studies in International Mediation. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Eriksson, M., & Kostić, R. (2013a). Peacemaking and peacebuilding: Two ends of a tail. In M. Eriksson & R. Kostić (Eds.), Mediation and Liberal peacebuilding: Peace from the ashes of war? (pp. 5–21). New York: Routledge.
- Eriksson, M., & Kostić, R. (2013b). Rethinking peacemaking: Peace at all costs? In M. Eriksson & R. Kostić (Eds.), Mediation and liberal peacebuilding: Peace from the ashes of war? (pp. 156–166). New York: Routledge.
- Eronen, O. (2016). Organising artisans for peace: CMI on a learning curve. In E. Brusset, C. de Coning, & B. Hughes (Eds.), Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation (pp. 141–176). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Fixdal, M. (2012). Introduction: Peacemaking in asymmetrical conflicts. In Fixdal (Ed.), Ways out of war: Peacemakers in the Middle East and Balkans. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Foley, C. (2010). The thin blue Line, how humanitarianism went to war. London/New York: Verso.
- Francis, D. (2002). People, peace, and power: Conflict transformation in action. London: Pluto Press.
- Greig, J. M., & Diehl, P. F. (2012). International mediation: War and conflict in the modern world (1st ed.). Cambridge: Polity.
- Höglund, K., & Svensson, I. (2009). Mediating between tigers and lions: Norwegian peace diplomacy in Sri Lanka's civil war. Contemporary South Asia, 17(2), 175–191.

- Kaldor, M. (2006). New and old wars (2nd ed.). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Kriesberg, L. (2015). Realizing peace. A constructive conflict approach. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Lehti, M. (2019). The era of private peacemakers. A new dialogic approach to mediation (Rethinking peace and conflict studies). Palgrave Macmillan.
- Lehti, M., Féron, É., Rellitz, S., & Romashov, V. (2019). Cross-regional dialogues: Launching an informal platform of local peacebuilders. Vienna: OSCE Network of Think Thanks and Academic Institutions.
- MSN Mediation Support Network (MSN). Mediation and conflict transformation. Discussion Points of the Mediation Support Network (MSN) No. 5, 2014.
- MSN Mediation Support Network: Challenges to mediation support in hot wars: Learnings from Syria and Ukraine. Discussion Points of the Mediation Support Network (MSN) No. 7, 2015.
- Oslo Forum. (2015). Peace making in the new world disorder. Meeting report. Authored by P. Dziatkowicz, C. Buchhold, J. Harlander, and M. Verri.
- Oslo Forum. (2016). Adapting to a new conflict landscape. Meeting report. Authored by P. Dziatkowicz, C. Buchhold, J. Harlander, and T. Andriamasomanana.
- Paffenholz, T., & Ross, N. (2015). Inclusive peace processes – An introduction. Development Dialogue, 63, 67–76.
- Pentikäinen, A. (2015). Reforming UN mediation through inclusion of traditional peacemakers. Development Dialogue, 63, 67–76.
- Piiparinen, T., & Brummer, V. (2012). Globalised peace mediation. In T. Piiparinen & V. Brummer (Eds.), Global networks of mediation: Prospects and avenues for Finland as a peacemaker. Helsinki: The Finnish Institute of International Affairs.
- Quandt, W. B. (2016). Camp David: Peacemaking and politics (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: Bookings Institution Press.
- Régnier, P. (2011). The emerging concept of humanitarian diplomacy: Identification of a community of practice and prospects for international recognition. International Review of the Red Cross, 93(884), 1211–1237.
- Ropers, N. (1995). Peaceful intervention: Structures, processes, and strategies for the constructive regulation of Ethnopolitical conflicts (Berghof report no. 1). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Shea, N. (2016). Nongovernment Organisations as mediators: Making peace in Aceh, Indonesia. Global Change, Peace and Security, 28(2), 177–196.
- Siebert, H. (2014). National dialogues as catalyst of fundamental change. In C. Collén (Ed.), National dialogues and internal mediation processes: Perspectives on theory and practice (pp. 41–45). Helsinki: The Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Finland.
- Strimling, A. (2006). Stepping out of the tracks: Cooperation between official diplomats and private facilitators. International Negotiation, 11(1), 91–127.
- Svensson, I., & Wallensteen, P. (2010). The go-between: Jan Eliasson and the styles of mediation. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- UN Mediation in the Syrian Crisis. (2016). From Kofi Annan to Lakhdar Brahimi. March: International Peace Institute IPI.
- United Nations (UN). (2012). United Nations guidance for effective mediation. New York: United Nations.
- Väyrynen, T., Lehti, M., Féron, É., & Koopman, S. Inclusive mediation and conflict prevention: The Finnish Model. Publication series of the Government's analysis, assessment and research activities 16/2018. Helsinki.
- Wallensteen, P., & Svensson, I. (2016). Fredens Diplomat: Nordisk Medling från Bernadotte till Ahtisaari. Stockholm: Santerus.
- Winter, J. (2012). Postscript: War and peace in a transnational age. In M. Fixdal (Ed.), Ways out of war: Peacemakers in the Middle East and Balkans. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Yarrow, C. H. M. (1978). Quaker Experiences in International Conciliation. New Haven: Yale University Press.

Private Tribunals

► Alternative Dispute Resolution

Property Disputes

► Fair Division

Protection of Civilians

Walt Kilroy

Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Definition

United Nations peacekeeping operations are now regularly given the task of protecting civilians from direct violence, along with the other obligations in their mandate. This can be one of the most challenging aspects of peacekeeping and has become increasingly relevant where these missions operate in areas of ongoing conflict. The responsibility was first added in tentative terms to the mandate in Sierra Leone in 1999, but is now expressed in more prescriptive ways, including the use of force. It refers to protection from direct violent attacks on civilians, rather than structural violence. However, actions are not limited to patrolling, presence by peacekeepers, or direct military action. A much broader range of activities is called for under UN policy on protection of civilians (PoC), including support for a peace process, inclusion in political dialogue, and human rights initiatives. But many challenges arise, such as sovereignty, host state consent, training, and gender representation among the mission members. Troop contributing countries and commanders on the ground may be risk averse, knowing there would be a very real cost for taking robust action. The use of force can be a key dilemma in how the mandate is implemented, with serious consequences from acting and from failing to act. Some notable failures to intervene and protect civilians have been seen in missions such as South Sudan, but the evidence shows that violence is reduced by PoC actions. The concept of protection of civilians by peacekeepers is distinct from the ideas of responsibility to protect, and from humanitarian actors' reference to social protection.

Introduction

In many ways, the idea of protecting civilians from direct attacks goes to the heart of the very idea of peacekeeping. It is certainly central to the popular perception what these missions are supposed to do. The idea is, however, one which emerged only at the very end of the twentieth century. The original concept of peacekeeping dating from the 1950s was much more limited. It focused on monitoring a ceasefire and providing reassurance. It was less likely to deal with situations of ongoing conflict. The core principles included consent of all the parties in the conflict, with the use of force in only very limited situations, where peacekeepers themselves were coming under attack. What remains consistent with today's multidimensional peace operations is that they cannot "impose" peace, but can help to create conditions where political solutions may be found by those willing to deal with conflict in this way.

Peacekeeping has of course changed significantly since the end of the cold war, and the world has presented new challenges. The traumas of genocidal killings in Rwanda (1994) and Srebrenica (1995) highlighted the cost of failing to act in some situations, and forced the internal community to consider its obligations and the limits of state sovereignty. One response was the very different idea of responsibility to protect (R2P), which was adopted at a UN summit in 2005. This relates to a wide range of measures up to and including full-scale military intervention, which clearly does not involve consent of all parties. But the separate question arose of where to draw the line in situations where a UN peacekeeping force is in place or about to be deployed. This question could no longer be avoided.

First Steps

The shock of seeing genocide taking place as the world watched and emergence of the concept of human security (as opposed to state security) placed civilians firmly on the agenda. Ethnic cleansing and gender-based violence, which have been around for so long, became recognized as relevant terms for the first time. The Report of the Secretary-General to the Security Council on the Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflict (UN Secretary General 1999, p. 22, par. 68) stated: "The plight of civilians is no longer something which can be neglected, or made secondary because it complicates political negotiations or interests. It is fundamental to the central mandate of the Organization." Later that year, the UN Security Council expressed its willingness to consider how peacekeeping mandates might address the issue better. This was followed shortly after by a mandate renewal for the mission in Sierra Leone which included protection for the first time, in very tentative terms with many caveats. Citing Chapter VII of the UN Charter, it said the mission “may take the necessary action . . . within its capabilities and areas of deployment, to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence, taking into account the responsibilities of the Government of Sierra Leone and ECOMOG [the military force of the Economic Community of West African States]” (UN Security Council 1999). It is important to note that the primary responsibility for protection is still attributed to the state (a feature shared with R2P), with the international community acting to complement this. In other ways, however, mandates have become much more definitive, and in some cases robust. Within a few years, most mandates – covering nearly all uniformed personnel – would include civilian protection among the many tasks (Hultman 2013; United Nations 2015).

The definition used by the United Nations for protection of civilians is “without prejudice to the primary responsibility of the host state, integrated and coordinated activities by all civilian and uniformed mission components to prevent, deter or respond to threats of physical violence against civilians, within the mission’s capabilities and areas of deployment, through the use of all necessary means, up to and including deadly force” (UN Department of Peace Operations 2020, p. 3). The caveat about capabilities is a significant one, given that peacekeepers may face restrictions on their freedom of movement, do sometimes come under attack, and often cover vast geographic areas where surface travel is difficult. However, the wording in mandates has become in stronger over time, and sometimes include calls for more proactive and robust approaches and effective patrolling. For example, the word “imminent” was removed from threats of physical violence which were covered as mandates were renewed for operations in Mali (MINUSMA) in 2015, and later for the Central African Republic (MINUSCA), the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUSCO), and South Sudan (UNMISS).

The UN commitment to civilian protection, and the difficulties involved, were underlined in the major review of peacekeeping in 2015 known as the HIPPO report (Report of the High level Independent Panel on Peace Operations). It states that PoC “is a core obligation of the United Nations, but expectations and capability must converge” (United Nations 2015, p. 11). It says that mandates must be realistic and ultimately linked to a wider political approach. The report reminds us that a UN presence does not take away the obligation of a host government to protect civilians; however, this primary responsibility does not remove the UN obligation to act when the host state is unwilling or unable to protect its citizens.

It would be misleading to suggest, however, that protection is simply a matter of presence, a show of strength, and the threat of force. There is an understandable focus on these tangible aspects, but protection is a great deal more than this, especially when it comes to dealing with the root causes of violence against civilians. The related (but separate) concept of R2P also suffers from the same misrepresentation. Both include a wide range of actions, including supporting and encouraging a state to provide security for its citizens, with the use of force being an option at one end of the spectrum. Other aspects may be less conspicuous but can be just as significant in handling matters before they become a crisis. UN policy on PoC involves three different tiers (Johnson 2018; United Nations 2015; UN Department of Peace Operations 2020). One tier deals with dialogue, mediation, negotiation, and public information. This reminds us of the primacy of politics in peacekeeping: conflict ultimately requires political solutions rather than ones imposed by force, even if there is a role for military action in creating the conditions for political engagement. A second tier involves uniformed peacekeepers (police and military) deterring or respond to attacks on civilians, using methods such as presence, patrolling, and possibly the use of force under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The third tier is a broader program which helps to create a more secure environment, including actions such as human rights monitoring, accountability, or security sector reform. Taken together, this ambitious and wide-ranging program involving all three levels is the kind of integrated, holistic approach which is often called for so that long-term, meaningful change can be facilitated, rather than short-term, output-focused activities which are donor-driven and prone to unintended consequences. Ownership of such a program is, as always, a key issue, along with the questions of knowledge, decision-making, resources, and power. Mandates for multidimensional missions have become increasingly complex and detailed, making competing demands on peacekeeping operations. But this three-tiered approach recognizes the way in which conflict dynamics evolve and multiple causal factors interact as a complex adaptive system (Brusset et al. 2016; de Coning 2016, 2020).

As with any conflict analysis or humanitarian operation, essential aspects will be missed if a gender-blind approach is taken. Using a gender lens helps to see the way in which women and girls can experience war and insecurity differently to men and boys (Ní Aoláin et al. 2011). This includes power dynamics, social relations, expectations, stigma, and the roles both genders are presumed to fulfill. Conflict-related sexual violence is of course one way in which these experiences are different and has been experienced in alarming levels in some of the areas where UN missions have protection mandates, such as the Democratic Republic of Congo and South Sudan (UNMISS and Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights 2017). However, it is not a matter of portraying women as victims with no agency, or indeed men simply as perpetrators. Women and men can also have different networks, capacities, and social capital when it comes to warning of future conflict and mechanisms for managing it. Taking this analysis seriously means that training and systems in peace operations have to include a gender perspective. At a UN level, there is scope for a greater exchange between the sometimes parallel discourses on protection and on women, peace, and security (Cuzzuol and Wels 2021; Hultman and Muvumba Sellström 2019). It is worth noting that while the number of women in senior positions in peacekeeping operations has increased considerably, the number of military personnel still falls far below the UN's own target.

Protection in Practice

One of the places where the protection agenda has been pushed forward is the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC), which is host to one of the longest-running peacekeeping missions (Berdal 2018). Currently called MONUSCO, it has close to 20,000 troops and police covering a huge territory for more than a decade. A variety of armed groups and state forces in the east of the country have attacked civilians, and sexual violence has been a feature as well. Each context is different, and some call for innovation or a response to specific events, perhaps at short notice. In the case of the DRC, a specific unit was set up to carry out "robust" peacekeeping in 2013, after the city of Goma was taken over by the M23 armed group. This Force Intervention Brigade (FIB) was a significant departure and was approved by the UN Security Council (2013). It was effectively a combat force of about 3000 troops, most of whom were from Africa. It also had artillery and attack helicopters, and specific rules of engagement (Berdal and Ucko 2015; Müller 2015; Murphy 2016). It defeated the M23 group and sent an important signal about peacekeepers' willingness to use force in order to protect civilians. It appears to be the kind of robust action which would meet some of the demands for the international community to "do something" in the face of atrocities. However, taking this example and merely scaling it up is neither a simple matter nor without serious consequences. There are many other armed actors in the country, and a war-fighting operation would completely change the nature of the mission and its relationship with the government and the people. Even if this kind of robust action meets a specific need, force is ultimately an interim measure in peacekeeping, with politics remaining the ultimate guarantor of rights, stability, security, and national ownership in the long term.

The use of force by peacekeepers, even with the explicit approval of the Security Council under Chapter VII in strictly defined situations, is of course contested. While calls for the UN to "act" are frequently heard when abuses are seen to be taking place, there are important risks and costs for taking action, as well as for deciding not to act.

Apart from changing the operation into something which few would recognize as peacekeeping, there may be civilian casualties, the UN would become more of a target, and losses among peacekeepers could make troop and police contributing countries reluctant to send their personnel to the mission. The matter has been discussed in detail by Hunt (2017), Slim (2001), Piiparinen (2016), Bellamy and Hunt (2015), Karlsrud (2015), and Howard and Dayal (2018). Kjeksrud (2016) has analyzed use of force for PoC according to the particular threats faced and actions taken, and shown that it is more likely to be effective in stopping violence in certain situations, with important implications for preparation, training, and planning.

The operation in South Sudan, on the other hand, faced situations where the UN was criticized for failing to act at times, despite having a mandate and the knowledge that civilians were under attack where its troops were deployed. The UN Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS) was present even before the country gained its independence in July 2011, following a long war of secession with Sudan. The new state moved into civil war just over two years later, as a delicate power-sharing arrangement fell apart and ethnic divisions quickly became part of the conflict. The ethnic nature of forced displacement, killings, gender-based violence, and looting were immediately evident, and the war has in fact consisted of a number of overlapping conflicts (UNMISS and Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights 2017). But the main actors included government forces and the rival coalition partner who had been driven from power, each of which were dominated by a significant ethnic group. Both were responsible for brutal attacks of various kinds on civilians. Death tolls are notoriously difficult to estimate, but one based on epidemiological evidence put it at almost 400,000 in the first 5 years alone when indirect deaths are included (Checchi et al. 2018). A third of the population was displaced, amounting to about four million people. Food production and distribution was affected to the extent that famine – which was anything but a natural disaster – was declared in parts of some states in 2017. By 2019, half of the population faced food insecurity. These conditions included exactly the kind of scenario described in the PoC mandate, yet the mission was faced with a hostile host state and sometimes struggled to respond effectively. Zambakari et al. (2019) describe the UN response as “nothing short of disappointing and showcases international hypocrisy. Nowhere is this more apparent than the conduct of UNMISS in regard to its mandate to protect civilians” (p. 124). They point to a mismatch between the mandate, its interpretation, political backing for the operation, and the resources and capacity made available.

One of the features which is unusual about South Sudan was the large numbers of civilians who spontaneously sought refuge at UN bases, and the way in which these were turned into camps (Arensen 2016; Briggs and Monaghan 2017; Kilroy 2018; Lilly 2014; Stern 2015; Sundberg 2020; United Nations 2019). The numbers and speed with which people turned up presented an enormous challenge, with approximately 20,000 people seeking protection at the UN base in Malakal in one day in December 2013 as the conflict erupted. One of the dilemmas was whether some of these were in fact armed elements, so a principle had to be quickly established, that only those without uniforms or guns could enter. UNMISS and humanitarian organizations had to organize a division labor, in terms of providing protection and also basic needs. After some relocation of camps with very poor living conditions, most ending up directly adjoining the UN base rather than inside it, and some held tens of thousands of people. At one point, more than 200,000 people were sheltered in them, amounting to roughly a tenth of the internally displaced people (IDPs) in South Sudan. While UN policy was developed in response to the situation, it referred to them simply as “PoC sites.” It was keen to avoid becoming responsible for them on a long-term basis. The mission started redesignating them as regular IDP camps and handing over responsibility for protection there to the state security services in 2020 (Mold 2020). While the state does indeed have primary responsibility for civilian protection, this caused great unease among some residents: the same government which had attacked them was now being put in charge of their safety inside the camps. The UN argument was that people were staying because services were provided, and sometimes came and went to jobs outside the camps. Resources could be freed up to carry out patrols which were needed elsewhere to implement the PoC mandate.

Clearly camps like these are an emergency measure which cannot protect the whole population, yet they can still have an important role. Their existence arose from large numbers of people seeking shelter in the first place, when the most basic of services could barely be provided. The question of people moving on from sites or IDP camps to return home should always be subject to important principles: that it is entirely voluntary, informed, and supported. PoC as a whole in any case requires a wide range of activities: arguments can always be made about best use of resources, and not all options involve an opportunity cost which rule out other actions. One comprehensive assessment of the sites concluded they had “unequivocally saved lives and helped prevent a far worse trajectory for the conflict in South Sudan” (Day et al. 2019, p. 3). A possible analogy is that of a hospital emergency room, which is important yet does not replace the much wider health system of which it forms a part. The sites are not a solution in themselves but can play a vital role.

Even though important and urgent protection can be pointed to, there were repeated failings in several cases where sometimes dozens of civilians were killed inside PoC sites when organized attacks on them were responded to inadequately by UNMISS. These happened in Bor in 2014 (Foley 2017), Malakal in 2016 (Arensen 2016; Center for Civilians in Conflict 2016a), and Juba in 2016 (Center for Civilians in Conflict 2016b; Spink 2016). The killings in Juba were part of a wider outbreak of violence when a delicate power-sharing agreement once again collapsed. The UN itself came under assault, but was criticized for its failings at the sites and for not responding to reports of other ongoing attacks very close to its bases. The internal report was damning, saying that there was a failure to plan for foreseeable violence. It pointed to lack of leadership and a “chaotic and ineffective response” when a swift action was essential, and that it “did not operate under a unified command, resulting in multiple and sometimes conflicting orders” (United Nations 2016). The force commander was relieved of his position in the mission shortly after.

Apart from risk aversion and lack of preparedness, one of the most significant difficulties is that of managing the relationship with a host government which is hostile, as evidenced by the physical attacks on the UN itself. The government of South Sudan has expelled humanitarian agencies and their staff, and repeatedly obstructed UNMISS. Despite the Chapter VII mandate, a UN mission is still dependent on the host government to allow it to operate: it is not an occupying power and is there only with the consent of the state. Governments have blocked deployment of the UN, can make things difficult in many ways such as restricting freedom of movement, and even require the peacekeepers to leave. Day et al. have spelled out how “systematic obstructions to the freedom of movement of UNMISS and its partners – by the Government and other parties – has created serious impediments to the Mission’s ability to deliver on its protection and humanitarian mandates” (2019, p. 13). The way obstructions arise has been detailed by Duursma (2019). The difficulty of negotiating and maintaining host state consent, and the very serious implications for peacekeeping, are explored by Sebastián and Gorur (2018), Gorur 2019, and Labuda (2020). This is especially significant in a situation such as South Sudan or Darfur, when a government or its proxies are responsible for some of the attacks on civilians.

Summary

In many ways, the protection of civilians is both new and old. Despite being seen as an innovation which presents us with many new challenges, many of which are still being worked through, it also deals with a fundamental of peacekeeping. It resonates with the high ideals of the UN Charter of sparing humanity from the scourge of war. In line with this bold aspiration, PoC exposes the existing tensions which are already faced by peace operations in areas of ongoing conflict. These include:

- Complex, multidimensional mandates with long lists of tasks (some of which might seem incompatible).
- The difficulty in getting uniformed personnel from troop and police contributing countries and their understandable reluctance to put these people at risk.
- The de facto “double line of command” in which UN orders may not be implemented until a contingent has checked with their own national military leadership.
- The dilemmas around the use of force and risk aversion in general.
- The quality and training of uniformed personnel, their rapid turnover, and the number of women deployed.
- Working alongside state forces, which is a recognition of host state sovereignty, but is problematic where these forces have been involved in attacking civilians or other human rights abuses.
- Maintaining the consent of parties to the conflict and dealing with obstruction of all kinds, especially where the host government is among those responsible for the violence against civilians.
- Incorporating a gender perspective in planning, prioritization, and operations.
- Choices about allocation of resources and political risk, at a time when peacekeeping budgets are being reduced significantly.
- Ownership of the peace process, and indeed the health and very existence of an inclusive peace process.
- Involving local communities in the overall work of protection, many of which have significant (but overlooked) resources, understanding, and abilities to anticipate problems and deal with conflict.

Highlighting these difficulties, which in any case affect peacekeeping as a whole, may create the impression that civilian protection is unrealistic. In fact, there is no basis for a generalized dismissal, and there are many examples of very real protection being provided. An “all or nothing” assessment does not take us any closer to the nonlinear, complex realities of people living in conflict zones. While specific shortcomings and failures have been seen, especially in South Sudan in 2016, it would be impossible to claim that PoC practices and policy have not had any effect on the security and safety of civilians. An attack which is deterred by presence, patrolling, or dialogue will not show up as an event or data point. The research on peacekeeping in general has repeatedly shown that operations do have a beneficial effect on several aspects of conflict (for example, Hultman et al. 2019), and recent studies show the effectiveness of PoC operations in particular on reducing violence (Carnegie and Mikulaschek 2020; Phayal and Prins 2020). It is significant that an effect can be seen, despite the causal complexity involving so many interacting variables besides any PoC initiatives, and the long timeframes which may be involved.

One way of assessing performance is to consider the case of Darfur, where the joint UN-African Union mission in Darfur in Sudan (UNAMID) concluded operations at the end of 2020 when its mandate expired. This included civilian protection, which was to be taken over the government of Sudan. The concerns expressed by communities in Darfur – including protests by displaced people – and by international human rights organizations about the withdrawal show that the operation was in fact valued by those affected (Guardian 2020; Human Rights Watch 2020; Mamiya and Hansen 2020). While making clear that there were failures by UNAMID amid constant restrictions by the host state of Sudan, Mamiya and Hansen also say that the operation “succeeded in deterring the worst abuses of the civilian population in Darfur, protecting thousands of people and facilitating the distribution of humanitarian assistance” (2020, p. 18). The increase in attacks on civilians and displacement in the months after this mission came to an end also suggests it was having an effect on protection (African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies 2021; Amnesty International 2021; UN Secretary General 2021).

Legitimacy and state sovereignty are of course brought into focus by the PoC agenda, and this is where the power politics of the UN Security Council are a significant factor. Civilian protection is another tool or framework available to “the international community” which can be used or ignored. Any proposed mission faces the threat of veto by a permanent member of the Council, along with the specifics of its mandate. The veto was used repeatedly by Russia and China on much less contentious proposals for Syria. Myanmar is also insulated from serious sanction or action by the Security Council despite the killings and expulsion of the Rohingya population and repression of protests in 2021. But this is a reflection on the structure of the Security Council rather than a weakness in the concept of protection.

In the end, while action to protect civilians may be most visible in terms of urgent needs and crisis actions, it is actually part of a holistic and sustainable approach to conflict. The primacy of politics rather than military action, and genuine ownership of a healthy and inclusive peace process, are part of the protection agenda in the long run.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions
- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

African Centre for Justice and Peace Studies. (2021). Sudanese authorities must urgently investigate violent attacks in Al-Jeneina, West Darfur. 6 April 2021. https://www.acjps.org/sudanese-authorities-must-

- urgently-investigate-violent-attacks-in-al-jeneina-west-darfur/. Accessed 22 April 2021.
- Amnesty International. (2021). Sudan: Horrific attacks on displacement camps show UN peacekeepers still needed in Darfur. 1 March 2021. <https://www.amnesty.org/en/latest/campaigns/2021/03/sudan-horrific-attacks-on-displacement-camps-show-in-darfur/>. Accessed 22 April 2021.
- Arensen, M. J. (2016). If we leave we are killed: Lessons learned from South Sudan protection of civilian sites 2013–2016. International Organization for Migration, Juba. https://publications.iom.int/system/files/pdf/if_we_leave_0.pdf. Accessed 16 Jan 2017.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Hunt, C. T. (2015). Twenty-first century UN peace operations: Protection, force and the changing security environment. International Affairs, 91(6), 1277–1298.
- Berdal, M. (2018). The state of UN peacekeeping: Lessons from Congo. Journal of Strategic Studies, 41(5), 721–750.
- Berdal, M., & Ucko, D. H. (2015). The use of force in UN peacekeeping operations. The RUSI Journal, 160(1), 6–12. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03071847.2015.1016718>.
- Briggs, C., & Monaghan, L. (2017). Protection of civilian sites: Lessons from South Sudan for future operations. Oslo: Norwegian Refugee Council.
- Brusset, E., de Coning, C., & Hughes, B. (2016). Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Carnegie, A., & Mikulaschek, C. (2020). The promise of peacekeeping: Protecting civilians in civil wars. International Organization, 74(4), 810–832.
- Center for Civilians in Conflict. (2016a). A refuge in flames: The February 17–18 violence in Malakal POC. Washington, DC: Center for Civilians in Conflict. http://civiliansinconflict.org/uploads/files/publications/ViolenceMalakalPOC_LowResSingle.pdf. Accessed 9 Jan 2017.
- Center for Civilians in Conflict. (2016b). Under fire: The July 2016 violence in Juba and UN response. Washington, DC: Center for Civilians in Conflict. http://civiliansinconflict.org/uploads/files/publications/CIVIC_-_Juba_Violence_Report_-_October_2016.pdf. Accessed 6 Oct 2016.
- Checchi, F., Testa, A., Warsame, A., Quach, L., & Burns, R. (2018). Estimates of crisis-attributable mortality in South Sudan, December 2013–April 2018: A statistical analysis. London: London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine.
- Cuzzuol, L., & Wels, W. (2021). UN peacekeeping operations and gendered threats to the protection of civilians. New York: <https://www.ipinst.org/wp-content/uploads/2021/02/IPI-E-RPT-UN-Peacekeeping-Ops-5.pdf>. Accessed 16 April 2021.
- Day, A., Hunt, C. T., Yin, H., & Kumalo, L. (2019). Assessing the effectiveness of the United Nations Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS). Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs. <https://effectivepeaceops.org>.

- net/wp-content/uploads/2019/04/EPON-UNMISS-Report-LOWRES.pdf. Accessed 23 April 2021.
- de Coning, C. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience, 4(3), 166–181.
- de Coning, C. (2020). Adaptive peace operations: Navigating the complexity of influencing societal change without causing harm. International Peacekeeping, 27(5), 836–858.
- Duursma, A. (2019). Obstruction and intimidation of peacekeepers: How armed actors undermine civilian protection efforts. Journal of Peace Research, 56(2), 234–248. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343318800522>.
- Foley, C. (2017). UN peacekeeping operations and the protection of civilians: Saving succeeding generations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1017/9781108236126>.
- Gorur, A. (2019). Managing host-state consent and the protection of civilians. Evolution of the protection of civilians in UN peacekeeping. Australian Strategic Policy Institute. <https://doi.org/10.2307/resrep23103.6>.
- Guardian. (2020). Halt plan to withdraw Sudan peacekeepers, UN urged. 28 May 2020. <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2020/may/28/halt-plan-to-withdraw-sudan-peacekeepers-un-urged-darfur>. Accessed 22 April 2021.
- Howard, L., & Dayal, A. K. (2018). The use of force in UN peacekeeping. International Organization, 72(1), 71–103. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0020818317000431>.
- Hultman, L. (2013). UN peace operations and protection of civilians: Cheap talk or norm implementation? Journal of Peace Research, 50(59), 59–73.
- Hultman, L., & Muvumba Sellström, A. (2019). WPS and protection of civilians. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. Oxford: OUP.
- Hultman, L., Nygård, H. M., & Hegre, H. (2019). Evaluating the conflict-reducing effect of UN peacekeeping operations. Journal of Politics, 81(1), 215–232.
- Human Rights Watch. (2020). Sudan: UN/AU plan for Darfur falls short. 16 March 2020. www.hrw.org/news/2020/03/16/sudan-un/au-plan-darfur-falls-short. Accessed 22 April 2021.
- Hunt, C. T. (2017). All necessary means to what ends? The unintended consequences of the ‘robust turn’ in UN peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 24(1), 108–131.
- Johnson, H. F. (2018). Protection of civilians in the United Nations: A peacekeeping illusion? In M. Peter & C. de Coning (Eds.), United Nations peace operations in a changing global order. Springer.
- Karlsrud, J. (2015). The UN at war: Examining the consequences of peace-enforcement mandates for the UN peacekeeping operations in the CAR, the DRC and Mali. Third World Quarterly, 36(1), 40–54.
- Kilroy, W. (2018). The evolution of civilian protection in peacekeeping mandates: The reality of UNMISS operations in South Sudan. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 29, 133–143. <https://doi.org/10.3318/isia.2018.29.12>.
- Kjeksrud, S. (2016). The utility of force for protecting civilians. In H. Willmot, R. Mamiya, S. Sheeran, & M. Weller (Eds.), Protection of civilians (pp. 329–349). Oxford: OUP.
- Labuda, P. I. (2020). With or against the state? Reconciling the protection of civilians and host-state support in UN peacekeeping. New York: International Peace Institute.
- Lilly, D. (2014). Protection of civilians sites: A new type of displacement settlement? Humanitarian Exchange, 62 (September), 31–33.
- Mamiya, R., & Hansen, W. (2020). Assessing the effectiveness of the United Nations-African Union Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID). Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs. <https://effectivepeaceops.net/publication/unamid/>. Accessed 9 Mar 2021.
- Mold, F. (2020). UN protection of civilians sites begin transitioning to conventional displacement camps. UNMISS, 4 September 2020. <https://unmiss.unmissions.org/un-protection-civilians-sites-begin-transitioning-conventional-displacement-camps>. Accessed 21 April 2021.
- Müller, L. (2015). The force intervention brigade – United Nations forces beyond the fine line between peacekeeping and peace enforcement. Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 20(3), 359–380.
- Murphy, R. (2016). UN peacekeeping in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the protection of civilians. Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 21(2), 209–246. <https://doi.org/10.1093/jcsl/krv030>.
- Ní Aoláin, F., Haynes, D. F., & Cahn, N. (2011). On the frontlines: Gender, war, and the post-conflict process. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Phayal, A., & Prins, B. C. (2020). Deploying to protect: The effect of military peacekeeping deployments on violence against civilians. International Peacekeeping, 27(2), 311–336.
- Piiparinen, T. (2016). Intervening to strengthen sovereignty: The lessons of the UN intervention brigade for global peacekeeping. International Relations, 30(2), 154–175. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0047117815595110>.
- Sebastián, S., & Gorur. (2018). UN peacekeeping and host-state consent: How missions navigate relationships with governments. Washington, DC: Stimson Center. <https://www.stimson.org/wp-content/files/file-attachments/UN-PeacekeepingAndHostStateConsent.pdf>. Accessed 15 Jan 2021.
- Slim, H. (2001). Violence and humanitarianism: Moral paradox and the protection of civilians. Security Dialogue, 32(3), 325–339.
- Spink, L. (2016). Challenges and conditions for deploying an effective regional protection force to South Sudan, 31 Oct 2016. Washington, DC: Center for Civilians in Conflict. http://civiliansinconflict.org/uploads/files/publications/RPF_Final.pdf.
- Stern, J. (2015). Establishing safety and security at protection of civilians sites. https://www.stimson.org/wp-content/files/file-attachments/CIC-Policy-Brief_2_Sept-2015.pdf. Accessed 17 April 2021.

- Sundberg, R. (2020). UN peacekeeping and forced displacement in South Sudan. International Peacekeeping, 27(2), 210–237.
- UN Department of Peace Operations. (2020). Protection of civilians in United Nations peacekeeping handbook. New York: United Nations. <http://dag.un.org/handle/11176/401048>. Accessed 16 April 2021.
- UN Secretary General. (1999). Report of the Secretary-General to the Security Council on the Protection of Civilians in Armed Conflict.
- UN Secretary General. (2021). Situation in the Sudan and the activities of the United Nations Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in the Sudan. Report of the Secretary-General to the UN Security Council, S/2021/199. 1 March 2021.
- UN Security Council. (1999). Security Council Resolution 1270, 22 October 1999.
- UN Security Council. (2013). Security Council Resolution 2098, 28 March 2013, UN Doc S/RES/2098.
- United Nations. (2015). The protection of civilians in United Nations peacekeeping. New York.
- United Nations. (2016). Executive Summary of the Independent Special Investigation into the violence which occurred in Juba in 2016 and UNMISS response, (Executive Summary only released by UN Sec Gen). http://www.un.org/News/dh/infocus/sudan/Public_Executive_Summary_on_the_Special_Investigation_Report_1_Nov_2016.pdf. Accessed 3 Nov 2017.
- United Nations. (2019). Future planning for the protection of civilians sites in South Sudan. Report of the Secretary General, S/2019/741, New York, (September 2019).
- UNMISS and Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights. (2017). A report on violations and abuses of international human rights law and violations of international humanitarian law in the context of the fighting in Juba, South Sudan, in July 2016, January 2017. <http://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/ReportJuba16Jan2017.pdf>. Accessed 16 Jan 2017.
- Zambakari, C., Kang, T. K., & Sanders, R. A. (2019). The role of the UN Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS) in protecting civilians. In S. C. Roach & D. K. Hudson (Eds.), The challenge of governance in South Sudan: Corruption, peacebuilding, and foreign intervention (pp. 95–130). Abingdon/New York: Routledge.

Protective Accompaniment

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Protracted Conflict Process

- ▶ Russia and Frozen Conflicts in the Post-Soviet Space

Q

Qualitative Research

- ▶ Auto-photography

Queer

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding

Quantification

- ▶ Measuring the Implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda

R

R2P

► R2P and Prevention

R2P and Prevention

Jaclyn D. Streitfeld-Hall and Savita Pawnday
Global Centre for the Responsibility to Protect,
New York, NY, USA

Synonyms

Crimes against humanity; Ethnic cleansing; Genocide; Mass atrocity crimes; R2P; Responsibility to protect; War crimes

Definition

This chapter explores the concept of the responsibility to protect (R2P) populations from genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity and ethnic cleansing, and charts the evolution of how it has been implemented since 2005. The chapter begins by outlining the institutional development of R2P and acknowledges its influence on the discussions on preventing and responding to mass atrocity crimes in various situations around the world.

Since its inception, normative progress of R2P has included dispelling myths and criticism about the principles of the concept. These criticisms have ranged from R2P being an attack on sovereignty or another “Western” means to justify the use of force to now focusing on critiques of how the R2P has been implemented and whether national, regional, and international actors have the capacity to uphold their responsibilities for prevention.

While acknowledging some critiques of how R2P has been applied to certain country situations, as well as gaps in the capacity of the international community to prevent and proactively respond to atrocity crimes, the article highlights how mitigation strategies undertaken in Kenya, Côte d’Ivoire, and Gambia were instrumental in preventing the commission of large-scale atrocities. These cases highlight not just the role of international and regional actors but also increase our understanding of what can be done by national stakeholders to guarantee nonrecurrence.

What Is the Responsibility to Protect?

R2P is a political commitment, unanimously adopted by heads of state and government at the 2005 UN World Summit. It is aimed at preventing and halting genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and ethnic cleansing. R2P stipulates that every state has the primary responsibility to protect its populations from the four crimes, the wider international community has the responsibility to encourage and assist individual states in meeting that responsibility, and if a state is manifestly failing to protect its populations, the international community must be prepared to take appropriate collective action in a timely and decisive manner and in accordance with the UN Charter. It is a political commitment and call to action that politics as usual cannot continue in the face of conscious shocking crimes of genocide, ethnic cleansing, war crimes, and crimes against humanity.

R2P emerged in response to the failure to protect populations during the genocides in Rwanda and at Srebrenica during the 1990s. It was designed as a new operational and political response to accomplishing the aim of “Never Again” – the idea that the world should never stand idly by when populations are suffering from genocide, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and ethnic cleansing. This new approach would be based not just on crisis response, but also on taking steps to actively prevent the conditions that lead to the commission of mass atrocity crimes.

R2P also emerged as a response to the failures of so-called “humanitarian intervention,” whereby states acted unilaterally under the guiding principle of a “right to intervene” in order to protect populations from humanitarian crises. The disastrous consequences of such interventions without approval by the UN or the target state helped drive the establishment of the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty (ICISS), which initially devised the term “Responsibility to Protect.” In its final report in 2001, ICISS framed R2P around the idea of “responsibility” rather than a “right” and on “protection” rather than “intervention,” placing the needs of vulnerable populations first (Evans 2008; ICISS 2001). Unlike humanitarian intervention, where states could take whatever military actions they deemed “necessary,” under R2P, military interventions are restricted to the protection of populations only in the context of the four mass atrocity crimes and only when interventions are authorized by the UN Security Council under Chapters VII or VIII of the UN Charter.

Inclusion of the responsibility to protect principle in the World Summit Outcome Document

4 years after the ICISS report helped shift the focus from the right of interveners to the idea that the international community has a responsibility to protect populations from atrocities (United Nations 2005). This shift was reinforced by the near simultaneous development of other norms and concepts, like the Protection of Civilians, the Women, Peace and Security Agenda, and Children in Armed Conflict, that emphasized the responsibility of the international community to protect vulnerable populations rather than standing idly by in the name of sovereignty.

When heads of state and government gathered at the 2005 World Summit, they unanimously agreed to the responsibility to protect as formulated in the following paragraphs:

2005 World Summit Outcome Document

Responsibility to protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity

138. Each individual State has the responsibility to protect its populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing, and crimes against humanity. This responsibility entails the prevention of such crimes, including their incitement, through appropriate and necessary means. We accept that responsibility and will act in accordance with it. The international community should, as appropriate, encourage and help States to exercise this responsibility and support the United Nations in establishing an early warning capability.

139. The international community, through the United Nations, also has the responsibility to use appropriate diplomatic, humanitarian and other peaceful means, in accordance with Chapters VI and VIII of the Charter, to help protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. In this context, we are prepared to take collective action, in a timely and decisive manner, through the Security Council, in accordance with the Charter, including Chapter VII, on a case-by-case basis and in cooperation with relevant regional organizations as appropriate, should peaceful means be inadequate and national authorities manifestly fail to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity. We stress the need for the General Assembly to continue consideration of the responsibility to protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity and its implications, bearing in mind the principles of the Charter and international law. We also intend to commit ourselves, as necessary and appropriate, to helping States build capacity to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity and to assisting those which are under stress before crises and conflicts break out.

140. We fully support the mission of the Special Adviser of the Secretary-General on the Prevention of Genocide.

R2P is a political commitment. Framed around the concept of “sovereignty as responsibility,” R2P builds upon the notion that state sovereignty does not shield governments from international scrutiny but rather that such sovereignty bestows a moral responsibility upon the government to protect all those within their borders (Deng et al. 1996). Moreover, in order to avoid repeating past failures, R2P served as a tool to counteract the politics of indifference. It was designed to ensure the international community responds to help protect populations within states that were unwilling or unable to uphold this sovereign responsibility. As noted by Gareth Evans, co-chair of ICISS, “the whole point of the R2P doctrine was to generate a reflex international response that genocide and other mass atrocity crimes happening behind sovereign state walls was everybody’s responsibility, not nobody’s.” The aim was “to create a new norm of international behavior which states would feel ashamed to violate, compelled to observe, or at least embarrassed to ignore” (Evans 2008).

Four Crimes and Three Pillars

R2P was created to prevent and halt the four crimes of genocide, ethnic cleansing, wars crimes and crimes against humanity. The crimes of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity are clearly defined in the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (United Nations 2002).

- Genocide: It includes acts committed in a deliberate attempt to destroy in whole or in part a national, ethnic, racial, or religious group. To constitute genocide, there must be a proven intent on the part of perpetrators. Victims of the crime of genocide are not randomly targeted: They are deliberately chosen, based on their real or perceived membership to one of the four types of groups.

- War crimes: They include acts that constitute grave breaches of the laws and customs of armed conflict, particularly those of the Geneva Conventions. War crimes can only be committed in the context of an armed conflict or protracted armed violence. Combatants and noncombatants can both be considered victims of war crimes.
- Crimes against humanity: They include acts committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against a civilian population. Widespread refers to the large-scale violence in relation to the number of victims or its extension over a broad geographic area. Systematic means that it is part of a wider policy or plan: this excludes random, accidental, or isolated acts of violence.
- Ethnic cleansing: While there is no formal legal definition of ethnic cleansing, it involves the systematic forced removal of distinct minority groups from a given territory, often with the intent of making it ethnically homogeneous. The crime “ethnic cleansing” has not been recognized as an independent crime under international law and is therefore considered as a subset of crimes against humanity.

R2P is primarily focused on prevention. Apart from the moral imperative to prevent and halt mass atrocities, as well as a government’s relevant international legal and political obligations, prevention saves lives. Also as a strategy, prevention is more effective and typically less expensive than response. To further consolidate the preventive aspects of R2P within its normative structure, the first report of the Secretary-General on R2P conceptualized the implementation of R2P in the context of a three pillar strategy (UN Secretary-General 2009):

- Pillar I: Every state has the responsibility to protect its populations from the four mass atrocity crimes.
- Pillar II: The wider international community has the responsibility to encourage and assist individual states in meeting that responsibility.

- Pillar III: If a state is manifestly failing to protect its populations, the international community must be prepared to take appropriate collective action, in a timely and decisive manner and in accordance with the UN Charter.

Actions under Pillar 1 include policies a state can implement domestically to uphold its responsibility to protect, for example, constitutionally and legally protecting human rights and minority rights; ensuring equal access to justice for all; establishing laws against hate speech and incitement; ensuring education curriculum does not privilege one group over another or foster identity-based divisions; and memorializing and acknowledging past atrocities, both domestically (where relevant) and internationally.

Under Pillar 2 the international community should assist a state in upholding its responsibility to protect by providing financial, logistical, or development assistance to a state to enable the government to fulfill its Pillar 1 commitments. In this context, denying the means to commit atrocities by suspending trade, military training, and aid programs with governments that are abusing and/or violating human rights.

Pillar 3 includes both coercive and non-coercive measures that may be employed by the international community in protecting populations at risk. It must be noted that although R2P is often equated with military intervention, the tool box that the disposal of the international community includes multiple measures, such as using good offices, mediation and other forms of diplomacy; applying targeted sanctions against identified perpetrators; authorizing and upholding arms embargoes that restrict or deny the means to commit atrocities; establishing no-fly zones; authorizing Fact-Finding Missions and Commissions of Inquiry to gather evidence of potential atrocity crimes; establishing or providing support to international tribunals, the ICC and other institutions of international justice in order to hold perpetrators accountable; or deploying peace-keeping missions.

The three pillars have served as a framework for discussing the different facets of prevention and response in mass atrocity situations and have been frequently invoked by member states when addressing R2P.

Normative and Institutional Progress Since 2005

Since its adoption in the World Summit Outcome Document, R2P has been a useful tool for energizing the discussions around mass atrocity prevention and demonstrating the distinction between atrocity prevention and conflict prevention approaches. In the first decade after its inception, discussions on R2P were about conceptually clarifying R2P and about expanding political consensus. There is now virtually universal acceptance of the abstract concept that all states have a responsibility to protect their populations. This normative development has largely been facilitated by actions taken by the UN and its member states that have encouraged wider acceptance of R2P and facilitated its implementation.

In August 2007, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon appointed Dr. Edward Luck as his first Special Adviser on the Responsibility to Protect. Working closely with the Special Adviser on the Prevention of Genocide, the two Special Advisers and their Joint Office have helped advance R2P within the UN system. The Secretary-General has subsequently appointed three other individuals to serve in this role (Dr. Jennifer Welsh, H.E., Mr. Ivan Simonovic, and Dr. Karen Smith).

Following the publication of the UN Secretary-General's 2009 report on R2P, the General Assembly held a formal debate on the topic in July 2009. This debate resulted in the General Assembly agreeing to adopt a resolution on R2P, which affirmed the decision to "continue its consideration of the responsibility to protect" (United Nations 2009).

Since the 2009 report, the UN Secretary-General has released ten subsequent annual reports on R2P, addressing issues related to R2P's implementation in his subsequent reports: Early warning, assessment, and the responsibility to protect (United Nations Secretary-General 2010), The role of regional and subregional arrangements in implementing the responsibility to protect (United Nations Secretary-General 2011), Timely and decisive response (United Nations Secretary-General 2012), State responsibility and prevention (United Nations Secretary-General 2013), Fulfilling our collective responsibility: international assistance and the responsibility to protect (United Nations Secretary-General 2014), A vital and enduring commitment: implementing the responsibility to protect (United Nations Secretary-General 2015), Mobilizing collective action: the next decade of the responsibility to protect (United Nations Secretary-General 2016), Implementing the responsibility to protect: accountability for prevention (United Nations Secretary-General 2017), Responsibility to Protect: from early warning to early action (United Nations Secretary-General 2018), and Responsibility to Protect: lessons learned for prevention (United Nations Secretary-General 2019).

The UN General Assembly has held three formal debates (2009, 2018, and 2019) and eight informal interactive dialogues on R2P between 2010 and 2017. These dialogues and debates have provided a forum for states to discuss the contents of the Secretary-General's annual report, share best practices and challenges in implementation, reaffirm their commitment to R2P, and, in some cases, restate their government's outstanding issues with the norm. Every year at the annual interactive dialogue and debates on R2P in the General Assembly a growing number of states have expressed an endorsement of the basic tenets of R2P. Since 2009, 134 states and 7 regional organizations (speaking on behalf of 155 countries) have participated in the UN General Assembly's interactive dialogues and debates on R2P. Following 8 years of informal interactive dialogues, during 2017 states who support R2P mobilized action to advocate for it to be included on the formal agenda of the General Assembly. As a result of these efforts, member states have voted in favor of its inclusion on the formal agenda for the General Assembly's 73rd–75th sessions. This is a significant shift from the informal interactive dialogue structure as it allows for more time for states to discuss their views on the development of the norm and have their positions officially recorded within the records of the General Assembly.

States also continue to discuss R2P in other human rights forums, including in UN Security Council debates on the protection of civilians and at the Human Rights Council. Evidence of the normative progress achieved by R2P lies in the record of the UN Security Council and the UN Human Rights Council. The Security Council, which had before 2011 passed only four resolutions mentioning R2P, after its March 2011 decisions on Côte d'Ivoire and Libya has adopted over 80 resolutions directly referring to the responsibility to protect, including measures to confront the threat of mass atrocities in Yemen, Libya, Mali, Sudan, South Sudan, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Syria, Somalia, and the Central African Republic. Since 2008, the UN Human Rights Council has similarly adopted over 40 resolutions that include language on R2P.

Over the last few years, there has also been a substantial amount of thinking around identifying risk factors, developing early warning models, and articulating inhibitors for mass atrocity crimes. To translate this commitment into action, R2P has been implemented and operationalized through the application of an "atrocity prevention lens." Application of this lens includes assessing dynamics within the country as they pertain to the risk and potential commission of mass atrocity crimes. The value adds of R2P is that it provides a lens that can identify factors missed by traditional conflict prevention frameworks. The lens looks at incitement, hate speech, and other factors that exacerbate ethnic and identity-based conflicts and helps in identifying patterns that lead to escalation from violations to atrocities. During November 2014, the UN Office of genocide prevention and the responsibility to protect launched a Framework of Analysis for Atrocity Crimes as a tool for the prevention of mass atrocities.

Policy makers have also been innovative in creating new institutional mechanisms and networks to facilitate the normative development or R2P at the UN as well as to mainstream atrocity prevention within the policies of their governments. This includes the establishment of the Global Network of R2P Focal Points, who are senior government officials appointed by their governments to promote R2P at the national level and the Group of Friends of the Responsibility to Protect, which promotes R2P at the UN in New York and Geneva.

Criticisms of R2P's Implementation

Despite the genuine institutional progress R2P has made since its unanimous endorsement by the international community in 2005, it has faced some controversy and misconceptions. An important part of the evolution of R2P has been the critiques directed at it from various countries in multilateral fora. At its inception, many states were particularly critical of how R2P could be used to justify the “use of force,” an inherent part of the R2P tool box. The criticism against R2P primarily focused on how it was an assault on sovereignty and a western norm which could be used as a guise for military and humanitarian intervention aimed at regime change.

Over the years as the understanding of R2P has evolved, the criticisms now focus on the failure of states to live up to the promise of this commitment to prevent and halt atrocities. The following are some of the common criticisms levied against R2P with a discussion of how the implementation of R2P and an understanding of its potential added-value to existing norms and protection and prevention agendas may address some of these concerns.

R2P Is Only Applicable to the “Global South”

In the last three decades, we have witnessed a global shift in conflict from largely interstate conflict to a growing number of intrastate civil wars. A predominant number of these conflicts have occurred in areas considered to be part of the “Global South,” including countries throughout Latin America and Africa. As a result, the perpetration of atrocities has been particularly high throughout these regions. Because R2P discussions have focused on where populations are most imminently vulnerable, R2P has been criticized as only being applicable to the Global South, rather than Europe and other “Northern” regions. One part of this criticism has focused on states in the “Global North” treating R2P as a foreign policy priority, meant only as something they implement in other states through intervention, while encouraging those in the “Global South” to implement structural reforms aimed at preventing atrocities domestically. This same criticism has been faced by the International Criminal Court, which many states, academics, and civil society observers have at times deemed as being “too Africa focused.”

However, modern history unequivocally demonstrates that no country or region is immune to atrocity crimes. Less than a century ago, Europe witnessed the Holocaust, and in 1995 approximately 8,000 men and boys were massacred in the genocide at Srebrenica, Bosnia. In the Americas, civilians in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile have experienced military dictatorships that engaged in enforced disappearances, torture, and other grave human rights abuses. Recent responses of government security forces to mass protests in Nicaragua and Venezuela have included use of disproportionate and deadly force that may amount to mass atrocity crimes. Mass atrocities have also been perpetrated in Asia, including atrocities under the Khmer Rouge in Cambodia between 1975 and 1979, and more recently, a genocide perpetrated against the Rohingya ethnic minority in Myanmar (Burma). In Africa mass atrocities have been committed recently in Sudan, South Sudan, Central African Republic (CAR), the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), and elsewhere. In the Middle East and North African region, the UN has recently started exhuming mass graves following the 2014 genocide of the Yazidi population in Iraq, while populations in Syria and Yemen continue to live in situations where crimes against humanity and war crimes are committed with impunity.

There are currently more than 70 million people displaced around the world as a result of conflict, persecution, and atrocities. Groups continue to be targeted based upon their identity, including religion, gender, and ethnicity. Moreover, there is a need to address the wider risk factors for atrocity crimes, which affect populations everywhere. Across the world, including in the Global “North,” we are witnessing an unprecedented rise in toxic nationalism, xenophobia, hate speech targeting migrants and refugees, targeted violence against human rights defenders, and diminishing space for independent media and civil society groups. These increase the vulnerability of minority groups and those deemed as “outsiders,” increasing the risk of mass atrocities and the pressure on governments everywhere to adopt policies that reinforce diversity and inclusion as well as laws that deter individuals from utilizing dangerous rhetoric and incitement.

R2P Is an Attack on Sovereignty

During the last 15 years a number of states, including Cuba and Venezuela, have expressed reservations regarding acceptance of R2P because they believe that R2P and other human rights norms are a way for hegemonic powers to assert their influence on them. Because R2P, unlike Peacekeeping and some other protection agendas, allows for the UN Security Council to authorize a response in the absence of state consent, such states have argued that it can be manipulated into a tool to “legally” authorize intervention that would violate their sovereignty.

Countries with a very “traditional” approach to the idea of noninterference in the domestic affairs of a state, such as China, India, Pakistan, and others, while acknowledging the merit in the need to prevent atrocities, emphasize that this responsibility should always fall to the state. This position has been expressed both within UN forums as well as regional institutions, where states in particular regions continue to be encouraged to not interfere with the domestic politics of other member states. However, despite their routine criticism, India, Brazil, and South Africa have individually contributed to the political, institutional, and operational development of R2P either through their resistance to the norm or in constructively engaging in clarifying its implementation through Brazil’s introduction and support for the concept of Responsibility while Protecting (United Nations 2011).

While some regional organizations continue to practice noninterference, the origins of R2P can be traced to Article 4(h) of the African Union Constitutive Act that rests on the principle of “non-indifference” to mass atrocities as opposed to the previous adherence to a doctrine of “non-intervention.” Article 4(h) specifically espouses the right of the AU to intervene in the affairs of a state in response to the commission of war crimes, genocide, and crimes against humanity (African Union 2000).

In addition, for the ICISS Commission that conceptualized and coined the concept, R2P rests on the principle of “Sovereignty as Responsibility” and as such makes the prevention of atrocities a primary responsibility of the state. R2P builds upon the notion that state sovereignty does not shield governments from international scrutiny, but rather that such sovereignty bestows a moral responsibility upon the government to protect all those within their borders (Deng et al. 1996).

R2P Is a Foreign Policy Issue

Many experts and policy makers view R2P as primarily a foreign policy issue. This perception is derived from a number of sources. First, debates regarding the conceptualization and implementation of R2P have largely taken place at the UN. As a result, experts on the concept within governments have frequently been positioned within the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in offices responsible for cooperation with the United Nations.

Another reason for the perception of R2P being strictly a foreign policy issue derives from the focus in debates on the applicability of Pillar 3. Since debates amongst states on R2P’s implementation in R2P’s first 10 years focused heavily on the legality of Pillar 3 measures and the parameters of the use of force, the emphasis for discussion of R2P was on how the international community should act. This is further augmented by the fact that most of the literature on R2P is primarily focused on implementation by the UN and regional organizations. Little attention has been directed towards implementation by states and prevention within national settings.

Commitment to prevention is at the heart of all three pillars of R2P – prevention of an initial outbreak of a crisis, prevention of its escalation, and prevention of recurrence. Mass atrocity prevention is, at its core, about the state’s responsibility as a sovereign entity to protect all its populations, regardless of identity or citizenship status, and must be a domestic policy imperative. The primary responsibility to uphold R2P thus falls on the state and should be a national policy priority.

Atrocity Prevention and Conflict Prevention Are the Same Thing

There is significant overlap between conflict prevention and mass atrocity prevention, largely because armed conflict provides an enabling environment for the perpetration of mass atrocity crimes. However, the two prevention agendas are distinct. Although mass atrocity crimes are often committed in the context of an armed conflict, as is the case with civil wars in South Sudan and Syria, it is important to recognize that not all armed conflicts give rise to mass atrocities.

Additionally, atrocity crimes can also be committed outside of an armed conflict. For example, prior to the so-called clearance operations in Rakhine State, mass atrocity crimes committed against the Rohingya community in Myanmar have taken place in a context of decades of institutionalized persecution against this distinct ethnic minority group, including denial of citizenship, involuntary confinement to displacement camps, and severe restrictions on the freedom of movement and other universally recognized human rights.

Moreover, prioritizing conflict prevention over mass atrocity prevention may sometimes exacerbate the risk of mass atrocity crimes. For example, by focusing on maintaining the Arusha Peace Agreement that ended the Rwandan Civil War, the international community neglected evidence of the planning of genocide. This included underestimating or disregarding warning signs such as increased hate speech, the importation and stockpiling of small arms and machetes, development of target lists of ethnic Tutsis, and the radicalization and training of youth militias.

R2P Implies Military Force and “Humanitarian Intervention”

R2P is often conflated with military intervention. Most of the academic literature on R2P focuses on Pillar 3 and the use of force to intervene when a state is failing to protect its populations. The overwhelming number of articles written on R2P that focus on the Libyan intervention to the exclusion of analyzing other cases, tools for response, or pillars of implementation.

Timely and decisive response to atrocity crimes includes a range of coercive and non-coercive measures from diplomacy, mediation, public advocacy, humanitarian assistance, protection of refugees and displaced persons, monitoring, fact-finding and verification missions, peacekeeping, sanctions, embargoes, as well as peacebuilding. Military intervention is one of the tools and should be considered as a tool of last resort, when all other measures have been exhausted and when and if decision to intervene is taken it must be undertaken in accordance with the UN Charter.

While policy makers debate the full range of options available to respond to atrocity risks – or hold perpetrators accountable in the aftermath of atrocities – the perception of R2P being “about” intervention is frequently raised in the media and academic literature. For example, during the 2017 “clearance operations” in Myanmar and again during 2019 as tensions rose in Venezuela between President Nicolas Maduro and opposition leader Juan Guaido, many were calling for (or advocating against) an “R2P intervention” or for states to “invoke R2P and intervene,” even though it was unclear how a military option could possibly resolve the political stalemate and prevent future commission of atrocities.

Prevention, rather than intervention, lies at the core of R2P, and when intervention is considered, it must only be done following careful consideration of all available options. When assessing the prudential criteria for authorizing the use of force, a number of questions should be raised, including:

1. What is the seriousness of the threat and is there a genuine risk of mass atrocity crimes?
2. What is the purpose of any use of force or possible military intervention?
3. Are there the proportional means to carry out any military intervention?

4. Is this a matter of last resort? Have all other measures been tried, within reason, to resolve the situation diplomatically and other collaborative and coercive measures?
5. What is the balance of consequences? Would the use of force alleviate the potential suffering of vulnerable populations or could it conceivably inflict further harm? (Adams 2019).

Furthermore, such action must be taken with the consent of the Security Council. As noted by Adrian Gallagher on Venezuela:

R2P does not permit military aggression as defined by the ICC. In fact, it acts as a barrier to it. Yes, [R2P] does allow states to consider all coercive and non-coercive measures under Chapters VI, VII, and VIII of the UN Charter when a government is 'manifestly failing' to protect its population from the four crimes. Though this does include the use of force, any action taken has to be authorised by the UN Security Council. In other words, any United States-led use of force without the consent of the Security Council cannot be undertaken on the grounds of [R2P]. (Gallagher 2019)

When the International Community Fails to Act, R2P Has Failed as a Norm

At a time when more than 70 million people are displaced by conflict, persecution and human rights violations – and when a growing number of conflicts around the world feature the commission of mass atrocity crimes by state and non-state actors and growing disregard for international humanitarian and human rights law, critics have often pointed to the demise of R2P. In his 2019 report on R2P, the UN Secretary-General noted that, “there is a growing gap between our words of commitment and the experience of protecting vulnerable populations.”

R2P has succeeded in its ambitious goal of making the commission of mass atrocity crimes intolerable anywhere they occur. The failure of individual member states to develop societal resilience to atrocity crimes – or the failure of the international community to respond decisively to the commission of atrocity crimes, does not signal a failure of the norm itself. As noted by Dr. Simon Adams, “the failure to end atrocities and protect civilians in Syria is not a failure of R2P, but of the imperfect actors and institutions charged with its implementation” (Adams 2015).

For example, in the case of Myanmar, it was a failure by all actors to take adequate steps to prevent the genocide committed against the Rohingya. The government of Myanmar has consistently violated its Pillar I responsibility through institutionalizing discrimination of the Rohingya minority, including through denying the Rohingya a right to citizenship since at least 1982, imposing restrictions on marriages and reproductive rights, restricting religious and socioeconomic freedoms, and severely limiting access to life-saving humanitarian assistance. Such policies have created an enabling environment where the military and non-Muslim populations could abuse and discriminate against the Rohingya.

Despite ample early warning provided by regional and international organizations over the years and especially since 2012, the international community failed to address the plight of Rohingya in their dealings with the government and military leadership of Myanmar. The efforts of the international community were solely focused on nurturing the budding democracy in the country. Governments from across the region and the world continued to signed preferential trade agreement with Myanmar and continued to train its military and security services.

In the aftermath of so called clearance operations undertaken by the Tatmadaw in August 2017, when over 700,000 Rohingya fled Myanmar to escape acts of genocide being committed against them, the efforts of the international community have been disappointing (UN Fact Finding Mission on Myanmar 2018). Except for limited sanctions imposed by the governments of the United States, Canada, European Union, and Australia, there has been no concerted effort by the international Community to hold the government of Myanmar responsible. Since August 2017, the UN Security Council has not adopted a single resolution on the situation, and the only formal response issued by the Council has been the adoption of a Presidential Statement in November 2017 – 4 months after the start of the “clearance operations.”

These failures in preventing and responding to atrocities signal some of the deeper institutional barriers within the multilateral system – and particularly the UN Security Council – and our collective capacity to respond to emerging risks. It should not be seen, however, as a lapse in the commitment to protect vulnerable populations from atrocity crimes. In fact, the seemingly intractable differences that prevented a response from the UN Security Council in the cases of both Syria and Myanmar have otherwise provoked UN member states to be creative in their thinking around upholding R2P.

Over the past few years, there has been growing momentum around calls for the UN Security Council to voluntarily refrain from using veto in atrocity situations. Over 120 governments – in addition to two UN observer missions – have supported calls for restraint on the use of the veto by the Permanent Five members of the Council or adherence to a Code of Conduct in response to mass atrocity situations (United Nations 2015). Such calls were partially prompted by the repeated use of the veto in response to the situation in Syria. Twelve vetoes have been used by Russia on Syria over the past 8 years, including six double vetoes with China. It is worth noting, however, that since 2013 the Security Council has passed 24 resolutions on humanitarian access, peace talks, and chemical weapons in Syria; including a number of resolutions that reference the Responsibility to Protect.

In addition to these initiatives, in the case of Syria states have sometimes circumvented indecision in the Security Council by drafting resolutions on cross-cutting issues that may have an impact on vulnerable populations within the country. For example, during 2016, the Security Council passed Resolution 2286 on the protection of healthcare in conflict. Though the resolution did not specifically address the situation in Syria, during the discussion preceding the vote, Ambassadors focused heavily on the bombardment of medical facilities and personnel in Aleppo. The resolution helped open space for the continued discussion of the vulnerability of medical facilities in Syria and wider Council condemnation of deliberate targeting of civilian infrastructure.

Member states have also been innovative in utilizing mechanisms outside of the Security Council in order to bolster the protection of civilians and ensure accountability for atrocity crimes. During December 2016, the General Assembly passed a landmark resolution calling for the operationalization of an International, Impartial, and Independent Mechanism to assist in the investigation and prosecution of persons responsible for the most serious crimes under International Law committed in the Syrian Arab Republic since March 2011. States have similarly utilized Human Rights Council-based tools, such as Commissions of Inquiry, to strengthen the capacity to hold perpetrators of atrocities in Syria accountable and have also recently begun prosecuting criminals under the principles of Universal Jurisdiction in the absence of a UN Security Council referral to the International Criminal Court. Not only do such initiatives fall under Pillar III of the Responsibility to Protect, but they have set a precedent for multilateral response to other atrocity situations, as demonstrated by the recently established Independent Investigative Mechanism for Myanmar.

R2P and Regime Change: The Case of Libya

Critics of R2P often point to the international response to the 2011 conflict in Libya, following the UN Security Council-authorized military intervention by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO), as an example of R2P being used as a doctrine for regime change or to justify military intervention by “western powers.”

In response to the violent state repression of anti-government demonstrations in Libya in early 2011, the UN Security Council adopted Resolutions 1970 and 1973 in February and March, respectively. Resolution 1970 invoked the Libyan authorities’ primary responsibility to protect civilians while imposing an arms embargo and travel ban in an attempt to pressure the government to halt violence against civilians (UN Security Council 2011a). Despite this, the government of Muammar al-Qaddafi ignored the Security Council’s demands for an immediate end to the violence and proceeded to perpetrate (and incite) atrocities. Utilizing the framework of R2P’s third pillar, the Security Council utilized Resolution 1973 to halt the commission of crimes against humanity and war crimes by Qaddafi's forces by authorizing the use of all necessary measures, including coercive military action, to protect the population, which led to the imposition of a "no fly zone," enforced by a NATO-led coalition, and the launch of airstrikes against Libya's air force, tanks, and artillery (UN Security Council 2011b). Alex Bellamy has argued, given Benghazi's imminent collapse and Qaddafi's record and rhetoric, "states could not plausibly argue that the threat of mass atrocities was not real. . . . With strong regional support (for whatever reason) and in the absence of reasonable alternative policies for preventing massacre in Benghazi, those Council members that remained skeptical about the use of force believed that they could not legitimize inaction" (Bellamy 2011).

During the months that followed, strict adherence to the R2P mandate waned, with several states admitting to breaking the UN-imposed arms embargo and supplying Libyan rebels with weapons. By the autumn of 2011, there was a growing view that the objective of NATO was no longer to uphold its civilian protection mandate but rather to overthrow the Qaddafi regime. Eventually on 20 October Qaddafi was captured and extrajudicially executed by rebel forces.

Furthermore, the post-conflict situation in Libya was exacerbated by the fact that decades of misrule by Qaddafi had resulted in a hollowing out of the country's institutions and the deliberate manipulation of tribal and regional rivalries. The international community also hastily disengaged politically from Libya after the fall of Qaddafi, leaving rival militias and armed groups to struggle for political control of the country, rather than focus on the rebuilding and redevelopment.

In the aftermath of Libya, Brazil championed the concept of "Responsibility while Protecting" (RWP). The essence of RWP was that military force must be a last resort that any response must be proportional to the threat posed and that no intervention should cause more harm than it seeks to prevent. RWP resuscitated meaningful dialogue at the UN around both the preventive core of R2P and the potential need, post-Libya, for prudential criteria for use-of-force mandates adopted by the Security Council.

Libya was a failure in terms of R2P's Pillar 1 and 2 implementation. But, despite the many criticisms, the response was a success in terms of Pillar 3. Through the adoption of Resolution 1973, the UN Security Council took timely and decisive action to stop the Qaddafi regime from committing mass atrocities. Within 2 days of the adoption of the resolution, a no-fly zone was imposed and countless lives were saved. However, the international community and the UN Security Council did not plan for the day after. The tepid international effort during the rebuilding phase in Libya was a contributing factor to the lawlessness, corruption, and warlordism that overtook the country, dividing it into competing factions. Furthermore, by not respecting the arms embargo imposed under Resolution 1970, the international community further contributed to the proliferation of small arms and light weapons that destabilized the region.

While there have been many lessons learned from the Libya situation, responding to atrocity situations will continue to require complex elements of coercion and consent, with legal authorization of the Security Council and active dialogue about how a state can uphold its responsibility to protect and how the international community can both assist and compel them to do so. Finally, it is also important to emphasize that Libya and military intervention are not the sole benchmarks to measure the success or utility of the Responsibility to Protect. The situations in Kenya (2007–2008), Côte d'Ivoire (2010–2011), and the Gambia (2017), among others, provide positive examples of national, regional, and international efforts to prevent and halt atrocities.

Implementation of R2P: Responding to Atrocity Risks in Kenya, Côte d'Ivoire, and the Gambia

While the situation in Libya brought R2P under the spotlight and bolstered the arguments on regime change and military intervention put forward by R2P's critics, a number of other situations have demonstrated that concerted efforts by the international community utilizing a combination of coercive and noncoercive measures can result in a cessation of mass atrocity crimes and the protection of vulnerable communities. While it is difficult to measure the success of preventive efforts, in each of the cases described below actions taken by the international community in upholding its responsibility to protect helped to halt or prevent the commission of mass atrocities. Subsequent Pillar 1 initiatives by the states themselves, with the support of regional and international organizations, have helped strengthen their societal resilience to atrocities and prevent further crimes.

Kenya

One of the earliest examples of success for R2P was the timely response of the international community to the postelection violence in Kenya in 2007–2008. By deploying a high-level panel of mediators, which included former UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the international community was able to prevent and halt further escalation of violence in Kenya which had already claimed over 1,200 lives and displaced over 600,000 people. The mediation brought the two contending parties to the table and sketched out the long-term and short-term outcomes that needed to be implemented by the government of Kenya to address structural, social, and political root causes of the violence. Kofi Annan hailed Kenya as a success of “R2P in Action” and highlighted the role mediation could play in halting ongoing atrocities.

Furthermore, Kenya can be considered a success in terms of pillar 1 and 2 implementation. Although the next national elections in Kenya in 2013 were as bitterly contested, no widespread killing, endemic hate speech, or systematic ethnic targeting took place. This was a result of 5 years of local, national, regional, and international investment in both structural and proximate prevention. These preventive measures covered everything from constitutional change, to security sector reform, and local civil society peacebuilding initiatives, to laws regarding the use of hate speech.

Côte d’Ivoire

Similar to Kenya, the situation in Côte d’Ivoire is seen as a success of R2P, and particularly of the positive effects of decisive action by the UN Security Council amidst a mounting crisis. The situation in Côte d’Ivoire escalated after presidential elections took place on 28 November 2010 with a run-off between incumbent President Laurent Gbagbo and Alassane Ouattara. While voting was relatively peaceful, a political crisis was sparked when the Constitutional Council overturned the Independent Election Commission’s (CEI) declaration that Ouattara won the election. Gbagbo refused to accept defeat, however, and the two men formed parallel governments while their supporters began attacking communities throughout the country based upon ethnic identity and corresponding perceived political support.

Regional organizations, including the Economic Community of West African State (ECOWAS) responded rapidly. The AU and ECOWAS both suspended Côte d’Ivoire’s membership and sent mediation teams to Côte d’Ivoire seven times between December and February. Meanwhile, ECOWAS’ regional bank, as well as the United States and EU, imposed targeted asset freezes and other economic sanctions against prominent members of Gbagbo’s government. The responsibility to protect was invoked in statements by the UN High Commissioner for human rights, the UN special advisers on the prevention of genocide, and the responsibility to protect and many other UN and member state officials.

Despite these efforts, during March 2011 the conflict escalated in the western regions of the country and in Abidjan, the economic capital, with Gbagbo supporters and security forces targeting political opponents, members of ethnic groups associated with Ouattara, and nationals from other West African countries. Armed Ouattara supporters were also increasing their assaults on Gbagbo supporters. Between 26 and 28 March, security forces and militias supporting both Gbagbo and Ouattara killed over 1,000 civilians in massacres near Duékoué in western Côte d’Ivoire.

Two days later, on 30 March, the Security Council passed Resolution 1975 authorizing the UN peacekeeping mission in the country (UNOCI) to use “all necessary means to carry out its mandate to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence... including to prevent the use of heavy weapons against the civilian population.” UNOCI had initially been mandated in 2004 to monitor a ceasefire agreement and their mandate had subsequently been expanded to help facilitate and monitor the election process, but in the timely adoption of Resolution 1975, the Security Council greatly expanded their protective mandate. After a 5-day operation conducted with the support of French forces, Gbagbo surrendered. Resolution 1975, which reaffirmed the “primary responsibility of each state to protect,” was widely seen as the Security Council’s second application of coercive measures under Pillar 3 of R2P.

While in the immediate aftermath of the post-election crisis, sporadic violence recurred, indicating that the roots of the crisis reach deeper than Gbagbo’s refusal to cede the presidential office, the AU, ECOWAS, and UNOCI remained engaged in Côte d’Ivoire’s recovery, reconciliation, and rebuilding process until the risks had dissipated. In keeping with R2P’s Pillar 2, UNOCI assisted the government in demobilization and reintegration of armed groups as well as in building its truth and reconciliation programs. When UNOCI finally departed in June 2017 it had helped demobilize thousands of members of armed groups and had conducted extensive training for the security forces in the protection of human rights.

The Gambia

Despite initially conceding defeat to Adama Barrow in The Gambia’s 1 December 2016 Presidential Election, former President Yahya Jammeh refused to step down from the presidency and his party – the Alliance for Patriot Reorientation and Construction – filed petitions to challenge the election results.

As the end of his mandate on 19 January 2017 neared, Jammeh made several public declarations threatening to use force, if necessary, to protect his interests. This included a speech on 13 December where he declared that any protests by opposition supporters would be met with extreme force and several threats that if regional organizations intervened in support of Barrow it would constitute a “declaration of war.” The final escalation came on 17 January when Jammeh declared a state of emergency, banning any acts of “disobedience” that could threaten his presidency, curtailing civil liberties, and placing additional restrictions on independent media. Throughout the 6-week period between the election and his eventual resignation on 20 January, political tensions pushed the country to the brink of disaster. According to the UN, at least 45,000 people fled Gambia amidst the political crisis.

As president, Jammeh had consistently demonstrated that he had both the will and capacity to systematically persecute civilians he perceived as a threat to his power. Under his leadership, Gambian authorities participated in forced disappearances, arbitrary detention, torture, and other human rights violations against journalists, human rights defenders and political opponents. Security forces had routinely arrested and beaten opposition supporters during peaceful protests in the months leading up to the election. Jammeh’s disturbing and inflammatory rhetoric, his long history of human rights violations, and his apparent willingness to use force to protect his power combined to create a delicate and dangerous situation in which civilians’ fears of violence were justified.

Ultimately, the uncertainty caused by Jammeh’s refusal to accept the election results and cede power after more than 22 years in office did not result in widespread violence or civilian casualties. The crisis in Gambia was neutralized by timely and consistent action on the part of ECOWAS and its member states, the AU, and the UN Office for West Africa and the Sahel (UNOWAS). On 13 December, the same day that Jammeh’s security forces blocked access to the electoral commission, ECOWAS sent a delegation of presidents from four West African countries to Gambia. After the delegation failed to convince Jammeh to concede to Barrow, they swiftly formed a formal mediation team and prepared standby forces for the possibility of military intervention.

Throughout January ECOWAS leaders and UNOWAS responded with consistent diplomatic and military pressure – including clear demands and deadlines for Jammeh to commit to a democratic transition or risk being forcibly removed from the country. On 18 January, the last day of Jammeh’s presidential mandate, a regional intervention appeared imminent, with Senegalese troops were on the border with Gambia and Nigerian warships deployed off the coast. Although Senegalese troops did cross into Gambia, ECOWAS’ intervention was halted only after Jammeh finally accepted an amnesty offer and resigned, leaving the country.

In a briefing to the Security Council a week later, the head of UNOWAS called the outcome “a success of preventive diplomacy that has been achieved through the mobilization of regional actors in perfect coordination with the international community.” The situation in The Gambia merited ECOWAS’ attention from the day Jammeh contested the results – rather than waiting for atrocities to occur.

Summary

For R2P to fulfill the promise of preventing war crimes, crimes against humanity, ethnic cleansing, and genocide, individual states and the international community must look at strategies that advance effective implementation and enhance prevention and protection on the ground.

Implementation at the national level will involve a wide variety of actors and both political will and technical expertise. For example, creating an accountable security sector is not only a technical enterprise but a deeply political process. It will be slow and not always be easy to measure success. However, in order to strengthen the agenda for prevention, it will be important for all actors including stakeholders from civil society and academia to identify and collect empirical evidence of success. To identify strategies that work and policies that can be replicated.

It will be important in this context to identify both formal and informal ways in which states can assist each other and provide timely advice and capacity. Since 2005 there has been a steady development of networks and structures for mass atrocities prevention. Networks like the Global Network for R2P Focal Points, a network of senior level government officials in charge of atrocities prevention policies within their government, will be crucial in not only embedding R2P in national policies but also advance its implementation by sharing best practices and lessons learned.

An important forum to gauge how states are strengthening human rights domestically and what this means in terms of their institutional resilience to the threat of mass atrocities is the UN’s Human Rights Council, with its Special Procedures and Universal Periodic Review. Such mechanisms are an indispensable part of early warning and response architecture of the multilateral system because they can highlight when human rights violations are increasing and what mechanisms within a country may be strengthened in order to prevent atrocities. Special Procedures mandate holders are also effective at ringing alarm bells when they observe mounting risks of atrocities within a country.

At the international level improving implementation of R2P will be about strengthening the early response mechanisms of the United Nations. In the most vexing and deadly cases, where a state is manifestly unwilling to protect its populations. However, most future mass atrocity cases that require coercive responses, including the use of force, will in all likelihood continue to look more like Democratic Republic of the Congo, South Sudan, Syria, Yemen, or Central African Republic than like Libya. That is to say, they will continue to require complex elements of coercion and consent, with legal authorization of the Security Council and active dialogue about how a state can uphold its responsibility to protect and how the international community can both assist and compel them to do so.

Furthermore, policy makers and practitioners will need to translate the obligation to protect and prevent that is enshrined within R2P into actionable policy options that enhance protection for populations at risk. This will involve creating linkages with related and cross-cutting issues and agendas, including protection of civilians, peacekeeping, countering violent extremism, countering sexual and gender-based violence, controlling the proliferation of small arms and light weapons, and sustainable development.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality

References

- Adams, S. (2015). Failure to protect: Syria and the UN Security Council (Global Centre for the Responsibility to Protect occasional paper series). New York: Global Centre for the Responsibility to Protect.
- Adams, S. (2019). The responsibility to protect in the Americas. Speech delivered at the General Secretariat of the Organization of American States, Washington, DC.
- African Union. (2000). The Constitutive Act, Addis Ababa.
- Bellamy, A. (2011). Libya and the responsibility to protect: The exceptions and the norm. Ethic & International Affairs, 25, 263.
- Deng, F., Kimaro, S., Lyons, T., Rothchild, D., & Zartman, I. W. (1996). Sovereignty as responsibility: Conflict management in Africa. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Evans, G. (2008). The responsibility to protect, ending mass atrocity crimes once and for all. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Gallagher, A. (2019). We need to understand the Responsibility to Protect before we (mis)apply it in Venezuela. London, UK: London School of Economics Blog.
- International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty. (2001). The responsibility to protect: Report of the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty. Ottawa: International Development Research Centre.
- UN Security Council. (2011a). S/RES/1970.
- UN Security Council. (2011b). S/RES/1973.
- United Nations. (2002). Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Treaty series, Vol. 2187, No. 38544.
- United Nations. (2005). World Summit outcome. A/60/L.1, 20.
- United Nations. (2009). 63/308. The responsibility to protect. A/RES/63/308.
- United Nations. (2011). Annex to the letter dated 9 November 2011 from the Permanent Representative of Brazil to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General: Responsibility while protecting: Elements for the development and promotion of a concept. A/66/551-S/2011/701.
- United Nations. (2015). Annex I to the letter dated 14 December 2015 from the Permanent Representative of Liechtenstein to the United Nations addressed to the Secretary-General Code of conduct regarding Security Council action against genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes. A/70/621-S/2015/978.
- United Nations. (2018). Report of the International Fact-Finding Mission on Myanmar. A/HRC/39/64.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2009). Implementing the responsibility to protect. A/63/677.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2010). Early warning, assessment and the responsibility to protect. A/64/864.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2011). The role of regional and subregional arrangements in implementing the responsibility to protect. A/65/877-S/2011/393.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2012). Responsibility to protect: Timely and decisive response. A/66/874-S/2012/578.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2013). Responsibility to protect: State responsibility and prevention. A/67/929-S/2013/399.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2014). Fulfilling our collective responsibility: International assistance and the responsibility to protect. A/68/947-S/2014/449.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2015). A vital and enduring commitment: Implementing the responsibility to protect. A/69/981-S/2015/500.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2016). Mobilizing collective action: The next decade of the responsibility to protect. A/70/999-S/2016/620.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2017). Implementing the responsibility to protect: Accountability for prevention. A/71/1016-S/2017/556.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2018). Responsibility to protect: From early warning to early action. A/72/884-S/2018/525.
- United Nations Secretary-General. (2019). Responsibility to protect: Lessons learned for prevention. A/73/898-S/2019/463.

Race

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Rapprochement

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Realism

- ▶ Emancipatory Peace

Reconciliation

- ▶ Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Gráinne Kelly
International Conflict Research Institute
(INCORE), Ulster University, Belfast, Ireland

Synonyms

Reconciliation; Northern Ireland; Ireland; United Kingdom; Interpersonal; Relationship-building; Cohesion; Social cohesion; Peacebuilding; Transitional justice; Dealing with the past; Divided societies

Description/Summary

Since the Belfast/Good Friday Agreement of 1998, Northern Ireland has grappled with the challenge of addressing its violent past while visioning and progressing a shared future, in the context of deep and persistent societal mistrust and division. While the burden of reconciliation is often placed most heavily on the direct victims and survivors of the conflict, reconciliation in Northern Ireland requires the commitment and active participation of all in the affected population, including state and non-state actors who played a part in the instigation, maintenance, and eventual transformation of the violent conflict.

Reconciliation is broadly understood as the component of peacebuilding that seeks to address conflictual and fractured perceptions and relationships between individuals and groups in society (horizontal reconciliation) and citizens and state institutions (vertical reconciliation). That said, no consensus on the specific choice or combination of actions required to progress reconciliation has been reached in the wider peacebuilding field. This ambiguity is mirrored in Northern Ireland where there is evidence of divergent understandings and application of the term across and within communities, thus ensuring that even the term “reconciliation” is not without contention and dispute. This entry explores the concept of reconciliation in the post-accord context of Northern Ireland and identifies the significant top-down policy developments and bottom-up community approaches which have – and have not – been instigated to date.

Conflict and the Progress Toward Peace in Northern Ireland

Northern Ireland experienced significant and enduring violent conflict from the late 1960s until the late 1990s. The contemporary conflict was rooted in centuries of social, political, and religious tensions between Britain and Ireland and the existence of two distinct ethnonational identity communities on the island of Ireland from the mid-seventeenth century onward (see “▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict”). The more recent conflict in Northern Ireland, known colloquially as “the Troubles,” was precipitated by the economic and political marginalization of the Catholic minority community by the Protestant-dominated Stormont government, which was established after the partition of Ireland in 1921 (Ruane and Todd 1995). This led to the rise of a non-violent civil rights movement in the 1960s, demanding an end to gerrymandering, inequality, and discrimination. Efforts to suppress the growing civil disobedience and disorder by the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) and civilian irregulars precipitated the rise in republican and loyalist paramilitary organizations, the deployment of British armed forces from August 1969, and the rapid escalation of violence by the early 1970s. Following the introduction of direct rule from Westminster in 1972, the issues under contention grew as political and social schisms widened. Fundamental to the emerging conflict were the opposing territorial and constitutional positions held by the two main communities. The majority Protestant population wished for Northern Ireland to remain part of the United Kingdom (and are known as unionist and/or loyalist), while most of the Catholic population sought for Northern Ireland to become part of the Republic of Ireland (and are known as nationalist and/or republicans) (McGarry and O'Leary 2004).

Over a 30-year period, the Northern Ireland conflict was characterized by paramilitary-led bombing and shooting campaigns, militarized policing, internment without trial, targeting of army and security, tit-for-tat community killings, human rights abuses, the suspension of the normal rule of law, state-led and state-sanctioned violence, and widespread communal unrest and rioting. Over 3600 people died as a result of the conflict, and tens of thousands were physically and psychologically injured (Fay et al. 1999). While mainly confined to Northern Ireland, the paramilitary violence also included the targeting of towns, cities, and specific individuals in both Britain and the Republic of Ireland. It also resulted in the physical polarization of the population with patterns of residential segregation set by the population movements of the 1970s and solidified by subsequent social housing decisions made, the choice of residents to live alongside those of their own identity group, and the building of physical barriers and "peace walls" as a response to localized security threats.

Various efforts were made to resolve the conflict, including the 1973 Sunningdale Agreement, which led to the temporary establishment of a power-sharing devolved government (Tonge 2000), and the 1985 Anglo-Irish Agreement reached between the British and Irish governments, which sought to give the Irish government an advisory role in Northern Ireland's affairs (Aughey and Gormley-Heenan 2011). Both agreements failed at implementation due to widespread unionist opposition and accusations of interference and betrayal. With a perceptible trend toward greater inclusivity in peace negotiations internationally, leaders of the main political parties and the British and Irish governments began peace talks in the 1990s. Strengthened by the paramilitary ceasefires of 1994, and after 4 years of on-off negotiations, the Good Friday Agreement (GFA) was reached in April 1998. The Agreement included arrangements for the establishment of a grand coalition of local political parties in a devolved, consociational administration, the instituting of new cross-border bodies to ensure greater cooperation between the new Assembly and the Irish Government (North-South arrangements) and between the British and Irish governments and the devolved political administrations of the United Kingdom (East-West arrangements). It also created opportunities to successfully demilitarize the society, reform the police service, release political prisoners, promote and monitor equality and human rights, and precipitate a significant reduction in the overall levels of violence (see "► Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements"). A majority (71%) of the Northern Ireland electorate endorsed the Agreement in a referendum in the autumn of 1998 (Hayes and McAllister 2001). However, it was publicly rejected and denounced by a significant section of the unionist community as well as a number of dissident republican groups.

Twenty years on from the Belfast Agreement, Northern Ireland remains a deeply divided society, starkly indicated by the number of interface walls (Byrne and Gormley-Heenan 2014); the prevalence of flags, murals, and emblems which act as exclusionary markers of territory; the very high levels of segregation of social housing by religious background (Gray et al. 2018); and the low (7%) numbers of children attending schools which formally integrate Catholic and Protestant pupils (Milliken et al. 2020). The legacy of violence has left scars of mistrust, suspicion, and bitterness which is manifest in many ways, from the reluctance of political leaders to work collaboratively to resolve the significant social and economic challenges of the region to the escalation of violent protest when freedoms of cultural expression are perceived to be threatened.

Following a brief description of the core theoretical understanding of reconciliation, this entry will then outline how the concept of reconciliation is broadly understood, framed, and utilized in Northern Ireland. While acknowledging that reconciliation is messy non-linear and multi-directional, the entry then outlines the major top-down and bottom-up strategies and approaches which have been taken to address aspects of reconciliation to date. It concludes with reflections on the incomplete task of reconciliation and the new challenges to be faced in light of the United Kingdom's decision to Brexit in 2016.

Framing and Understanding of Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

In recent years, the concept of reconciliation has occupied an increasingly prominent place in the articulation of the peacebuilding tasks associated with a society's emergence from violent conflict. Alongside the United Nations' more frequent evocation of the term, reconciliation is now regularly cited in peace accords as an aspirational goal; is included in lists of crucial peacebuilding priorities in peace-focused, handbooks, compendiums, training manuals, and field guides (De Coning and Ngubane 2015; Mac Ginty 2013; Reychler and Paffenholz 2001; Salter and Yousef 2016); and is prominently incorporated into the objectives of structural mechanisms such as truth commissions, designed to address the legacies of violent conflict (Fischer 2011). Although much of the literature on reconciliation begins with an acknowledgement of its conceptual imprecision (Anstey and Rosoux 2017; Hazan 2009; Long and Brecke 2003; Murphy 2010), it is broadly understood as the component of peacebuilding that seeks to address conflictual and fractured relationships between individuals and groups in society (horizontal reconciliation) and citizens and state institutions (vertical reconciliation). As Bloomfield has argued, reconciliation is "an essential (and essentially political) ingredient in peacebuilding, just as central and just as necessary as economic reconstruction, legal reform and all other post-violence reconstructive and preventative measures" (Bloomfield 2006, p. 9).

Despite ongoing theoretical debates as to whether reconciliation is an ongoing and action-oriented process or an aspirational end state, there is now broad agreement that reconciliation requires active top-down, bottom-up, and middle-out interventions in order to improve damaged relationships between individuals, communities, and institutions (Charbonneau and Parent 2012; Lederach 1997). The choreography and synchronization of the many individual processes which contribute to reconciliation, including justice, healing, truth-telling, and reparations, remain a challenge for both policymakers and peacebuilding practitioners alike, particularly when progress in one area can (at least temporarily) precipitate setbacks and new tensions in another (Hamber and Kelly 2005).

In Northern Ireland, the term "reconciliation" has appeared in both political and societal discourses since the early periods of the recent conflict. Perhaps unsurprisingly in an overwhelmingly Judeo-Christian society, the pre-accord debates and literature on (re)-building damaged inter-communal relationships tended to invoke theological understandings of reconciliation and were utilized by both church-based and ecumenical civil society organizations (Hurley 1994; Faith and Politics Group 1997). Problematically, reconciliation was often referenced in relation to those who had been directly engaged in, or affected by, the conflict. For some, this created associations between the concepts of reconciliation and the personal act of forgiveness, which was congruent for some, but by no means all, in society (Spencer 2011). As detailed further below, reconciliation was not broadly favored as the language of British government policy during the 1970s and 1980s and was not typically used to describe the peace-focused interventions taking place at communal levels. In the pre-agreement period, some political leaders, including the leader of the Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP) leader, John Hume (White 1984), did invoke the term as an aspiration, and it was incorporated into the title of peace-oriented initiatives, including the Forum for Peace and Reconciliation established by the Irish government in 1994. That said, in the context of persistent violence, the rhetoric of reconciliation did not gain significant traction until the post-Agreement period.

While the link between theology and reconciliation continued post-GFA (Clegg and Liechty 2001; Robinson 2014), a more secular understanding and expression of the concept became increasingly evident. The term was more prominently introduced into the wider peacebuilding discourse with the introduction of the influential European Union-led Special Support Programme for Peace and Reconciliation (PEACE Programme) in 1995, of which the EU and the British and Irish governments were direct financial contributors. Worth 667 million euros in its first iteration (1995–1999) and, to date, having distributed over two billion euros in grand aid, the PEACE Programme was established to encourage grassroots support for the tentative steps being made toward a multi-party political negotiation (Bush and Houston 2011). The title choice not only reflected a core value of the European Union project as a whole but mirrored a growing international focus on reconciliation as a task of peace accord implementation in contemporaneous examples of societies emerging from conflict in the 1990s, including South Africa and Guatemala (Hayner 2002). The dominance and reach of the PEACE Programme, which supported the rapid expansion of an active civil society-led intervention in support of economic regeneration, equality and diversity, and improved intra- and inter-communal relationship-building, precipitated the more regular appearance of the term within wider societal discourse. Other external funding bodies, including the International Fund for Ireland (Skarlato et al. 2016), and the private philanthropic foundation, Atlantic Philanthropies (McKay 2015), also emphasized inter-communal and societal reconciliation in their core objectives, further solidifying its presence in the language of civil society focused activity over time.

That said, research undertaken in the 2000s provided evidence that civil society organizations were broadly pragmatic and instrumental in their use of the term “reconciliation” in order to address the demands of the funding bodies (Hamber and Kelly 2005; McEvoy et al. 2006). In practice, organizations tended to preference the more descriptive and government policy-oriented language of “community relations” and later “good relations.” The unstated ambition of the term reconciliation, the implied focus on individual change, as well as its theological roots were regularly cited as reasons to avoid the term when engaging in practical community-focused interventions (Hamber and Kelly 2005; Porter 2003; Wilson 2006).

Broadly speaking, the term reconciliation has been more frequently cited as a pressing task and objective within republican/nationalist, rather than unionist, political discourse, creating some tensions around “ownership” of, and receptiveness to, the concept. These politically partisan associations may also explain why the term has not gained blanket usage as a peacebuilding task within the wider society (Beirne and Knox 2014; Hamber and Kelly 2018). Despite these tensions, passing references to reconciliation regularly appear in official documents and in popular discourse in reference to specific events, behaviors, aspirations, and objectives.

Top-Down Policymaking for Reconciliation

Despite reservations about the speed and quality of reconciliation since the 1998 GFA (Morrow 2016; Ruane 2015), progress has been made to address and reform some of the structures and institutions which gave rise to the conflict. The establishment of the devolved power-sharing assembly is, arguably, an impressive example of pragmatic reconciliation arising from uncomfortable ideological and constitutional compromise. Despite many challenges and long periods of political inertia, the new political institutions have required political adversaries to find ways of working together, and there have been optimistic periods in which more cordial working relationships have appeared possible. The 13-month term in which the leader of the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP), Ian Paisley Senior, and Sinn Féin's Northern leader Martin McGuinness shared First Minister offices is regularly cited in this regard. That said, the failure of political opponents to work collaboratively to progress pressing policy decisions, and the long periods of suspension of the Northern Ireland Assembly (between 2002–2007 and 2017–2020), demonstrates the enduring levels of suspicion and mistrust between the various political parties and the superficiality of working relationships built.

The Declaration of Support preamble to the 1998 GFA included the aspirational commitment to “the achievement of reconciliation, tolerance and mutual trust” (Northern Ireland Office 1998, p. 3). A separate section on “Reconciliation and Victims of Violence” also referenced the specific needs of victims of the violent conflict and articulated a commitment to financially support organizations engaged in reconciliation-focused work. The document also cited the need to encourage a “culture of tolerance” (Northern Ireland Office 1998, p. 23) and to facilitate increased mixing in housing and education, although it lacked detail on modes of implementation. Subsequent agreements including the St Andrews Agreement (2006), which resulted in the restoration of power-sharing after 5 years of direct rule from Westminster, and the Hillsborough Agreement (2010), which facilitated the long-awaited devolution of policing and justice powers to the Northern Ireland Executive, made no direct references to reconciliation as either an objective or a practice. The Stormont House Agreement (2014) dealt specifically with issues of identity expression and proposed a comprehensive approach to dealing with the legacy of past violence. This document, addressed further below, cited reconciliation as an underpinning principle and included proposals to establish an “Implementation and Reconciliation Group” (Northern Ireland Office 2014, p. 9) as part of wider legacy structures, thus reintroducing the concept of reconciliation into formal peace negotiations.

The achievement of a multi-party peace agreement in 1998 also provided for a new era of cooperation and joint working between the British and Irish states and facilitated the thawing of a historically difficult relationship. Symbolic important acts, including the laying of a wreath in Dublin's Garden of Remembrance by Queen Elizabeth II in 2011 during the first official visit of a British monarch to Ireland since independence and the reciprocal visit of the Irish President Michael D. Higgins to Windsor Castle in 2014, emphasized the efforts made to normalize relations between the two states. Other significant acts, including the handshake between the former IRA commander Martin McGuinness and the Queen in Belfast in 2012 and the apology given in the House of Commons in 2010, by the then British Prime Minister David Cameron for the Bloody Sunday atrocity in 1972, in which Catholic civilians were killed by British soldiers, have been cited as evidence of both a change in tone and as high profile reconciliatory gestures. Though the significance of these events should not be overstated, they may serve to encourage further acts of acknowledgment of wrongdoing and provide hope that previously difficult relationships can be repaired over time.

Reconciliation as Inter-communal Relationship-Building

While the Northern Ireland conflict centers on long-standing and incompatible national aspirations, internationally the “Troubles” became synonymous with the tensions and estrangement of the two dominant identity communities – Catholic and Protestant. This hegemonic “two communities” or “two tribes” analysis of the conflict suggests a predominantly internal dynamic and has been criticized for failing to acknowledge the wider dispute around the political legitimacy of the British state in the region, the ongoing power differentials in the social and political system, and the existence of other minority identity groups which have been sidelined in the preoccupation with the socio-religious divide.

In the emergent stages of the violent conflict, the British Government identified that interventions were required to address the increasing mistrust and polarization of the two main communities and the growing manifestations of sectarianism and segregation. Institutional bodies were established, charged with formulating, reviewing, and challenging policy across government departments, in order to improve community relations, including the Ministry for Community Relations in the early 1970s and the Central Community Relations Unit in 1987 (CCRU 1991). The focus of financial investment was on encouraging cross-community initiatives and supporting community development strategies to boost individual communities' self-confidence to move toward increased contact. Fair Employment legislation was introduced at Westminster in 1976 and 1989 aimed at outlawing discrimination in the workplace. Over the longer term, this provided opportunities for greater inter-communal mixing at work and a narrowing of the socioeconomic gap between Protestants and Catholics.

In the education field, the early policy responses to addressing societal division centered on attempts to increase contact between pupils in a school system in which the vast majority attended institutions which were almost exclusively Catholic or Protestant in makeup. These government-funded initiatives to encourage inter-communal mixing involved collaborative school ventures and cross-community field trips but were criticized for failing to address the institutionalization of a segregated school system (Gallagher 2004). The introduction of a common curriculum across the school sector and the inclusion of a program of Education for Mutual Understanding in the late 1980s were likewise criticized for its failure to engage with the politically charged debates around national identities that remain at the heart of the conflict. This approach was subsequently replaced by a wider program of citizenship education, with a focus on human rights, equality, and social responsibility from 2007 (Niens et al. 2013). Parent-initiated efforts to establish an integrated education sector, where children from the two main communities and other traditions would be educated together, began in the early 1980s but were not formally endorsed and funded by the government until the late 1980s. Although there is still a policy commitment to support the integrated school sector, progress toward further expansion has been glacial, with only around 7% of pupils enrolled in schools which aim for balanced representation of Catholic and Protestant pupils (Department of Education 2020). Policy focus has shifted in recent years to a focus on "shared education," whereby existing schools develop partnerships and collaborate on education planning and delivery while maintaining existing institutional identities (Gallagher 2016). The GFA provided for the establishment of two new non-departmental public bodies, the Equality Commission and the Human Rights Commission. The Equality Commission has a statutory responsibility to provide guidance to public authorities on their equality of opportunity and promotion of good relations duties and to ensure their appropriate fulfillment. In practice, its power to ensure the proactive transformation of societal attitudes and behaviors has proven limited. The early years of the new power-sharing Executive saw no new strategies to make good on the GFA commitment to achieve "reconciliation, tolerance and mutual trust" developed, although existing financial support for the quasi-independent Community Relations Council (established in 1990) and local authority work was maintained. During a period of direct rule from Westminster (2002–2007), an ambitious policy framework entitled A Shared Future was introduced by the Northern Ireland Office in 2005. It declared that "relationships matter and are central. Moving from relationships based on mistrust and defense to relationships rooted in mutual recognition and trust is the essence of reconciliation" (OFMDFM 2005, p. 21). The document also argued for a pragmatic approach to reconciliation on the basis of the significant socioeconomic costs of division. However, with the restoration of the Northern Ireland Assembly in 2007, the two dominant political parties, Sinn Féin and the DUP, took little ownership of the integrationist ethos of the document, and it was quietly shelved, much to the frustration of the smaller parties and civil society.

It was not until 2010 that a new policy framework was proposed. Entitled Cohesion, Sharing and Integration (CSI), the document was the product of painfully protracted negotiations between the two main parties (OFMDFM 2010). Following a public consultation exercise, it was rejected by both the smaller parties and wider civil society for its lack of vision and ambition. No references to the term reconciliation were used in the body of the document, and an independent review concluded that CSI had rejected reconciliation in favor of “mutual accommodation” (Todd et al. 2010, p. 3). Placed under increased internal and external political pressures, another policy strategy entitled Together: Building a United Community (T:BUC) was proposed in 2013 and subsequently rolled out. This T:BUC strategy outlined a vision of:

A united community, based on equality of opportunity, the desirability of good relations and reconciliation – one which is strengthened by its diversity, where cultural expression is celebrated and embraced and where everyone can live, learn, work and socialise together, free from prejudice, hate and intolerance. (OFMDFM 2013, p. 2)

The language used in this current policy framework is more robust and ambitious, with the objective of reconciliation referenced on several occasions. The inclusion of actions, such as the development of shared (not integrated) education campuses, the building of shared social housing neighborhoods, and the development of urban villages schemes, indicated some understanding of the wider social context in which division can persist. That said, the allocation of Departmental Ministries between opposing political parties in a grand coalition is not always conducive to the development of a coordinated approach to address the complex societal and economic challenges of a region emerging from violent conflict, and the long-term impact of this policy approach is, as yet, unproven.

Reconciliation via Addressing the Past

The 1998 GFA contained a number of “past facing” provisions (McEvoy and Bryson 2016), including provision for prisoner release and criminal justice reform. Scant detail was provided on the issue of victims and survivors of the conflict, as the British government had, in 1997, established a Victims’ Commission “to look at possible ways to recognize the pain and suffering felt by victims of violence” (Bloomfield 1998, p. 8) and a report was imminently anticipated. On publication, the We Will Remember Them report by the Commission made recommendations focused on victims’ needs, compensation, memorialization, and the broad issue of “truth.” However, it stopped short of outlining a workable mechanism for transitional justice or truth recovery and was criticized for creating a “hierarchy of victimhood” with its failure to acknowledge state violence (Ferguson et al. 2010). Over the past two decades, significant financial investment has been made to support the provision of support and advocacy services for victims and survivors within both statutory and community settings. Both the government-funded and PEACE Programme grant supports to civil society groups have been crucial to the support and visibility of victims of the conflict. While some organizations focus on the delivery of advocacy specialist services across all communities irrespective of identity and affiliation, there have also been divisions within the victim support sector, with organizations predominantly representing nationalist or unionist populations, or those affected by state or paramilitary violence. Although there have been challenging debates around the existence of hierarchies of victimhood, politicization, and manipulation of victims by political actors, there is also evidence of increasing levels of networking and collaboration between organizations and recognition of the shared impact of the conflict on all communities (Lynch and Argomaniz 2017).

As noted above, the GFA had little to say about how the society would deal with wider issues of truth, justice, and reparation in the post-accord period and did not propose an overarching framework to comprehensively “deal with the past.” In the first decade post-Agreement, there was little movement to develop formal transitional justice processes by the devolved government. In its absence, a piecemeal approach involving public inquiries and coronial inquests, police-led reviews into the significant numbers of unsolved conflict-related deaths, civil actions, and community-led initiatives were slowly progressed. During a period of direct rule from Westminster (2002–2007), an eight-person Consultative Group on the Past was established in 2007 to consult with communities and make recommendation “on any steps that might be taken to support Northern Ireland society in building a shared future that is not overshadowed by the events of the past”

(Consultative Group on the Past 2009, p. 22). In 2009, it published a set of 31 recommendations for the re-established local Assembly to consider; however controversy over one particular recommendation stymied its progress toward implementation, and it was ultimately shelved.

In 2013, formal efforts were made to revisit the issue when US Diplomat Richard Haass and academic Meghan O’Sullivan were invited to facilitate negotiations between the political parties on a range of contentious issues, including legacies of violence. Although no agreement was reached, the subsequent publication of the negotiating documents (The Panel of Parties of the Northern Ireland Executive, 2013) formed the basis for a second round of negotiations in 2014, resulting in the Stormont House Agreement (SHA), reached in December of that year. This cross-party agreement proposed a more comprehensive framework of institutional mechanisms to investigate conflict-related deaths and enable victims and survivors to seek and receive information about deaths of their next of kin and the establishment of an oral history archive and an “Implementation and Reconciliation Group” to oversee themes, archives, and information recovery and to encourage reconciliation and support a “better understanding of the past” (Northern Ireland Office 2014, p. 10). Progress on the fleshing out of the limited detail contained in the SHA was slow and was halted by the collapse of the Northern Ireland Assembly in 2017. The details of the SHA were the subject of another round of public consultation in 2018, instituted by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Following the re-establishment of the Northern Ireland Executive in January 2020, a new commitment was made to publish and introduce legislation to implement the Stormont House Agreement within 100 days, as part of the New Decade, New Approach deal reached by the political parties.

Bottom-Up Reconciliation Practice

As noted previously, civil society has played a significant role in the design and delivery of processes and initiatives aimed at building trust, forming relationships and networks, and addressing social needs in both the pre- and post-Agreement periods. Heavily influenced by social psychological theories around optimal contact (Allport 1954) and social identity (Tajfel and Turner 1979), there has been a significant emphasis on the need to challenge existing stereotypes, develop mutual understanding, and encourage positive behavioral change toward the “other.” In the pre-GFA period, this work was more typically been described as community relations or cultural diversity work, with self-described reconciliation work tending to be concentrated in the hands of inter-church and inter-community groups, such as the Corrymeela Community and the Peace People. In the context of ongoing violence, mutual suspicion, and polarization of communities, this work was challenging and under-resourced, with as many setbacks as achievements.

Community-Focused and Relationship-Driven Practice

By the early 1990s, a significant level of experience of grassroots dialogue, cross-community engagement, advocacy, and support practice had been built by community and voluntary organizations (Cochrane and Dunn 2002). This work remained somewhat detached from the wider peace process, although there is evidence that it contributed to an enabling environment in which the peace process gained a broader base of community support and acceptance (Belloni 2010). The introduction of the EU PEACE Programme in 1995 continued this trend, with its general avoidance of overtly political funding themes and its early emphasis on reconciliation through social and economic change (Byrne and Irwin 2001). During the course of its approximately 5-year iterations, the PEACE Programme became increasingly explicit in its articulation of reconciliation objectives (Hamber and Kelly 2009) and focused its financial support on programs involving both cross-community, relationship-enhancing activities and investments and initiatives which engage with community approaches to dealing with the legacies of the past.

Despite the focus on reconciliation by mainly international funding streams, the concept did not feature heavily in the ambitions of many bottom-up peacebuilding practitioners, with many indicating that the term had too many divergent connotations and associations to be helpful as a descriptor for their work. This civil society-led relationship-focused work has been instigated by a wide range of actors, including community development workers, churches and faith-based groups, women's groups, youth workers, trade unions, former paramilitary prisoners, and victims' groups. It has involved a range of approaches, from the development of cross-community social enterprises and shared spaces, the challenging of sectarianism in the workplace, the alleviation of tensions at interface areas, the facilitation of deep dialogue on painful and contentious issues, and the establishment of working relationships with institutions such as the police and the legislature.

The significant injection of local, inter-governmental, and philanthropic grant aid from the 1990s onward provided for the rapid expansion of an entrepreneurial grassroots peacebuilding sector which was in a position to experiment, innovate, and deepen the quality of its interventions over time. It has also resulted in an increasing dependency on financial support with conditionalities and restrictions attached, an erosion of volunteerism and autonomous action, and increased despondency as the long-term sustainability of projects is threatened by the wind-down of grant programming in recent years. Community-driven work has generally been obliged to operate within the context of existing social divisions, rather than being in a position to affect significant change to the structural segregation which hinders progress toward reconciliation. This change would require ambitious policy commitments to ensure greater opportunities for contact and integration within housing, education, work, sport and leisure, cultural rituals, and use of public services (Hughes 2018). Increasingly, civil society organizations have developed service-delivery arrangements with government departments, which provides a level of support and mainstreaming of effective practice, but have also bound community organizations to the implementation of more rigid strategies on "good relations" designed by policymakers, rather than seasoned practitioners.

Addressing the Past from "Below"

In the absence of a wider policy framework to address the legacies of past violence, civil society has developed a range of bottom-up initiatives to address issues related to the past. These have included important cross-community contributions to the deliberation on what the top-down processes might look like, advocacy for the establishment of investigations in relation to particular atrocities and deaths, the development of both society-wide and community-specific commemoration, memorialization and oral history processes, and the encouragement of intra- and inter-communal dialogue processes to explore the challenge of facing the truths and perceptions of the past (Eriksson 2009; Hamber and Kelly 2016; Lundy 2011; Lundy and McGovern 2008).

These initiatives have relied heavily on external, non-governmental funding sources, although grant aid from the British and Irish governments and the European Union has also ensured that some civil society-led progress has been made on legacy issues, despite the failure to establish a more comprehensive framework of measures. These bottom-up processes have tended to take two distinct approaches – one framing the issue as a legal, human rights, and accountability concern (government facing) and the other focusing on the creation of trust, mutual understanding, and the improvement of relationships between estranged groups (human dynamics focused) (Beirne and Knox 2014). The former is often aligned with the more justice-oriented organizations and often involves victims, community organizers, and legal experts working together to work both on specific campaigns and wider institutional reform. The latter is more typically associated with (or self-describes as) having an explicit reconciliation agenda and might include the development of storytelling projects, encounters between victims and perpetrators, community education processes, or joint commemorative practices. While the latter could be described as the type of community relations practice described in the previous section, its gaze was more directly focused on the past and the coming-to-terms with challenging and contested interpretations of the past. While a "false dichotomy" has emerged (ibid 2014), these two approaches are not mutually exclusive, and there are obvious overlaps and intersections. Increasingly, in both funding and practice, there is recognition that a more integrated and synergistic approach is possible. Civil society organizations, such as Healing through Remembering, have sought to approach the issue on the basis of agreeing a core set of principles (including “right to truth” and “trust, transparency and engagement”) from which a range of civil society-led practices and initiatives can develop (Healing through Remembering 2013).

Conclusion

The term reconciliation has moved in and out of favor in post-agreement Northern Ireland, and there are indications that the reluctance or hesitancy around its use is related to the inherent ambition of the concept, which demands bold societal transformation to be effectively progressed. That said, if reconciliation is understood to involve a wide set of individual, yet interdependent, processes which focus on the improvement of the complex web of horizontal and vertical relationships, there is evidence that aspects of reconciliation have been positively progressed in Northern Ireland over the past two decades. This can be seen in a range of social, political, and economic changes, from the increase in the proportion of mixed-identity neighborhoods (Nolan 2014) and the willingness to accept further sharing and integration among the majority of the population (Morrow et al. 2013), the increased legitimacy of the reformed police service (Bradford et al. 2019), and the ability of antagonist political leaders to, at least, agree an outline process for truth recovery, even if implementation has proved more challenging (Lawther 2014).

Though there is no definitive understanding of what a reconciled society might look like, it is safe to say that, to date, Northern Ireland is neither fully reconciled with its violent past or with the shape or form of its shared future. It remains a highly segregated society with a brittleness and fragility to relationships at both political and communal levels. Dissident republican groups are still engaged in violence, loyalist paramilitaries still dominate and control working class communities and stymie opportunities for economic and social development, tensions around cultural expression and memorialization are regularly ignited, and sectarian antagonism persists. Significant levels of social and economic deprivation, educational disadvantage, and social exclusion across all identity communities endure. Reconciliation requires that the political, social, and economic structures and institutions that gave rise to and served to maintain the conflict and division must be fundamentally changed or transformed. Peace agreements can go some significant way in identifying and progressing this institutional change and encourage ambitious policy developments. However, a watching brief needs to be maintained in order to revise and course-adjust to respond to the changing social and political context.

The process of reconciliation requires the acceptance of paradoxes and contradictions, with tensions arising between, for example, the dual objectives of painful truth recovery and positive inter-communal relationship-building or the development of a vision of a shared and interdependent future while simultaneously acknowledging historical grievances and brutalities of the past. Like many other societies emerging from conflict, Northern Ireland has struggled to find the balance between securing political stability and encouraging the types of transformative social change demanded of an ambitious reconciliation process. In the implementation of peacebuilding practice, concepts of community relations and good relations have been more closely perceived as the “softer” end of reconciliation, while truth and justice demands have been framed as more adversarial and political, with only minimal alignment with wider reconciliation discourses. With the publication of, and progression toward the implementation of the Stormont House Agreement (2014), which includes institutional bodies to address both issues of truth recovery and reconciliation, there are indications of some tentative political convergence on these issues.

Reconciliation cannot be imposed from above or morally demanded from below, nor is reconciliation solely the responsibility of those most directly affected by the conflict. A comprehensive process of reconciliation requires the involvement of all parties, including the post-GFA generation who did not experience the direct violence but live with the consequences of division and intergenerational transmission of polarizing narratives of the past. In addition, reconciliation is not just an internal matter for Northern Ireland. The decision of the United Kingdom to exit the European Union in 2016 has increased political tensions within Northern Ireland and between the pro-Brexit DUP and the Irish government and has the potential to hinder the progress made in the thawing of historic tensions between the British and Irish states. The indications are that Brexit has also accelerated the wider social and political debate around the realization of Irish unity. The Northern Ireland peace process has been lauded internationally as a positive model for conflict resolution and peacebuilding and has been thus marketed by the British, Irish, and US governments and the European Union. However, there is still much to learn about the processes, decisions, and investments that are required to address the hostilities, mistrust, and divisions that exist, if reconciliation is to take firm hold.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

References

- Allport, G. W. (1954). The nature of prejudice. Reading: Addison-Wesley.
- Anstey, M., & Rosoux, V. (2017). Introduction: Negotiating perilous relations: Quandaries of reconciliation. In V. Rosoux & M. Anstey (Eds.), Negotiating reconciliation in peacemaking: Quandaries of relationship building (1st ed., pp. 1–14). New York: Springer International Publishing.
- Aughey, A., & Gormley-Heenan, C. (Eds.). (2011). The Anglo-Irish agreement: Re-thinking its legacy. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Beirne, M., & Knox, C. (2014). Reconciliation and human rights in Northern Ireland: A false dichotomy? Journal of Human Rights Practice, 6(1), 26–50.
- Belloni, R. (2010). Northern Ireland: Civil society and the slow burning of peace. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society and peacebuilding: A critical assessment (pp. 105–128). Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Bloomfield, K. (1998). We will remember them: Report of the Northern Ireland victims' commissioner. Belfast: The Stationery Office.
- Bloomfield, D. (2006). On good terms: Clarifying reconciliation. Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Bradford, B., Topping, J., Martin, R., & Jackson, J. (2019). Can diversity promote trust? Neighbourhood context and trust in the Police in Northern Ireland. Policing and Society, 29(9), 1022–1041. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10439463.2018.1479409>.
- Bush, K., & Houston, K. (2011). The story of PEACE: Learning from EU PEACE funding in Northern Ireland and the Border Region. Belfast: SEUPB.
- Byrne, J., & Gormley-Heenan, C. (2014). Beyond the walls: Dismantling Belfast's conflict architecture. City, 18(4–5), 447–454. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13604813.2014.939465>.
- Byrne, S., & Irwin, C. (2001). Economic aid and policy making: Building the peace dividend in Northern Ireland. Policy & Politics, 29(4), 413–429. <https://doi.org/10.1332/0305573012501431>.
- Central Community Relations Unit, (CCRU). (1991). Community relations in Northern Ireland. Belfast: CCRU.
- Charbonneau, B., & Parent, G. (2012). Peacebuilding, memory and reconciliation: Bridging top-down and bottom-up approaches. New York: Routledge.
- Clegg, C., & Liechty, J. (2001). Moving beyond sectarianism project: Religion, conflict and reconciliation in Northern Ireland. Dublin: Columba Press.
- Cochrane, F., & Dunn, S. (2002). People power? The role of the voluntary and community sector in the Northern Ireland conflict. Cork: Cork University Press.
- Consultative Group on the Past. (2009). Report of the consultative group on the past. Belfast: Consultative Group on the Past.
- De Coning, C., & Ngubane, S. (Eds.). (2015). Accord peacebuilding handbook (2nd ed.). Durban: ACCORD.
- Department of Education. (2020). School enrolment – School level data 2019/20. Retrieved 1 July, 2020, from <https://www.education-ni.gov.uk/publications/school-enrolment-school-level-data-201920>
- Eriksson, A. (2009). A bottom-up approach to transformative justice in Northern Ireland. International Journal

- of Transitional Justice, 3(3), 301–320. <https://doi.org/10.1093/tjtj/ijp019>.
- Faith and Politics Group. (1997). Doing unto others: Parity of esteem in a contested space. Belfast: Faith and Politics Group.
- Fay, M. T., Morrissey, M., & Smyth, M. (1999). Northern Ireland's troubles: The human costs. London: Pluto Press.
- Ferguson, N., Burgess, M., & Hollywood, I. (2010). Who are the victims? Victimhood experiences in post-agreement Northern Ireland. Political Psychology, 31(6), 857–886.
- Fischer, M. (2011). Transitional justice and reconciliation. In B. Austin, M. Fischer, & H. J. Giessmann (Eds.), Advancing conflict transformation: The Berghof handbook (Vol. II, pp. 406–424). Opladen: Barbara Budrich Publishers.
- Gallagher, A. M. (2004). Education in divided societies. London: Palgrave.
- Gallagher, A. M. (2016). Shared education in Northern Ireland: School collaboration in divided societies. Oxford Review of Education, 42(3), 362–375. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03054985.2016.1184868>.
- Gray, A. M., Hamilton, J., Kelly, G., Lynn, B., Melaugh, M., & Robinson, G. (2018). Northern Ireland peace monitoring report: Number five. Belfast: Community Relations Council.
- Hamber, B., & Kelly, G. (2005). A place for reconciliation? Conflict and locality in Northern Ireland. Belfast: Democratic Dialogue.
- Hamber, B., & Kelly, G. (2009). Beyond coexistence: Towards a working definition of reconciliation. In J. Quinn (Ed.), Reconciliation(s): Transitional justice in postconflict societies (pp. 286–310). Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Hamber, B., & Kelly, G. (2016). Practice, power and inertia: Personal narrative, archives and dealing with the past in Northern Ireland. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 8(1), 25–44.
- Hamber, B., & Kelly, G. (2018). Northern Ireland: Case study. In Kofi Annan Foundation & Interpeace (Eds.), Challenging the conventional: Making post-violence reconciliation succeed (pp. 86–130). Geneva: Kofi Annan Foundation/Interpeace.
- Hayes, B. C., & McAllister, I. (2001). Who voted for peace? Public support for the 1998 Northern Ireland agreement. Irish Political Studies, 16(1), 73–93. <https://doi.org/10.1080/07907180108406633>.
- Hayner, P. (2002). Unspeakable truths: Facing the challenge of truth commissions. New York/London: Routledge.
- Hazan, P. (2009). Reconciliation. In V. Chetail (Ed.), Post-conflict peacebuilding: A lexicon (pp. 256–267). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Healing through Remembering. (2013). Core values and principles for dealing with the past. Belfast: Healing through Remembering.
- Hughes, J. (2018). Agency versus structure in reconciliation. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 41(4), 624–642. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2018.1381340>.
- Hurley, M. (Ed.). (1994). Reconciliation in religion and society. Belfast: Institute of Irish Studies.
- Lawther, C. (2014). Truth, denial and transition: Northern Ireland and the contested past. London: Taylor and Francis.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Long, W. J., & Brecke, P. B. (2003). War and reconciliation: Reason and emotion in conflict resolution. Cambridge: The MIT Press.
- Lundy, P. (2011). Paradoxes and challenges of transitional justice at the 'local' level: Historical enquiries in Northern Ireland. Contemporary Social Science, 6(1), 89–105. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17450144.2010.534495>.
- Lundy, P., & McGovern, M. (2008). Whose justice? Rethinking transitional justice from the bottom up. Journal of Law and Society, 35(2), 265–292.
- Lynch, O., & Argomaniz, J. (2017). Victims of terrorism and political violence: Identity, needs, and service delivery in Northern Ireland and Great Britain. Terrorism and Political Violence, 29(3), 464–482. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09546553.2015.1049342>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (Ed.). (2013). Routledge handbook of peacebuilding. Abingdon: Routledge.
- McEvoy, K., & Bryson, A. (2016). Justice, truth and oral history: Legislating the past 'from below' in Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland Legal Quarterly, 67(1), 67–90.
- McEvoy, L., McEvoy, K., & McConnachie, K. (2006). Reconciliation as a dirty word: Conflict, community relations and education in Northern Ireland. Journal of International Affairs, 60(1), 81–106.
- McGary, J., & O'Leary, B. (2004). The Northern Ireland conflict: Consociational engagements. New York: Oxford University Press.
- McKay, S. (2015). The Atlantic Philanthropies: Northern Ireland. New York: The Atlantic Philanthropies.
- Milliken, M., Bates, J., & Smith, A. (2020). Education policies and teacher deployment in Northern Ireland: Ethnic separation, cultural encapsulation and community cross-over. British Journal of Educational Studies, 68(2), 139–160. <https://doi.org/10.1080/00071005.2019.1666083>.
- Morrow, D. (2016). From enemies to partners? Reconciliation in Northern Ireland. In M. Salter & Z. Yousef (Eds.), Accord insight 3: Transforming broken relationships: Making peace with the past (pp. 39–44). London: Conciliation Resources.
- Morrow, D., Robinson, G., & Dowds, L. (2013). The Long view of community relations in Northern Ireland: 1989–2012. Belfast: ARK.
- Murphy, C. (2010). A moral theory of political reconciliation. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1017/CBO9780511761652>.
- Niens, U., O'Connor, U., & Smith, A. (2013). Citizenship education in divided societies: Teachers' perspectives in Northern Ireland. Citizenship Studies, 17(1), 128–141. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13621025.2012.716214>.

- Nolan, P. (2014). Northern Ireland peace monitoring report: Number three. Belfast: Community Relations Council.
- Northern Ireland Office. (1998). The agreement: Agreement reached in the multiparty negotiations. Belfast: Northern Ireland Office.
- Northern Ireland Office. (2014). Stormont house agreement. Belfast: Northern Ireland Office.
- Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, (OFMDFM). (2005). A shared future: The policy and strategic framework for good relations in Northern Ireland. Belfast: OFMDFM.
- Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, (OFMDFM). (2010). Programme for cohesion, sharing and integration consultation document. Belfast: OFMDFM.
- Office of the First Minister and Deputy First Minister, (OFMDFM). (2013). Together: Building a united community strategy. Belfast: OFMDFM.
- Porter, N. (2003). The elusive quest: Reconciliation in Northern Ireland. Belfast: Blackstaff Press.
- Reychler, L., & Paffenholz, T. (Eds.). (2001). Peacebuilding: A field guide. London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Robinson, L. (2014). Embodied peacebuilding: Reconciliation as practical theology. Oxford: Peter Lang Publishing.
- Ruane, J. (2015). Conflict and reconciliation in Northern Ireland. In T. Inglis (Ed.), Are the Irish different? (pp. 166–176). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Ruane, J., & Todd, J. (1995). The dynamics of conflict in Northern Ireland: Power, conflict, and emancipation. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Salter, M., & Yousef, Z. (Eds.). (2016). Transforming broken relationships; making peace with the past. London: Conciliation Resources.
- Skarlato, O., Byrne, S., Ahmed, K., & Karari, P. (2016). Economic assistance to peacebuilding and reconciliation community-based projects in Northern Ireland and the Border Counties: Challenges, opportunities and evolution. International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society, 29(2), 157–182. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s10767-015-9209-z>.
- Spencer, G. (2011). Forgiving and remembering in Northern Ireland: Approaches to conflict resolution. London: Continuum International Publishing Group.
- Tajfel, H., & Turner, J. C. (1979). An integrative theory of intergroup conflict. In W. G. Austin & S. Worchel (Eds.), The social psychology of intergroup relations (pp. 33–47). Monterey: Brooks Cole.
- Todd, J., Ruane, J., & Dunne, M. (2010). From "shared future" to "cohesion, sharing and integration": An analysis of Northern Ireland's framework documents. York: Joseph Rowntree Charitable Trust.
- Tonge, J. (2000). From Sunningdale to the Good Friday Agreement: Creating devolved government in Northern Ireland. Contemporary British History, 14(3), 39–60. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13619460008581593>.
- White, B. (1984). John Hume: Statesman of the troubles. Belfast: Blackstaff Press.
- Wilson, R. (2006). What works for reconciliation? Belfast: Democratic Dialogue.

Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research

Yasmin Chilmeran¹ and Jenny Hedström²

¹Middle East and North Africa Programme, Swedish Institute of International Affairs, Stockholm, Sweden

²Swedish Defence University, Stockholm, Sweden

Synonyms

Feminism; Ethics; Fieldwork; Ethical research; Conflict research; Positionality

Definition of Reflexivity

This entry explores reflexivity as a method through which researchers can make visible the relationship between what is known (ontology) and how to know it (epistemology) (Hemmings 2012). Reflexivity is closely related to ways of knowing, which challenges the idea that knowledge is objective. This is an approach that understands knowledge as subjective, and reflexivity as the means through which these partial aspects of knowledge are foregrounded (Harding 1992; Behar 1996). Reflexivity can be particularly useful in research on peace as it provides opportunities to reflect upon the much larger political, and often violent, contexts informing research, including the choices we make about what to ask, who to speak to, and where to go. Reflexivity also makes the researcher a visible component of the research process, rather than assuming that research is done through impartial observation. Reflexivity as a methodological practice thus provides both tools and opportunities for researchers working on peace and conflict to engage in research that attempts to be transparent about its aims, its limitations, the way in which it was conducted, and for whom (Wibben 2016).

Introduction

This entry discusses reflexivity as feminist method for peace and conflict research, with specific focus on how this can play out in fieldwork intensive research projects. In this entry, the authors discuss reflexivity as both a way to foreground the presence and impact of the researcher within the research project, and also to situate the researcher and the project in the wider political context in which struggles over meaning are fought, and the intersectional power relations that bely these struggles. Hence, reflexivity is a method that understands knowledge as contextual, and therefore partial. To “see” this partiality we need to practice reflexivity – asking ourselves how, where, and to what extent we influence or even construct the meaning and knowledge accrued from research. Researchers can foster stronger knowledge claims by being upfront about the ways in which knowledge is subjective (Harding 1992). Further, reflexivity helps to uncover how knowledge claims are never set, but negotiated in the setting in which research is conducted (Fujii 2010). The negotiation over meaning becomes even more fraught in research on peace and conflict, wherein knowledge about the meaning of conflict itself can be violently contested (Sangarasivam 2001). In short, research is never innocent, but always by someone, for someone, and researchers need to be explicit about how these broader relations of power shape and are shaped by the research they engage in (Collins 2012; Tuhiwai Smith 1999).

A reflexive approach situates the research and the researcher in the world that it seeks to observe and analyze, and in so doing, asks the researcher to reflect on how this situatedness shapes the research process, its outcomes, impacts, and even potential harms. This allows the researcher to think beyond the shelf life of the research project and understand and contextualize its contributions, be they academic or policy focused.

This is important in many disciplines, but especially so within feminist research, which seeks not only to produce knowledge but also to work toward a larger project of gender equality – similar in a sense to what Brooke Ackerly and Jacqui True discuss as part of a “feminist research ethic” (Ackerly and True 2020). Feminism, after all, is a political project geared towards gender equality. Reflexivity thus provides opportunities to critically reflect on the structural (and intersectional) context of both the researcher and the research project – making visible the impact of gender, class, race, and other structural factors on research and its effects.

This entry explores how reflexivity can practically function in the context of fieldwork-based research. First, the authors briefly explain how a reflexive approach fits into the theoretical, epistemological, and methodological contributions of feminist research on conflict and peace. The entry next draws on the experiences of the authors in undertaking research on peace and conflict in Iraq and Myanmar, illustrating opportunities as well as challenges in practicing reflexivity as a method.

Reflexivity in Feminist Research on Peace and Conflict

Feminist scholars studying issues of peace, conflict, and violence have broadened the (traditional/malestream) scope of inquiry, moving away from a focus on the nation-state as the unit of analysis to include women’s lived experiences in their studies (Wibben 2016). This is both a methodological and a theoretical challenge to mainstream accounts of conflict, its drivers, impacts, and relevant actors. As Swati Parashar reminds us: attempts to be objective often results in reifying male elite narratives and hides the complex continuum of violence women experience in conflict as well as in transitions from conflict to peace (Parashar 2014). Feminist research, on the other hand, centers on the question of gender. This makes visible not only the interconnected way in which war and peace operate, but the silent (and silenced) role that both gender, and indeed women themselves, play in conflict and its aftermath (see D'Costa 2006). While this silence occurs in mainstream accounts of conflict and its drivers (which frequently leaves women or gendered analysis out of its scope of analysis), there are also silences in the way research is conducted – silences regarding knowledge production, the power dynamics therein that determine how research is conducted, whose voice is highlighted, which participants are invited in, and the role of the researcher in all of this. This is what reflexivity as a methodological tool helps to uncover, account for and mitigate.

Reflexivity in Practice

Both authors work in contexts in which knowledge production has a long and contentious history in relation to the state, as well as to Western governments and educational institutions. In the Middle East, Iraq sits uncomfortably both in relation to colonial legacies in the region, its own history of authoritarian rule under the Ba'athist regime, and most recently, its conflict relative to the War on Terror and the military campaigns against the Islamic State. Knowledge production by non-Iraqis about Iraq has historically, and at times continues to, rely on racialized, orientalist, gendered, and otherwise loaded assumptions about Iraq, the Middle East region more broadly, and the dynamics of conflict in this context (Abu-Lughod 2002; Bhattacharyya 2008; Mohanty 2003). For example, recent violent conflicts in Iraq run the risk of being simplistically attributed to sectarianism, when there are complex webs of actors, class dynamics, historical grievances, and experiences at play that shape violence and its many forms in post-2003 Iraq. Given the complexities and difficulties of conducting research in Iraq, there are also significant power imbalances between Iraqi and foreign researchers that need to be addressed when conducting research in or on the country. Similarly, the knowledge economy in Myanmar has been, and to some extent continues to be, controlled by the central state, restricting access to certain areas, topics, and subjects. This can be understood in relation to the broader security concerns of the state, currently engaged in civil wars with multiple minority ethnic armed groups, and its recent history of military rule. As a result, knowledge outputs, including state curriculum, have a history of centering majority Bamar/Buddhist perspectives, while current research on Myanmar are undertaken in a context of recent or present trauma, discrimination, and violence. It is against these contentious backdrops that current research on Iraq and Myanmar must be understood.

Entering the Field: Decisions and Reflections on Identity

I am an early career research who is a member of the Arab Iraqi “diaspora.” In this sense, I had both much in common and some key difference between my own identity, experiences and privileges, and those who I interview (who were primarily Iraqi women working in civil society organisations, and largely on the Women, Peace and Security Agenda). Some too had dual citizenship, some had been in the diaspora before returning to Iraq (which carries its own baggage in Iraq’s post-2003 landscape), and some had lived through the final years of Saddam Hussein’s dictatorship. My identity informed the research process throughout for a number of reasons – I could never be a “neutral” observer, but had a vested interest in the rights, freedoms and safety of the people I spoke to, as well as a specific identity that I needed to communicate and navigate – someone simultaneously “local” and not. There was also the added complexity of being from an ethnically mixed but Arab identifying family and conducting the majority of my fieldwork in the relative safety of Iraqi Kurdistan. There were political tensions I was very much aware because of their centrality in published analysis on Iraq, and many that I was not aware of at the outset of my work. However, navigating my own identity and the identities of the women I spoke to helped me understand the importance of understanding and analysing the material and political reasons for why some of these tensions occur – a dynamic that became a central part of how I write about women’s networks and their members in Iraq – as agential and responsive political actors rather than simply recipients of international norms and funding.

The above reflection focused heavily on identity – a key process through which reflexivity can be practiced. For me, reflexivity was an important process that took different forms from the outset of the research process; thinking critically about first my identity and positionality, how to communicate, disclose, or address it, how this shapes, limits, or opens up conversations with experts and research participants, and lastly, what True and Ackerly (2020) refer to as “deliberative moments,” which I took as opportunities to reshape my research questions to more responsively reflect the interviews I was conducting. This reflexive approach to positionality is useful in setting up research questions that seek to avoid assumptions about Iraq and Iraqi women (see Al-Ali and Pratt (2016) for an example of how this operates in Iraq too). Reflexivity here also allowed me to revise these questions as my knowledge deepened. In fact, leaving space for opportunity to discover silences within a context or topic can reshape the research project entirely (see D’Costa 2006).

Communicating my identity and values to the women I encountered throughout the research process was equally important – achieved through thinking about how to introduce myself, my research interests, how I would use the information provided to me, and what communicating this would show to participants (that I understood the sensitivity of what we were discussing, that I had an awareness of the complexities and tensions in post-2003 Iraq, that I had an interest in discussing sensitive or taboo subjects relating to gender). The conversations I had with research participants were a result of choices available to researchers about how much of themselves to share, how to frame interviews, and which questions to ask. I inhabited two scenarios during interviews, with one scenario being two women discussing the gendered dynamics of life in post-2003 Iraq, and the other of the PhD candidate with research goals to meet and a thesis to submit. Reflexivity allowed me to embody the complexities of both identities, and the myriad others, and understand how these would go on to shape the research project in its entirety.

In the Field: Encountering Vulnerabilities

The woman in front of me looks barely eighteen, though she tells me she is in her mid-twenties. She has a low voice, and stops often to catch her breath, and she sits still, hardly moving at all. I am in Myanmar to interview women about women’s leadership opportunities in post-war settings, but she talks about war and the gendered violence she experienced at the hands of uniformed men. Mirroring her body language, I also keep still, and do not interrupt her narrative. When she is finished speaking, we sit in silence, before I thank her for sharing this story with me. I then ask if she wants this story published and explain to her how to get in touch with me in case she changes her mind. I do not seek out narratives of violence, as asking women about traumatic experiences might retraumatise them. Sometimes, like with this case, they surface anyway, reflecting, I believe, a need among survivors of violence for telling their story to someone living outside their community. I explain, again at the end of the interview, that she, ultimately, owns the story – so if she doesn’t want it published she can contact me after I leave the room. I ask her if she knows where to go when she feels sick, if someone helps her when she cannot sleep. She tells me yes.

Rather than pushing for facts and details, or reaching for some sort of detached objectivity, reflexivity here meant not asking for detailed information, nor ironing out ambiguities or contradictions in the story told (Page 2017). I felt it was important to sit in the moment with the woman, simply listening, rather than questioning. As Lee Ann Fujii (2010, p. 234) argues, the value of people’s narration does not necessarily lie in their “accuracy” but rather in the ways people make sense of their experience as located in a specific context. When sharing experiences of events taking place in an environment that is both politicized and conflict-affected, people may forget certain facts, or choose to tell them in a different light. Paying reflexive attention to this “meta-data” helps render visible the grander political context which shapes experiences of violence and insecurity, and thus helps with the analysis as well (Fujii 2010, p. 232). In the above example, I found that a focus on the particular and the affective were helpful for generating knowledge about larger political events (see Mohanty 2003): the woman’s story brought into stark relief the relationship between gender, ethnicity, violence, and war in Myanmar’s border areas. Journaling after fieldwork, as a reflexive tool, helped to bring into focus the affective environment of the interview by reminding me after the event how I perceived the interview, complementing the transcription.

This experience is a reminder that a question about women’s leadership in a conflict context can, and often will, reveal violence even when it is not expected. The people we encounter in conflict fieldwork have a right to express their experiences of that conflict, even if it is not what we expected to discuss. As researchers conducting fieldwork in the aftermath of conflict, we need to have some tools prepared for when such a topic arises in an interview. Here, this meant relying on some ethical guidelines, like anonymity, sensitivity, and allowing the participant a degree of control over the conversation and what happens with it even after the interview is finished. In not wanting to further traumatize or harm the woman, I reminded her that she was in control of the story being told: she could stop at any moment, or choose to contact me after the interview ended to withdraw the story. Not asking for details about the perpetrators would also, I hoped, help to minimize potential reprisals. Her name was not noted down in any document; instead we used a code when discussing her. These attempts at ensuring confidentiality, trust and full voluntary and informed participation were key tools aiding the study’s reflexive process (Shwe et al. 2015).

In the Field: Navigating Political and Emotional Topographies

During my PhD research, undertaken in northern Myanmar, the conflict between the Kachin armed forces and the Myanmar military is worsening, and rumours abound about impending military attacks on Kachin areas are bountiful. I am told bridges and roads are being reinforced by the Myanmar army to facilitate troop movements, and there is footage of military planes attacking Kachin fields, farms and displacement camps, although the Myanmar army refutes any claims of attacks on Kachin communities. Not knowing what is about to happen, and where exactly, I end up postponing my trip to Kachin areas. When I do go, a couple of months later, everyone I meet is bracing for assault: building bunkers, hiding valuables. There is a sense of urgency and tension in the air. Rumours produce fear and uncertainty; these impact not only who I meet, but where I go, what I ask, and also how people react to me. Fear prevented me from going into certain areas, both geographically and subjectively speaking. Fear also prevented people from speaking to me about certain things, rendering some people silent, and some topics off limit.

In this case, research reflexivity became a critical method through which I could tease out the affective environment of the research: in being attentive to emotions I could see how it affected the collection of information (where I went, who I spoke to), but also the ways in which I interpreted the narratives shared with me (Skidmore 2004). It helped me see how research includes the careful negotiations of the political topography and relationships of the field (Huggins and Glebbeek 2009), and how this shaped how I approached, understood, and conducted the research process (Sehgal 2009; Subramanian 2009). Reflexivity, which here meant being attentive to emotions, helped me trace “the subjectivities and partialities” that research entails (Sangarasivam 2001). This is particularly urgent in research on peace and war, where pervasive everyday insecurities often exist alongside memories and experiences of violence, inducing “rumors, inventions, denials, evasions, and silences” (Fujii 2010). Acknowledging emotions and their impact on the data collection and analysis can facilitate reflexivity at this point of the research, by foregrounding the way emotions shape decisions about methods, which data is collected, and where research takes place. This is a useful process even after fieldwork.

Leaving the Field: Impact and Expertise

In the process of conducting research on Iraqi women's participation, I meet a number of policy practitioners from Iraqi and international organisations, some of whom express interest in reading summaries of research findings once I have completed the thesis. This is not unexpected – ethically, I have an obligation to share what I find, and it is something I aim to do at the outset. It is also something that can be built into the research project (with resourcing), through validation workshops and renewed visits to research participants. Currently, there is both an incentivisation of producing policy relevant academic research, as well as a mismatch in how research for policy audiences and research for academic markers must be written. As I write this chapter, I am in the process of drafting a short summary of findings. I ask myself – what would Iraqi civil society actors want to know from me, what would policy actors in international organisations want or need to know from me, and lastly, how do I balance being critical about the work civil society engages in and writing something useful or encouraging? While I am encouraged to work through my 'imposter syndrome' as a young woman in an academic context, I am also keenly aware that my 'expertise' is granted because of my institutional affiliation and the training I have received. Many of the women I interviewed also have graduate degrees and have many years of work and leadership experience. What can I share or summarise that can meaningfully be useful for them in their work? And further, how should I target my 'expertise' in a way that can be useful to the larger peacebuilding project in Iraq?

In feminist research, reflexivity becomes ever more complex, as by design, feminism and feminist research is both a theoretical standpoint and a political project. This means understanding not only the ethical and epistemological considerations necessary in the process of conducting research, but also what happens with that knowledge and our acquired “expertise” after the research project is completed.

In the introduction to her chapter “Translation in the war-zone,” Malaka Shwaik (2020) describes her dismay after being asked to help a media outlet connect with Palestinian youth living in the Gaza Strip, only to see their discussions of their experiences “rebutted” throughout the radio segment. The research we conduct, the knowledge claims we make, and the contacts and networks we build, exist in the world in which that knowledge is contested, politicized, and repurposed often outside of our intentions for it. Shwaik’s experience is a reminder that as researchers with a political purpose, our work exists beyond the “project,” and at times, our expertise is called on to contribute to a much wider conversation that we have little control over. Reflexivity in this context provides opportunities to critically reflect on what we do with these opportunities, and when they do not result in ways we expect or hope, how to account for this in the future.

Conclusion/Summary

Reflexivity is both a process and a tool, relevant for all stages of a research project – from outlining its parameters, asking questions and stating the curiosities about a particular issue, conducting fieldwork, and of course, in drawing conclusions, understandings, and recommendations. It is also an important part of how the researchers engage with participants, build trust, and discuss the research with those who may be involved in the research or its aftermath. Thus, in practicing reflexivity, researchers may consider how their identities (gender, class, age, ethnicity, and so on) affect the research process in its entirety. Others may go further and center the importance of emotions, feelings, and closeness in the interview settings (Hedström 2019), and some researchers may argue that the knowledge we create during research does not exist prior to the research process, but is co-constructed by the people involved in the research (Cavarero 2000). In the examples above, the authors stress their own positioning vis a vis their research participants and the research topic more generally, as well as the conscious and subconscious choices the researchers made throughout the process. This process allowed both researchers to reflect on how identity and positionality shaped the fieldwork, the eventual analysis, writing and outputs of the research project, and lastly, the impacts of the research on the researcher, participants, and on the broader political context.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace
- ▶ Reflexivity in the Study of Security and Conflict

References

- Abu-Lughod, L. (2002). Do Muslim women really need saving? Anthropological reflections on cultural relativism and its others. American Anthropologist, 104(3), 783–790.
- Ackerly, B., & True, J. (2020). Doing feminist research in political and social science (2nd ed.). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Al-Ali, N., & Pratt, N. (2016). Positionalities, intersectionalities, and transnational feminism in researching women in post-invasion Iraq. In A. T. R. Wibben (Ed.), Researching war: Feminist methods, ethics and politics (pp. 76–91). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Behar, R. (1996). The vulnerable observer: Anthropology that breaks your heart. Boston: Beacon Press.
- Bhattacharyya, G. (2008). Dangerous brown men: Exploiting sex, violence and feminist in the war on terror. New York: Zed Books.
- Cavarero, A. (2000). Relating narratives: Storytelling and selfhood. London/New York: Routledge.
- Collins, P. H. (2012). On intellectual activism. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- D’Costa, B. (2006). Marginalized identity: New frontiers of research for IR? In B. Ackerly, M. Stern, & J. True (Eds.), Feminist methodologies for international relations (pp. 129–152). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Fujii, L. A. (2010). Shades of truth and lies: Interpreting testimonies of war and violence. Journal of Peace Research, 47(2), 231–241.
- Harding, S. (1992). After the neutrality ideal: Science, politics, and ‘strong objectivity’. Social Research, 59(3), 567–587.
- Hedström, J. (2019). Confusion, seduction, failure : Emotions as reflexive knowledge in conflict settings. International Studies Review, 21(4), 662–677.
- Hemmings, C. (2012). Affective solidarity: Feminist reflexivity and political transformation. Feminist Theory, 13(2), 147–161.
- Huggins, K. M., & Glebbeek, M.-L. (2009). Women fielding danger – Negotiating ethnographic identities in field research. Lanham/Plymouth: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
- Mohanty, C. T. (2003). Under Western eyes; revisited: Feminist solidarity through anticapitalism struggles. Signs, 28(2), 499–535.
- Page, T. (2017). Vulnerable writing as a feminist methodological practice. Feminist Review, 115(1), 13–29.
- Parashar, S. (2014). Women and militant wars: The politics of injury. Abingdon, Oxon: Routledge.
- Sangarasivam, Y. (2001). Researcher, informant, ‘assassin’, me. Geographical Review, 91(1/2), 95–104.
- Sehgal, M. (2009). The Veiled Feminist Ethnographer: Fieldwork among Women’s India’s Hindu Righth. In M. Huggins & M.-L. Glebbeek (Eds.), Women fielding danger: Negotiating ethnographic identities in field research (pp. 325–352). Plymouth: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Shwaik, M. (2020). Translation in the war-zone: The Gaza strip as case study. In R. R. Gould & K. Tahmasebian (Eds.), The Routledge handbook of translation and activism (pp. 129–144). London: Routledge.
- Shwe, S., Miedema, S., & Aye Thiri Kyaw. (2015). Application of international ethical and safety guidelines on conducting violence against women research within the Myanmar context: Lessons learned and ways forward. Myanmar Health Sciences Research Journal, 27(3), 232–238.
- Subramanian, M. (2009). Negotiating the field in rural India: Location, organization, and identity salience. In M. Huggins & M.-L. Glebbeek (Eds.), Women fielding danger: Negotiating ethnographic identities in field research (pp. 201–226). Plymouth: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Skidmore, M. (2004). Karaoke fascism: Burma and the politics of fear. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Tuhiwai Smith, L. (1999). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and indigenous peoples. London: Zed Books.
- Wibben, A. T. R. (2016). Researching war: Feminist methods, ethics and politics. Abingdon, Oxon: Routledge.

Reflexivity in the Study of Security and Conflict

James Fitzgerald
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Introduction

This chapter will examine reflexivity, with a focus on three cognate disciplines: international relations, security studies, and peace studies. It opens with an account of how reflexivity has become more visible in – and has actively shaped – the study of security and conflict, following spatial openings in the early 1990s within international relations and security studies in particular. This is followed by a brief exposition of how feminist epistemologies have influenced (and continue to influence) the theory and practice of reflexive inquiry. Finally, the chapter will examine how reflexive analyses have been applied via three prominent “turns” in the aforementioned disciplines, namely, the narrative, vernacular, and local turns.

Definition: Reflexivity and Disciplinarily in International Relations and the Study of Conflict

While many concepts across the social sciences (and beyond) certainly meet W.B. Gallie’s criteria of being “essentially contested” (1956), reflexivity is of a particularly slippery constitution. This is largely due to its simultaneous presence across a number of disciplines, each of which characterizes reflexivity in its own way. Tracing reflexivity across linguistics (“Grammar and Linguistics. Of a grammatical element or its meaning: that refers back to the subject of the clause or sentence in which it is used [emphasis in original]” (Oxford English Dictionary 2019)), philosophy (“Philosophy and Psychology. Of a mental action, process, etc. turned or directed back upon the mind itself; involving intelligent self-awareness or self-examination; introspective” (Oxford English Dictionary 2019)), and the social sciences (“Social Sciences. Of a method, theory, etc.: that takes account of itself or esp. of the effect of the personality or presence of the researcher on what is being investigated. [emphasis in original]” (Oxford English Dictionary 2019)), for example, presents an array of definitions – yet one can identify, at the very least, an underlying quality of “turning, deflecting, or bending (something) back” (Oxford English Dictionary 2019). In the case of social analysis – and by extension, the analysis of conflict – this “bending back” most typically refers to the ability or practice of the researcher to reflect on their own subjectivities and to embed this recognition in the research process. Such recognition is often explicit – such as in the case of autobiography as method (see below). It can also be implicit, such as in cases where the researcher embraces a specific program of critical analysis – social constructivism (see Finnemore and Sikkink 2001) or post-structuralism, for example (see Howarth 2013) – that positions “truth” as a social construct and infers, therefore, that the researcher’s reflections on contingent social phenomena are themselves contingent. Either way, Amoreuax’s assertion that reflexivity entails “grappling with thought and action, which requires but moves beyond self-awareness” (2016, p. 23) is astute. When applied to international relations, security studies, and peace studies as academic disciplines, this exercised self-awareness can serve to elucidate the various power dynamics that underpin – and uphold – their traditional histories, rendering them not as identifiably whole but as a panoply of flexible narratives that offer various different stories depending on what(/how) one reads, and what – by extension – one distills as (ir)relevant from this literature. When Cox provided his famous dictum that “[t]heory is always for someone and for some purpose” (1981, p.), he was, essentially, speaking about reflexivity.

Exercising reflexivity at this systemic level opens the possibility of infinite readings around a wealth of phenomena, thus contravening the notion of paradigmatic “progress” that is foundational to classic interpretations of the academic enterprise. It is no surprise, then, that reflexivity is positively absent from most orthodox iterations of social or political science, a silence upheld by design. In traditional (or perhaps more accurately, positivist social analysis (see Harrison and Callan 2013; Smith 1996), the basic principle of naturalism reigns supreme: “[t]hat is, it is assumed that there is no fundamental difference between the social world and the natural world; the social world contains the same kind of regularities independent of time and place. . . as exist in the natural world” (Neufeld 1993, p. 40). These regularities – reproduced across a stable ontology – avail themselves to scientific methodologies in particular, which are designed to subsume observable patterns of behavior under “general covering laws” (ibid.). Such “laws” are easily recognized in the traditional (hi)stories of conflict studies and international relations, ranging from Doyle’s democratic peace thesis (1983) to the myriad Cold War-era applications of rational choice theory and scenario planning (see Erickson et al. 2013). Grieco’s (1988) assertion that hegemonic neorealist/neoliberalist explanations in international relations (which both assumed that states act rationally and adjust to “ripples” in a structurally determined international system) constituted “two of the same coin” (see Waever 1996) came at a pivotal and highly symbolic moment: the Berlin Wall was about to be torn down, and with it, the positivist orthodoxy of conflict studies defined by the primacy rationally acting states and what Sandra Harding has called the “want for objectivity” (Hirsh et al. 1995, p. 193).

In the vacuum left by these events, a host of “critical”/post-positivist approaches could come to the fore – including social constructivism, radical feminism, post-colonialism, and poststructuralism – the seeds of which had, of course, been planted decades earlier through the work of critical theorists such as Wittgenstein, Foucault, Enloe, Rorty, and Fanon (not to mention various less prominent scholars), all of whom were exercising reflexivity in some way. Giving rise to what has been typically referred to as the “Third Great Debate” in international relations, this reinvigorated body of scholarship imbued the study of conflict with “patterns of dissent and the celebration of difference” (George and Campbell 1990), an important intervention indeed given that, as Lapid put it, “[f]or many years the international relations discipline has had the dubious honour of being among the least self-reflexive of the Western social sciences” (1989, pp. 249–250; see also Amoureux and Steele 2016). What we can say, then, is that the post-Cold War period of the 1990s presented time (and space) for reflexivity to become more deeply ingrained in the mainstream study of security and conflict, steadily moving away from its early iteration(s) as a totemic rejection of positivist orthodoxy to becoming a byword for (self-)reflective inquiry that positioned the author at the core of analysis (see Hamati-Attaya 2013). This intertwining of the personal and the political – which can be strongly identified in what many would later dub the “narrative turn” – owes a lot to a well-developed kernel of feminist scholarship that had indelibly primed the critical landscape of the 1990s. Before providing examples of how reflexivity is employed in more recent literature, then, it is instructive to briefly explore the (continuing) influence of this intellectual progenitor.

The Personal, the Political, and the Reflexive

It is difficult to overstate the role of feminist research in promoting and subsequently normalizing reflexive inquiry in the study of security and conflict. To reduce the significance of feminist scholarship to disruptions of “gender” and “patriarchy” – essential though they are – is to miss the point: feminism should be more accurately evaluated as an affective bulwark against various forms of power: disciplinary, epistemological, methodological, and otherwise (see, e.g., Ackerly et al. 2006; Blanchard 2003; Sylvester 1994). Underlying the intensely disruptive bent of feminism lies the synthesis of the personal and the political, a recognition that elevating personal experience(s) can resonate with and give rise to broader social movements of collective resistance (and vice versa). Elizabeth Reid, channeling the pioneering work of feminist activists in the 1970s, reflects on this dynamic as follows:

Feminism empowers us to unlock the doors of our own resistance, enabling us to go back into ourselves, to recognise and reclaim our space, to re-orient ourselves. It allows a sense of self in solidarity with other women to emerge. This is a paradox: to change ourselves is to turn inwards, to begin the process of putting ourselves back together again. It is not to change the world. Yet it does for, in changing how we relate to the world, we change the world. Feminism, in taking women’s lived experience as its starting point, makes the personal political [emphasis added] (Reid 2018, p. 13).

Given the personal/political formation at the heart of feminism, it stands to reason that the methodologies typically employed differed quite clearly from the “norm” – that is, from self-contained methodological coda that would delineate “dependent variable” from “independent variable” from “generalizability,” and so on (see King et al. 1994). Feminists, to the contrary, embraced the pluralist potential of methodology, claiming no single standard of methodological correctness, nor any desire to create one (Tickner 2006, p. 21). In the hands of feminist scholars, methodology was more so a byword for discovery, conversations with a text (and oneself), and an epistemological compass that would allow for the complexities of inquiry to reveal themselves in all their constitutive, circular messiness. At the heart of this methodological enterprise – as with the ethos of activist feminism that preceded it – lay the individual:

Unlike social scientific IR, which has drawn on models from economics and the natural sciences to explain the behavior of states in the international system, IR feminists have used sociological analyses that start with individuals and the hierarchical social relations in which their lives are situated. While social scientific IR has been quite system-determined or state-focused, feminist understandings of state behavior frequently start from below the state level – with the lives of connected individuals [emphasis added] (Tickner 2006, p. 25).

Here, we see the essential dialectic of reflexivity at play: by turning “back on ourselves,” we simultaneously project our politics outward to any number of political collectives – an endeavor that can only be achieved by forgoing the orthodox social scientific impulse toward “objectivity” and embracing, instead, the inherent multiplicity that comes with being human and communicating oneself on those terms. Little wonder, then, that traces of feminist intervention(s) can be so strongly identified in a more modern, “reflexively aware” international relations, where the researcher’s recognition of self, positionality, and power has become increasingly inseparable from the empirical output produced in their name. This has become especially apparent in – and has perhaps even given rise to – the “narrative,” “vernacular,” and “local” turns currently in vogue in the (reflexive) study of conflict.

Reflexive “Turns”: The Narrative, the Vernacular, and the Local

The Narrative

While the practice of denoting disciplinary “turns” is somewhat problematic, it is a useful rhetorical device, nonetheless, to chart how certain concepts/epistemologies become more deeply sedimented as legitimate forms of inquiry. In the case of the narrative turn, the work of Naeem Inayatullah, Elizabeth Dauphinee, and Roland Bleiker (among others) in the late 2000s/early 2010s was instrumental in promoting reflexive practices such as autoethnography (see Brigg and Bleiker 2010) and novel writing (Jackson 2014), wherein “[t]he desire for introspection, to expose personal struggles, and to use alternative narrative styles. . . take on an almost therapeutic purpose, particularly when it appears that research is intimately connected with the researcher’s sense of being” (Eagleton-Pierce 2011, p. 5). As Doty and Dauphinee have reflected, however, there is a careful balance to be struck between the desire to accentuate the lived experiences of individual subjects of “conflict” and the somewhat unavoidable impulse of the author to elevate their own presence, thus presenting a fine line between “fieldwork and tourism between scholarship and voyeurism” (Dauphinee 2010, in Doty 2010, p. 1047). As Jenny Edkins also puts it: “[t]elling the stories of others as if they were somehow separate from us leads to. . . many ethical concerns. . . We want to give them voice, but we want it to be their voice and not ours. We want to collect stories, but we want them to be their stories, not ours.” (2013, p. 290).

Elizabeth Dauphinee’s The Politics of Exile (2013) – perhaps the most influential publication of this early narrative turn – is emblematic of this tension. A (semi-fictional) novel focusing on the Bosnian War and its aftermath explores essential themes of “personal and civilizational guilt, of displaced and fractured identity, of secrets and subterfuge, of love and alienation, of moral choice and the impossibility of ethics” (2013, [back matter]) and in doing so, “challenges us to recognise pure narrative as an accepted form of writing in international relations” (ibid.). It is, undoubtedly, an excellent and accomplished piece of work, but its very form highlights the potential perils/limits of (autobiographical) reflexivity. “Known” IR/conflict scholars – who enjoy unique access to publication, promotion, and the projection of voice [based, of course, off their hard work to attain that position] – get to speak on behalf of their subjects, often reducing the source content to traces and snippets gleaned from interviews, focus groups, and in the case of novel writing, the ethereal truths of others wrapped in a fiction that ineradicably belongs to the author (Fitzgerald 2015). This is as much a reflection of the dominant practices and limiting structures of academic writing as anything else (Fitzgerald 2014), yet it also calls to mind that despite its emancipatory potential, exercising reflexivity cannot ever be a panacea – or wholly resistant – to pervasive structures of power that dictate the positionality of academics as individuals, yes but also, inescapably, as subjects who must produce work in their own name to fulfil the basic conditions of employment and in many cases – to return to Doty and Dauphinee [pace Lacan] their very sense of being (on the Lacanian concept of “lack” with regard to the production of ethnography, see Atkinson 2014.) Recognizing these limits, and navigating them effectively, represent an ongoing challenge for the “reflexive” scholar who chooses to employ (auto)ethnography, novel writing, or indeed, any number of associated critical methodologies (see Salter and Mutlu 2013). In the shadow of this problematique, recent reflexive scholarship has shifted more intently toward foregrounding the voices of “ordinary citizens” on matters of “everyday security,” individuals who have been typically spoken for on such issues, rather than spoken to as the basis of creating expertise: hence, the “vernacular turn.”

The Vernacular

The shift to accentuating the voices of “ordinary citizens” as expert mediators on their own “lived” experiences of everyday (in)security has gained much momentum since the early 2010s—though as with narrative approaches, its genesis can also be identified in influential feminist works, such as Dorothy E. Smith’s The Everyday World as Problematic: A Feminist Sociology (1987). In 2013, Lee Jarvis and Michael Lister published an influential qualitative analysis and research agenda on “vernacular security,” which set out to “offer a space for lay understandings of security to enter academic debate” (2013, p. 162). Jarvis and Lister’s work employed wide-ranging focus groups to capture – and replicate in text – public attitudes toward security, citizenship, and anti-terrorism policy in the UK (ibid.), inductively producing “six images of security” that differed quite intently from state-centric concepts typical of orthodox security studies (see above). By accentuating the voices of “everyday citizens” and their encounters with (in)security – all the while making them visible in typically “closed” academic settings – the authors propose that the very vernacular of how security is talked about, and thus conceptualized, begins to shift, offering a meaningful corrective to “the creeping monopolisation of security by ‘experts’... [which] conceals the inherently political character of security” (ibid., p. 173).

Recent developments in this literature have tended to concern everyday cultures of (in)security with reference to traditionally “vulnerable” communities – such as refugees and children – and have quite often (much like in the case of the narrative turn) centered on the concept of exile and its concomitant of border politics. This is hardly surprising, given the 2015 apogee of Europe’s “migration crisis” and the degree to which this issue continues to dominate media and political discourses against a backdrop of near-constant electioneering. In their Border Narratives project, for example, Löffmann and Vaughan-Williams (2018) set out to interrogate widely held assumptions contained in elite political discourses on migration, which have projected a notion of collective fear on the part of EU citizens concerned with an “influx” of “irregular migrants” without, in fact, finessing the details – or veracity – of such fears through qualitative exposition. Developing a qualitative program of critical focus group research (CFGR) to “create a reflexive forum for investigating ‘how knowledge, ideas, story-telling, self-presentation and linguistic exchanges operate within a given cultural context’” (Barbour and Kitzinger 2009 p. 5 in ibid., p. 391), the authors accept (and embrace) that unlike quantitative surveys of public opinion, the CFGR approach cannot claim replicability or generalizability, nor is it scientifically representative, due to small sample sizes. What it can provide, however – in the spirit of the vernacular turn and reflexivity itself – is an inductive understanding of “how citizens use and understand the concepts of ‘border’ and ‘border security’ in the context of their daily lives [emphasis in original]” (ibid.). From their wide-ranging study, the authors conclude that contra the overarching impressions provided by prominent opinion polls such as the Standard Eurobarometer 84 (which implies that citizens are overwhelmingly hostile to migrants and refugees, and supportive of tough(er) border controls (ibid., p. 399)):

What emerges from the ‘Border Narratives’ project . . . is a rich and complex set of narratives that position the figure of the migrant in a highly nuanced way; as both a threat to political, economic, societal, and personal security, and as threatened by exposure to violence en route to Europe, unnecessarily restrictive policies upon entry to Europe, and exposure to racism, xenophobia, and forms of physical violence once in Europe [emphasis in original] (ibid., p. 400).

Working through the vernacular to elevate the voices of the non-elite as the basis of re-understanding security politics is to act reflexively on two levels: first, it performatively inverts the orthodoxy of top-down expertise on matters of security that has typically sustained the traditional intellectual economy of IR and security studies; second, it is to reflexively interrogate – as academics – our own status as “experts” on matters of security and conflict that affect so many other (typically silenced) actors in much more profound ways. Further developments in vernacular scholarship include shifts to not only provide voice(s) directly to “vulnerable” subjects themselves (such as refugees and asylum seekers) but to offer far more open spaces for articulation – such as dedicated platforms for self-uploaded content – than is typically provided in academic settings. (This approach is not without its ethical problems; however, an in-depth discussion of which is beyond the scope of this chapter. For further exposition on this issue, see Mackenzie et al. 2007; Kabranian-Melkonian 2015.) These projects include but are by no means limited to Interrogating the Terrorist/Refugee Narrative: Human Stories of Resistance (see Fitzgerald 2017); the UN Migration Agency’s I Am a Migrant (<https://iamamigrant.org/>); and the Immigrant Stories project, led by the University of Minnesota’s Immigration History Research Center (<https://cla.umn.edu/ihr/immigrant-stories>).

The Local

As with international relations and security studies, the early to mid-1990s provided conceptual space within peace studies – and the study of peacebuilding – for more critical analyses to come to the fore. Foundational works – such as Lederach (1995), Rupesinghe (1995), and Avruch (1998) – championed the notion of “peace from below” (see Leonardsson and Rudd 2015), which attempted to reposition local actors as “the primary architects, owners and long-term stakeholders” of peace (Rupesinghe 1995, p. 81), much in contrast to hegemonic notions of liberal peace, a familiar, top-down diktat centered on the almost exclusive capacity of (Western) states, and interstate agencies, to effectively impose and maintain peace in conflict and post-conflict zones. As MacGinty and Richmond point out, although this literature was beginning to make waves – and formed what some label a “first” local turn in peace studies (see Paffenholz 2015) – the local remained, nonetheless, predominantly conceived as “a near empty space, willingly subservient to Northern models and interests” (2013, p. 765). In the rich tradition of colonialist and orientalist epistemologies, “locals” – in typically storied (post-)conflict zones such as Timor-Leste, Kosovo, Palestine, and Afghanistan – were viewed as subjects whose progress could (perhaps only) be elevated by the transplantation of external expertise and its accompanying promise of emancipation. As McGinty and Richmond elaborate, ingrained assumptions of liberal peace deemed local populations in (post-)conflict zones as acutely susceptible to Western governmentality, due to a supposed “lack of capacity at the local level to combat structural power wielded by elites or by colonists, and. . .the fact that most local agency was in any case constitutive of and willingly complicit with colonialism” (ibid., p. 765).

It is no surprise, then, that as scholarship in peace studies and peacebuilding began to develop a second – and seemingly more affective – “local turn” from the early 2010s onward; it leaned heavily on post-colonial and poststructuralist perspectives (see Paffenholz 2015; Hirblinger and Simons 2015), developing reflexive threads of analysis that paralleled those of the “narrative” and “vernacular” turns discussed above. In the midst of this growing body of critical scholarship, however, orthodox analyses of “the local” – driven by a range of influential national and international actors – have continued to “depict what local actors and institutions are really like. . .bringing forward idealisations of how local government should be [emphasis added]” (Hirblinger and Simons 2015, p. 430; in Bräuchler and Naucke 2017, p. 424). This essentialization of “the local” – which preemptively determines emancipatory route(s) to success – is, in essence, contrary to the spirit of more reflexive approaches to peacebuilding, which would seek to communicate the cultural, everyday, and even administrative practices that are procedurally generative of “peace from below” in ways that suitably represent the messy, circular and, indeed, reflexive character(s) of “the local” itself. This dilemma is neatly summarized as follows:

Where the local turn’s critique of liberal peacebuilding declared the impossibility of relating to everyday realities in the old framework that gave precedence to top-down solutions, the local turn itself proposed a normative solution of accessing everyday authentic forms of being in the world from the bottom up and the local. In an attempt to use the concept of the everyday as an alternative to the top-down approach of the liberal peace, the framing of the everyday has come to be framed as the starting point in the struggle to uncover the hidden narrative and transcripts of peace. As a consequence of the normative, emancipatory drive of the local turn, it has been argued, local agency has come to be identified, delineated and then judged on the basis of pre-established normative ideas regarding the social order, as a direct reaction to what were perceived to be the ills of an ‘unbecoming’ liberal paradigm [emphasis added] (Randazzo 2016, p. 1362).

Randazzo’s intervention reflects (on) an essential, ongoing puzzle in contemporary peace studies and peacebuilding: what, now, for reflexive representations of “the local”? A variety of approaches have been put forward. Bräuchler and Naucke (2017), for example, have called for the careful (re-)application of anthropology, which, in their view, offers unique methodological and conceptual capacities to adequately represent – without claiming external ownership of – the culturally specific and highly contingent practices of peacebuilding:

“We would like to argue that the strength and core contribution of anthropological peace research lies in. . .a place-based approach that combines the methodological and conceptual dimension of the local. Methodologically and conceptually informed studies of ‘local’ conflicts and peace initiatives can highlight the creativity and resolution-finding ability of local actors that should be recognised, respected and supported through complementary peacebuilding – without reducing the local to yet another tool in the international peace industry and without ignoring the share of local actors in the conflicts and the problems, limitations or contradictions they face” (2017, p. 428).

Gearoid Millar (2018) proposes an ethnographic peace research (EPR) agenda that, while borrowing from the anthropological legacy of “thick description,” embellishes it with an attuned reflexive awareness on the part of the researcher to make available – and more visible – their hybrid methodologies, which may include semi-structured interviews, focus groups, and extensive qualitative field notes (ibid., p. 265) – Millar’s article is part of a special issue on “Decentering the study of international interventions” in Cooperation and Conflict (2018); for a useful introduction to this special issue and its core themes, see Schroeder 2018. Finally, Julian et al. (2019) explicitly leverage feminist-inspired epistemologies of inclusion to “ensur[e] direct involvement of local people in the collection and dissemination of experiential knowledge. . . provid[ing] a basis for extending the inclusion of local ‘voices’, experiences and life stories to conflict analysis” (ibid., p. 215). In this spirit, their Raising Silent Voices project in Myanmar reflexively speaks about “non-standard entry points to the field”; offers colloquial accounts of working with – and delegating data collection responsibilities to – Burmese research associates; and explores the power of “arts-based methods,” such as drawing workshops, to aesthetically represent peoples’ experiences and the continuous production of a fragile, eternally malleable, but appropriately local vision of peace. As the authors reflect:

“Our. . . research experience is that conversational and arts-based approaches such as (but by no means limited to) our drawing workshops, in conjunction with local research collaborations in which outsider researchers are prepared and willing to let go of the control over the data collection process, seem particularly well suited to create the trustful space needed to explore the experiential side of our knowing even in rather short-term encounters between researchers and researched.” (ibid)

Conclusion

Returning to the opening gambit of this chapter, there is no question that reflexivity is a slippery, “tricky” concept, something one inevitably encounters not only when one attempts to elucidate but also (as I hope to have shown in the examples above) when one attempts to put reflexivity into practice. And yet, this is precisely the point of reflexivity; it emits an eternal sense of possibility, of circularity and jouissance that, when embraced, can positively develop the study of conflict in ways typically foreclosed by more “orthodox” modes of inquiry. This is not to say that reflexive analyses are the “correct” approaches and should be advanced, necessarily, at the cost of more traditional studies. The two can – in fact do – coexist quite comfortably across a number of disciplines tasked with the study of conflict. In this respect, it is instructive to resist any temptation to become overly wedded to any “one” or “essential” conception of reflexivity, a necessity somewhat confounded by the structural requirements of an Encyclopedic entry, but an important reminder, nonetheless.

What we might say in conclusion is that reflexivity presents researchers across a number of cognate disciplines (such as international relations, security studies, and peace studies) with a means to “do” conflict studies in various ways that cannot but enhance our understanding of deeply complex and changeable dynamics of human interaction. Anthropology, ethnography, and storytelling – it is no mere coincidence that as reflexive analyses of security and conflict continue to drive forward, scholars find themselves turning back to some of the most fundamental, human-focused programs of social inquiry and reanimating them at/as the frontier of contemporary conflict studies. What is old appears new again (and vice versa); reflexivity is ever thus. This is precisely why it will always remain indispensable to our collective understandings of what it means to be secure, a performative reminder that the dynamics that sustain conflict and peace cannot be anything but precarious.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

References

- Ackerly, B. A., Stern, M., & True, J. (Eds.). (2006). Feminist methodologies for international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Amoureux, J. L. (2016). Promise unfulfilled. In J. L. Amoureux & B. J. Steele (Eds.), Reflexivity

- and international relations (pp. 23–43). Routledge: Abingdon.
- Amoureux, J. L., & Steele, B. J. (Eds.). (2016). Reflexivity and international relations. Routledge: Abingdon.
- Atkinson, P. (2014). The ethnographic imagination: Textual constructions of reality. London: Routledge.
- Avruch, K. (1998). Culture and conflict resolution. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Barbour, R., & Kitzinger, J. (Eds.). (2009). Developing focus group research: Politics, theory and practice. London/New Delhi: Sage.
- Blanchard, E. M. (2003). International relations and the development of feminist security theory. Signs, 28(4), 1289–1312.
- Bräuchler, B., & Naucke, P. (2017). Peacebuilding and conceptualisations of the local. Social Anthropology, 25(4), 422–436.
- Brigg, M., & Bleiker, R. (2010). Autoethnographic international relations: Exploring the self as a source of knowledge. Review of International Studies, 36(3), 779–798.
- Cox, R. W. (1981). Social forces, states and world orders: Beyond international relations theory. Millennium, 10(2), 126–155.
- Dauphinee, E. (2010). The ethics of autoethnography. Review of International Studies, 36(3), 799–818.
- Dauphinee, E. (2013). The politics of exile. London: Routledge.
- Doty, R. L. (2010). Autoethnography—making human connections. Review of International Studies, 36(4), 1047–1050.
- Doyle, M. W. (1983). Kant, liberal legacies, and foreign affairs, part 2. Philosophy & Public Affairs, 12, 323–353.
- Eagleton-Pierce, M. (2011). Advancing a reflexive international relations. Millennium, 39(3), 805–823.
- Edkins, J. (2013). Novel writing in international relations: Openings for a creative practice. Security Dialogue, 44(4), 281–297.
- Erickson, P., Klein, J. L., Daston, L., Lemov, R., Sturm, T., & Gordin, M. D. (2013). How reason almost lost its mind: The strange career of cold war rationality. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Finnemore, M., & Sikkink, K. (2001). Taking stock: The constructivist research program in international relations and comparative politics. Annual Review of Political Science, 4(2), 391–416.
- Fitzgerald, J. (2014). Between the lines: ‘Al Qaeda’, ‘Islamic Extremism’ and the authorship of critique. Dissertation held at Dublin City University. http://doras.dcu.ie/20238/1/James_Fitzgerald_PhD_Dissertation_Hard_Bound_Final.pdf
- Fitzgerald, J. (2015). Why me? An autoethnographic account of the bizarre logic of counterterrorism. Critical Studies on Terrorism, 8(1), 163–180.
- Fitzgerald, J. (2017). Confronting the terrorist/refugee narrative, Europe Now. <https://www.europenowjournal.org/2017/01/31/confronting-the-terroristrefugee-narrative/>
- Gallie, W. B. (1956). Art as an essentially contested concept. The Philosophical Quarterly, 6(23), 97–114.
- George, J., & Campbell, D. (1990). Patterns of dissent and the celebration of difference: Critical social theory and international relations. International Studies Quarterly, 34(3), 269–293.
- Grieco, J. M. (1988). Anarchy and the limits of cooperation: A realist critique of the newest liberal institutionalism. International Organization, 42(3), 485–507.
- Hamati-Attaya, I. (2013). Reflectivity, reflexivity, reflexivism: IR’s “reflexive turn” – And beyond. European Journal of International Relations, 19(4), 669–694.
- Harrison, L., & Callan, T. (2013). Key research concepts in politics and international relations. London: Sage.
- Hirblinger, A. T., & Simons, C. (2015). The good, the bad, and the powerful: Representations of the “local” in peacebuilding. Security Dialogue, 46(5), 422–439.
- Hirsh, E., Olson, G. A., & Harding, S. (1995). Starting from marginalized lives: A conversation with Sandra Harding. JAC, 15, 193–225.
- Howarth, D. (2013). Poststructuralism and after: Structure, subjectivity and power. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jackson, R. (2014). Confessions of a terrorist: A novel. London: Zed Books Ltd..
- Jackson, R., & Hall, G. (2016). Talking about terrorism: A study of vernacular discourse. Politics, 36(3), 292–307.
- Jarvis, L., & Lister, M. (2013). Vernacular securities and their study: A qualitative analysis and research agenda. International Relations, 27(2), 158–179.
- Julian, R., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Redhead, R. (2019). From expert to experiential knowledge: Exploring the inclusion of local experiences in understanding violence in conflict. Peacebuilding, 7(2), 210–225.
- Kabranian-Melkonian, S. (2015). Ethical concerns with refugee research. Journal of Human Behavior in the Social Environment, 25(7), 714–722.
- King, G., Keohane, R. O., & Verba, S. (1994). Designing social inquiry: Scientific inference in qualitative research. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Lapid, Y. (1989). The third debate: On the prospects of international theory in a post-positivist era. International Studies Quarterly, 33(3), 235–254.
- Lederach, J. P. (1995). Preparing for peace: Conflict transformation across cultures. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 825–839.
- Löfflmann, G., & Vaughan-Williams, N. (2018). Vernacular imaginaries of European border security among citizens: From walls to information management. European Journal of International Security, 3(3), 382–400.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–778.
- Mackenzie, C., McDowell, C., & Pittaway, E. (2007). Beyond “do no harm”: The challenge of constructing ethical relationships in refugee research. Journal of Refugee Studies, 20(2), 299–319.

- Millar, G. (2018). Decentring the intervention experts: Ethnographic peace research and policy engagement. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(2), 259–276.
- Neufeld, M. (1993). Interpretation and the “science” of international relations. Review of International Studies, 19(1), 39–61.
- Oxford English Dictionary*. (2019). <https://www.oed.com/>
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874.
- Randazzo, E. (2016). The paradoxes of the ‘everyday’: Scrutinising the local turn in peace building. Third World Quarterly, 37(8), 1351–1370.
- Reid, E. (2018). How the personal became political: The feminist movement of the 1970s. Australian Feminist Studies, 33(95), 9–30.
- Rupesinghe, K. (Ed.). (1995). Conflict transformation. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Salter, M. B., & Mutlu, C. E. (Eds.). (2013). Research methods in critical security studies: An introduction. Routledge: Abingdon.
- Schroeder, U. C. (2018). Introduction: Decentring the study of international interventions. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(2), 139–153.
- Smith, D. E. (1987). The everyday world as problematic: A feminist sociology. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Smith, S. (1996). Positivism and beyond. In S. Smith et al. (Eds.), International theory: Positivism and beyond (pp. 1–44). New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Smith, S., Booth, K., & Zalewski, M. (Eds.). (1996). International theory: Positivism and beyond. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Sylvester, C. (1994). Feminist theory and international relations in a postmodern era. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tickner, J. A. (2006). Feminism meets international relations: Some methodological issues. In B. A. Ackerly et al. (Eds.), Feminist methodologies for international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Vaughan-Williams, N., & Stevens, D. (2016). Vernacular theories of everyday (in) security: The disruptive potential of non-elite knowledge. Security Dialogue, 47(1), 40–58.
- Waever, O. (1996). The rise and fall of the inter-paradigm debate. In International theory: Positivism and beyond (pp. 149–185). New York: Cambridge University Press.

Reforms

- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

Refugee Voting

- ▶ Voting Systems

Refugees

- ▶ Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Regional Organizations

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts

Relationality

- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State
- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

Relationship-Building

- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Rent-a-Judges

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

R

Research Ethics

- ▶ Auto-photography

Resilience

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Resilience and Peace

Marije Luitjens
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Definition/Description

Over the last decades, resilience has become a fast-growing topic within various academic disciplines and policy debates. The academic path of resilience finds its origins in the 1970s and lies rooted in the studies of (ecological) complex adaptive systems. In the following decades, resilience obtained significant field within the social sciences, and has more recently also been studied in relation to peace studies and practices. Despite the increase in resilience research, there is not one agreed upon definition. The following five factors that are, however, most common in current conceptualizations are (1) (adaptive) capacity, (2) local agency, (3) collective action, (4) social capital, and (5) social cohesion.

Within peacebuilding efforts, the focus mostly lies on local agency, or what is often referred to as the “actor-centered” approach. It is hereby deemed important to increase the adaptive capacity of the local communities, for example, through social capital/cohesion building, or to instigate collective action. The increased focus on resilience within both development and peacebuilding efforts led to the rise of resilience-critique. The most common critique focuses on the shift of accountability within resilience-based projects. It is argued that due to the actor-centered approach that has been adopted, there is an increased change of embedded neoliberalism within the projects. There is furthermore the notion that the “responsibilization of victims” does more harm than good within resilience practices. Despite this, there is a vast number of authors that argues in favor of exploring the opportunities that resilience brings to the field of peacebuilding.

Synonyms

Actor-centered peacebuilding; Adaptive capacity; Complexity thinking; Risks; System thinking

Introduction

We live in an increasingly complex world, filled with risks and uncertainties. Risks it seems we can't prepare for, and the ongoing uncertainty of them taking place. While the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic in early 2020 clearly demonstrated a risk to global stability, uncertainties like these have been around for much longer and in different gradations. The perception of risks has, however, changed significantly during the last 50 years. During the Cold War, risks were mostly perceived as monolithic. At that time, a “Central Government” was in control over a relatively straightforward emergency contingency plan. The post-Cold War world has, however, been experienced as an increasingly complex world where the threats and risks have increased (Coaffee 2009, p. 263). This is, for example, visible in relation to climate change, which is unfolding rapidly and adds further to the existing risks of natural disasters (IPCC 2018). With as a result more frequent wildfires, longer periods of drought in some regions and an increase in the number, duration, and intensity of tropical storms (NASA 2019). The world population is moreover increasing rapidly, the United Nations (2019, p. 5) estimates the world population at 8.5 billion by 2030 and even over 10 billion in 2100. The Living Planet Report 2020 (WWF 2020, p. 74) argued that “Nature is essential for human existence and a good quality of life, providing and sustaining the air, fresh water and soils on which humanity depends.” Over the last decades, the crucial impact that climate change has on the increasing risks in this world has become clear. Both natural and man-made disasters as such leave the world in shock and deepen the existing feelings of uncertainty, complexity, and ambiguity towards the modern-day world (Juncos 2018; Corry 2014).

The notion of increasing complexity lies at the heart of the current-day resilience-thinking and replaced the previous emergency planning processes (de Coning 2016; Coaffee 2009). Resilience became relevant to understanding current-day threats and to increase the likelihood of managing risks (Chandler 2014). While until half a century ago resilience was not a big word in the public domain, it is an old word as it comes from the Latin re-silere: “to spring back” (Deveson 2003, p. 24). Overtime, resilience has become a fast-growing research topic and made its way into various academic disciplines. The concept appears prominent in policy discourse on topics such as climate change or food security and more recently also in relation to peace and security (e.g., Chandler 2015; de Coning 2016; Taşan-Kok and Eraydin 2013; de Weijer 2013; Chandler and Coaffee 2017; Koonings and Kruijt 2015). In relation to peacebuilding, resilience has received unprecedented attention, and as such has split the field in two: those in favor of exploring its potential both as an analytical framework and in practice, and those arguing against the use of it. This will be further discussed in the last part of this chapter. Before diving into this, the first part will highlight the origins of resilience and explain its path to the first appearance in social science. After this, the position of resilience within peacebuilding will be discussed. This will be done in twofold, first the presence of resilience within the academic debate will be analyzed, which is followed by the use of resilience in practice. In this latter part, the controversy that comes with applying resilience in practice is clearly shown, which will be further described in the last part of this entry.

Origins and Operationalization of Resilience

While resilience is used widely nowadays, the contemporary usage of resilience dates back almost five decades and was introduced by Crawford Stanley Holling in 1973. Holling (1973) wrote an influential essay, challenging the existing mathematical, or mathematical-ecological way of resilience-thinking, where resilience is understood as an abstract variable. Resilience is here the time (t) it takes a system to return to “equilibrium” after a disturbance, whereby equilibrium is understood as the equivalent to long-term persistence (Walker and Cooper 2011, p. 145). Holling (1973, p. 2) argued the focus on returning to equilibrium by stating that “an equilibrium centered view is essentially static and provides little insight into the transient behavior of systems that are not near equilibrium.” Instead, Holling (1973, p. 14) placed the focus on the sustainability of complex adaptive systems within ecology and defined the concept as the “persistence of systems and of their ability to absorb change and disturbance and still maintain the same relationships between populations or state variables.” Consequently, Holling paved the way for contemporary resilience-thinking to develop and broaden, while remaining rooted in studies of complex adaptive systems (Walker and Cooper 2011; Folke et al. 2010; Taşan-Kok and Eraydin 2013). Various other ecologists took the notion of resilience and developed separate understandings. Over the course of the last four decades, numerous definitions of resilience have been presented. Despite this, the definition presented by the ecologists Walker et al. (2004) is among the most often and most widely used definition, which argues that resilience is:

the capacity of a system to absorb disturbance and reorganize while undergoing change so as to still retain essentially the same function, structure, identity, and feedbacks (p. 4).

Over time, it became obvious to scholars that researching the resilience of ecological systems could not be done without focusing on the influence of individuals and social groups on ecological systems and vice versa (Adger 2000; Folke et al. 2010; Holling 1999). As a result, the social resilience-perspective first emerged at the beginning of the twenty-first century (de Weijer 2013). Socio-ecological resilience became an integrated way of understanding in what way people and nature depend on each other, it hence observes “people and nature as interdependent systems”

(Folke et al. 2010, p. 21). Resilience-thinking provides the opportunity to incorporate different components within a single system, components that would previously be studied separately. As Ami Carpenter (2014, p. 66) argues: “Simply put, the whole is greater than the sum of its parts.”

As a result of this change in understanding, two different conceptualizations of resilience became clear. Within ecological system resilience “bouncing back after a disaster” is the preferred definition of resilience. This means the focus is not placed on preventing risks, threats, or problems from happening, but on quickly recognizing problems and addressing these in an adequate manner with minimum disruption (Chandler and Coaffee 2017, pp. 4–5; de Weijer 2013). Over time, the focus of resilience definition shifted to the first part of the definition, the “capacity of a system” or “self-regulation,” therewith emphasizing the dynamic identity of resilience. Here, bouncing back or returning to equilibrium is not key, but rather growth and development, or “bouncing forward” (de Weijer 2013; Rodin 2015; Manyena et al. 2011). David Chandler and Jon Coaffee (2017, p. 5) refer to this distinction as the first- and second-generation resilience-thinking, or the shift from an “homeostatic approach” to an “auto-poietic approach.” Where the homeostatic approach refers to maintaining essentially the same function or a state of equilibrium, the auto-poietic approach sees resilience as transformation, aspiring to generate new and innovative ways of thinking and organizing. Growth and development are hence the aim, which can be reached through an increased awareness of interconnections and processes (Chandler and Coaffee 2017, p. 6). In other words, resilience is seen as a process of ongoing self-transformation, and the focus on transformative capacity is hence important (e.g., Juncos 2018; Chandler 2017; Carpenter 2014; Koonings and Kruijt 2015; Chandler and Coaffee 2017).

David Chandler and Jon Coaffee (2017, p. 6) discern a third range of resilience approaches, which applies an emphasis on the rethinking of contextual possibilities to be better prepared for future risks. This notion has led to a shift towards resilience-thinking, and consequently organizing and governing on the basis of resilience has become normalized (e.g., Taşan-Kok and Eraydin 2013; Davoudi 2012; Chandler 2014; Joseph 2013; Juncos and Joseph 2020). The use of resilience within governing approaches has, however, received wide critique, which will be discussed further below.

Operationalizing Resilience

As discussed above, there are various approaches for conceptualizing resilience, but all of these are rooted in the notion of complex adaptive systems. This implies that all resilience conceptualizations focus on systems that are first of all complex, meaning they consists of many working components that are all interrelated in some way. Secondly, these systems are all considered “adaptive”, which implies that they are subject to constant change; within ecosystems species evolve, and social systems change due to human behavior.

Because resilience has been applied to a wider field, it has become of high importance to define what Meerow and Newell (2016, p. 2) refer to as the “five Ws of resilience”: resilience for whom, what, when, where, and why. Despite certain similarities in resilience definitions, posing these five questions is of significant importance to the operationalization of resilience. Notwithstanding, assessing individual resilience to natural hazards differs in conceptualization from implementing community resilience to gang-violence. Despite these differences, a number of similar characteristics of social resilience come forward in the academic literature, which lead to the operationalization of the concept. These concepts are (1) (adaptive) capacity, (2) local agency, (3) collective action, (4) social capital, and (5) social cohesion and will be discussed here below.

Adaptive capacity is central to any conceptualization of a resilient system (e.g., Chandler 2012, 2017; Carpenter 2014; de Coning 2018; Taşan-Kok and Eraydin 2013; Juncos and Joseph 2020; Folke et al. 2010; Holling 1973). Over the last decade, conceptualizations of social resilience refer to adaptive capacity in the broadest sense; not just to return to equilibrium or “bounce back,” but to transform to a better condition (Harris et al. 2017; Menkhaus 2013). In other words: a form of learning is imbedded in order to “bounce back better” or to “bounce forward.” Within the notion of capacity, an emphasis has been placed on “human” capacity, which comes forward in various forms, among others as capacity to learn, or as the capacity to transform after a(n external) shock. The notion of social resilience as adaptive capacity is hence rooted in the debate on human agency (e.g., Juncos and Joseph 2020; Shah et al. 2020, p. 15), as it focuses on the agency that individuals and communities possess to enhance their capacities to “bounce back better.”

According to Berkes and Ross (2013, p. 6), a community’s resilience is “understood as the capacity of its social system to come together to work toward a communal objective.” To “come together and work” is deemed of high importance in order to increase the resilience of a community. A community should here be understood in the broadest sense; a community of diverse (not homogenous) people – who are connected through their space of living, or elsewhere. According to Adger (2003, p. 388), capacities to adapt “are bound up in their ability to act collectively.” Collective action is therefore deemed an essential feature of resilience (Chaskin 2008; Magis 2010; Taşan-Kok and Eraydin 2013). As Arana and Wittek (2016, p. 764) argue: “Collective action is a community resource crucial to ensure the resilience of communities.” While collective action is not always referred to as such, and terms like “capacity for self-organization” (de Coning 2016; Chandler 2015) or “collective agency” (Otsuki et al. 2018) are used, there is a common notion that people have to work together in order to become more resilient as a social group, like a community.

Collective action and social capital are strongly related, and the majority of the academics consider social capital to be a key feature of resilience (Uekusa 2017; Aldrich 2012; Aldrich and Meyer 2015; Tierney 2014). An important reason for this is that social capital networks in the community provide access to various crucial resources in disaster situations, as aid, financial resources, or emotional and psychological support (Elliott et al. 2010; Aldrich and Meyer 2015). Social capital should hence be understood as instrumental concept, something that – along the lines of the social engineering approach – can be constructed (Portes 1998), and as Bourdieu (1985, p. 249) asserts “the profits which accrue from membership in a group are the basis of the solidarity which makes them possible.” Bourdieu goes on to affirming the negative possible outcomes of social capital, as group exclusion, or restriction on individual freedoms. Putnam’s (1995) definition of social capital focuses, however, on the more positive consequence of social capital, claiming that when people within a community possess a lot of social capital, this indicates there are “norms and social trust that facilitates coordination and cooperation for mutual good” (p. 67). This notion strongly links to the understanding of social cohesion. Already in 1893, Durkheim referred to the understanding of social cohesion as a “glue” that holds the society together through mutual trust and reciprocity (Durkheim 1893). A study by Patel and Gleason (2018, pp. 165–167), into the relation between social cohesion and resilience, moreover revealed that higher levels of social cohesion indicate higher levels of community resilience.

In order to analyze, or build, resilience of a community, it is therefore important to incorporate these components, as these have previously been studied in isolation (Carpenter 2014, p. 66). It is important to note, however, that these working components might change per resilience context and are hence, like resilience itself, not fully static. While various research has proven that enhancing social cohesion or instigating collective action are important in building social resilience, in practice, it becomes clear that decision makers do not often incorporate these findings into resilience-programming. Before analyzing the translation from resilience to practice, it is, however, important to focus on the theoretical debate that resilience instigates in relation to peacebuilding.

Theoretical Notions of Resilience in Peacebuilding

In light of the increasing geopolitical uncertainty, resilience-thinking seems to offer new opportunities to the risk management of (international) conflicts (Chandler 2014; Juncos 2018; de Coning 2018; Juncos and Joseph 2020). There is a growing belief that it has become impossible to predict when the next crisis takes place or which countries, or areas, are at highest risk (Juncos 2018, p. 559). As Garschagen (2013, p. 31) argues, resilience has become the “management paradigm,” as it promotes an integrated approach to managing risks. In this understanding, societies form complex adaptive systems in which resilience is built. This begs for an integrated approach that can expose the “patterns of interconnections” and that aims to understand how different elements interact and form a system (Cilliers 1998; de Coning 2018). System thinking does, however, not always link to resilience: in a 2006 study by the Berghof Foundation, the authors argue in favor of the adoption of a “systemic conflict transformation,” in order to deal with the increasing complex and dynamic conflicts (Wils et al. 2006). Translating this systemic approach to practice, has the potential to transform the field of peacebuilding, as project-driven, one-off interventions no longer suffice to tackle the root causes of conflicts (Carpenter 2014, p. 66; Juncos and Joseph 2020, p. 259). In line with this, the European Union Global Strategy (EUGS 2016, p. 29) also reads that “we will pursue a multi-level approach to conflicts acting at the local, national, regional and global levels; a multi-lateral approach engaging all players present in a conflict and necessary for its resolution.” Prior to this understanding, however, the dominant liberal peace paradigm had to make way for peacebuilding to transform and adapt to more of these complex and dynamic conflict situations.

The Transformation of Peacebuilding

The adoption of the 1992 UN “Agenda for Peace” (Boutros-Ghali 1992) formalized the widespread notion that in order to achieve positive peace, states had to adopt and maintain a multiparty democracy, free-market economy, individual human rights, and rule of law (de Coning 2018, p. 302). Post-conflict societies were hence engineered through the export of “liberal frameworks of ‘good governance’, democratic elections, human rights, the rule of law and market relations” (Chandler 2017, p. 22). Over time, however, with peacebuilding failures as Rwanda or Bosnia-Herzegovina, it had become clear that this liberal peace paradigm, on which the majority of the interventions were based, proved to be incapable of dealing with the complexities of present-day conflicts. As a result, peacebuilding finds itself on unprecedented territories. There is a clear wish to include voices from the ground, as there is a wide recognition of the inability to impose external top-down programs or institutions. Consequently, there is a shift towards working with existing strengths and capabilities, to focus on creating a form of peace that is accepted by the local society and is sustainable (e.g., UN 2015; Chandler 2017; Richmond 2015; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). As a result, various new approaches to peacebuilding appeared, of which the most prominent ones will be presented here.

System thinking lays at the basis of various recent or emerging approaches in peacebuilding, such as – but not limited to – sustaining peace (UN 2015; UN and WB 2018), adaptive peace (de Coning 2018), notions of everyday peace (Mac Ginty 2014; Firchow 2018), or the victim-centered approach (Brewer et al. 2019). First of all, Cedric de Coning (2018) introduced the concept of adaptive peacebuilding. This approach is based on complexity theory, which offers insights about complex social systems and its social processes relevant to peacebuilding activities. Adaptive peacebuilding aims to help societies develop resilience, to cope with and adapt to various forms of change as it “suggests using a particular form of structured engagement that helps to generate institutional learning and stimulates and facilitates adaptation” (de Coning 2018, p. 306). It is hereby important that the local communities are involved in all aspects of the peacebuilding process as peace has to emerge from within (de Coning 2018, p. 307). In other words, external wisdom will not offer aid if this is not internalized.

Another approach to peacebuilding is the focus on constructing “everyday peace,” as conceptualized by Roger Mac Ginty in 2014. Everyday peace refers to the “routinized practices used by individuals and collectives as they navigate their way through life in a deeply divided society” (Mac Ginty 2014, p. 549). It focuses among others on local coping mechanisms, as avoidance of ethnically tensed situations. Everyday citizens are therefore crucial in designing a program that can construct a lasting, sustainable peace, instead of including a through an INGO artificially constructed civil society which is often distanced from the needs on the ground (Firchow 2018, p. 35). Following this line of thought, a global project to conceptualize everyday peace has been realized through the creation of Everyday Peace Indicators (EPI) – where bottom-up research is done to understand the local understandings of peace (Mac Ginty and Firchow 2016; Firchow and Mac Ginty 2017). Through this research, it has become clear that peace and peacebuilding mean different things to different people, and that, comparable to “adaptive peacebuilding,” it is crucial to understand these differences. Similar, though from a different perspective, is the victim-centered approach proposed by Brewer et al. (2019). After conducting extensive research, the authors argue that victims should be seen as central to any conflict transformation attempts (Brewer et al. 2019, p. 9). While victims are often the center of any peace discourse, they hardly ever get the chance to speak for themselves, which places victims in a dangerous ambiguous position. In line with the EPI projects, a victim-centered approach claims it is of great importance to focus on the reconstruction of everyday life, which Brewer et al. (2019, p. 15) refer to as “everyday life is the realm in which ordinary, taken-for-granted, habitual social life is performed, experienced and understood as ordinary, taken-for-granted and habitual.” After the “brutalization” of everyday life in the form of conflict, it is only possible to restore everyday life through the inclusion of victims.

While these different visions do not place the focus on resilience per se, in all these approaches, resilience-thinking is central. David Chandler (2017, pp. 165–191) describes this as the “rise of resilience” in intervention approaches. In all these different approaches, peace practices aim to incorporate local voices into the process, to build forth on existing local understandings of peace, and on local strengths and capacities. Resilience is central here, as it offers new perspectives, because it emphasizes the importance of existing capacities, capabilities, and practices to strengthen a society from within (Juncos 2018, p. 562; Chandler 2015, p. 13; Juncos and Joseph 2020).

Resilience and Peacebuilding, Definitions?

With the growth of literature on resilience-thinking within peacebuilding studies and practices, different definitions appeared as well. David Chandler, for example, defined resilience broadly as the “capacity to positively or successfully adapt to external problems or threats” (Chandler 2012, 2017) and later added that the key point of resilience within peacebuilding practices is that the focus lays on “working with and upon the capacities, capabilities, processes, and practices already ‘to hand’ rather than the external provision of policies or program” (Chandler 2015, p. 28). This indicates that a community never becomes resilient when the actors are viewed as passive, without agency; change can only happen when they are conceived as having agency and being capable of self-transformation. While David Chandler does not refer directly to peace, or violence in his definition, Koonings and Kruijt (2015, p. 2) do: “resilience means that communities, networks, grassroots organizations, and public and non-governmental support structures mobilize to create alternative, non-violent spaces and practices in cities.”

Ami Carpenter (2014, p. 66) on the other hand argues that “community resilience to sectarian violence uses the lens of systems’ resilience – the ability of social systems to cope, adapt, and reorganize in response to dramatic challenges.” Following this definition, she presents an analytical framework of resilience (Carpenter 2014, p. 76), which is an interesting operationalization of community resilience to violence, or of what a community that is resilient to violent would look like. In her framework, she outlined a number of characteristics that allowed Iraqi communities to be resilient to sectarian violence: economic development, information and communication resources (IRC), social capital, and community competence. She distinguishes between resilience resources as regime characteristics, and community competence as resilience management. Community competence in this sense means adaptation (the actual response to stressors) and is the product of the resilience resources. The community competence is hence depended on the regime resources.

While there are hence multiple ideas of what resilient societies looks like, a clear conceptualization of resilience – and most importantly, the effect on the ground – remains mostly unidentified.

Resilience in Practice

Despite the absence of a unified translation of resilience into practice, over the last decades, various attempts have been made. In the majority of the programming efforts that focus on building resilience, the reduction of risk or hazards, or risk-mitigation is central (e.g., Juncos 2018; de Weijer 2013; Mitchell and Harris 2012; Paton and Johnston 2017). Before explaining resilience practices in peacebuilding, it is therefore important to understand the relation between disaster risk reduction (DRR) and the rise of resilience. Within developmental work, the notion that risk management is crucial has been around for longer, which is shown in the establishment of the UN Office for Disaster Risk Reduction (UNDRR) in December 1999, following the adoption of the International Strategy for Disaster Reduction (DRR) by the UN General Assembly. The mandate of the UNDRR is to coordinate UN disaster risk reduction activities, in order to ensure synergy between both UN activities and regional or local activities (A/RES/56/195 2002). Interestingly enough, resilience was not linked to DRR practices until much later, but currently “becoming resilient” is part of the UNISDR’s core vision (UNDRR 2020).

While the study into and practice of DRR was not initially linked to resilience, there is currently a general understanding that by increasing the resilience and reducing vulnerabilities, the “risks of disasters” will automatically also be reduced (e.g., Amaratunga et al. 2020; Tierney 2014; Alexander 2013; Uekusa 2017). The resilience discourse shed new light on the research of disaster reduction, resulting in a more balanced research focus between disaster response, mitigation, and prevention (Uekusa 2017, p. 3). The 2015 Sendai Framework for Disaster Risk Reduction 2015–2030 replaced the Hyogo Framework for Action 2005–2015, which mentioned resilience in relation to DRR for the first time (UNDRR 2015). The Sendai Framework emphasized resilience and applied a broader focus of resilience, not focusing solely on natural hazards but including man-made hazards. As a result, the main objective includes the aim to “strengthen resilience” (UNDRR 2015).

While man-made hazards are referred to in the Sendai Framework, these imply industrial or technological hazards, and no threats of violence or conflict. In the final text, no references to conflict or violence sustained, as this was deemed “too political” (Walch 2015; Stein and Walch 2017, p. 3). The Sendai Framework does highlight issues that are parallel to the UN report “the Challenge of Sustaining Peace,” which was published in the same year (UN 2015). On top of that, the Framework references three main sets of factors: socioeconomic factors, politico-institutional factors, and environmental factors (UNDRR 2015). And, as Stein and Walch (2017, p. 7) argue, these factors are “parallel to those that would need to be addressed in a prevention or sustaining peace agenda.” It is understood that tackling these specific factors will reduce the risks of conflict and violence. There is thus a renewed focus on prevention articulated by the UN, among others through the Sendai Framework for Action, the Sustaining Peace Agenda and in the Sustainable Development Goals (UNDRR 2015; UN 2015; UNSDG 2019).

Following this line of arguing, conflict and violence are perceived as a risk to creating resilient communities, or to reduce or threaten the existing resilience to disasters. It is moreover apparent that resilience and DRR are often used interchangeable in the policy discourse, and while the aim is to follow an integrated approach to preventing risks – including conflict – in reality, the focus lies mainly on reducing the risks of, or building resilience to, natural hazards (e.g., Peters 2017; Walch 2010; Koliou et al. 2018; Zhou et al. 2009). It is interesting to observe that while this discussion at first sight appears similar to the resilience discussions in peacebuilding paradigms, there is a significant difference: DRR or DRR frameworks are not mentioned in the peace and resilience discourse. Resilience in relation to peace is moreover to a great extent absent in the resilience frameworks and roadmaps presented by the main protagonists of international development (see, for example: the TANGO resilience framework; Wayfinder; USAID framework; CoBRA). Another interesting note: the over 400-pages Routledge Handbook of International Resilience edited by Chandler and Coaffee (2017) does not discuss resilience in direct relation to the creation of peace, nor in the practice of sustaining peace. Instead, conflict is often not understood as something that can be solved through resilience building but as something that undermines existing resilience. In other words: conflict stressors, or the risk of conflict, should be eliminated through resilience building, in order to keep resilience “high” (Carnwath 2017; Peters 2017).

Within peacebuilding practices, however, the resilience vision is more in line with the existing peacebuilding literature on, for example, sustainable peace. A study presented by USIP argues that “strengthening a society’s capacity to overcome violent shock and communal stressors could play a key role in preventing conflict and achieving a more sustainable postconflict recovery” (van Metre and Calder 2015, p. 5). Along these same lines, Interpeace introduced “resilience for peace” in 2016, therewith going against earlier notions of “resilience in relation to conflict.” By doing so, they placed a positive focus on the existing capacities for peace, the capacities from “ordinary” people to contribute to durable peace. To offer analytical insights into the functioning of resilience for peace, Interpeace launched the “Framework for Assessing Resilience” (FAR) program between 2014 and 2016, which was designed as an inclusive and participatory process, with a strong emphasis on local perspectives, ownership, and leadership. According to Interpeace, the Resilience for Peace Framework “can be approached both as a lens – or a way of seeing, analysing and understanding peace and conflict in any society – and as a vehicle which serves as an operational guide in programming” (Interpeace 2016, p. 7). The framework is currently one of the few, if not the only, framework that observes peace and conflict through resilience lens in practice. In contrary to the frameworks presented earlier, this framework specifically aims at understanding how resilience interacts with durable peace. It does not offer a scale or measurements for ranking countries’ resilience but should be understood as a guiding framework, and it “offers a method for the systematic and replicable analysis of resilience using participatory mixed methods research approaches” (Interpeace 2016, p. 14). Similar to other conceptualizations of resilience, it emphasizes concepts as absorption, adaptation, and transformation capacities on different levels: from individual to society. It moreover makes a difference between positive and negative manifestations of resilience. Negative manifestations of resilience, for example, a resilient dictatorship or a violent youth gangs with high levels of resilience (Davis 2012, p. 67), may “foster conflict and resilience to conflict may in turn be undermined” (Interpeace 2016, p. 17).

Another interesting project, which ran throughout 2018, is the Resilient Peace network. The network brings together leading experts on resilience and peace, with the aim to achieve and exceed the aims of Sustainable Development Goals (SDG) 16 in West Africa. The SDG 16 implies to “Promote peaceful and inclusive societies for sustainable development, provide access to justice for all and build effective, accountable and inclusive institutions at all levels” (UNSDG 2019). This is done through a series of three workshops. While not directly focusing on the operationalization or definition of “resilient peace,” it “engaged with the challenges of building peace in West African states in the context of the withdrawal of Western actors and the promotion of resilience approaches in peacebuilding” (Resilient peace 2018). Unfortunately, a conceptualized understanding of resilient peace has not been presented. The project is closed, the website no longer updated, consequently only the anticipated outputs are presented. The article “Resilience in peacebuilding: Contesting uncertainty, ambiguity, and complexity,” authored by Ana Juncos (2018) and used throughout this chapter, seems to be the only journal output so far.

While the literature on resilience and peace is growing quickly and it continues to play an enormous role in various conflict and peace programming, there is hence no agreement on how to define or conceptualize resilience in relation to peace. As Ken Menkhaus (2013) states in his speech at the Geneva Peacebuilding Platform:

This [defining resilience] is simply not possible. Moreover, it is not clear that it is even a problem to be solved. Instead, it may be an opportunity. That is to say, the different definitions and approaches to resilience in different disciplines are loaded with opportunities to borrow and adapt, in ways that can enrich our use of the term when applied to peacebuilding work.

While Menkhaus argues in favor of “adapting” resilience to peacebuilding work, there is currently no clear understanding of how to translate resilience practices to peace practices. And, at the same time, there is an increasing amount of critique on the “use of resilience” within peacebuilding, which will be explained in the following section.

The Resilience Controversy

While most scholars agree there is a necessity to remove the implementation of the external blueprint by the intervener, resilience is not by everyone accepted as the solution. David Chandler (2015, p. 48), for example, argues: “Rather than enlarging our understanding of problems and their solutions, the removal of the ‘big picture’, universalist meta-narratives, and critical sociological understandings could be seen as constructing a new and much more problematic paradigm.” This critique is crucial and also applies to other new peace paradigms, whereby the focus on the “local” has taken over the larger picture. Resilience on the other hand offers the capacity to, using the words of Ami Carpenter (2014, p. 66), focus on “the sum of its parts.” It hence creates the possibility to incorporate a wider view of the system, which implies that while building resilience on the very local level is important, creating a more resilient system can only be done when other social levels are included as well. This links to the notion of trans-scalar peace (Millar 2019) – where the agency of the local should not be over-estimated, in other words: the power dynamics within the interactions of the local, regional, national, or global are crucial to creating peace. Creating peace through the resilience lens allows to analyze different fractions, levels, and understandings of a peace process at once, and to assure that no external conceptualization of peace gets lost in the wider peace process.

Another crucial critique that is shared widely is that the accountability of the peace process shifts by building forth on existing local capacities and capabilities (e.g., Juncos and Joseph 2020; Chandler and Reid 2016; Harris et al. 2017; Vilcan 2017; Joseph 2013, 2018; Koonings and Kruijt 2015; Bargués-Pedreny and Martin de Almagro 2020). By adopting an actor-centered approach, the focus has increasingly been placed on local actors which brought two (largely intertwined) lines of critiques to light: the use of resilience projects as a disguise for neoliberal practices and the “responsibilization” of victims. Regarding the latter, as a result of the actor-centered approach, the focus is often placed on the “capacity of affected communities to recover with little or no external assistance” (Manyena 2006, p. 433). The responsibility of creating “resilience” is thus placed more and more upon the victims – where (neoliberal) elites and authorities encourage victims to take ownership of the risks instead (Evans and Reid 2014; Lentzos and Rose 2009; Uekusa 2017). Vilcan (2017, p. 2) refers to this as the ongoing “responsibilization” of victims. An interesting example is put forward by the UK’s Cabinet’s Office, as the UK Strategic National Framework on Community Resilience read that the Government commits to “reduce the barriers which prevent people from being able to help themselves and to become more resilient to shocks” (Cabinet Office 2011, p. 3). Here it becomes clear that responsibility of the government to assist and support their citizens while facing adversities is shifting to the locals themselves.

Here the second part of the critique comes forward, whereby the use of the term resilience within international projects or within government practices is understood as a disguise of the neoliberal agenda (e.g., Harris et al. 2017; Koonings and Kruijt 2015; Joseph 2013, 2018; Kastner 2020; Vilcan 2017). Neoliberalism here extends the notion of the free market and liberal democracy and focuses on the principle of competition, whereby the idea is normalized that individuals are ultimately responsible for managing their own risks and adversities (Mavelli 2019, p. 225; Joseph 2013). In doing so, there is an added danger that using resilience as a governing strategy tends to ignore social vulnerability or obscures preexisting social injustices (Uekusa 2017; Chandler and Reid 2016; Grove 2013). This pattern is, however, also visible within international interventions. Jonathan Joseph (2013, p. 51) even goes so far as to argue that the “resilience discourse of the UNDP, World Bank and others is a tool in a bigger game that applies governmentality to states in order to get them to reform their institutions in the interests of global capital.” A recent study by Bargués-Pedreny and Martin de Almagro (2020) also indicates a similar pattern within a European Union and United Nations sponsored project on gender equality in Liberia. While the project is executed by local actors, Bargués-Pedreny and Martin de Almagro (2020, p. 17) argue it builds forth on the assumption that “there are harmful values and social practices that Liberians cannot change alone, without external support.” Notwithstanding, within resilience interventions that fall into neoliberalism, more long-term systematic approaches to dealing with structural injustice or the root causes of conflict are often left aside (Uekusa 2017; Koonings and Kruijt 2015; Juncos and Joseph 2020; Bargués-Pedreny and Martin de Almagro 2020).

Despite the controversy over the applicability of resilience into practice, there appears to be general agreement that we should not “throw out the baby with the bathwater.” In other words, while it might be necessary to restructure current resilience practices, it is crucial to not deny the potential positive contributions that resilience-thinking offers to peacebuilding, both on a theoretical level and in practice (e.g., Grove 2018; Kastner 2020; Koonings and Kruijt 2015; Juncos and Joseph 2020; Menkhaus 2013; de Coning 2018). The most commonly shared advantages are summed up by Ana Juncos and Jonathan Joseph, who argue that resilience-thinking offers: “(1) a focus on complexity; (2) a system approach; (3) a shift toward local capacities; and (4) an emphasis on human agency” (2019, p. 2). This is in line with the operationalization of resilience as explained above. Moreover, in contrary to other approaches present in the field of peacebuilding, this manner of resilience-thinking offers the potential to incorporate these four features into one approach, instead of merely focusing on one.

Conclusion

The notion of increasing complexity lies at the heart of the current-day resilience-thinking and replaces the previous emergency planning processes (de Coning 2016; Coaffee 2009). Resilience became seen as relevant to understanding current-day threats and to increase the likelihood of managing risks (Chandler 2014). While resilience stems from an old Latin word, its current use is rooted in the study of complex adaptive systems. More specifically, the contemporary usage of resilience dates back almost five decades and was introduced by Crawford Stanley Holling in 1973. Over time, resilience has also made its way to the social sciences, and while various conceptualizations of social resilience exist, the following five factors are most common: (1) (adaptive) capacity, (2) local agency, (3) collective action, (4) social capital, and (5) social cohesion.

Notwithstanding, resilience has become a fast-growing research topic within various academic disciplines, and more recently, the concept appears prominent in policy discourse, also in relation to peace and conflict. Over the last two decades, peacebuilding has seen significant transformations, whereby the focus has shifted from liberal, top-down interventions to the inclusion of local voices, in a variety of manners. The rise of resilience fit this perfectly, and as a result, resilience has also gained significant terrain within peace studies and practices. At the same time, the critique towards the use of resilience within peace efforts is also growing. The most common critique focuses on the shift of accountability within resilience-based projects. It is argued that due to the adopting of an actor-centered (or bottom-up) approach, there is an increasing danger for embedded neoliberalism within the projects. On top of that, there is the notion that the “responsibilization of victims” does more harm than good within resilience practices. Despite this, there is a vast number of authors that argues in favor of exploring the opportunities that resilience brings to the field of peacebuilding.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality

References

- A/RES/56/195. (2002). United Nations General Assembly: international strategy for disaster reduction. <https://documents-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N01/492/61/PDF/N0149261.pdf?OpenElement>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Adger, N. (2000). Social and ecological resilience: Are they related? Progress in Human Geography, 24(3), 347–364.
- Adger, N. (2003). Social capital, collective action, and adaptation to climate change. Economic Geography, 79(4), 387–404.
- Aldrich, D. (2012). Building resilience – Social capital in post-disaster recovery. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.
- Aldrich, D., & Meyer, M. (2015). Social capital and community resilience. American Behavioral Scientist, 59(2), 254–269.
- Alexander, D. (2013). Resilience and disaster risk reduction: An etymological journey. Natural Hazards and Earth Systems Sciences, 13, 2707–2716.
- Amaratunga, D., Malalgoda, C., Haigh, R. P., & de Silva, A. (2020). How do we organise for disaster risk reduction and resilience? A Study on disaster reduction and management governance profile of Sri Lanka. University of Huddersfield UK. <https://huddersfield.app.box.com/s/zwtx3jrn78gmobm62zcxgob8o875qvwa>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Arana, M. M., & Wittek, R. (2016). Community resilience: Sustained cooperation and space usage in collective housing. Building Research & Information, 44(3), 764–774.
- Bargués-Pedreny, P., & Martin de Almagro, M. (2020). Prevention from afar: Gendering resilience and sustaining hope in post-UNMIL Liberia. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(3), 327–348.
- Berkes, F., & Ross, H. (2013). Community resilience: Toward an integrated approach. Society & Natural Resources, 26(1), 5–20.
- Bourdieu, P. (1985). The forms of capital. In J. G. Richardson (Ed.), Handbook of theory and research for the sociology of education (pp. 241–258). New York: Greenwood.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping. New York: United Nations.
- Brewer, J., Hayes, B., Dudgeon, K., Teeny, F., Mueller-Hirth, N., & Lal Wijesinghe, S. (2019). The sociology of everyday life peacebuilding. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cabinet Office. (2011). Strategic national framework on community resilience. <https://www2.oxfordshire.gov.uk/cms/sites/default/files/folders/documents/fireandpublicsafety/emergency/StrategicNationalFramework.pdf>. Accessed 23 Dec 2020.
- Camwath, A. (2017). Conflict often breeds disaster. So why is it neglected in disaster risk reduction? Concern Worldwide. <https://reliefweb.int/report/world/conflict-often-breeds-disaster-so-why-it-neglected-disaster-risk-reduction>. Accessed 23 Dec 2020.
- Carpenter, A. (2014). Community resilience to sectarian violence in Baghdad. New York: Springer.
- Chandler, D. (2012). Resilience and human security: The post-interventionist paradigm. Security Dialogue, 43(3), 213–229.
- Chandler, D. (2014). Beyond neoliberalism: Resilience, the new art of governing complexity. Resilience, 2(1), 47–63.
- Chandler, D. (2015). Rethinking the conflict-poverty nexus: From securitising intervention to resilience. Stability: International Journal of Security & Development, 4(13), 1–14.
- Chandler, D. (2017). Peacebuilding the twenty years' crisis, 1997–2017. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Chandler, D., & Coaffee, J. (2017). The Routledge handbook of international resilience. New York: Routledge.
- Chandler, D., & Reid, J. (2016). The neoliberal subject: Resilience, adaptation and vulnerability. London: Rowman & Littlefield International. Ltd..
- Chaskin, R. (2008). Resilience, community, and resilient communities: Conditioning contexts and collective action. Child Care Practices, 14, 65–74.
- Cilliers, P. (1998). Complexity and postmodernism: Understanding complex systems. London: Routledge.

- Coaffee, J. (2009). Terrorism, risk and the global city towards urban resilience. Farnham: Ashgate Publishing limited.
- Corry, O. (2014). From defense to resilience: Environmental security beyond neo-liberalism. International Political Sociology, 8(3), 256–274.
- Davis, D. (2012). Urban resilience in situations of chronic violence. USAID & MIT. <https://cis.mit.edu/sites/default/files/documents/urbanresiliencereport2012.pdf>. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- Davoudi, S. (2012). Resilience, a bridging concept or a dead end? Planning Theory and Practice, 3(2), 299–307.
- de Coning, C. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience, 4(3), 166–181.
- de Coning, C. (2018). Adaptive peacebuilding. International Affairs, 94(2), 301–317.
- de Weijer, F. (2013). Resilience: A Trojan horse for a new way of thinking? ECDPM Discussion Paper 139. <https://ecdpm.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/DP-139-Resilience-Trojan-Horse-New-Way-of-Thinking-2013.pdf>. Accessed 23 Dec 2020.
- Deveson, A. (2003). Resilience. Crows Nest: Allen & Unwin.
- Durkheim, E. (1893). The division of labor and society. New York: The Free Press.
- Elliott, J., Haney, T., & Sams-Abiodun, P. (2010). Limits to social capital: Comparing network assistance in two New Orleans neighbors devastated by Hurricane Katrina. Sociological Quarterly, 51, 624–648.
- EUGS. (2016). Shared vision, common action: A stronger Europe. A global strategy for the European Union's foreign and security policy. European union global strategy. https://eeas.europa.eu/archives/docs/top_stories/pdf/eugs_review_web.pdf. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- Evans, B., & Reid, J. (2014). Resilient life: The art of living dangerously. Cambridge: Polity.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Firchow, P., & Mac Ginty, R. (2017). Measuring Peace: Comparability, commensurability and complementarity using bottom up indicators. International Studies Review, 19, 6–27.
- Folke, C., Carpenter, S., Walker, B., Scheffer, M., Chapin, T., & Rockstrom, J. (2010). Resilience thinking: Integrating resilience, adaptability and transformability. Ecology and Society, 15(4), 20.
- Garschagen, M. (2013). Resilience and organizational institutionalism from a cross-cultural perspective: An exploration based on urban climate change adaptation in Vietnam. Natural Hazards, 67, 25–46.
- Grove, K. (2013). Hidden transcripts of resilience: Power and politics in Jamaican disaster management. Resilience, 1, 193–209.
- Grove, K. (2018). Resilience. London: Routledge.
- Harris, L., Chu, E., & Ziervogel, G. (2017). Negotiated resilience. Resilience: International Policies, Practices and Discourses, 6(3), 196–214.
- Holling, C. (1973). Resilience and stability of ecological systems. Annual Review of Ecology and Systematics, 4, 1–23.
- Holling, C. (1999). Introduction to the special feature: Just complex enough for understanding; just simple enough for communication. Conservation Ecology, 3(2), 1.
- Interpeace. (2016). Assessing resilience for peace. <http://www.interpeace.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/06/2016-FAR-Guidance-note-Assessing-Resilience-for-Peace-v7.pdf>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- IPCC. (2018). Global warming of 1.5°C – Summary for policy makers. Intergovernmental panel on climate change. https://report.ipcc.ch/sr15/pdf/sr15_spm_final.pdf. Accessed 23 Dec 2020.
- Joseph, J. (2013). Resilience as embedded neoliberalism: A governmentality approach. Resilience, 1(1), 38–52.
- Joseph, J. (2018). Varieties of resilience: Studies in governmentality. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Juncos, A. (2018). Resilience in peacebuilding: Contesting uncertainty, ambiguity, and complexity. Contemporary Security Policy, 39(4), 559–574.
- Juncos, A., & Joseph, J. (2020). Resilient peace: Exploring the theory and practice of resilience in peacebuilding interventions. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(3), 289–302.
- Kastner, P. (2020). A resilience approach to transitional justice? Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(3), 368–388.
- Koliou, M., van de Lindt, J., McAllister, T., Ellingwood, B., Dillard, M., & Cutler, H. (2018). State of the research in community resilience: Progress and challenges. Sustainable and Resilient Infrastructure, 5(3), 131–151.
- Koonings, K., & Kruijt, D. (2015). Violence and resilience in Latin American cities. London: Zed Books.
- Lentzos, F., & Rose, N. (2009). Governing insecurity: Contingency planning, protection, resilience. Economy and Society, 38, 230–254.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Firchow, P. (2016). Top-down and bottom-up narratives of peace and conflict. Politics, 1(16), 1–16.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Magis, K. (2010). Community resilience: An indicator of social sustainability. Society and Natural Resources, 23(5), 401–416.
- Manyena, S. B. (2006). The concept of resilience revisited. Disasters, 30(4), 433–450.
- Manyena, S. B., O'Brien, G., O'Keefe, P., & Rose, J. (2011). Disaster resilience: A bounce back or bounce forward ability? Local Environment, 16, 417–424.

- Mavelli, L. (2019). Resilience beyond neoliberalism? Mystique of complexity, financial crises, and the reproduction of neoliberal life. Resilience, 7(3), 224–239.
- Meerow, S., & Newell, J. P. (2016). Urban resilience for whom, what, when, where, and why? Urban Geography, 40(3), 309–329.
- Menkhaus, K. (2013). Making sense of resilience in peacebuilding contexts: Approaches, applications, implications. Geneva Peacebuilding Platform. https://www.gpplatform.ch/sites/default/files/PP%2006%20-%20Resilience%20to%20Transformation%20-%20Jan.%202013_3.pdf. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Millar, G. (2019). Toward a trans-scalar peace system: Challenging complex global conflict systems. Peacebuilding, 8, 261–278.
- Mitchell, T., & Harris, K. (2012). Resilience: A risk management approach. Overseas Development Institute, background note, 1–7.
- NASA. (2019). The effect of climate change. <https://climate.nasa.gov/effects/>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Otsuki, K., Jasaw, G., & Lolig, V. (2018). Linking individual and collective agency for enhancing community resilience in Northern Ghana. Society & Natural Resources, 31(2), 151–165.
- Patel, R., & Gleason, K. (2018). The association between social cohesion and community resilience in two urban slums of Port au Prince, Haiti. International Journal of Disaster Risk Reduction, 27, 161–167.
- Paton, D., & Johnston, D. (2017). Disaster resilience: An integrated approach (2nd ed.). Springfield: Charles C Thomas Publisher Ltd..
- Peters, K. (2017). The next frontier for disaster risk reduction: Tackling disasters in fragile and conflict-affected contexts. ODI report. <https://www.odi.org/sites/odi.org.uk/files/resource-documents/11808.pdf>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Portes, A. (1998). Social Capital: Its origins and applications in modern sociology. Annual Review Sociology, 24, 1–24.
- Putnam, R. (1995). Bowling alone. Journal of Democracy, 6(1), 65–78.
- Resilient Peace. (2018). Resilient peace project closed. <https://resilientpeacenet.wordpress.com>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Richmond, O. (2015). After liberal peace: The changing concept of peace-building (RSIS commentary no. 272). Singapore: S. Rajaratnam School of International Studies. <https://www.rsis.edu.sg/wp-content/uploads/2015/12/CO15272.pdf>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Rodin, J. (2015). The resilience dividend. London: Profile Books.
- Shah, R., Paulson, J., & Couch, D. (2020). The rise of resilience in education in emergencies. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(3), 303–326.
- Stein, S., & Walch, C. (2017). The Sendai framework for disaster risk reduction as a tool for conflict prevention. Conflict prevention and peace forum. https://www.preventionweb.net/files/54222_cppfpaperthesendaiframeworkasa.pdf. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Taşan-Kok, T., & Eraydin, A. (2013). Resilience thinking in urban planning. London: Springer.
- Tierney, K. (2014). The social roots of risk: Producing disasters, promoting resilience. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Uekusa, S. (2017). Rethinking resilience: Bourdieu's contribution to disaster research. Resilience, 6(3), 181–195.
- UN. (2015). The challenge of sustaining peace: Report of the advisory group of experts. United Nations https://www.un.org/pga/wp-content/uploads/sites/3/2015/07/300615_The-Challenge-of-Sustaining-Peace.pdf. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- UN, & WB. (2018). Pathways for peace: Inclusive approaches to preventing violent conflict. Washington, DC: United Nations & World Bank.
- UNDRR. (2015). Sendai framework for disaster risk reduction 2015–2030. United Nation Disaster Risk Reduction. <https://www.undrr.org/publication/sendai-framework-disaster-risk-reduction-2015-2030>. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- UNDRR. (2020). International strategy for DRR. United Nations Disaster Risk Reduction. <https://www.undrr.org>. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- United Nations. (2019). World population prospects 2019: Highlights. Department of Economic and Social Affairs. https://population.un.org/wpp/Publications/Files/WPP2019_Highlights.pdf. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- UNSDG. (2019). Sustainable development goals 2030. United Nations. <https://www.un.org/sustainabledevelopment/sustainable-development-goals/>. Accessed 25 Dec 2020.
- van Metre, L., & Calder, J. (2015). Peacebuilding and resilience: How society responds to violence. United State Institute of Peace. <https://www.usip.org/sites/default/files/PW121-Peacebuilding-and-Resilience-How-Society-Responds-to-Violence.pdf>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Vilcan, T. (2017). Articulating resilience in practice: Chains of responsabilisation, failure points and political contestation. Resilience, 5(1), 29–43.
- Walch, C. (2010). Climate change, Disaster Risk Reduction and Peace-Building: Analysing the linkages and offering suggestions. Care, 1–37.
- Walch, C. (2015). Expertise and policy-making in disaster risk reduction. Nature Climate Change, 5(8), 706–707.
- Walker, J., & Cooper, M. (2011). Genealogies of resilience: From systems ecology to the political economy of crisis adaptation. Security Dialogue, 14(2), 143–160.
- Walker, B. H., Holling, C. S., Carpenter, S. R., & Kinzig, A. (2004). Resilience, adaptability and transformability in social–ecological systems. Ecology and Society, 9(2), 5.
- Wils, O., Hopp, U., Ropers, N., Vimalarajah, L., & Zunzer, W. (2006). The systemic approach to conflict transformation concept and fields of application. Berghof Foundation for Peace Support. <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/5087C2517BF0C015>

C1257235004C0697-Berghof-Oct2006.pdf. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.

- WWF. (2020). Living planet report 2020: Bending the curve of biodiversity loss. World Wide Fund. <https://f.hubspotusercontent20.net/hubfs/4783129/LPR/PDFs/ENGLISH-FULL.pdf>. Accessed 24 Dec 2020.
- Zhou, H., Wang, J., Wan, J., & Jia, H. (2009). Resilience to natural hazards: A geographic perspective. Natural Hazards, 53(1), 21–41.

Further Reading

- Chandler, D., & Coaffee, J. (2017). The Routledge handbook of international resilience. New York: Routledge.
- de Coning, C. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience, 4(3), 166–181.
- Juncos, A., & Joseph, J. (2020). Resilient peace: Exploring the theory and practice of resilience in peacebuilding interventions. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(3), 289–302.
- Juncos, A. (2018). Resilience in peacebuilding: Contesting uncertainty, ambiguity, and complexity. Contemporary Security Policy, 39(4), 559–574.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.

Responsibility

- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences

Responsibility to Protect

- ▶ R2P and Prevention

Restorative Justice

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Restraints on War

- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Results

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Revolution, Violence, and the Pursuit of Peace

Sandra Pogodda
University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Definition

This entry understands revolution as emancipation from an oppressive constellation of power or from systemic forms of exploitation and subordination, achieved through mass mobilization. This way, this research hopes to update Skocpol's structural definition of revolutions (Skocpol 1979) for the twenty-first century. Contemporary scholarship has highlighted the limitations of foregrounding the state and class as central categories of analysis. While the modern state possesses a large arsenal of technologies and strategies to oppress resistance, the question how to achieve emancipation requires identification of networked forms of power that link state actors to transnational and domestic forces (Belmonte and Cerny 2021). Hence, revolutionaries' capacity to upend sociopolitical oppression and economic marginalization depends on their understanding of the strengths and vulnerabilities of power constellations that extend beyond and below the state. Indeed, if revolutions keep being conceptualized in state-centric terms, they are likely to remain trapped in the pattern of replacing one form of oppression with another. In a similar vein, exploitation and subordination need to be understood intersectionally, linking class, race, gender, sexuality, ethnicity and other identity markers (Crenshaw 1993) in order to fully grasp the emancipatory potential of revolutions. Incomplete revolutions might tackle one dimension of an intersectional structure of domination or emancipate society from one oppressive heterarchy, while leaving others intact. A great revolution in the twenty-first century, by contrast, would need to uproot the structures that perpetuate different interlinked dimensions of exploitation, subordination, and oppression. By including the concept of emancipation, this definition aims to refocus structural approaches towards Arendt's notion that freedom is the main pursuit of revolutions (Arendt, [1963] 1990). The latter makes revolutions relevant for critical peace and conflict studies.

Keywords

Revolution · Oppression · Heterarchy · Violence

Introduction

Until the late twentieth century, revolutions were mired in violence through a multitude of mechanism, prompting prominent social scientists (e.g., Charles Tilly, Ted Gurr, Anthony Giddens) to define revolutions as intrinsically violent phenomena. Yet, the relationship between revolutions and violence is complex and subject to changes at the microlevel of social organization as well as in their international environment. Regarding revolutions as inherently violent thus serves conservative political agendas more than our understanding of the phenomenon itself: If indifference and the “fear of one man” fail to inspire voluntary servitude (de La Boetie, [1552/1553]2015), fear of destruction of a country by the “evils of revolution” (Burke, [1790] 2008) might help perpetuate oppressive forms of rule. Hence, this chapter scrutinizes the complex relationship between revolutions and violence before turning to recent attempts at nonviolent revolutions and their anti-systemic potential. By examining the emancipatory ethics of revolutions, this research tries to highlight why revolutions remain indispensable for our understanding of progress and emancipatory forms of peace, despite their bloody trails on the paths of history.

The first part of this chapter investigates various links between revolutions and violence. By distinguishing between different types of violence and their role in the revolutionary process, this analysis aims to develop a clearer understanding of the mechanisms that perpetuate revolutionary violence. Moreover, the first section connects different forms of violence to revolutionary ethics in order to explain why even violent forms of revolution may constitute a pursuit of freedom and emancipation. The second part of the chapter investigates how contemporary nonviolent attempts at revolution have fared in their opposition to oppression, exploitation, and subordination. It also investigates the links between violence and nonviolence, which are often neglected in pacifist scholarship. Drawing heavily on the experiences of revolutionaries in the Arab Uprisings, this part questions whether revolutionary agency that wants to diverge from the well-trodden path of liberal catching-up can chart a “new beginning” with the instruments of nonviolence.

Revolutions and Violence

Diagnosing a growing interrelatedness of war and revolution, Hannah Arendt stated in 1963 that revolutions were “not even conceivable outside of the domain of war” (Arendt 1990 [1963], 18). Indeed, the links between revolutions and violence were historically well established: Prior to revolutionary insurrections, involvement in interstate wars might have weakened ruling regimes and thus emboldened revolutionary movements (Halliday 1999; Skocpol 1979). Guerrilla wars and armed insurrections often enabled revolutionary movements to seize power. Once in power, violence continued through wars waged by counterrevolutionary forces against revolutionary regimes, but also through revolutionary vanguards' use of large-scale violence against dissenters in their own population (Mayer 2000). How can this large array of links between violence and revolutions be reconciled with Arendt's assumption that revolution is the pursuit of freedom? This chapter argues that a fuller understanding of the relationship between revolutionary movements, violence, and peace can only be achieved through analysis of the underlying ideology, political strategy, and ethics of revolutionary movements.

Historically, revolutions have often been facilitated by interstate wars that exposed the weakness or incompetence of a ruling regime. Poorly conducted wars, for instance, further eroded the legitimacy of the Russian monarchy and fueled public support for revolutionary movements in 1905 and 1917. Beyond impacting political authority, externally imposed wars can also shift the military balance of forces between an existing regime and a revolutionary movement. An example for this was the Japanese invasion of Manchuria, which militarily weakened the ruling Kuomintang government and thus enabled the communist movement to win its guerrilla war in 1949. Withdrawal from a war might equally embolden revolutionary movements. The American withdrawal from Vietnam, for instance, was seen as a world systemic opening and thus sparked a cascade of revolutions between 1974 and 1980 (Halliday 1999, 178/179). In this first category of links, revolutionary movements might benefit from war but are not the aggressors. Indeed, war-torn populations might at times consider revolutionary movements as an alternative to war-prone regimes. Yet, such wars have also limited effects on revolutionary dynamics. Effective challenges to an established political regime result from interlinked socioeconomic, fiscal, and political crises, in which interstate wars are only one contributing factor (Skocpol 1979). Similarly, revolutionary movements do not emerge in response to such wars, but from a complex conjunctural crisis (Mayer 2000; Halliday 1999).

If war-weary masses had hoped for revolutionary movements to end wars and establish stability though, they were often disappointed. Not only did revolutionary movements until the late twentieth century usually chart their path to power by way of armed insurrection or guerrilla war. Violence tended to continue between revolutionary and counter-revolutionary forces even after revolutionary movements seized power: Internally, revolutionary leaders tended to use purges and terror to solidify their hold on power, while counter-revolutionary forces have often waged wars to defeat revolutionary governments and restore previous regimes.

Of course, wars waged by counter-revolutionary forces against revolutionary governments demonstrate the violence of the former, not the ethics of the latter. However, such wars might curtail the scope of emancipatory possibilities in revolutions and thereby indirectly shape revolutionaries' ethics of violence. The Haitian Revolution illustrates this trap set by counter-revolutionary forces. As a previously unthinkable challenge to established political hierarchies (Trouillot 2009), the successful slave revolution in Haiti faced a multitude of external threats. Haiti's revolutionary government was acutely aware that its people's freedom remained under constant threat. Given the importance of slavery in the construction of capitalism and imperialism (Williams 2021 [1944]), slaveholding powers had a strong interest in crushing the dangerous precedent that the Haitian slave revolution set. Constant military mobilization and permanent debt bondage turned out to be the price of this newly achieved freedom. In order to be able to finance such commitments, the revolutionary government under Touissant Louverture had to reactivate and militarize the hated plantation system and force Haitian workers back into it (Shilliam 2008). Hence, political emancipation may require economic subordination.

Yet as Rosa Luxemburg observed "... the danger begins when [revolutionaries] make a virtue of necessity and want to freeze into a complete theoretical system all the tactics forced upon them by these fatal circumstances" (Waters 1970). Revolutionary terror, for instance, has often been the product of three factors that are spurred on by perceived threats to the survival of the revolution (Mayer 2000, 96/97): the inexperience of new leaders in dealing with sharp political, social, and cultural discord; an ideological imperative to destroy the ancient regime and other counter-revolutionary forces; as well as a paranoid mindset that sees conspiracy everywhere. Given counter-revolutionary forces' compulsion to intervene in revolutionary processes, the line between paranoia and real threat appears blurred in the liminality of the revolutionary process. Here, the violence of foundation (to establish a new political and social order) faces off against the violence of conservation (Mayer 2000, 76).

For all the devastation that revolutionary violence has caused in history, its use needs to be understood in relation to its cause. While feudalism and other forms of authoritarian rule may promise stability, they are the embodiment of structural violence (Galtung 1978). Revolution, by contrast, strives for the creation of a better world in which an emancipatory peace would follow the violent elimination of an ancient regime. Operating on the assumption that society can be transformed, revolution aims to lay bare the injustice, exploitation, and violence of the ruling regime, and replace it with a new social order (Hewlett 2016). This novelty comes at a price, but so does subservience to an unjust regime (Hegel [1837] 2009).

Problematically, once ideologically justified, violence has often enabled the hijacking of revolutions by ruthless leaders. Since ideology is molded to the interests of a political leadership, the defense of ideology might become indistinguishable from the defense of revolutionary vanguards. Excessive violence, such as used in Mao's Cultural Revolution, may be publicly justified as defeating the enemies of the revolution even if it only serves to preserve the power of a dictator. At this point, a revolution would have strayed so far from striving for freedom that it may have crossed the line into counterrevolution.

Nonviolent Revolutions?

Since the peaceful mass uprisings that toppled socialist regimes in Eastern Europe in 1989, nonviolence has been considered a revolutionary tactic. There are good reasons for this change of perspective: In the 1989 revolutions, nonviolence appeared to be able to achieve emancipation from oppressive power constellations that kept the socialist regimes in Eastern Europe in place, while also avoiding the ethical pitfalls of violent revolutions. In contrast to the isolated forerunners of this trend (e.g., Mahatma Gandhi's independence movement and the Iranian Revolution of 1979), the 1989 revolutions seemed to have cut the link between direct forms of violence and revolutions not only in their initial mobilization, but even in the subsequent revolutionary process. Initially, the Arab Uprisings might have supported this trend towards nonviolent revolutions. However, the uprisings in Libya, Syria, and Yemen soon turned into civil wars, while Egypt's and Bahrain's attempted nonviolent revolutions were quickly crushed. This section first investigates the often ignored links between violence and nonviolence in contemporary revolutions and subsequently examines the limitations of nonviolent mobilization in achieving emancipatory objectives.

Starting from a normative commitment to nonviolence as the moral backbone of social mobilization, pacifists often fail to acknowledge the links between violent and nonviolent forms of uprisings. By contrast, practitioners of nonviolent resistance in oppressive contexts often recognize armed resistance as an alternative pathway to their own struggle. They might consider the methods of armed struggle counterproductive or even deeply unethical, yet they are often acutely aware that disowning armed resistance would create a moral equivalence between the oppressor and the struggle to end oppression.

As hinted to above, earlier examples of peaceful mass uprisings descended into wars and revolutionary terror in the revolutionary process. Despite Mahatma Gandhi's historical achievement of creating a peaceful nationalist movement that ended British colonialism in India, the revolutionary moment resulted in the War of Partition between India and Pakistan. Similarly, the Iranian Revolution of 1979 started with a peaceful mass uprising that toppled the oppressive regime of Shah Reza Palavi, but the formation of the Islamic Republic of Iran under Ayatollah Khomeini became quickly mired in revolutionary terror (as well as a counterrevolutionary war waged by neighboring Iraq). Hence, in both instances, the revolutionary processes became violent, despite initial peaceful mass mobilization.

Three decades on from the Iranian Revolution, the Arab Uprisings of 2011 serve as a reminder of the interwoven nature of armed and nonviolent struggle in the initial stages of mass mobilization. Indeed, even the peaceful mass uprisings in Tunisia and Egypt were to a certain extent enabled by limited forms of violence. In Tunisia, it took 2 weeks for the local uprisings in the interior to culminate in sufficient peaceful mass mobilization to unseat dictator Ben Ali. Within this period, limited violence employed by marginalized youth was as effective in keeping the struggle against dictatorship alive as nonviolent trade union mobilization. In Egypt, the international (academic and media) focus on the peaceful organization of mass resistance at Tahrir Square blocked out the violent clashes in the adjacent locations. Yet the bloody street battles between working class youth and President Hosni Mubarak's security forces allowed the peaceful demonstrations at Tahrir Square to reach the critical mass that allowed nonviolence to claim a prominent place in the mythology of the Egyptian uprising (Ryzova 2020).

The question arising from these examples for the ethical foundations of nonviolent revolutions is: Where does the enablement of nonviolent resistance by violent forms of struggle leave nonviolence as an ethical commitment to refuse the use of violence? Another ethical challenge to nonviolent resistance can be illustrated with the example of the Syrian uprising against Bashar al-Assad. While this uprising was initially marked by peaceful mass protests, fascist forms of violence (e.g., the use of chemical weapons and cluster bombs against his population) deployed by the Syrian regime and its external backers Iran, Hezbollah and Russia forced many dissidents to take up arms (Al-Haj Saleh 2017; Daher 2019). Here, a moral dilemma for nonviolent resistance arose from the strategy of the al-Assad regime to persecute not only dissidents but their whole families. Is it ethically permissible under such circumstances to jeopardize the lives of family members, while refusing to take any responsibility for their protection? Many activists joined militias when they realized that pacifism only allowed subservience to a dictator as an alternative to jeopardizing the lives of their loved ones (Al-Haj Saleh 2017).

More important to answer the question whether nonviolent mobilization can amount to a revolutionary strategy, is analysis of the outcomes of peaceful uprisings. With regard to the Arab Uprisings, only Tunisia fulfils the criteria set out in the definition above and qualifies as an incomplete revolution. The Tunisian uprising has emancipated the country from the oppressive power network that connected Ben Ali's inner circle to its foreign backers. Yet Ben Ali's patronage networks and unaccountable security agencies have not only survived the revolution, but have been able to manipulate the democratic process in their favor (Gallien and Werenfels 2019). A change in Tunisia's development model has been prevented by a coalition of former regime cronies, conservative political parties, and the International Financial Institutions (Hanieh 2015). As a consequence, neither structural violence nor corruption have been eradicated.

In other parts of the region, nonviolent attempts at revolution have been crushed or turned into civil wars by regional counterrevolutionary forces. Faced with excessive violence, nonviolence has shown its major shortcoming: Its dependence on a conducive international environment rendered it vulnerable to shifts in geopolitics. As soon as the "iron cage of liberalism" (Ritter 2015) collapsed and the USA withdrew its military backing of democratisation movements in the Arab region after the R2P-intervention in Libya, nonviolent mobilization could no longer leverage the moral jiu-jitsu as its strongest political weapon.

By contrast, the events of 1989 occurred in a supportive regional and international environment. It stands to reason that their success depended on their limited ambition to duplicate the modes of governance employed by their dominant neighbors. Moreover, the Soviet Union ceased its military enforcement of socialism in Eastern Europe, rendering the epicentre of the counterrevolution in a state of disintegration. The Arab Uprisings, on the other hand, encountered no sustained regional or world systemic opening. While equally not being driven by a new utopian ideology, the Arab Uprisings seemed to demand transformations of governance that could only be regarded as a threat by their neighbors. Demands for democratization, human rights safeguards, anti-corruption, and accountability had the potential to expose their neighboring authoritarian regimes for all their failings on these accounts. In this hostile environment, only one attempt at nonviolent revolution survived the onslaught of counterrevolutionary interference in a small country without geopolitical significance. And even here, revolution could not progress beyond achieving political emancipation.

Summary

This chapter aimed to elaborate the role of violence and nonviolence in the pursuit of revolutionary emancipation. It juxtaposed different types of violence and scrutinized the limits of nonviolence in order to avoid simplistic assumptions on “successes” and “failures” of revolutions. The ethics of violence in revolutions is plagued by the gap between utopian visions and their dystopian realities. Violent revolutions have often been more effective in removing an oppressive regime from power and charting a course towards a genuinely new beginning. Unfortunately, the confrontation of revolutionary and counterrevolutionary violence tended to lead to a radicalization process within revolutionary movements (Crane 1960), allowing new forms of oppressive rule to emerge. Nonviolent revolutions, by contrast, try to avoid these pitfalls and can lead to emancipation from oppressive power constellations. Yet nonviolence does not seem to enable a pluriverse of emancipatory revolutionary outcomes, but has in the past only served the catching up with prevalent modes of governance. Hence, rather than acting as harbingers of a novel socio-political order, nonviolent revolutions have at best enabled the implementation of a widespread (and already crumbling) ideology. Here, the role of the international environment in revolutions appears paramount in determining whether contemporary mass uprisings can in fact lead to revolutionary transformation. This highlights the role of networked power beyond and below the state in revolutionary processes. Indeed, it urges scholars to move their focus away from the choice between violent versus nonviolent tactics and towards the emancipatory possibilities of scalar strategies of revolutionary contestation

Cross-References

- ▶ Asymmetrical Warfare
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace
- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance

Bibliography

- Al-Haj Saleh, Y. (2017). The Impossible revolution. London: Hurst.
- Arendt, H. ([1963] 1990). On revolution. London: Penguin Books.
- Belmonte, R., & Cerny, P. G. (2021). Heterarchy: Toward paradigm shift in world politics. Journal of Political Power, 14(1), 235–257.
- Burke, E. (2008). The evils of revolution. London: Penguin Books.
- Crane, B. (1960 [1938]). The anatomy of revolution. New York: Random House.
- Crenshaw, K. (1993). Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of color. Stanford Law Review, 43(6), 1241–1299.
- Daher, J. (2019). Syria after the uprising (London: Pluto Press, chapter 2 “Popular uprising and militarization”, pp. 38–73).
- de La Boetie, E. ([1552/1553] 2015). The politics of obedience: The discourse of voluntary servitude. Auburn: The Mises Institute.
- Gallien, M. and I. Werenfels (2019, March 6). Is Tunisia really democratising? Progress, resistance, and an uncertain outlook, SWP Comment 2019/C 13. Available at <https://www.swp-berlin.org/en/publication/is-tunisia-really-democratising>
- Galtung, J (1978). Peace and Social Structure. Oslo: International Peace Research Institute.
- Halliday, F. (1999). Revolution and world politics. London: Palgrave.
- Hanieh, A. (2015). Shifting priorities or business as usual? Continuity and change in the post-2011 IMF and World Bank Engagement with Tunisia, Morocco and Egypt. British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, 42(1), 119–143.
- Hegel, G. ([1837] 2009). The philosophy of history. London: Frederick Ellis Publishers.
- Hewlett, N. (2016). Blood and progress: Violence in pursuit of emancipation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Mayer, A. (2000). The furies: Violence and terror in the French and Russian Revolutions. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ritter, D. (2015). The iron cage of liberalism: International politics and unarmed revolutions in the Middle East and North Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ryzova, L. (2020). The battle of Muhammed Mahmoud street in Cairo: The politics and poetics of urban violence in revolutionary time. Past and Present, 247, 273–317.

- Shilliam, R. (2008). What the Haitian Revolution might tell us about development, security, and the politics of race. Comparative Studies in Society and History, 50(3), 778–808.
- Skocpol, T. 2015 [1979]. States and social revolutions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Trouillot, M. R. (2009). Haiti: State against nation - The origins and legacy of Duvalerism. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Waters, M.-A. (1970). Rosa luxemburg speaks. New York: Pathfinder Press.
- Williams, E. (2021 [1944]). Capitalism and slavery. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press.

Right to Have Rights

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Rise of China

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

Risk Reduction

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Risks

- ▶ Resilience and Peace

Role of State and Non-state Terrorism in Peace Processes, The Rashmi Singh

The Pontifical Catholic University of Minas Gerais, PUC Minas, Belo Horizonte, Brazil

Description

The study of terrorism, with some notable exceptions (Findley and Young 2015; Fortna 2015; Kalyvas 2004; Sambanis 2008), tends to remain silenced from the study of civil wars and peace agreements. On closer inspection, however, the data clearly demonstrates that terrorism is a common occurrence within the context of civil wars and other armed conflicts. Some prominent cases include the LTTE in Sri Lanka, Hamas and various other Palestinian factions in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and the PKK in Turkey. In each case, evidence shows that governments also use the tactic of terrorism against their respective non-state opponents. This can manifest as a policy of systematic rape and torture as seen in the case of the Sri Lankan government, the prolonged occupation with concomitant human rights abuse of the Occupied Palestinian Territories of West Bank and Gaza by Israel, or the state campaign to depopulate and demolish thousands of Kurdish villages to rout out the PKK in Turkey. Terrorism serves many functions for both state and non-state actors in civil wars ranging from forcing compliance (Balcells 2010; Kalyvas 2006) to outbidding rivals (Bloom 2005), from intimidating competitors and enemies to ensuring group survival (Kydd and Walter 2006). Terrorism can also be used as a tactic of attrition (Pape 2003), i.e., whereby its use seeks to undercut the enemy's will to continue fighting or as a mechanism of propaganda (Crenshaw 2011) and provocation (Lake 2002). However, perhaps one of the most significant roles of terrorism when used under conditions of conflict is as a tactic to “spoil” attempts at achieving a durable peace (de Mesquita 2005; Kydd and Walter 2002; Newman and Richmond 2006; Reiter 2016). It is worth pointing out that while both states and non-state actors use the tactic of terrorism to spoil peace agreements, the literature, with a few exceptions (Höglund and Zartman 2006; Ghanem-Yazbeck 2018; Kibrik and Kornberg 2019), tends to focus mostly upon the non-state actor's role in spoiling, perhaps because, more often than not, it is the non-state actor that engages in spoiling activities.

Introduction

Terrorism: State and Non-state

One of the fundamental problems with the study of terrorism concerns the definitional problem, i.e., how should terrorism be defined. It is a problem that has confounded both scholars and practitioners and generated considerable debate and hairpulling in the field. Some have argued that this definitional failure has become even more acute after the iconic attacks of 09 September 2001. Moreover, the deluge of new literature in the wake of the 9/11 attacks meant that the term has been subjected to even more manipulation than before (Richards 2015). There are obvious advantages to a universally accepted definition of terrorism. For policymakers and practitioners, a universally agreed upon definition would facilitate cooperation against the phenomenon while for academics, it would facilitate theory-building and an advancement in the field of study. However, despite these obvious advantages, the term terrorism continues to be used so broadly, carelessly, and in so many contexts “as to become almost meaningless” and even those who accept the label challenge its contents (Richardson 1999:209). There is a clear division between scholars and policymakers who believe that attempting to reach a consensus definition is a waste of time and others who are firmly of the opinion that not only is this possible but imperative for the advancement of the field (Ganor 2002).

It has been argued that the term “terrorism” is a pejorative label, often arbitrarily used and rarely accepted by those being labelled as such (Richardson 2006). Indeed, there are several points of disagreement that prevent the emergence of a consensus definition of terrorism, albeit some argue that this absence of consensus may also be somewhat overstated (Schmid 2011). Nonetheless, it behooves mentioning, at the very least, a few controversies that are relevant to the discussion about the role of state and non-state terrorism in armed conflicts. First, one of the longest-standing debates is related to if a state can be categorized as a terrorist actor or if terrorist violence is the remit of non-state actors alone. In other words, is there even such a thing as “state terrorism”? The logic of those suggesting that states be left out of any definition of terrorism is based on their assertion that states and their militaries observe laws of war, while non-state actors involved in perpetrating acts of terrorism adamantly refuse to be bound by these very rules of war and codes of conduct (Hoffman 2018; Lodge 1981; Richardson 2006). There are of course others who hold the opposite point of view (English 2012, 2015; Wilkinson 2011). English (2016) eloquently argues that state and non-state terrorisms diverge in terms of both scale and dynamics, making them difficult to study synoptically. Nonetheless, the argument goes that state actors, very much like non-state actors, can also practice terrorism. As such, the definition of terrorism should be founded upon the nature of the act rather than upon the nature of the actor (Jackson 2008; Singh 2018).

The logic exempting states from the study of terrorism because they evidently follow the laws of war is also linked to a second key point of disagreement, i.e., whether a defining characteristic of terrorism is that it targets civilians in peacetime environments or if attacks on combatants under certain circumstances, peacetime or not, can also be categorized as terrorist in character. The debate over targeting is closely linked to the often problematic distinction between what constitutes a combatant versus a noncombatant (see for instance, Schmid 2011); however, in relation to the intentional use, or the threat of use, of violence against civilians or civilian targets for a political motive (Ganor 2002), some scholars argue that as terrorism’s key intent is “to generate a psychological response beyond the immediate victims . . . anyone can become a victim of terrorism providing he, she or they serve their purpose as ‘message generators’ to a broader group or audience” (Richardson 2015: 18). In other words, the deliberate targeting of civilians, in peacetime or otherwise, represents just one kind of terrorism rather than being the defining characteristic of terrorism. Nonetheless, there exists to some extent a consensus that what distinguishes terrorism from other forms of political violence, for instance insurgency, is that the primary targets of terrorism tend to be civilians and/or terrorist violence, when exercised, is indiscriminate. This can explain how the tactic of terrorism can coexist with other forms of political violence, practiced by both state and non-state parties as a distinguishing character of a civil conflict.

Finally, basing a definition of terrorism upon the nature of the act as opposed to the identity of the actor or victim and/or the motivation behind the use of such violence, allows one to circumvent the old cliché, “one man’s freedom fighter is another man’s terrorist.” Not only do acts of terrorism directly contravene the laws of war which grant civilians immunity from deliberate attack – hence, underscoring that “one man’s terrorist is everyone’s terrorist” (Jenkins 1980: 2) – but most terrorists who claim to be freedom fighters would struggle to meet the standards set by international humanitarian law for resistance fighters/lawful belligerents (Schmid 2011: 22). Once again, this perspective allows one to sidestep both the motivations and identities of terrorist actors and instead focus upon the quality of their actions when characterizing them as terrorist and at least some of their activities as terrorism.

Given this discussion, terrorism may be defined as an anxiety-inspiring method of repeated violent action, employed by individuals, groups, or state actors for mainly political reasons whereby the direct and immediate targets of violence are not necessarily the main targets (Schmid 2011).

Spoiling

Just like “terrorism,” the notion of “spoiling” is somewhat difficult to pin down and there are several definitions used by researchers today. The original definition was proposed by Stephen Stedman (1997, 5) who originally defined spoilers as “leaders and parties who believe that peace emerging from negotiations threatens their power, world-view, and interests, and use violence to undermine attempts to achieve it.” In the period since the introduction of the concept of spoiling, it has come to be used in a much more general manner to describe any group or individuals opposing a settlement. In other words, researchers now “refer to spoiling as action taken to disrupt, undermine, hinder or delay a peace process” (Reiter 2016: 6; see also: Sisk 2006; Newman and Richmond 2006).

Stedman’s original definition was accompanied by various strategies for the “custodians of peace processes” (1997,12), i.e., international actors, involved in implementing peace agreements, to cultivate and protect the peace while managing spoilers. He therefore offered a preliminary typology of spoilers that underpinned these strategies and asserted that a correct diagnosis of spoiler type was central to their successful management (Stedman 1997). Most subsequent scholarship on spoiling, building on Steadman’s seminal work, accepts that spoilers vary considerably in their stated objectives and consequently focusses upon identifying their underlying motivations for using violence to influence a peace process. Much of this work also follows Steadman’s original typology that categorized spoilers into three key categories based upon their objectives and their commitment to achieving these objectives, i.e., limited, greedy, and total. Hence, at one end of this spectrum are the limited spoilers who have limited goals and albeit, as Steadman argues, this does not correspond to their levels of commitment as they can be deeply dedicated and, as such, unwilling to negotiate. These actors tend to use violence “as a tool to gain leverage in deal making, and thus this violence can be halted if the sides strike the right deal” (Reiter 2016: 23). At the opposite end of the spectrum lies the category of the total spoilers or “zealots,” as Darby (2001) calls them. These actors are in pursuit of total power or “unilateral solutions” (Ayres 2001) and tend to hold immutable preferences, i.e., their “goals are not subject to change” (Stedman 1997: 10), and they can be neither bought off nor incorporated into the peace process. For peace to be successful, then international actors need to circumvent these total spoilers. In between these two extremes lies the category of the greedy or “opportunistic spoilers” (Darby 2001). These are a wide range of actors that, as the name suggests, can be motivated by political, military, or financial gains as the opportunity presents itself. The goals of such so-called greedy spoilers tend to contract and expand based on their calculations of costs and risks.

While Steadman’s typology has strongly shaped the research on spoilers, subsequent scholarship has also criticized it for its several shortcomings and limitations. For one, this newer research argues that Steadman’s model strongly relies upon “explanatory factors that are endogenous to the parties no matter the contextual circumstances of the peace process, making it difficult to predict spoiler activities before they have occurred . . . [Furthermore, it also] fails to adequately explain why groups frequently change their behavior, from compliance to spoiling and vice versa, within a given peace process or even with respect to a specific peace accord” (Nilsson & Kovacs 2011: 615). Instead, subsequent researchers emphasize, for instance, the centrality of the structural environment of the peace process (Greenhill & Major 2007); the capabilities of potential spoilers (i.e., access to valuable tradable commodities and foreign patrons) and available opportunities (i.e., the presence of international peacekeeping forces and the group’s own vested interests in the peace process) (Zahar 2006); their considerations of costs and risks based on if they are located inside or outside the peace process (Zahar 2008); the intrinsic character of the group (i.e., if it is inclusive or exclusive) (Blaydes & De Maio 2010); group type (if it is a government or a non-state actor) (Johnston 2007); and so on. Stedman himself has acknowledged some of this criticism (2002; 2008), especially giving more weight to the structural conditions of peace processes. In short, the current consensus in the field of spoiler research seems to be pointing towards not only broader, more complex definitions of what spoiling is, but also the construction of more complex and nuanced models which can provide more robust explanations for the emergence of spoiler activities during peace processes.

A final issue worth highlighting in an assessment of spoiling is the normative nature of the terminology used. A critical concern of much of the research on spoiling is first, how to identify spoilers and second, how to predict their emergence in any given peace process. However, the very discussion around “spoilers” implies a “binary” between those who are interested in peace and those who are against it (Newman & Richmond 2006). This logic is also very clearly founded on the idea that all conflicts can be resolved once the obstacles to such progress are removed. The idea of actors who are “spoilers,” i.e., actively obstructing the peace, fulfills this requirement. However, the evidence clearly demonstrates that peace processes are neither so simple nor quite as linear. In other words, all parties associated with a peace process carry the capacity for spoiling, and more importantly, actors frequently change their preferences, demands, positions, and loyalties. In short, a more dynamic understanding of actors engaging in spoiling activities better explains this phenomenon than the static identity-category of “spoiler.” Moreover, as Newman and Richmond (2006: 4-5) so effectively argue, at least some of the evidence suggests that the term “spoiler” is tremendously subjective and reflects the bias of third-party mediators who tend to see all actors opposed to a liberal peace as “spoilers” in a conflict situation. Hence very much like the discussion on terrorism, spoiling is best viewed as a tactic and as such, better understood in terms of the nature of the act (spoiling) rather than the nature of the actor (spoiler).

Key Issues

Why Is Terrorist Violence Used to Spoil Peace Processes and when Does Terrorism Become a Tactic of Spoiling?

As the research on spoiling has developed there has emerged a general consensus in the academic community that “violence directed at peace agreements poses a serious threat to the maintenance of peace” (Reiter 2016: 2; Kydd & Walter 2002; Darby 2001). Given the focus here upon specifically terrorist violence, this can be further qualified as terrorist violence undermines peace processes and poses a serious threat to the maintenance of peace. Warring parties use terrorist violence during war and associated peace processes in the hopes of gaining some particular outcome(s). Typically, all parties seek military victory on the battlefield which would guarantee full control over the postwar terms of settlement. However, given the difficulty of achieving the outcome of an undisputed military victory, warring parties pursue peace negotiations in the hope of gaining a share in the outcome of peace settlements, “which include a variety of factors, such as property rights, electoral rules, disarmament, territory, amnesty for political prisoners,” etc. (Findley & Young 2015: 1119). In some cases, all groups want a share in these outcomes and use violence to force their way into contention for these benefits. In other situations, there are groups that oppose the settlement because it would usher in conditions that may fundamentally threaten their interests – and hence, they use terrorist violence to derail the process. State actors can also spoil a peace process. As Reiter (2016: 38) argues, government spoiling, i.e., when spoiling is directed by the political leaders of a state, presents a significant threat to peace agreements. Often negotiated agreements require non-state groups disarming which leaves the state party with a renewed monopoly on violence which it can then use to alter the terms of the peace settlement to its own advantage and gain more concessions. At other times, governments can use spoiling to ascertain the true intentions of rebel groups, especially if it is unclear if rebels are truly interested in negotiating a settlement or if they are merely using a lull in the conflict to regroup and rearm (Reiter 2016: 38). Government spoiling, like all spoiling, can also be deliberate or unintentional (Höglund & Zartman 2006; MacGinty 2006) and the result of its punitive counter-terrorism policies. When a state responds harshly to terrorist violence, this serves to not only neutralize the terrorist threat posed by the non-state enemy but also alienates more moderate negotiating partners due to issues such as collateral damage and collective punishment. This can not only serve to anger the targeted community, thereby helping mobilize new recruits and fighters, but also derail the peace process by instigating an escalating cycle of violence between warring parties (Singh 2011).

Steadman’s work argued that spoilers appear only when there is an existing or potentially emerging peace that can be undermined, i.e., after a pact has already been signed [my emphasis] or at least two parties have publicly committed themselves to some sort of comprehensive peace agreement (Stedman 1997; Nilsson & Kovacs 2011). In later works, Steadman narrowed his position even further stating that “in the absence of an agreement, the concept of spoiler should not apply” (Steadman 2002: 13; Nilsson & Kovacs 2011). However, many works by subsequent authors take a more relaxed approach and do not outline the context of a peace process while some, like Newman and Richmond (2006: 102) take the middle path and argue that spoiling can apply to situations where “some form of peace process is underway [my emphasis] and where at least one of the parties to the conflict is either engaged in, or committed to, a peace process.” Certainly, terrorist violence can appear at all stages of armed conflicts and peace processes.

In the pre-conflict or early stages of armed conflict, terrorism is often employed to provoke a violent response from the enemy. In other words, here terrorism functions as a catalyst for violence leading to a general escalation in the conflict’s levels of violence, and often provokes a full-scale armed confrontation between the parties involved. During an ongoing armed conflict, terrorism can be used by all parties involved in the conflict as a tactic of confrontation and may sometimes even function as a force multiplier. Often in these circumstances, terrorism is practiced by both state and non-state parties in tandem with other forms of political violence (“regular” wartime military activity, guerrilla warfare) as well as potentially combined with nonviolent activities (social work and humanitarian efforts). However, it is when terrorism is practiced during an ongoing peace process that it appears as a spoiling tactic used by parties to undermine and disrupt ongoing negotiations and destabilize the process in general.

Once a peace process is underway violence – including terrorist violence – can once again be used for various purposes and at different stages of the process. During early stages of negotiation, for instance, terrorism can be used by groups trying to force their way to the negotiation table. During implementation, terrorist violence can be used to derail the process completely, draw attention to specific clauses of the accord, or force parties to renegotiate specific terms of the settlement underway. In post-agreement periods, violence is often used by parties who are dissatisfied with the power-sharing agreement to gain additional concessions as well as by weaker groups who are trying to reignite the conflict to generate conditions that would potentially enable group survival. In a post-agreement scenario, most spoilers tend to be outside the negotiated agreement with the more powerful of these posing a serious threat to the durability of peace. In all cases, research suggests that the more inclusive the peace negotiations are, the lower the probability of post-agreement spoiler violence (Sisk 2009; Blaydes & De Maio 2010).

Does Terrorism “Spoil” Peace Processes More than Other Types of Violence?

Terrorist violence directed against peace accords can, at worst, result in the collapse of the peace agreement, extend the duration of conflict and/or bring about the renewal of war, and concomitantly, engender mass civilian casualties and human rights violations. In addition, if the tactic of terrorism provokes broader armed conflict, this wider violence can produce consequences as varied as large-scale environmental degradation, humanitarian crises, and the emergence of safe havens (Rotberg 2004) which can be exploited not only by transnational and international terrorist actors but also by organized criminal groups involved in the trafficking of drugs, peoples, arms, cultural artifacts, and various other resources (Shelley 2014; Rothfield 2007). At the same time, empirical evidence also suggests that sometimes spoiling activities can – somewhat counter-intuitively – produce positive and tangible results. This is because spoiling can “raise new questions within a peace process, attract or divert attention to or from certain issues or actors, provide marginalized actors with a voice, delay or postpone progress in a process or future rounds of talks, prevent implementation of agreements, elevate the interests of one particular party, or illustrate the need to include other actors in discussions” (Newman and Richmond 2006: 18). In short, while it is clear that the effects of spoiling vary widely, it is unclear if terrorist violence, as opposed to other forms of violence in armed conflict, is unique in its ability to spoil the trust between moderate factions of warring parties or disrupt other conditions necessary to generate and/or maintain peace (Kydd & Walter 2002; Findley & Young 2015). In other words, does the use of terrorism in spoiling tend to produce more negative rather than positive results? Some scholars certainly believe so. Abrahms (2013), for instance, argues that the appearance of terrorism during peace negotiations damages trust and the credibility of the actor using it, and demonstrates to other side that compromise is impossible leading to a drop in its willingness to reach a negotiated settlement, even when the demands of the enemy are relatively moderate. This can not only prolong the duration of a conflict but also contribute to the collapse of any peace process underway. However, given the general lack of theoretical and empirical work systematically addressing this question, the jury is still out. What does seem to be clearer is that even when terrorism is practiced by marginal or fringe elements in an armed conflict, it can, when compared to other forms of violence, disproportionately spoil peace processes, making wars not only more difficult to resolve but also more likely to recur (Findley & Young 2015).

The scholarship on spoiler activities in post-agreement scenarios has added much more nuance to our understanding of conditions under which spoiling occurs (Höglund 2008; MacGinty 2006; Darby 2001, Shikaki 1998). This work reveals how, even in cases where violence does not overturn the peace agreement when the post-agreement period is marked by acute terrorist violence, there are grave consequences for the sustainability of peace. For instance, the period after the signing of the 1998 Good Friday in Northern Ireland saw a spate of violent protests, assassinations, and bombings by those who were opposed to the accord (Reiter 2016; MacGinty 2006). Similarly, violence used by groups like Hamas and the Palestinian Islamic Jihad in the mid-1990s during the Oslo peace process contributed to a hardening of Israeli public opinion and the strengthening of political hawks, eventually leading to the election of a right-wing prime minister. This, in addition to, diverting precious resources that could have been used for rebuilding towards security also resulted in harsh counter-terrorism methods employed by Israeli state. In turn, harsh Israeli counter-measures served to undercut Palestinian confidence and trust, and further obstructed the implementation of the peace accord, eventually leading to the collapse of the Oslo Accords (Reiter 2016; Singh 2011). Once again this underscores the position that terrorist violence carries more bang for the buck and may indeed possess a disproportionate capacity to undermine and disrupt peace processes.

Summary

As stated at the very beginning, much of the recent work on civil war and terrorism tends to treat them in a siloed manner, treating them as completely distinct phenomenon without considering the myriad ways in which they overlap, interact, and relate. Developing this line of inquiry should therefore be an important concern that should interest both researchers and policymakers. As demonstrated, the use of terrorism as a tactic of spoiling in armed conflict can have a disproportionately powerful effect on the outcomes of the war, even when used by so-called marginal or fringe actors. However, much of the work on the use of terrorism as a tactic of spoiling tends to focus on the non-state actor. This not only falls into the trap of ignoring the possibility of the existence of state terrorism but also leave a lacuna in our understanding of the phenomenon and its many nuances. In 2015, Findley and Young argued that despite the attention paid to the dangers of potential spoilers in peace processes, there is not much systemic empirical research on the topic. Most empirical studies are “insightful” but are characterized either by brief empirical discussions, or focused upon a limited number of cases, or are single-case studies. The existing cross-country statistical analyses which seek to examine the duration of peace following a conflict either “incorporate violence that risks spoiling the peace . . . only indirectly and not as a primary objective, [or once again] rely on a limited number of cases, [do not] examine multiple stages of the peace process and [do not] move beyond a descriptive application of the data” (Findley & Young 2015: 1118). In all cases, while these are important and substantial contributions to the literature on spoilers, they leave room for a development of the research agenda, especially when it comes to moving beyond the distinctive approaches to studying the resolution of civil wars and armed conflict and role(s) of state and non-state terrorism in these processes.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Kenya’s War on Terror
- ▶ Peace Agreements

References

- Abrahms, M. (2013). The credibility paradox: Violence as a double-edged sword in international politics. International Studies Quarterly, 57(4), 660–671. <https://doi.org/10.1111/isqu.12098>.
- Ayres, R. W. (2001). Strategies, capabilities and demands: Explaining outcomes in violent intrastate nationalist conflicts. International Interactions, 27(1), 61–93. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03050620108434977>.
- Balcells, L. (2010). Rivalry and revenge: Violence against civilians in conventional civil wars. International Studies Quarterly, 54(2), 291–313.
- Blaydes, L., & De Maio, J. (2010). Spoiling the peace? Peace process exclusivity and political violence in north-Central Africa. Civil Wars, 12(1–2), 3–28. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2010.484896>.
- Bloom, M. (2005). Dying to kill: The allure of suicide terror. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Crenshaw, M. (2011). Explaining terrorism: Causes, processes and consequences. London: Routledge.
- Darby, J. (2001). The effects of violence on peace processes. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- De Mesquita, E. B. (2005). Conciliation, counterterrorism, and patterns of terrorist violence. International Organization, 59(1), 145–176. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/3877881>.
- English, R. (2012). Armed struggle: The history of the IRA. London: Macmillan.
- English, R. (2016). The future study of terrorism. European Journal of International Security, 1(2), 135–149. <http://doi.org/10.1017/eis.2016.6>.
- English, R. (Ed.). (2015). Illusions of terrorism and counter-terrorism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Findley, M. G., & Young, J. K. (2015). Terrorism, spoiling, and the resolution of civil wars. The Journal of Politics, 77(4), 1115–1128.
- Fortna, V. P. (2015). Do terrorists win? Rebels’ use of terrorism and civil war outcomes. International - Organization, 69(3), 519–556. <http://www.jstor.org/stable/24758312>.

- Ganor, B. (2002). Defining terrorism: Is one Man's terrorist another Man's freedom fighter? Policy, Practice and Research, 3(4), 287–304.
- Ghanem-Yazbeck, D. (2018). Algeria's peace process: spoilers, failures and successes. The Politics of Post-Conflict Reconstruction, Carnegie Middle East Centre, pp 38–43.
- Greenhill, K. M., & Major, S. (2007). The perils of profiling: Civil war spoilers and the collapse of intrastate peace accords. International Security, 31, 7–40. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/4137506>.
- Hoffman, B. (2018). Inside terrorism. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Höglund, K. (2008). Peace negotiations in the shadow of violence. Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.
- Höglund, K., & Zartman, I. W. (2006). Violence by the state: Official spoilers and their allies. In J. Darby (Ed.), Violence and reconstruction. Notre Dame: Notre Dame University Press.
- Jackson, R. (2008). An argument for terrorism. Perspectives on Terrorism, 2(2).
- Jenkins, B. (1980). 'The study of terrorism: Definitional problems.', RAND Paper Series.
- Johnston, P. (2007). Negotiated settlements and government strategy in civil wars: Evidence from Darfur. Civil Wars, 9(4), 359–377. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698240701699466>.
- Kalyvas, S. N. (2004). The paradox of terrorism in civil war. The Journal of Ethics, 8, 97–138. <https://doi.org/10.1023/B:JOET.0000012254.69088.41>.
- Kalyvas, S. N. (2006). The logic of violence in civil war. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Kydd, A. H., & Walter, B. F. (2006). The strategies of terrorism. International Security, 31(1), 49–80. <https://doi.org/10.1162/isec.2006.31.1.49>.
- Kydd, A. H., & Walter, B. F. (2002). Sabotaging the peace: The politics of extremist violence. International Organization, 56(2), 263–296. <http://www.jstor.org/stable/3078606>.
- Lake, D. A. (2002). Rational extremism: Understanding terrorism in the twenty-first century. Dialogue IO, 1(1), 15–28. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S777777770200002X>.
- Lodge, J. (1981). Introduction. In J. Lodge (Ed.), Terrorism: A challenge to the state. Oxford: Martin Robertson.
- MacGinty, R. (2006). Northern Ireland: A peace process thwarted by accidental spoiling. In E. Newman & O. Richmond (Eds.), Challenges to peacebuilding: Managing spoilers during conflict resolution. New York: United Nations University Press.
- Newman, E., & Richmond, O. (Eds.). (2006). Challenges to peacebuilding: Managing spoilers during conflict resolution. New York: United Nations University Press.
- Nilsson, D., & Kovacs, M. S. (2011). Revisiting an elusive concept: A review of the debate on spoilers in peace processes. International Studies Review, 13(4), 606–626. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1468-2486.2011.01080.x>.
- Pape, R. A. (2003). The strategic logic of suicide terrorism. American Political Science Review, 97(3), 343–361. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S000305540300073X>.
- Reiter, A. G. (2016). Fighting over peace: Spoilers, peace agreements, and the strategic use of violence. Switzerland: Springer International Publishing.
- Richards, A. (2015). Conceptualizing Terrorism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richardson, L. (1999). Terrorists as transnational actors. Terrorism and Political Violence, 11(4), 209–219. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09546559908427541>.
- Richardson, L. (2006). What terrorists want: Understanding the terrorist threat. London: John Murray.
- Rotberg, R. I. (Ed.). (2004). When states fail: Causes and consequences. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Rothfield, L. (Ed.) (2007). Antiquities under siege: Cultural heritage protection after the Iraq war. Plymouth: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, Inc.
- Sambanis, N. (2008). Terrorism and civil war. In P. Keefer & N. Loayza (Eds.), Terrorism, economic development and political openness (pp. 174–208). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Schmid, A. (Ed.). (2011). The Routledge handbook of terrorism research. London: Routledge.
- Shelley, L. I. (2014). Dirty entanglements: Corruption, crime and terrorism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Shikaki, K. (1998). The peace process and political violence. Middle East Review of International Affairs, 2(1), 8–11.
- Singh, R. (2011). Hamas and suicide terrorism: Multi-causal and multi-level approaches. London: Routledge.
- Singh, R. (2018). India's experience with terrorism. In S. Ganguly, N. Blarel, & S. Pardesi (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of India's National Security (pp. 247–266). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Sisk, T. D. (2006). Political violence and peace accords: Searching for the silver lining. In J. Darby (Ed.), Violence and reconstruction. Notre Dame: Notre Dame University Press.
- Sisk, T. D. (2009). International mediation in civil wars: Bargaining with bullets. New York: Routledge.
- Stedman, S. J. (1997). Spoiler problems in peace processes. International Security, 22, 5–53. <https://doi.org/10.2307/2539366>.
- Stedman, S. J. (2002). Introduction. In S. J. Stedman, D. Rothchild, & E. M. Cousens (Eds.), Ending civil wars: The implementation of peace agreements. London: Lynne Rienner.
- Stedman, S. J. (2008). Peace processes and the challenges of violence. In J. Darby & R. Mac Ginty (Eds.), Contemporary peace-making: Conflict, violence and peace processes. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Wilkinson, P. (2011). Terrorism versus democracy: The Liberal state response. London: Routledge.
- Zahar, M. J. (2006). Political violence in peace processes: Voice, exist and loyalty in the post-agreement period. In

- J. Darby (Ed.), Violence and reconstruction. Notre Dame: Notre Dame University Press.
- Zahar, M. J. (2008). Reframing the spoiler debate in peace processes. In J. Darby & R. Mac Ginty (Eds.), Contemporary peace-making: Conflict, violence and peace processes. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

Roles of Victims in Peacebuilding

Jessie Barton-Hronešová
Oxford Department of International Development, St Antony's College, University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Synonyms

Victims – survivors, harmed
Victimhood – suffering, injury, harm, identity, status
Peacebuilding – postwar reconstruction, reckoning, rebuilding, settlement, conflict management

Description

Until the late twentieth century, victims of war and violence were left on the margins of peace and peacebuilding considerations. They first started featuring as providers of information and evidence during court proceedings against war-crimes perpetrators in the 1960s and later as narrators of uncomfortable experiences. Thereafter, domestic and international peacebuilders continued to view victims through the humanitarian prism as passive and hapless actors of post-war reconstruction and in need of pity and assistance. This has resulted in constrained participation of victims in shaping peace processes and influencing how post-war reconstruction unravels. However, the last two decades have seen a transformation of victims' roles into active shapers of peacebuilding and their more meaningful inclusion in peace processes. This process initially started with the spread of global human rights regimes in the late 1970s and the advent of transitional justice that has gradually placed victims at the heart of restorative justice through truth enquiries, reparations, apologies, and other forms of victims' redress. In some recent cases, victims have also assumed roles of active interlocutors in peace negotiations, placing their needs and their post-war integration at the heart of peacebuilding. This entry examines the evolution of victims' inclusion in peacebuilding and the related transitional justice. It highlights the transformation of victims' roles from passive beneficiaries of justice to active shapers of post-war politics and policies with both peace-inducing and peace-endangering effects.

Peacebuilding and Victims

Victims' roles in peacebuilding have undergone major changes in the past century. From initial side effects of wars and afterthoughts in processes of post-conflict rebuilding, victims have increasingly become key players in approaches to post-conflict reconstruction and sustainable peace – both domestically and in the international arena. In the past, victims were considered as “collateral damage,” “statistics” as the numbers of deaths, and in the case of violated women as “spoils of war” (Enloe 2004). Their identities and individual needs rarely featured as noticeable and noticed in war and peace. While the scholarly field of peacebuilding has generally focused on demobilizing soldiers, building institutions, and ensuring security, the related field of “transitional justice” as “the array of processes designed to address past human rights violations following periods of political turmoil, state repression, or armed conflict” (Olsen et al. 2010, p. 11) initially focused on punishing perpetrators without much comprehensive concern for victims (Baker and Obradović-Wochnik 2016). Yet the realization of the past two decades that victims are important peace stakeholders with a set of rights changed these attitudes. Domestically, victims' roles have become closely tied to and representative of national identities and understandings of one's community and/or national past and future. At the international level, victims have become the primary object – and at the same time beneficiary – of humanitarian interventions, human rights, and as part of wider peacebuilding interventions in the 1990s. In cases such as Colombia, victims even became directly integrated in peace negotiations with a significant bearing on the overall design of the final 2014 peace settlement (Brett 2018; Sanchez and Rudling 2019; Theidon 2016). The Colombian case is also an apt example of a wider transformation of victims' roles into more inclusive and participatory peace actors.

I would like to thank Jasna Dragovic-Soso for her useful feedback and comments on the draft of this entry.

The change in victims' roles in post-conflict realities has also come with new evidence that bridging deep social ruptures and animosities between victimizers and victims is a critical step in overcoming the past and moving toward a shared peaceful future, especially in situations when previous perpetrators live side by side with victims – as is common in contemporary civil wars (Hozic 2014). This has led to wider enquiries into how to reconcile different groups emerging from wars with different grievances and traumas, how to transform previously violent relations into coexistence, and how to compensate those who suffered the most. More recent holistic approaches to transitional justice in particular lifted victims to prominence by including them meaningfully not only in processes of war-crimes prosecution, but also truth telling, reparations, redress, memorialization, and other elements of what is also referred to as “coming to terms with the past” (Dragović-Soso 2010). Yet the fundamental problem with bringing both peace and justice to war-torn societies through a more active victim engagement has been a potential antagonistic set of objectives of transitional justice and peacebuilding. As peace is conditioned upon stability, which victims' demands and memory-recovery efforts may undermine, the key dilemma has been how to include victims without increasing state fragility. This “justice vs. peace” dilemma (Sriram 2007) has focused on the question of whether “settling the accounts” rather than “drawing thick lines” works better in terms of securing physical and societal peace (Thoms et al. 2008; Vinjamuri and Snyder 2004). This tension is also at the heart of the roles of victims outlined below as they can act as pioneers of justice efforts on the one hand but also as destabilizing elements in fragile post-conflict situations.

How can we understand the various roles of victims in contemporary peacebuilding and post-conflict reconstruction, both domestically and internationally? As this entry shows, victims' roles have not only undergone several transformations, but they are rarely unequivocally peace-inducing or clearly destabilizing. More often than not, war victims – that is to say both deceased victims and survivors – represent important symbols of post-war reckoning but also painful reminders of the bygones that societies resist to remember. In parallel, they can act as important forces of positive and more inclusive change, especially in societies that are ready to face unpalatable pasts. This entry analyses the diverse meanings and roles of victims in peace against the latest discussions in transitional justice regarding their contributions to building sustainable and comprehensive peace as well as on endangering it. The focus here is on victims who emerge from conflicts and violence with a set of traumas, grievances, and memory burdens. While killed victims continue to be used as “proofs” of victimization (i. e., in terms of numbers and methods of killing), surviving victims are living testaments to previous pains and losses. At the same time, they are critical pieces of the peace and reconciliation puzzle. Their experiences, needs, and demands often shape communities' understandings of themselves and their future political orientations. This entry first defines the complex concept of the “victim,” before conceptualizing victims' roles in peace interventions both domestically and internationally. It specifically offers three key understandings of victims' roles – as national bearers of injustice, as universal moral beacons of suffering, and as active influencers of peace and justice policies.

Defining Victims for Peacebuilding

The term “victim” has religious and spiritual origins from the fifteenth century when it denoted sacrifice for a higher cause (Oxford English Dictionary). While the meaning subsequently changed to a person unjustifiably or excessively harmed or killed, the term has preserved its moral connotations and continues to carry a great symbolic energy. By the 1940s, victims became the subject of a new discipline of “victimology” (pertaining to sociology) and criminology in terms of national crime. The concern with human suffering expanded since then at the international level and peacebuilding, and today victims figure prominently in most fields of social sciences (Jacoby 2015, p. 514). However, despite this proliferation in studying victims from a multitude of perspectives (or potentially because of that), clear definitions of victims remain sporadic. Similar to other fields, in the context of transitional justice and peacebuilding, defining war victims is fraught with highly sensitive power dynamics and legal concerns (Feyter 2005; Goldblatt 2006; Kiza et al. 2006; Miers 1978; Wemmers 2014). Regarding victims of conflicts, wars, and state oppression, the basic distinction is made between surviving victims and killed victims who are generally perceived to be of civilian character (although in some conflicts soldiers were also denoted as victims, see below). Both killed victims and survivors suggest an existence of a crime but while the first one invokes the possibility of death, the other invokes life after the trauma as a “surviving victim.” In terms of who the “surviving victims” are, the starting point is legal definitions, anchored in international human rights law, which sets out the broad categorization of victims as:

[p]ersons who individually or collectively suffered harm, including physical or mental injury, emotional suffering, economic loss or substantial impairment of their fundamental rights, through acts or omissions that constitute gross violations of international human rights law, or serious violations of international humanitarian law. (UN General Assembly 2005b, pt. Article V)

They are thus victims of “gross violations of international human rights law, or serious violations of international humanitarian law,” which form a long lists of breaches such as torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment, summary and arbitrary executions, abductions, or arbitrary detentions, either in the context of war or mass scale oppression. Victims can be both direct (also referred to as primary victims) – i.e., those abused, detained, or persecuted (or killed) – and indirect (secondary) as family members of a direct victim, who experience psychological harm or even economic losses if the main family breadwinner was killed and his/her loss signifies fall into poverty and the like (Bloomfield et al. 2003, 54; and also Goldblatt 2006, 62). As some argue, while there may be situations of mass victimization when most of society may make claims to victimhood (Saeed 2016), victims and victimhood identities are often determined by contexts and scales of harm – i.e., while entire populations may be victimized by wars due to economic and security losses, some groups still suffer disproportionately.

The term “victim” is thus not universally accepted as a socio-legal category as it is deeply influenced by the context and nature of the harms. For example, feminist scholars stress that the term “survivor” is better suited for crimes of torture and sexual violence as it implies agency and defiance as opposed to the passive and suppressed connotations of the term “victim,” which “makes them [harmed individuals] appear ill and in need of treatment; impotent and in need of help” (Bloomfield et al. 2003, p. 60). As Huma Saeed noted in her reflections on victims and victimhood in Afghanistan, to her the term victim “connotes passivity, stripping people of the very agency that the human rights community considers central to bringing societal change” (2016, p. 170). Yet she also admits that most of her respondents referred to themselves as “victims” anyway. While preferences for the usage differ across communities and individuals, socioeconomic status of victims and types of victimization, international human rights regimes as well as domestic legislation generally adhere to the generic term “victim” for those disproportionately affected by violence and conflicts.

The survivor vs victim debate underlines the lack of a nuanced understanding of the different experiences of victimization in conflict. As Michael Rothberg recently noted (Rothberg 2019), we lack a precise vocabulary to describe the multifaceted roles and identities that individuals emerging from violence and wars assume. He introduced the term “implicated subjects” as those who might not have willingly participated and benefitted from injustice and violations but whose “actions and inactions help produce and reproduce the positions of victims and perpetrators” (Rothberg 2019, p. 1). His insights speak to the messy conflict situations when individuals assume different roles – some victims might have been directly involved in the conflict as soldiers while others had simply found themselves in the wrong place at the wrong time. In some cases the line between a victim and a perpetrator may be blurred as multiple roles are possible at different spaces and times (Drumbl 2012; Moffett 2016). The case of child soldiers or forcefully recruited fighters is indicative of the inherent definitional difficulties. Are they perpetrators or victims? Individual victims may also prefer to use different terminology for different audiences – they may privately resist the term victim but understand the need for its outward projection in order to be publicly acknowledged, especially in front of a court or state authorities (cf. Fernandes 2017; Močnik 2019).

Following from this, victimhood, i.e., the victim identity or status, may act as a social stigma for some individuals, while others may see it as the primary source of their identity, in particular if their victimhood is challenged, contested, or unrecognized (Schnabel and Tabyshalievna 2012). Individuals have also been frequently subject to multiple victimization (being a victim of many crimes or the repetition of the same one) or re-victimization such as social stigmatization or the denial of the existence of the crime committed (Bloomfield et al. 2003, p. 61), which makes their victimhood multiplied. To bear the “victim label” may thus be a double blessing – while it carries a baggage of essentialism and can be psychologically crippling, it can also be a defining source of identity and grounds for public recognition (Buckley-Zistel 2013, p. 96). Despite these nuances, for the purposes of this entry, the term “victim” is used to denote all people directly affected by war crimes and human rights violations, e.g., maimed and injured civilian survivors, survivors of sexual violence, survivors of torture and unlawful incarceration, families of the missing people and killed civilians, refugees and internally displaced people, and all civilians persecuted and killed during conflicts.

Epitomes of Suffering and National Identities

Victims’ suffering outlined above has started to play an important role in national myth-making and imaginings since the rise of modern nationalism in the nineteenth century (Clarke 2019, p. 36). Yet until the twentieth century, it was the hero, the soldier, and the general that was glorified, commemorated, and mourned, argues the British historian Philip Towle in his genealogy of victimhood (Towle 2018). The personal sacrifices of soldiers during wars featured prominently in national identity creations. A case in point is the World War I commemorations across the world that have primarily focused on fallen soldiers and their portrayals as young and innocent victims of the total war machine – symbolically represented in cenotaphs of unknown soldiers – rather than on civilian victims suffering (see Mosse 1991, Chapter 3). It was the mass civilian suffering of World War II in particular, combined with a proliferation of mass media, and the subsequent advent of the “humanitarian paradigm of human rights” in the 1970s (Moyn 2014, p. 110) that shifted the attention to victimization and suffering of noncombatants too, leading to what Towle sees as the origins of today’s “Age of Victimhood.” Victimhood – as victims’ social identities and constructions – has thus only gradually become an important aspect of domestic politics in post-conflict (but also post-authoritarian) societies. National as well as individual victimization has proven extremely effective to unite people, denigrate other nations or individuals, legitimize governments, and justify new policies and political choices.

It was long after World War II that victimhood identities have become closely linked to ethnic, national, or religious identities as religious and ethnic (i.e., Jewishness, Slavic background, etc.) determined one's victimization. Subsequently, especially in more authoritarian societies where singular versions of history are promoted and/or imposed, the willingness of domestic actors to recognize victims and engage them in peace processes has been related to how their victimization corresponds with their political hegemonic narratives of the past and future (Arthur 2011; Barton-Hronešová 2020). This has often resulted in misuses of victims' experiences for political objectives and silencing other victims who could undermine such hegemonies (Meyers 2016, Chapter 5). For example, legitimate Jewish suffering has been clearly used as a political justification for the oppression of Palestinians by the state of Israel. Another good example provides Paul Kagame's regime in Rwanda, which has refused to recognize the victimhood of Hutus killed by his Rwandan Patriotic Front. Their memory is suppressed and only the hegemonic suffering of Tutsi victims is allowed in public manifestations of mourning and memorialization (Ibreck 2012). The resulting victims' roles in peace can thus be passively politicized – i.e., victims are used as objects of politics.

On the more positive side of the spectrum, victims can fulfill important symbolic public functions related to more nuanced interpretations of the past and collective memories. Origins of victims' mnemonic function again date back to the Jewish (and East European) experience of Holocaust; however, the memory of such experience initially did not reach the wider public. An emergence of a more prominent public memory of the Holocaust and its manifestation in popular culture only came in the late 1970s and early 1980s (Bloxham 2001; cf. Moyn 2014, p. 110). Victims' accounts (and those of their children) through books, documentaries, films, and art subsequently became an important aspect of human remembering of the past. Yet victims' storytelling roles have proliferated especially since the emergence of a new tool of transitional justice – truth commissions in the 1990s – most notably with the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission. This has led to a more meaningful and sensitive inclusion of victims into the process of reckoning that differed from court testimonies discussed next. Unlike tribunals for war crimes prosecutions that expanded in the 1990s as well as the international level, truth commissions have been designed by national authorities as more flexible and victim-centric mechanisms that provide victims with the space to narrate their stories as they remember them, without the impenetrable legal jargon of criminal trials and the painful – and in some cases humiliating – process of cross-examination, which often leads to negative victim experiences and retraumatization (Hayner 2001, 2006). Victims have for the first time assumed an absolutely superior and central role. They have acted as chroniclers of the past and educated nations about their experiences.

While in some cases, recounting past memories has created additional conflicts and tensions (see Payne 2007), in others, truth commissions have had important peace-inducing consequences in terms of society coming to terms with histories of multifaceted conflicts. In Peru, the underappreciated victimization of the Quechua came to the spotlight after the over 15,000 victim testimonies and data-gathering efforts through the 2001–03 Truth and Reconciliation Commission (Laplante and Theidon 2007; de Waardt 2013). The scale of Quechua victimhood (who formed over three quarters of all victims) changed the historical record of the previous conflict and had an impact on newly enacted social policies (Hayner 2001, p. 37). The conflict suddenly came to be understood in a different light – as a conflict that disproportionately affected the poor in rural areas. While some sections of the Peruvian society refused to accept this and discrimination prevailed, the historical account has changed. Victims thus have the potential to act as epitomes of the scale of a wider societal suffering or oppression and they also have the ability to denigrate a past regime or enemy. Another example provides the victimhood identity or the Opfermythos (victim myth) of German victims of the Nazi regime who “became constitutive of the formation of citizenship and belonging in the post-World War II Bundesrepublik" (Jensen and Ronsbo 2014, p. 5). In other words, the new German democracy needed victims of their own to prove their own legitimacy to function as a democratic state. (A related phenomenon can be observed in the discussion about Austria's collective victimhood identity, i.e., its national claims to have been the first victim of Adolf Hitler's regime, rather than a puppet Nazi state of the likes of Slovakia and Croatia.)

In contexts with divided interpretations of the past, victims can also become convenient coalition partners for new political regimes. While this may have unifying effects on national identifications of titular nations as outlined in the German case and as many other European cases after World War II seem to suggest, more often than not, victimhood politics destabilizes and endangers peace (see also Druliolle and Brett 2018, p. 9). In divided Bosnia, different victim groups have acted as "memory guardians" (Jouhanneau 2013) as they defended their own narratives of the past, determined by their own experience, memory, and identities – often in direct contradiction to and denial of victims from the "other" side. The new Bosniak (Muslim) identity has been largely established on the basis of the war-time victimization of Bosnian Muslims who had been targeted solely for their religion and identity. The Bosniak "victim identity" has become an important unifying component of the newly reinvented Bosniak identity while at the same time antagonizing Bosnian Serbs and Croats, as well as liberal Bosnians (Bougarel 2009; Hronešová 2012).

Similarly, in Northern Ireland, the "meta-conflict" over the past (McGarry and O'Leary 1993) resulted in various political coalitions and the public portrayal of victims as epitomes of one group's greater suffering over others (see also Jankowitz 2018a). As local definitions of who is a victim predetermines social rights and recognition of "true" and "real" victimhood (de Waard 2018, 135), it has been common to see various domestic manifestations of the so-called "competition of victimhood" (see Chaumont 2000) when different victim groups compete over the extent of victimization, hierarchies of victimhood, and public worthiness. While material benefits might be important to some victim groups – especially those who live in poverty – for others the objective is wider societal recognition and a greater stake in the peace process (Breen-Smyth 2018; Hronešová 2018). This can result to domestic disputes about falsifications of one's victimhood and ideas of "non-genuine" (Ballinger 2003, p. 135), "guilty," or "bad" (Moffett 2016) victims as those who could be thought of as being part of the causes of their victimization. These various domestic roles also underline some aspects of how victim groups can compete with each other for recognition, resources, and remedies, acting as domestic pressure or interest groups (see also Jankowitz 2018b). On the case of Afghanistan, Saeed recorded how victims fought over who was "more victim" as to them "each had suffered a greater harm" (Saeed 2016, p. 172). Similar findings resulted from programs in Bosnia, Peru, Nepal, and Chile where only selected groups of victims were offered redress (see Robins 2012; Sajjad 2015). The ultimate result of such victimhood contestations is the creation of victim hierarchies, polarization, and tensions, which in divided societies in particular clearly jeopardizes peace and societal reckoning.

Witnesses of Crimes and Universal Moral Beacons

Yet it is the international understanding of victims' roles that has changed most dramatically in the past century. It was especially the new regime of human rights in the late 1970s and later humanitarian intervention of the 1990s that placed victims as important beneficiaries of international criminal justice measures, which were aimed at reconciliation and thus peace (Bonacker and Buckley-Zistel 2013; Strassner 2013). However, victims were initially treated as secondary to legal and forensics processes and integrated only as auxiliary providers of information regarding the circumstances of their victimization, i.e., the original act of harm, in order to make a legal case to prosecute perpetrators. In the aftermath of World War II, not even victims of the Holocaust were given the platform to speak openly about their suffering in the court in the immediate post-war years. Their testimonies were excluded from the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials. This was not only because Holocaust was not the central crime under review in Nuremberg (crimes against peace dominated, see United Nations 1945, Art. 6) but also because of the worry that victims would misremember and weaken the prosecutorial evidence base (Wilke 2011). Victims' testimonies – as Hannah Arendt famously argued – are indeed fraught with misremembering and lack of detail necessary for the legal-forensic process to establish any resolution and impose punishment (Wilson and Brown 2009, p. 22). It was only at the Adolf Eichmann trial in 1961 that first witnesses were invited to testify, depicting the extent of the brutality, and inhumanity of the Nazi regime and the Holocaust (Loren and Metelmann 2016). It was indeed this trial that ushered in what some called the “era of the witness” and introduced a new role of victims in post-war orders (Annette Wieviorka's term cited in Clarke 2019, p. 2). Yet – like in all criminal trials – it remained to be the perpetrator as the potential peace spoiler that remained in the focus rather than the “harmed party,” i.e., the victim.

The secondary consideration for victims has been the result of the misconstrued understanding of victims as passive beneficiaries (or sufferers) in humanitarianism rather than important stakeholders in peace. There has been an instrumental attitude towards their roles on the part of external actors and domestic policymakers before the 1990s in particular (Humphrey 2003a; Jankowitz 2018a; Rauschenbach and Scalia 2008). Victims continued to be portrayed as innocent and helpless injured parties of a civilian character, which needed to be assisted and guided through the post-war process of societal rebuilding (see Shaw 2010). This rather demeaning approach to victims has been underpinned by simplistic understandings of victimhood and victims' roles in post-war contexts. The general assumptions around victims have been based on their unequivocal moral righteousness and their undisputable need for assistance (see especially Bouris 2007; Breen-Smyth 2018; Lawther 2015). The consequence has been a skewed approach to their agency. Meyers called the dominant paradigm around victims (especially Holocaust victims) as the “pathetic victim,” i.e., a victim that is innocent of any wrongdoing, helpless, and subjected to unspeakable suffering (Meyers 2016, p. 32). She noted that with most victims of mass human rights violations, it has often seemed as if victimization and agency were “incompatible categories” (Meyers 2016, p. 34). However, this has not only led to moral judgments about victims who have taken a more public and open stance about their suffering (as explained below), but it has also induced idealizations of victims' interpretations of truth and their contributions to societal peace. This is especially true for female victims and children who have been portrayed as pure, ideal, “perfect,” or “clean-hand victims” (Méndez 2016, p. 2) due to their perceived limited responsibility for violence.

This imaginary of moral innocence often prevails after wars when victims are presented as “moral beacons” (Bouris 2007; Breen-Smyth 2018; Brewer et al. 2014). While this has had negative consequences on the local dynamics of social hierarchies and the politics of victimhood, i.e., who is the “true” victim and who suffered more (Druliolle and Brett 2018; Barton-Hronešová 2020), the moral universality of victims mobilized the wider international community to humanitarian interventions and more vigorous peacebuilding engagement by the 1990s. With the proliferation of human rights, advocacy groups and NGOs focusing on reconciliation and peace, victims and their redress became a more important topic. The 1984 Convention against Torture and other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (OHCHR 1984) and the 1985 Declaration of Basic Principles of Justice for Victims of Crime and Abuse of Power (UN General Assembly 1985) were some of the first documents that opened a worldwide debate about the rights of victims. The subsequent UN “Agenda for Peace” in 1992 has recognized the need for the inclusion of victims' rights and needs.

Soon thereafter, the purpose of war victims as witnesses was reinvented in the emergence of new war crime tribunals for the former Yugoslavia in 1993 and Rwanda in 1994. Giving victims platform to face their victimizers and providing evidence was thought to serve a wider societal reckoning – a deeply controversial objective that has later been proven unjustified (Clark 2014; Humphrey 2003b; Nettelfield 2010). Most importantly, victims as beneficiaries of justice and peace were later firmly anchored in the establishment of the permanent International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague through the 1998 Rome Statute where victims were specifically mentioned as key actors and beneficiaries of the new tribunal, whose ultimate objective was not only global justice but also peace (International Criminal Court 2011). The ICC not only provided victims with a key place in terms of providing testimonies but also established a new victims' compensation fund. Although the creation of such courts was justified as fulfilling a global "moral duty" by delivering justice to victims (Orentlicher 1991), within their procedures, the victim maintained its principal role as a supplier of evidence. Yet as evidence from not only the former Yugoslavia but also Rwanda suggests (Stover and Weinstein 2004), the repetition of accusations and painful stories has often driven deeper rifts into fragile communities and rarely directly led to societal peace, as predicted in the "peace vs. justice" dilemma.

However, the notion emerged that victims are an important stakeholder in human security and need to be protected. The norm of Responsibility to Protect (RtP) developed alongside the legal developments in transitional justice in the late 1990s as a reaction to the failures in the former Yugoslavia, Somalia, and Rwanda. The 2005 World Summit of the UN adopted RtP as a principle that fundamentally challenged state sovereignty in order to prevent any potential victimization of nationals. It obliged states to protect their citizens from harm and wars, and declared a global responsibility on the side of the international community to use any diplomatic, humanitarian, and other means to protect citizens and potential victims of their own states (UN General Assembly 2005a). Subsequently, this shift has been reflected in the international human rights arena where citizens and victims became key beneficiaries of the Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation of the United Nations in 2005 (UN General Assembly 2005b). This document anchored victims' rights for wide-ranging reparations as part of responsibilities of states toward their citizens and identified the need for a victim-oriented perspective in post-war justice and peacebuilding. This was part of a wider global transformation in concerns for victims (as the next section documents).

Active Influencers of Justice and Peace

With the growing evidence that legal justice rarely leads to peace and victims' satisfaction and domestic authorities are ill-suited to support victims on their own, the focus of domestic and international peace actors has shifted into the realm of restorative justice that focuses on victims as the prime beneficiary through truth recovery, reparations, memorialization, social care, and various other victim-centric types of redress (Shaw et al. 2010). As Trudy Govier noted, "the aims of restorative justice regarding victims are to give them a larger role, meet their need for information, allow them to be heard, and assist them in getting back the independence and power that the crime may have been taken away from them" (Govier 2015, p. 16). The recent approaches and what some call the "victims turn" (García-Godos 2013) since the mid-2000s have emphasized the need for localized and integrative approaches to justice, peace, and truth-seeking (Mac Ginty 2010; Sharp 2014; Paffenholz 2015). The emphasis on local, grassroots, and hybrid approaches to peace and redress that adopt more deliberative processes has inspired a stronger focus on victims' needs outside of the courtroom or truth commissions. This has provided victims with a framework within which to assume a more active role in post-conflict processes.

The peacebuilding and transitional justice practice have gradually demonstrated that victims can become active shapers of policies that have an impact on peace outcomes such as social welfare, reparations, amnesties, and lustrations, among others. Through their victim associations, victims have started to function as important pressure and interest groups with direct involvement in politics and policies (Barton-Hronešová 2020; Clarke 2019; Rombouts 2004). In many cases, rather than competing over definitions of who is the “true victim,” they have unified in coalitions to jointly pressure domestic authorities and international peacebuilders to consider their propositions and needs. Such needs have ranged from public recognition and educational reforms to social welfare. Most notably in the Colombian peace process, victim delegations took part in the Havana talks in 2014–15. Their contributions to the design and long-term sustainability of the negotiated peace process were significant. According to Brett (2018), victims assumed the role of active peacebuilders with important consequences for the legitimacy and transparency of the entire process. Their inclusion in the discussions also made the victim delegates appreciate the compromised nature of any peace. In order to appease the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), i.e., one of the main victimizers, and establish long-term peace, certain amnesty provisions had to be made. The invited victims drew a red line at the most egregious human rights violations and crimes and insisted on prosecutions. At the same time, they were behind the details of the proposed Victims’ Law, which included a series of transitional justice and reconciliation mechanisms. Most of their suggestions were accepted in the deliberative peace process. As Brett argues, their inclusion led to a “rehumanization” of both perpetrators and victims, ultimately allowing for a more peaceful outcome in the long run (Brett 2018, p. 297).

Such developments did not happen overnight. Instead, they were affected by the previous global advocacy work of organizations supporting victims and local charities, and the gradual realization that war victims have a significant bearing on how societies come together after violence. In reality, victims as collective agents gathered in associations are often able to effect change via domestic or transnational advocacy efforts (Gready 2004; Keck and Sikkink 1998; Risse et al. 1999). Some previous mobilization work in Latin America bore witness that victims’ voices can be effective in changing public attitudes to victimhood and corresponding policies. The resonant campaigns of the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo focused on information and truth about the disappearance of their children in Argentina, leading to some path-breaking developments not only in domestic approaches to reconciliation but also forensic investigations (Abreu Hernandez 2002). Similarly, in the Balkans, vigorous efforts of the mainly female survivors of Srebrenica in Bosnia resulted in the creation of the International Commission for the Missing Persons (ICMP) in 1996. ICMP has since become a critical contributing factor to appeasing victims by finding and identifying primary victims’ bodies in over 40 war-torn countries such as Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, Cameroon, Namibia, and Kosovo (Wagner and Kešetović 2016).

Yet similar to domestic political engagements, victims’ mobilization has the potential to undermine post-war peace in fragile situations. As peacebuilding is still primarily concerned with stability and physical security, considerations for appeasing victims have gradually come to the forefront of peacebuilding. Similar to veterans, who have long been considered as potential key spoilers of peace (and thus groups to pacify), victims have become important war-generated collective groups to consider and integrate in peacebuilding processes. As women generally form the majority of surviving victims, female victims in particular have entered the peacebuilding agenda in a much more prominent fashion than previously. Since the path-breaking 2000 UN Resolution 1325 “Women, Peace, and Security” (UN Security Council 2000), seven additional UN resolutions (1820 in 2009, 1888 in 2009, 1889 in 2010, 1960 in 2011, 2106 in 2013, 2122 in 2013, 2242 in 2015, 2467 in 2019, and 2493 in 2019) were adopted, and a specialized office for women only (UN Women) was created by the UN in 2010. This demonstrated the realization that if left unaddressed, victims grievances can pose serious peace challenges, and that as women tend to be disproportionately targeted in wars, they need to be directly included in peacebuilding processes (McLeod 2019).

Local organizations responded to these developments. From Bosnia to Iraq, new victim associations for victims were set up, demanding a variety of transitional justice tools, a clear say in the peace order, and global developments vis-à-vis victims. For example, in Iraq, the diaspora organization Yazda of the persecuted Yazidi community has actively shaped global approaches to war-time sexual violence. One of the survivors Nadia Murad won the Nobel Peace Prize in 2018 for her campaigns to protect victims of rape (BBC 2018). Meyers calls victims such as Murad as “heroic” as they individually stand out and speak on behalf of the wider community of victims with a potential to change victim-centric attitudes and policies (Meyers 2016, p. 36). Such active engagements finally put victims on par with other advocacy groups and as important voices and stakeholders in peacebuilding. While the process of asserting their roles has been troubled, tortuous, and is still finding its ground, it is clear that victims are currently one of the key stakeholders of peacebuilding and conflict management. Their rights and their needs are not only anchored in international law but are vigorously supported by the media and popular culture around the world. Indeed, contemporary peacebuilding is no longer about security and institutions only, it is also about a meaningful integration of key stakeholders, among which victims unequivocally belong.

Summary

The three key roles of victims outlined in this contribution are only the beginning of the currently changing and increasingly more prominent roles of victims in peacebuilding. Victims – i.e., surviving individuals of war crimes and violence as well as those killed – were initially included in post-war reconstruction processes as an afterthought. They were generally perceived through the lens of trauma and passivity instead of empowerment and agency. Their initial key roles were reduced to provisions of information (whereabouts and names of potential perpetrators, recognition of perpetrators on the witness stand, etc.)

and later as collective symbols of wider societal or national suffering. It is only with the rise of individual and collective human rights and transitional justice’s turn toward more restorative approaches to justice negotiations that victims have assumed a much more prominent role in post-war orders. They have become important bearers of not only national collective memories but also active policy influences through their mobilization activities and advocacy campaigns. From Colombia to Iraq, victims have become important interlocutors to peacebuilders such as the UN and global charities and key public opinion shapers. While some of their new roles and activities have been clearly peace-inducing and contributed to wider future societal reckoning, others have especially in the short-run increased fragility, leading to polarization, tensions, and creations of victimhood hierarchies.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)
- ▶ Youth and Peacebuilding

References

- Abreu Hernandez, V. M. (2002). The mothers of La Plaza de Mayo: A peace movement. Peace & Change, 27(3), 385–411.
- Arthur, P. (2011). Identities in transition: Challenges for transitional justice in divided societies. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.
- Baker, C., & Obradović-Wochnik, J. (2016). Mapping the nexus of transitional justice and peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 281–301.
- Ballinger, P. (2003). History in exile: Memory and identity at the borders of the Balkans. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- Barton-Hronešová, J. (2020). The struggle for redress: Victim capital in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- BBC. (2018, October 5). Nobel Peace Prize winner Nadia Murad. BBC News. <https://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-45759669>
- Bloomfield, D., Barnes, T., & Huysse, L. (2003). Reconciliation after violent conflict: A handbook. Stockholm: International Idea.
- Bloxham, D. (2001). Genocide on trial. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bonacker, T., & Buckley-Zistel, S. (2013). Introduction: Transitions from violence. Analysing the effects of transitional justice. International Journal of Conflict and Violence (IJCV), 7, 4–9. T.M.C. Asser Press.
- Bougarel, X. (2009). Od “Muslimana” do “Bošnjaka”: Pitanje nacionalnog imena bosanskih Muslimana. In H. Kamberović (Ed.), Rasprave o nacionalnom identitetu Bošnjaka: Zbornik radova (pp. 117–136). Sarajevo: Institut za historiju.
- Bouris, E. (2007). Complex political victims. Bloomfield: Kumarian Press. <http://www.loc.gov/catdir/toc/ecip072/2006032244.html>.
- Breen-Smyth, M. (2018). The uses of suffering: Victims as moral beacons or icons of grievance. In V. Druliolle & R. L. Brett (Eds.), The politics of victimhood in post-conflict societies: Comparative and analytical perspectives (pp. 211–236). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brett, R. L. (2018). The role of the victims’ delegations in the Santons-FARC peace talks. In V. Druliolle & R. L. Brett (Eds.), The politics of victimhood in post-conflict societies: Comparative and analytical perspectives (pp. 267–299). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brewer, J. D., Hayes, B. C., Dudgeon, K., Mueller-Hirth, N., Teeney, F., & Wijesinghe, S.-L. (2014). Victims as moral beacons of humanitarianism in post-conflict societies. International Social Science Journal, 65 (215–216), 37–47.
- Buckley-Zistel, S. (2013). Redressing sexual violence in transitional justice and the labelling of women as “victims”. In T. Bonacker & C. Safferling (Eds.), Victims of international crimes: An interdisciplinary discourse (pp. 91–100). The Hague: T. M. C. Asser Press. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-90-6704-912-2_6.
- Chaumont, J.-M. (2000). Du culte des héros à la concurrence des victimes [From the cult of heroes to the competition of victims]. Criminologie, 33(1), 167–183.
- Clark, J. N. (2014). International trials and reconciliation: Assessing the impact of the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Clarke, D. (2019). Constructions of victimhood: Remembering the victims of state socialism in Germany. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- de Waardt, M. (2013). Are Peruvian victims being mocked?: Politicization of victimhood and victims’ motivations for reparations. Human Rights Quarterly, 35(4), 830–849. <https://doi.org/10.1353/hrq.2013.0066>.
- de Waardt, M. (2018). The Politics of Victimhood at the Grassroots Level: Inclusion and Exclusion Among Peruvian Victim Organisations. In V. Druliolle & R. L. Brett (Eds.), The politics of victimhood in post-conflict societies: comparative and analytical perspectives (pp. 133–158). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Dragović-Soso, J. (2010). Conflict, memory, accountability: What does coming to terms with the past mean? In W. Petritsch & V. Džihčić (Eds.), Conflict and memory: Bridging past and future in (South East) Europe (pp. 29–46). Baden-Baden: Nomos.
- Druliolle, V., & Brett, R. L. (2018). The politics of victimhood in post-conflict societies: Comparative and analytical perspectives. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Drumbl, M. A. (2012). Reimagining child soldiers in international law and policy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Enloe, C. (2004). The curious feminist: searching for women in a new age of empire. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Fernandes, S. (2017). Curated stories: The uses and misuses of storytelling. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Feyer, K. (2005). Out of the ashes: Reparation for victims of gross and systematic human rights violations. Antwerp: Intersentia.
- García-Godos, J. (2013). Victims’ rights and distributive justice: In search of actors. Human Rights Review, 14 (3), 241–255.
- Goldblatt, B. (2006). Evaluating the gender content of reparations: Lessons from South Africa. In R. Rubio-Marin (Ed.), What happened to the women?: Gender and reparations for human rights violations (International Center for Transitional Justice) (pp. 48–91). New York: SSRC.
- Govier, T. (2015). Victims and victimhood. Peterborough: Broadview Press.
- Gready, P. (2004). Conceptualising globalisation and human rights: Boomerangs and borders. The International Journal of Human Rights, 8(3), 345–354.
- Hayner, P. B. (2001). Unspeakable truths: Transitional justice and the challenge of truth commissions. London: Taylor & Francis.
- Hayner, P. B. (2006). Truth commissions: A schematic overview. International Review of the Red Cross, 88 (862), 295–310.
- Hozic, A. (2014). The origins of “post-conflict”. In C. Gagnon & K. Brown (Eds.), Post-Conflict Studies: An Interdisciplinary Approach (pp. 19–38). Abingdon; New York: Routledge.
- Hronešová, J. (2012). Everyday ethno-national identities of young people in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Prager Schriften zur Zeitgeschichte und zum Zeitgeschehen). New York: Peter Lang.
- Hronešová, J. (2018). Explaining compensation in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina: The case of victims of torture and sexual violence. In V. Druliolle & R. L. Brett (Eds.), The politics of victimhood in post-conflict societies: Comparative and analytical perspectives (pp. 161–186). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Humphrey, M. (2003a). From victim to victimhood: Truth commissions and trials as rituals of political transition - and individual healing. The Australian Journal of Anthropology, 14(2), 171–187.

- Humphrey, M. (2003b). International intervention, justice and national reconciliation: The role of the ICTY and ICTR in Bosnia and Rwanda. Journal of Human Rights, 2(4), 495–505.
- Ibreck, R. (2012). A time of mourning: Commemorating the Tutsi genocide in Rwanda. In P. Lee & P. N. Thomas (Eds.), Public memory, public media and the politics of justice (pp. 98–120). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- International Criminal Court. (2011). Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (A/CONF.183/9), 17 July 1998. <https://www.icc-cpi.int/NR/rdonlyres/ADD16852-AEE9-4757-ABE7-9CDC7CF02886/283503/RomeStatutEng1.pdf>.
- Jacoby, T. A. (2015). A theory of victimhood: Politics, conflict and the construction of victim-based identity. Millennium, 43(2), 511–530.
- Jankowitz, S. (2018a). Order of victimhood: Violence, hierarchy and building peace in Northern Ireland. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jankowitz, S. (2018b). The ‘hierarchy of victims’ in Northern Ireland: A framework for critical analysis. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 12(2), 216–236. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ijtj/ijy003>.
- Jensen, S., & Ronsbo, H. (2014). Introduction. Histories of victimhood: Assemblages, transactions, and figures. In S. Jensen & H. Ronsbo (Eds.), Histories of victimhood (pp. 1–22). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Jouhanneau, C. (2013). La résistance des témoins: Mémoires de guerre, nationalisme et vie quotidienne en Bosnie-Herzégovine (1992–2010) [The resistance of the witnesses. War memories, nationalism and everyday life in BiH]. CERISciences Po, Paris.
- Keck, M. E., & Sikkink, K. (1998). Activists beyond borders: Advocacy networks in international politics. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Kiza, E., Rathgeber, C., & Rohne, H.-C. (2006). Victims of war: An empirical study on war-victimization and victims’ attitudes towards addressing atrocities. Hamburg: HIS.
- Laplante, L. J., & Theidon, K. S. (2007). Truth with consequences: Justice and reparations in post-truth commission Peru. Human Rights Quarterly, 29(1), 228–250.
- Lawther, C. (2015). The construction and politicization of victimhood. In O. Lynch & J. Argomaniz (Eds.), Victims of terrorism: A comparative and interdisciplinary study (pp. 10–30). London: Routledge.
- Loren, S., & Metelmann, J. (Eds.). (2016). Melodrama after the tears: New perspectives on the politics of victimhood. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41(4), 391–412.
- McGarry, J., & O’Leary, B. (1993). The politics of ethnic conflict regulation: Case studies of protracted ethnic conflicts. London: Routledge.
- McLeod, L. (2019). Investigating “missing” women: Gender, ghosts, and the Bosnian peace process. International Studies Quarterly, 63(3), 668–679. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isq/sqz027>.
- Méndez, J. E. (2016). Victims as protagonists in transitional justice. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(1), 1–5.
- Meyers, D. T. (2016). Victims’ stories and the advancement of human rights. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Miers, D. (1978). Responses to victimisation: A comparative study of compensation for criminal violence in Great Britain and Ontario. Abingdon: McGraw-Hill Professional Publishing.
- Močnik, N. (2019). Collective victimhood of individual survivors: Reflecting the uses and impacts of two academic narratives two decades after the war-rapes in Bosnia-Herzegovina. East European Politics, 35(4), 457–473. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21599165.2019.1676739>.
- Moffett, L. (2016). Reparations for ‘guilty victims’: Navigating complex identities of victim-perpetrators in reparation mechanisms. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(1), 146–167.
- Mosse, G. L. (1991). Fallen soldiers: Reshaping the memory of the world wars. New York and Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Moyn, S. (2014). Human rights and the uses of history. London: Verso.
- Nettelfield, L. J. (2010). Courting democracy in Bosnia and Herzegovina: The Hague tribunal’s impact in a postwar state. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- OHCHR. (1984). General assembly resolution 39/46: Convention against torture and other cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. United Nations. <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CAT.aspx>.
- Olsen, T. D., Payne, L. A., & Reiter, A. (2010). Transitional justice in balance: Comparing processes, weighing efficacy. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace.
- Orentlicher, D. F. (1991). Settling accounts: the duty to prosecute human rights violations of a prior regime. Yale Law Journal, 100(8), 2537–2615.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029908>.
- Payne, L. A. (2007). Unsettling accounts: Neither truth nor reconciliation in confessions of state violence. Durham and London: Duke University Press.
- Rauschenbach, M., & Scalia, D. (2008). Victims and international criminal justice: A vexed question? International Review of the Red Cross, 90(870), 441–459. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S1816383108000398>.
- Risse, T., Ropp, S. C., & Sikkink, K. (1999). The power of human rights: International norms and domestic change. New York: Cambridge University Press.

- Robins, S. (2012). Transitional justice as an elite discourse: Human rights practice where the global meets the local in post-conflict Nepal. Critical Asian Studies, 44(1), 3–30.
- Rombouts, H. (2004). Victim organisations and the politics of reparation: A case-study on Rwanda. Antwerp/Oxford: Intersentia.
- Rothberg, M. (2019). The implicated subject: Beyond victims and perpetrators. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Saeed, H. (2016). Victims and victimhood: Individuals of inaction or active agents of change? Reflections on fieldwork in Afghanistan. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(1), 168–178.
- Sajjad, T. (2015). Heavy hands, helping hands, holding hands: The politics of exclusion in victims' networks in Nepal. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(1), 25–45.
- Sanchez, N. C., & Rudling, A. (2019). Reparations in Colombia: Where to? Mapping the Colombian Landscape of Reparations for Victims of the Internal Armed Conflict [Policy Paper]. Queen's University Belfast. <https://reparations.qub.ac.uk/assets/uploads/ColombiaReparationsPolicyReportFORAPPROVAL-SP-HR-NoCrops.pdf>.
- Schnabel, A., & Tabyshalieva, A. (2012). Defying victimhood: Women and post-conflict peacebuilding. Tokyo, JPN: UNUP.
- Sharp, D. N. (2014). Introduction: Addressing economic violence in times of transition. In Justice and economic violence in transition (pp. 1–26). New York: Springer.
- Shaw, R. (2010). Linking justice with re-integration. In R. Shaw, L. Waldorf, & P. Hazan (Eds.), Localizing transitional justice: Interventions and priorities after mass violence (pp. 111–134). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Shaw, R., Waldorf, L., & Hazan, P. (2010). Localizing transitional justice: Interventions and priorities after mass violence. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Sriram, C. L. (2007). Justice as peace? Liberal peacebuilding and strategies of transitional justice. Global Society, 21(4), 579–591.
- Stover, E., & Weinstein, H. M. (2004). My neighbor, my enemy: Justice and community in the aftermath of mass atrocity. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Strassner, V. (2013). From victimhood to political protagonism: Victim groups and associations in the process of dealing with a violent past. In T. Bonacker & C. Safferling (Eds.), Victims of international crimes: An interdisciplinary discourse (pp. 331–344). T. M. C. Asser Press. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-90-6704-912-2_20.
- Theidon, K. (2016). Peace in Colombia: A time to believe? Current History, 115(778), 51–56.
- Thoms, O. N. T., Ron, J., & Paris, R. (2008). The effects of transitional justice mechanisms: A summary of empirical research findings and implications for analysts and practitioners (pp. 329–354). Ottawa: Centre for International Policy Studies.
- Towle, P. (2018). History, empathy and conflict: Heroes, victims and victimisers. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- UN General Assembly. (1985). Declaration of basic principles of justice for victims of crime and abuse of power (A/RES/40/34). United Nations. <http://www.un.org/documents/ga/res/40/a40r034.htm>.
- UN General Assembly. (2005a). 2005 world summit outcome (A/RES/60/1). United Nations. <https://documents-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N05/487/60/pdf/N0548760.pdf?OpenElement>.
- UN General Assembly. (2005b). Basic principles and guidelines on the right to a remedy and reparation for victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law (A/RES/60/147). UN. <https://goo.gl/UosgNT>.
- UN Security Council. (2000). UN SC resolution 1325: Women, peace, and security. <https://goo.gl/rXxDES>.
- United Nations. (1945). Charter of the International Military Tribunal—Annex to the Agreement for the prosecution and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis. UN. https://www.un.org/en/genocideprevention/documents/atrocity-crimes/Doc_2_Charter%20of%20IMT%201945.pdf.
- Vinjamuri, L., & Snyder, J. (2004). Advocacy and scholarship in the study of international war crime tribunals and transitional justice. Annual Review of Political Science, 7, 345–362.
- Wagner, S. E., & Kešetović, R. (2016). Absent bodies, absent knowledge: The forensic work of identifying Srebrenica's missing and the social experiences of families. In D. Congram (Ed.), Missing persons: Multidisciplinary perspectives on the disappeared (pp. 42–73). Toronto: Canadian Scholars' Press.
- Wemmers, J.-A. M. (2014). Restoring justice for victims of crimes against humanity. In J.-A. M. Wemmers (Ed.), Reparation for victims of crimes against humanity: The healing role of reparation (pp. 38–50). New York: Routledge.
- Wilke, C. (2011). Staging violence, staging identities: Identity politics in domestic prosecutions. In P. Arthur (Ed.), Identities in transition: Challenges for transitional justice in divided societies (pp. 118–148). Cambridge University Press. <http://www.loc.gov/catdir/enhancements/fy1011/2010031508-t.html>.
- Wilson, R. A., & Brown, R. D. (2009). Humanitarianism and suffering: The mobilization of empathy. New York: Cambridge University Press.

Rule of Law

► Police Reform and Peacebuilding

Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations

Conor Foley
Pontificia Universidade Católica, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Definition

This chapter provides an overview of the integration of rule of law programming into UN peacekeeping operations, a process that has evolved considerably in the last two decades as UN missions have taken on increasingly sovereignty intrusive tasks such as the protection of civilians.

Introduction

The UN has long supported programs designed to strengthen the rule of law in countries susceptible to or recovering from violent conflict. The question of what exactly is meant by rule of law and where it fits into modern Peace Operations is more complicated, though, and has evolved considerably at a both practical and analytical level.

UN rule of law programming in mission settings has expanded considerably in recent years to address previously neglected areas. It has also sought to move beyond responding to the immediate, operational risks facing UN Peace Operations to tackling underlying causes of conflicts and strengthening conflict prevention.

This process has been largely driven by the experiences of the UN's own field operations. There is little contemporary academic literature analyzing these developments, which can mainly be found in the "grey literature" of mission reports, evaluations, and lesson-learned documents. Given the high turnover of mission staff in UN Peace Operations and other humanitarian emergencies, institutional memory is often weak, and there is a need to discuss and disseminate these developments more widely. This chapter will trace the origins of rule of law programming within the history of UN Peace Operations, describe its current structure, and highlight some of the challenges that it is likely to face for the future.

Defining the Rule of Law

The rule of law is defined in the World Justice Project Rule of Law Index 2019 as consisting of a framework of laws and institutions that embodies four universal principles: accountability, just laws, open government, and accessible and impartial dispute resolution (World Justice Project 2019). This updates and simplifies a definition from a UN Secretary-General's 2004 report (UN Doc. S/2004/616, 3 August 2004) that it:

refers to a principle of governance in which all persons, institutions and entities, public and private, including the State itself, are accountable to laws that are publicly promulgated, equally enforced and independently adjudicated and which are consistent with international human rights norms and standards. It requires, as well, measures to ensure adherence to principles of supremacy of law, equality before the law, accountability to the law, fairness in the application of law, separation of powers, participation in decision-making, legal uncertainty, avoidance of arbitrariness and procedural and legal transparency.

While other definitions may differ slightly, it is widely agreed that strengthening the rule of law through, for example, ensuring that people have access to courts and that crime is effectively controlled brings both direct and indirect benefits to all societies. It has been described as the "foundation for communities of justice, opportunity, and peace—underpinning development, accountable government, and respect for fundamental rights" (World Justice Project 2019).

This might reasonably be considered a "maximalist" definition of the concept of rule of law programming, including goals such as social justice and community empowerment, which for much of the world remains, at best, work in progress. Such programs did, however, attract significant international donor support with the ending of the Cold War and the triumph of "Western" concepts of rule of law based on international human rights and neoliberal economic restructurings from the 1990s onward. The UN Development Programme (UNDP), the World Bank, and other UN agencies were major recipients of such funding, and UN Country Teams (UNCTs) now have considerable experience implementing rule of law programs in accordance with the above principles. The debates surrounding these definitions around law programming, however, are clearly located within the sphere of those concerning long-term international development.

It is less clear, from a definitional perspective, how rule of law programming fits into UN Peace Operations in post-conflict and crisis situations. Here a more “minimalist” definition focused on the legality of rules and the restoration of order in countries experiencing or emerging from violent conflicts is likely to be seen as a more urgent priority. In one highly critical report, published in 2005, for example, Hurwitz and Studdard criticized the “absence of overarching and coherent strategic frameworks and planning related to the sequencing of rule of law programs within peacebuilding initiatives” (Hurwitz and Studdard 2005). They argued that “measures aimed at longer-term development reforms—through administrative laws and processes, anti-corruption strategies, property, land and housing rights, and natural resource management—are still comparatively neglected in UN approaches.” As will be discussed below, the UN has more recently addressed these criticisms in its programming, which can very much still be seen as work in progress.

The very first UN peacekeeping missions included “rule of law” activities although this was originally done in a rather haphazard manner. The mandate of the UN Emergency Force (UNEF) sent to respond to the Suez crisis in 1956 included “measures to protect civilian life and public and private property” (UN Doc. A/3943, 9 October 1958). UNEF was “authorized to apprehend infiltrators and persons approaching the demarcation line in suspicious circumstances” and to hand them over to the local police “after interrogation.” The first international police officer was deployed to the UN Mission in the Congo (MONUC) in 1960, and civilian police officers have regularly been deployed on missions after that, mainly to monitor and report on the behavior of the local police (Osland 2019). The UN missions to Namibia (UNTAG) and Cambodia (UNTAC) in 1989 and 1992 explicitly took on rule of law capacity building tasks that included both monitoring and training law enforcement officials, including police, judges, and prison guards. UNTAC even created an office of the Special Prosecutor to try certain crimes and built the first UN “detention facility,” although this will probably not be remembered as a good practice model (Doyle 1995). (Two suspects were detained but flaws in the Cambodian criminal justice system meant the UN was unable to hand them over to local courts, and so they ended up as prisoners of the UN without habeas corpus rights or trial.)

The UN’s first conceptual attempt to define the relationship between rule of law programming and its Peace Operations can be found in the 1992 Secretary-General’s report, Agenda for Peace (UN Doc. A/47/277 – S/24111, 17 June 1992). This chronologically sequenced UN efforts to promote peace, beginning with preventive diplomacy, followed by peacemaking (negotiating ceasefires and peace treaties), peacekeeping (monitoring the implementation of these agreements), and then peacebuilding (mine clearance, Demobilization, Disarmament, and Reintegration (DDR), Security Sector Reform (SSR), elections, justice sector capacity building, and good governance reform). Peacekeeping had traditionally been understood as inter-positioning peacekeepers between the parties to a conflict, de-escalating tensions, and building confidence in a ceasefire or peace agreement. Peacebuilding aimed at addressing the root causes of the conflict and removing the reasons why it occurred in the first place. Peacekeepers might, on occasion, act as “early peacebuilders,” but there was, at least in theory, a clear distinction between the two types of activity.

The progress from “war” to “peace,” however, is almost always both nonlinear and complex, and UN missions from the 1990s onward have been forced to respond accordingly. As an ad hoc mechanism for managing crises and conflicts, Peace Operations have constantly had to adapt, given their limited means and ever more complex environments, which rarely fit into definitional neatness (De Coning 2019). “Peacebuilding” could and often did take place simultaneously with “peacemaking” and “peacekeeping.” Indeed, it is doubtful if there is really any need for the type of analytical distinctions set out between them above. Subjective factors in the field also played a huge part in shaping responses, such as the intensity and duration of the conflict, the leadership of and funding available for UN missions, the presence or absence of non-UN agencies, media interest, donor fatigue, or sudden changes in other international priorities. As de Coning notes (De Coning 2018a):

The kind of peacebuilding activities that were undertaken by peacekeeping operations in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Sierra Leone, and Haiti gradually expanded over the last two decades to include: supporting trust- and confidence-building among the parties to a peace or political process; national dialogue initiatives; reviewing or drafting new constitutions; supporting transitional justice and national reconciliation processes; supporting reforms of, and capacity building for, rule of law and security institutions; supporting the development of local mechanisms for conflict resolution and reconciliation; disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR); protecting and promoting international human rights laws and standards; among many other areas.

Many of these types of activities have long been understood as rule of law programming and conducted by UN agencies, coordinated through the UNCTs. Peace Operations, managed by the UN Secretariat, however, can often access funds more easily than UN agencies, who depend on voluntary funding, so there were pragmatic self-interested reasons why more and more of these types of activities were added to peacekeeping mandates over the years. It is now generally accepted that UN Peace Operations will take on a nexus of rule of law issues such as reform of security institutions, the extension of state authority, and the capacity of sub-national authorities to prevent and manage conflict. Typical tasks often include training and capacity building of the police and prison services, monitoring court procedures, inspecting prisons, reviewing criminal laws and procedures and more general human rights training of public officials, and monitoring of the overall human rights situation. As is discussed in the next section, however, rule of law programming has taken on an increasingly important strategic significance as UN Peace Operations have increasingly had to confront issues surrounding protection, sovereignty, and the use of force.

Sovereignty and Protection

In 1999, the UN established the two most sovereignty-intrusive missions in its history: UNMIK in Kosovo and UNTAET in Timor Leste. (The UN mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) was established by Security Council Resolution 1244 of 10 June 1999; the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) was established by Security Council Resolution 1272 of 25 October 1999.) The Security Council also began explicitly to insert Protection of Civilians (POC) tasks into mission mandates giving them Chapter VII powers to use force in order to do so. Both of these developments had profound implications for the integration of rule of law programming into UN Peace Operations, although these were not perhaps immediately apparent at the time.

Both UNMIK and UNTAET were confronted with the dilemma of administering territories whose ultimate constitutional status was still in flux and so were given executive powers for the transitional period, including full responsibility for enforcing the rule of law. The Security Council resolution creating UNMIK specified that its responsibilities would include “protecting and promoting human rights (UN Security Council Resolution 1244, 10 June 1999, Article 11 (j)),” while one of the earliest regulations of UNTAET stated that “all persons undertaking public duties or holding public office in East Timor shall observe internationally recognized human rights standards (UNTAET Regulation No. 1999/1).” Both missions were also granted immunity in line with the UN’s standard practice (UNMIK promulgated regulation UNMIK/REG/47/2000, 18 August 2000).

Confronted with considerable ongoing discrimination and violence against Kosovo's non-Albanian ethnic minorities and a weak judicial system, widely seen as politically biased and pliant, UNMIK and its accompanying security force (KFOR) frequently resorted to using executive orders to overturn judicial decisions, particularly in relation to detentions (Saramati v. France, Germany and Norway (Appl. No. 78166/01), (Grand Chamber) Decision on Admissibility, 2 May 2007). One observer, who served in the mission, noted that its civilian and military components "declared themselves above regulation, overturning even the most basic of human rights laws, that of requiring all detention to be by order of a judge" (Baldwin 2006). Two others commented that "UNMIK's and KFOR's executive actions have clearly contravened human rights standards but remained beyond any legal challenge" (Marshall and Inglis 2003). Amnesty International claims that both UNMIK police and the Kosovo national police, whom they were mentoring, contravened international standards on the use of force by beating and tear-gassing peaceful demonstrators and shooting people dead in circumstances that were not properly investigated (AI Index: EUR 70/015/2006). Both KFOR and UNMIK police failed to protect minority communities, and the Kosovo national police may have participated in some violent attacks against them. On one occasion UNMIK police shot dead two civilians with plastic bullets so hardened with age that they penetrated the skulls of their victims (Benner et al. 2011).

The Security Council resolution which established UNTAET also specified that it was "endowed with overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor and will be empowered to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice (Security Council Resolution 1272 of 25 October 1999, para 1)." Similar concerns were also raised about UNTAET actual rule of law record (Goldstone 2004; Martin and Mayer-Rieckh 2005). An Amnesty International report published in July 2001, for example, noted that:

Detainees have gone for weeks or even months before having access to legal counsel . . . At the same time, the UN Civilian police (Civpol), currently responsible for law enforcement in East Timor, have not always responded effectively where civil disturbances have occurred and in some cases its members have committed violations themselves in their efforts to prevent such disturbances . . . illegal detention and torture . . . have not been effectively addressed. (AI Index: ASA 57/001/2001)

The experience of UNMIK and UNTAET was a chastening one for all concerned and led to a number of safeguards being introduced to try to ensure that the UN itself complied with the rule of law standards set out in international law (See, for example, Kosovo Human Rights Advisory Panel, N.M. and Others v. UNMIK Case No. 26/08, Opinion 26 February 2016). Nevertheless, there is a clear problem of subjecting the UN to the four universal rules of law principles described above of accountability, just laws, open government, and accessible and impartial dispute resolution, given the difficulties of judicially reviewing actions of the Security Council or challenging the UN's own immunity (Wood 2006; Matheson 2006; De Wet 2004; Orakhelashvili 2007).

The UN has subsequently opted for a much "lighter footprint" approach in all missions and has never again taken on executive powers and governance functions (Brahimi 2007). (A golden principle for international assistance should be that everyone shall do everything possible to work him or herself out of a job as early as possible. This is, in very simple terms, the principle of a "light footprint.") In the same year that UNMIK and UNTAET were established, however, the Security Council gave its first explicit POC mandate to a UN mission, UNAMSIL, in Sierra Leone. This authorized the use of force by peacekeeping soldiers to protect civilians from grave violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law; a practice was to become increasingly common as the 2000s wore on. POC was not initially considered a significant departure from "traditional peacekeeping" and so has been the subject of very little academic scrutiny. It primarily developed through Security Council resolutions and policy guidance from the DPKO based on the experiences of its field missions, but these became increasingly detailed in spelling out POC tasks and making it a priority for missions (Foley 2017a).

The inclusion of POC mandates in UN peacekeeping missions was to significantly change how the UN came to regard rule of law issues as fitting into its Peace Operations strategies. At the most basic practical level, peacekeeping soldiers need to know under what circumstances they can legally use lethal force for POC purposes, and the legal regime governing arrest and detention procedures of people who may be threatening the civilians the mission is mandated to protect. When UN Peace Operations are working in support of the host state police and armed forces, they also have a positive obligation to ensure that these fully respect the rule of law norms contained in international law (UN Doc. A/67/775-S/2013/110, 5 March 2013). There are no easy answers to the dilemmas that these issues raise, and the failures of missions to deal with them have been well documented elsewhere (Foley 2010). As POC has been increasingly defined as the main priority of most UN Peace Operations, rule of law programming has become increasingly central to the fulfilment of mission mandates.

Joined-Up Thinking

In December 2005, the UN created a Peacebuilding Commission, with a rule of law unit within its support office in response to recommendations made in two Secretary-General's reports In Larger Freedom and A More Secure World (UN Doc. A/59/2005). The commission was mandated to "bring together all relevant actors to marshal resources and to advise on and propose integrated strategies for post-conflict peacebuilding and recovery" (Security Council Resolution 1645, 20 December 2005; and General Assembly Resolution 60/180, 20 December 2005).

A Peacebuilding Fund (PBF) was established in October 2006. The PBF aims to "provide for a more sustained engagement in support of countries emerging from conflict" and supports "peacebuilding activities which directly contribute to post-conflict stabilization and strengthen the capacity of Governments, national/local institutions and transitional or other relevant authorities." The PBF was created in response to widespread criticism that existing development finance was often "insufficient, slow and inflexible at critical moments of transition" (UN PBF, no date). Its aims include supporting:

programs and projects in the area of the rule of law in countries where a conflict analysis has identified this sector as an area of continuing tensions or a potential conflict trigger or where the legitimate structures for settling legal disputes need to be restored, following the return to peace. As a result, PBF projects in this area tend to focus on legal reform and on strengthening the national and local judicial institutions and police . . . The objective of this support is to ensure that the targeted legal institutions and entities are effective, inclusive and accountable to laws that are publicly promulgated, equally enforced, independently adjudicated and consistent with international human rights standards. There is a particular emphasis on supporting human rights, including through harmonisation of existing constitutional, legal and policy frameworks; human rights education and training; strengthening capacity of and access to judicial and law enforcement systems; monitoring and protecting human rights; and supporting transitional justice mechanisms. (Rule of Law Homepage)

The PBF aims to provide "impactful, jump start or bridge financing for UN preventive and peacebuilding programmes" and claims that it has developed a comparatively higher risk tolerance to other funds through a "rigorous, proactive approach to risk management." Reform of rule of law institutions is, nevertheless, described as a "long-term endeavour, and one which must be rooted in inclusive political agreements to ensure the popular legitimacy of the reforms."

At the same time, DPO is deploying increasing number of police officers and civilian rule of law experts to its missions, both to build host state capacity in as part of the mission exit strategy but also to directly implement rule of law projects (Hills 2009). There are currently around 11,500 police officers, deployed in 16 out of 23 UN operations and drawn from 87 UN member states (UN Police Homepage). Most of these are deployed in Formed Police Units (FPUs), each of which consists of approximately 140 police officers, trained and equipped to act as a cohesive unit.

The first FPU's were deployed in UNMIK and UNTAET where, as discussed above, they had full responsibility for enforcing the law. FPU's continue to operate in "high-risk" environments, and their functions include public order management, protection of the UN, and support to national police operations. Along with the FPU's individual police officers are often deployed as advisors on missions and support the reform, restructuring and rebuilding of domestic police and other law enforcement agencies through training and financial support. In some cases, UN police are deployed in specialist teams trained to investigate issues like transnational crime or sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV) or to develop community-oriented policing in refugee or internally displaced person camps (Osland 2019). Depending on their mission mandate, UN police officers may have power to arrest, detain, and interrogate criminal suspects. They may also have power to detain UN international civilian and military personnel accused of sexual exploitation and abuse (SEA) (Foley and Blackmore 2016).

Alongside police officers DPO is also deploying thousands of specialist civilian staff to UN missions, including weapons experts and de-miners, judges, prosecutors and defense lawyers, prison and probation officers, SSR advisers, and DDR specialists. As well as providing advice and support for long-term host state capacity development, these staff are also expected to help missions directly fulfil their POC mandates. As the Capstone Doctrine, of 2008, stated:

Most multi-dimensional United Nations peacekeeping operations are now mandated by the Security Council to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical violence. The protection of civilians requires concerted and coordinated action among the military, police and civilian components of a United Nations peacekeeping operation and must be mainstreamed into the planning and conduct of its core activities. United Nations humanitarian agencies and NGO partners also undertake a broad range of activities in support of the protection of civilians. Close coordination with these actors is, therefore, essential. (UN Capstone Doctrine 2008)

The assumption in this report that the work of humanitarian agencies, who are bound by principles of independence and neutrality, can be "coordinated" by the UN for POC purposes raises some principled objections (Hodge 2011). There is little doubt, however, that, as the report asserts, the creation of "a secure and stable environment while strengthening the State's ability to provide security, with full respect for the rule of law and human rights" is now considered by the UN to be a part of its "Core Business" (Capstone Doctrine 2008). In their 2005 report, Hurwitz and Studdard argued that the UN is increasingly accepting "International programs to support the rule of law are now regarded as important components of both the security and development agendas." They noted that:

rule of law institutions are indispensable for internal security and law enforcement purposes, and to ensure the transparency, accountability and control of security forces such as the police and the military. While the judiciary is the primary institution concerned with the rule of law, the inclusion of rule of law assistance as part of integrated conflict management approaches has reinforced pre-existing linkages with governance and security institutions, and further justifies the need to situate rule of law reforms and programs within a broader analytical framework. (Hurwitz and Studdard 2005)

One problem they identified was the huge array of actors ranging from private sector consulting firms, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), academic institutions, individual governments and multilateral organizations, the UN, and regional development banks that have all engaged, with differing approaches, in programs that seek to enhance the rule of law and that the "sheer number of disparate projects" being implemented meant that "greater coherence in rule of law programming still remains a distant objective" (ibid). The experiences of UN-mandated operations in countries experiencing violent insurgencies – such as Somalia, Afghanistan, Iraq, and Libya – has also posed acute questions about the way rule of law programming can contribute, or fail to contribute, to the re-establishment of state authority. As the Security Council has become increasingly detailed and ambitious in the POC mandates that it gives to its "traditional" peacekeeping operations, rule of law programming has also been seen as providing a strategic contribution to the creation of a “protective environment” for civilians.

Since 2010 DPO has produced a variety of policy papers and guidance that stress the need for capacity building of state institutions to enhance the protection of civilians. Its first Operational Concept on POC conceived it as encompassing three “tiers” of activities: (i) protection through political process, (ii) protection from physical violence, and (iii) establishment of a protective environment (Draft Operational Concept 2010; Policy on the Protection of Civilians 2015; Implementing Guidelines for Military Components 2015). In response to criticism from a UN evaluation which stated that “force is almost never used to protect civilians under attack” (UN Doc A/68/787, 7 March 2014), it stated that “the approach of the report over emphasizes one element of military action and devalues the importance of political solutions and other aspects of the comprehensive approach peacekeeping operations take in implementing their protection mandate.”

As UN Peace Operations have been established in increasingly insecure and hostile environments, however, the notion of UN peacekeepers acting as “early peacebuilders” has become increasingly difficult to sustain. As de Coning notes (De Coning 2018b):

In the 1990s and early 2000s, two-thirds of UN peacekeepers were deployed in places like Burundi, Cambodia, and Mozambique that implemented comprehensive peace agreements in the aftermath of civil wars. The focus of these missions, and others at the time such as in Kosovo and East Timor, was on peacebuilding and state-building. Today, in contrast, two thirds of peacekeepers are deployed in missions where the main focus is on the protection of civilians, amidst ongoing violent conflict, in places like the Central African Republic (CAR), DRC, Mali, and South Sudan. UN peacekeeping has experienced a significant shift away from conflict resolution, where peace consolidation and peacebuilding were the main activities, to conflict management, characterized by protection and stabilization activities.

The UN has never definitively explained what it means by the phrase “stabilization,” although four of its largest missions – MONUSCO, MINUSMA, MINUSCA, and MINUSTAH – have the word in their official titles. There is, however, a vast and growing literature on the concept, which essentially defines it as operations to help states in crisis to restore order and stability in the absence of a peace agreement, by using force as well as political, developmental, and other means (Muggah 2014). Rule of law programming may, therefore, sometimes be implemented in the context of anti-terrorist or counterinsurgency operations in conflict-prone or post-conflict countries where state institutions are weak or inaccessible and the state’s legitimate authority is strongly contested by significant sections of the population (De Coning 2018a). This gives an added complexity to long-standing dilemmas in rule of law programming, such as the relationship between state and customary law, gender equality, minority rights, legal pluralism, and corruption (Foley 2017b).

At the same time, as financial pressures on UN Peace Operations grow, rule of law programming may in some cases be seen as a cheaper alternative to full missions. For example, in 2017, the military component of MINUSTAH was withdrawn, to be replaced with the UN’s first “justice support” mission (MINUJUSTH), composed of up to 7 FPU (980 personnel) and 295 individual police officers (Security Council Report 2017).

Coordinating Rule of Law Programming in UN Peace Operations

It was against this general background that UN Office of Rule of Law and Security Institutions (OROLSI) and the Global Focal Point for the Rule of Law (GFP) were created in 2007 and 2012, respectively. The OROLSI supports rule of law components in Peace Operations and special political missions, through expertise and integrated guidance, as they work with national authorities to protect civilians, extend State authority, re-establish law and order, and stabilize conflict and post-conflict situations. It currently includes five components: Police Division; Justice and Corrections Service; UN Mine Action Service; Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration (DDR) Section; and Security Sector Reform (SSR) Unit. OROLSI is currently led by Alexandre Zouev, the Assistant Secretary-General for Rule of Law and Security Institutions in the Department of Peace Operations (DPO) (Peacekeeping Homepage/OROLSI 2019).

The GFP was created in 2012 and is co-chaired by DPO and UNDP. It also includes other UN agencies and departments such as the UN Office for Drugs and Crime (UNODC), the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the UN Officer of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), UN Women, and the Executive Office of the Secretary-General (EOSG). GFP coordinating platforms and working group arrangements are established both at headquarters and in the field to serve as a single entry point for joint up rule of law assistance to host governments and other national actors in conflict-affected countries and to achieve better results and coherence drawing on the expertise of the contributing agencies. Together OROLSI and GFP provide the main coordination of and support for rule of law programming in UN Peace Operations.

In the Secretary-General's report on Restructuring of the Peace and Security Pillar of the Organization, which was published in October 2017, the purpose of OROLSI was described as complementing the work currently being done by the GFP. Its task is to “ensure systematic collaboration with all relevant United Nations and non-United Nations actors . . . with the single political-operational structure to support stabilization and help to carry out protection-related tasks in field missions, as well as capacity-building and advisory functions . . . The location of the police and military components in one department would help to maintain the necessary links in planning, force generation, deployment and protection-related activities” (UN Doc A/72/525, 13 October 2017). The restructuring was also designed to “align the peace and security pillar more closely with the development and human rights pillars” and to change the “working culture” to ensure coherence and coordination across the peace and security pillar.

This restructuring came into effect on 1 January 2019 with the creation of DPO, out of the previous Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO), and the Department of Political and Peacebuilding Affairs (DPPA) out of the previous Department of Political Affairs (DPA). It was carried out against a background of the wind-down of missions in Haiti and Côte d'Ivoire but with challenges facing large new UN missions in Mali and the Central African Republic renewed conflict in South Sudan and the continuing long simmering conflicts in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and Darfur. Its context was also shaped by the growing financial pressures facing UN peacekeeping due to big budget cuts imposed by the US administration headed by President Donald Trump (Boutellis and Novosseloff). (The General Assembly's Fifth Committee reduced the peacekeeping budget to $7.3 billion for 15 peacekeeping missions for the year starting July 1, 2017, from $7.87 billion the previous year and the all-time high of $8.27 billion in 2015/2016.) More positively, it provided an opportunity for the UN to respond to three important reviews of its own working practices carried out in 2015: the High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations (HIPPO); the review of the UN's women, peace, and security agenda; and the review of the implementation of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Some observers have described the set of reforms that the UN has adopted in response as being likely to “instil some of the most radical changes to the UN peace and security architecture” in its recent history (Cliffe and Novosseloff 2017).

OROLSI is an integrated part of DPO, and its main function is to coordinate the deployment of rule of law specialists in Peace Operations as well as non-mission contexts. It is a system-wide service provider in mission and non-mission settings and deploys approximately 15,000 personnel globally. It has standing in-house capacities with expertise in policing, justice, and corrections that can deploy teams within 7 days to support new operations, in crisis response situations, and to help provide surge capacity to missions. It can also generate other deployable capacities through rosters, rapid reaction teams, and similar standby arrangements. As well as deploying to “traditional peacekeeping missions,” it aims to increase the capacity of UN Peace Operations in the areas of conflict prevention, prevention of violent extremism, counter terrorism, stabilization and peace sustainment, and local/community dynamics (Peacekeeping Homepage/OROLSI 2019).

OROLSI usually works side-by-side with national authorities and aims to provide a full cycle of related activities, from doctrine development, capacity building, community liaison, training, and generation of personnel to technical expertise, lessons learned, and transition planning. OROLSI can also deploy specialist teams of experts such as one on sexual violence in conflict, which focusses its efforts on strengthening the capacity of national rule of law and justice actors, including in specialized areas such as criminal investigation and prosecution; collection and preservation of evidence; military justice system investigation and prosecution; criminal and procedural law reform; and protection of victims, witnesses, and justice officials.

The GFP was created in 2012 and brings together both UN agencies and departments that deploy during Peace Operations as well as those involved in long-term development. As its lengthy full name indicates, there was significant internal initial debates about its scope and composition. It is jointly convened by DPO and UNDP, and, as discussed in the introduction, its key partners include OHCHR, UN Women, UNODC, and UNHCR. It essentially functions as a forum for cooperation among agencies that retain their own mandates, functions, and reporting lines and it was created on a “cost neutral” basis, given the UN’s overall financial constraints. The idea behind the GFP is to strengthen the UNs’ ability to fill critical civilian capacity gaps in the aftermath of conflict, facilitate collaborative work from the early planning phase onward, leverage resources, draw on external assets, and avoid duplication of efforts aiming at joint implementation of programs and projects.

Given the newness of both organizations and in the context of an ongoing and significant restructuring of the management of the UN’s peace and security pillars, any assessment of their effectiveness can only be tentative. The GFP has been the subject of two biannual reviews – one in 2014 and one in 2018 – which provide an overall and largely positive account of its activities. The most recent one found that it has “helped to leverage comparative advantage, position the UN to avoid setbacks during peace operation transitions, reduce duplication, and create efficiencies in the field” (Center on International Cooperation 2018). The review noted that the emphasis on “justice sector” reform (police, justice and corrections) failed to include “the close connection between police reform and strengthening other security services (police and military reforms, for example, are almost always closely linked).” It also did not give sufficient attention to “informal systems, broader access to justice/legal and judicial reform programs, and non-discrimination/equality before the law.” The review recommended forging closer links between the GFP and other units working on justice reform in UNDP with OROLSI and DPO. It also suggested reviving “dormant links with the Peacebuilding Support Office (PBSO) and the Peacebuilding Fund (PBF)” as a matter of priority.

Conclusions and Challenges

Rule of law programming in UN Peace Operations has, like many other features of these operations, developed reactively as much as proactively, and this is crucial to understanding the organizational structures that deliver it. What they lack in “organizational neatness” may be compensated for by a responsiveness to the changing needs of field operations. A fair assessment of their effectiveness should be based on what they have dealt with these changing needs rather than an idealized conception of rule of law programming in the long-term development terms discussed above. These needs, and the political pressures surrounding them, will also, ultimately, shape the nature of both the programs themselves and the structures needed to deliver them.

Sometimes rule of law programs are introduced to deal with specific problems, such as land disputes in the context of large-scale refugee return, where cadastral records are not reliable (see, e.g., Foley 2004). Since such disputes have the potential for sparking violent conflict, they demand responses more urgently than can be generated through long-term development programs. Insurgents often specifically target rule of law institutions – such as police, judges, court houses, and public record offices – specifically to weaken state authority. In some cases – such as Afghanistan and Sri Lanka – insurgent forces have established their own “justice systems” to enhance their own credibility and consolidate their support. (The author of this chapter set up legal aid programmes in both countries which had to deal with this dilemma.) A variety of justice “packages,” “rapid response initiatives,” and “standby deployments” have been developed for these types of situations by the UN and international donors in response, although the effectiveness of these varies considerably.

As discussed above, the UN is legally prohibited from providing support to state security forces that are violating norms contained international law – particularly refugee law, international humanitarian law, and international human rights law. This can present huge challenges for rule of law programming during UN Peace Operations where national forces are accused of such violations. Is it better to continue to provide support, through training and mentoring, to specific police and military units against whom such accusations have been levelled or to withdraw technical cooperation? What should be the limits of such constructive engagement and what alternatives are there to such strategies?

Similar dilemmas confront rule of law programs being implemented in countries where customary law institutions are more accessible and perceived to have more legitimacy than the official state justice sector. Is it better to work with such structures because affected communities consider them more “just” than official state structures, or does this risk legitimizing practices which are often not based on due process procedures and may discriminate against women and ethnic minority groups? A strong case can be made for doing both and working with informal mechanisms to remove the practices that conflict with international standards while ensuring that their decisions and performance is monitored by state institutions, but donor support for this approach in the field has often been inconsistent and haphazard (Foley 2017b).

While the future of rule of law programming in UN Peace Operations is difficult to predict, some trends appear to be emerging. First of all, growing financial pressures on the UN are likely to keep bearing down on the need to cut the costs of Peace Operations, which makes programs that go beyond the basic, traditionally defined mandates more difficult to justify. Secondly, the growing influence of countries from the Global South, such as India and China, commensurate with their role as major Troop Contributing Countries, will probably make future Peace Operations less normative and sovereignty-intrusive. Concepts surrounding the rule of law and human rights in peacebuilding and state-building strategies that are perceived as “Western,” neoliberal, or simply too expensive to implement are likely to come under increasing pressure.

At the same time, rule of law programming may find it easier to access political and financial support within the UN system and among its external donor where it can be justified in POC or “stabilization” terms. The first obvious danger here is that rule of law programming may find itself increasingly integrated into counterinsurgency and counter-terrorist strategies where the success or failure of individual programs may become increasingly subordinated to the success or failure of these overall strategies.

More fundamentally, as the HIPPO review concluded: “UN peacekeeping missions, due to their composition and character, are not suited to engage in military counter-terrorism operations. They lack the specific equipment, intelligence, logistics, capabilities and specialized military preparation required, among other aspects” (UN Doc. A/70/95–S/2015/446, 17 June 2015). While it is “the prerogative of the Security Council to authorize UN peacekeeping operations to undertake enforcement tasks,” it urged “extreme caution” about them, as they involve a “fundamentally different type of posture that uses offensive force to degrade, neutralize or defeat an opponent” (ibid).

In this context the debate about rule of law programming in UN Peace Operations cannot be conducted in isolation from the debate about the future of such operations themselves.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Baldwin, C. (2006). Minority rights in Kosovo under International rule. Minority Rights Group International.
- Benner, T., Mergenthaler, S., & Rotmann, P. (2011). The new world of UN peace operations, learning to build peace. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Brahimi, L. ‘State building in crisis and post-conflict countries’, 7th Global Forum on Reinventing Government Building Trust in Government, Vienna 26–29 June 2007.
- Center on International Cooperation, Folke Bernadotte Academy, and the Norwegian Institute of International Affairs. Review of the global focal point for police, justice, and corrections, August 2018.
- Cliffe, S., & Novosseloff, A. Restructuring the UN secretariat to strengthen preventative diplomacy and peace operations. Center on International Cooperation, February 14, 2017.
- De Coning, C. What peacekeeping can learn from peacebuilding: The peacebuilding dimensions of the A4P, Complexity 4 Peace Operations, London 23 July 2018a.
- De Coning, C. (2018b). Implications of stabilisation mandates for the use of force in UN peace operations. In P. Nadin (Ed.), The use of force in UN peacekeeping. Routledge.
- De Coning, C. (2019). UN peace operations and changes the global order: Evolution, adaptation, and resilience. In C. de Coning, & M. Peter (Eds), United Nations peace operations in a changing global order. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- De Wet, E. (2004). The chapter VII powers of the United Nations security council. Portland: Hart Publishing.
- Doyle, M. W. (1995). UN peacekeeping in Cambodia: UNTAC’s civil mandate. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Foley, C. (2004). Land and property disputes in Eastern Afghanistan. Kabul and Oslo: Norwegian Refugee Council.
- Foley, C. (2010). The thin blue line: How humanitarianism went to war. London: Verso.
- Foley, C. (2017a). UN peacekeeping operations and the protection of civilians saving succeeding generations. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Foley, C. (2017b). Rebuilding the justice sector of Afghanistan. Journal of International Peacekeeping, 21, 246–270.
- Foley, C., & Blakemore, S. (2016). Protecting children from sexual exploitation and abuse in the context of UN peacekeeping operations. London: Keeping Children Safe.
- Goldstone, A. (2004). UNTAET with hindsight: The peculiarities of politics in an incomplete state. Global Governance: A Review of Multilateralism and International Organizations, 10(1), 83–98.
- Hills, A. (2009). Policing post-conflict societies. London: Zed Books.
- Hodge, N. (2011). Armed humanitarianism, the rise of the nation builders. Bloomsbury.
- Hurwitz, A., & Studdard, K. Rule of law programs in peace operations. International Peace Academy, August 2005.
- Marshall, D., & Inglis, S. (2003). The disempowerment of human rights-based justice in the United Nations Mission in Kosovo. Harvard Journal of International Law, 16.
- Martin, I., & Mayer-Rieckh, A. (2005). The United Nations and East Timor: From self-determination to state-building. International Peacekeeping, 12(1), 125–145.
- Matheson, M. (2006). Council unbound: The growth of UN decision-making on conflict and post-conflict issues after the cold war. Washington, DC: US Institute for Peace.
- Muggah, R. (Ed.). (2014). Stabilization operations, security and development: States of fragility. London/New York: Routledge.
- Orakhelashvili, A. (2007) The acts of the security council: Meaning and standards of review, Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, Vol. 11.
- Osland, K. M. (2019). UN policing: The security–trust challenge. In C. de Coning, & M. Peter (Eds), United Nations peace operations in a changing global order. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Wood, M. ‘The UN Security Council and International Law’. Second lecture: ‘The UN Security Council and International Law’, Hersch Lauterpacht Memorial Lectures, Lauterpacht Centre for International Law, University of Cambridge, 8 November 2006.
- World Justice Project, Rule of Law Index 2019.

UN Security Council Resolutions and Reports
A more secure world: Our shared responsibility: Report of the high-level panel on threats, challenges and change. United Nations, 2004.

- Draft Operational Concept on the Protection of Civilians in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations*. New York: Department of Peacekeeping Operations–Department of Field Support, 2010.
- Evaluation of the implementation and results of protection of civilians mandates in United Nations peacekeeping operations*, Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services, UN Doc A/68/787, 7 March 2014.
- General Assembly Resolution 60/180, 20 December 2005.
- Human rights due diligence policy on United Nations support to non-United Nations security forces*, UN Doc. A/67/775–S/2013/110, 5 March 2013.
- In Larger Freedom: Towards development, security and human rights for all*, UN Doc. A/59/2005, 21 March 2005.
- Policy on the Protection of Civilians in United Nations Peacekeeping*, Department of Peacekeeping Operations/Department of Field Support, Ref. 2015.07, 1 April 2015.
- Preventing Conflict, Transforming Justice, Securing the Peace, A Global Study on the Implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 1325*, UN Women, 2015.
- Protection of Civilians: Implementing Guidelines for Military Components of United Nations Peacekeeping Missions*, Department of Peacekeeping Operations/Department of Field Support, February 2015.
- Report of the High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations*, A/70/95–S/2015/446, 17 June 2015.
- Report of the Secretary-General An Agenda for Peace: Preventive Diplomacy, Peacemaking and Peacekeeping* UN Doc. A/47/277 – S/24111, 17 June 1992.
- Report of the Secretary General, Summary of the experiences derived from the establishment and operation of the force*, UN Doc. A/3943, 9 October 1958.
- Restructuring of the United Nations peace and security pillar Report of the Secretary-General*, A/72/525, 13 October 2017.
- Secretary-General's report on The Rule of Law and Transitional Justice in Conflict and Post-Conflict Societies*, UN Doc. S/2004/616, 3 August 2004.
- Security Council Report, “July 2017 Monthly Forecast: Haiti,” June 30, 2017. Available at www.securitycouncilreport.org/monthly-forecast/2017-07/haiti_12.php
- Security Council Resolution 1645, 20 December 2005.
- Security Council Resolution 1244, 10 June 1999.
- Security Council Resolution 1272, 25 October 1999.
- The Secretary-General's Peacebuilding Fund Leveraging the UN to Prevent the Lapse and Relapse into Conflict*, UN PBF, no date.
- Transforming our world: the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development*, A/RES/70/1, 21 October 2015.
- UN Peace keeping Homepage, Office of Rule Of Law And Security Institutions (OROLSI), <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/office-of-rule-of-law-and-security-institutions>. Accessed 27 Feb 2019.
- UN Peacekeeping Homepage, Building Rule of Law and Security Institutions. <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/building-rule-of-law-and-security-institutions>. Accessed 15 Mar 2019.
- UN Police Home page <https://police.un.org/en>. Accessed 8 Mar 2019.
- UN Rule of Law Homepage, UN Coordination of Rule of Law activities. <https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/what-is-the-rule-of-law/coordination-of-rule-of-law-activities/>. Accessed 15 Mar 2019.
- United Nations and the Rule of Law, Homepage, Peacebuilding Support Office. <https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/un-and-the-rule-of-law/peacebuilding-support-office/>. Accessed 18 Mar 2019.
- United Nations Peacebuilding Fund, Homepage, <http://www.unpbf.org/>. Accessed 19 Mar 2019.
- United Nations Peacekeeping Operations, Principles and guidelines* (Capstone Doctrine). New York: Department of Peacekeeping Operations, 2008.

Laws, Regulations, and Cases

- Kosovo Human Rights Advisory Panel, N.M. and Others v. UNMIK Case No. 26/08, Opinion 26 February 2016.
- Saramati v. France, Germany and Norway* (Appl. No. 78166/01), (Grand Chamber) Decision on Admissibility, 2 May 2007.
- UNMIK promulgated regulation UNMIK/REG/47/2000, 18 August 2000.
- UNTAET Regulation No. 1999/1.

Russia and Frozen Conflicts in the Post-Soviet Space

Adriana Cuppuleri
School of International Studies, University of Trento, Trento, Italy

Synonyms

Post-Soviet conflict; Protracted conflict process

Definition

There is no unanimity in defining what frozen conflicts are and what distinguishes them from other types of conflictual situations in international politics. However, it has most often been used in academia to indicate international conflictual situations in which active armed conflict has been brought to an end, but no peace treaty has been achieved between the conflictual sides. The opposing parts in frozen conflicts are usually internationally recognized states on the one hand and de facto states on the other. Hence, territorial issues, minority rights, and the autonomy/independence of ethnic groups constitute the core issues of frozen conflicts.

The notion emerged mainly following the dissolution of the Soviet Union and the birth of several successive states in Eastern Europe in the early 1990s. Since then, the concept of frozen conflict has been almost exclusively applied to protracted ethno-conflicts in contemporary post-Soviet space, in particular the ones in South Ossetia, Abkhazia, Transnistria, Nagorno-Karabakh, Chechnya, and Crimea to some extent. While the word has moved to indicate perennial territorial disputes that are neither regional nor temporal-specific (see, e.g., North Korea), the spatial dimension of frozen conflicts is still so bounded to Russia's role in the regional security architecture that these conflicts are occasionally defined as post-Soviet conflicts. In this sense, frozen conflicts became sensors and indicators of Russia's "intentions" and "strategies" in the security architecture of post-Soviet space. The reason for this connotation is that Russia is the central external actor and mediator in all the peace processes of frozen conflicts in the post-Soviet space, yet at the same time, its military presence and political involvement persuade observers to consider Russia a party to the conflicts. This interpretation has become clear during Ukraine's crisis as Western observers have interpreted Russia's meddling in Ukraine mainly as an attempt to set the scene for another protracted frozen-conflicts situation as part of the Kremlin's "revisionist line" against the European order.

Introduction

The main difficulty in defining frozen conflicts lies exactly in the adjective "frozen." This qualifier has often lead experts and decision-makers to think about frozen conflicts as static since violence was brought to an end and therefore as stable and irrelevant (Broers 2015). Similarly, Svante Cornell (2017) claims that "the concept of frozenness falsely connotes a lack of dynamism, as if the politics of the conflict are frozen in time and space" (Cornell 2017, p. 2). For this reason, Dov Lynch (2005) has correctly argued that "the metaphor [of frozen] is misleading — the conflicts are not frozen. . . events have developed dynamically, and the situation on the ground today is very different from the context that gave rise to these conflicts in the late 1980s" (Lynch 2005, p. 192). Despite the fact that full-scale fighting had already stopped, the core issues of frozen conflicts have not been fully resolved as "the underlying interests of the formerly warring parties have neither been abated nor addressed" (Perry 2009, p.36); thus, the situation could easily slip back into violence (Shevchuk 2014). This is the case of Nagorno-Karabakh, where violence still erupts sporadically along the OSCE-monitored line of contact (Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe 2011) and where a few days war flared up in April 2016 (for overview, see Broers 2016).

Within the semantic critique of the adjective "frozen," it is clear that the term "resolution," which refers to peace processes in general, cannot be used to describe the present study. In attempt to overcome this ambiguity, recent research offers two main trends that describe the scope and consequences of post-Soviet conflicts. On the one hand, scholars have focused on the policy mechanisms of "freezing" the violence. With this aims, Helena Rytövuori-Apunen (2019) recurs to the term "settlement" to indicate the outcome of a frozen conflict. Dispute and conflict settlement, which in Russian is translated as uregulirovanie, refer to a wide scope of policies meant to maintain peace and stability; yet, no conflict resolution is reached (Rytövuori-Apunen 2019). Some studies have moved into the direction of substituting frozen conflicts with other concepts. Smetana and Ludvík (2019) have adopted the term like "protracted conflict process" to indicate an independent subtype of international conflict with possibly unique internal logic. Similarly, Broers (2015) applies the "enduring rivalry" framework to the case of Nagorno-Karabakh meant as "a particular kind of interstate conflict known for its longevity and stability" (Broers 2015, p. 556). On the other hand, using the term "failed frozen conflicts," Tudoroiu (2016) looks at domestic conditions by arguing that tensions mainly are due to local leaders trying to take advantage of the new international situation in order to promote their own group and private interests.

This last interpretation stresses the conflict “management” rather than its “settlement.” In particular, it presumes that the Kremlin, sometimes in cahoots with belligerent sides, has hidden strategies to wear out the enemy, which in this case would be the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the European Union (EU) competing with Russia for influence in the region. Such narrative poses itself with the discourse against the “imperial domain” of Russia, and it implies that Russia, being the patron of the separatist de facto states, can control outcomes of events in specific situations (see Caspersen 2009, pp. 47–53; Kolstø 2006, pp. 733–734). Herein, the concept of frozen conflict moved from its initial descriptive scope of a specific kind of international conflict to indicate a foreign policy strategy, especially when addressing Russia’s foreign policy.

This entry traces the main approaches to study Russia and frozen conflicts in the post-Soviet space, and it situates the concept into the broader research agenda of peace and conflict studies. The first subheading briefly presents the frozen conflicts of post-Soviet space, while it examines Russian policies and actions in the peace negotiation process. The second subheading discusses the main approaches used to interpret Russia’s role in settlement/management of frozen conflicts. Finally, the third subheading explores scholars’ attempts to unpack the dynamics of frozen conflicts with the aim to present a wider and sharper perspective of Russia’s role in regional security.

Russia’s Presence in the Frozen Conflicts: Similarity and Difference

During the 1990s the interest of the UN to develop regionally based peacekeeping created a favorable political climate for Russia’s efforts to negotiate the ceasefire agreements after violent ethno-conflicts erupted in several successive states of the Soviet Union (Lynch 1999, pp. 19–30). At the same time, the ceasefire promoted by Russia remained shaky and needed to be repeatedly established as escalation and militarization occurred (Lynch 2005). The most crucial example of such precarious arrangement remains Georgia, where Russia had a leading role in the ceasefire with South Ossetia in 1992. In fact, the trilateral format for peacekeeping forces including the Georgian government, the delegation of South-Ossetian separatists, and the Russian Federation was officially under Russian command, while the OSCE was monitoring the ceasefire giving legitimacy to the operation (Jonson and Archer 1996). The predominance given to Russia in the peace arrangement was unacceptable for Georgia, and it contributed to the Russo-Georgian war in August 2008. In contrast, the ceasefire in Abkhazia in 1993 was more difficult to negotiate and to legitimate because Russia objected to any clear subordination of its peacekeepers to the UN (Lynch 1998).

In any of the cases, after bilateral treaties were signed in April 2009, Russia has acquired military outposts and has formal control of the borders of the Abkhazia and South Ossetia toward Georgia (Galkina and Popov 2016). In Transnistria, where the ceasefire was set in July 1992, Russia’s ability to maintain control over military issues was facilitated by its close relationship with the separatist region’s peacekeeping contingent. Importantly, the ceasefire is ensured by the presence on the ground of a military contingent of the Russian Federation together with those of Moldova and Transnistria (Kuznetsova 1992). Despite its limited scope, the military presence of Russia allows Tiraspol to maintain a strong position in relation to Chisinau regarding Moldova’s likely membership in NATO and EU (Rogstad 2018). The case of Nagorno-Karabakh differs from the other frozen conflicts because no peacekeeping mission could be established after the ceasefire in May 1992 due to the opposition from both Azerbaijan and the Western actors of giving Russia a dominant role for a likely mission (for overview, see e.g., de Waal 2005). Moreover, unlike South Ossetia, Abkhazia, and Transnistria, Nagorno-Karabakh does not have a close historical and cultural connection with Russia (Minassian 2008); however, Russia is continuously there through the political, military, and economic support to Armenia (Ademmer 2017).

With the annexation of Crimea in 2014, international observers regarded it as the latest development in a series of events to set another frozen conflict (Burrige 2016; Blank 2016; Fischer 2016; Tudoroiu 2016). While it is true that the annexation of Crimea and the following conflict in Eastern Ukraine resemble dynamics of post-Soviet conflicts, several features make the Ukrainian case as well as exceptional: first, the presence of the Black Sea naval base in Sebastopol is Russia's largest military base outside its own territory and has guaranteed Russia the access to the Black Sea since the late eighteenth century; and second, the majority of people living in Crimea are Russian speakers, who maintain a strong historical and cultural relationship with Moscow (Sasse 2007). This ethnic arrangement had resulted in demands for territorial autonomy already in 1994, a "suspended" issue that eventually culminated in the annexation of 2014 after a referendum to be part of Russia took place (Harris 2020). Differently, before tensions escalated in 2014, issue between Kyiv and Donetsk and Luhansk oblasti had revolved not on independence or even autonomy but on the use of Russian as a state language, both locally and nationally, and on the federalization of Ukraine (Wilson 2016). Finally, the case of Chechnya in the 1990s is one of the most protracted of all the post-Soviet conflicts. Like other frozen conflicts, Chechnya involves secession and territorialized ethnicity. However, Chechnya, a mountainous region located in the North Caucasus, is the only among the post-Soviet conflicts to have occurred within the Russia Federation and where, being one of the opposing sides, Russia has persistently deployed its military power to resist secessionism (Hughes 2001). Although fights started already in 1999 after a peace treaty was signed by the belligerent sides in May 1997, Russia created the new constitution for Chechnya in 2003 according to which the Chechen Republic is one of federal subjects of the Russian Federation.

Realist and Ideational Interpretations

Russia's foreign policy has been interpreted according to several theories and approaches (see, e.g., Tsygankov 2018). At risk of oversimplification, this entry will focus on the two most popular ones that respectively take power (realist) and ideas (ideational) as Russia's sources of foreign policy. The most common interpretation of Russia's role in frozen conflicts and of its foreign policy in general derives from realist political theory according to which Russian policies are aimed to territorial expansion (Coyle 2018a; Kanet 2012; Blank 2008). Neorealism assumes that because of the inequality of capabilities and the anarchic nature of the world system (see Waltz 1959), powerful countries like Russia increase its relative power by invading their neighbors. Accordingly, the main goal of Russia's policies is, thus, to further its security interests and, subsequently, to decrease the influence of its rivals (Oldberg 2007). This interpretation understands international politics as a fight for survival in an anarchic system where no superior entity to nation-state is in charge. Hence, James Coyle (2018b) in his book Russia's Border Wars and Frozen Conflicts argues that the United States and NATO must prevent and counteract the "imperial-like" expansion of Russia's influence regionally and globally (see, e.g., Coyle 2018b, pp. 111–112, 198, 230, 272–273).

Within the realist school, a second component of explanations holds that Russia's agency in frozen conflicts is a function of external threats. In the Russian case, external threats come from neighbors' willingness to build closer ties with Western institutions like the EU, NATO, and even China as well as from political, economic, and military activity of external great powers. Accordingly, the closer the political ties between small neighboring states and external great powers, the more likely Russia will react assertively (Götz 2016; MacFarlane 2003, 2016). This line of reasoning draws on defensive realism, which holds that states tend to balance against dangerous concentration of power near their borders (Walt 1990; Waltz 1979). Thus, although Russia has applied selectively the card of “invasion,” the Kremlin continues to pursue calculated destabilization of frozen conflicts with the aim of controlling internal and external developments in the affected states in order to prevent them from turning to the West (Fischer 2016).

In general, both interpretations argue that Russia attempts to maintain a sphere of influence in the former territory of USSR (Ferguson and Hast 2018; Ortmann 2018; Sussex 2012). Despite its success among academic scholars of international relations, the realist approach regarding Russia’s foreign policy is often criticized to rely on a selective (if not marginal) approach to history, paying little attention to events between Russia and other post-Soviet republics, which are tackled with superficiality (Kuzio and D’Anieri 2018, Chap. 1). Similarly, when speaking about Russia’s “imperial” in international politics, Mikhail Molchanov (2012) asserts that “while the rhetoric is often reminiscent of great power ambitions, the actual objectives and real achievements of Russian foreign policy are much more modest and limited in scope. [At the same time], it is not quite post-imperialist either [as] Moscow consistently attempts to exploit existing weaknesses of the ‘near abroad’ governments and gain unilateral material advantages for Russian business majors, as well as geopolitical advantages for the Russian state” (Molchanov 2012, pp. 34–35). Moreover, Susan Hast (2014) argues correctly that the notion of “sphere of influence” in Western academic and policy discourse refers especially to Russia’s foreign policy; yet, its meaning is taken for granted, and it remains undertheorized or outside any critical study (Hast 2014; p. 14; see also Costa Buranelli 2017; Leichtova 2014).

In contrast to realist interpretations, notions about Russia’s idea of great power status lead to explain Russia’s revisionism in the post-Soviet space as a result derived from state’s cultural dimension (Hopf 2002). Accordingly, Russia acts as a spoiler in regional security of the post-Soviet space in order to defend Russia’s image of great power and its ancient values such as Slavic Brotherhood and Eurasianism that embody a civilization in its own right opposed to that of the West and the Western system of values (Gould-Davies 2019). The final goal of Russia’s foreign policy is to re-establish its great powerness, which vanished with the “loss” of the Coal War (Smith 2014; Urnov 2014). Therefore, Russia’s intervention in post-Soviet conflicts have been interpreted according to both Russia’s cultural uniqueness (Yanov 2013a, b) and attempts of Russia to obtain great power’s status recognition by peer states (Forsberg 2014; Larson and Shevchenko 2010, 2014) and to gain a seat at the decision table (Ikenberry 2011). After 1989, Russia’s main goal was to engage with the global US-led liberal international order as the co-founders (not a subaltern) of a new political community, what could putatively be called a “Greater West” (for similar arguments, see White and Feklyunina 2014; Smith 2013). However, a number of Western military and political activities in the post-Soviet space perceived as humiliations resulted in Russia’s frustration related to the loss of great power status (Heller 2014) as well as on the emphasis of ideological and cultural superiority of Russia (see, e.g., Laruelle 2017; Tsygankov 2007, p. 7). This argument connects Russia’s revanche with its “defeat” in Europe. As Gerard Toal (2017) argues:

Russian geopolitical culture under Vladimir Putin became concertedly revanchist in conception and goal. That revanchism did not have a teleological territorial end: it was not about re-creating the territory of the Soviet Union or about expanding the territorial expanse of the Russian Federation. Instead, it was about restoring existing Russian state strength and territorial integrity. Ground zero for this project was Chechnya, Russia’s inner abroad, and it was Putin’s use of force there that launched his political career and gave impetus to the project of “making Russia great again.” (p. 280)

Although ideational factors have provided nuanced explanations for Russia’s foreign policy, they have been criticized for pre-given assumptions on Russia’s historical experience (see, e.g., Katzenstein and Weygandt 2017; Prozorov 2010). Hence, the picture still seems to be incomplete, leaving several questions and doubts about the very nature of Russia’s policies in frozen conflicts and the region.

Critical Approach and Reconceptualization

Tired of “[...]the hasty conclusions that so often accompany observations of Russian policies” which are commonly deduced by “rough historical analogies in order to construct continuity between past events and future,” Helena Rytövuori-Apunen (2019, p. 2) examines the factual and existential experience of Russia’s practices in frozen conflicts without the predominance of a priori theoretical frameworks (2019). Inspired by practice in international relations, this study shares Vincent Pouliot’s (2010) point of departure that focuses on relational issues between agents in international politics rather than on agents’ properties (2010, pp. 49, 96–98). In his study investigating the “missed opportunity” to incorporate Russia within a community of common security interests with the Western States, Pouliot (2010, Chaps. 5 and 6) shows how diplomacy has become a normal, though not self-evident, practice between the two former enemies. However, this fragile relationship is still subjected to ongoing symbolic power struggles: NATO’s Eastern enlargement resulted into a Russia’s “hysteresis” over Western unrecognition of its interests in the region. Within this framework, Rytövuori-Apunen (2019) researches Russia’s response in frozen conflicts across more than two decades through the analytical concept of “deep border,” which is meant as the habitual practice for Russia to establish and to consolidate its presence in another state with the argument that it has legitimate reasons – from right to protect to borders security – to handle internal dynamics of the latter. Such claim collides with norms of sovereignty and territorial integrity from the international community resulting an inevitable disaccord with the West over the position that Russia should assume in the post-Soviet space (Rytövuori-Apunen 2019). The importance of this approach relies in its critical posture toward the tendency to impose similarity as a model and in its proposal to use similarities to unfold difference.

With a similar aim to escape the existing biases that burden the concept of frozen conflicts within peace and conflict studies literature, Smetana and Ludvík (2019) redefine frozen conflicts by outlining “a cyclical understanding” of their dynamics (Smetana and Ludvík 2019, p. 8). Unlike other types of international conflictual situations, a frozen conflict undergoes a periodical resumption of mutual relations between the opposing sides: either toward diplomatic negotiations or re-escalation toward use of armed force, which Smetana and Ludvík call, respectively, “peaceful thawing” and “violent thawing” (2019, p. 8). In the cyclical nature of this conflictual dynamic, external factors such as the interests of powerful third parties may either prevent a successful transformation of frozen conflicts (i.e., stable peace) (Ditrych 2019) or fail to address the interests of local actors (Bláhová 2019). Despite their epistemological differences, the two approaches represent a novelty in the way to look and interpret frozen conflicts as well as power and security in general. The first argues that we can know about agency or actor – Russia in this case – through the regularity of actions that it shows or which relates to it and consequently gives them a pattern (see e.g., Bueger 2018, Chap. 3). The second provides ground for a systematic empirical inquiry into frozen conflicts dynamics. A practice explanation of strategic interaction of actors involved within the cyclical nature of frozen conflict dynamics has important implications for future research on dispute resolution and international security more broadly.

Summary

The term frozen conflict has not a clear connotation both among decision-makers and policy professionals and in the media discourse on international politics. While the term has referred first to a conflictual outcome exclusively of the post-Soviet space and has been later extended to other geographic areas, it has gradually shifted to indicate a distinct foreign policy strategy promoted by great powers to halt others’ influence in the region. Particularly in the case of Russia in the aftermath of Ukraine’s crisis, Western observers have looked at Russia’s policy in the region as an attempt to set the scene for another protracted frozen-conflicts situation similar to those of the early 1990s.

This entry has discussed the main approaches used to study Russia's foreign policy in the frozen conflicts of the post-Soviet space. While accumulation of power as well as ideas provides valid arguments for explaining Russia's behavior as main external actor in the peace negotiations, these theoretical approaches tend to impose similarity as a model without considering the peculiarities of each frozen conflict. At the same time, in the necessity to overcome spatial and temporal limits of the common understanding of the term, scholars within peace and conflict studies have traced a common cyclical path of frozen conflicts. Drawing on the novelty of these arguments, a future research could investigate the diplomatic practice adopted by both opposing sides and by patron states to explain what happens at the critical junction when the "thawing" results in conflict resolution or instead the process reaches its peak without resolution and the conflict refreezes.

Cross-References

- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ Mediation
- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination

References

Ademmer, E. (2017). Russia's impact on EU policy transfer to the post-Soviet space: The contested neighborhood (1st ed.) (Hardback). Routledge. <https://www.routledge.com/Russias-Impact-on-EU-Policy-Transfer-to-the-Post-Soviet-Space-The-Contested/Ademmer/p/book/9781138944244>. 10 Feb 2020.

- Bláhová, P. (2019). Nagorno-Karabakh: Obstacles to the resolution of the frozen conflict. Asia Europe Journal, 17(1), 69–85.
- Blank, S. (2008). Russia and the Black Sea's Frozen Conflicts in Strategic Perspective. Mediterranean Quarterly, 19, 23–54. <https://doi.org/10.1215/10474552-2008-012>
- Blank, S. (2016). Opinion: Putin cannot afford the frozen conflict in Ukraine. Newsweek. <https://www.newsweek.com/putin-cannot-afford-frozen-conflict-ukraine-421083>. 1 Feb 2020.
- Broers, L. (2015). From "frozen conflict" to enduring rivalry: Reassessing the Nagorny Karabakh conflict. Nationalities Papers, 43(4), 556–576.
- Broers, L. (2016). The Nagorny Karabakh conflict: Defaulting to war. <https://www.chathamhouse.org/publication/nagorny-karabakh-conflict-defaulting-war>. 10 Feb 2020.
- Bueger, C. (2018). International practice theory (2nd ed.). New York, NY: Springer Berlin Heidelberg.
- Burridge, T. (2016). Daily reality of Ukraine's "frozen war". BBC News. <https://www.bbc.com/news/world-europe-35990401>. 7 Feb 2020.
- Caspersen, N. (2009). Playing the Recognition Game: External Actors and De Facto States. The International Spectator, 44, 47–60. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03932720903351146>
- Cornell, S. E. (Ed.). (2017). The international politics of the Armenian-Azerbaijani conflict: The original "frozen conflict" and European security. Palgrave Macmillan US. <https://www.palgrave.com/gp/book/9781137600042>. 1 Feb 2020.
- Costa Buranelli, F. (2017). Spheres of Influence as Negotiated Hegemony – The Case of Central Asia. Geopolitics, 1–26. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14650045.2017.1413355>
- Coyle, J. J. (2018a). International law, realism, and nationalism. In J. J. Coyle (Ed.), Russia's border wars and frozen conflicts (pp. 1–22). Cham: Springer International Publishing. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-319-52204-3_1. 3 Feb 2020.
- Coyle, J. J. (2018b). Russia's border wars and frozen conflicts. Palgrave Macmillan. <https://www.palgrave.com/gp/book/9783319522036>. 3 Feb 2020.
- de Waal, T. (2005). The Nagorny Karabakh conflict: Origins, dynamics and misperceptions. In L. Broers (Ed.), The limits of leadership: Elites and societies in the Nagorny Karabakh peace process (pp. 12–17). London: Conciliation Resource.
- Dirtych, O. (2019). Georgia's frosts: Ethnopolitical conflict as assemblage. Asia Europe Journal, 17(1), 47–67.
- Ferguson, I., & Hast, S. (2018). Introduction: The return of spheres of influence? Geopolitics, 23(2), 277–284.
- Fischer, S. (Ed.). (2016). Not Frozen! The unresolved conflicts over Transnistria, Abkhazia, South Ossetia and Nagorno-Karabakh in light of the crisis over Ukraine (Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik research paper 97). Berlin: Stiftung Wissenschaft und Politik, German Institute for International and Security Affairs.

- Forsberg, T. (2014). Status conflicts between Russia and the West: Perceptions and emotional biases. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 47(3–4), 323–331.
- Galkina, T. A., & Popov, F. A. (2016). Russia's borders with Abkhazia and South Ossetia on four scales: Analysis of the political discourse. Regional Research of Russia, 6(3), 258–266.
- Götz, E. (2016). Neorealism and Russia's Ukraine policy, 1991–present. Contemporary Politics, 22(3), 301–323.
- Gould-Davies, N. (2019). The politics of Eurasianism: Identity, popular culture and Russia's foreign policy. International Affairs, 95(5), 1186–1187.
- Harris, E. (2020). What is the Role of Nationalism and Ethnicity in the Russia–Ukraine Crisis? Europe-Asia Studies, 1–21. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09668136.2019.1708865>
- Hast, S. (2014). Spheres of influence in international relations: History, theory and politics. Burlington: Routledge.
- Heller, R. (2014). Russia's quest for respect in the international conflict management in Kosovo. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 47(3), 333–343.
- Hopf, T. (2002). Social construction of foreign policy: Identities and foreign policies, Moscow, 1955 and 1999 (1st ed.). Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Hughes, J. (2001). Chechnya: The causes of a protracted post-Soviet conflict. Civil Wars, 4(4), 11–48.
- Ikenberry, G. J. (2011). The future of the liberal world order: Internationalism after America. Foreign Affairs, 90(3), 56–68.
- Jonson, L., & Archer, C. (1996). Peacekeeping and the role of Russia in Eurasia. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Kanet, R. E. (2012). The return of imperial Russia. In M. Sussex (Ed.), Conflict in the Former USSR (pp. 15–34). Cambridge University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1017/CBO9780511980565.003>
- Katzenstein, P. J., & Weygandt, N. (2017). Mapping Eurasia in an open world: How the insularity of Russia's geopolitical and civilizational approaches limits its foreign policies. Perspectives on Politics, 15(2), 428–442.
- Kolsto, P. (2006). The Sustainability and Future of Unrecognized Quasi-States. Journal of Peace Research, 43, 723–740. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343306068102>
- Kuzio, T., & D'Anieri, P. (2018). The sources of Russia's great power politics: Ukraine and the challenge to the European order. E-international Relations Publishing. <https://www.e-ir.info/publication/the-sources-of-russia-as-great-power-politics-ukraine-and-the-challenge-to-the-european-order/>. 19 Nov 2018.
- Kuznetsova, V. (1992). Settlement in the Dnestr region. Nezavisimaya Gazeta, 44(29), 21.
- Larson, D. W., & Shevchenko, A. (2010). Status seekers: Chinese and Russian responses to U.S. primacy. International Security, 34(4), 63–95.
- Larson, D. W., & Shevchenko, A. (2014). Russia says no: Power, status, and emotions in foreign policy. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 47(3–4), 269–279.
- Laruelle, M. (2017). Putin's Regime and the Ideological Market: A Difficult Balancing Game. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. <https://carnegieendowment.org/2017/03/16/putin-s-regime-and-ideological-market-difficult-balancing-game-pub-68250>
- Leichtova, M. (2014). Misunderstanding Russia: Russian foreign policy and the West. Farnham: Routledge. <http://ezp.biblio.unitn.it/login?url=http://search.ebscohost.com/login.aspx?direct=true&db=e000xww&AN=754237&lang=it&site=eds-live&scope=site>. 25 Feb 2018.
- Lynch, D. (1998). The conflict in Abkhazia: Dilemmas in Russian 'peacekeeping' policy. London: Royal Institute of International Affairs.
- Lynch, D. (1999). Russian peacekeeping strategies in the CIS: The case of Moldova, Georgia and Tajikistan. Springer.
- Lynch, D. (2005). New thinking about “frozen” conflicts. Helsinki Monitor, 16(3), 192–195.
- MacFarlane, S. N. (2003). Russian policy in the CIS under Putin. In G. Gorodetsky (Ed.), Russia between East and West: Russian foreign policy on the threshold of the twenty-first century (pp. 118–123). London: Frank Cass.
- MacFarlane, S. N. (2016). Kto Vinovat? *Why is there a crisis in Russia's relations with the West? Contemporary Politics, 22(3), 342–358.
- Minassian, G. (2008). Armenia, a Russian outpost in the Caucasus? Russia/NIS Center, 27, 21.
- Molchanov, M. (2012). Russian foreign policy in the in the “near abroad”: Has the post-imperial adjustment happened. https://www.academia.edu/25444449/Russian_Foreign_Policy_in_the_Near_Abroad_Has_the_Post-imperial_Adjustment_Happened. 9 Oct 2018.
- Oldberg, I. (2007). Russia's great power ambitions and policy under Putin. In R. E. Kanet (Ed.), Russia re-emerging great power (pp. 13–30). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe. (2011). Executive summary | OSCE. <https://www.osce.org/mg/76209>. 4 Feb 2020.
- Ortmann, S. (2018). Beyond spheres of influence: The myth of the state and Russia's seductive power in Kyrgyzstan. Geopolitics, 23(2), 404–435.
- Perry, V. (2009). At cross purposes? Democratization and peace implementation strategies in Bosnia and Herzegovina's frozen conflict. Human Rights Review, 10(1), 35–54.
- Pouliot, V. (2010). International security in practice: The politics of NATO–Russia diplomacy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. <http://ebooks.cambridge.org/ref/id/CBO9780511676185>. 3 Feb 2020.
- Prozorov, S. (2010). Ethos without nomos: The Russian–Georgian War and the post-Soviet state of exception. Ethics and Global Politics, 3(4), 255–275. <https://doi.org/10.3402/egp.v3i4.5665>
- Rogstad, A. (2018). The next Crimea?: Getting Russia's Transnistria policy right. Problems of Post-Communism, 65(1), 49–64.

- Rytövuori-Apunen, H. (2019). Power and conflict in Russia's borderlands: The post-Soviet geopolitics of dispute resolution. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Sasse, G. (2007). The Crimea question: Identity, transition, and conflict. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Shevchuk, Z. (2014). The evolving nature of the armed conflict in South Ossetia: From “frozen” to “hot” and back. Obrana a strategie (Defence and Strategy), 14(1), 51–64.
- Smetana, M., & Ludvík, J. (2019). Between war and peace: A dynamic reconceptualization of “frozen conflicts”. Asia Europe Journal, 17(1), 1–14.
- Smith, M. A. (2013). Russia and multipolarity since the end of the Cold War. East European Politics, 29(1), 36–51. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21599165.2013.764481>.
- Smith, H. (2014). Russia as a great power: Status inconsistency and the two Chechen wars. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 47(3), 355–363.
- Sussex, M. (2012). The shape of the security order in the former USSR. In M. Sussex (Ed.), Conflict in the former USSR (pp. 35–63). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. https://www.cambridge.org/core/product/identifier/CBO9780511980565A012/type/book_part. 3 Feb 2020.
- Toal, G. (2017). Near abroad: Putin, the West and the contest over Ukraine and the Caucasus. New York: Oxford University Press USA.
- Tsygankov, A. P. (2007). Finding a civilisational idea: “West,” “Eurasia,” and “Euro-East” in Russia’s foreign policy. Geopolitics, 12(3), 375–399.
- Tsygankov, A. P. (2018). Routledge handbook of Russian foreign policy. Routledge. <https://www.routledge.com/Routledge-Handbook-of-Russian-Foreign-Policy/Tsygankov/p/book/9781138690448>. 2 May 2018.
- Tudoroiu, T. (2016). Unfreezing failed frozen conflicts: A post-Soviet case study. Journal of Contemporary European Studies, 24(3), 375–396.
- Urnov, M. (2014). “Greatpowerness” as the key element of Russian self-consciousness under erosion. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 47(3), 305–322.
- Waltz, K. N. (1979). Theory of International Politics (1 edition). McGraw-Hill.
- Walt, S. M. (1990). The origins of alliances (New edition). Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Waltz, K. N. (1959). Man, the state, and war: A theoretical analysis. New York: Columbia University Press. <https://www.amazon.it/Man-State-War-Theoretical-Analysis/dp/0231125372>. 23 Aug 2018.
- White, S., & Feklyunina, V. (2014). Identities and foreign policies in Russia, Ukraine and Belarus – The other Europes. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan. <https://www.palgrave.com/us/book/9780333993613>. 25 Aug 2018.
- Wilson, A. (2016). The Donbas in 2014: Explaining civil conflict perhaps, but not civil war. Europe-Asia Studies, 68(4), 631–652.
- Yanov, A. (2013a). The birth of Pan-Slavism – Part one. Institute of Modern Russia. <https://imrussia.org/en/nation/527-the-birth-of-pan-slavism>. 3 Feb 2020.
- Yanov, A. (2013b). The birth of Pan-Slavism – Part two. Institute of Modern Russia. <https://imrussia.org/en/nation/533-the-birth-of-pan-slavism-2>. 3 Feb 2020.

S

Safety Perceptions

- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Search for Peace, the

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Arms control; Balance of power; Civil resistance (see Nonviolence); Conciliation (see Reconciliation); Diplomacy; Nonviolence; Pacifism; Peace; Peace through prosperity; Peace through strength; Peacekeeping; Reconciliation; Restorative justice; Track II diplomacy; Truth commissions; World government

Definition

Thirteen methods that have been proposed or tried as a path to peace, each with its own actual or predicted successes and failures.

Among the methods by which people have searched for peace is the pacifist vision in which the “lion lies down with the lamb,” although it leaves unclear just what the lion eats to survive.

Nonviolence as practiced by Gandhi, King, and others has under some circumstances proven an effective tool for peace. Some put their hopes for peace in arms control, some believe in peace through strength and others in peace through prosperity based on trade. Some envision peace emerging from diplomacy, whether by authorized representatives of nations or arising from the efforts of NGOs and individuals. Others believe it requires a balance of power among nation-states regionally and globally, or world government, or international peacekeepers, or reconciling former enemies and restorative justice. Each of these is discussed in turn below.

Pacifism

Siddhartha (c. 563/480–c. 483/400 BC), the founder of Buddhism, probably is the earliest famous pacifist. Jesus instructed his followers “If anyone slaps you on the right cheek, turn to them the other cheek as well.” Greek poet Euripides (480–406 BC) and his Chinese contemporary Mozi (c. 470–391 BC) were pacifists as were the prolific early Christian writers Tertullian (160–220) and Origen of Alexandria (184–253) and Islamic philosopher Al-Ghazali (1058–1111).

Western and Central Europe degenerated into frequent local wars and Viking raids with the collapse of the Carolingian Empire (888). Trying to reduce the toll, clergy in 989 proclaimed the Peace of God threatening excommunication for anyone attacking priests and then gradually extended the threat to protect noncombatants, children and women, and finally merchants, then to pillaging churches and burning houses to the prohibited acts. Little changed. The Truce of God followed in 1027, prohibiting war on Sundays in most of France, Germany, Italy, and the Low Countries enforced by penance, exile, and excommunication. It was extended to Saturday in memory of the Resurrection, then to Friday in memory of the Passion, then to Thursday in memory of the Ascension, and then to periods such as Advent through Epiphany and Mardi Gras through Easter, until in theory it left only 80 days scattered throughout the year for war (Thompson and Johnson 1937). Again, little changed.

Centuries later in 1928, 15 initial and 47 later signatories agreed to abandon war as a tool of national policy in the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Three years later, signatory Japan invaded Manchuria. Seven years after signing, Italy invaded Ethiopia, and Germany occupied the Rhineland and annexed Austria. Technically still in effect, it is largely if not universally viewed as well-meaning and ineffectual.

Nonviolence

Nonviolence, also known as civil resistance and civil disobedience, inspired by writers such as Henry David Thoreau (1992) and Leo Tolstoy (2012), has proved a powerful tool (Clark 2009; Homes and Gan 2011). Although marred by occasional violence, Mohandas Gandhi (2002) led a successful decade-long nonviolent struggle that ended in 1947 with India's freedom from Britain. In the United States, the 1960s saw sustained civil resistance to segregation led largely by Martin Luther King resulting in the Civil Rights Act, while Cesar Chavez and Delores Huerta's version improved the lot of farmworkers in California. In 1980, Lech Walesa (later a recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize and president of Poland) founded Solidarity, the first independent trade union in the Soviet bloc, which used the methods of civil resistance to advance workers' rights. The 1986

People Power Revolution ended the 21-year rule of Ferdinand Marcos and restored democracy to the Philippines. In 1989, Vaclav Havel's "Velvet Revolution" led to the overthrow of Czechoslovakia's communist government. In 1998, the UN General Assembly 1998 declared the first decade of the twenty-first century as the International Decade for the Promotion of a Culture of Peace and Nonviolence for the Children of the World. The 2003 nonviolent campaign organized by Leymah Gbowee (who later received the Nobel Peace Prize) ended a 14-year civil war in Liberia. The 2004–2005 Orange Revolution led to Ukrainian elections widely accepted as fair. Early in 2005, the Kyrgyz dictator fell to a peaceful protest.

However, conditions must be favorable for success. George Orwell noted the importance of a free press and right of assembly allowing growth into a mass movement. Martin Luther King, Jr. specified six requirements. First, following Thoreau, individuals must be willing to suffer consequences. Second, following Gandhi, courage and discipline are required. Third, it must seek reconciliation rather than victory. Fourth, it must target evil, not people. Fifth, resisters must not do violence to others or to their own spirits. Sixth, it requires faith that justice will triumph. Outside factors often are important. Gandhi succeeded to a large degree because Britain no longer could afford the costs of its empire in India and elsewhere. Integration had begun in the US Army, professional sports, the schools, and many workplaces over a decade before Martin Luther King began his work and President Johnson proved a powerful ally. Lech Walesa and Vaclav Havel faced a considerably weakened Soviet Union and received significant covert help from the United States. Widespread coverage by the mass media led to widespread sympathy and practical support.

Sharp and Pauson (2005), the first called both the Machiavelli and the Clausewitz of nonviolence, detailed dozens of nonviolent tactics available for integration into a larger strategy that takes political and cultural circumstances into account. They may be classified as one of the three general types:

Nonviolent protests include hunger strikes, petitions, posters, processions, speeches, and use of social media and the like to broaden public awareness of an issue and persuade or influence the public or people affected.

Noncooperation is targeted halting or hindering of an industry, political system, or economic process. Methods include labor strikes, boycotts, withholding of taxes and even of sex (recently in Colombia, Kenya, Liberia, the Philippines, and South Sudan), and general disobedience – such as Rosa Parks' refusal to surrender her bus seat to a white passenger.

Nonviolent intervention can take many forms such as blockades, occupations, sit-ins, and physically interceding between factions (which sometimes has turned violent, even fatal). It can involve third-party mediators, accompaniments (individuals backed by an international support network who provide an on-site international presence), and international publicity for organizations, communities, and individuals under threat (Mahony and Eguren 1997). This often dissuades violence; puts pressure on governments, multinational corporations, and other actors; and focuses on human rights, peacebuilding, and defending local resources and culture.

Arms Control

It is common for a state interested in changing the status quo in its favor to strengthen its military capability, often leading possible opponents to respond in kind, resulting in an arms race, widely believed as alone sufficient to cause wars. Logically, that leads to the idea that arms control is a way to peace. It has precursors in prohibiting specific weapons such as barbed or poisoned arrows in the Mahabharata or crossbows by Pope Urban II. The most common example given of an arms race is the 20 or so years leading up to World War I. French and British spending on armaments doubled, and German spending increased tenfold from a much smaller base. Somewhat inconveniently for the theory, non-defense spending increased even faster in all three countries. More importantly, subsequent publication of its cabinet meeting minutes makes clear that Germany aimed to replace Britain as Europe's hegemon, eliminate France as a world power, dominate Russia, and unite Central Europe under its control. That is, the German arms buildup did not lead to but implemented policy (Fischer 1967).

The potential destructiveness of intercontinental missiles mounting nuclear weapons revived interest in arms control after WWII. Cold War policy makers tried to combine arms control and arms buildup to avert nuclear war. Policy evolved from the idea of a decisive "first strike" capability into "mutually assured destruction" [MAD] – in effect, a mathematical game of prisoners' dilemma which was actually used to calculate force levels so as to reduce the likelihood of nuclear war. The Cold War arms race did not result in a Soviet-US world-destroying nuclear war, despite coming close in 1962 and 1983.

Arms control faces new problems with the end of the Cold War. The willingness of "rogue states" to violate even voluntary agreements, the spread of intercontinental missiles, the increasing number of nuclear powers, the evolution of supersonic into hypersonic missiles, the militarization of space, the weaponization of trade and computer hacking, and the growth of global terrorism – particularly the possibility that terrorists might surreptitiously obtain weapons of mass destruction untraceable to their source – undermine the assumptions on which arms control is based.

Peace Through Strength

The contrary position to achieving peace through arms control or disarmament is that peace requires sufficient strength to discourage attack and to defend successfully if it occurs (Baruch 1952). As Flavius Vegetius Renuus echoing the Emperor Hadrian famously wrote when Rome faced multiple threats of attack, "Let him who desires peace prepare for war."

Writing in the same vein 14 centuries later, Alexander Hamilton (1937) in Federalist No. 24 argued that strong garrisons in the west and a strong navy in the east were necessary to preserve the newly independent United States from British or Spanish threats. Soon after, in his 1793 State of the Union Address, President George Washington asserted that “There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war.” Ninety years later, in his 1983 State of the Union Address, President Ronald Reagan also linked freedom and prosperity not just for the United States but other nations as well saying, “But our strategy for peace with freedom must also be based on strength—economic strength and military strength. A strong American economy is essential to the well-being and security of our friends and allies.”

Peace Through Prosperity

Reagan’s idea hardly is new or original. Building on it, in 1996, the United States intending to foster economic interdependence and prosperity that it hoped would lead to peace in the Middle East offered Jordan, Egypt, and the Palestinian territories of the West Bank and Gaza Strip unlimited duty-free imports of products that were produced cooperatively with Israel in Qualified Industrial Zones [QIZs]. Only Jordan accepted and only one Jordanian seized the opportunity, but he and the Israeli partner he found soon created 850 new jobs in Jordan at salaries 40% above Jordanian norms. Seeing their success, other Jordanian entrepreneurs followed suit, and by 2002 more than 30,000 Jordanians were employed in QIZs exporting over $400 million in goods, not just to the United States. In 2005, Egypt followed suit opening a QIZ that proved comparably successful. The QIZs allow US companies to import goods duty-free rather than pay duties up to 31%, savings that can be passed on to the consumer. Although opponents remain and Palestine has not joined, proponents still hope to see the idea behind QIZs spread along with peace (Saif 2006).

Generally, one avoids or at least minimizes wars with one with whom one trades (Lehman and Lehman 2010; Smith 2008; Vernon 2015). In this view, the world consists of countries that are fully integrated into the global trading networks and those that are not. The former resolve disputes by sometimes contentious but largely peaceful means, while most of the world’s wars involve those not part of the system. The more countries can be brought fully into the world’s trading networks, the more prosperity and peace will follow. This suggests a general diplomatic strategy spelled out in some detail by Barnett (2004).

Diplomacy

Diplomacy is at least as old as civilization. We have letters exchanged by rulers of Sumerian city-states arranging trade and settling disputes. We have the widespread diplomatic correspondence a thousand years later in the Amarna Letters from fourteenth-century BC Egypt. The first book on statecraft is from India by Kautilya (1992) in which he advises building alliances to defeat adversaries. Similarly, Nizam al-Mulk’s (1978) eleventh-century The Book of Government or Rules for Kings is a guide on all aspects of government including diplomacy. The competing city-states of the Italian Renaissance led in 1532 to Machiavelli’s The Prince (2011). In 1716, de Callières (2000) followed with On the Manner of Negotiating with Princes, much of it addressing the personal qualities required of the successful diplomat. Modern treatises abound, but Crocker, et. al. (2007), Eban (1983), Kissinger (1994), Morgenthau (2005), and Nicholson (1988) are cited frequently.

Embassies, consulates, the United Nations, and numerous international agencies provide forums for conducting diplomacy on a wide range of concerns. The basic diplomatic tools now include arbitration, confidence-building measures, good offices, mediation, bi- and multinational conferences, negotiation, reconciliation, summits, threats, and ultimatums (Reynolds 2007). It is conducted by exchange of gifts (and sometimes bribes), at social functions, in informal consultations, and through press releases, official public statements, and diplomatic signals such as recall of an ambassador (Cohen 1987) or the ping-pong games that led to the restoration of US-Chinese relations. It may be supplemented by arms sales, development assistance, sanctions, tariffs, and training of armed forces and police, known as “hard power” ever since Joseph Nye (2004) contrasted it with what he termed “soft power,” the extent to which a state’s culture, institutions, policies, and values attract or repel others. Soft power methods include ongoing and emergency foreign aid, athletic, cultural, and educational exchanges. Significant examples include Pope John Paul II’s visit to Poland in support of the Solidarity Movement and more general long-term programs such as the Radio Free Europe during the Cold War, the US Peace Corps and Fulbright Program, and the Chinese Belt and Road Initiative involving infrastructure development and investments in Africa, Asia, and Europe.

Track II Diplomacy

Joseph Montville (1991) coined the term “Track II diplomacy” to contrast it with traditional diplomacy that evolved from nonprofit organizations such as Rotary International’s efforts dating from World War I (Epstein 2006) and Eisenhower’s “People to People International” program in the 1950s. It now includes an incredible variety of programs by non-state actors such as churches, think tanks, humanitarian organizations, and artistic, entertainment, sport, and student exchanges under programs, some short- and some long-lived (Forward 2016; Hanson 2007) such as Experiment in International Living (experiment.org), Junior Year Abroad (studyabroad.com/worldwide/academic-year), Nonviolent Peaceforce (nonviolentpeaceforce.org), Rotary International (rotarianactiongroup.org), Sister Cities (sistercities.org), Search for the Common Ground (sfcg.org), Transpartisan Dialogue (www.reunitingamerica.org), and Wisdom Councils (Rough 2002).

Chiagas (2003) identifies three main Type II activities. The first involves unofficial actors serving as intermediaries between people and government. The intermediaries often are former government officials, a prominent example being former US President Jimmy Carter. The second occurs when neutrals bring key individuals together in their personal rather than their official capacities, for off-the-record talks focused on trust building. The third occurs when citizens take the initiative in trying to stimulate progress in official negotiations.

Track II targets feelings and so is difficult to assess. At their best, Track II efforts can open channels of communication, reduce stereotyping, strengthen the influence of moderates, and weaken that of the ideologues. To do so, Track II activists often must overcome obstacles such as the opprobrium of their neighbors, the hostility of their media, the propaganda of their educational system, and obstacles to meeting counterparts. Type II activities often employ methods developed by scholars such as Burton (1969) and Fisher (1989). These “engage representative citizens from the conflicting parties in designing steps to be taken in the political arena to change perceptions and stereotypes, to create a sense that peace might be possible, and to involve more and more of their compatriots [in achieving it]” (Saunders 1996). Knowledgeable, skilled, and neutral scholars or practitioners usually act as trainers and facilitators.

Track II is process oriented, often draws idealists with relatively little influence, and often is greeted with enthusiasm by liberals and skepticism by conservatives. Many have a New Age, therapeutic flavor, depend on small-group discussion with ground rules to maintain civility, and tend to paper over differences with “apple pie and motherhood” language on which all can agree until action is required. But, the two forms of diplomacy can and do reinforce one another. Track II can improve relationships and improve public attitudes, leading to a favorable bargaining climate for the Track I diplomats who can then resolve issues such as boundaries, distribution of political power, and economic issues that are beyond the capability of Track II diplomacy.

Balance of Power

In a multistate variation on peace through strength, balance of power theory asserts that national security is enhanced when no state is strong enough to dominate others regionally or globally. A rising power seen as a threat provokes others to form a defensive alliance, strengthen their own defenses, or both to make war risky so as to maintain peace. The idea dates at least to the Greek city-states, was made explicit during the Renaissance, and was formulated as a fundamental diplomatic method in seventeenth-century Europe by writers such as Grotius and Fenelon and in the eighteenth century by von Gentz. Recent analysts of this approach such as Kissinger (1994) and Morgenthau (2005) recognize only about a dozen periods in history of actual balance of power systems, none of them particularly peaceful.

The resulting alliances may not actually be strong enough to balance and dissuade the perceived aggressor partly because of a tendency of some allies to free ride within the balancing coalition, for example, by not meeting obligations to maintain their own military at agreed levels as has been the case within NATO. Worse, such alliances can turn small disputes into large ones through chaining, which occurs when a state deems any attack on an ally the equivalent of an attack on itself, creating a situation in which a weak state could drag states like prisoners in a chain gang into wars they may have no desire to fight. Thus did the assassination of an Austro-Hungarian prince grow into WWI.

In practice, the responses to a hegemon are more varied than the balance of power theory suggests. Instead of joining the power balancing alliance, some states may ally with the aggressor either in hope of sharing in the spoils (climbing on the bandwagon) or of diverting the attack from itself (passing the buck). Alternatively, states may seek good diplomatic relations with the perceived aggressor, chill its relations with its perceived targets, or if antagonistic to the aggressor and the victim encourage and perhaps try to prolong a war between the two, weakening both.

Balance of power periods often coincide with dependence on professional armies and tend toward wars fought not for great causes or national survival but for strategic and political reasons. Korea and Vietnam are Cold War examples fought by the US strategy devised by the Truman administration of “containing” the Soviet empire within its WWII gains to maintain the status quo.

World Government

Many, perhaps most, advocates of a world government assume on the basis of the scourge of war the desirability of a world government that will exercise a benign sovereign authority over the entire world. Just how this might happen and when varies from one thinker to another. Dante (1265–1321) envisioned a universal state modeled on the Roman Empire, Francisco de Vitoria (c. 1483–1546) conceived a “republic of the whole world,” and Hugo Grotius (1583–1645) thought in terms of international law leading to his foundational work, On the Law of War and Peace. Others, such as Niebuhr (April 1949), see the idea as delusional.

Immanuel Kant (2003) listed nine requirements for establishing permanent global peace to be accomplished in two phases. The first phase, consisting of six steps, was to be taken immediately and supposedly would end current hostilities, while the second phase consisting of the final three, requiring more time, supposedly would establish permanent peace:

- No secret treaty of peace is valid in which there is tacitly reserved matter for a future war.
- No independent states shall come under the dominion of another by inheritance, exchange, purchase, or donation.
- Standing armies shall in time be totally abolished.
- National debts shall not be contracted with a view to the external friction of states.
- No state shall by force interfere with the constitution or government of another state.

- No state shall, during war, permit such acts of hostility which would make mutual confidence in the subsequent peace impossible, such as the employment of assassins, poisoners, breach of capitulation, and incitement to treason in the opposing state.
- The civil constitution of every state should be republican.
- The law of nations shall be founded on a federation of free states.
- The law of world citizenship shall be limited to conditions of universal hospitality.

Ulysses Grant thought that “the Great Framers of the World will so develop it that it becomes one nation, so that armies and navies are no longer necessary.” He further believed that “at some future day, the nations of the earth will agree on some sort of congress which will take cognizance of international questions of difficulty and whose decisions will be as binding as the decisions of the Supreme Court are upon us.”

Bahá'u'lláh (1817–1892), founder of Bahá'í, identified the establishment of world unity and a global federation of nations as a key principle of the faith and foresaw a world legislature, an international court, and an international executive empowered to carry out the decisions of the judicial and legislative bodies. Bahá'u'lláh called for world reconciliation, reunification, collective security, and peaceful settlement of disputes. His great-grandson, Shoghi Effendi (1938), described it as the “world’s future super state” and Bahá'í as the state religion.

H.G. Wells (1901) envisaged the unification of the English-speaking peoples by the year 2000 in a New Republic that would be the means “by which the final peace of the world may be assured forever.” Its principles would “shape and determine that still ampler future of which the coming hundred years is but the opening phase. The New Republic must ultimately become a ‘World-State’.”

Some view the League of Nations, founded as a result of the Treaty of Versailles, as the first attempt to implement Kant’s vision. Its goals included collective security, dispute resolution through negotiation, and disarmament. It failed partly because it lacked its own armed forces and so depended on the great powers to enforce its resolutions which they proved reluctant to do, partly because the United States was not a member, partly because the Eurocentric League would not apply its own principles to condemn Italy’s invasion of Ethiopia.

World War II led to the founding of the United Nations, which proponents of world government saw as little more than a forum in which sovereign nations worked primarily if not exclusively to advance their own interests in areas such as economic development, international law, human rights, international peace and security, and social progress. Beyond the Security Council, the UN is largely limited to an advisory role and attempting to foster cooperation between existing governments rather than exerting any authority over them.

The World Federalist Movement, formally founded in 1947, saw the League of Nations and the UN as steps leading to a better organization, the World Federal Government, whose Parliament of Man would make world laws and, which alone, could guarantee world peace. After 1965, sensing the inability to achieve these ambitions, it now concentrates on proposing reforms to make UN institutions more democratic and effective instead of merely making non-binding resolutions. Similarly, Democracy Without Borders, founded in 2007, advocates the addition to the UN system of a United Nations Parliamentary Assembly that would allow for participation of member nations’ legislators and eventually direct election of UN parliament members by citizens worldwide.

Peacekeeping and Peacebuilding

Peacekeeping aims to reduce civilian and battlefield deaths, reduce the risk of warfare, or end a war and establish a lasting peace. Largely but not entirely conducted by the UN, there are four probable missions:

Observation consists of small usually unarmed contingents of military or civilian observers who monitor conditions of a cease-fire agreement such as troop withdrawals. They lack the mandate or capability to intervene should either side renege on the agreement.

Traditional peacekeeping consists of substantial contingents of lightly armed troops who in the aftermath of a conflict and with the consent of the belligerents provide a buffer between factions to build confidence and monitor any agreements between concerned parties, while diplomats work toward a peace agreement.

Peacemaking by military and police personnel assigned to implement peace settlements. It often faces a multitude of post-conflict tasks such as assisting in institution building, economic development, election monitors, mediation, reconstruction, rumor control, safe passage, security, trainers of indigenous police and security forces; restoring the economic, physical, and political infrastructure; initiating projects to improve relations between former belligerents; and reducing uncertainty and fear.

Peace enforcement may have but does not require the consent of the belligerent parties. It may include both civilian and military personnel. The military forces assigned generally are well-armed and authorized to use force beyond self-defense to enforce a treaty or cease-fire.

UN Peacekeeping started in 1948 with the deployment of unarmed UN observers to monitor the armistice following the Arab-Israeli War. Since then through 2018, the UN has undertaken and completed 57 peacekeeping missions including 23 in Africa, 10 in the Americas, 17 in Asia, 7 in the Middle East, and 8 in Europe. Fifteen current deployments include 8 in Africa, 1 in the Americas, 4 in Asia, 3 in the Middle East, and 2 in Europe. In addition, non-UN peacekeeping missions include 4 by NATO (2 completed), 3 by the African Union (1 completed), 4 completed by the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group, 1 completed by the Indian Peace Keeping Force, and 2 completed by Australian and New Zealand forces.

During the Cold War (1947–1988), UN Peacekeepers were deployed primarily as buffers separating belligerents and ensuring compliance with peace agreements. The largest concern was preventing altercations that might result in a US-USSR nuclear war. Eighteen UN operations began during this period, of which eight ended during and five ended after the Cold War. Israel-Palestine (since 1948), Kashmir (since 1949), Cyprus (since 1964), Golan (since 1974), and Israel-Lebanon (since 1978) continue to this day.

With the likelihood of general nuclear war reduced by the end of the Cold War, major powers were less concerned with restraining their allies and many long-simmering disputes boiled over. Forty-eight UN operations began in the 14-year period following 1989. The goal gradually shifted from strategic to humanitarian peacemaking under the changed circumstances. The Helsinki Accords provided justification for selective intervention in the internal affairs of states that violate the rights of their own citizens, although any action must be financially, logistically, militarily, and politically feasible. Finally, the shift reflected the study of past successes and failures by governments, NGOs, think tanks, and universities that led to new ideas as to what was possible and desirable.

In the post-Cold War era, with 39 missions deployed so far, the UN has clarified and refined the four types of peacekeeping missions described above and developed a wide range of supporting methods for preventive diplomacy, peace enforcement, peacemaking, peacekeeping, reconciliation (see below), and reconstruction both of infrastructure and institutions. The Peacebuilding Commission [PBC] was established within the UN in 2005 as a subsidiary of both the Security Council and the General Assembly to improve UN ability to prevent state collapse, interstate war, and the transition from war to peace. Composed of 31 member states, the PBC is charged with coordinating available resources from multiple sources and drafting long-term strategies for reconstruction, institution building, and sustainable development. To date it has held discussions on Burundi, Colombia, Kyrgyzstan, Papua New Guinea, Solomon Islands, Sierra Leone, Somalia, and Sri Lanka but has concentrated on six countries in the Sahel and Great Lakes regions of Africa.

Each UN authorized mission must find governments willing to commit equipment, money, and personnel and implement a three-phase process to decide whether, when, and how to intervene. The first phase aims at understanding the background, situation, causes, extent, and dynamics of a conflict and defines options that the UN could take.

The second phase assesses the likely positive and negative outcomes, the tasks such as clearing mines, conducting elections, disarming and demobilizing combatants and refugee, humanitarian care, maintaining public order, patrolling cease-fires, rebuilding economies and civil, and identifying the financial, human, logistical, and political resources each option requires.

In the third phase, the UN draws up a mandate for action; obtains clearances and other operational requirements; assigns UN departments and agencies; identifies and incorporates regional organizations, contact groups, and NGOs that can help; plans for transition to local authorities; and establishes evaluation and exit criteria and data collection mechanisms to measure progress.

This cumbersome but necessary process has proven slow when speed is important. Nor do the problems end there. Sometimes, troops sent prove to be poorly trained or equipped. Commanders often under pressure to avoid casualties may appease the strongest local force, tolerating its abuses. As the strongest local force often varies from place to place within each country, a coherent policy may prove impossible. Refugee camps sometimes intensify resentments. Finally, prostitution and abuse frequently crop up (Renner 2000).

From 1945 to 1989, of 93 civil conflicts, 44 were settled by military victory, and 14 were settled by negotiation. The negotiated settlements lasted in only 7 of the 14 cases (Shearer 1997). According to some critics, UN intervention protects the weaker side from defeat that leads to peace. Knowing there would be no intervention could dissuade the weaker side from risking war. Thus, Luttwak (1999) argues that letting wars run their course could lead to relatively rapid and realistic resolution through surrender and negotiation. In contrast, Fortna (2008) concludes that compared with leaving belligerents to their own devices, peacekeepers reduced the severity of civil war, increased the likelihood of an agreed cease-fire, reduced the risk of renewed warfare, and were most effective when they also had or were accompanied by staff with conflict management skills to bring belligerents together. Furthermore, there was little difference in effectiveness between consent and enforcement missions if the latter proved and sustained their credibility. Finally, civil wars with a clear victor and cease-fire or truce are unlikely to break out again, especially if a mutually agreed peace treaty is reached. Doyle and Sambanis (2006) conclude that in the short run, peace is dependent on a robust UN deployment coupled with low levels of hostility between belligerents. Recognized as early as 1923, Ataturk said “No matter how great they are, political and military victories cannot endure unless they are crowned by economic triumphs.” In the long run, economic capacity matters far more than the level of hostility between belligerents, although given insufficient attention by many peacekeeping missions. The assumption that peacekeeping leads to stability and local governance has not always been realized, leading to essentially permanent peace missions (e.g., Cyprus, Israel).

In response to criticism, the UN has taken steps toward reforming its operations, first in 2000 based on the “Report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations,” frequently referred to as the Brahimi Report after its chairman and then in 2008 based on the “United Nations Peacekeeping Operations: Principles and Guidelines.” The reports addressed many dysfunctions of UN peace and security operations, including lack of commitment from member states to make peace operation personnel, required resources, improving information collection, processing, and analysis to improve decision-making, speeding deployments, improving the management of peacekeeping operations, and strengthening relationships with other UN bodies.

Since 1948, about 1 million soldiers, police, and civilians from some 130 nations have served in UN peacekeeping operations. Developing nations tend to participate more than developed ones, partly because it is a significant source of revenue, training, and equipment, partly because they are less likely than major European powers to be suspected of colonial motives. On the other hand, peacekeeping has been criticized for eroding the combat skills of troops involved, for the fact that prostitution, sex abuse, and human trafficking crop up wherever troops are sent and in at least one case, the creation of a military in Fiji powerful enough to stage four coups d'état and to rule Fiji as a military dictatorship for over two decades (Diehl and Druckman 2010).

Reconciliation and Restorative Justice

When a civil war ends, reconciliation, sometimes called restorative justice, restitution, or victim-offender mediation, is important to prevent a relapse. Maynard (2000) proposes a five-step model based on her experience in Bosnia. Establishing safety for people and property is the first step because nothing is possible without it. Training an honest police force representative of all the warring populations has high priority. It leads to “communalization,” during which traumatic experiences are shared in a safe environment in conjunctions with a period of mourning over losses. The third step is establishing or reestablishing positive relationships among former adversaries. It starts small – for instance, buying bread from and selling milk to the baker who was on the other side – and leads to more ambitious joint efforts. One possibility is working together to remove disparaging descriptions from educational materials. Another is truth- or fact-finding commissions that take testimony on abuses. Approximately two dozen have been established, and at least a dozen others suggested. One such was the 2-year 30-member Commission for Reception, Truth, and Reconciliation in East Timor, which had 3 assigned tasks. First, it investigated human rights violations committed between April 1974 and October 1999. Second, it facilitated reconciliation and reintegration of individuals who confessed to minor crimes. Third, it recommended measures to prevent future abuses and address the needs of victims (Hayner 2001). Fourth, it initiated “Quick Impact Projects” [QIPs] in which former enemies worked together to restore or build mutually beneficial infrastructure, gradually building trust and even friendships across sectarian lines. Fifth, it completed full restoration of civil society, including shared governance.

Summary: Is Mankind Becoming More Peaceful?

Pinker (2011), looking at human history across 10,000 years, identifies five major points at which violence declined significantly. The first, starting about 5000 years ago, coincided with the rise of cities, initially concentrated in Egypt, India, and Mesopotamia, primitive warfare almost certainly being much more devastating to small hunter-gatherer tribes than is commonly portrayed (Keeley 1996). The second, during the Late Middle Ages, saw at least a tenfold decline in the rate of homicide attributed to the consolidation of feudal territories into kingdoms with centralized authority and the nationalization of criminal justice, although in Pinker’s formulation the proposed cause seems largely limited to Europe. Third, the Enlightenment saw the widespread abolition of judicial torture and cruel punishment, reduced the list of capital crimes from hundreds to less than a dozen, and abolished blood sports, religious persecution, and slavery – again in Europe. Fourth, the Cold War, which due to nuclear deterrence that prevented the great clash between the Soviet Union and NATO, saw rising valuation of human life. Fifth, the collapse of communism ended the proxy wars of the Cold War while the expansion of peacekeeping has brought the rate of documented direct deaths from political violence to a few hundredths of a percentage point. Looking ahead, Pinker foresees a cascade of “rights revolutions” and a growing revulsion against aggression that will continue to bring the violence down in future.

According to Pinker, the most obvious and important reason for this long-term trend is the monopolization of legitimate force by the state. Second is the growth of trade, which turns enemies into suppliers and customers. Third is the reduction of parochialism due to education and travel. Fourth, technological progress especially including mass media and the Internet makes it easier and faster to exchange goods and ideas over longer distances. Fifth, democracy increases reliance on nonviolent resolution of conflict.

When one takes account of the many causes and types of war, and the many different means of fighting, it becomes less surprising that peace has proved so elusive. For the most part, the methods probably do little harm and some good, so the best hope probably lies in using however many seem best for each particular circumstance while continuing to innovate and try new ones.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Disarmament
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Reconciliation
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

References

- Barnett, T. (2004). The Pentagon's new map: War and peace in the twenty-first century. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.
- Baruch, B. (1952). Peace through strength. New York: Farrar, Straus and Young.
- Burton, J. (1969). Conflict and Communication. New York: Macmillan.
- Chiagas, D. (2003). Track II diplomacy. Boulder: University of Colorado.
- Clark, H. (2009). People power: Unarmed resistance and global solidarity. London: Pluto Press.
- Cohen, R. (1987). Theatre of Power: The Art of Diplomatic Signaling. London: Addison-Wesley Ltd.
- Crocker, C., et al. (Eds.). (2007). Leashing the dogs of war: Conflict management in a divided world. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Institute of Peace.
- de Callières, F. (2000). On the Manner of Negotiating with Princes. New York: Houghton-Mifflin
- Diehl, P., & Druckman, D. (2010). Evaluating peace operations. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Pub.
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war & building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Eban, A. (1983). The new diplomacy. New York: Random House.
- Effendi, S. (1938). Local and national houses of justice. The world order of Bahá'u'lláh. Wilmette: Bahá'í Publishing Trust.
- Epstein, E. (Ed.). (2006). Sources of international and intrastate conflict and possibilities for resolution in this decade. Rotary international monograph series. Evanston: Rotary International.
- Fischer, F. (1967). Germany's aims in the first world war. New York: W.W. Norton.
- Fisher, R. (1989). Prenegotiation Problem Solving Discussions in J. Stein. Getting to the Table. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins.
- Fortna, P. (2008). Does peacekeeping work? Shaping belligerents' choices after civil war. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Forward, D. (2016). Doing good in the world, the inspiring story of the Rotary Foundation's first 100 years. Minneapolis: Kindle.
- Gandhi, M. (2002). Essential Gandhi: An anthology of his writings. New York: Knopf.
- Hamilton, A., et al. (1937). The federalist no. 24, The federalist: A commentary on the constitution of the United States. New York: The Modern Library.
- Hanson, M. (2007). From conflict to peace: What lessons might we learn from episodes of successful resolution of conflict? Evanston: Rotary International Monograph.
- Hayner, P. (2001). Unspeakable truths: Confronting state terror and atrocity. New York: Routledge.
- Homes, R., & Gan, B. (2011). Nonviolence in theory and practice. Long Grove, IL: Waveland Pr. Inc.
- Kant, I. (2003). Perpetual peace: A philosophical sketch. Indianapolis: Hackett.
- Kautilya. (1992). Arthashastra. London: Penguin.
- Keeley, L. (1996). War before civilization. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kissinger, H. (1994). Diplomacy. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Lehman, F., & Lehman, J. (2010). Peace and prosperity through world trade: Achieving the 2019 vision. Cambridge: Cambridge University.
- Luttwak, E. (July/August 1999). Letting Wars Burn. Foreign Affairs.
- Machiavelli, N. (2011). The prince. New York: Simon & Brown.
- Mahony, L., & Eguren, L. (1997). Unarmed bodyguards: International accompaniment for the protection of human rights. West Hartford: Kumarian Press.
- Maynard, K. (2000). Healing communities in conflict. New York: Columbia University.

- Montville, J. (1991). Conflict and peacemaking in multi-ethnic societies. New York: Lexington.
- Morgenthau, H. (2005). Politics among nations: The struggle for power and peace. Boston: McGraw-Hill.
- Nicholson, H. (1988). Diplomacy. Washington, DC: Institute for Study of Diplomacy.
- Niebuhr, R. (1949). The illusion of world government. Whitestone: Foreign Affairs.
- Nizam al-Mulk. (1978). The book of government or rules for kings. London: Routledge.
- Nye, J. (2004). Power in the Global Information Age. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Pinker, S. (2011). The better angels of our nature. London: Penguin.
- Renner, M. (2000). UN Peacekeeping an Uncertain Future. Foreign Policy in Focus.
- Reynolds, D. (2007). Summits: Six Meetings that Shaped the Twentieth Century. New York: Basic Books.
- Rough, J. (2002). Society's breakthrough: Releasing essential wisdom and virtue in all the people. Bloomington: AuthorHouse.
- Saif, I. (2006). The socio-economic implications of qualified industrial zones in Jordan. Amman: Center for Strategic Studies.
- Saunders, H. (1996). Prenegotiation and Circumnegotiation: Arenas of the Peace Process in C. Crocker & F. Hampson, Managing Global Chaos: Sources of and Responses to International Conflict. United States Institute of Peace.
- Sharp, G., & Paulson, J. (2005). Waging nonviolent struggle: 20th century practice and 21st century potential. Boston: Extending Horizons Books.
- Shearer, D. (1997). Exploring the limits of consent: Conflict resolution in Sierra Leone. Millennium-Journal of International Studies, 26, 845–860.
- Smith, J. (2008). Economic democracy: A grand strategy for world peace and prosperity. Fayetteville: Institute for Economic Democracy.
- Thompson, J., & Johnson, E. (1937). An introduction to medieval Europe 300–1500. New York: W.W. Norton.
- Thoreau, H. (1992). Walden and resistance to civil government. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Tolstoy, L. (2012). The kingdom of god is within you. New York: Dover.
- Vernon, P. (2015). Peace through prosperity. London: International Alert.
- Wells, H. G. (1901). Anticipations of the reaction of mechanical and scientific progress upon human life and thought. London: Chapman & Hall.

Secession and Self-Determination

Robert Muharremi¹ and Nita Dragusha²
¹Public Policy and Governance, Rochester Institute of Technology – Kosovo Campus, Prishtina, Kosovo ²University of Prishtina, Prishtina, Kosovo

Introduction

Nations, defined as groups that share a sense of identity, based on ethnic, religious, or cultural characteristics, tend toward the creation of their own state as a means to achieve full self-determination and to improve their chances of survival in the international system (Mearsheimer 2018). This is particularly relevant for minorities, which live in a state that is dominated by an ethnically, religiously, or culturally different majority. Creating their own state by secession from the existing state and by referring to the right of self-determination as a justification for the secession “offers itself naturally as a way of emerging from the shadow and the threat of the majority” (Welhengama and Pillay 2013).

Secessionist movements are very often resisted by the existing state that relies on the international law principles of state sovereignty and territorial integrity to oppose such secession. The result can be armed conflict or protracted political stalemates in the absence of an agreement between the conflicting parties that may endanger international peace and security (Velasco 2014). Kosovo, Crimea, Catalonia, Somaliland, Abkhazia, and South Ossetia are examples of such contested secessions that have major international implications and which are prone to violent conflict. It is therefore important to understand how secession, as a method of creating a state (Anderson 2013, 2016), relates to the right of self-determination as a fundamental principle of international law and to the impact that self-determination has on the process and outcome of secession.

Secession

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Definition

Although the term secession is widely used in international, political, and legal discourse, there is no authoritative definition of this term in any international agreement or official document. Recourse has, therefore, to be made to definitions provided by academia. Crawford (2006) defines secession as “the creation of a state by the use or threat of force without the consent of the former sovereign.” Anderson (2013) refines this definition by clarifying that secession is about “the withdrawal of territory and sovereignty from part of an existing state to create a new state” without necessarily involving the use or threat of force. The purpose of secession would be the establishment of a new sovereign over a territory so far held by another sovereign (Anderson 2016).

Secession as a process must be distinguished from secession as an outcome (Anderson 2016) as not every process of secession would lead to the establishment of a new state. A state is usually defined by reference to the criteria established in the Montevideo Convention on the Rights and Duties of States (1933). According to this Convention, for an entity to be a state, it must have (a) a permanent population, (b) a defined territory, (c) a government, and (d) the capacity to enter into relations with other states. The latter criterion reflects “independence” and is the “decisive criterion of statehood” (Crawford 2012). Independence means that the state is the supreme authority in the territory to the exclusion of other states and only subject to international law (Crawford 2012). Independence must be formal and real, i.e., the government must be effectively in control of the territory and be able to have a separate existence from other states (Crawford 2006).

Secession is consensual or unilateral (Anderson 2006). In the event of a consensual secession, the new state is created with the consent of the former sovereign. This can occur through political negotiations and settlements or through constitutional mechanisms and procedures that entitle certain territories to separate (Anderson 2006). This type of secession is not problematic as the creation of the new state does not collide with the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the former sovereign.

A unilateral secession, i.e., a secession that occurs without the consent of the former sovereign, is a problematic scenario as the state where the secession is occurring still asserts its sovereignty and demands respect for its territorial integrity by opposing the secession. This scenario very often generates violent conflicts and may provoke different reactions by the international community. This scenario also leads to a conflict between international law principles: the state’s claim to sovereignty and territorial integrity, and the right of a people to self-determination, which is usually invoked by the secessionist movement.

A further distinction is made between the secession of a colonial entity and secession outside a colonial context (Crawford 2006) as the impact of the right of self-determination is different in both situations.

In contrast to secession, the right of a people to self-determination is addressed in major international documents. The Charter of the United Nations (UN Charter) states that one of the purposes of the United Nations (UN) is “to develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples.”

The UN General Assembly Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (Res. 1514 (XV)) defines the right of self-determination to mean that

All peoples have the right to self-determination; by virtue of that right they freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.

The same definition is reiterated in the UN General Assembly Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations (GA Res. 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970), which states that

[b]y virtue of the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples enshrined in the Charter of the United Nations, all peoples have the right freely to determine, without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development, and every State has the duty to respect this right in accordance with the provisions of the Charter.

It further states that

[t]he establishment of a sovereign and independent State, the free association or integration with an independent State or the emergence into any other political status freely determined by a people constitute modes of implementing the right of self-determination by that people.

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966) also provide that all peoples have the right of self-determination that entitles them to “freely determine their political status and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development.”

The right to self-determination includes “internal self-determination” and “external self-determination.” External self-determination is primarily about achieving an independent state, if necessary through secession (Meester 2010), but can also mean the association with another state. Internal self-determination excludes secession and is about enabling people to effectively participate in the political and constitutional decision-making processes of the state where they live and to effectively enjoy human rights (Meester 2010). This can be achieved through various forms of participation on governance, including autonomy, local self-government, decentralization, and federalization (Weller 2009).

Key Issues and International Perspectives

Secession Under International Law

The creation of states by secession was a common method until the end of World War I (Crawford 2006). If an entity managed to establish effective control over a territory and “there was no real likelihood of the previous sovereign reasserting its position,” that entity qualified as a state and could be recognized as such by other states, even if the state, from which the entity seceded, did not recognize it (Crawford 2006). International law is neutral as regards the legality of secession (Sterio 2015). According to Crawford (2006), “secession is neither legal nor illegal in international law, but a legally neutral act the consequences of which are regulated internationally.” Although the UN Charter emphasizes state sovereignty and territorial integrity as fundamental principles of international relations and therefore attaches importance to the stability of the state system (Welhengama and Pillay 2013), there is no prohibition of secession as a way of creating a new state. This was also confirmed by the Canadian Supreme Court in Reference re Secession of Quebec (1998). In its Advisory Opinion on the Accordance with International Law of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence in Respect of Kosovo, the International Court of Justice did not discuss the legality of secession (Christakis 2011). However, it affirmed that a declaration of independence, which is an important part of unilateral secession, would not violate international law, although the declaration itself would not necessarily lead to the creation of a new state (International Court of Justice 2010).

There is a discussion if the seceding entity can be a state if it is created in violation of international law, despite the fact that it meets the requirements of effective government control and independence (Crawford 2006). Rhodesia, Taiwan, Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus are referenced as examples of entities that have established effective control but are not recognized as states by the international community. The counterargument is that this discussion conflates questions of recognition and statehood, which are distinct concepts. Denying effective entities statehood also bears the risk of maintaining a legal fiction that does not correspond to the political facts on the ground. This would also allow other states to determine based on their own interpretations of international law if an entity is a state or not. In an anarchic international system, where the interpretation and application of international law are decentralized and exercised primarily by states, this would result in arbitrary confirmations or denials of statehood.

Self-Determination and a Right to Secession

The right of self-determination of peoples, in the form of external self-determination, is usually invoked as a right to secession. The right to self-determination has inspired numerous ethnic groups to pursue nationalist policies to create their own state. As described by Weller (2009), it “often encapsulates the hopes of ethnic peoples and other groups for freedom and independence.” There seems to be no other norm of international law that has been so widely promoted and accepted as the right to self-determination (Hannum 1996). At the same time, it is one of the most unclear and obscure political and legal ideas (Weitz 2015). There are at least five different meanings of a right to self-determination. It can refer to an individual human right; a minority right; a right of indigenous people; a right to territorial change; and a right to secession to create an own state (Seshagiri 2010). Questions about who is entitled to self-determination, what does self-determination entail, and how does it correspond to state sovereignty and territorial integrity are just some of the fundamental questions that have haunted this idea since it has become a principle for ordering international relations and that have still not been resolved.

Self-determination is usually associated with the French and American Revolutions (Seshagiri 2010) and the “principle of nationalities” implied in US President Wilson’s “Fourteen Points” as a new principle for ordering international relations following World War I (Velasco 2014; Brilmayer 1991). In its origins and up to the late eighteenth century, self-determination was not conceived of as an idea related to groups but to individuals (Weitz 2015). The original idea of self-determination is about the emancipation of the individual. As expressed in Kant’s Selbstbestimmung, self-determination is the attainment of the individual’s freedom through reason and knowledge, which is the constitutive element of a human being (Weitz 2015). With the emergence of nationalism, self-determination gradually transformed into an idea that applied to peoples struggling for national liberation (Hannum 1996).

Despite its liberal origins, the idea of self-determination was also embraced by Marxists. They conceived of self-determination as the emancipation of the oppressed class. Since nationalism and the state were facts that could not be denied, Marxists supported the idea of self-determination as a means to achieve cultural autonomy and a decentralized state as a necessary step toward communism (Weitz 2015; Hannum 1996). Self-determination was also used as an argument to support colonized people to achieve independence from their “capitalist” oppressors (Weitz 2015). Marxists supported secession as an expression of self-determination when it was useful for the class struggle and when it harmed the bourgeois and capitalist opponents (Hannum 1996).

The idea of self-determination was embraced by US President Wilson as a principle for the design of a new international order following World War I and the disintegration of the Austro-Hungarian and Ottoman empires (Hannum 1996). As explained by Hannum (1996), “the principle of self-determination became the obvious vehicle for the re-division of Europe by the victorious powers.” Wilson’s idea of self-determination was grounded in “American ideals of democracy, promoting self-determination of peoples as the foreign extension of American norms of political fairness” (Brilmayer 1991). Despite its liberal spirit, self-determination “meant free white men coming together consensually to form a democratic political order” (Weitz 2015). This is why, at that time, self-determination was limited to people who were part of the defeated empires and did not apply to overseas colonies (Hannum 1996).

Despite Wilson’s promotion of the idea of self-determination, it was not included in any of the peace agreements following the end of World War I (Weitz 2015). It was nevertheless the guiding principle for the formation of new states, the redrawing of borders, and the establishment of the League of Nations, including its minority protection system (Weitz 2015), although always subject to the realpolitik of the great powers. Even Hitler referred to the principle of self-determination as a justification for the annexation of Austria and the partition of Czechoslovakia (Kissinger 1994).

During World War II, the Allied Powers included in the Atlantic Charter (1941) the idea of self-determination as a principle for guiding their war efforts (Velasco 2014). The Atlantic Charter stated that the Allied Powers will ... respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.

In this context, self-determination meant the liberation of peoples occupied and oppressed by the Axis Powers.

Following the end of World War II, the UN Charter explicitly mentioned the “principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples” as a principle for developing friendly relations among nations as one of the purposes of the United Nations. However, this principle was embedded in the overarching purpose to maintain international peace and security and the fundamental principle of sovereign equality of states. Despite its inclusion in the UN Charter, self-determination was not considered a legal right but a political principle (Hannum 1996). The evolution from a political principle to a legal right under international law evolved subsequently through resolutions of the UN General Assembly and the case law of the International Court of Justice.

The UN General Assembly Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples (Res. 1514 (XV)) and the UN General Assembly Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations (GA Res. 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970) further elaborated the notion of self-determination in the context of the UN Charter by giving it attributes of a right. The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966) explicitly referred to the right of self-determination as a necessary precondition for human rights.

The main impetus for the development of self-determination into a right came from the International Court of Justice (ICJ). In the Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences for States of the Continued Presence of South Africa in Namibia (South West Africa) notwithstanding Security Council Resolution 276 (1970) (1971), the ICJ clarified that self-determination applied to all non-self-governing territories, i.e., former colonial territories of the victorious powers (Velasco 2014). It implied that self-determination is limited to former colonial territories which were held as a sacred trust by the UN and which have not yet attained independence.

In the Advisory Opinion on Western Sahara (1975), the ICJ described the “principle of self-determination as a right of peoples’ and its application for the purpose of bringing all colonial situations to a speedy end.” External self-determination was therefore instrumental for decolonization. In the 1995 East Timor (Portugal v. Australia) case, the ICJ asserted that the principle of self-determination of peoples had evolved into one of the “essential principles of contemporary international law” but applicable to non-self-governing territories. The ICJ Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Construction of a Wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory (2004) extended self-determination to occupied territories, in this case, the occupied Palestinian territory. The ICJ Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Separation of the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius in 1965 (2019) referred to the right to self-determination as a fundamental human right but still limited its application to the context of decolonization. It clarified that the right to self-determination of a people is defined in reference to the non-self-governing territory, implying that the right to self-determination is connected to a specific territory which can only be changed “based on the freely expressed and genuine will of the people of the territory concerned.”

A highly controversial question is if the right to external self-determination applies to ethnic minorities outside the context of colonialism, foreign occupation, and racist regimes (Moore 1997). The argument is that international law would justify a “remedial secession” when a state denies an ethnic group meaningful participation in government and systematically fails to protect fundamental human rights. This interpretation is based on the “safeguard clause” (Principle 5, para. 7) of the UN General Assembly Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations. The “safeguard clause” implies that a state represents the whole of the people of its territory without distinction of any kind and complies with the principle of self-determination in respect of all its people and is entitled to the protection of its territorial integrity. A state that does not conform to this standard would forfeit its right to territorial integrity, and the ethnic group would be entitled to secession as a measure of last resort (Meester 2010).

Support for “remedial secession” is drawn from the League of Nations Aaland Island Reports. On the question if the people of the Aaland Island had the right to separate from Finland to join Sweden, the Commission of Jurists appointed by the League of Nations referred to the principle of self-determination but denied that it was a legal principle and that there was a right of national groups to separate from a state (Crawford 2006). However, the Commission of Rapporteurs clarified that the principle of self-determination could be invoked as a last resort “when the State lacks either the will or the power to enact and apply just and effective guarantees” for minority rights (Meester 2010).

Remedial secession reflects “just-cause” theories which claim that it would be morally justified for a “group to secede if and only if the group has suffered a major injustice in the larger state, namely severe human rights violations, wrongful annexation, continual violations of intrastate autonomy, or permanent minority status” (Catala 2013). The “just-cause” theory is liberal in its core as the injustice suffered relates primarily to serious and persistent violations of individual human rights (Freeman 1999). Support for secession outside the colonial and foreign occupation context is also provided by voluntarist and communitarian theories. Voluntarist theories claim that every group is built on the voluntary association of individuals (Freeman 1999). If members of a group want to leave the group, they would have the right to do so; the same would apply to the secession of any kind of group from a state (Freeman 1999). Communitarian theories focus on group identity and its importance for the individual members of the group. Since the international system is anarchic and there is no centralized enforcement mechanism to ensure the existence of a group and its collective identity, every group would have the right to decide which political form ensures best the preservation of the group and its identity, even if this means the secession from a state (Freeman 1999).

Despite the theoretical support for remedial secession, the predominant view in international law is that the right to external self-determination does not apply outside the context of colonialism and foreign occupation. The case law of the ICJ suggests that the right to external self-determination is limited to people living in colonial territories (mandate and trusteeship system and non-self-governing territories) and territories under foreign occupation (Cassese 2005; Crawford 2006; Brilmayer 1991; Welhengama and Pillay 2013; Hannum 1996), which would imply a presumption against secession outside these contexts (Frankel 1992). While the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (2007) recognizes a right to self-determination for indigenous peoples, it limits it explicitly to a right to autonomy or self-government in matters relating to their internal and local affairs. Although a number of states supported the idea of “remedial secession” in their submissions to the ICJ for Advisory Opinion on the Accordance with International Law of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence in Respect of Kosovo (2010), these were too few to reflect a general international opinion or even customary international law (Meester 2010). In fact, state practice indicates an attitude against secessions outside colonial and foreign occupation contexts for fear of destabilizing the international system and causing violent conflicts (Bereketeab 2014; Griffiths 2014). As noted by Klabbers (2019), in the Advisory Opinion on the Legal Consequences of the Separation of the Chagos Archipelago from Mauritius in 1965 (2019), the ICJ has connected the right to self-determination so much to decolonization that “self-determination and the right to decolonization come close to being one and the same thing, with the important corollary that self-determination cannot be invoked in other, non-colonial settings.”

Even when external self-determination is permitted, it could only be exercised within the existing boundaries of the respective territory, as reflected in the uti possidetis juris doctrine (Weller 2009). The territorial approach to self-determination is criticized as a too narrow interpretation of the right to self-determination and that national identity, and not territory, should be the constitutive element of this right (Moore 1997; Seshagiri 2010; Lee 2012). The problem with this approach is that there is no uniformly accepted definition of “peoples,” although there are attempts to define peoples by reference to objective criteria, such as culture, language, tradition and history, and subjective identification with a particular group (McCorquodale 2018).

In Reference re Secession of Quebec (1998), the Canadian Supreme Court concluded that a state, which enables a people to exercise internal self-determination, whose government represents the whole of the people or peoples resident within its territory, on a basis of equality and without discrimination, would be entitled to the protection under international law of its territorial integrity. There would be certain defined contexts within which the right to the self-determination of peoples would allow that right to be exercised “externally,” i.e., in the form of secession. This would apply to colonial peoples and where a people is subject to alien subjugation, domination, or exploitation outside a colonial context. As for the third context, when a people is denied or blocked from the meaningful exercise of its right to self-determination internally, the Supreme Court expressed doubts if international law would grant a right to secession.

In its Advisory Opinion on the Accordance with International Law of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence in Respect of Kosovo (2010), the ICJ confirmed that “[w]hether, outside the context of non-self-governing territories and peoples subject to alien subjugation, domination and exploitation, the international law of self-determination confers upon part of the population of an existing State a right to separate from that State is, however, a subject on which radically different views were expressed by those taking part in the proceedings and expressing a position on the question. Similar differences existed regarding whether international law provides for a right of ‘remedial secession’ and, if so, in what circumstances.” However, the ICJ did not address these questions due to a narrow interpretation of the question addressed to it (Wilde 2011), and so they remain the main controversy surrounding the right to self-determination.

The Principle of “Effectiveness”: Secession as a Political Fact

Whether the right to self-determination entitles to secession or not, secession as a method of creating a state can also be viewed as a matter of political fact rather than law. In Reference re Secession of Quebec (1998), the Canadian Supreme Court confirmed that “while international law may not ground a positive right to unilateral secession in the context of Quebec, international law equally does not prohibit secession and, in fact, international recognition would be conferred on such a political reality if it emerged, for example, via effective control of the territory of what is now the province of Quebec.” Effective control of a territory and population by a politically organized power is what matters for a successful secession, and this is reflected in the principle of effectiveness. The principle of effectiveness means that an illegal act may become legal if, as a matter of empirical fact, it is internationally recognized. According to the Supreme Court, international law would “adapt to recognize a political and/or factual reality, regardless of the legality of the steps leading to its creation.” Legal consequences could flow from political facts, and sovereignty was a political fact for which no purely legal authority could be constituted. The Supreme Court concluded that the “secession of a province from Canada, if successful in the streets, might well lead to the creation of a new state. Although recognition by other states is not, at least as a matter of theory, necessary to achieve statehood, the viability of a would-be state in the international community depends, as a practical matter, upon recognition by other states.”

The Supreme Court raised a number of important and complex issues about the relationship between international law and politics and the legal effects of political realities created by superior power on the ground.

The first issue is the impact of the principle of effectiveness on the creation of a state by secession. The principle of effectiveness is grounded in the idea that a state is a matter of political and historic fact and not of law. German legal scholar Jellinek established the idea that the state was a social fact that resulted from historical developments (Portman 2010). Jellinek claimed that the state could be examined from a sociological and a legal perspective; the sociological perspective would examine the social reality, the relationships, and power arrangements within a state, while the legal perspective would examine its legal organization and structures (Portman 2010). A legal perspective would require the existence of a state as a historic fact and would not determine its existence (Portman 2010). The very idea of international law being constituted by states implies the assumption that the state, as a political and historic fact, predates international law (Portman 2010). With the “principle of effectiveness” in mind, the Badinter Arbitration Committee on the former Yugoslavia described the “existence or disappearance of the state” as a question of fact (Pellet 1992). However, this conception of the state and international law is challenged by authors who claim that the state itself exists as a category of international law and is constituted by it (Crawford 2006).

There is agreement that effective control is an important prerequisite for a successful secession. According to Frankel (1992), “if a secessionist movement can effectively assert military control over its own territory, or even if it can inflict enough death and destruction on the parent state, it will quickly achieve independence.” Crawford (2006) explains that a seceding territory could be recognized as a state “if it governed its territory effectively and with sufficient stability, such that there was no real likelihood of the previous sovereign reasserting its position.” The right to self-determination would have only an impact on the degree of effective control that the seceding territory would have to display. Where an entity would not be entitled to external self-determination, it would have to demonstrate a high degree of effective control that would make the loss of control by the previous sovereign irreversible. An entity entitled to self-determination could be recognized as a state even with a lesser degree of effective control, as the right to self-determination would operate “in favour of the statehood of the seceding territory, provided that the seceding government can properly be regarded as representative of the people of the territory” (Crawford 2006). However, even in clear self-determination case, it would be the political power of the seceding entity, and not the right to self-determination, that would lead to statehood (Velasco 2014). According to Bereketeab (2014), decolonization in Africa, although justified with reference to external self-determination, was in fact determined by political power considerations, such as the interests of powerful states, the attitude of the central government toward the secessionist movement, the military balance between the secessionist movement and central government, the strategic importance of the seceding region, and external support for the secessionist movement or central government. Although entitled to self-determination, as confirmed by the ICJ, Western Sahara and the Palestine territories, as prominent examples, are still deprived of their statehood due to lack of political power to enforce their right to self-determination. Bangladesh's secession from Pakistan, although not a self-determination case, was successful due to its political power. Crimea's secession from Ukraine, which is controversial from the perspective of the right to self-determination (Kapustin 2015; Driest 2015), has also created a political reality on the ground that may require a different interpretation if the principle of effectiveness is applied.

The second issue is the role of international recognition for the success or failure of a secession. International law discusses recognition from a declaratory and a constitutive theory perspective. According to the declaratory theory, a recognition does not create a state but merely, as a political act with certain legal consequences, acknowledges its existence (Anderson 2013). According to the constitutive theory, it is recognition by other states that creates the state (Andersen 2013). While the declaratory theory prevails in international law, in reality political recognition of secessionist movements is important for them to achieve statehood (Crawford 2006). According to Frankel (1992), a secessionist movement would gain legitimacy and would be treated as a state only if it manages to convince other states to recognize it.

Crawford observes that since 1945, the international community has been reluctant to accept unilateral secession if the secession was opposed by the government of that state and that no state created by unilateral secession had been admitted to the United Nations against the declared wishes of the government of the predecessor state (Crawford 2006). He implies that this behavior is norm-guided as it would reflect respect for the principle of sovereignty and territorial integrity.

The opposing view is that the decision to recognize or not is political (Velasco 2014), and political considerations, especially the political and military success of the secessionist movement, would outweigh legal arguments (Frankel 1992). Coggins (2011) summarizes the following observations on political motives for recognition:

- States are more likely to recognize those who weaken their enemies.
- States are less likely to recognize those who weaken their friends.
- States beset by secessionist challenges at home are less likely to recognize others.
- Once one Great Power has granted recognition, the others are more likely to do so.

Current international divisions concerning the recognition of Kosovo, Crimea, South Ossetia, Abkhazia, Palestine, although clouded in legal language, therefore reflect political rather than legal considerations.

Recognition by great powers and other powerful states seems to be more important than effective control, and such external legitimacy would be the “fundamental distinguishing feature between states and non-states” (Coggins 2011). Sterio (2010, 2015) observes that all successful secessions were supported by at least one great power (“friends in high places”) that was willing to recognize the seceding entity as a state. Effective control is not necessary where the seceding entity has the support of great powers (Coggins 2011), while effective control is of limited usefulness when there is no such support, as illustrated by the example of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus. Membership of the seceding entity in the international community of states, for example, in form of membership in the United Nations, would also require “a quorum of the world’s states to consecrate their legitimacy” that is more than the support by one or more great powers and more than just a few unilateral recognitions (Coggins 2011). Complications and protracted political stalemates with potential for violent conflict would arise when great powers are politically divided on the recognition of a seceding entity, such as in the case of Kosovo (Coggins 2011).

Future Directions

The right to self-determination requires further specification and clarification especially as regards its scope of application and the controversial question of “remedial secession.” Without such clarification, it might provide many ethnic groups, which do not have the corresponding political power and international support, with a false promise of independent statehood and thus fuel international conflicts. It is also important to examine what role the right to self-determination would have to play in a post-decolonization context characterized by a power shift toward a multipolar international system. Current examples of secessions indicate that the role of political power and fact will increase and that international law might have to adjust to these new circumstances.

Cross-References

► Kashmir Conflict, The

References

Anderson, G. (2013). Secession in International Law and Relations: What Are We Talking About? In L.A. Loyola (Ed) International and Comparative Law Review, 35, 343–388.

Anderson, G. (2016). Unilateral non-colonial secession and internal self-determination: right of newly seceded peoples to democracy. Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law, 34(1), 1–64.

Bereketeab, R. (2014). Self-determination and secession – African challenges. In R. Bereketeab (Ed.), Self-determination and secession: The post-colonial state (pp. 3–19). New York City: Routledge.

Brilmayer, L. (1991). Secession and self-determination: A territorial interpretation. Yale Journal of International Law, 16, 177–202.

Cassese, A. (2005). International law. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Catala, A. (2013). Remedial theories of secession and territorial justification. Journal of Social Philosophy, 44(1), 74–94.

Christakis, T. (2011). The ICJ advisory opinion on Kosovo: Has international law something to say about secession? Leiden Journal of International Law, 24, 73–86.

Coggins, B. (2011). Friends in high places: International politics and the emergence of states from secessionism. International Organization, 65(3), 433–467.

Crawford, J. (2006). The creation of states in international law. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

Crawford, J. (2012). Brownlie’s principles of public international law. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Driest, S. (2015). Crimea’s separation from Ukraine: An analysis of the right to self-determination and (remedial) secession in international law. Netherlands International Law Review, 62, 329–363.

Frankel, L. M. (1992). International law of secession: New rules for new era. Houston Journal of International Law, 14(3), 521–564.

Freeman, M. (1999). The right to self-determination in international politics: Six theories in search of a policy. Review of International Studies, 25, 355–370.

Griffiths, R. (2014). The future of self-determination and territorial integrity in the Asian century. The Pacific Review, 27(3), 457–478.

Hannum, H. (1996). Autonomy, sovereignty, and self-determination: The accommodation of conflicting rights.

International Court of Justice. (2010). Advisory Opinion of 22 July 2010 on Accordance with International Law of the Unilateral Declaration of Independence in Respect of Kosovo.

Kapustin, A. (2015). Crimea’s self-determination in the light of contemporary international law. Heidelberg Journal of International Law, 75, 101–118.

Kissinger, H. (1994). Diplomacy. New York: Simon & Schuster Paperbacks.

Klabbers, J. (2019). Shrinking self-determination: The Chagos opinion of the international court of justice. ESIL Reflections, 8(2), 1–9.

Lee, H. (2012). The identity argument for national self-determination. Public Affairs Quarterly, 26(2), 123–139.

McCorquodale, R. (2018). Group rights. In D. Moeckli, S. Shah, & S. Sivakumaran (Eds.), International human rights law (pp. 344–365). Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Mearsheimer, J. (2018). The great delusion. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.

Meester, D. (2010). The International Court of Justice’s Kosovo case: Assessing the current state of international legal opinion on remedial secession. The Canadian Yearbook of International Law, 48, 215–254.

Moore, M. (1997). On national self-determination. Political Studies, 45, 900–913.

Pellet, A. (1992). The opinions of the Badinter arbitration committee: A second breath for the self-determination of peoples. European Journal of International Law, 3, 178–185.

Portman, R. (2010). Legal personality in international law. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Seshagiri, L. (2010). Democratic disobedience: Reconceiving self-determination and secession at international law. Harvard International Law Journal, 51 (2), 553–598.

Sterio, M. (2010). On the right to external self-determination: Selfistans, secession, and the great powers’ rule.

Minnesota Journal of International Law, 19(1), 137–176.

- Sterio, M. (2015). Self-determination and secession under international law: The new framework. ILSA Journal of International and Comparative Law, 21(2), 293–306.
- Velasco, Z. A. (2014). Self-determination and secession: Human rights-based conflict resolution. International Community Law Review, 16(1), 75–105.
- Weitz, E. (2015). Self-determination: How a German Enlightenment idea became a slogan of national liberation and a human right. American Historical Review, 120(2), 462–496.
- Welhengama, G., & Pillay, N. (2013). Minorities' claim to secession by virtue of the right to self-determination: Asian perspectives with special reference to Kosovo and Sri Lanka. Nordic Journal of International Law, 82, 249–282.
- Weller, M. (2009). Settling self-determination conflicts: Recent developments. The European Journal of International Law, 20(1), 111–165.
- Wilde, R. (2011). Self-determination, secession, and dispute settlement after the Kosovo advisory opinion. Leiden Journal of International Law, 24, 149–154.

Secessionism

- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention

Secessionist Conflicts

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Security

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Security of Being

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security

Security of the Self

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security

Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

Sabine Kurtenbach¹ and Nadine Ansorg^{1,2}

¹GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies, Hamburg, Germany

²University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

Synonyms

DDR; Local security; Peacebuilding; Reforms; SSR; UN

Definition/Description

Security sector reform (SSR) is a central pillar of peace strategies, closely linked to but not interchangeable with state-building and democratization. There is a broad consensus that sustainable post-war peace needs a stable security environment and thus institutions that are able to inhibit non-legal manifestations of violence. The main elements of SSR are reforms in the state security institutions (military and police) as well as in the judiciary. The first generation SSR was characterized by Western blueprints and a lack of context sensitivity, with the empirical record being rather weak. As a consequence, programs moved away from “one size fits all” to a greater attention to local contexts. The need to include local, non-state actors has been acknowledged, but designing and implementing new approaches on the ground is neither easy nor going to happen in the immediate future. A further step in the evolution of post-war SSR can be an approach to decolonize reform aspects: to radically question the origins of knowledge and practice of SSR and to center efforts more in the communities affected by reform than with ideals of the security sector that resemble more those in the Global North.

Introduction

In transitions out of war and armed conflict, security sector reform (SSR) is a central pillar of peace strategies, closely linked to but not interchangeable with state-building and democratization. There is a broad consensus that sustainable post-war peace needs a stable security environment and thus institutions that are able to inhibit non-legal manifestations of violence. A first step prior but rarely closely integrated to substantial reform is the demobilization, demilitarization, and reintegration (DDR) of former combatants (Giustozzi 2012). This is often followed by reforms in the armed forces (Licklider 2014) and the police (Davis 2009; Neild 2001), which stand at the core of conventional SSR. Reforming the judiciary (Betts et al. 2001; Strohmeyer 2001) is another important element of post-war SSR. Although the judiciary is regarded as a “non-core security institution” by some authors (Wulf 2004), others reason that judicial reform is among the most vital parts of SSR, as without it, the impact of military and police reform would be diminished (Slaby 2003). For instance, high levels of impunity stalled police reform in Guatemala after the end of civil war, also because judicial reform did not occur simultaneously (Kurtenbach 2008, 2010).

Relevant provisions of SSR as well as their implementation vary significantly across the globe. Data from the Peace Accord Matrix shows that in the 34 documented comprehensive peace agreements, 28 include provisions on disarmament, 27 on reintegration, 25 on demobilization, 26 on military reform, 24 on police reform, but only 16 on judiciary reforms. PAM distinguishes between 51 types of provisions and summarizes seven provisions under the heading “security”: demobilization, disarmament, military reform, paramilitary groups, police reform, prisoner release, and reintegration. Under a broader security and justice system perspective, we need to include provisions on judiciary reform, truth, and reconciliation mechanisms (in PAM both included under institutions) as well as amnesty and reparations (in PAM included in the category of rights). The contrast is even more pronounced when we look at the number of fully implemented provisions. Here demobilization stands at the top with 13 while judiciary reform is lowest with 3 (Joshi et al. 2015, p. 556).

Research on SSR

The academic literature on post-war SSR is divided between two schools of thought regarding the question of how the reform of security institutions is best managed and implemented: a state-centric model and a critical security perspective.

First, a number of studies advocate the need to rebuild formal state security institutions for peace (Giustozzi 2011; Glassmyer and Sambanis 2008; Paris and Sisk 2009). This view on SSR builds on the notion that in the aftermath of war, formal and capable state institutions are often destroyed or have never existed outside the capital (Besley and Persson 2010). In this camp, SSR is considered as main pillar of externally driven state-building strategies.

Second, criticizing this Western-centric model of security provision, the critical security perspective focuses both on the inclusion of domestic models of security governance and on informal security institutions. Rejecting “one size fits all” SSR programs that are based on the example of a Weberian state, this perspective calls for a better understanding of local approaches to security building and for promoting peace, to increase legitimacy, and public acceptance. In post-war societies with a high involvement of international actors, this can mean creating hybrid models of security shaped by a combination of international and domestic models, for instance by the UN and local security actors, or combining formal and informal security institutions (Krause 2012; Mac Ginty 2011; Schroeder et al. 2014). Studies in the critical security tradition hold that informal non-state institutions, such as neighborhood watches, can be more efficient providers of security than mistrusted or weak state institutions (Mehler 2009). Thus, informal provisions of security should be promoted by SSR as a transitional mechanism or in the long run (Jackson 2018; Sedra 2010, 2018).

A methodological shortcoming of the SSR research is related to the domination of policy-oriented, “lessons learned” formulating best practices guidelines on the one hand (Bryden and Hänggi 2004; Cooper and Pugh 2002; Wulf 2004) and in-depth, often noncomparative case studies on the other. Case studies are also disproportionately oriented towards a small number of recent cases that include Liberia (Bøås and Stig 2010; Loden 2007), Timor-Leste (Hood 2006; Myrntinen 2010), Haiti (Lemay-Hébert 2014; Mendelson-Forman 2006), Afghanistan (Gross 2009), and the countries of the former Yugoslavia (Berg 2014; Stodiek and Zellner 2007). Such lack of comparative analysis implies that few findings of past research on post-war SSR can be generalized across time and cases. More comparative or statistical studies analyzing post-war security institutions, however, do not capture SSR as a whole, but look at very narrow elements of security institutions (Ansorg et al. 2016; Hartzell and Hoddie 2003). These analyses are additionally limited to looking at institutions in relation to intra-state armed conflict on the dependent variable, without attending to other manifestations of post-war violence that security sectors are involved in, such as one-sided violence or violence between non-state actors.

Studies also link SSR closely to post-war democratization (Bernabéu 2007; Cawthra and Luckham 2003), with democratization as an outcome and/or as an intervening factor. First, it is claimed that a fundamental purpose of SSR is the promotion of democratic rule, and that as a result of a completed SSR, security actors and governments become more accountable to a society (Nathan 2007). Second, it is recognized that SSR is not a technical and isolated process but one that is conditioned by functioning democratic institutions (Ansorg et al. 2016). O’Neill, for instance, stresses that police reform needs a “heavy emphasis on police accountability” (O’Neill 2005, p. 9) and a creation of democratic oversight bodies that prosecute professional misconduct of officers.

Both the state-building perspective to SSR and works in the tradition of critical security studies address the issue of international engagement in SSR (e.g., Vetschera and Damian 2006). Studies using the state-building argument often hold that, in very volatile environments and after serious and long-lasting civil wars, post-war peace is more likely with international engagement, also in reforming the security sector (cf. Doyle and Sambanis 2000; Paris and Sisk 2009). One argument is that international actors come with the financial resources, technical knowledge, and military manpower to force warring parties into compliance. Bajraktari et al. (2006, p. 19), for instance, stress that in extremely weak states, international contribution to security management and SSR becomes necessary. Works in line with the critical security argument thereby strongly argue that peacebuilding is only successful with high degrees of local ownership, referring to the extent by which domestic parties are in control over the design and conduct of SSR, and by preserving local institutions that worked well before and during the war (Ball 2006; Donais 2009; Kurtenbach and Wulf 2012; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). One argument against SSR driven by international actors is that the identification with reforms and created institutions is missing, as in Afghanistan (Sedra 2014). Also, while donors bring the needed resources or experience to SSR, a multiplicity of international actors tends to create parallel chains of commands or fights over funds that curb efficiency of SSR (Brzoska and Heinemann-Grüder 2004).

Linking the Elements of SSR

A major challenge in SSR research and practice is that the different elements are rarely systematically linked. While particularly in the state-building perspective to SSR, the DDR element is considered as an indispensable component and necessary first step of post-war SSR, both processes tend to be rarely linked (Giustozzi 2012). Incomplete or even complete absence of DDR in the aftermath of war can lead to unstable oligopolies of violence and eventually a recurrence of armed conflict (Brzoska and Heinemann-Grüder 2004; Lambach 2007). Scholars suggest that DDR should be introduced early during post-war SSR as it helps to increase trust between warring parties and creates a culture in which the use of weapons becomes unlikely (Muggah 2005; Spear 2002). Having said that, once excombatants are demobilized, recent efforts have often involved their integration into the army. Such integration has, however, been found to not necessarily effectively contribute to peace, mostly because it is often poorly implemented (Glassmyer and Sambanis 2008). Underlying causes of conflict are often not addressed, and demobilized combatants continue to be frustrated, without work, and prone to renewed recruitment (McFate 2010).

Military reform includes the restructuring, reduction, merging, or creation of the state's armed forces, as well as the education and training of recruits; and the separation of the tasks of the police and the military. In contexts of democratization, SSR efforts might also include civilian oversight of the military (Kuehn and Lorenz 2011) as well as changes in the mandate of the military (external security) and the police (public security). Intelligence and secret services are rarely included in the study of SSR due to non-availability of information.

Policing is another important element of SSR that aims at establishing or maintaining public order – with repressive as well as with preventive means. In most countries “the police” is a formal institution organized at different levels (state, region, or community) to prevent, prosecute, and sanction violence in cooperation with the judiciary. Police forces as well as the judiciary are important links between war and post-war contexts as – contrary to the military – the police as the main cornerstone of public security in a country will unlikely be fully dismantled. The police's mandate, organizational structure, and behavior might be reformed or changed, but the institution itself will prevail even if name and personnel are changing. Policing is an important link between security forces and the judiciary as well as between the prevention of violence and the prosecution of its perpetrators.

Judicial reform is a fourth pillar of comprehensive SSR. The creation of an independent judiciary through legal separation and changes to judicial appointments, and the development of basic foundations of a rule of law and training of judicial personnel is a necessary element of non-violent conflict transformation. The access to and the application of general rules and laws for all are important components as are formal and informal institutions (such as courts, prosecution, defense, and ombudsmen) and a minimum of impartiality and trust in these institutions.

Security Sector Reform on the Ground

The theoretical debate on SSR interacts with changing perspectives of the practice of reform by local and national reform actors as well as international donors. SSR conducted by international donors is still a quite young field. From its inception, mainly by the United Kingdom with its engagement in Sierra Leone from 1997, it has been established as one main pillar of post-conflict peacebuilding (Jackson 2011; Waldman 2014). As more and more aspects of SSR found their way into peacebuilding programs of international donors, the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD) developed a “Handbook on Security System Reform (SSR),” with the main aim that donor support to SSR programs is both effective and sustainable. The OECD handbook served as one of the guiding documents for the so-called first generation SSR with four core objectives (OECD 2007): the establishment of effective governance, oversight, and accountability in the security system; the improved delivery of security and justice services; the development of local leadership and ownership of the process; and sustainability of justice and security sector delivery.

While the OECD handbook has been considered a useful guideline for practitioners of security sector reform in particular in the first years, this first generation of SSR has been widely criticized. The main criticism was that SSR programs often end up being technocratic, focused solely on improving the effectiveness of security institutions rather than on the politics that provide the context for security (Jackson 2018). In practice, this had often been translated into short-term stabilization efforts taking priority over longer-term transformations of underlying causes of conflict (Ansorg and Gordon 2019). One reason for this is the immediate setting of SSR, which is often one of urgency. In addition, international or bilateral donors often work according to tight timelines and specific short-term milestones, which then leads to a reduction of the agenda to technical aspects at the cost of long-term normative goals. For example, oversight bodies – and broader efforts to promote governance, accountability, and transparency as outlined by the OECD guidelines – often receive less attention and less resources than the core security sector institutions they are meant to hold accountable. As cases such as Chad, Guinea-Bissau, the DRC, and the CAR show, creating functioning oversight bodies is often only last in line of a long list of technical priorities in SSR. In addition, human rights and gender equality are often reduced to a day's awareness training or a footnote in a report (Ansorg and Haastrup 2018).

In sum, the first generation SSR was characterized by what Jane Chanaa already in 2002 called the “conceptual-contextual divide” (Chanaa 2002). Ultimately, it led to a weak empirical record of the programs: as cases such as DRC or Afghanistan show, the reform of the security sector was often only a technical exercise that led to security forces might have received some training and equipment, but that lacked the consideration of core normative principles such as human rights and democracy.

Practitioners were and are well aware of aforementioned weaknesses in the first generation model of SSR, and hence there has been some adjustment in the last couple of years. The programs moved away from “one size fits all” to a greater attention to local contexts. The need to include local, non-state actors has been acknowledged and studied (Sedra 2018). There have been multiple analyses of hybrid and integrative security models, such as in Liberia or Papua New Guinea (cf. Boege 2016). Equally, there have been attempts by international donors, in part in response to SSR scholarship, to include into SSR policy and guidelines actors beyond those at the level of the state (UN 2014). While the inclusion of local actors and the attention to local norms is uncontested nowadays, some challenges still persist.

International donors continue to strive for a normative agenda of creating liberal states out of nonliberal ones, while at the same time not recognizing or acknowledging the ongoing resistance to this process in the post-conflict countries (Jackson 2018, p. 5). This tension is only resolved by the donor side claiming to have reached their goals of building a “liberal” state with a functioning security sector, and withdrawing from the country (Jackson 2018; Kurtenbach 2013). Yet, as cases such as Afghanistan, Iraq, or the DRC show, the states left behind are often too fragile or unstable to deal with ongoing challenge by non-state armed actors (Jackson 2018, p. 5). Any meaningful security service is then often only possible by means of a powerful regime (ibid.). The danger here is that security providers do not serve to create a secure environment for citizens, but rather focus on the survival of their regime at the costs of political opponents and democratic competition.

SSR continues to be a largely state-centric project, driven by Western ideas of a state – at least partly because of concerns over sovereignty and external interference, but also with regards who funds these programs to a great extent. A lot of government officials would agree that it is rather difficult to dismiss the idea of the state as the reference frame for these kinds of reform.

Yet, considerations of SSR are accompanied by growing uncertainty about its ends, as it becomes increasingly evident that donor-led ideas about SSR and – to say it in the words of the OECD – “strengthening the ability of state institutions to monopolize the means of violence” (OECD 2007) do no longer seem to be realistic in the vast majority of post-conflict states (Jackson 2018, p. 6). The general idea of an improved security governance still holds nowadays; however, donors as well as actors on the ground are not entirely sure what the end product of SSR is supposed to look like, and how it is reached (Jackson 2018, p. 6).

Context Matters: Decolonizing SSR as a Next Step on the Agenda

Post-war reforms do not happen in a political vacuum, there is no new beginning from scratch. Despite high hopes that the end of war will bring fundamental change and open space for a better future, empirical evidence shows that it is “unlikely to see a clean break from violence to consent, from theft to production, from repression to democracy, or from impunity to accountability” (Keen 2000, p. 10). Even when fundamental reforms are envisioned in peace agreements, they will interact with existing structures and behaviors shaped by history, culture, and the experience of war and widespread violence (Ansorg and Kurtenbach 2017; Arjona 2014; Wood 2008). Hence the end of war is not necessarily a critical juncture where profound change happens in a short period of time (Capoccia 2016) but can also favor path-dependent developments or fortify existing structures. Due to their direct and indirect participation in the war, institutions of the security and justice system (police, military, and judiciary) are extremely important for these complex relations that need to be analyzed in their interaction and not separately.

For security sector reform to be meaningful and in order to create a secure environment for citizens to live in, reform efforts need to go beyond the attention to the often-cited “local ownership.” Two aspects are of importance here: a greater contextualization, and what we consider as “decolonization of SSR.”

Contextualization goes beyond the prescription of norms and guidelines of the security sector. It includes a careful analysis and acknowledgement of local power relations and historical trajectories, simply because reform does not happen from scratch and it is not possible to conduct reform independently of existing power structures (Ansorg and Kurtenbach 2017). Related to that is the regional environment of many post-war countries. As the examples of Sierra Leone or Iraq show, regional interactions influencing the reform process can be either conducive or nonconductive to the reform efforts (Almohamad 2019). Acknowledgement of context thus needs to be done on different levels – the local, the national, the regional, as well as finally (but not foremost) the international level. In addition, both patterns the patterns of transition (pacts vs. victories) as well as the degree of international interventions shape the outcome of SSR fundamentally.

Lastly, we need to acknowledge that knowledge and practice continue to be informed by epistemological assumptions that are deeply rooted in colonial history and colonial rule (Ansorg 2019). Policies on development and international cooperation in the Global North, particularly when it comes to post-conflict countries, still contemplate an idea of racial and civilizational hierarchy. These epistemological assumptions are inherently problematic, and they transfer a sense of the world that ignores many aspects that are essential to the history, politics, and societies in the Global South. A further step in the evolution of post-war SSR can thus be an approach to decolonize reform aspects: to radically question the origins of knowledge and practice of SSR and to center efforts more in the communities most affected by reform. In detail, this might include a decolonization of knowledge on SSR, and a departure from the idea of “making their security sector look more like our security sector” (Jackson 2018, p. 5) to something completely different from the security sectors of the Global North, but something that might work much better in these different contexts. This might also include a change in practice, and a re-centering of reform towards the Global South, including the way international donors fund programs. And this might include a fundamental reconsideration of foreign policy and a critical discussion of any intended and unintended effects of intervention.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Rule of Law

References

- Almohamad, S. (2019). Bringing regional politics to the study of security sector reform: Army reform in Sierra Leone and Iraq. GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies, Hamburg.
- Ansorg, N. (2019). Decolonising security sector reform in fragile countries in the global south. Keynote address at the workshop "Security sector reform in fragile contexts – What works best, where and when?," Federal Academy for Security Policy and GIZ, Berlin.
- Ansorg, N., & Gordon, E. (2019). Co-operation, contestation and complexity in post-conflict security sector reform. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 13(1), 2–24. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2018.1516392>.
- Ansorg, N., & Hastrup, T. (2018). Gender and the EU's support for security sector reform in fragile contexts: Gender & the EU's support to SSR. JCMS: Journal of Common Market Studies. <https://doi.org/10.1111/jcms.12716>.
- Ansorg, N., & Kurtenbach, S. (2017). Introduction: Institutional reforms and peace building. In N. Ansorg & S. Kurtenbach (Eds.), Institutional reforms and peacebuilding. Change, path-dependency and societal divisions in post-war communities (pp. 1–18). Abingdon/Oxon: Routledge.
- Ansorg, N., Haass, F., & Strasheim, J. (2016). Police reforms in peace agreements, 1975–2011: Introducing the PRPA dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 53(4), 597–607. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343316628932>.
- Arjona, A. (2014). Wartime institutions: A research agenda. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 58(8), 1360–1389. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022002714547904>.
- Bajraktari, Y., Boutellis, A., Gunja, F., Harris, D. Y., Kapsis, J., Kaye, E., & Rhee, J. (2006). The PRIME system: Measuring the success of post-conflict police reform. Princeton University, Woodrow Wilson School of Public and International Affairs, Princeton NJ.
- Ball, N. (2006). Civil society, good governance and the security sector. In M. Caparini, P. Fluri, & F. Molnar (Eds.), Civil society and the security sector. Concepts and practices in new democracies. Berlin: LIT Verlag.
- Berg, L.-A. (2014). From weakness to strength: The political roots of security sector reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina. International Peacekeeping, 21(2), 149–164. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2014.910397>.
- Bernabéu, I. (2007). Laying the foundations of democracy? Reconsidering security sector reform under UN auspices in Kosovo. Security Dialogue, 38(1), 71–92. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010607075973>.
- Besley, T., & Persson, T. (2010). State capacity, conflict, and development. Econometrica, 78(1), 1–34. <https://doi.org/10.3982/ECTA8073>.
- Betts, W. S., Carlson, S. N., & Gisvold, G. (2001). Post-conflict transitional administration of Kosovo and the lessons-learned in efforts to establish a judiciary and rule of law. Michigan Journal of International Law, 22(3), 371.
- Boås, M., & Stig, K. (2010). Security sector reform in Liberia: An uneven partnership without local ownership. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 4(3), 285–303. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2010.498934>.
- Boege, V. (2016). Looking beyond institutional reform engaging with the hybridization of peace and political order. Two cases from Oceania and West Africa. In N. Ansorg, S. Kurtenbach, & H. Wulf (Eds.), Institutional reforms and peacebuilding: Change, path-dependency and societal divisions in post-war communities (1st ed.). New York: Routledge. <https://doi.org/10.4324/9781315545219>.
- Bryden, A., & Hänggi, H. (2004). Reform and reconstruction of the security sector. Münster: LIT Verlag.
- Bzroska, M., & Heinemann-Grüder, A. (2004). Security sector reform and post-conflict reconstruction under international auspices. In A. Bryden & H. Hänggi (Eds.), Reform and reconstruction of the security sector (pp. 121–142). Münster: LIT Verlag.
- Capoccia, G. (2016). When do institutions "bite"? Historical institutionalism and the politics of institutional change. Comparative Political Studies, 49(8), 1095–1127. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010414015626449>.
- Cawthra, G., & Luckham, R. (2003). Governing insecurity: Democratic control of military and security establishments in transitional democracies. London: Zed Books.
- Chanaa, J. (2002). Security sector reform: Issues, challenges and prospects. Oxford/New York: Oxford University Press for the International Institute for Strategic Studies.
- Cooper, N., & Pugh, M. (2002). Security-sector transformation in post-conflict societies (The Conflict, Security & Development Group working papers). Retrieved from Centre for Defence Studies, King's College London website: <http://securityanddevelopment.org/pdf/work5.pdf>
- Davis, D. E. (2009). Non-state armed actors, new imagined communities, and shifting patterns of sovereignty and insecurity in the modern world. Contemporary Security Policy, 30, 221–245. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13523260903059757>.
- Donais, T. (2009). Empowerment or imposition? Dilemmas of local ownership in post-conflict peacebuilding processes. Peace & Change, 34(1), 3–26. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1468-0130.2009.00531.x>.
- Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2000). International peacebuilding: A theoretical and quantitative analysis. The American Political Science Review, 94(4), 779–801.
- Giustozzi, A. (2011). The art of coercion: The primitive accumulation and management of coercive power. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Giustozzi, A. (Ed.). (2012). Post-conflict disarmament, demobilization and reintegration: Bringing state-building back in. Burlington: Ashgate.
- Glassmyer, K., & Sambanis, N. (2008). Rebel – Military integration and civil war termination. Journal of Peace

- Research*, 45(3), 365–384. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343308088816>.
- Gross, E. (2009). Security sector reform in Afghanistan: The EU's contribution. Brussels: European Union Institute for Security Studies.
- Hartzell, C., & Hoddie, M. (2003). Institutionalizing peace: Power sharing and post-civil war conflict management. American Journal of Political Science, 47(2), 318–332. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1540-5907.00022>.
- Hood, L. (2006). Missed opportunities: The United Nations, police service and defence force development in Timor-Leste, 1999–2004. Civil Wars, 8(2), 143–162. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698240600877270>.
- Jackson, P. (2011). Security sector reform and state building. Third World Quarterly, 32(10), 1803–1822. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2011.610577>.
- Jackson, P. (2018). Introduction: Second-generation security sector reform. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 12(1), 1–10. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2018.1426384>.
- Joshi, M., Quinn, J. M., & Regan, P. M. (2015). Annualized implementation data on comprehensive intrastate peace accords, 1989–2012. Journal of Peace Research, 52(4), 551–562. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343314567486>.
- Keen, D. (2000). War and peace: What's the difference? International Peacekeeping, 7(4), 1–22. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310008413860>.
- Krause, K. (2012). Hybrid violence: Locating the use of force in postconflict settings. Global Governance, 18(1), 39–56.
- Kuehn, D., & Lorenz, P. (2011). Explaining civil-military relations in new democracies: Structure, agency and theory development. Asian Journal of Political Science, 19(3), 231–249. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02185377.2011.628145>.
- Kurtenbach, S. (2008). Guatemala's post-war development. The structural failure of low intensity peace (Working paper no. 3, Social and political fractures after wars: Youth violence in Cambodia and Guatemala). Duisburg: INEF.
- Kurtenbach, S. (2010). Why is liberal peace-building so difficult? Some lessons from Central America. European Review of Latin American and Caribbean Studies, 88, 95–110.
- Kurtenbach, S. (2013). The 'happy outcomes' may not come at all – Postwar violence in Central America. Civil Wars, 15(Suppl 1), 105–122. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2013.850884>.
- Kurtenbach, S., & Wulf, H. (2012). Violence and security concerns in post-conflict situations (Research and advisory project „Instruments and procedures of German development cooperation in post-conflict situations“ – Project working paper no. 3). Duisburg: Institute for Development and Peace.
- Lambach, D. (2007). Oligopolies of violence in post-conflict societies. Hamburg: German Institute of Global and Area Studies.
- Lemay-Hébert, N. (2014). Resistance in the time of cholera: The limits of stabilization through securitization in Haiti. International Peacekeeping, 21(2), 198–213. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2014.910399>.
- Licklider, R. (2014). New armies from old: Merging competing military forces after civil wars. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Loden, A. (2007). Civil society and security sector reform in post-conflict Liberia: Painting a moving train without brushes. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(2), 297–307. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ijtj/ijm022>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- McFate, S. (2010). The link between DDR and SSR in conflict-affected countries. Retrieved from United States Institute of Peace website: <https://www.usip.org/publications/2010/05/link-between-ddr-and-ssr-conflict-affected-countries>
- Mehler, A. (2009). Hybrid regimes and oligopolies of violence in Africa: Expectations on security provision "from below" (No. 8). Retrieved from Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management website: http://www.berghof-foundation.org/fileadmin/redaktion/Publications/Handbook/Dialogue_Chapters/dialogue8_mehler_comm.pdf
- Mendelson-Forman, J. (2006). Security sector reform in Haiti. International Peacekeeping, 13(1), 14–27. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310500424629>.
- Muggah, R. (2005). No magic bullet: A critical perspective on disarmament, demobilization and reintegration (DDR) and weapons reduction in post-conflict contexts. The Round Table, 94(379), 239–252. <https://doi.org/10.1080/00358530500082684>.
- Myrntinen, H. (2010). Poster boys no more: Gender and security sector reform in Timor-Leste (Report). Geneva: Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces (DCAF).
- Nathan, L. (2007). No ownership, no commitment: A guide to local ownership of security sector reform. Retrieved from http://issat.dcaf.ch/mkd/layout/set/fullscreen/content/download/2210/19148/file/Nathan%20No_Ownership_No_Commitment.pdf
- Neild, R. (2001). Democratic police reforms in war-torn societies. Conflict, Security and Development, 1(01), 21–43. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678800100590596>.
- O'Neill, W. G. (2005). Police reform in post-conflict societies: What we know and what we still need to know. Retrieved from International Peace Academy website: <http://www.ipinst.org/~ipinst/media/pdf/publications/polreferpt.pdf>
- OECD. (2007). OECD DAC handbook on security system reform. Supporting security and justice. Paris: OECD.

- Paris, R., & Sisk, T. D. (Eds.). (2009). The dilemmas of statebuilding: Confronting the contradictions of post-war peace operations. London: Routledge.
- Schroeder, U. C., Chappuis, F., & Kocak, D. (2014). Security sector reform and the emergence of hybrid security governance. International Peacekeeping, 21(2), 214–230. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2014.910405>.
- Sedra, M. (2010). Security sector reform 101: Understanding the concept, charting trends and identifying challenges. Retrieved from The Centre for International Governance Innovation website: https://www.cigionline.org/sites/default/files/ssr_101_final_april_27.pdf
- Sedra, M. (2014). An uncertain future for Afghanistan's security sector. Stability: International Journal of Security & Development, 3(1), 1–16. <https://doi.org/10.5334/sta.ei>.
- Sedra, M. (2018). Adapting security sector reform to ground-level realities: The transition to a second-generation model. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 12(1), 48–63. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2018.1426383>.
- Slaby, K. (2003). Security sector reform in Central America: Is it working? (No. IPS 688-FA03). Retrieved from Monterey Institute of International Studies website: <http://sites.miis.edu/sand/files/2011/07/Security-Sector-Reform-in-Central-America-is-it-Working-Kimberly-Slaby.pdf>
- Spear, J. (2002). Disarmament and demobilization. In S. J. Stedman, D. Rothchild, & E. M. Cousens (Eds.), Ending civil wars. The implementation of peace agreements (pp. 141–182). Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Stodiek, T., & Zellner, W. (2007). The creation of multi-ethnic police services in the Western Balkans: A record of mixed success. Retrieved from <http://nbn-resolving.de/urn:nbn:de:0168-ssoar-260323>
- Strohmeier, H. (2001). Collapse and reconstruction of a judicial system: The United Nations Missions in Kosovo and East Timor. The American Journal of International Law, 95(1), 46–63. <https://doi.org/10.2307/2642036>.
- UN. (2014). Resolution 2151 (2014) (UN Security Council Resolution). Retrieved from United Nation Security Council website: http://www.un.org/en/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=S/RES/2151\(2014\))
- Vetschera, H., & Damian, M. (2006). Security sector reform in Bosnia and Herzegovina: The role of the international community. International Peacekeeping, 13(1), 28–42. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310500424694>.
- Waldman, T. (2014). The use of statebuilding research in fragile contexts: Evidence from British policymaking in Afghanistan, Nepal and Sierra Leone. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 8(2–3), 149–172. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2014.885675>.
- Wood, E. J. (2008). The social processes of civil war: The wartime transformation of social networks. Annual Review of Political Science, 11, 539–561.
- Wulf, H. (2004). Security sector reform in developing and transitional countries. Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.

Security-Development Nexus

► Police Reform and Peacebuilding

Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

Manuela Nilsson

Department of Peace and Development Studies,
Linnaeus University, Växjö, Sweden

Conceptualizing Security and Development

The policy community frames peacebuilding as the process in which the foundations for sustainable peace are laid. It is widely accepted within the international community that sustainable peace is based on re-establishing basic security and development conditions and that poverty, intrastate conflicts, complex emergencies, and human insecurity are interlocking problems. Dominant policy frameworks therefore present security and development as core pillars of peacebuilding that are inextricably linked: low levels of security and development reinforce each other in a vicious circle, while high levels are expected to influence each other positively. Hence, they have been calling for integrated peacebuilding policies in which all peacebuilding actors, at the international, state, and local level, cooperate and coordinate their activities on the ground to address both challenges in concert (UNDP 2016; WB 2011; DfID 2012; OECD/DAC 2001, 2012; OECD 2009; UN 2005).

Security and development, however, are contested concepts that have, in part as a result of the emergence of peacebuilding as a field of increasing international engagement after the end of the Cold War period, undergone an evolutionary process during which they have become increasingly entangled and overlapping. Shifting their focus from state-centered, top-down, to bottom-up approaches, the individual took center stage in both concepts. Before the 1990s, development strategies mainly focused on poverty reduction and economic growth in order to enhance the well-being of societies, while security was understood predominantly as the protection of a society from external threat. However, during the early years following the end of the Cold War, and in part as a consequence of the international community's stronger focus on peacebuilding, both concepts were expanded. Today's concept of human development grew out of global discussions on the links between economic growth and development during the second half of the nineteenth century. Going beyond GDP measurements and the expansion of income and wealth, the human development approach focuses at improving peoples' lives rather than the national economy they live in. Human development therefore includes social, economic, and sustainable development, measuring indicators such as education, gender equality, the environment, and human rights rather than macroeconomic indicators. In order to achieve this broader concept of development in societies involved in, or emerging from, conflict, however, security objectives such as crime prevention and conflict resolution had to be included into post-conflict reconstruction plans, thereby establishing an ever-closer link between development and security, particularly in peacebuilding endeavors. Since the 1990s and as a result of the changes in the existing security architecture, a different understanding of security also broadened the concept of national security that had shaped the Cold War period. A number of basic human needs were suggested as indispensable for the survival of the individual. Adding economic, health, political, environmental, community, and food security to physical security, the concept of human security challenged the state-centric security and further linked security with development components (UNDP 1994).

However, this broadening and rapprochement of the security and development concepts also evoked criticism. Questions arose concerning just whose security and whose development international donors intended to strengthen. A general understanding emerged that security is about "us" and development is about "them," creating biopolitical divides between desirable and improvable as opposed to unworthy and intolerable societal actors. Particularly human security was accused of being vague, undefined, and all-inclusive and therefore prone to become a tool to legitimize imposition and intervention (Spear and Williams 2012; Stepputat 2010; Duffield 2006). With the introduction of the concept of humanitarian intervention in the early 2000s, the human security discourse effectively put humanitarian challenges in developing countries as a security risk for the developed world.

The Evolution of the Security-Development Nexus

Security and development have both been key concepts in global politics since colonial times. Although they were still conceptually separate, the idea of a nexus between both was already an important element in the state policies of colonial as well as postcolonial regimes well before the end of the Cold War, where security concerns largely dictated donors' development policies and counterinsurgency strategies included development activities. The international system that emerged at the end of the Second World War was explicitly created to further both security and development at the global level. The two competing political and economic systems that dominated the bipolar world order of the Cold War divided along the lines of security and development and used both as tools to secure followers (Buur et al. 2007; Tschirgi 2005; Stilhoff-Sörensen and Söderbaum 2012).

The end of the bipolar security architecture brought new challenges and greatly impacted the security-development nexus. Addressing a wave of intrastate conflicts, growing awareness of the development costs of armed conflict and the impact of social and economic development on security levels, and therefore the overlapping nature of security and development challenges, UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali's An Agenda for Peace (Boutros-Ghali 1992) underlined the importance of conflict prevention and peacebuilding to address a world that was threatened more by its people's inability to procure livelihoods than by interstate wars. The emergence of the concept of peacebuilding in the early 1990s and a new focus on conflict prevention strategies significantly expanded the scope of the development and security agendas and firmly established the nexus as an important part of the liberal-international policy arena. Security and development became the heart of a more assertive global liberal peacebuilding agenda which assumed that democratization, free market economies, the rule of law, and the integration of societies into the global community ensured worldwide security and sustainable peace (Hurwitz and Peake 2004; Donais and Knorr 2013; Richmond 2011). Emphasis was placed on so-called fragile states that faced the nexus challenges: severe development problems that were often related to ongoing or previously experienced periods of violence. The failures of UN missions in Somalia, Rwanda, and Bosnia during the 1990s clearly exposed the limitations of conventional military crisis management in a threat environment shaped by domestic conflicts and highlighted the necessity of a comprehensive approach to security that included development components (Trachsler 2008). By the end of the 1990s, the need to include security reforms in development interventions was also widely recognized. Combining security, development, and good governance was regarded as the winning recipe to create modern, democratic, and liberally minded states that were able to reduce conflict and create a broader peaceful political culture (see, for example, OECD/DAC 2007). State-building, the process of building, rebuilding, or consolidating the capacities of a conflict-afflicted state, thus became the predominant tool to break the vicious circle of underdevelopment and conflict by focusing on the creation of strong and legitimate states capable of providing security and facilitating economic growth. The state's capacity to recuperate its monopoly over the use of force after ongoing armed conflict was often prioritized over development objectives and caused considerable tensions in countries where state security actors had been perpetrators.

The attacks of September 11, 2001, however, gave birth to the War on Terror and changed the approach toward the security-development nexus. Large-scale peacekeeping operations and long-term peacebuilding were replaced by shorter-term UN interventions with more modest security and development packages. These stabilization missions mixed security sector reform with the provision of basic social services, reconstruction tasks, and short-term development projects and engaged non-state actors and development aid agencies in the effort to impose liberal peace. In the years to follow, stabilization missions were used in countries experiencing extreme violence such as Colombia, Pakistan, Afghanistan, Haiti, the DRC, Mali, the Central African Republic, Iraq, Kenya, and Sri Lanka (Muggah 2013). A prime task of international military personnel in their quest to stabilize countries with high levels of violence was to "win hearts and minds" of local populations, reminiscent of the Winning Hearts and Minds (WHAM) project during the Vietnam War, and once again the security-development nexus came of use, this time to fuel counterinsurgency strategies. Thus, eager to secure local support vital to pacifying spaces and populations that were regarded a threat to the international system of liberal states, military personnel transformed into development workers (Kiensherf 2011; Buur et al. 2007).

In 2005, the United Nations World Summit officially finalized the evolution of the nexus into an international truism. Secretary General Kofi Annan summarized the international consensus by underlining that "in an increasingly interconnected world, progress in the areas of development, security and human rights must go hand in hand. There will be no development without security and no security without development" (UN 2005, UN A/59/2005, annex, point 2). Today, the nexus continues to stand strong in international policy frameworks. Conflict prevention work, DDR (disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration), and SSR (security sector reform) are now a fundamental part of global development policy, and international actors make sure that objectives for development cooperation, humanitarian assistance, and international security are mutually reinforcing (OECD 2019; DfID 2012; EC 2016; UNDP 2016; WB 2016). A new structure emerged to address these combined security and development challenges: comprehensive, integrated, "three-D" (defense, diplomacy, and development), or whole-of-government approaches. Those approaches commonly feature a confusing array of actors, integrating different governmental institutions engaged in security and development work, security actors, and civil society and combining them with local organizations in the peacebuilding environments. As development problems increasingly turned into security risks, international donors also initiated institutional changes. Major international development aid players, such as the United States, Canada, and the United Kingdom, have increasingly coordinated their development aid agencies with their foreign policy and military institutions. In the United Kingdom, for example, a new institution, the Conflict Pool, united the Ministry of Defense, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, and the Department for International Development (DFID) to facilitate multi-agency assistance and planning (Pugh et al. 2013; McConnon 2016), while the European Union created the European External Action Service (EEAS). However, problems of coordination and battles over funding and responsibilities institutionalized rather than eliminated the division between the EU's development cooperation agenda and the security policy agenda and led to reduced EU involvement in fragile states after 2011 (Smith 2013). Furthermore, nexus thinking has also created major problems when implemented on the ground, both within the international donor community and in the host countries where the nexus was applied. The following sections will discuss those problems in more detail.

Challenges to the Implementation of the Nexus on the Ground

Efforts to implement the security-development nexus in peacebuilding environments have revealed a disconnect between policy documents and activities on the ground. Critics have pointed out that international interventions have so far been characterized by a clear primacy of security over development that has, furthermore, produced little success. They underline that the shift to stabilization after the 9/11 effectively favored the establishment of a controlled environment, stability, and order over profound social change. Development, rather than being a transformation toward greater democracy and justice, became a process that was expected to create greater stability by managing security risks. In the UN stabilization mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) that began in 2004, for example, nexus thinking linked poverty and criminality. A strong focus on a militarized version of restoring order to eliminate certain security risks limited development engagements to practices of social work, relief assistance, and small-scale reconstruction. The elimination of security risks became a condition for development assistance, deferring long-term development. However, despite that emphasis on security assistance, security was hardly improved, and the top-down focus on state-building essentially rendered the mission a failure (Siman and Santos 2018; Baranyi 2014; Donais and Knorr 2013). The European Union's discourse on the security-development nexus is an example of the commonly held assumption among international donors that re-establishing security represents a necessary precondition for development engagement, an assumption that justifies the primacy of security over development in the implementation of the nexus. European donors are even accused of paying only lip service to the nexus, as the main drivers for their development work are European security interests (Keukeleire and Raube 2013; Furness and Gänzle 2017). This primacy of security over development has, according to critics, even resulted in European donor support for authoritarian regimes, such as in the case of Tajikistan, who effectively used the security-development nexus mantra to solicit development aid in order to counter security threats but in fact blocked any reforms to further development in the country (Boonstra and Shapovalova 2012). The UK's Department for International Development (DFID) is reported to have bolstered state security at the expense of individual security during their intervention in Sierra Leone in 2000 (Abrahamson 2005), and US military solutions to development problems in Africa are accused of having resulted in renewed conflict and increased insecurity (McConnon 2016).

A second critique against the application of the security-development nexus in liberal approaches to peacebuilding underlines that much of the rhetoric of integrated or whole-of-government approaches translated mainly into military-led Quick Impact Projects (QIPs), short-term development initiatives designed to increase trust in the military rather than further long-term development. Long from being equal partners in these activities, civil society and local organizations only played a supporting role that blurred the boundary between civilians and the military and evoked resistance on both actor sides. The two major international interventions of the past decades, Afghanistan (2001–2014) and Iraq (2003–2011), are good examples. As a natural outgrowth of the adoption of the security-development nexus mantra, both featured so-called Provincial Reconstruction Teams (PRTs) that included military and nonmilitary personnel with the aim to win the “hearts and minds” of the local population by providing a modicum of security and development in the most insecure regions. PRTs engaged in a wide variety of activities ranging from humanitarian relief and police training to the collection of intelligence information and the implementation of Quick Impact Projects that lacked local ownership. However, PRT activities were ultimately led by security concerns to combat insurgents and protect military forces rather than long-term needs for recovery. PRT legitimacy was based on the argument that security had to be established before real long-term development work could be attempted and that only security actors could enter those insecure regions, thereby effectively keeping development actors out. Studies have shown that the PRTs disempowered the Afghan population, called forth disengagement rather than cooperation, and even drew the local population further into conflict (Waddell 2006; Ryerson 2012; Beath et al. 2012; Stepputat 2010).

A third characteristic of the difficulties concerning the implementation of the security-development nexus in international stabilization and peacebuilding missions are problems of leadership and coordination in those multi-actor interventions, often featuring an ad hoc and fragmented array of bilateral and multilateral development and security actors. Critics maintain that while the nexus is firmly established at the policy level, there is no coherence of security and development policies in their comprehensive approaches on the ground. Those problems were experienced not only by multilateral actors such as the United Nations and the European Union but also by traditional donors such as the United States, the United Kingdom, Australia, Sweden, Germany, or Canada and emerging powers such as Brazil, India, China, and South Africa participating in UN missions (Sherman et al. 2011; Furness and Gänzle 2017). The international mission in Afghanistan is, again, a prime example for the difficulty to find a common approach between the NATO-led International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), tailored on the neoliberal state-building model and based on the Common Approach Action Plan, a result of the security-development paradigm, and the US-led counterinsurgency Operation Enduring Freedom-Afghanistan (OEF-A), designed to fight Al-Qaeda and the Taliban. Incompatible and competing national strategies of the participating countries and a lack of a joint framework and decision-making, or even a consensus concerning the long-term goals to be achieved, impeded effective cooperation. While the nexus was followed at the policy level, military and civilian efforts were strictly separated at the tactical level on the ground. Missions, money, and staff earmarked for the security and development domains remained divided. Much more funds were channeled to security than to development projects, and aid often ended up where donors had their own troops instead of contributing to an overall development plan. Poor coordination, communication problems, and a general lack of oversight, evaluation, and mutual understanding between civilian and military actors eventually further destabilized the economy and increased insecurity (Andersen 2016; Kfir 2015; Muggah 2013).

Furthermore, the combination of security and development actors in these multi-actor teams eroded the distinction between them in the eyes of both insurgents and ordinary Afghans, which in turn led to the association of aid agencies with the military and consequently presented greater security risks for the former. While the NGOs debated with the PRTs over the latter’s short-term security focus, the PRT efforts, in turn, clashed with hardcore military strategies that shifted between combat and peacebuilding missions. Overall, Afghanistan represents an excellent example to showcase the differences between military and civilian personnel in terms of focus, goal, time frame, and ownership questions. Both lacked knowledge about how the other works, felt challenged in their respective identities, and observed different and sometimes incompatible practices (Waddell 2006; Andersen 2016; Alamir 2012).

Studies focusing on the form the nexus assumes in local settings, at the level of national government practices for peacebuilding rather than international peacebuilding missions, revealed even more challenges for the implementation of the security-development nexus on the ground. While the interdependence between security and development has become a truism in international donor policy frameworks, countries that are experiencing security and development challenges still display a rather unilateral security-first understanding at their policy level. Policies designed to either increase security or development often hamper, block, and counteract each other when implemented and often pose a trade-off for the local populations (Nilsson 2018; Jensen 2010). In Colombia, for example, peacebuilding policies to restitute land to their rightful owners increased insecurity levels for peasant communities (Nilsson and Taylor 2017), while in Sri Lanka, security strategies hampered livelihoods for fishermen (Orjuela 2010). The linking of security and development in the form of military actors doing development work in remote areas not controlled by the state often creates further tensions, particularly in countries emerging from protracted armed conflict, as the military is more often than not associated with human rights violations against the populations it now tries to develop (Reitano 2014). Continued violence during peacebuilding further unbalances the nexus, pushing the security agenda ahead of the development agenda, favoring short-term security over long-term development results, and placing obstacles in the way of cooperation between security and development actors.

The Future of the Security-Development Nexus

So far, experiences with implementing the security-development nexus on the ground clearly show that nexus theory is easier than nexus practice. But even nexus theory is challenged. Critics to the cycle truism abound. They outline an infinite number of possible linkages between security and development that make the definition of one specific nexus impossible (Stern and Öjendal 2010), point out that the nexus is historically and contextually dependent (Spear and Williams 2012), argue that the causal connections between security and development are intermediated through a country's evolving social and political processes and institutions (Tschirgi et al. 2010), and caution against applying the security-development nexus automatically across all policy areas, levels of policy implementation, conflict phases, or contexts (Tschirgi 2005). A first proposition is therefore that international donors move away from "the" security-development nexus and allow for a more context-specific analysis of the relationship between security and development where peacebuilding is required (and desired).

A second thought concerns the question who is ultimately responsible for implementing the nexus, in its different forms, in peacebuilding processes. Criticism abounds that donors are engaging in development interventions predominantly to strengthen their own security at home, as wealthy nations cannot isolate themselves from the effects of poverty, thereby sacrificing long-term development challenges of poor countries on the altar of short-term donor security needs. Others even argue that linking security and development in the discourse about human security presents a new form of domination of the developing world by the developed. Development, it is said, has become securitized, whereby long-term development objectives are subordinated to, and merged with, short-term security concerns (Amer et al. 2012; Chandler 2007; Duffield 2007; Buur et al. 2007).

However, the overall failure of the implementation of the nexus on the ground has also contributed to a shift away from top-down international interventionism to an approach that focuses more on empowering societies to be the agents of their own security and development. The so-called turn to the local (Öjendal and Sivhouch 2015) calls for cultivating resilience, the internal capacity to cope with crisis, of populations in countries that face security and development challenges. Peacebuilding ownership is transferred from global to local levels, fostering endogenous peacebuilding processes that are facilitated and supported, rather than imposed by the international community (Donais and Knorr 2013). While the belief in the nexus mantra at the global policy level remains strong, responsibility for its implementation has effectively shifted from the donors to the struggling populations. Critics maintain that the security-development nexus is in that sense used as an opportunity to make grand policy statements while at the same time disengaging from serious policy-making and passing the responsibility on to other actors, not least non-governmental organizations (Chandler 2007; Pugh et al. 2013; Duffield 2001; Keukeleire and Raube 2013; Stilhoff-Sørensen and Söderbaum 2012).

Disengagement, however, is not a credible reaction to increasing global security and development challenges. Neither is the shift toward resilience necessarily a move to reject responsibility but could also be regarded as a hopeful trend toward collaboration based on a more equal, interdependent relationship between international and local actors. Donor involvement in the implementation of the security-development nexus (es) can and should not be standardized but needs to be based on a bottom-up, context-specific understanding of individual peacebuilding environments and the needs and priorities of host countries and local communities instead of simply repeating the mantra of the security-development nexus. Just how complex the possible linkages between security and development are has become clear, through research as well as practical implementation efforts. Genuine, long-term, development-centric approaches are required to deal with today's security and development problems, where the securitization of development, security-first approaches, and short-term security policies have clearly failed (Andersen 2016; Tschirgi 2018; Reitano 2014). Security and development will always present prime challenges to societies worldwide. Their relationship to each other will therefore remain a focus of attention for all actors engaged in confronting these challenges. Ending the competitive primacy thinking and recognizing the long-term importance of both will help to reconcile these two peacebuilding arenas. This will enable all peacebuilding actors, international as well as local, to engage in a comprehensive analysis on how security and development challenges, actors, policies, and opportunities are linked in specific peacebuilding environments and on that basis devise long-term, integral plans that involve international, regional, state, and local actors in a coordinated and collaborative approach.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Abrahamson, R. (2005). Blair's Africa: The politics of securitization and fear. Alternatives, 30, 55–80.
- Alamir, F. M. (2012). The complex security-development nexus – Practical challenges for development cooperation and the military. Security and Peace, 2, 69–75.
- Amer, R., Swain, A., & Öjendal, J. (2012). The security-development nexus. London: Anthem Press.
- Andersen, L. R. (2016). Afghanistan. Lessons identified 2001–2014. Copenhagen: Danish Institute for International Studies (DIIS).
- Baranyi, S. (2014). Canada and the security-development nexus in Haiti: The 'dark side' or changing shades of gray? Canadian Foreign Policy Journal, 20(2), 163–175. <https://www.tandfonline-com.proxy.lnu.se/doi/pdf/10.1080/11926422.2014.934858?needAccess=true>
- Beath, A., Christia, F., & Enikolopov, R. (2012). Winning hearts and minds through development? Evidence from a field experiment in Afghanistan (Policy Research Working Paper 6129). Washington, DC: World Bank.
- Boonstra, J., & Shapovalova, N. (2012). Thinking security, doing development? The security-development nexus in European politics towards Tajikistan. Helsinki: Ministry for Foreign Affairs of Finland.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An Agenda for Peace. Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping. New York: United Nations. http://www.unrol.org/files/A_47_277.pdf
- Buur, L., Jensen, S., & Stepputat, F. (2007). The security-development nexus. Expressions of sovereignty and securitization in Southern Africa. Cape Town: HSRC Press.

- Chandler, D. (2007). The development-security nexus and the rise of anti-foreign policy. Journal of International Relations and Development, 10(4), 362–386. <https://doi.org/10.1057/palgrave.jird.1800135>.
- Department for International Development (DfID). (2012). Fighting poverty to build a safer world. A strategy for security and development. London: DfID. <https://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/+http://www.dfid.gov.uk/pubs/files/securityforall.pdf>
- Donais, T., & Knorr, A. C. (2013). Peacebuilding from below vs. the liberal peace: The case of Haiti. Canadian Journal of Development Studies/Revue canadienne d'études du développement, 34(1), 54–69. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02255189.2013.761130>.
- Duffield, M. (2001). Global governance and the new wars: The merging of development and security. London: Zed Books.
- Duffield, M. (2006). Human security: Linking development and security. In S. Klingebiel (Ed.), New interfaces between security and development changing concepts and approaches (pp. 11–38). Bonn: Deutsches Institut fuer Entwicklungspolitik (DIE).
- Duffield, M. (2007). Development, security and unending war: Governing the world of peoples. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- European Commission (EC). (2016). Strategic plan 2016–2020. DG international cooperation and development – DG DEVCO. Brussels: European Commission. https://ec.europa.eu/info/sites/info/files/devco-strategic-plan-2016-2020-revised_en.pdf
- Furness, M., & Gänzle, S. (2017). The security–development nexus in European Union foreign relations after Lisbon: Policy coherence at last? Development Policy Review, 35(4), 475–492.
- Hurwitz, A., & Peake, G. (2004). Strengthening the security-development nexus: Assessing international policy and practice since the 1990s. New York: International Peace Academy.
- Jensen, S. (2010). The security and development nexus in Cape Town: War on gangs, counterinsurgency and citizenship. Security Dialogue, 41(1), 77–97. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010609357038>.
- Keukeleire, S., & Raube, K. (2013). The security–development nexus and securitization in the EU's policies towards developing countries. Cambridge Review of International Affairs, 26(3), 556–572.
- Kfir, I. (2015). NATO's paradigm shift: Searching for a traditional security–human security nexus. Contemporary Security Policy, 36(2), 219–243. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13523260.2015.1061766>.
- Kiensherf, M. (2011). A program of global pacification: The US counterinsurgency doctrine and the biopolitics of human (in)security. Security Dialogue, 42, 517. <http://sdi.sagepub.com/content/42/6/517>
- McConnon, E. (2016). Risk and the security-development nexus. The policies of the US, the UK and Canada. London: Palgrave.
- Muggah, R. (2013). Stabilization operations, security and development: States of fragility. London: Routledge.
- Nilsson, M. (2018). Building peace amidst violence: An analysis of Colombia's policies to address security and development challenges. Iberoamericana – Nordic Journal of Latin American and Caribbean Studies, 47(1), 34–33. <https://doi.org/10.16993/iberoamericana.411>.
- Nilsson, M., & Taylor, L. K. (2017). Applying the security-development nexus on the ground: Land restitution in Colombia. Conflict, Security and Development, 17(1), 73–89. <http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/14678802.2016.1231844>
- Öjendal, J., & Sivhouch, O. (2015). The 'local turn' saving liberal peacebuilding? Unpacking virtual peace in Cambodia. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 929–949. <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1080/01436597.2015.1030387>
- Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2001). Helping prevent violent conflicts: Orientations for external partners. DAC guidelines. Paris: OECD.
- Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2007). Principles for good international engagement in fragile states and situations. Paris: OECD. www.oecd.org/fragilestates
- Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2009). Concepts and dilemmas of state building in fragile situations: From fragility to resilience. OECD Journal on Development, 9(3), 61–148. https://www.oecd-ilibrary.org/development/concepts-and-dilemmas-of-state-building-in-fragile-situations_journal_dev-v9-art27-en
- Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2012). European Union: Development Assistance Committee (DAC) peer review 2012. Paris: Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development. <https://www.oecd.org/dac/peer-reviews/europeunion2012dacpeerreviewmainfindingandrecommendations.htm>
- Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2019). DAC recommendation on the humanitarian-development-peace nexus. OECD/LEGAL/5019. <https://legalinstruments.oecd.org/public/doc/643/643.en.pdf>
- Orjuela, C. (2010). The bullet in the living room: Linking security and development in a Colombo neighborhood. Security Dialogue, 41(1), 99–120.
- Pugh, J., Gabay, C., & Williams, A. J. (2013). Beyond the securitization of development: The limits of intervention, developmentization of security and repositioning of purpose in the UK coalition government's policy agenda. Geoforum, 44, 193–201.
- Reitano, T. J. (2014). Comparing approaches to the security-development nexus in the Sahel and their implications for governance. Governance in Africa, 1(1), 1–6. <https://gaj.ubiquitypress.com/articles/10.5334/gia.aa/>
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. New York: Routledge.
- Ryerson, C. (2012). The pacification of soldiering and the militarization of development: Contradictions inherent

- in provincial reconstruction in Afghanistan. Globalizations, 9(1), 53–71.
- Sherman, J., Gleason, M. M., Sidhy, W. P. S., & Jones, B. (2011). Engagement on development and security. New actors, new debates. New York: New York University.
- Siman, M., & Santos, V. (2018). Interrogating the security–development nexus in Brazil’s domestic and foreign pacification engagements. Conflict, Security & Development, 18(1), 61–83. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2017.1420312>.
- Smith, M. E. (2013). The European external action service and the security–development nexus: Organizing for effectiveness or incoherence? Journal of European Public Policy, 20(9), 1299–1315. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13501763.2012.758441>.
- Spear, J., & Williams, P. (2012). Security and development in global politics. A critical comparison. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Stepputat, F. (2010). Are we in this together? Security, development and the ‘comprehensive approach’ agenda. In J. McNeish & J. H. Sande Lie (Eds.), Security and development (pp. 19–35). New York: Berghahn Books.
- Stern, M., & Öjendal, J. (2010). Mapping the security–development nexus: Conflict, complexity, cacophony, convergence. Security Dialogue, 41(1), 5–29. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010609357041>.
- Stilhoff-Sörensen, J., & Söderbaum, F. (2012). The end of the development-security nexus? The rise of global disaster management. Uppsala: Dag Hammarskjöld Foundation.
- Trachsler, D. (2008). Security and development: Convergence or competition? CSS analyses in security policy 3(40). Zurich: Center for Security Studies, ETH.
- Tschirgi, N. (2005). Security and development policies: Untangling the relationship. New York: International Peace Academy (IPA). <https://gsdrc.org/document-library/security-and-development-policies-untangling-the-relationship/>
- Tschirgi, N. (2018). International security and development. In A. Ghecia & W. G. Wohlforth (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of international security. Oxford: University Press.
- Tschirgi, N., Lund, M. S., & Mancini, F. (2010). Security and development. Searching for critical connections. London/Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- United Nations (UN). (2005). In larger freedom. Towards development, security and human rights for all. Report of the Secretary-General. (UN A/59/2005), annex, point 2. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). (1994). Human development report. New York: Oxford University Press. http://hdr.undp.org/sites/default/files/reports/255/hdr_1994_en_complete_nostats.pdf
- United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). (2016). Building inclusive societies and sustaining peace through democratic governance and conflict prevention. New York: UNDP.
- Waddell, N. (2006). Ties that bind: DfID and the emerging security and development agenda. Conflict, Security & Development, 6(4), 531–555. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678800601066520>.
- World Bank (WB). (2011). World development report: Conflict, security, and development. Washington, DC: World Bank. https://siteresources.worldbank.org/INTWDRS/Resources/WDR2011_Full_Text.pdf
- World Bank (WB). (2016). World Bank Group engagement in situations of fragility, conflict, and violence. Washington, DC: The World Bank Group.

Self-Defense

- ▶ Cyber Conflict

Self-Organization

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Separation

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Separatist Conflicts

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Settlement

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Sexual

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Sexual and Gender-Based Violence

- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding

Sexuality

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding

Shared Sovereignty

- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

Sierra Leone

Patrick Tom
Independent Researcher, St. Andrews, UK

Synonymys

Lomé accord; Lomé peace accord; Lomé peace agreement; Peace accord; Peace agreement; Peace negotiations; Peace talks; Post-conflict; Postwar

Definition

A broad understanding of peacebuilding in Sierra Leone is vital in dealing with the root causes of the conflict, including challenges such as poverty and social injustice that individuals and communities on “the margins of the state” in the country face in their everyday life. International peacebuilding in Sierra Leone largely focused on state elites, the state, and its institutions. Despite international attempts at building strong and effective state institutions, “state institutions almost without exception (notable exceptions are Audit and Ombudsman) have returned to the status quo preceding the conflict” (M’cleod and Ganson 2018, p. 26). This broad understanding of peacebuilding “does not limit peacebuilding [in Sierra Leone] to activities aimed at preventing a return to conflict, but also include social justice, welfare provision, reconciliation, equity and humanistic agendas for peace rather than technocratic institutional state-centric agendas for peace” (Tom 2017, p. 50). If international actors had adopted a broad understanding of peacebuilding in Sierra Leone, this would have enabled them from the beginning to design post-conflict peacebuilding strategies and mechanisms not dominated by state-centric approaches since a broad understanding of peacebuilding considers the significant role of non-state actors and institutions in promoting sustainable peace in the country. It is vital to note that this does not mean that in Sierra Leone political participation and prevention of relapse to conflict do not matter but that these can still be addressed within the broader understanding of peacebuilding.

Introduction

The small West African State of Sierra Leone gained political independence from Great Britain on 27 April 1961. In the immediate aftermath of independence, there was considerable optimism that political independence would usher the country into an era of political, social, and economic development (Berewa 2011). However, the independence euphoria started to dissolve as the post-colonial state soon turned into an authoritarian and corrupt one generating grievances among citizens, eventually leading to a brutal civil war which lasted from 1991 until 2002. Sierra Leone’s civil war began in March 1991 when the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) led by Corporal Foday Sankoh attacked the eastern part of the country from its bases in neighboring Liberia seeking to overthrow the All People's Congress (APC)-led government of President Joseph Momoh. The RUF were supported by the Liberian leader, Charles Taylor's National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) "special forces" and mercenaries from Burkina Faso. During the war other factions emerged, including the Kamajors or civil defense groups who protected rural communities and fought against the RUF in alliance with Sierra Leone army (SLA) and the West Side Boys, a splinter group of the SLA.

The end of the civil war in Sierra Leone saw a wide range of international actors play a significant role in peacebuilding and statebuilding. This entry provides a discussion of the civil war, the torturous peace process, and some of the postwar peacebuilding initiatives by international actors in Sierra Leone. International actors have largely focused on the state and its institutions, and nearly two decades after the end of the civil war in Sierra Leone, peace in the sense of the absence of structural violence and social injustice remains elusive in the country. The entry argues that a broader understanding of post-conflict peacebuilding allows for approaches that may result in promoting sustainable peace in Sierra Leone.

A Brutal Civil War

Although both government forces and the RUF committed atrocities during the war, the RUF committed the majority of atrocities directed against civilians (Human Rights Watch 1999a). The war resulted in the death of more than 50,000 people and the displacement of over 500,000 people (Gberie 2005) as well as the collapse of Sierra Leone's state and its institutions. Furthermore, thousands of civilians were raped and maimed, children including some as young as 8 years were recruited through abduction, diamonds were looted, and the revenue from diamonds helped prolong the war, the rule of law became nonexistent, social capital declined, and schools, government buildings, and administrative infrastructure were destroyed. As Sengupta (2009) wrote in the Independent, "[t]he civil war in Sierra Leone became a byword for savagery. Marauding militias, often using child soldiers, killed and raped across the land." The RUF's targeting of civilians contradicted its claims that it wanted to liberate Sierra Leoneans from state autocracy and introduce multiparty democracy in the country, that it sought to secure inclusion, free education, free healthcare, social justice and equity and to protect Sierra Leone's resources from foreign capitalists. Due to the RUF's brutality against civilians, it failed to win the sympathy and support of the majority of Sierra Leoneans.

Causes of the Crisis

Various scholars have sought to explain the cause of the 11-yearlong civil war in Sierra Leone. Interpreting the origins of the war has proved to be very controversial. A variety of scholars have put forward various theories – from Kaplan's (1994) "new barbarism thesis" to Richards' (1996) "crisis of patrimonialism," to Abdullah's (1998) "lumpen youth culture" and Collier and Hoeffler's (2004) "greed vs grievance" theory – to explain Sierra Leone's descent into one of the most brutal civil wars in the world. Kaplan's 1994 essay published in the Atlantic Monthly portrayed West African civil wars including Sierra Leone as primitive and anarchic resulting from "loose family structures," "cultural dysfunction," "communalism and animism," "unchecked spread of disease," and overpopulation. Collier (1999) who have examined the relationship between natural resources and conflict have argued that rebels are motivated by greed, not grievances, that is, they engage in civil wars in order to extract valuable primary commodities such as diamonds and drugs. In the case of Sierra Leone, reference has been made to the role of "blood diamonds" in fuelling conflict. This view is supported by Sengupta (2009) who notes that "[t]he country's natural riches turned to a curse, with predators, both domestic and foreign, engaged in a fierce struggle to control mines producing the highly lucrative 'blood diamonds'." The RUF became associated with "blood diamonds." As such, the international community's perceptions of the Sierra Leonean were influenced by Collier's (1999) work, interpreting the conflict as primarily an outcome of greed, and Kaplan (1994) and Kaldor's (1999) publications, interpreting the conflict as a good example of "new wars," that is, wars that are primarily emanating from primordial ethnic differences and ancient hatreds and opportunist warlords manipulating ethnic sentiments to further their own self-interest.

The war in Sierra Leone neither had religious nor ethnic dimensions. While it is true that the RUF were involved in the illicit trade in diamonds to finance its war effort, it is too simplistic to argue that greed alone is the chief driver of the Sierra Leone Civil War, since inter-group or "horizontal" socioeconomic inequalities are also significant in the war. As the Sierra Leone Truth and Reconciliation Commission argued, such a view fails to "capture numerous complexities, the reasons for the decay of the state in Sierra Leone and the role minerals played prior to and during the conflict. It also does not reflect what unfolded on the ground in Sierra Leone. There were multiple causes of the conflict and reasons for the involvement of Liberian and other foreign actors" (Truth and Reconciliation Commission 2004a, p. 4). As Francis (2006, p. 160) has pointed out, the conflict is a product of a number of external and domestic causes, including "the patrimonial and clientelistic systems of governance in the post-colonial period, whereby successive civilian and military governments effectively impoverished and excluded the majority of the population from the economic and political processes in the country." Sierra Leone's Truth and Reconciliation Commission largely attributed the civil war to "failures in governance and government institutions" (Truth and Reconciliation Commission 2004b, p. 39). However, Sierra Leone's weak state prior to the civil war also needs to be looked at in the context of globalization. For instance, external pressure on the government of Sierra Leone (GoSL) to adopt the structural adjustment program had a negative effect on its revenue base. On the eve of the civil war, Sierra Leone was on the verge of collapse, economically and politically, and heavily dependent on loans and foreign aid (Lord 2000).

The Quest for Peace in Sierra Leone

In 1992 a group of disgruntled young officers, led by Captain Valentine Esegrobo Melvin Strasser, staged a coup and overthrew President Joseph Momoh's government forcing Momoh to flee to neighboring Guinea. The soldiers then formed a military junta, the National Provisional Ruling Council (NPRC). In the early 1990s, the NPRC made half-hearted attempts to engage in dialogue with the RUF as NPRC hardliners preferred a military solution over a political one as they were convinced their troops were capable of defeating the rebels militarily. However, this did not yield any positive results. Protests from citizen groups, donor pressure, and an intractable war forced the NPRC government to announce a democratic transition plan in November 1993 (Kandeh 1998). This democratic transition plan called for the establishment of the "Interim National Electoral Commission (INEC), the promulgation of a new constitution, presidential and parliamentary elections in late 1995, and the swearing-in of a new president and parliament by January 1996" (Kandeh 1998, p. 95).

However, the RUF leader, Sankoh, who mistrusted the NPRC, opposed the holding of elections arguing that "the elections could not be held while the country was under the occupation of foreign troops and mercenaries," the NPRC government was illegitimate in the eyes of Sierra Leones as it came into power unconstitutionally, and the NPRC lacked sincerity in their peace negotiations (Mutwol 2009, p. 229). Despite this, a coalition of citizen groups put pressure on the military government to hold national elections, even though the elections would be conducted against the backdrop of a civil war. The war against the RUF was still continuing. For instance, at the beginning of 1995, the security situation in Sierra Leone had deteriorated to the extent that rebels had gained effective control over much of the countryside and major provincial towns, and the NPRC government only managed to regain control later in the same year after the intervention of external forces, including South African mercenaries and Nigerian and Ghanaian forces (Riley 1996). Despite this challenge, the Sierra Leone's women movement took a leading role in campaigning for a return to civilian rule, with paramount chiefs, well-known academics, trade unionists, journalists, and local council leaders joining the movement (Hirsch 2001).

In late 1995, the first peace process between the RUF and the NPRC was initiated. The London-based conflict resolution nongovernmental organization, International Alert, is credited for initiating the peace process, and in the summer of 1996, the Organization of African Unity (OAU) took over (Hayner 2007). While there were challenges to implement the timetable for a return to civilian rule, progress was made during 1995, including allowing political parties to reform from June and organizing a National Conference on Elections in August aimed at deciding whether the elections should be held. It was a broadly based consultative conference in which representatives of political parties, traditional leaders, the army, nongovernmental organizations, and religious leaders participated which saw an agreement on the election date of late February 1996 and the mechanics of the transfer of power being reached (Riley 1996).

However, in January 1996, a month before the elections, a palace coup by President Strasser's second-in-command, Brigadier Julius Maada Bio, saw Strasser being forced into exile to neighboring Guinea resulting in fears that the elections would be delayed. Upon taking office, Maada Bio launched a campaign for "Peace before Elections," which called for the postponement of the February 1996 elections as he had initiated talks with the RUF (Bangura 2019). There were fears that the campaign of achieving peace before elections was an attempt by the NPRC to prolong its stay in power, which could also prolong the return to democracy. As such, Sierra Leone's resurgent civil society opposed the "Peace before Elections" campaign pressing for elections, thus launching an "Elections before Peace" campaign (Bangura 2019). On 9 February 1996, an estimated 5,000 demonstrators, most of them women, protested against attempts at postponing the 26 February elections (Gberie 1996). As Sierra Leone's civil society and the international community stood firm, the NPRC could not postpone the elections. As a result, the presidential and parliamentary elections took place on 26–27 February 1996 as scheduled. Since there was no outright winner after the first round of the presidential election, a second round was held on 15 March. The Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP) and its presidential candidate Ahmad Tejan Kabbah won the elections and decided to form a government of national unity with the aim to promote national unity and cohesion. The military handed over power to the civilian government. In his inauguration speech on 29 March, Kabbah, who had been elected on a mandate of ending the war and rebuilding the country's collapsed economy, promised to continue pursuing negotiations to end the war.

As Sierra Leone was preparing for the 1996 elections, Bio with the support of the international community was able to bring the RUF to the negotiating table in Abidjan, the capital of Côte d'Ivoire. Bio's successor, President Kabbah, continued with the peace negotiations leading to the signing of the Abidjan Peace Accord between the Government of President Kabbah and the RUF in November 1996. Moreover, Sierra Leone's international donors, including the International Monetary Fund, World Bank, the European Community, and the United States, exerted pressure on President Kabbah's government insisting "on a comprehensive peace plan with RUF before realising over $212 million — most of it needed to reconstruct the economy" (Mutwol 2009, p. 237). The Abidjan Peace Agreement (1996) was intended to mark the formal ending of the civil war. It called for the cessation of hostilities, judicial, police, and electoral reform, the disarmament of combatants, the establishment of a Demobilization and Resettlement Committee, the transformation of RUF into a political party, the incorporation of RUF forces into the national army, the withdrawal of the private security firm Executive Outcomes and regional forces, and the protection of human rights. Furthermore, the agreement granted amnesty to the RUF. The agreement was short-lived as the country returned to full-scale war less than 2 months after its signing.

In May 1997, factions within the army opposed to Kabbah overthrew him and established the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) government under Major Johnny Paul Koroma. Kabbah was forced into exile in neighboring Guinea where he formed a government in exile. AFRC invited the RUF forces to join them in power sharing. The AFRC/RUF government was abusive to its citizens, and furthermore, unruly soldiers who roamed the country engaged in looting and arson (Mutwol 2009; Hayner 2007). The AFRC/RUF government ruled for less than a year as in February 1998, the Nigerian-led Economic Community of West African State Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) ousted them with the support of the civil defense forces and, in March, restored to power the elected civilian government of President Kabbah. ECOMOG's use of force to remove the AFRC/RUF government from power and restoring President Kabbah to power received a lot of international support. The RUF/AFRC forces who had fled to the interior of Sierra Leone continued fighting and deliberately targeted and terrorized civilians worsening human suffering in the country.

The reinstated government of President Kabbah rejected the idea of a negotiated settlement preferring to pursue a military solution against the RUF and ex-AFRC. In January 1999, the RUF/AFRC forces invaded Freetown under an operation code-named "Operation No Living Thing" committing widespread atrocities and looting. The invasion saw Freetown experiencing what O'Flaherty (2004, p. 32) has called "an unprecedented savaging." As the Human Rights Watch reported:

The rebel occupation of Freetown was characterized by the systematic and widespread perpetration of all classes of gross human rights abuses against the civilian population. Civilians were gunned down within their houses, rounded up and massacred on the streets, thrown from the upper floors of buildings, used as human shields, and burned alive in cars and houses. They had their limbs hacked off with machetes, eyes gouged out with knives, hands smashed with hammers, and bodies burned with boiling water. Women and girls were systematically sexually abused, and children and young people abducted by the hundreds. (1999b)

Government and ECOMOG forces also committed atrocities, including the summary execution of those suspected of sympathizing with rebels and aerial attacks on civilian targets (O'Flaherty 1999 cited in O'Flaherty 2004). The rebels had inflicted great damage in Freetown when ECOMOG forces managed to repel them from the capital and restored order in by mid-February. This rebel offensive on Freetown showed the strength of the rebels and exposed the weakness of the government forces. The perception was that the rebels were strong and resilient, and it was not possible for ECOMOG to have the capacity to completely eradicate them countrywide (O'Flaherty 2004). Furthermore, despite being ejected from Freetown, the RUF/AFRC forces continued to dominate many parts of Sierra Leone. Realizing the vulnerability of the government and the strength of the rebels, as well as under considerable international pressure to resolve the conflict peacefully, President Kabbah's government eventually agreed to peace negotiations. This saw the GoSL and the RUF signing a comprehensive peace agreement, the Lomé Peace Agreement on 7 July 1999 in Lomé, Togo. The signing of the agreement officially ended the war between the GoSL and the RUF.

There was a significant national and international participation in the peace negotiations. International organizations and interested governments attended for part or all of the proceedings included the OAU, Ghana, Libya, Liberia, the Commonwealth, the United Kingdom, Mali, Nigeria, the United States, and the UN (Barnes and Polzer 2000; Hayner 2007). The Lomé Peace Accord was a compromise document between the GoSL and the RUF, but it failed to be inclusive as other local actors were excluded. Sectors that were excluded from decision-making role in the peace process included women, civil society organizations and community representatives, other armed groups, "prominent individuals not aligned with President Kabbah, and especially people from regions other than Freetown and the Western area" (Barnes and Polzer 2000, p. 4). Moreover, the interests of the AFRC/SLA were not considered at the Lomé peace talks, and as such, the international community did not sufficiently recognize the pivotal role of these rogue soldiers throughout most of the conflict, despite the “sobel problem,” soldiers by night, rebels by day, and their January 1999 attack on Freetown (Keen 2005).

The Lomé Peace Agreement's provisions, include the UN involvement, the immediate cessation of hostilities and the creation of a Ceasefire Monitoring Commission, the creation of a government of national unity, blanket amnesty for human rights crimes to all warring parties, demobilization, disarmament, reintegration, constitutional reform, the establishment of truth and reconciliation, and human rights commissions, the transformation of RUF into a political party, human rights, and security sector reform (Lomé Peace Agreement 1999). The agreement also provided for the creation of a council of elders and religious leaders to deal with any disputes resulting from differences in the interpretation of the Lomé Peace Agreement and the Commission for the Management of Strategic Resources, National Reconstruction and Development (CMRRD), which would be chaired by the RUF leader, Sankoh, and a Commission for the Consolidation of Peace with a mandate to implement post-conflict program to ensure reconciliation and welfare of all parties to the conflict. The agreement provided for the establishment of a new independent electoral body, the National Electoral Commission, with a mandate of ensuring “a level playing field in the national elections” (Lomé Peace Agreement 1999, Article XII).

However, the amnesty provisions of the agreement proved to be very controversial. Human rights groups within and outside Sierra Leone, including the Sierra Leone Human Rights Committee, the Amnesty International, and the Human Rights Watch, strongly opposed the Lomé Accord's amnesty provisions with the Human Rights Watch calling on the UN to clarify its position on the provisions (Human Rights Watch 1999c). In a letter to the UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, Peter Takiramubude, Executive Director of the Africa Division for the Human Rights Watch, called on Annan to reject the amnesty provisions:

Human Rights Watch believes that the international community, above all the United Nations must emphasize the need for the current negotiations to establish mechanisms to ensure that those who have committed grave abuses will be subject to certain minimum processes of accountability, and that at least those who have committed the worst atrocities, especially those in command positions, are subjected to trial and punishment under national and international laws. We call on you, as secretary-general, to disassociate the U.N. from any peace deal that compromises respect for fundamental standards of human rights and humanitarian law. We also urge you to use your moral authority to speak in favor of accountability. (1999d)

For the Human Rights Watch, the international community needed to show commitment to bring to justice individuals most responsible for war crimes in Africa just as they were doing in the former Yugoslavia. As a result of this pressure, the UN representative at the peace talks, Francis Okello, added a disclaimer to the text of Article IX when he signed the agreement on behalf of the UN as he said he “could not countenance amnesty for those guilty of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity because these are forbidden by international law” (Lewis 1999).

The peace agreement resulted in a new mandate for ECOMOG, the creation of the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL), and the arrival of a UN peacekeeping force. UNAMSIL had a mandate to assist the GoSL and the parties to implement the Lomé Peace agreement. The Mission, over the course of its mandate, played a significant role in Sierra Leone, including helping to rebuild Sierra Leone's police, disarming tens of thousands of former fighters, monitoring and training Sierra Leoneans in human rights, helping in the holding of national elections, and the rehabilitation of the country's infrastructure. The Lomé Peace Agreement also provided an opportunity for both the RUF and the GoSL to gain legitimacy as well as access to economic and political power for the RUF (Tom 2017). Immediately after the signing of the peace accord, the GoSL took steps to implement it. The Parliament of Sierra Leone unanimously ratified the accord on 15 July 1999 with the passage of the Lomé Peace Agreement (Ratification) Act, 1999, thus incorporating its provisions into domestic law.

Despite these efforts by the GoSL, the process could not be sustained largely due to actions by the RUF and AFRC who were unwilling to comply with the treaty provisions, including the RUF's reluctance to disarm, ceasefire violations, and a failure to release civilian abductees. Continued human rights abuses against the civilian population and infighting within rebel ranks also threatened the peace process. In August, a faction of the AFRC kidnapped 42 UN military observers, journalists, religious leaders, ECOMOG soldiers, and aid workers, who had gone to the Okra Hill to try to persuade the rebels to release children who had been abducted earlier in the year (Human Rights Watch 2003). The AFRC resented their exclusion from the Lomé talks. The peace agreement collapsed when in early May 2000 RUF forces held hostage 500 UN peacekeepers resulting in a full-scale fighting between the SLA and the rebels. On 8 May a massive public demonstration outside Foday Sankoh's residence in Freetown denouncing the RUF turned violent when his bodyguards opened fire on the demonstrators killing 19 of them leading to the arrest of Sankoh (Onishi 2000).

The May 2000 crisis brought the conflict to increased international attention with the UK military intervention playing a significant role in ending it. A combination of factors contributed to the eventual stabilization of the situation, an end to the civil war and international actors' involvement in the country's post-conflict reconstruction. These factors include British military intervention; diplomacy; the May 2001 Guinean bombardment of Kambia, a town on the border of Sierra Leone and Guinea that was under RUF control; and the UN Security Council's expansion of the size of UNAMSIL and its mandate, which allowed UN troops to use force against the rebels; civil disobedience; and the imposition of economic and travel sanctions on Charles Taylor's government in Liberia (see Ero 2009; Olonisakin 2008; ICG 2001; Paris 2004). On 18 January 2002, President Kabbah declared the Sierra Leone Civil War officially over. On 2 May, the country successfully held parliamentary and presidential elections with the assistance of the UN. The elections were considered critical to consolidate peace and democracy. The SLPP and President Kabbah were reelected with an overwhelming majority to serve another 5-year term. Since the end of the civil war, Sierra Leone has successfully held four democratic elections in 2002, 2007, 2012, and 2018 with the All People's Congress winning the 2007 and 2012 elections and the SLPP winning the 2002 and 2018 elections. The 2007 and 2018 elections witnessed smooth transfers of power between incoming and outgoing heads of state. Moreover, Sierra Leone has not relapsed into conflict. However, despite this and heavy international involvement in the country, Sierra Leone continues to face most of the challenges that contributed to the civil war.

International Peacebuilding in Sierra Leone

Given the devastating nature of the Sierra Leonean conflict, it is not surprising that at the end of the war, the country had no financial resources to support the massive postwar reconstruction program which would enable its peace process to hold. As such, it required international assistance to help secure the peace. This witnessed a wide range of international actors, including leading states such as the UK government; inter-governmental organizations like the UN, the European Union (EU), and the World Bank; and bilateral institutions such as the UK Department for International Development (DFID) and the United States Agency for International Development (USAID) intervening. Such leading states and organizations largely emphasized peace and state reconstruction projects that were liberal peace oriented as they sought to promote political and economic liberalization and the building of public institutions in the country – what Newman et al. (2009) have called liberal peacebuilding.

Statebuilding and Peacebuilding Emphasizing the State and Its Institutions

Much international efforts and resources were applied to statebuilding and peacebuilding initiatives. These initiatives in the early period of post-conflict reconstruction largely focused on issues including development and humanitarian assistance, governance, rule of law, justice and security sector reform, establishing a vibrant and responsive “liberal” civil society, disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants, market-based economic reform measures, and building strong and effective state institutions. A wide range and comprehensive governance reform measures were undertaken, including the Local Government Act, 2004 [and the Local Government (Amendment Act), 2017]; the Anti-Money Laundering Act, 2004; the Anti-Corruption Act, 2004 (and a new Anti-Corruption Act of 2008), the Human Rights Commission of Sierra Leone Act, 2004; the Government Budgeting and Accountability Act, 2005; and the Independent Media Commission Act, 2006.

In an attempt to improve governance and accountability, the DFID provided support aimed at strengthening the public financial management systems and civil service reform. Other international actors, including the UN, the United Kingdom, the World Bank, and the EU, provided significant support to the creation and operation of core state institutions for good governance and democracy, including the Independent Media Commission, the National Commission for Democracy (NCD), the Human Rights Commission for Sierra Leone (HRCSL), Political Parties Registration Commission (PPRC), and the National Electoral Commission (NEC). On the economic realm, under the close supervision of international actors such as the World Bank, the GoSL embarked on structural reforms, including reforming the public sector and modernizing the financial sector. Other programs that were introduced include the Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper (PRSP) and the two DFID-funded programs: Justice Sector Development Program (2005–2011) and the Access to Security and Justice Program (2011–2016).

Prioritizing the Special Court over the TRC

In order to redress gross human rights violations during the civil war, a Special Court for Sierra Leone and a Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) were simultaneously established. The two institutions operated contemporaneously presenting challenges as the TRC placed emphasis on restorative justice while the special court emphasized retributive justice. The Special Court of Sierra Leone was formally established in January 2002 through an agreement between the UN and the GoSL. It was a hybrid court with a mandate to prosecute individuals who bear the greatest responsibility for committing serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law in Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Court targeted leaders from the CDF, the RUF, and AFRC while dismissing crimes against humanity that ECOMOG forces and the SLA committed. As such, for some Sierra Leoneans, “Victims of RUF and AFRC had the dignity of a court hearing and a reparations programme, but these victims were never part of that. They have been complete bystanders in every sense of the word” (Lawal 2019).

The Court indicated a total of 13 people, including Charles Taylor, Foday Sankoh, and Samuel Hinga Norman, the CDF leader. Foday Sankoh died before the Court could bring him to trial, while Samuel Hinga Norman died before judgment in his trial. In 2012, the Court found Taylor guilty of five counts of war crimes (outrage upon personal dignity, acts of terrorism, pillage, cruel treatment, and murder); five counts of crimes against humanity (sexual slavery, murder, rape, enslavement, and other inhumane acts); and one count of other serious violation of international humanitarian law (enlisting children under the age of 15 as soldiers) during the Sierra Leone Civil War (The Hague Justice Portal n.d.). It completed its mandate in December 2013 after the Court’s Appeals Chamber upheld the its decision to sentence the former Liberian leader, Charles Taylor, for 50 years in prison who had appealed against the sentence handed over to him in April 2012.

While the Special Court was an outcome of an agreement between the GoSL and the UN, the establishment of the TRC was a product of the Lomé Accord. The TRC was required to start operating within 90 days of the signing of the accord. The agreement stated the mandate of the commission as “[...]to address impunity, break the cycle of violence, provide a forum for both the victims and perpetrators of human rights violations to tell their story, get a clear picture of the past in order to facilitate genuine healing and reconciliation” focusing on violations committed from the beginning of the civil war in 1991 (Lomé Peace Agreement 1999, Art. XXVI [1] & [2]). However, the GoSL failed to meet the target of establishing the TRC within 90 days of the signing of the Accord. On 22 February 2000, the Sierra Leone Parliament adopted legislation for the establishment of the TRC – The Truth and Reconciliation Commission Act 2000. The Act states the functions of the TRC as:

[...] to create an impartial historical record of violations and abuses of human rights and international humanitarian law related to the armed conflict in Sierra Leone, from the beginning of the Conflict in 1991 to the signing of the Lomé Peace Agreement; to address impunity, to respond to the needs of the victims, to promote healing and reconciliation and to prevent a repetition of the violations and abuses suffered. (Truth and Reconciliation Commission Act 2000, Art. 6 [1])

Although the TRC was a creation of the Parliament of Sierra Leone, it had an international dimension since two senior UN officials, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sierra Leone, participated in its establishment (Schabas 2006). In 1999, the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) agreed to play a lead role in organizing and overseeing Sierra Leone’s TRC process. The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sierra Leone were responsible for the appointing of three international commissioners, and funding for the TRC largely came from external donors, with OHCHR having the responsibility for fund raising (Schabas 2006). As such, the TRC consisted of domestic and international commissioners.

However, in terms of funding, international donors privileged the Special Court over the TRC, war victims, and local and customary approaches to peacebuilding (Tom 2017). The initial budget for the TRC was US$10 million; however, poor donor response resulted in the budget being reduced to US$7 million, and in the end, the Commission received US$4 million (Schabas 2006). By contrast, the Special Court had an initial budget of US$75 million, however, when it formally closed in 2013, it had spent over US$300 million to prosecute nine war criminals (Gberie 2014). With such a small budget and short timeframe, the TRC had no capacity and resources to meet its core objective of promoting national reconciliation and consolidating the peace, addressing impunity, attending to the needs of the victims of the war, and preventing a repetition of the violence and abuses experienced during the war. The TRC produced its final report in 2004 with findings and conclusions relating to the causes of war and policy recommendations to facilitate national reconciliation and avoid future violations. The international community’s emphasis on the Court resulted in it paying very little attention on human needs and welfare; structural violence; the indigenous and traditional social, political, and economic structures; and forms of peace and peacebuilding. Yet, the TRC’s focus on the local and its recommendations for long-term peacebuilding through justice for those affected by the war was paramount for a sustainable peace (Cubitt 2012, p. 37).

UNIPSIL and the Prioritization of State Institutions

With UNAMSIL successfully completing its mandate in December 2005, the UN changed its focus from peacekeeping to peacebuilding resulting in the creation of the UN Integrated Office in Sierra Leone to provide support to the GoSL in consolidating peace in the country. In June 2006, Sierra Leone was one of the countries to be on the agenda of the newly established UN Peacebuilding Commission (PBC) and its Peacebuilding Fund (PBF). In its Sierra Leone Peacebuilding Cooperation Framework, the PBC noted that the country’s engagement with it is “aimed at ensuring sustained attention of the international community in providing additional political, financial and technical support to the country’s peace consolidation efforts” (UN Peacebuilding Commission 2007, p. 3). Between 2007 and 2018, the PBF invested

US$57.3 million, which it used to support of a wide range of peacebuilding activities in Sierra Leone (UN Peacebuilding Fund 2018). Some of the PBF projects have supported conflict prevention, such as promoting peaceful dialogue and enhancing early warning and response systems. The PBF has also funded the Gender and Youth Promotion Initiative (GYPI), which focuses on improving the participation of women in political processes as ambassadors of peacebuilding. Furthermore, the fund has been used to finance specific expenses of the GoSL that support state institutions vital for peacebuilding such as the Office of National Security (ONS), NCD, PPRC, HRCSL, and NEC, so they function in an effective and efficient manner (Bangura 2019).

In August 2008, the UN Security Council through Resolution 1829 (2008) requested the UN Secretary-General to the UN Integrated Peacebuilding Office in Sierra Leone (UNIPSIL). The Security Council requested UNIPSIL to assist the GoSL in the following areas:

- (a) Providing political support to national and local efforts for identifying and resolving tensions and threats of potential conflict, whatever the source; (b) Monitoring and promoting human rights, democratic institutions and the rule of law, including efforts to counter transnational organized crime and drug trafficking; (c) Consolidating good governance reforms, with a special focus on anti-corruption instruments such as the Anti-Corruption Commission; (d) Supporting decentralization, reviewing the 1991 Constitution and the enactment of relevant legislation; (e) Closely coordinating with and supporting the work of the Peacebuilding Commission, as well as the implementation of the Peacebuilding Cooperation Framework and projects supported through the Peacebuilding Fund. (UN Security Council 2008)

UNIPSIL coordinated closely with UN programs, agencies, and funds through the “Joint for Sierra Leone of the United Nations Family” framework (UN Secretary-General 2014). UNIPSIL helped the GoSL strengthen key institutions such as NEC and PPRC as well as helped establish the Sierra Leone Broadcasting Corporation. Furthermore, it supported the Sierra Leone police in establishing an Independent Police Complaints Board and the Transnational Organized Crime Unit (TOCU).

Moreover, UNIPSIL placed emphasis on tolerance and dialogue, and it largely focused on providing technical and financial assistance to governmental bodies. However, UNIPSIL had to change to its approach after recognizing that “its focus on government institutions remained incomplete,” which saw it establishing the non-state actors project funded by US$5 million from the PBF “(in addition to the US$35 million allocated for working with the government) to engage civil society more broadly in pursuit of non-violent elections” (Lawrence 2014, p. 7). The fact that the non-state actors project was established in 2010, 2 years after the creation of UNIPSIL is evidence of how at the design stage of the program, non-state actors were not fully integrated (Bangura 2019). As various critics of international peacebuilding (that is liberal peace oriented) have noted, international actors have tended to mainly focus on state elites and state institutions in their peacebuilding efforts marginalizing non-state actors (see, e.g., Richmond 2011). This has contributed to the liberal peace’s failure to achieve desired outcomes of creating durable and sustainable peace in societies emerging from violent conflict. Both state and non-state actors play a unique role in the peacebuilding process.

On 31 March 2014, UNIPSIL completed its UN Security Council mandate in Sierra Leone and transferred its responsibilities to the UN Country Team, marking the end of over 15 years of UN peace support operations in the country, which had played a vital role in the country’s transition from violent conflict to peace. The end of the UNIPSIL mandate in Sierra Leone saw the UN shifting from focusing on peacebuilding to focusing development in the country. On 5 March, at a press conference in Sierra Leone, the then UN Secretary-General, Ban Ki-Moon remarked: “Sierra Leone represents one of the world’s most successful cases of post-conflict recovery, peacekeeping and peacebuilding” (UNIPSIL 2014, no page number). Yet, this official version of Sierra Leone as a “peacebuilding success story” of the UN and many international organizations is sharply contrasted with the feelings on the ground. The Sierra Leone state remains fragile nearly two decades after the end of the civil as the country's stability continue to be under threat. This is due to the fact that most of the underlying causes of the civil war have not been fully addressed, including poverty, social injustices, youth unemployment, and marginalization, which continue to generate grievances among those affected. Yet, effective peacebuilding requires addressing such causes, and as such, moving from a peacebuilding stage to a development stage without fully addressing the root causes of the conflict in Sierra Leone is futile.

Summary

Drawing on the case of Sierra Leone, this entry has offered a broad understanding of peacebuilding which does not only prioritize state-centric agendas for peace but equally prioritize issues such as social justice, the provision of welfare, equity, reconciliation, and humanistic agendas for peace. It has argued that for lasting peace to be achieved in postwar Sierra Leone, it is vital for international peacebuilders to adopt this broad understanding of peacebuilding. In the case of Sierra Leone, the entry has shown that international peacebuilders largely supported peacebuilding initiatives that emphasized the state and its institutions giving little attention to human welfare and needs and other peacebuilding initiatives and mechanisms. The end of UNIPSIL mandate saw the then UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon heralding Sierra Leone as success story of post-conflict peacekeeping, recovery, and peacebuilding. This is based on a narrow understanding of peacebuilding as a broad understanding of peacebuilding as provided in this entry would show that structural violence and social injustice persist in postwar Sierra Leone requiring more efforts to address them in order to achieve durable and sustainable peace in the country.

Cross-References

- ▶ Human Rights
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice

- ▶ Liberal Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ Statebuilding

References

- Abdullah, I. (1998). Bush path to destruction: The origin and character of the Revolutionary United Front/Sierra Leone. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 36(2), 203–235.
- Abidjan Peace Agreement, (1996, November 30). https://peaceaccords.nd.edu/sites/default/files/accords/Abidjan_Peace_Plan_1996.pdf. Accessed 05 Nov 2019.
- Bangura, I. (2019). Peacebuilding in Sierra Leone one and a half decades after the civil war. In K. Omeje (Ed.), Peacebuilding in contemporary Africa: In search of alternative strategies. London: Routledge.
- Barnes, C., & Polzer, T. (2000). The Sierra Leone peace process: Learning from the past to address current challenges. Conciliation Resources. An expert seminar report, 27 September, London.
- Berewa, S. E. (2011). A new perspective on governance, leadership, conflict and nation building in Sierra Leone. London/Indianapolis: AuthorHouse.
- Collier, P. (1999). Doing well out of war. Paper prepared for conference on economic agendas in civil wars, World Bank, London. Retrieved September 21, 2009, from <http://siteresources.worldbank.org/INTKNOWLEDGEFORCHANGE/Resources/491519-1199818447826/28137.pdf>. Accessed 23 Oct 2019.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2004). Greed and grievance in civil war. Oxford Economic Papers, 56, 563–95.
- Cubitt, C. (2012). Local and global dynamics of peacebuilding: Post-conflict reconstruction in Sierra Leone. London: Routledge.
- Ero, C. (2009). UN Peacekeeping in West Africa: Liberia, Sierra Leone and Cote d'Ivoire. In A. Adebajo (Ed.), From global apartheid to global village: Africa and the United Nations. Scottsville: University of Kwazulu-Natal Press.
- Francis, D. J. (2006). Uniting Africa: Building regional peace and security systems. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Gberie, L. (1996, February 9). Sierra Leone-politics: Opposition to bid to postpone elections. Inter Press Service News Agency. <http://www.ipsnews.net/1996/02/sierra-leone-politics-opposition-to-bid-to-postpone-elections/>. Accessed 25 Oct 2019.
- Gberie, L. (2005). A dirty war in West Africa: The RUF and the destruction of Sierra Leone. London: C Hurst & Co.
- Gberie, L. (2014, April). The special court for Sierra Leone rests – For good. Africa Renewal. <https://www.un.org/africarenewal/magazine/april-2014/special-court-sierra-leone-rests—good>. Accessed 20 Oct 2019.

- Hayner, P. (2007). Negotiating peace in Sierra Leone: Confronting the justice challenge. The Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue Report. https://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-CHD-SierraLeone-Negotiating-Peace-2007-English_0.pdf. Accessed 28 Oct 2019.
- Hirsch, J. L. (2001). Sierra Leone: Diamonds and the struggle for democracy. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Human Rights Watch. (1999a). Shocking war crimes in Sierra Leone: New testimonies on mutilation, rape of civilians, June 24. <https://www.hrw.org/news/1999/06/24/shocking-war-crimes-sierra-leone>. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- Human Rights Watch. (1999b). Sierra Leone getting away with murder, mutilation, and rape: New testimony from Sierra Leone (Human Rights Watch Report, Vol. 11, No. 3A). <https://www.hrw.org/reports/1999/sierra/>. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- Human Rights Watch. (1999c). U.N. Must clarify position on Sierra Leonean amnesty, July 12. <https://www.hrw.org/news/1999/07/12/un-must-clarify-position-sierra-leonean-amnesty>. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- Human Rights Watch. (1999d). Letter to U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on the Sierra Leone conflict, July 6. <https://www.hrw.org/news/1999/07/06/letter-un-secretary-general-kofi-annan-sierra-leone-conflict>. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- Human Rights Watch. (2003). “We’ll kill you if you cry” – Sexual violence in the Sierra Leone conflict. New York: Human Rights Watch. <http://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/sierleone0103.pdf>. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- ICG. (2001). Sierra Leone: Managing uncertainty. <https://reliefweb.int/report/sierra-leone/sierra-leone-managing-uncertainty>. Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- Kaldor, M. (1999). New wars and old wars: Organized violence in a global era. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Kandeh, J. D. (1998). Transition without rupture: Sierra Leone’s transfer election of 1996. African Studies Review, 41(2), 91–111.
- Kaplan, R. D. (1994, February). The coming anarchy. The Atlantic Monthly. <http://www.theatlantic.com/magazine/archive/1994/02/the-coming-anarchy/4670/>. Accessed 12 Oct 2018.
- Keen, D. (2005). Conflict & collusion in Sierra Leone. Oxford: James Currey.
- Lawal, S. (2019, December 18). Nigeria: Freeing Freetown – A tale of atrocities committed by Nigeria’s ECOMOG soldiers in Sierra Leone (Part 2). Premium Times. <https://allafrica.com/stories/201912180334.html>. Accessed 18 Dec 2019.
- Lawrence, M. (2014). United Nations peacebuilding in Sierra Leone – Toward vertical integration (CIGI papers, no. 5). https://www.files.ethz.ch/isn/185870/no.49_0.pdf. Accessed 02 Nov 2019.
- Lewis, P. (1999, July 26). Amnesty in Sierra Leone opposed by rights group. New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/1999/07/26/world/amnesty-in-sierra-leone-opposed-by-rights-group.html>. Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- Lomé Peace Agreement, July 7, 1999. <http://www.sierra-leone.org/lomeaccord.html>. Accessed 05 Nov 2019.
- Lomé Peace Agreement [Ratification] Act, July 18, 1999. <https://www.legal-tools.org/doc/554445/pdf/>. Accessed 05 Nov 2019.
- Lord, D. (2000). Introduction: The struggle for power and peace in Sierra Leone. In D. Lord (Ed.), Paying the price: The Sierra Leone peace process. London: Conciliation Resources.
- M’cleod, H., & Ganson, B. (2018). The underlying causes of fragility and instability in Sierra Leone. LSE-Oxford Commission on State Fragility, Growth and Development, April. <https://www.theigc.org/wp-content/uploads/2018/04/Sierra-Leone-Report-v2.pdf>. Accessed 23 Dec 2019.
- Mutwol, J. (2009). Peace agreements and civil wars in Africa: Insurgent motivations, state responses and third-party peacemaking in Liberia, Rwanda, and Sierra Leone. Amherst: Cambria Press.
- Newman, E., Paris, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2009). Introduction. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- O’Flaherty, M. (2004). Sierra Leone’s peace process: The role of the human rights community. Human Rights Quarterly, 26(1), 29–62.
- Olonisakin, F. (2008). Peacekeeping in Sierra Leone: The story of UNAMSIL. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Onishi, N. (2000, May 18). Neighbors grab fugitive rebel in Sierra Leone. New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2000/05/18/world/neighbors-grab-fugitive-rebel-in-sierra-leone.html>. Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war’s end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richards, P. (1996). Fighting for the rain forest: War, youth and resources in Sierra Leone. Oxford: James Currey.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Riley, S. P. (1996). The 1996 parliamentary and presidential elections in Sierra Leone. Electoral Studies, 15(4), 537–545.
- Schabas, W. A. (2006). The Sierra Leone Truth and Reconciliation Commission. In N. Roht-Arriaza & J. Javier Mariezcurrena (Eds.), Transitional justice in the twenty-first century: Beyond truth versus justice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sengupta, K. (2009, December, 15). UK Army head still fighting for the victims in Sierra Leone. The Independent. <https://www.independent.co.uk/news/world/africa/uk-army-head-still-fighting-for-the-victims-in-sierra-leone-1841589.html>. Accessed 20 Oct 2019.
- The Hague Justice Portal. (n.d.). Taylor, Charles. <http://www.haguejusticeportal.net/index.php?id=6414>. Accessed 04 Nov 2019.

- Tom, P. (2017). Liberal peace and post-conflict peacebuilding in Africa. London: Palgrave.
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission Act. (2000). <http://www.sierra-leone.org/Laws/2000-4.pdf>. Accessed 05 Nov 2019.
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission. (2004a). Report of the Sierra Leone Truth and Reconciliation Commission, volume 3B. <http://www.sierra-leone.org/Other-Conflict/TRCVolume3A.pdf>. Accessed 20 Oct 2019.
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission. (2004b). Report of the Sierra Leone Truth and Reconciliation Commission, volume 3A. <http://www.sierraleonetr.com/index.php/view-the-final-report/download-table-of-contents/volume-three-b>. Accessed 20 Oct 2019.
- UN Peacebuilding Commission. (2007). Sierra Leone peacebuilding cooperation framework, 3 December, PBC/2/SLE/1. <https://www.refworld.org/docid/47fdff2f0.html>. Accessed 26 Nov 2019.
- UN Peacebuilding Fund. (2018). Peacebuilding fund in Sierra Leone, June 27. https://www.un.org/peacebuilding/sites/www.un.org/peacebuilding/files/documents/sierra_leone_two-pager.pdf. Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- UN Secretary-General. (2014). Final report of the secretary-general on the United Nations Integrated Peacebuilding Office in Sierra Leone. S/2014/192, 17 March. <https://digitallibrary.un.org/record/767125/>. Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- UN Security Council. (2008). Resolution 1829 (2008). https://undocs.org/S/RES/1829\(2008\)). Accessed 03 Nov 2019.
- UNIPSIL. (2014). Sierra Leone saw many UN “Firsts,” says Ban Ki-Moon as UNIPSIL completes its mandate, March 27. <https://unipsil.unmissions.org/sierra-leone-saw-many-un-%E2%80%9Cfirsts%E2%80%9D-says-ban-ki-moon-unipsil-completes-its-mandate>. Accessed 10 Nov 2019.

Silence and Peacebuilding

Marita Eastmond¹ and

Johanna Mannergren Selimovic²

¹School of Global studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

²Södertörn University, Stockholm, Sweden

Synonyms

Acknowledgement; Co-existence; Denial; Memory; Reconciliation; Transitional Justice

Definition/Description

Silences are common in societies emerging from war and can serve a range of different purposes. Oppressive regimes may impose silence to hide crimes, and victims may keep silent for fear of speaking out. Peacebuilding mechanisms are therefore often focused on breaking silences and facilitating acknowledgment. Yet, at the same time, the practice of silence can open ways for people and societies to approach and handle a difficult past and make coexistence possible. Silence can thus be a sign of respect or a strategy of protection; it can also be a means to making claims in contentious settings. A nuanced understanding of the different roles that silence may play in societies affected by conflict is called for, in order to support the building of a durable and inclusive peace.

Introduction

The relationship between speech and silence is a central theme in research on how to build peaceful societies in transitions from war. When dealing with an atrocious past, societies and individuals necessarily make a selection of what is to be remembered and what is to be forgotten. When new collective memories are forged, certain events and actors are commemorated and others are not. Who has power over the past? Who can decide what and whom should be remembered and spoken about, and what should be forgotten and shrouded in silence?

In post-conflict settings, silence is often connected to denial and impunity and understood as something negative and oppressive (Cohen 2011; Connerton 2011). After war there is usually a need to construct clear victim and perpetrator positions and there is little room for ambiguities. The crimes of one’s own side may be silenced, and so is often the suffering of the enemy. In peacebuilding practices, a connection is therefore often made between reconciliation and the breaking of silences. It is argued that in order to come to terms with the past and be able to “move on”, the truth must be told, and victims must have acknowledgment of their suffering (cf Hinton 2018). Truth and Reconciliation Commissions are examples of institutions that have been set up with the aim of breaking silences and thus to create more inclusive postwar societies. It is argued that it is through speech and being heard that individual victims can heal (Guthrey 2015). Community peacebuilding projects often have a component of rebuilding trust through dialogue groups. The idea is that through sharing experiences across dividing lines, individuals and communities will be able to heal their wounds.

However, in these local settings, silence holds a broader range of meanings and can open up for other possibilities. It follows that silence does not always have to be an obstruction or serve a destructive purpose but can help to make peace possible, for instance through helping to reforge a sense of community. Research that seeks to understand everyday informal practices of coexistence has shown that certain acts of silence and their interpretations may be an important part of building and maintaining peace among people that live together after atrocity (e.g., Eastmond and Mannergren Selimovic 2012). Thus, depending on the (postwar) social context, silence may be a sign of respect, of enabling cooperation and, in precarious situations, to contest top-down threats or demands, and a necessary strategy to keep safe. Importantly, then, silence as a form of communication is not mute, even in situations where oppression and fear reign and people are frightened or uncomfortable in raising their voices. Strong claims can be made without verbal speech. Relying on ambiguity, such communication can be employed to convey difficult experiences and sensitive messages more effectively than does speech, and also assist in rebuilding trust and restoring relations. A number of “traditional” peacebuilding mechanisms that engage with practices of silence rather than speech therefore question the generalized assumption that “speaking out” is always a constructive way forward.

Silence is thus more than the absence of speech. As a form of tacit communication, it can be employed and interpreted so as to serve different purposes for different actors. In the following, a number of empirical examples will illustrate the workings of silence in relation to peacebuilding. They also show that there is no clear-cut opposition nor straightforward dividing line between silence and speech; that different types of silence can be enfolded into each other, and that, over time, silence can change into speech and back again. Key questions for peace research thus revolve around what silence in particular contexts of power and influence seeks to communicate, and to what effect. In the following, silences that “disable” or “enable” peace will serve as short-form analytical categories.

Silences That Disable Peace

Oppressive regimes tend to hide their crimes in order to stay in power. In Argentina, many secrets were kept hidden by the military junta that ruled 1976–1983, including the fate of the thousands of oppositionals who were tortured and killed. Chillingly labeled los desaparecidos (“the disappeared”), their whereabouts remained shrouded in secrecy for decades. The quest for truth has been driven by a number of civil society groups such as the Madres de Plaza de Mayo and the Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo. These are women who have gathered weekly for many years in the central square of Buenos Aires, demanding to know what happened to their children and grandchildren who were appropriated by the military, and to break the silence around their disappearance.

Another top-down silence was imposed in Spain in the 1970s after the end of the Franco era that followed the civil war. The “pact of forgetting” was a political agreement between parties on both the right and the left in order to safeguard the fragile democracy that was emerging from autocracy. The crimes of the past should be forgotten in order not to jeopardize the transition toward national reconciliation, it was argued. However, over the last decade, demands for truth to be known have increased, especially in relation to the recent opening of mass graves. Many relatives of the victims feel that the time has come to break the silences that are now understood as oppressive and a crime against the victims and their families (Kovras 2013; Renshaw 2011).

Moving to one of the worst atrocities of our time, the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, one can note the strong narrative of reconciliation and forgiveness in the country, in which the commemoration of the genocide against the Tutsis is an ongoing activity with recurring public events. Survivors have possibilities to tell their stories and to have their pain acknowledged. Yet the collective narrative about the genocide silences other instances of violence. Burnet (2012) notes that the many thousand Hutus that were killed by the Rwandan Liberation Front (RPF) during and directly following the genocide are left out from the narrative. Many Hutu survivors of the RPF massacres remain silent, fearing imprisonment and assassination. They are afraid of breaking the genocide ideology law, imposed to prevent a new genocide from taking hold in the country; however, the law has also become a tool to maintain the narrative of Tutsis as being the only victims (Otake 2019).

In Bosnia-Herzegovina, conflicting narratives of the past also exist in a frictional relationship. The active and continued denial of crimes by their adversaries is a painful experience for many victims. Despite a large number of investigations and criminal trials that have provided detailed evidence of the genocide in Srebrenica in 1995 against Bosniaks, politicians and other elite actors on the Bosnian Serb side refuse to acknowledge this and other crimes. Individual survivors testify that this silencing is extremely painful and inflicts what has been called “the second wound of silence” which in turn is understood as a major stumbling block on the precarious path to reconciliation.

Silence can also be selective in that some crimes are noted and acknowledged, whereas others are hidden and/or ignored. Sexual violence is such a crime. Gendered relations of power mean that women who have been raped often are subjected to shame and social stigma (Mannergren Selimovic 2018; Parpart and Parashar 2018) as a result, many women themselves often rely on silence, also in their close relations and over many years, and forego seeking assistance with continuing injuries incurred. While rape has been part of warfare probably for as long as war has existed, it is not until the last couple of decades that silences have been broken more generally around this topic. Crucially, women in Rwanda and in Bosnia-Herzegovina testified about sexual violence in the 1990s, and as a result international law has been changed. The fact that there is now international legislation in place obviously does not mean that conflict-related sexual violence stops, or that it is easily talked about or acknowledged by perpetrators. However, it is now a crime that is noted and addressed in formal processes. The difficulties of breaking silences are exemplified by the fate of Yazidi women who in 2014 were abducted and raped by IS (Islamic State) in northern Iraq on a massive scale. Many of them have testified that not only do they have to deal with the scars from the violence they suffered, but they are also ostracized in their own community and considered to bring shame on their families. A number of suicides have been reported (Amnesty International 2018).

Silences That Enable Peace

While silence can be detrimental, used to uphold divisions and a tool for oppressive regimes, research that takes an interest in more bottom-up approaches to peace have highlighted and explored the enabling effects of silence. Reconciliation discourses and transitional justice mechanisms that favor the breaking of silences are here at odds with local strategies that rather see silence as the appropriate response, and in fact make use of silence as a tactic to make peace durable. Silence appears to be particularly productive in contexts where conflicts remain unsolved and where there is still a need to build trust and cooperate socially and economically. This is especially important in societies that have seen interethnic or interreligious violence and where conflict lines may divide communities and even families. The idea that differences will be overcome by talking and sharing is often regarded in these communities as misguided and detrimental to social relations. Research in these contexts points to the enabling role played by silence, as it is locally perceived to communicate respect and as such facilitate co-existence and the rebuilding of “normality” in everyday life.

In Sierra Leone, local populations have been skeptical to the linkages between truth and reconciliation as advertised by the Truth and Reconciliation Commission set up to address the consequences of the civil war. Studies have shown that the locally more accepted way to deal with pain and healing was respectful silence, considered to be a constructive way forward, whereas talking about the atrocities openly was seen as damaging (Shaw 2007; Millar 2012). In these communities, interdependence is a vital feature of individuals’ social, economic, political, and religious life. Similar findings from communities in northern Uganda support these claims. Here silence was read as a sign of strength and value enabling victims to reestablish self-worth and to preserve relationships (Akello in Otake 2019).

Linked to this use of silence to uphold relationships is the way memories of violence are selectively reworked and transmitted from one generation to the next. Intergenerational research among Bosnian families suggests that elders tend to feel a responsibility to protect the younger members from stories that might reignite hatred (Eastmond 2016; Palmberger 2016). These findings point to a pragmatic rationality found in local communities, rural as well as urban, to rebuilding lives and social relations after violent conflict.

Societies may also rely on the power of symbolic rituals in order to address the past. Such ritual practices are not centered on speech, but acknowledge that silence holds the potential of social repair. In Timor-Leste rituals and ceremonies have been performed in relation to reinhabiting homesteads that had to be abandoned during the violence, as well as in the recovery and burial of the remains of dead relatives. Kent (2016) observes that these rituals reaffirm and recognize the interdependence between members of a community; as such, they are not dependent on the collection of testimonies in the UN-sponsored truth commission CAVR (Commission for Reception, Truth and Reconciliation) set up in 2002 following the end of Indonesian occupation.

Even in situations of high precarity, when it might be dangerous or socially destructive to “speak up,” there are ways of being silent that can also make a statement and demonstrate a position. In ethnically cleansed areas in Bosnia-Herzegovina, returnees have testified to experiencing the power of their physical but silent presence. Through mundane actions, such as walking in the streets and having coffee in cafés, they make moral claims to the place and their history, thus destabilizing ongoing attempts to collectively erase their historical presence. In the absence of the political space to openly challenge the dominant silence at the state level about ethnic cleansing, these locals use silence to contest the dominant and disabling silence (Stefansson 2010). Such performative silences can be understood as a claim-making strategy replacing confrontational forms of opposition to the postwar political order. They play out at public events as well as in private, informal settings. As such, they refute claims that “nothing has happened.”

Sometimes such silences are ritualized. As a reminder that silence is multifaceted and that enabling silences can exist within and seek to delegitimize disabling silences, it is pertinent to return to Argentina and the work to bring down the top-down culture of silence around the crimes of the junta. The weekly vigils of the Mothers of Plaza de Mayo were held in silence, a chosen strategy that ameliorated the impact of their protest as the loss of their “disappeared” children became all the more poignant through the lack of verbal speech strategies.

Implications for Peacebuilding

These examples from different societies and conflicts show that the relationship between silence and peace is not a straightforward one. There is a need for peacebuilding interventions to understand these variations in order to be able to identify the postwar practices that best support peace.

Peacebuilding takes place in societies where narratives at the macro-political level may silence and marginalize victims, in order to strengthen and consolidate hegemonic positions. Such dominant and disabling silences need to be broken in order for an inclusive peace to take place that allows for multifaceted stories of the past. At the same time, attention to the practices of silence in everyday life makes us cognizant of the enabling role that silence can play. Silences emerge as an important component of informal interactions between former adversaries, often seen as necessary to make room for the slow rebuilding of trust and a future acceptance of multiple experiences and stories of the past. Importantly, such everyday interactions often take place not as a moral engagement with reconciliation or peace as such, but as part of rebuilding a sense of “normal life” and imagining a possible future. This leads to a questioning of some of the practices of transitional justice and peacebuilding measures; importantly, it undermines unidimensional claims that silence is negative and that “speaking out” is always the best way to address a difficult past to make a shared future possible.

Summary

The practice of silence needs to be taken into consideration as part of transitional processes from war to peace. There is a strong relationship between power and silence. Silence is a form of communication in all human interaction; it can convey a broad range of social meanings and comes with social and political implications for individuals and societies who have experienced war and repression. Practices of silences at the micro level are entangled in larger processes at the level of hegemonic discourses. Depending on the transitional circumstances, silence may be disabling or enabling, or both. The relationship between speaking out and refraining from speech, between acknowledgment and denial, and between disabling and enabling silences, is a dynamic one and unfolds over time. Peacebuilding efforts need to be sensitized to the multiple meanings of silence, instead of only working to disrupt silences as a hoped for straightforward path toward peace and, eventually, reconciliation.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Everyday Peace

References

- Amnesty International. (3, August 2018). Four years on: Yazidi women’s struggles continue. <https://www.refworld.org/docid/5bcf1cc84.html>. Accessed 28 Aug 2019.
- Burnet, J. E. (2012). Genocide lives in us: Women, memory, and silence in Rwanda. Wisconsin: The University of Wisconsin Press.
- Cohen, S. (2011). States of denial knowing about atrocities and suffering. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Connerton, P. (2011). The Spirit of mourning. History, memory and the body. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Eastmond, M. (2016). Shifting sites: Memories of war and exile across time and place. In M. Palmberger (ed.) How generations remember: Contested histories and shared memories in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Eastmond, M., & Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2012). Silence as possibility in post-war everyday life. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 6(3), 502–524.
- Guthrey, H. L. (2015). Victim healing and truth commissions. Transforming pain through voice in Solomon Islands and Timor-Leste. New York: Springer.
- Hinton, A. L. (2018). The justice façade. Trials of transition in Cambodia. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kent, L. (2016). Sounds of silence: Everyday strategies of social repair in Timor-Leste. Australian Feminist Law Journal, 42(1), 31–50.
- Kovras, I. (2013). Explaining prolonged silences in transitional justice: The disappeared in Cyprus and Spain. Comparative Political Studies, 46(6), 730–756.
- Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2018). Gendered silences in post-conflict societies: A typology. Peacebuilding. Published online: <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/21647259.2018.1491681?scroll=top&needAccess=true&>
- Millar, G. (2012). Between Western theory and local practice: Cultural impediments to truth-telling in Sierra Leone. Conflict Resolution Quarterly, 29(2), 177–199.
- Otake, Y. (2019). Suffering of silenced people in northern Rwanda. Social Science & Medicine, 222, 171–179.
- Parpart, J. L., & Parashar, S. (Eds.). (2018). Rethinking silence, voice and agency in contested gendered terrains. London: Routledge.
- Palmberger, M. (2016). How generations remember: Contested histories and shared memories in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Renshaw, L. (2011). Exhuming loss. Memory, materiality and mass graves of the Spanish civil war. London/New York: Routledge.
- Shaw, R. (2007). Memory frictions: Localizing the truth and reconciliation Commission in Sierra Leone. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(2), 183–207.
- Stefansson, A. H. (2010). Coffee after cleansing? Coexistence, cooperation, and communication in post-conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina. Focaal, 57, 62–76.

Slums

► Urban Violence and Crime

Social Capital and Peace

Walt Kilroy

Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Definition

Social capital is the term describing the norms, networks, and trust which enable collective action by societies, or groups within a society, to achieve goals which they could not bring about as individuals. It is relevant to conflict analysis and understanding peace processes and peace-building, because it helps to foreground social dynamics which affect how these unfold. Relationships at many levels are fundamental to conflict and its resolution, and social capital is a helpful analytical lens for understanding how relationships are shaped, and how they influence the dynamics at work. One of most important elements in social capital is trust, which of course comes under enormous pressure during violent conflict. Yet it is required in order to engage in dialogue or to negotiate a settlement. Norms are changed and created during conflict, and new ones may be explicitly promoted during a peace process. Networks are also disrupted or formed, and these can have a significant bearing on whether and how a peace process can progress. Social capital is therefore profoundly affected by conflict, with various forms being destroyed, refashioned, and created. It has an effect in turn on the conflict dynamics. Social capital is not always a constructive factor, and some forms can even deepen divisions and harden identities. But whatever role it plays, it is a useful conceptual tool for understanding conflict and transitions toward peace.

Introduction

Social capital can be used as a conceptual tool for exploring the way relationships are made and transformed by conflict and peace. Like any tool, it is more useful in some situations than others and will not help if it is applied inappropriately, without sensitivity, or as a replacement for the many other useful ways of analyzing conflict. But it does help to move this analysis to the group or social level, where the whole is more than the sum of its parts. It also helps to make visible processes, power dynamics, and roles at local and societal levels which would otherwise be missed. The term is usually most associated closely with Putnam (1993, 1995), who in fact credits others with having mentioned the idea before. But his development of the concept has been used widely by researchers and applied usefully to a broad range of situations. He defines it as “features of social organization, such as trust, norms, and networks, that can improve the efficiency of society by facilitating coordinated actions” (1993, p. 167). The question of collective action is also fundamental, as these social dynamics “enable participants to act together more effectively to pursue shared objectives” (1995, pp. 664–665).

It is important to recognize the implied normative aspects of social capital: It may be described as something which should be fostered, and which will benefit all members of society. This is especially relevant when it comes to trust – one of the essential components of social capital – since it is inherently appealing. But while social capital can facilitate peace processes in very significant ways, it can also enable and promote conflict, othering, and exclusion. For this reason, it is necessary to explore its different manifestations. It may work with or against a peace process, so it is not a question of advocating or promoting it. It is however important to understand its potency and how it can affect a conflict dynamic.

Types of Social Capital

Besides the question of whether or not social capital can contribute to or undermine a peace process, it is important to distinguish between its different forms. Some of these relate to particular groups, rather than society as a whole. One significant distinction is between bonding and bridging social capital. In the bonding variety, it strengthens the relationships and capacity within a particular group, rather than between groups. This can lead to a reinforcement of group cohesion and identity, with varying results. A group which is fragmented, insecure, and includes potential spoilers may be unable to negotiate effectively or deliver on any agreement reached. In this situation, greater social capital could in fact help to build confidence within a group to allow it to “take risks for peace.” However, bonding capital can also harden identities which are defined in contrast to the “other,” or underpin a fixed narrative shared by its members. The conflict may then be understood in terms of “win-lose” or a zero-sum game.

Bridging social capital, on the other hand, strengthens links between groups and allows for wider collective action (Putnam 2000). Norms, networks, and trust operate across divisions and enable shared interests and goals to be realized. It therefore has the potential to be inclusive and build solidarity. This can be seen to different degrees at all stages of a conflict, from second track diplomacy and citizen diplomacy through to the difficult and complicated issues of transitional justice, agreeing on coexistence, and finding ways to recognize and acknowledge the past.

This analytical lens is not intended to obscure the power dynamics, structures, and institutions which also affect human relationships. Another useful conceptualization is linking social capital, which takes power asymmetries more explicitly into account. While bridging social capital can connect groups which may be equal, linking social capital connects those who are in different positions. Szreter and Woolcock (2004) describe it as “norms of respect and networks of trusting relationships between people who are interacting across explicit, formal or institutionalized power or authority gradients in society” (p. 655).

A distinction can also be made between horizontal social capital – describing relationships between people with similar types of power or status – and vertical social capital, where hierarchies or other dynamics are involved. This in fact touches on the related idea of social contract, which is often being questioned or renegotiated in the course of armed conflict. Failure of the social contract between the state and its citizens, or its rejection, may even have contributed to the conflict in the first place. The contract may also be explicitly on the agenda in the course of peacebuilding, where there is a conscious attempt to create new and credible structures with a broader appeal (Knight and Özerdem 2004; Richmond 2011; Themnér and Ohlson 2014).

How Social Capital Interacts with Conflict

Social capital, conflict, and peace interact with each other in nonlinear ways, and looking for simple cause and effect relationships may obscure the complex dynamics at work. Social capital is created, destroyed, and transformed in different ways during the different stages of the conflict cycle. The onset of violence has a profound effect on relationships, but new social capital may emerge within armed groups, civil society, or illicit trading networks. Social capital in turn affects how the conflict unfolds and whether peace agreements can be reached or implemented. The causation does not just go in “both directions” but is part of a dynamic social ecosystem with many feedback loops. (There are limits to the analogy of an ecosystem, however, given that powerful interests are actually an attempt to shape the structures, and agency and ownership are also relevant.) The work on systems thinking and complexity theory brings an important perspective on how these elements interact (Brusset et al. 2016; de Coning 2016; Hughes 2016; Hunt 2015; Leroux-Martin and O’Connor 2017).

It is important to remember that social capital does not simply become relevant once a conflict has begun, or that peacebuilding initiatives which take account of it are drawing on a blank slate. The preexisting social capital, whether recognized or not, may even affect whether a conflict becomes violent or takes a less destructive form. As civil war progresses, new forms of social capital emerge. Cheng refers to “conflict capital” created through the shared experiences of war, describing it as “a form of social capital forged in the intense crucible of violent conflict” (2018, pp. 54–55). There can also be remarkably enduring networks of patronage and interdependency after war, such as those seen for a number of reasons among ex-combatants and former commanders (Themnér 2012; Utas 2012).

There are many examples where social capital is far from benign: organized crime, armed groups, and business elites can all have very high levels of social bonding which helps these groups to engage in collective action (Gilbert 2009; Micolta 2009; Subedi and Jenkins 2017). Social capital for some “may imply social exclusion for others” (Goodhand and Hulme 1999, p. 22). Nussio and Oppenheim (2014, p. 1000) use the term “anti-social capital” when dealing with certain networks of ex-combatants in Colombia, where close bonding within the group can produce distrust of the outside world.

A number of studies have explored how social capital affects the process of peacebuilding in different contexts (for example, Colletta 1999; Cox 2009; Goodhand and Hulme 1999). Paffenholz (2009) suggests a framework for seeing how social capital can contribute through accountability, social cohesion, and inter-group relations. Andrieu (2010) stresses the rebuilding of human relationships is needed as much as institutions or infrastructure, and that this is in fact much harder. It includes creating a healthy civil society, making institutions trustworthy, and redefining relationships.

Social capital also sheds light on some of the important tasks in what might be termed the original conceptions of peacebuilding. The objective is to avoid the relapse into violent conflict which is so often seen after a peace agreement has been adopted, by addressing underlying causes and also supporting a society’s ability to deal with its conflicts without the use of violence (Cousens 2001; Doyle and Sambanis 2006). It is important to note that this conception sets out the tasks of supporting a peace process, which is distinct from the matter of who controls the process and how it is conducted: The work remains to be done either way. Important critiques of how liberal peacebuilding has been practiced by international actors have of course been made. Questions about ownership, decision-making, and legitimacy are entirely valid and have been explored usefully by many critics of donor-driven interventions carried out in a top-down manner (for example, Mac Ginty and Richmond 2007; Richmond 2011). However, while it is essential to understand these dynamics and consider who is in control, the question remains of how effective support can be provided to a peace process – ideally an inclusive one where those most affected have real ownership and decision-making power over what structures are being built. This is especially important since so many processes go into reverse within a few years and see a return to armed conflict. In this context, social capital allows us to see inside the “black box” of peacebuilding, where relationships are being remade. There is a short window of opportunity when people decide what are the “real” rules of the game, and whether the new dispensation will indeed be inclusive and fair after all the rhetoric is stripped away. Social capital is an important part of what judgements they form. It also helps us to see processes which may be too “local,” interpersonal, or everyday to be visible to an outsider attempting to analyze or influence the situation. It is relevant for both negative peace – the absence of direct violence – and the broader idea of positive peace, where structural violence is addressed.

It is important to include gender when using social capital as one of our analytical tools. Taking a gender-blind approach would make important aspects invisible, since women and men experience war, peace, and social capital in different ways. Many norms are highly gendered, with specific expectations, roles, stigmas, and values for men and women. Networks are also gendered, with different functions and access to leadership roles prescribed according to gender, and sometimes even separate networks.

One of the aspects analyzed with a social capital lens has been the Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration (DDR) of ex-combatants after war (Bowd 2011; Colletta and Cullen 2000; Leff 2008). These programs aim to facilitate those associated with armed group to make the difficult transition back to civilian life, often with some support for education or vocational training. Social capital can be seen as a means to help the programs and the people to connect to the wider peace process. However, social capital is itself being built or undermined at the same time by the way DDR is carried out and the message this sends to the people involved (Kilroy and Basini 2018). In some ways, reintegration is a microcosm of the difficult transformation which societies attempt at the end of war. Ex-combatants – and to some extent the communities where they return or settle – may be forging new identities, rebuilding livelihoods, adapting to changed governance, overcoming economic and physical destruction, seeking a new role in society, and working out how to deal with trauma and the past. Many of these involve collective action problems and operate at community as well as individual levels. This action can be enabled or undermined by the social capital being built up or weakened by how DDR and the peace process play out. Norms for a post-war society are actively discussed and promoted during demobilization and reintegration training. Networks are also significant in terms of the support offered and the survival strategies adopted by those involved. Trust is very much in question, especially when the training or benefits promised to ex-combatants do not meet their expectations, are seen to be diverted by corrupt actors, or simply do not materialize (Kilroy 2014).

Summary

Peace and conflict are ultimately about the remaking of relationships. Social capital is an important analytical tool to help understand this. It not only exposes some of the microdynamics and interpersonal dealings, but also explains how this feeds back into a self-sustaining social dynamic, the everyday working assumptions which people have to use, and the social imagination. The whole is more than the sum of its parts. Like any other tool, it can be useful in particular situations, in combination with other ways of analyzing a conflict. If used in the wrong way, in a situation where it is irrelevant, or without sensitivity to the human realities involved, it will not bring us any useful or accurate insights. But if used in the right way, it can help to reveal important dynamics within a peace process, explain the many complexities and nonlinearities, and help to plan more effective and sustainable interventions.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Andrieu, K. (2010). Civilizing peacebuilding: Transitional justice, civil society and the liberal paradigm. Security Dialogue, 41(5), 537–558.
- Bowd, R. (2011). Burning the bridges and breaking the bonds: Social capital and its transformative influence in relation to violent conflict. Journal of Conflict Transformation and Security, 1(1), 37–62.
- Brusset, E., de Coning, C., & Hughes, B. (Eds.). (2016). Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cheng, C. (2018). Extralegal groups in post-conflict Liberia: How trade makes the state (p. 2018). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Colletta, N. J. (1999). The World Bank, demobilization, and social reconstruction. In J. Boutwell & M. T. Klare (Eds.), Light weapons and civil conflict: Controlling the tools of violence. Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield Publishers.
- Colletta, N. J., & Cullen, M. L. (2000). Violent conflict and the transformation of social capital: Lessons from

- Cambodia, Rwanda, Guatemala, and Somalia*. Washington: World Bank.
- Cousens, E. M. (2001). Introduction. In E. M. Cousens & C. Kumar (Eds.), Peacebuilding as politics. Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner.
- Cox, M. (Ed.). (2009). Social capital and peace-building: Creating and resolving conflict with trust and social networks. London: Routledge.
- de Coning, C. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience, 4(3), 166–181.
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Gilbert, L. (2009). Analyzing the dark side of social capital: Organized crime in Russia. In M. Cox (Ed.), In social capital and peace-building: Creating and resolving conflict with trust and social networks. London: Routledge.
- Goodhand, J., & Hulme, D. (1999). From wars to complex political emergencies: Understanding conflict and peace-building in the new world disorder. Third World Quarterly, 20(1), 13–26.
- Hughes, B. (2016). Thawing ceteris paribus: The move to a complex systems lens. In E. Brusset, C. de Coning, & B. Hughes (Eds.), Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hunt, C. T. (2015). UN peace operations and international policing: Negotiating complexity, assessing impact and learning to learn. New York: Routledge.
- Kilroy, W. (2014). Does a more participatory approach to reintegrating ex-combatants lead to better outcomes? Evidence from Sierra Leone and Liberia. Conflict Security and Development, 14(3), 275–308.
- Kilroy, W., & Basini, H. S. A. (2018). Social capital made explicit: The role of norms, networks, and trust in reintegrating ex-combatants and peacebuilding in Liberia. International Peacekeeping, 25(3), 349–372.
- Knight, M., & Özerdem, A. (2004). Guns, camps and cash: Disarmament, demobilization and reinsertion of former combatants in transitions from war to peace. Journal of Peace Research, 41(4), 499–516.
- Leff, J. (2008). The nexus between social capital and reintegration of ex-combatants: A case for Sierra Leone. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 8(1), 9–38.
- Leroux-Martin, P., & O'Connor, V. (2017). Systems thinking for peacebuilding and rule of law: Supporting complex reforms in conflict-affected environments. USIP.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. (2007). Myth or reality: Opposing views on the liberal peace and post-war reconstruction. Global Society, 21(4), 491–497.
- Micolta, P. H. (2009). Illicit interest groups, social capital, and conflict: A study of the FARC. In M. Cox (Ed.), In social capital and peace-building: Creating and resolving conflict with trust and social networks. London: Routledge.
- Nussio, E., & Oppenheim, B. (2014). Anti-social capital in former members of non-state armed groups: A case study of Colombia. Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, 37(2), 999–1023.
- Paffenholz, T. (2009). Exploring opportunities and obstacles for a constructive role of social capital in peacebuilding. In M. Cox (Ed.), In social capital and peace-building: Creating and resolving conflict with trust and social networks. London: Routledge.
- Putnam, R. D. (1993). Making democracy work: Civic traditions in modern Italy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Putnam, R. D. (1995). Tuning in, tuning out: The strange disappearance of social capital in America. Political Science and Politics, 28(4), 664–683.
- Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Subedi, D. B., & Jenkins, B. (2017). The nexus between reintegration of ex-combatants and reconciliation in Nepal: A social capital approach. In B. Jenkins, D. B. Subedi, & K. Jenkins (Eds.), Reconciliation in conflict-affected communities: Practices and insights from the Asia-Pacific. Singapore: Springer.
- Szreter, S., & Woolcock, M. (2004). Health by association? Social capital, social theory, and the political economy of public health. International Journal of Epidemiology, 33(4), 650–667.
- Themnér, A. (2012). Former mid-level commanders in big man networks. In M. Utas (Ed.), African conflicts and informal power: Big men and networks (pp. 205–223). London: Zed Books.
- Themnér, A., & Ohlson, T. (2014). Legitimate peace in post-civil war states: Towards attaining the unattainable. Conflict, Security & Development, 14(1), 61–87.
- Utas, M. (2012). Introduction: Bigmanity and network governance in African conflicts. In M. Utas (Ed.), African conflicts and informal power: Big men and networks. London: Zed Books.

Social Cohesion

- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Social Contract

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

Daniela Lai

London South Bank University, London, UK

Definition

Socioeconomic justice is a debated and, one may say, controversial concept: its role within the transitional justice practice and literature has been contested, while socioeconomic issues in peacebuilding have also remained marginal and often submitted to free market considerations. Broadly speaking, socioeconomic justice refers to providing redress for socioeconomic forms of violence or the violation of socioeconomic rights. Redress can be pursued through reparations, restitution, and/or redistribution. Especially in critical and most notably feminist scholarship, socioeconomic justice is considered to be an essential part of peacebuilding processes and of sustainable and gender-just peace.

Introduction

Discussions of socioeconomic justice and peacebuilding necessarily require considering how justice is conceptualized and addressed in post-conflict societies, most commonly as part of “transitional justice” programs, and whether and how this kind of justice can be supportive of peacebuilding processes and conducive to sustainable peace. Transitional justice is commonly defined as doing justice “in times of transition” (Teitel 2000) from war or authoritarian rule, and transitional justice programs can include judicial mechanisms (international, hybrid, and domestic courts), truth and reconciliation commissions, reparation programs, lustration and vetting, and other locally-specific mechanisms. Recent debates in the field have interrogated the connections between transitional justice and peacebuilding: whether one is conducive to or subsumed within the other or what kind of “nexus” (Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik 2016) exists between the two (see Chapter ▶ “Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding”).

This chapter discusses how socioeconomic justice has been defined (and debated), looking first at controversies over its meaning. Following from this, it situates the concept within transitional justice and then within peacebuilding. Lastly, it looks at how socioeconomic justice can be more easily incorporated by critical understandings of peace and peacebuilding, such as feminist ones. The concluding section introduces two examples of how grassroots activism and the practice of peacebuilding have addressed socioeconomic justice issues. Throughout, the section will highlight how the realization of socioeconomic justice after conflict is strictly connected to the pursuit of sustainable peace.

Conceptualizing Socioeconomic Justice

Socioeconomic justice is more and more commonly understood and defined in relation to the socioeconomic nature of injustice or violence suffered, rather than simply as a socioeconomic remedy for direct physical violence. Its understanding among scholars varies based on a number of factors, including disciplinary background and theoretical inclination, and also whether it is seen as pursued within the context of transitional justice or as part of its expansion to more “transformative” projects of post-conflict justice and peacebuilding. As a result, there is no single accepted definition of socioeconomic justice, nor an agreement on what kind of socioeconomic violations or crimes it should redress.

From a legal point of view, it is possible to see socioeconomic justice as the process through which violations of social and economic rights occurred during conflict are redressed. Such an understanding is anchored to international human rights law, where economic, social, and cultural rights are defined and protected in documents such as the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (especially Articles 22–27) and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR). These include rights and protections related to standards of living (such as access to housing, water, and food), education, and employment – among other things – which should be granted without discrimination. The common belief that these rights should be treated as “aspirations” and realized “progressively” (see ICESCR article 2.1) has given them somewhat of a lesser status within human rights practice, something that has been mirrored in the field of transitional justice (Arbour 2007; Sharp 2013), whose central focus has traditionally been on violations of the right to life and basic liberties. While there has been skepticism toward the inclusion of economic and social rights in the remit of transitional justice, it has been recently argued that – at least with respect to reparations – existing mechanisms are already capable of addressing these violations without dramatically altering their conventional way of functioning (Ochoa-Sánchez 2019).

However, there remain challenges to an understanding of socioeconomic justice grounded in the human rights framework, as this leaves out some specifically socioeconomic forms of violence that are part of the nature of the conflict (including some that jeopardize the very subsistence of communities) (Sankey 2014; Schmid and Nolan 2014). For example, the legal acquisition of land and property for a fraction of their value due to ongoing conflict would not necessarily constitute a violation of economic and social rights (Ochoa-Sánchez 2019, p. 523). However, it is clear that such process entails and is built upon violence: civilians are compelled to sell at low prices due to ongoing fighting and the threat this poses to their economic and physical survival in the area.

Therefore, human rights frameworks could be ill-suited to redress structural forms of socioeconomic violence: that is, violence which is perpetrated as part of a system rather than directly and whose effects are also systemic, generalized, and often intergenerational. Such an understanding of socioeconomic violence draws on Galtung’s (1969) famous conceptualization of structural violence and “positive peace.” Based on this, the redress of economic violence can, and in fact should, be understood as a legitimate part of “transitional” justice – if transition is redefined as the pursuit of “positive peace” (Sharp 2013), rather than toward a “liberal” form of peace.

Structural understandings of socioeconomic violence vary and can imply different types of redress. Some have noted how structural violations of socioeconomic rights are often supported by a system of injustice enshrined in law, as was the case with the Apartheid in South Africa. Because of this, they require mechanisms that differ from the existing, narrowly-focused legalistic or quasi-legalistic mechanisms offered by transitional justice, and that could instead address fundamental claims on land issues and reparations in the South African context (Evans 2016). Others consider economic exploitation to be a crucial element of structural violence, alongside (and closely interlinked with) political exclusion and social marginalization (McGill 2017). As a result, socioeconomic justice entails a commitment to end this kind of exploitation that, in conflict-affected contexts, often becomes systematic and an integral part of the political economy of the war. This is why some scholars see redistribution as the key remedy for socioeconomic violence (Fraser 1995; O’Reilly 2016; Lai 2020). Redistributive efforts are, however, particularly challenging because their cost is likely to provoke resistance on the part of those who benefitted from injustice and violence (Mamdani 1996).

To conclude this section, while some conceptions of socioeconomic justice are devised to fit existing transitional justice mechanisms and further develop their capabilities to address socioeconomic violations, others challenge transitional justice to transform itself and accommodate socioeconomic justice concerns as part of a strive toward more holistic forms of justice and sustainable peace.

Socioeconomic, Transitional, and Transformative Justice

The introduction of socioeconomic justice within transitional justice debates is linked to the pursuit of an expanded, more comprehensive notion of justice and peace after conflict. Such expansion, which is considered a feature of the so-called “fourth wave” transitional justice literature (Sharp 2013), has been considered unrealistic by some, on account of either the difficulty of transitional justice mechanisms such as courts and truth commissions in dealing with the scale of the violations (Waldorf 2012) or the limitations that domestic politics – not just international models – place on the pursuit of peace and justice understood in this broader sense (McAuliffe 2017). From a practice-based point of view, transitional justice mechanisms around the world have also struggled dealing with socioeconomic issues. To give a few notable examples, the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda were not equipped to deal with socioeconomic violations by design; truth commissions in Latin America (Argentina, Chile, El Salvador, Uruguay) mostly focused on basic civil and political rights violations (Hayner 2010; Sharp 2013); and the remit of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in South Africa encompassed reparations that have, however, remained an unrealized aspiration of many victims of the Apartheid (Mamdani 1996).

Because transitional justice is seen (by many) as inherently narrow and legalistic, the pursuit of socioeconomic justice may thus require a different paradigm: a “transformative justice” model that is more suited to addressing the systemic and collective nature of socioeconomic issues. Transformative justice is a more holistic, multifaceted conception of justice after mass violence, which is broader than – but usually encompasses – socioeconomic justice, and is often defined in direct connection to peacebuilding. Transformative justice prioritizes socioeconomic issues for several reasons: first, because they are often considered to be priorities by conflict-affected communities; second, because addressing them can help tackle the root causes of conflict; and third, following from the previous points, because tackling these root causes and meeting local needs can help prevent future conflict (Gready and Robins 2014). Transformative justice has also been defined as a model intended to support sustainable peacebuilding (Lambourne 2009), of which socioeconomic justice is one of four key elements and defined as relating to “financial or other material compensation, restitution or reparation for past violations or crimes (historical justice) and distributive or socioeconomic justice in the future (prospective justice)” (Lambourne 2009, p. 41).

Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

In many respects, transitional justice and peacebuilding share many of the same shortcomings – and they are clearly related to their inability to focus on socioeconomic issues: flawed assumptions about the process of “transition” toward peace, liberal democracy, and market economy (Sriram 2007); problematic representations of the “local” and inadequate engagement with conflict-affected societies (Andrieu 2010); the problematization of local actors as responsible for war and violence while internationals are shielded from responsibility (Nagy 2008); and the aforementioned marginalization of socioeconomic issues and questions and “capital” (economic, social political; see Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik 2016).

If transitional and transformative justice scholars have often seen socioeconomic justice as conducive or supportive of peacebuilding, this does not necessarily mean that peacebuilding has adopted justice categories as crucial to its analysis of socioeconomic issues. In their influential article on the “nexus” of transitional justice and peacebuilding, Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik (2016) note how multidimensional approaches to justice have commonly been used to situate justice in peacebuilding (Mani 2005; Clark 2008; Lambourne 2009), but only the recent “turns” in the peacebuilding literature have opened up the scope for addressing justice (and socioeconomic justice) more explicitly as part of discussions on peace. Among these, the turn to the “local” (Leonardsson and Rudd 2015) and “everyday” (Mac Ginty 2014) have emphasized how socioeconomic issues are commonly part of alternative models, bottom-up processes, and daily experiences of people affected by conflict.

Socioeconomic justice thus fit more easily within critical understandings of peace and peacebuilding and notably feminist ones. The concern for socioeconomic issues emerged from the observation that there has been a tendency – possibly more marked than in the transitional justice field – to promote peacebuilding through international liberal agendas that are seen as complementary to (or even supportive of) neoliberal reforms and that these reforms can potentially undermine socioeconomic justice in post-conflict countries. Three elements are worth highlighting here.

First, the notion of “liberal peace” is imbued with assumptions on the role of free market exchange in maintaining peaceful relations. However, research has shown that postwar markets are gendered spaces where violence continues after the end of conflict: the Arizona market near Brčko, in Bosnia and Herzegovina, was touted as a place where free exchange and entrepreneurship could lay the basis for peaceful interethnic relations – until it emerged that human beings and weapons were being trafficked there (Haynes 2010). An inclusive and gender-just approach to post-conflict peacebuilding thus requires addressing the role of markets in potentially supporting violence and injustice. Second, post-conflict peacebuilding and its practice have been supported and enabled by the intervention of the International Financial Institutions (such as the World Bank and International Monetary Fund), which has promoted privatization, public budget cuts, and more generally standard development models that were not adapted to local contexts, let alone sensitive to the legacies of mass violence (Pugh, Cooper and Turner 2016). Privatizations often led to high levels of unemployment, and foreign direct investment flows remained at disappointing levels, while support for micro-credit or small and medium enterprises failed to generate sustainable development. Last but not least, feminists have highlighted the existence of a continuum linking wartime physical violence, domestic violence, as well as socioeconomic and structural forms of violence that become particularly visible by looking at the experiences of women in conflict and after conflict (True 2012; Rai et al. 2019). IFI policies and other market economy reforms intervene directly onto this continuum, aggravating socioeconomic injustice and undermining the prospects for sustainable peace (Lai 2019). Socioeconomic issues thus cannot be excluded from conceptions of gender-just peace and “sustainable peace.” Thus, the notion of socioeconomic justice is an important corrective to market-driven agendas and the involvement in peacebuilding of financial institutions with vested interests.

Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding in Practice

A few examples can help illustrate the value of socioeconomic justice for peacebuilding from the perspective of conflict-affected communities and the different ways in which it can be (or has been) pursued by local groups. In the former Yugoslavia, grassroots activism has been critical of international interventions that, far from establishing a “liberal peace,” have contributed to legitimize ethnonationalist elites while enacting a transition to market economy that left weaker groups, women, and minorities marginalized. Waves of protests – most notably in 2014 – have highlighted this discontent (Kurtović 2015). Women’s groups from across the former Yugoslav region, motivated by the shortcomings of transitional justice, also mobilized to conceptualize and practice alternative and more holistic forms of justice at the Women’s Court in Sarajevo in 2015. This was a nonjudicial court, drawing on an established tradition of women’s courts around the world, which heard women’s experiences of war and wartime violence from their own point of view and without trying to fit strict legal categories (O’Reilly 2016). As O’Reilly (2016, p. 427 and pp. 432–434) notes, a whole section of the event was dedicated to socioeconomic violence, which is indicative of the activists’ attempt to do justice through redistribution as a way to achieve a gender-just peace (see Chapter ► “Gender Justice and Peacebuilding”).

If women’s groups in Yugoslavia sought justice through unofficial and participatory popular courts, in Colombia, socioeconomic issues were always at the center of official peace negotiations. Socioeconomic injustice – in the form of land inequality, access to natural resources, and social marginalization – was among the root causes of the conflict, and economic exploitation and trafficking was instrumental to its financing and continuation across decades (Richani 2013). Once the Peace Agreement was signed in 2016, the first chapter was entirely dedicated to land reform and included commitments to creating a “land fund” for the distribution of illicitly acquired land to peasants and a number of other programs aimed at establishing land rights and promoting the sustainable development of rural areas. The agreement also foresaw reparation and restitution measures and opened the way for including economic actors within the mandate of the newly established Special Jurisdiction for Peace (See ► “Colombian Peace Agreement 2016”). The Colombian peace process is a clear example of how socioeconomic justice can be seen as integral to peacebuilding. However, this ambitious program has been threatened since its inception by a hostile political environment, funding difficulties, and slow progress on reforms. These challenges are not new, as in other cases such as that of Nepal (Pasipanodya 2008) where there has been a lack of progress on socioeconomic justice following a peace agreement that outlined clear commitments on these issues: still too often, socioeconomic justice issues are perceived as secondary to ending the violence and expensive to tackle. However, continued discontent and instability in the former Yugoslavia and ongoing waves of popular protests in Colombia show that socioeconomic justice is central to meaningful peace.

Summary

Socioeconomic justice has become a central concern for transitional justice and peacebuilding scholarship (especially in critical traditions) and practice. Lively debates on the concept and its relationship to the pursuit of justice and peace after conflict have not led to an agreed-upon definition of socioeconomic justice. For many, such definition can be grounded in social and economic rights, while others emphasize the structural dimensions of wartime violence that would remain unaddressed through a focus on human rights law. The pursuit of socioeconomic justice as part of transitional justice efforts has been dubbed unrealistic by some but strongly advocated, most notably, by scholars subscribing to more holistic definitions of “transformative” justice as conducive to inclusive and sustainable peacebuilding. Peacebuilding is, however, not necessarily well equipped to dealing with socioeconomic justice, especially when pursued in conjunction with liberalizing economic reforms that do not account for the legacies of mass violence. Ultimately, more critical and feminist conceptions of peace and justice have emerged that highlight the necessity of pursuing socioeconomic justice as integral to peacebuilding processes. The examples provided at the end are not meant to be comprehensive or representative, but illustrate the importance of socioeconomic justice in the pursuit of meaningful peace.

Cross-References

- Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Andrieu, K. (2010). Civilizing peacebuilding: Transitional justice, civil society and the liberal paradigm. Security Dialogue, 41(5), 537–558.
- Arbour, L. (2007). Economic and social justice for societies in transition. NYU Journal of Law and Politics, 40(1), 1–28.
- Baker, C., & Obradovic-Wochnik, J. (2016). Mapping the nexus of transitional justice and peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 281–301.
- Clark, J. N. (2008). The three Rs: Retributive justice, restorative justice, and reconciliation. Contemporary Justice Review, 11(4), 331–350.
- Evans, M. (2016). Structural violence, socioeconomic rights, and transformative justice. Journal of Human Rights, 15(1), 1–20.
- Fraser, N. (1995). From redistribution to recognition? Dilemmas of justice in a ‘post-socialist’ age. New Left Review, 212, 68.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Gready, P., & Robins, S. (2014). From transitional to transformative justice: A new agenda for practice. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8(3), 339–361.
- Hayner, P. B. (2010). Unspeakable truths: Transitional justice and the challenge of truth commissions (2nd ed.). London: Routledge.
- Haynes, D. F. (2010). Lessons from Bosnia's Arizona market: Harm to women in a neoliberalized postconflict reconstruction process. University of Pennsylvania Law Review, 158(6), 1779–1829.
- Kurtović, L. (2015). ‘Who sows hunger, reaps rage’: On protest, indignation and redistributive justice in post-Dayton Bosnia-Herzegovina. Southeast European and Black Sea Studies, 15(4), 639–659.

- Lai, D. (2019). What has justice got to do with it? Gender and the political economy of post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina. Review of International Political Economy, Online first, 1–23. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09692290.2019.1679221>.
- Lai, D. (2020). Socioeconomic justice: International intervention and transition in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina. Cambridge: Cambridge University press.
- Lambourne, W. (2009). Transitional justice and peacebuilding after mass violence. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 3(1), 28–48.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 825–839.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mamdani, M. (1996, November/December). Reconciliation without justice. Southern African Review of Books, 46, 3–5.
- Mani, R. (2005). Rebuilding an inclusive political community after war. Security Dialogue, 36(4), 511–526.
- McAuliffe, P. (2017). Transformative transitional justice and the malleability of post-conflict states. Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- McGill, D. (2017). Different violence, different justice? Taking structural violence seriously in post-conflict and transitional justice processes. State Crime Journal, 6(1), 79–101.
- Nagy, R. (2008). Transitional justice as global project: Critical reflections. Third World Quarterly, 29(2), 275–289.
- O’Reilly, M. (2016). Peace and justice through a feminist lens: Gender justice and the women’s court for the former Yugoslavia. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 419–445.
- Ochoa-Sánchez, J. C. (2019). Economic and social rights and transitional justice: A framework of analysis. Journal of Human Rights, 18(5), 522–542.
- Pasipanodya, T. (2008). A deeper justice: Economic and social justice as transitional justice in Nepal. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 2(3), 378–397.
- Presidency of Colombia (2016). Final Agreement to End the Armed Conflict and Build a Stable and Lasting Peace. Retrieved from the Colombian Presidency website at <http://especiales.presidencia.gov.co/Documentos/20170620-dejacion-armas/acuerdos/acuerdo-final-ingles.pdf>
- Pugh, M., Cooper, N., & Turner, M. (2016). Whose peace? Critical perspectives on the political economy of peacebuilding. Basingstoke: Springer.
- Rai, S. M., True, J., & Tanyag, M. (2019). From depletion to regeneration: Addressing structural and physical violence in post-conflict economies. Social Politics: International Studies in Gender, State & Society, 26(4), 561–585.
- Richani, N. (2013). Systems of violence: The political economy of war and peace in Colombia. Albany, NY: Suny Press.
- Sankey, D. (2014). Towards recognition of subsistence harms: reassessing approaches to socioeconomic forms of violence in transitional justice. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8(1), 121–140.
- Schmid, E., & Nolan, A. (2014). ‘Do no harm’? Exploring the scope of economic and social rights in transitional justice. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8(3), 362–382.
- Sharp, D. N. (2013). Interrogating the peripheries: The preoccupations of fourth generation transitional justice. Harvard Human Rights Journal, 26, 149–178.
- Sriram, C. L. (2007). Justice as peace? Liberal peacebuilding and strategies of transitional justice. Global Society, 21(4), 579–591.
- Teitel, R. G. (2000). Transitional Justice. New York: Oxford University Press.
- True, J. (2012). The political economy of violence against women. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Waldorf, L. (2012). Anticipating the past. Social & Legal Studies, 21(2), 171–186.

Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

M. Anne Brown
The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Synonyms

Custom; Governance; Hybridity; Land conflict; Melanesia; Pacific Island states; Relationality; Vanuatu

Definition

This entry addresses sources of peace in Vanuatu, a small island state in the Pacific Islands region. Though the region is highly diverse, there is much that is shared regarding social organization, contemporary vulnerabilities, and sources of peace. The discussion’s themes are thus relevant to other regional states and in broad terms beyond the region. Governance is often seen as fundamental to peace, but internationally governance is generally understood in terms of state institutions. The entry argues that governance in Vanuatu rests largely on a mix of state institutions, forms of customary governance and (to a lesser extent) churches, with customary governance in particular vital to peace and well-being. In Vanuatu, as in many countries, governance could be understood as a hybrid network or interactive web of different modes of governance shaped by unscripted processes of interaction and experimentation.

Customary practices have changed substantially over time. Nevertheless, fundamental elements of custom continue to shape the lives of most ni-Vanuatu. While government and customary institutions and ways of life underpin governance, however, the nature of relations between them is critical to peace. How these relations are mediated and whether these different forms of leadership can together deal with key challenges facing the country will shape the character of Vanuatu's political community. The entry considers customary governance and short examples of interaction with state institutions. Exploring how networks linking different systems of governance operate is vital to understanding sources of peace and of conflict. There is much to learn from Vanuatu's challenges and experience.

Introduction

This entry addresses sources of peace in Vanuatu, one of the independent, small island states of the Pacific Islands region. Though the region is socio-politically and culturally highly diverse, there is also much that is shared regarding ways of life, colonial history, contemporary vulnerabilities, and sources of social stability and peace. The discussion's themes are thus relevant to other regional states and in broad terms beyond the region (see entries ► “Peace Formation in Bougainville” and ► “Post-conflict Timor-Leste”).

Governance is widely identified as critical to peace and security. The forms of governance seen as leading to peace, however, are nearly always envisaged in terms of state institutions, particularly liberal democratic institutions (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; see entry ► “Local Peacebuilding”). In Vanuatu, however, as in many countries, governance and justice processes derive from a complex mix of state institutions and various forms of customary governance (Forsyth 2009). Vanuatu strongly identifies as Christian, and what are seen as Christian values and at times Christian religious leaders and organizations are also significant.

In Vanuatu, governance could thus be understood as a hybrid political order or a dynamic, interactive web of different modes of governance shaped by unscripted processes of interaction and experimentation (Boege et al. 2008; see entry ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”). Despite the undoubted significance of state institutions, to frame questions about the provision of peace in Vanuatu solely or even primarily in terms of such institutions would be to overlook fundamental factors that underpin peace and stability. It would also be to miss significant threats.

Two themes shape this discussion. The first is that contemporary expressions of customary ways of life contribute fundamentally to peace and stability within Vanuatu and to adaptability in the face of change and disruption. Customary practices have changed substantially over time and continue to change. Nevertheless, fundamental elements of customary ways of life, including the continuity and centrality of kin, land and place, the significance of the world of the spirit, and principles of reciprocity and respect, continue to shape the lives of most ni-Vanuatu. Customary governance is not reducible to “chiefs” (although leadership roles are important) but could be understood as embedded in these patterns of relations and ways of life.

The second theme is that while government, customary, and (to a lesser extent) church institutions and practices all contribute to governance, the nature of relations among them is critical to questions of peace (see entry ► “Peace Formation”). While there is enmeshment and cooperation between government and customary governance, there are also substantial gaps, friction, and confusion. There are also systemic tensions between the nature of community (political, economic, and ecological) as conceived by customary world views and those framed by the liberal state and free market. These tensions are clear in profoundly different ways of valuing land, for example, but also in different models of authority. Effective communication and accountability between people in rural Vanuatu, where the majority of the population lives, and government, which largely takes place in towns, is a significant practical but also systemic challenge. How these tensions are managed is critical to Vanuatu's peace and well-being, to its ability to navigate major challenges and to the character of its political community. Focusing solely on formal state institutions would miss these points of vulnerability, challenge, and potential and overlook the contribution of customary ways of life to peace.

The entry first touches on cross-regional threats. It then explores these two themes – the significance to peace of Vanuatu's contemporary customary ways of life and of the enmeshment of different forms of governance and social organization – through brief discussions of Vanuatu's social economy and socio-political organization and through a series of short examples, including land, gender violence, political crises, and responses to natural disaster.

There is a longstanding tendency in discussing politics and development to overlook societal forms of governance and their contributions to peace or to see them in overwhelmingly negative terms, as corrupting or obstructing government. In Vanuatu's case, however, as in many others, people's well-being rests substantially on such forms of governance and the nature of their relations with state institutions. Ni-Vanuatu grapple with profound challenges of forging reliable, accountable patterns of constructive interaction among different modes of governance and so shaping a statehood grounded in their own society, values, and place (Brown 2007). Greater appreciation of the operation of these webs of governance and how they are navigated is vital to understanding sources of peace in Vanuatu and many other post-colonial states.

The Pacific Islands Region

The Pacific Islands region is made up of many hundreds of islands extending in scattered clusters over a vast ocean (the exact size depends on where regional borders are drawn) and encompassing the subregions of Melanesia (of which Vanuatu is part), Polynesia, and Micronesia. The profound socio-cultural complexity of the region, and particularly of Melanesia, is reflected in Vanuatu's linguistic diversity. A population of approximately 300,000 people speaks over 100 distinct languages, as well as the vibrant national pidgin (Bislama), English and French (Francois et al. 2015).

The region reaches across the Pacific Ring of Fire, a zone of high volcanic activity, and is very susceptible to natural disasters and their intensification by climate change. Vanuatu itself is an archipelago formed by volcanic activity and volcanoes continue to be active. As touched on later, this can demand evacuation of entire island populations. Vanuatu's geography makes it one of the most vulnerable countries in the world to natural and climate-driven disasters.

Climate change is “the single greatest threat to the livelihoods, security and wellbeing of the peoples of the Pacific” and is gathering pace (Pacific Island Forum 2018, p. 1). Sea level rise, saltwater contamination, increasing incidence and severity of extreme weather events, and disruption of fish stocks and plant species zones have far-reaching consequences for populations around the Pacific where most people depend directly on fishing and food gardens and have deep cultural and spiritual connection with their land (Boege 2018). The pressures of disasters, loss of land and of vital resources, the disruption of sources of meaning and well-being, the need for mass relocations, and resulting overcrowding exacerbate already-existing fractures within and among communities (Boege 2018; see entry ► “Conflicts and Natural Disasters”).

The intense pace of socio-cultural, political, and economic change and the interaction of at times significantly different forms of socio-political organization resulting from colonization and the nature of contemporary globalization also generate friction and insecurity and challenge governance and justice processes (Forsyth 2009). Different ways of valuing land, addressed briefly below, provide one example of these tensions. More broadly, state structures and processes do not always fit easily with the more relational, kin-based forms of socio-political organization prevailing across the region. Because broadly customary forms of governance have been so under-valued in understanding statehood, there is little available experience to draw from regarding constructive linkages between democratic state processes and prevailing, more relational forms of socio-political order. This, however, is a challenge facing communities and governments across the region (Forsyth 2009; Brown 2007; see entry ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”).

After climate change, the main drivers of vulnerability in Vanuatu and across the region are issues of social peace and elite political instability and corruption. While social conflict, political instability, and corruption have a range of causes, they also need to be understood within the context of the friction between modes of social order noted above. Drivers of social conflict include tension over land; increasing inequality, poverty, and the growth of squatter settlements; resistance to changing gender roles amid weakening cultural constraints on violence; social and economic impacts of a fast-growing youth population (approximately one-third of ni-Vanuatu are under 15 years old according to Countrymeters 2020); and communal tensions (e.g., between different Island groups in squatter settlements).

Following the 2001 terrorist attacks in New York, security assessments of the region were preoccupied with the potential for state failure, particularly in view of a series of regional crises. Australia feared that Melanesian states formed an arc of instability, breeding chaos and economic collapse. The subregion’s culture was depicted as “tribal” and “warlike” in the Australian and New Zealand press. This is to misunderstand the dynamics of governance in the region, however, by focusing too narrowly on formal state institutions. Regional states have not failed, and while state institutions are weak, with some exceptions community life is orderly and peaceable. While the region has recurrent problems with elite political instability, there are also examples of strong national leadership as well as a capacity, across the varying networks of governance, to navigate significant challenges.

Social Economy

Approximately two-thirds of Vanuatu’s population live in rural areas in networks of extended families and engage in small-scale mixed farming, fishing, and associated crafts (MALFFB 2020). These activities are the basis of livelihood and food security and the context for the social, political, and cultural life of most ni-Vanuatu. That is, they are the context for most broadly customary ways of life. They are also the basis of the nation’s economy, employing about 75% of the working population to some degree (MALFFB 2020). Small-scale farming nevertheless struggles to absorb the fast-growing population of young people, which contributes to urban drift and unemployment. Tourism (on hold during the pandemic) and some commercial agriculture are additional sources of employment (and foreign currency), alongside small professional and light industrial sectors.

