- Jakobsen, P. V. (1996). National interest, humanitarianism or CNN: What triggers UN peace enforcement after the cold war? Journal of Peace Research, 33(2), 205–215.
- Lanteigne, M., & Hirono, M. (2013). China's evolving approach to peacekeeping. London: Routledge.
- Levin, J., MacKay, J., & Nasirzadeh, A. (2016). Selectorate theory and the democratic peacekeeping hypothesis: Evidence from Fiji and Bangladesh. International Peacekeeping, 23(1), 107–132. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2015.1108845>.
- Mackinlay, J., & Cross, P. (2003). Regional peacekeepers: the paradox of Russian peacekeeping. Tokyo: United Nations Publications.
- Mullenbach, M. J. (2005). Deciding to keep peace: an analysis of international influences on the establishment of third-party peacekeeping missions. International Studies Quarterly, 49(3), 529–556.
- Murphy, R. (2007). UN peacekeeping in Lebanon, Somalia and Kosovo: Operational and legal issues in practice. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Regan, P. M. (2002). Civil wars and foreign powers: Out-side intervention in intrastate conflict. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Ruby, T. Z., & Gibler, D. (2010). US professional military education and democratization abroad. European Journal of International Relations, 16(3), 339–364.
- Savage, J. D., & Caverley, J. D. (2017). When human capital threatens the capitol: Foreign aid in the form of military training and coups. Journal of Peace Research, 54(4), 542–557. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343317713557>.
- Waltz, K. N. (1993). The Emerging structure of international politics. International Security, 18(2), 44–79.
- Wilén, N., Ambrosetti, D., & Birantamije, G. (2015). Sending peacekeepers abroad, sharing power at home: Burundi in Somalia. Journal of Eastern African Studies, 9(2), 307–325.
- Worboys, K. J. (2007). The traumatic journey from dictatorship to democracy: Peacekeeping operations and civil-military relations in Argentina, 1989–1999. Armed Forces & Society, 33(2), 149–168.

Grounded Nationalism

Siniša Malešević

School of Sociology, University College, Dublin, Ireland

Definition

Nationalism is an ideology which posits the nation as a principal unit of human solidarity and political legitimacy. Grounded nationalism is a concept that aims to capture variety of historical processes that make nationhood organizationally, ideologically, and micro-interactionally embedded phenomenon.

Introduction

Although aspects of nationalist thinking were present well before the eighteenth century, it was the proliferation of the enlightenment and romanticism that played a crucial role in formulating the key postulates of nationalist doctrine. The American Revolution (1765–1783) and the French Revolution (1789–1799) together with the Latin American wars of independence (1808–1833) gave further impetus to establishing nationhood as the principal sources of political legitimacy. While before modernity political elites typically justified their right to rule by invoking the specific dynastic claims or by appealing to religious and mythical entitlements such as the idea of divine origins of monarchs, in modern era political power is deduced from the notion of popular sovereignty. Nevertheless, for much of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, nationalism coexisted and competed with other ideological doctrines for political primacy and it was only after WWII that nationhood was entrenched as the dominant organizing principles of territorial rule in the world. Whereas in the nineteenth century nationalism and imperialism often cohabited within the same political space as was the case with the British, French, Dutch, and later German political projects, the end of WWII delegitimized the idea of empire and reaffirmed the principle of national sovereignty as the dominant ideological vista of contemporary social and political order. Once nation-state was established as the only legitimate form of polity in the world, nationalism gradually became the hegemonic ideological discourse throughout the globe (Malešević 2013, 2019).

The scholarship on nationalism has traditionally distinguished between the aggressive and banal experiences of nationhood. On the one hand, nationalism has been associated with wars, revolutions, terrorism and insurgency, genocide and ethnic cleansing, and the violent break-ups of old states and the creation of new political entities (Hall and Malešević 2013; Mann 1993). On the other hand, nationalism has also been traced to variety of everyday habitual practices ranging from the idealized tourist destinations and sporting competitions to distinct consumption practices, national cuisine, or popular song contests (Fox and Miller-Idriss 2008; Billig 1995).

Another influential and well entrenched typology differentiates between the civic and ethnic forms of nationalism (Smith 1998). Traditionally, ethnic nationalism was a synonymous with hereditary and descent-based membership in the nation, whereas civic nationalism was associated with the shared political rights and allegiance to the shared constitutional order. Hence, ethnic nationalism was tied to the specific cultural markers such as shared language, ancestry, or religion while civic nationalism is regularly linked to the moral equality of citizens and a voluntary political association.

Finally, scholarship has also been divided on the question of how old are nations and nationalism, with the two dominant perspectives – modernism and ethno-symbolism – offering very different explanations. Hence, the modernist perspective insists that since nationhood and nationalism are dependent on the socio-economic and political structure of modern social order (i.e., industrialization, urbanization, secularization, educational systems, etc.), they cannot develop before modernity (Breuilly 2017; Mann 1993; Gellner 1983). In contrast, ethno-symbolists claim that there is a strong element of cultural continuity between the premodern ethnies and modern-day nations as they both utilize shared symbols, myths, traditions, and collective memories (Smith 1998, 2009).

Several scholars have questioned these sharp dichotomies pointing that banal nationalism can quickly transform into its virulent forms and that banality is not a synonym for benign action. Other scholars have argued that there is no purely civic nationalism and that all nationalisms contain ethnic and civic elements (Brubaker 2015; Yack 1996). Moreover, one should not assume that civic nationalism is harmless, and that ethnic nationalism is destined towards violence. The ethno-symbolist versus modernist debate has also been criticized for its neglect of other social factors that make nationhood possible and relevant in the modern world.

Despite these pronounced criticisms, there have been little sustained attempts to integrate these varieties of nationalist experience into a historically and sociologically coherent framework. The organizational longue durée perspective aims to capture the changing dynamics of nationhood through time and space (Malešević 2010, 2013, 2017, 2019). This perspective challenges the two dominant paradigms within the nationalism studies and aims to transcend the ethnic versus civic and aggressive versus banal dichotomies that have dominated nationalism studies for decades.

In this understanding, nationalism is a historical phenomenon that developed gradually through the organizational, ideological, and micro-interactional grounding. In contrast to ethno-symbolism and modernism, the organizational longue durée perspective argues that nationhood is a modern phenomenon, but its emergence and proliferation was dependent on the long-term organizational, ideological, and micro-interactional processes. This view opposes the modernist idea where nationalism is functionally tied to modernization and also contests the ethno-symbolist emphasis on unbroken cultural continuity. In contrast, the organizational longue durée perspective aims to show that there are premodern organizational, ideological and micro-interactional ingredients that have made modern-day nationhood and nationalisms possible. Hence, the concept of grounded nationalism aims to seize the historical complexities and contradictions that underpin the development of nationhood over longue durée: its organizational, ideological, and micro-interactive grounding.

Nationalism is an organizationally grounded phenomenon in a sense that its existence and proliferation is tied to its coercive and disciplinary capacity to coordinate social action. There is no nationalism without organizational power. The first proto-nationalist associations were comprised of dedicated middle-class individuals who would congregate in saloons, beer houses, and private clubs espousing variety of nation-centric ideas (Mann 1993). These cultural associations later transformed into the secret revolutionary societies many of which developed into disciplined and militant organizations that were capable of utilizing violence (i.e., assassinations, dynamite campaigns, hijackings, etc.) to pursue their nationalist ambitions. From Carbonari and Philiki Hetairia to Young Ireland and Young Bosnia, such clandestine organizations have attained significant organizational capacity to inflict damage on the structures of imperial states and also to popularize the idea of sovereign nationhood. Throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, these national projects were attained wider support base and have often transformed into formidable social movements many of which advocated the establishment of independent states. From the Finian Brotherhood in Ireland to the Fennoman movement in Finland or the National League in Poland, European continent witnessed proliferation of nationalist movements that created wide and deep organizational networks throughout their respective societies, thus making the eventual transition to independent statehood possible. In addition to these society-based initiatives, the main vehicle for the development of coercive organizational power has been the state. The continuous rise of state infrastructural power in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries has played a crucial role in making nationalism society-wide phenomenon. With the substantial improvements in the communication systems and transport networks, the modern states have increased their ability to control their borders, enforce the taxation, and implement better systems of surveillance. These new developments were later used to coercively homogenize populations of new nation-states as was the case in France where cultural minorities were forcibly assimilated and the minorities languages such as Basque, Breton, and Occitan were largely wiped out. By the end of WWII, much of Europe has experienced a similar process of national homogenization with some regions witnessing genocides, ethnic cleansings, and violent exchanges of populations. It is no accident that nationalism became organizationally more grounded as the coercive capacities of nation-states increased.

Nationalism is also an ideologically grounded phenomenon. While political elites may approach the power game in a cynical way and thus may not believe in the political and social programs they nominally advocate, many of their supporters see the ideological messages as important. Since nationalist narratives offer grand vistas of liberation, salvation, emancipation, and authenticity, they attract a wide support base. Some nationalist discourses invoke the idea of collective self-interest including the notion of prioritizing nationals over non-nationals. Historically, many East European nationalist movements attracted support among nationally ambiguous peasantry only when they promised tangible benefits such as the land redistribution, lower taxation, or full citizenship rights. Nevertheless, most nationalist ideologies gain traction through their emotional and moral appeals. Hence most successful nationalist leaders tend to invoke the ethical discourses to delegitimize the existing political orders and state structures. The imperial rulers are regularly condemned for their unjust, unequal, or immoral treatment of their subjects. The question of popular sovereignty and the necessity of independence are framed as moral questions such as “Ireland unfree shall never be at peace” (Patrick Pearse) or “We will face the bullets of the enemies, we are free and will remain free” (Chandra Azad). The key nationalist principles are often couched in the language of righteousness emphasizing the ethical principles of self-determination such as the idea that all nations should be free and possess a state of their own. In this context, nationalism is ideologically grounded in two principal ways: as a vehicle of mass scale social mobilization and as a dominant discourse of political legitimization. These two ideological processes play a decisive role in articulating unified nation-centric discourses that bring different social strata together resulting in what Mosse (1991) called “the nationalisation of the masses.” The organizational grounding provides a structural scaffold through which ideological penetration of the social order is achieved. The mass scale ideological mobilization is only possible once organizational capacity is in place. Hence, the state, social movements, and variety of other social organizations utilize the existing social structures such as the mass media, educational system, the courts, military and police, the welfare institutions, and many other outlets to forge and reproduce nation-centric understandings of social reality. Furthermore, ideological grounding is also achieved outside of the formal institutions as the civil society, religious institutions, private corporations, and the public sphere are all also involved in the creation, reproduction, and proliferation of nationalist tropes.

Finally, nationalism is also dependent on the micro-interactional grounding. While the organizational structures and ideological discourses provide the structural context for grounding, they cannot penetrate the micro-universe of everyday life without having a strong embedment in the interpersonal relationships. The scholarship on banal and everyday nationalisms has made clear that nationhood is reproduced through variety of habitual experiences including the everyday communication, naturalized and routinized practices of interaction, consumption rituals, and habitual activities that all take place daily in the lives of ordinary individuals. As Billig (1995) emphasized, the strength of nationalism is better gauged not from the passionately waved banners but from the barely noticeable flags hanging on the government buildings and the porches of private houses. It is the banal and unconscious practices of everyday life that sustain and reproduce nation-centric realities and as such make nationalism a hegemonic project that can be triggered at any moment in time. Nevertheless, habitual nationalism does not automatically transform into its virulent forms. Instead for nationalism to have a significant impact on social life, its organizational and ideological grounding must coalesce with the micro-interactional grounding. In other words, since human beings are not puppets that simply follow the wishes of their rulers but are in fact reflective and thinking creatures, it is paramount that their interests, emotions, and norms are reflected in the ideological narratives and organizational structures of nationalism. Hence nationalist discourses can resonate only when they speak and act in the language of everyday interactions. It is here that organizational and ideological grounding fuse with micro-interactional grounding. Nationalism can and does become a dominant form of modern subjectivity only when the micro-attachments, local meanings, interests, and emotions became fully aligned with the society-wide nationalist narratives. The nationalist ideas and practices become normalized and naturalized through the personalized experiences linked to micro-level solidarities that matter to all human beings such as our intimate relationships with our families, close friends, comrades, lovers, friendly neighbors, and so on. In this context, nationalist ideologies have been very successful in deploying and often monopolizing the discourses of kinship and comradeship where nation-states and nationhood have regularly been depicted as one’s family members and close friends. Thus whether they are framed in the predominately ethnic or civic terms, nationalists tend to speak in potent metaphors such as “our sacred Indian motherland,” “our French brothers and sisters,” “our American boys fighting overseas to preserve the honor of our fatherland,” “the sacrifices of Russian comrades,” and so on. In some instances, this language of kinship and friendship is deployed deliberately as a propaganda strategy, but in most cases, this is not necessarily a top down exercise, but something generated by the successful blending of the organizational, ideological, and micro-interactional grounding. It is a structural and interactional process whereby organizationally and ideologically embedded ideas and practices are translated into the local micro-worlds, whereas the micro-localities also contribute towards shaping the larger macro narrative of nationhood. The organizational and ideological grounding create a situation where nationalism can tap into the local attachments and emotional dynamics of the micro-worlds.

Summary

The historical grounding of nationalism indicates that this is a Janus-faced phenomenon that can generate violence and protracted conflicts but can also contribute to peaceful social environment. Nationalism is not inherently a violent ideology but its ideological potency in modernity makes it an effective tool for mass mobilization in times of crises and wars. In a contemporary world where an overwhelming majority of people feel strongly attached to their nation-states, political leaders can and do regularly invoke nationalist tropes to justify participation in wars or support for the use of violence, something their premodern predecessors could not do. In this context, organizational, ideological, and micro-interactional grounding of nationalism has contributed to the proliferation of violence. However, development and expansion of nationalism in everyday life has also created opportunities for prolonged periods of peace in some parts of the world. The states where nationalist ideas and practices are deeply and consensually grounded (i.e., Denmark, Sweden, Norway, etc.) have managed to develop strong and functioning organizational, ideological, and micro-interactional structures that have generated political stability, economic prosperity, societal integration, and protracted peace.

Cross-References

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict
- ▶ Genocide
- ▶ Identity and Political Violence
- ▶ Organized Brutality
- ▶ Peace

References

- Billig, M. (1995). Banal nationalism. London: Sage.
- Breuilly, J. (2017). Modern empires and nation states. Thesis Eleven, 139(1), 11–29.
- Brubaker, R. (2015). Grounds for difference. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Fox, J., & Miller-Idriss, C. (2008). Everyday nationhood. Ethnicities, 8(4), 536–563.
- Gellner, E. (1983). Nations and nationalism. Cornell: Cornell University Press.
- Hall, J., & Malešević, S. (Eds.). (2013). Nationalism and war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2010). The sociology of war and violence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2013). Nation-states and nationalisms: Organisation, ideology and solidarity. Cambridge: Polity.
- Malešević, S. (2017). The rise of organised brutality: A historical sociology of violence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2019). Grounded nationalisms: A sociological analysis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mann, M. (1993). The sources of social power 2. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mosse, G. (1991). The nationalization of the masses: Political symbolism and mass movements in Germany from the Napoleonic Wars through the Third Reich. Cornell: Cornell University Press.
- Smith, A. D. (1998). Nationalism and modernism. London: Routledge.
- Smith, A. D. (2009). Nationalism and ethno-symbolism: A cultural approach. London: Routledge.
- Yack, B. (1996). The myth of civic nation. Critical Review, 10(2), 193–211.

Guidelines

- ▶ Measuring the Implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda

Gulf Security

- ▶ Yemen Conflict

H

Harmony

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Heritage

- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

Holding the Ground Peacekeeping – Maintaining the Status Quo

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peace-keeping Operations

Honduras

- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

How Apologies After War and Atrocities Matter in International Politics

Karl Gustafsson
Department of Economic History and International Relations, Stockholm University, Stockholm, Sweden

Definition

How do apologies and other acts of contrition after war and atrocities matter in international politics? Much of the existing scholarship has been concerned with whether such gestures can facilitate reconciliation between perpetrators and victims. While recognizing the value of such scholarship, this entry also discusses what apologies and other acts of contrition do more broadly. It suggests that apologies can have effects other than facilitating reconciliation. Apologies and other acts of contrition provide opportunities for former perpetrators to distinguish themselves from what they used to be. Through such differentiation, states and collectives that transgressed in the past can construct new identities for themselves and relate in new ways to other states and groups. However, this entry also suggests other possible consequences of such identity redefinition through apologies. First, it may lead the former transgressor to want this new self-understanding to be recognized by others. If such recognition is not forthcoming, it might result in bilateral friction. Second, such changes may also contribute to enabling security policies that previously could not be enacted. These points are developed and illustrated through engagement with the case of Japanese apologies for colonialism and World War II.

Introduction

History-related issues in international politics have increased in importance after the end of the Cold War, and demands for apologies and compensation for past transgressions can be heard throughout the world (See the chapter on Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts and the chapter on Memorials and Transitional Justice; Kampf, 2009; Lazare, 2005, pp. 6–8). This has prompted some scholars to declare that we live in the “age of apology” (Brooks, 1999; Gibney et al., 2008). But how do apologies and other acts of contrition after war and atrocities matter in international politics?

This entry surveys the growing body of research that has explored such issues. It thereby highlights how apologies have typically been seen to matter in international politics. It shows that much research has emphasized the positive potential and power of apologies when it comes to achieving reconciliation. This entry, however, also discusses more critical and skeptical views of this conciliatory potential. In addition, through reference to recent research, it argues that apologies might also matter in other ways. Most notably, it suggests that apologies provide important opportunities for former aggressors to distinguish themselves from what they used to be. In other words, states and collectives that committed atrocities in the past can use apologies to construct new identities for themselves. As part of this process, they can also relate in new ways to other states and groups. This entry goes on to show that such identity redefinition through apologies may have significant consequences. First, it may lead the former transgressor to want this new self-understanding to be recognized by others. If such recognition is not forthcoming, it might result in bilateral friction. Second, such changes may also contribute to making possible security policies that previously could not be enacted due to fear that it might lead the former aggressor to revert to its old ways. These points are illustrated through discussion of the case of Japan. Based on these discussions, this entry suggests that future research on apologies should further explore whether apologies matter in international politics beyond the possibility that they might contribute to reconciliation.

The Power of Apologies: How Contrition Can Facilitate Reconciliation

Much of the existing research has emphasized the power of apologies in achieving reconciliation (e.g., Barkan & Karn, 2006; Daase et al., 2016; Lazare, 2005). It has, for example, been argued that “[a]n honest and contrite confrontation with the past can . . . help to reduce threat perceptions abroad and build confidence and trust” (Langenbacher, 2010, p. 38). Politicians too have testified to the power of apologies: “When I admit my mistakes, people are convinced. It’s very effective” (Benjamin Netanyahu, quoted in Kampf, 2009, p. 257). Several scholars have stressed that apologies are closely linked to collective memory and identity (e.g., Tavuchis, 1991, p. 9; Löwenheim, 2009, p. 532). Apologies are said to have the power to alter identities through a reinterpretation or reframing of history (Luke, 1997, p. 366; Weyeneth, 2001, p. 10). Acts of contrition are likely to be particularly successful when the performance they entail expresses emotion (Wilson & Bleiker, 2014). It is argued, for example, that “[r]emorse improves the national spirit and health. It raises the moral threshold of a society” (Brooks, 1999, p. 3). Apologies may thus involve a reinterpretation of the story a group tells about itself (Barkan, 2000, p. xxii). Admitting (or refusing to admit) past transgressions indicates who a group is because it becomes part of this story. “How the offender perceives and addresses that past (in its collective memory and historical narrative) demonstrates how it defines its role in it and what course it may take to come to terms with it” (Löwenheim, 2009, p. 554).

Critical Approaches: Why Do Apologies Fail?

The positive view of apologies has been questioned by scholars advocating a more skeptical approach that focuses not primarily on successful but also failed apologies (Kampf & Löwenheim, 2012).

Sometimes, demands for apologies are met with outright refusal to apologize. Such refusal may be related to the story a group tells about itself and the belief that the story and the group’s honor will be stained by such disclosures (O’Neill, 1999, p. 177). It may also be the case that even if an apology is presented by a representative of a state, other influential actors within the apologizing state may make statements that are seen as denying the apology (Cunningham, 2008; Lind, 2008). Because there may be opposition to apologies, it has been argued that rhetorical strategies that construct a common identity between the offender and victim groups can serve to legitimize apologies because it garners broad support for it within the group the apologizer represents. Such strategies are especially effective if coupled with an emotional and detailed description of the acts, which prompted the apology (Augoustinos et al., 2011).

An important criticism of arguments about the positive potential of apologies is that too much power has been ascribed to qualities seen as inherent to apologies. It has thus been pointed out that in much research, the power the audience has to interpret apologies and the context in which such interpretation takes place have not been sufficiently taken into account (Renner, 2010, p. 1586). Relatedly, some studies propose that the apology ritual is culturally specific and that misunderstandings are common in inter-cultural apologies (Gries & Peng, 2002; Murata, 1998). Differences in language or religion may function as obstacles to successful apologies (Barkan & Karn, 2006, pp. 14–15). This indicates that international apologies, especially in cases characterized by cultural distance, may be especially complicated.

Additional Ways in Which Apologies Matter

While acknowledging the great value and important contributions of research concerned with the potential for apologies to facilitate reconciliation, this section suggests that apologies may matter in international politics in other ways as well. It proposes two ways in which apologies matter. First, states or groups that apologize for war or atrocities may present themselves as having changed since the time of the transgression. They may then want others to recognize that change. If such recognition is not forthcoming, however, it might disturb bilateral relations. Second, such changes may also contribute to enabling security policies that previously could not be enacted. Both these arguments have to do with identity and temporality. In what follows, I develop these points through engagement with the case of Japanese apologies for colonialism and World War II.

As indicated in the Wikipedia page that lists Japanese apologies (See: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_war_apology_statements_issued_by_Japan, accessed 1 June 2021), Japan has apologized numerous times for wartime atrocities and colonialism. These apologies, however, have not been very successful in improving Japan’s image in the states that suffered most from Japanese aggression and colonialism, most notably China and South Korea. Some suggest that the reason is that Japanese apologies have been ambiguous (Coicaud, 2009, p. 117). Similarly, it has been suggested that the failure of Japanese apologies can be attributed to the fact that they have been followed by acts or statements by Japanese right-wingers and conservatives that have been seen as nullifying the apologies (Lind, 2008; Yamazaki, 2006). However, that apologies fail to change the views of victims does not necessarily mean that they do not matter. They may have effects on other audiences. Crucially, Japanese apology statements have contained discursive constructions of a Japanese identity that differentiates present-day Japan from wartime Japan. For example, during a speech at the Asian-African Conference in Bandung, Indonesia in 2005, Prime Minister Koizumi Junichirō stated:

with feelings of deep remorse and heartfelt apology always engraved in mind, Japan has resolutely maintained, consistently since the end of World War II, never turning into a military power but an economic power, its principle of resolving all matters by peaceful means, without recourse to use of force. Japan once again states its resolve to contribute to the peace and prosperity of the world in the future as well, prizing the relationship of trust it enjoys with the nations of the world. (Koizumi, 2005)

Numerous Japanese apologies have contained similar statements in which postwar and present-day Japan are depicted as starkly different from wartime Japan. Whereas wartime Japan was a warmongering state that committed atrocities, postwar Japan is portrayed as peace-loving and contrite. This Japanese identity as peaceful is also apparent in abundant statements by Japanese politicians and the media describing Japan as a “peaceful nation,” or “peace state” (heiwa kokka). However, as Japan has apologized and emphasized its peacefulness and difference from wartime Japan, it has become increasingly sensitive to actions and statements that are seen as denying this self-image. For example, Japanese politicians, as well as the Japanese media, have repeatedly criticized Chinese education for focusing excessively on atrocities committed by wartime Japan, while not recognizing Japan’s peaceful development in the postwar period. This lack of recognition for Japan’s peacefulness has been described as one of the main reasons for violent anti-Japanese protests and other incidents that occurred in China in the 2000s and 2010s. The lack of recognition for Japan’s self-image as peaceful has thus contributed to the deterioration in bilateral relations (For more detailed accounts, see Gustafsson, 2015, 2016).

Apologies have also contributed to enabling changes to Japanese security policy that have taken place in recent years. These have been described as “radical policies that appear to transform national security, US-Japan alliance ties and relations with China and East Asia” (Hughes, 2015, p. 1). For example, in April 2014 Japan relaxed its ban on arms exports. In July the same year, the Japanese government reinterpreted Article 9 of the Japanese constitution, often referred to as the “peace clause,” to allow for collective self-defense. This means that the Japanese Self-Defense Forces (SDF) are now allowed to offer military support in case an ally is attacked, even if Japan itself is not directly under attack. A key legal obstacle to Japan’s participation in war has thus been removed. But how did these changes occur?

Several scholars have argued that for a long time in the postwar period Japanese security policy was limited by a strong antimilitarist or pacifist self-understanding. Many Japanese expressed a fear of the revival of Japanese militarism. To prevent postwar Japan from reverting to its old militarist ways, constraints such as Article 9 of the constitution, the ban on arms exports, and other measures were self-imposed on Japan’s security policy (Berger, 1998; Katzenstein, 1996; Oros, 2008). This fear that Japan might once again become an aggressor unless legal restrictions were kept in place was accompanied by the abovementioned efforts to apologize to countries that suffered from Japanese militarism and colonialism. Again, these apology statements emphasized how different postwar Japan has become from wartime Japan. It was stressed that while wartime Japan was an aggressive warmonger, postwar Japan had become a peace state. As such apology statements were repeated, over time more and more people in Japan came to regard Japan as almost inherently peaceful and the fear that it might again become an aggressor declined significantly. The image of the Japanese Self-Defense Forces became increasingly positive, and opposition to security policy reform weakened. In this way, Japanese apologies and the self-image that they constructed contributed to enabling the far-reaching security policy changes mentioned above. This is not to say that there was no opposition to the reforms. The reforms were severely criticized. However, opposition had weakened to an extent that arguably made the changes possible (For a more detailed account, see Gustafsson, 2020).

Conclusion

This entry has surveyed the literature on apologies after atrocities and war. Such research has often highlighted the power of apologies and suggested that apologies and other acts of contrition can bring about interstate or intergroup reconciliation. However, there is also a body of research that has emphasized that apologies are not always successful. Such scholars have argued for the importance of paying attention to failed apologies.

This entry has sought to further expand the debate about how apologies matter. In doing so, it has developed arguments based on the insight that apologies often are bound up with identity change. Those who apologize may seek to present themselves as having changed – as no longer being aggressive, war-mongering perpetrators. If, in such a situation, others do not recognize such a change in identity, the result might be a deterioration in relations. In addition, this entry has also suggested that apologies can contribute to enabling security policy change. A state that apologizes many times may thereby reconstruct its self-understanding from one where it sees itself as potentially dangerous to one where it considers itself inherently peaceful and therefore no longer a threat to peace. As a consequence, it may alter its security policy so that previously existing constraints are removed and actions that used to be considered illegal or inappropriate become possible.

These are only two additional ways in which apologies matter in international politics. Future research on apologies could explore whether there are additional ways in which apologies matter. One way to do so might be to focus on other audiences than the ones the apologies are directly meant for. For example, exploring effects on third-party audiences that belong neither to the apologizing nor the victimized states might be fruitful.

References

- Augoustinos, M., Hastie, B., & Wright, M. (2011). Apologizing for historical injustice: Emotion, truth and identity in political discourse. Discourse and Society, 22(5), 507–531.
- Barkan, E. (2000). The guilt of nations. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Barkan, E., & Karn, A. (2006). Group apology as an ethical imperative. In E. Barkan & A. Karn (Eds.), Taking
- wrongs seriously: Apologies and reconciliation* (pp. 3–32). Palo Alto: Stanford University Press.
- Berger, T. U. (1998). Cultures of antimilitarism: National security in Germany and Japan. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Brooks, R. L. (1999). The age of apology. In R. L. Brooks (Ed.), When sorry isn't enough: The controversy over apologies and reparations for human injustice (pp. 2–21). New York: New York University Press.
- Coicaud, J.-M. (2009). Apology: A small yet important part of justice. Japanese Journal of Political Science, 10(1), 93–123.
- Cunningham, M. (2008). “It wasn't us and we didn't benefit”: The discourse of opposition to an apology by Britain for its role in the slave trade. The Political Quarterly, 79(2), 252–259.
- Daase, C., Engert, S., Horelt, M.-A., Renner, J., & Strassner, R. (2016). Apology and reconciliation in international relations: The importance of being sorry. London: Routledge.
- Gibney, M., Howard-Hassmann, R. E., Coicaud, J.-M., & Steiner, N. (Eds.). (2008). The age of apology: Facing up to the past. Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia Press.
- Gries, P. H., & Peng, K. (2002). Culture clash? Apologies East and West. Journal of Contemporary China, 11(30), 173–178.
- Gustafsson, K. (2015). Identity and recognition: Remembering and forgetting the post-war in Sino-Japanese relations. The Pacific Review, 28(1), 117–138.
- Gustafsson, K. (2016). Routinised recognition and anxiety: Understanding the deterioration in Sino-Japanese relations. Review of International Studies, 42(4), 613–633.
- Gustafsson, K. (2020). Temporal othering, de-securitisation and apologies: Understanding Japanese security policy change. Journal of International Relations and Development, 23(3), 511–534.
- Hughes, C. W. (2015). Japan's foreign and security policy under the 'Abe doctrine': New dynamism or dead end? New York: Palgrave.
- Kampf, Z. (2009). The age of apology: Evidence from the Israeli public discourse. Social Semiotics, 19(3), 257–273.
- Kampf, Z., & Löwenheim, N. (2012). Rituals of apology in the global arena. Security Dialogue, 43(1), 43–60.
- Katzenstein, P. J. (1996). Cultural norms and national security: Police and military in postwar Japan. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Koizumi, J. (2005). Speech by H.E. Junichiro Koizumi, Prime Minister of Japan. <http://www.mofa.go.jp/region/asia-paci/meet0504/speech.html>. Accessed 26 June 2021.
- Langenbacher, E. (2010). Collective memory as a factor in political culture and international relations. In E. Langenbacher & Y. Shain (Eds.), Power and the Past: Collective Memory and International Relations (pp. 13–49). Washington D.C.: Georgetown University Press.
- Lazare, A. (2005). On Apology. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Lind, J. (2008). Sorry states: Apologies in international politics. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Löwenheim, N. (2009). A haunted past: Requesting forgiveness for wrongdoing in international relations. Review of International Studies, 35(3), 531–555.
- Luke, A. (1997). The material effects of the word: Apologies, “stolen children” and public discourse. Discourse: Studies in the Cultural Politics of Education, 18(3), 343–368.
- Murata, K. (1998). Has he apologized or not? A cross-cultural misunderstanding between the UK and Japan on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of VJ day in Britain. Pragmatics, 8(4), 501–513.
- O’Neill, B. (1999). Honor, symbols, and war. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Oros, A. L. (2008). Normalizing Japan: Politics, security, and the evolution of security practice. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Renner, J. (2010). “I’m sorry for apologising”: Czech and German apologies and their perlocutionary effects. Review of International Studies, 37(4), 1579–1597.
- Tavuchis, N. (1991). Mea culpa: A sociology of apology and reconciliation. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Weyeneth, R. (2001). The power of apology and the process of historical reconciliation. The Public Historian, 23(3), 9–38.
- Wilson, E. K., & Bleiker, R. (2014). Performing political apologies. In E. Resende & D. Budryte (Eds.), Memory and trauma in International Relations: Theories, cases and debates (pp. 42–56). London: Routledge.
- Yamazaki, J. W. (2006). Japanese apologies for World War II: A rhetorical study. London: Routledge.

Hugo Grotius

► Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Sandra Milena Rios Oyola
 Institut de sciences politiques Louvain-Europe
 (ISPOLE), Université catholique de Louvain, Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium

Synonyms

Autonomy, Agency, Dignification, Good life, Right to have rights

Definition

The idea of human dignity entails that humans have inherent and equal value due to the mere fact of being humans. This worth is unconditional, equal, and universal. Human dignity is an idea found at the core of human rights, and it has been recognized as a value and a right in diverse constitutions across the world. Human rights are a social practice and effective means to protect human dignity (Donnelly 2007). Human dignity is the ground to define what it means to live a life worth of living by humans; in a sense it is the definition of humanity in itself.

People who have suffered grave human rights violations have had their dignity violated, although it has not necessarily been lost. Transitional justice is an attempt to deal with violent and atrocious pasts by providing mechanisms of redress for victims. This includes truth commissions, criminal prosecutions, reparation programs, memorialization efforts, and other measures used to address large-scale or systematic violations in the wake of mass violence. Transitional justice offers an important toolkit of mechanisms that can help restore the human dignity of victims. Victims’ demand for human dignity points at their claim for recognition of their humanity as equal citizens. This entry explains the uses of the concept of human dignity in transitional justice, with particular reference to truth commissions and reparations.

Introduction

After the Second World War, human dignity became a fundamental legal concept. European constitutions sought to prevent the resurgence of totalitarianism by emphasizing that individuals should receive certain core protections from the state. For instance, the German Basic Law of 1949 presents human dignity both as a principle and as a right ensured by the state, declaring in Art. 1.1 that “human dignity shall be inviolable. To respect and protect it shall be the duty of all state authority.” Further, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights made the relationship between human rights and human dignity explicit; it recognizes “the inherent dignity and . . . the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family,” as well as states in Art. 1 that “All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.” Today, over 150 constitutions recognize the right to dignity and several international treaties refer to human dignity in their bodies or preambles.

Transitional justice, as it is understood today, emerged in the late 1980s to mid-1990s as a way to signal a new type of human rights activity (Arthur 2009; Bell 2009). Transitional justice is the product of attentive consideration on how to deal with human rights violations and political violence in societies undergoing some form of transition (Nagy 2008). Transitional justice is also deeply intertwined with the field of human rights. It is logical then that human dignity plays a prominent role in the scholarship and practice of transitional justice. The protection and restoration of human dignity is considered to be paramount in the policies of reconciliation, transition, and peace (Rosoux and Anstey 2017). Similar assertions can be found in Louis Joinet’s report on the “Principles against impunity,” (UNHCR 2005): “Collectively, symbolic measures – annual homage to the victims or public recognition by the State of its responsibility, for example – besides helping to restore victims’ dignity, also help to discharge the duty of remembrance” (my emphasis). However, contrary to fields such as constitutional law and human rights, the meaning and the role of human dignity in transitional justice has seldom been interrogated.

Human dignity can be defined as simply as “the equal treatment and respect of human beings due to the fact of being human,” but the materialization of human dignity as a principle, norm, or right to be protected is more complex than that simple definition. The protection of human dignity challenges a consensus over its conceptualization amid international and domestic courts (Dupré 2015; Rosen 2012; Waldron 2012). Human dignity as a constitutional value requires that the state ensures its protection and realization. Additionally, many modern constitutions recognize human dignity as a constitutional right, “The constitutional right to dignity is intended to ensure human beings’ political and civil liberties as well as their social and economic freedoms” (Barak 2015, p. 367). Courts invoking human dignity have used different versions of the concept, for example, “dignity may be considered part of autonomy, liberty, equality or respect—values that will often be irreconcilable” (Rao 2008, p. 208). Contrary to the uses of human dignity in constitutional law, the treatment of human dignity within transitional justice is more focused on its restoration than on its protection, with the exception of the protection of the dignity of the victims involved in testimonials in truth commissions and reparation mechanisms, in an attempt to avoid their revictimization.

This entry explains the uses of the concept of human dignity in transitional justice, with particular reference to truth commissions and reparations. The reason for observing these two particular mechanisms is because in contrast to the rest of the mechanisms such as trials, vetting, or amnesties, reparations and truth commissions focus on the victims. The entry discusses how this concept has been used in the transitional justice process in Colombia, following the Victims and Restitution of Land Law in 2005 and the peace accord between the FARC guerrillas and the government in 2016 as well as mentions to other internationally prominent transitions.

The Uses of Human Dignity Amid Transitional Justice

Transitional justice measures are established to deal with the legacy of past atrocities amid political transition. Transitional justice includes governmental and non-governmental policies and mechanisms that aim to bring justice, truth, reparations, and warranties of non-repetition. Although some scholars contend that these practices date back centuries ago (Elster 2004), they have only been systematically applied, at times as a toolbox to different sociopolitical contexts, since the 1980s, with a rapid surge in the creation of truth commissions in the 1990s (Teitel 2014). Truth commissions, memorials, and reparations not only seek to recognize the indignities suffered by the victims of violence but to restore victims' human dignity.

For instance, the Guatemalan Commission for Historical Clarification claims that:

There is no doubt that the truth is of benefit to everyone, both victims and transgressors. The victims, whose past has been degraded and manipulated, will be dignified; the perpetrators, through the recognition of their immoral and criminal acts, will be able to recover the dignity of which they had deprived themselves.

Similarly, the final report of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission argues that:

The Commission facilitated the official, public acknowledgement of these violations. In so doing, it sought to restore the dignity of those who had suffered.

Scholarship on reparations and truth commissions has explicitly claimed that transitional justice can restore victims' human dignity and that "by acknowledging suffering and wrongdoing and allowing victims to tell their story it will help restore dignity and assist the healing process" (Lundy 2011, p. 100). These assumptions are repeatedly spread (Nauenberg 2015). For example, claims that public testimonies at South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission "helped people to restore their human dignity" are generally accepted as common wisdom (Castillejo-Cuellar 2007). According to Malamud-Goti and Grosman (2006, p. 541), "in the context of a transitional democracy, the specific goal of compensation to victims of human rights abuse is to restore their dignity and to reintegrate them to civil society as equal citizens." Bernadette Atuahene (2016, p. 796) uses the category of "dignity takings and dignity restoration" in her analysis of land restitution programs for victims of involuntary property loss in South Africa. She defines dignity restoration as the mechanisms that address "deprivations of both property and dignity by providing material compensation to dispossessed populations through processes that affirm their humanity and establish their agency." However, several challenges arise when trying to use this same definition to address nonmaterial loss, such as death, disappearance of bodies, or torture.

Meanings of Human Dignity

For the purpose of the present discussion, the meanings of human dignity are divided in two sets. The first set of meanings highlights the dimension of human dignity as a universal justification for the protection of human rights. The second set of meanings emphasizes the meaning of human dignity in everyday life and is dependent on particular sociocultural contexts.

According to the first set, human rights should be protected because humans have a special place in the creation, either because they were created in the image of God (religious explanation) or because they are equipped with autonomy and reason (secular explanation). Kant justifies the exceptionality of humans on the basis that, "we – all of us, equally – contain within ourselves the moral law to which we are subject" (Rosen 2012, p. 55). There is something in humans both as an essence and as a status that makes them special and at the same time equal. Waldron (2012, p. 33) explains this argument as follows: "the modern notion of human dignity involves an upwards equalization of rank, so that we now try to accord to every human being something of the dignity, ranks, and expectation of respect that was formerly accorded to nobility." Although this is an important discussion in philosophy and law, it is not as relevant in the context of societies in transition or post-atrocity societies, which are more concerned with the realization of human dignity and its restoration than on debates about the meaning or origin of human dignity.

Questions about the origin of human dignity are neither a strong priority nor self-evident in the aftermath of conflict or authoritarian regimes. Instead, transitional justice is concerned with the question of how to restore victims' human dignity. For some victims, the inherent value and worth of people is not lost even after experiencing the worst circumstances, what is lost is the social regarding of their human dignity. The social and relational dimension of human dignity is the locus of victims' claims in the context of transitional justice. This dimension has two sociocultural components, the emotional (cultural) and the relational (social).

Although there are legal definitions for “the right to lead a life in keeping with human dignity” (see the Belgian constitution, art. 23), debates about undignified and inhumane treatment (Buyse 2016), as well as for the violation of human dignity, the definition of human dignity is not only a philosophical or legal problem. The everyday understanding of human dignity is based on cultural notions of humiliation and social recognition.

The cultural dimension of human dignity reflects emotions and feelings that are culturally constructed (Fierke 2015). For instance, the term Agaciro is a word in Kinyarwanda that denotes dignity. It has been used as a form to create an idea of a “New Rwanda”; therefore it not only has a cultural but also a political dimension. This cultural aspect of human dignity allows us to understand certain crimes in the light of what they culturally mean for the victims, for instance, how the desecration of a body is a way of harming somebody's dignity, and the challenge to restore their dignity in the aftermath (Bolin 2019).

Dignity or lack of dignity is related to the emotion of humiliation, humiliation as the denial of a mutual sense of worth (Hicks 2011). The cultural element of human dignity refers to the feeling of “inherent value and worth” that people experience (Hicks 2011, p. 6). This is not an existential or a philosophical definition as much as a feeling or an emotion that is materialized in social norms and behaviors. When victims claim that their dignity has been violated or that it needs to be restored, they mean that those social norms required to be regarded as humans have been broken, and something needs to be done in order to repair them.

The social dimension of Human dignity emphasizes its relational character. This means that the recognition of human dignity goes beyond the personal self-assessment and the individual recognition of self-respect and reaches toward the dignifying dimension as it is constructed through human relationships. According to Llewellyn and Philpott (2014, p. 21), “Dignity is not something that resides in the individual alone. Rather it marks the relationship between and among parties. Dignity refers here to the way in which we are connected with others – that such connections must refer their value.” From this perspective, the violation of human dignity means that there is a rupture in the relationship between people as members of the human family, between victims and perpetrators, but also between perpetrators as members of the human family. In this way, some scholars have argued that perpetrators also lose their dignity through the practice of atrocities. Corrias (2016) commenting on the case of the prisoner, war criminal and former leader in the Khmer Rouge movement, Cambodian Kaing Guek Eav, better known as Duch, claims that “By committing the crimes he has confessed, by dehumanizing his victims and humanity, Duch has dehumanized himself in the sense that he has made himself an outcast of humanity (inhuman, or outsider of humanity).”

Demanding Dignity

The concept of human dignity also becomes relevant in post-conflict contexts when it is used as an umbrella term for bringing together claims of social justice from disenfranchised groups, particularly victims' groups. The use of the language of dignity in relation to the violation of their human, economic, social, and cultural rights serves as a tool for highlighting the urgency and severity of the victims' situation. These demands stress that a minimum of basic conditions need to be achieved in order to live a life worth of human dignity (Nussbaum 2011).

The demand for social recognition goes beyond the self-recognition and includes the claim for political recognition as an equal citizen. This demand points at the need to be regarded in equal terms. This claim is imbued in the principle of equality of access to resources and political rights, but also it demands the equal acknowledgment and status to different identities (Margalit 1996; Taylor 1992). According to Daly and May (2018, p. 3), “Dignity then is both a means (participation itself promotes human dignity) and as an end (democratic participation produces results most likely to advance and enhance human dignity as a substantive matter of lived experience).”

Dignity is built through the demand for rights, and for dignity itself. By highlighting autonomy and agency, the empowerment that results from the claims of citizens, and particularly of victims, they regain their dignity even before their demands are met. The claim for human dignity has become a popular slogan among emancipatory and social movements, and it works as a vehicle that creates empathy and brings together the dispossessed in their fight for freedom, equality, and basic resources (Alhassen and Shihab-Eldin 2012; McCrudden 2013). The demand for human dignity is an implicit claim for equal recognition of their humanity, particularly after living under a political system that has prospered under the denial of their human worth. Regarding dignity from a postcolonial perspective, El Bernoussi (2015) brings important questions about the material aspect of dignity; can dignity be bought? In her research on the Egyptian revolution, she coined the term dignition to explain “mainly a struggle between a seemingly misunderstood dignity, and a need for defiance and recognition” (El Bernoussi 2015, 378).

Dignification of Victims in Colombia

Human dignity plays an important role in the Colombian Constitution. In the context of its transitional justice policies and legislation, the Law of Victims and Land Restitution (2011) created a number of mechanisms intended to repair victims and support the restitution of their land property. Article 4 establishes “Dignity” as one of the general principles of the law, and Article 1 establishes that in addition to the core principles of transitional justice (right to truth, justice, reparation, and nonrecurrence for victims), the goal of the law is:

that their condition of victims is recognized and dignified through the materialization of their constitutional rights. (“dentro de un marco de justicia transicional, que posibiliten hacer efectivo el goce de sus derechos a la verdad, la justicia y la reparación con garantía de no repetición, de modo que se reconozca su condición de víctimas y se dignifique a través de la materialización de sus derechos constitucionales.” (my emphasis))

Article 2 establishes that

... it offers tools [for victims] for them to claim their dignity and take on their citizenship. (“ofreciendo herramientas para que estas reivindiquen su dignidad y asuman su plena ciudadanía.”)

The framework of reparation in Colombia is integral, which means that it includes not only measures of material reparation and distributive justice but also of symbolical redress through restorative justice; “it is about the dignification and restoration of the effective enjoyment of the victims’ fundamental rights.” ((iii) el derecho a la reparación de las víctimas es integral, en la medida en que se deben adoptar distintas medidas determinadas no solo por la justicia distributiva sino también por la justicia restaurativa, en cuanto se trata de la dignificación y restauración plena del goce efectivo de los derechos fundamentales de las víctimas) Similarly, regarding the Truth, Coexistence, and Non-Recurrence Commission, “its main focus is to guarantee the dignification of victims.” (“13. Los procesos de transformación positiva de las organizaciones e instituciones a lo largo del conflicto. Para el logro de los objetivos y del mandato, la Comisión, tiene como eje central asegurar la dignificación de las víctimas y contribuir a la satisfacción de su derecho a la verdad y las garantías de no repetición, bajo los enfoques territorial, diferencial y de género, de conformidad con lo establecido en el Decreto 588 de 2017.” [emphasis added]. <https://comisiondelaverdad.co/la-comision/mandato-y-funciones>)

Up until now, attempts to restore the human dignity of victims have mainly been applied in the context of measures of satisfaction following the United Nations (2005) statement that victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law should receive full and appropriate reparations to nonmaterial harm or harm that cannot be repaired through material means. For example, “the publication of a sentence [that recognizes the responsibility of the state over a criminal act] in official newspapers or other media, is considered [by the Interamerican Court of Human Rights] as an action that can help to dignify the victims” (Gamboa Martínez 2016, p. 16).

Truth-telling and measures to address victims’ memories of harms are also perceived as an outlet for the restoration of victims’ human dignity. For instance, according to the 1448 Law, the Historical Memory National Center (Centro Nacional de Memoria Histórica, CNMH) should create a National Memory Museum that should develop actions that can reestablish victims’ dignity and spread the truth about what happened. Similarly, different attempts by the CNMH seek to emphasize the memory of the active engagement and resistance of civilians and victims amid conflict. There is an assumption that highlighting the positive and resilient actions of victims is a way of inscribing their narratives into the collective memory of the conflict in Colombia (see CNMH 2013).

Summary

Human dignity is a legal concept that has become increasingly recognized by national constitutions and international treaties. It has been amply understood as a justification for human rights. Additionally, the demand for human dignity has been a call for social justice and recognition by emancipatory movements across the world. The idea of human dignity has been included in transitional justice measures to justify the transformation of a political system that requires stronger support for human rights and prompt a social transformation that recognizes all members of society as equal and worthy of rights. Transitional justice has mainly focused on the restoration of the human dignity of victims and the reincorporation of perpetrators into civilian life, who also have the opportunity to restore their own dignity that was violated through the enactment of atrocities. While victims have not entirely lost their human dignity, the social relationships that ensure the recognition of their worth has been broken. Memorials, truth commission, apologies, and other measures can help restore victims’ dignity. However, further research on the local and cultural meanings of human dignity and dignification is required. The focus on the Colombian case presented in this entry, shows the challenges for operationalizing and materializing the demand and the right to dignity in a post-conflict setting.

References

- Alhassen, M., & Shihab-Eldin, A. (Eds.). (2012). Demanding dignity: Young voices from the front lines of the arab revolutions (I speak for myself series). Ashland: White Cloud Press.
- Arthur, P. (2009). How “transitions” reshaped human rights: A conceptual history of transitional justice. Human Rights Quarterly, 31, 321–367.
- Atuahene, B. (2016). Dignity takings and dignity restoration: Creating a new theoretical framework for understanding involuntary property loss and the remedies required. Law & Social Inquiry, 41(4), 796–823. <https://doi.org/10.1111/lsi.12249>.
- Barak, A. (2015). Human dignity: The constitutional value and the constitutional right. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bell, C. (2009). Transitional justice, Interdisciplinarity and the state of the ‘field’ or ‘non-field’. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 3(1), 5–27. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ijtj/ijn044>.
- Bolin, A. (2019). Dignity in death and life: Negotiating Agaciro for the nation in preservation practice at Nyamata genocide memorial, Rwanda. Anthropological Quarterly, 92(2), 345–374. <https://doi.org/10.1353/anq.2019.0018>.
- Buyse, A. (2016, octobre 21). The role of human dignity in ECHR Case-Law. Consulté 25 janvier 2019, à l’adresse ECHR BLOG website: <http://echrblog.blogspot.com/2016/10/the-role-of-human-dignity-in-echr-case.html>
- Castillejo-Cuellar, A. (2007). Knowledge, experience, and South Africa’s scenarios of forgiveness. Radical History Review, 2007(97), 11–42. <https://doi.org/10.1215/01636545-2006-011>.
- CNMH, Comisión Nacional de Reparación y Reconciliación (Colombia) (Éd.). (2013). ¡Basta ya! Colombia, memorias de guerra y dignidad: Informe general (Segunda edición corregida). Bogotá: Centro Nacional de Memoria Histórica.

- Corrias, L. (2016). Crimes against humanity, dehumanization and rehumanization: Reading the case of Duch with Hannah Arendt. Canadian Journal of Law & Jurisprudence, 29(2), 351–370. <https://doi.org/10.1017/cjlj.2016.15>.
- Daly, E., & May, J. (2018, September 20). A primer for dignity rights. International Juriste. Available at SSRN: <https://ssrn.com/abstract=3252694>
- Donnelly, J. (2007). The relative universality of human rights. Human Rights Quarterly, 29(2), 281–306. <https://doi.org/10.1353/hrq.2007.0016>.
- Dupré, C. (2015). The age of dignity: Human rights and constitutionalism in Europe. Oxford/Portland: Hart Publishing.
- El Bernoussi, Z. (2015). The postcolonial politics of dignity: From the 1956 Suez nationalization to the 2011 revolution in Egypt. International Sociology, 30(4), 367–382.
- Elster, J. (2004). Closing the books: Transitional justice in historical perspective. Cambridge, UK/New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Fierke, K. M. (2015). Human dignity, basal emotion and a global emotionology. In L. Åhäll & T. Gregory (Eds.), Emotions, politics and war (pp. 45–57). Bosa Roca, United States: Routledge.
- Gamboa Martínez, M. F. (2016). Análisis de las Medidas de Satisfacción en el Marco del Programa de Reparación Colectiva implementado con la comunidad del corregimiento de Pueblo Bello, Turbo – Antioquia. Periodo 2012–2016 (Departamento de Ciencias Jurídicas y Políticas). Bogotá: Universidad Santo Tomás.
- Hicks, D. (2011). Dignity: The essential role it plays in resolving conflict. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Llewellyn, J. J., & Philpott, D. (Ed.). (2014). Restorative justice and reconciliation: Twin frameworks for peacebuilding. Restorative justice, reconciliation, and peacebuilding. Oxford/New York: Oxford University Press.
- Lundy, P. (2011). Paradoxes and challenges of transitional justice at the ‘local’ level: Historical enquiries in Northern Ireland. Contemporary Social Science, 6(1), 89–105. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17450144.2010.534495>.
- Malamud-Goti, J. E., & Grosman, L. S. (2006). Reparations and civil litigation: Compensation for human rights violations in transitional democracies. Consulté à l’adresse. <http://www.oxfordscholarship.com/peacepalace.idm.oclc.org/view/10.1093/0199291926.001.0001/acprof-9780199291922-chapter-16>
- Margalit, A. (1996). The decent society. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- McCrudden, C. (2013). In pursuit of human dignity: An introduction to current debates. In C. McCrudden (Ed.), Understanding human dignity (pp. 1–58). Oxford: British Academy.
- Nagy, R. (2008). Transitional justice as global project: Critical reflections. Third World Quarterly, 29(2), 275–289. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436590701806848>.
- Nauenberg, S. (2015). Spreading the truth: How truth commissions address human rights abuses in the world society. International Sociology, 30(6). <https://doi.org/10.1177/0268580915605647>.
- Nussbaum, M. C. (2011). Creating capabilities. The human development approach. Cambridge, MA/London: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Rao, N. (2008). On the Use and Abuse of Dignity in Constitutional Law. Columbia Journal of European Law, 14(2), 201–256. Spring; George Mason Law & Economics Research Paper No. 08-34. Available at SSRN: <https://ssrn.com/abstract=1144856>.
- Rosen, M. (2012). Dignity: Its history and meaning. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Rosoux, V., & Anstey, M. (2017). Negotiating reconciliation in peacemaking: Quandaries of relationship building. Cham: Springer.
- Taylor, C. (1992). Multiculturalism and the politics of recognition: An essay by Charles Taylor (1st ed.). Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Teitel, R. G. (2014). Globalizing transitional justice: Contemporary essays. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- United Nations (2005) Updated Set of principles for the protection and promotion of human rights through action to combat impunity (E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1) https://www.un.org/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=E/CN.4/2005/102/Add.1
- UNHCR. (2005). Basic principles and guidelines on the right to a remedy and reparation for victims of gross violations of international human rights law and serious violations of international humanitarian law adopted and proclaimed by General Assembly resolution 60/147 of 16 December 2005. <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/RemedyAndReparation.aspx>
- Waldron, J. (2012). Dignity, rank and rights. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Human Geography and Peacebuilding

Susan Forde
University of York, York, UK

Synonyms

Space, place, and peacebuilding; Spatial agency; Spatial analysis

Definition

Peacebuilding as a concept, and a spatial and social process, is rooted in human geography. This entry looks at the interconnectedness of human geography and peacebuilding and how this has advanced understandings of peace (building). Through this, the chapter demonstrates the long-standing spatial nature of the field though this has developed more so in recent years. Notably, this advancement has been preceded by closer attention paid to bottom-up initiatives which contribute to, and establish conditions of, peace. Such localized spaces have created opportunities beyond elite and international spaces of peacebuilding. Though notably, these spaces have their own accessibility issues. International peacebuilding efforts characterized by liberal peacebuilding have been marked by a lack of effectiveness through, in some cases, a replication and maintenance of divisions, spatially and socially. To illustrate the intersection of human geography with peacebuilding, this chapter will use the case studies of South Africa and Bosnia and Herzegovina to illustrate the connection of human geography and peacebuilding. Other relevant case studies will be noted to illustrate key points.

Introduction

Peacebuilding was first introduced by Johan Galtung in 1976 (298); it involves the establishment of structures which “remove causes of wars and offer alternatives to war in situations where wars might occur.” As Galtung observes, in the opening paragraph of the work, geographical distance and topography have long served as a tool for classical approaches to peace in international relations (1976, p. 282). Peacebuilding is enacted on multiple levels, from the interpersonal to interstate, in the broad spectrum of the field of peacebuilding. The term was formalized as a process within the UN through the 1992 An Agenda for Peace written by former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali which set out that peacebuilding would “identify and support structures, which will tend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid a relapse into conflict” (Boutros-Ghali 1992, p. 6). The Brahimi Report released in 2000 sought to move peacebuilding as a concept and a process forward to encompass that which provides the “the foundations of peace and provide the tools for building on those foundations something that is more than just the absence of war” (Brahimi 2000, p. 3). A few months later in 2000, UN Security Council Resolution 1325 was passed which was a landmark resolution on the inclusivity of women in all spheres of peacebuilding (UN SC RES 1325: 2000). This has been followed by reports which refine focus on localized approaches and those which further advance the involvement of women in peacebuilding.

Critically, peace means different things to different people and is experienced differently dependent on positionalities. In “Letter from a Birmingham Jail” written by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr in 1963, King Jr observes the structural violence and maintenance of the status quo which the “White moderate” facilitate in the fight for social justice and racial equality. According to King Jr, the White moderate is “more devoted to “order” than to justice; [and] prefers a negative peace which is the absence of tension to a positive peace which is the presence of justice.” King Jr’s conceptualization of what peace means socially alongside Galtung’s 1969 theorization of positive and negative peace (the latter being merely the cessation of violence and the former being a situation in which individuals could experience a fulfilled life in Galtung’s conceptualization) allows us to think critically about what peace looks like and how peace manifests differently depending on positionalities. In relation to peacebuilding as a concept, positive peace is the condition wherein peacebuilding occurs and can be most effective. These understandings of what peace is and how peace may be built can be thought of in combination with Lederach’s (2003) work on conflict transformation. Through this concept, Lederach (2003) frames conflict as that which is part of everyday life and can be transformed for the improvement of relations. Lederach (2003, p. 12, 7) deploys a spatial metaphor to address the context and layers of conflict, which create the ““topography” a relief map of the peaks and valleys,” essential to understanding how peacebuilding may occur.

Human geography is the study of people and their spatial surroundings. It is an area of study which covers the broad relationship between humans and geography. The growth of intersections between human geography and peace and conflict studies is demonstrable due to the intrinsic link between lived environment and human relations. Peace and conflict studies have always been spatial in nature, and human geography has long explored different types of conflict (Williams et al. 2014, p. 7). The variety of spaces which interact with war and peace are broad, as both place and war are created through human movement and use of space (Flint 2005, p. 5) and war transforms place. Notably, there is a range of spaces in which humans interact with the lived environment and in which social constructions dictate movement or create conflict, for example, water resources, land, migration and movement, urban and rural spaces, and the relations that spatially manifest therein. In researching these areas and others, geography scholars have been part of widening the scope of the field of peacebuilding. This has been a recent development as Koopman observed in 2011 (193) peace was not central in any way in geography despite critical geography largely being “about and for peace.” Part of the contribution which geographers have made involves the critique of liberal forms of peacebuilding through “deconstructing normative assumptions about peace and in exploring peace as situated knowledges within different cultural settings” (Williams et al. 2014, p. 11). This localization of understanding peace is a central contribution to the development of peacebuilding research.

Spatial Dimensions of Peace and Conflict

Conflict, in all its forms, interpersonal, intercommunal, and interstate, is spatial in nature and complex in its origin and form. The post-Cold War era saw the rise of intrastate violence incited under the mask of ethnic tensions. Interstate conflicts, such as the Bosnian War, the Rwandan genocide, and the Sri Lankan Civil War, among many others, were characterized by displacement, ethnic cleansing, and genocide. Such types of violence are spatial, involving the mobilization of persons through evoking narratives of ownership over space and stoking tensions regarding resources and space. In more recent years, there has been rise in the popularity and visibility of right-wing nationalist politics, and siege mentality focused around state borders has been used to solidify political control through fueling fear and inciting violence (e.g., the USA). This is illustrative of the use of socially constructed understandings of space and statehood to restrict or legitimize movement (Foucault 1976). Such spatially orientated narratives center on “imagined geographies” (Said 1979, p. 49) and “imagined communities” (Anderson 2006, p. 6). These imagined socio-spatialities create temporally and physically static perceptions of place.

As explored by Massey in Space, Place, and Gender (1994), space is constructed through intersections of identity and social relations. In this work, Massey (1994, p. 5) proposes a reimagining of place identities as that which are “always unfixed, contested and multiple.” It is through understanding place identities in this way that the narratives of place as belonging exclusively to “internal histories or to timeless identities” may be deconstructed (1994, p. 5). Therein altering narratives around place identity can impact on how peace is built and aligns well with the concept of conflict transformation through the dynamism inherent in social ideas of space and social relations.

Case Studies

South Africa was colonized by Dutch, and British forces who exploited the land and oppressed the Indigenous population. The 1913 Natives Land Act facilitated the displacement of Black populations to townships and reduced the space available to this majority group. Following this, in the mid-1900s, the racist apartheid government expanded the project of displacement and regulation of movement furthering racialised spatial restrictions through multiple laws including those which restricted education, work conditions, and political representation, alongside marital and sexual relations. The displacement of Black but also Indian and Colored (as defined and described by the South African government) communities led to an expansion of townships and enforced separateness of public spaces. After a long civil rights fight against the oppressive apartheid state violence, in 1994 the apartheid era officially ended with the transition to democracy. However, the large-scale inequalities fostered by the apartheid government were spatially maintained. This was compounded by a lack of reparations through the Transitional Justice process, and a lack of social support for marginalized communities, resulting in a transgenerational continuation of the inequalities established during the era of apartheid.

Since the formal end of apartheid, the population of townships has expanded. This has led to a splitting of access to basic resources such as water and electricity, and an increase in informal settlements which are more vulnerable to poor weather conditions or removal and displacement by government officials. Furthermore, in Cape Town, one of the most divided large cities in South Africa, the inequalities created by apartheid and maintained in the post-apartheid era have led to an increase in gang violence which has resulted in murder statistics which are comparable to war zones (Merrington 2018). The widespread physical violence is paralleled by widespread structural violence (Galtung 1990) which has resulted in the maintenance of separate schools, long commutes for those living in townships, and unequal opportunities for Black, Colored, and other minority ethnic groups. This maintains the economic violence created by apartheid's spatial and structural divides, which preserves socioeconomic divides and perpetuates inequality transgenerationally.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

In 1963 the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY) was established, under the leadership of Josip Broz Tito, who enforced a narrative of Yugoslavian identity through “brotherhood and unity.” Following the death of Tito, the “imagined geography” (Said 1979, p. 49) and imagined community (Anderson 2006, p. 6) of SFRY began to crumble. The economic turmoil that followed led to a rise in nationalism which manifested along ethno-nationalist lines and resulted in numerous states declaring independence. In 1991 ethnic violence erupted in the former Yugoslavia, stoked by elite actors creating a climate of misinformation and fear. Plans to divide Bosnia and Herzegovina were already underway by Slobodan Milosević and Franjo Tudman, Serb and Croat leaders, respectively. This resulted in the Bosnian War, during which there was a widespread use of rape as a weapon of war, ethnic cleansing, displacement, and detention, alongside the destruction of cultural heritage and the social fabric of the spaces and places where violence occurred. The Dayton Agreement in 1995 brought an end to the conflict through spatially dividing the contested territory. The Agreement established two separate spatial entities, the Federation of Herzegovina and the Republika Srpska and separately the Brcko District.

These conflict divisions still permeate everyday life in Bosnia and Herzegovina, such as in the divided schooling system which frequently operates as separate schools for the main ethnic groups, Bosniak, Croat, and Serb. The resulting effect is that children learn three different histories through ethno-nationalistically charged textbooks. The division also manifests at a local-spatial level, in divided cities (see section “Divided Cities”), such as Sarajevo and Mostar, among others. Over 20 years on from the end of the Bosnian War, the result of these maintained divisions is the transgenerational perpetuation of narratives of division, of movement, and of the heritage and ownership of space.

The two case study examples, South Africa and Bosnia and Herzegovina, though different in their spatial context and histories, demonstrate the spatial nature of conflict, and the ineffectiveness of top-down orientated “peace” agreements. In combination, the stagnant and maintained nature of divisions in these two very different spatial contexts demonstrates a lack of peacebuilding, as the structures which created the conditions for war and conflict are replicated.

Divided Cities

Due to economic, social, and cultural, and spatial practices, all cities can be considered divided. This is observable globally and can be seen to take different forms. For example, the Grenfell Tower disaster in 2017 demonstrated the catastrophic variability of quality of housing in one of the most affluent parts of Central London. While all cities are divided in some way, the divided city classification is one which represents a significant socio-spatial divide that perpetuates divides established through large-scale violence, physical, cultural, or structural, though the three are often intertwined (Galtung 1990). The divide may be immediate; for example, in some areas of Cape Town, gated communities exist opposite informal settlements. Comparative to the pools and luxury housing on one side, communities living in informal settlements experience restricted access to basic rights such as water, electricity, and proper housing. Such inequality, which is racialized, perpetuates and maintains the divide created under the apartheid government and acts as a barrier to peacebuilding initiatives, as structures which prevent conflict are not in place. Rather, the unequal system perpetuates social divides and acts as an impediment to building peace.

Other divided cities, such as Belfast and Mostar, are also spatially divided, with separate schooling spaces facilitating the transgenerational maintenance of the conflict divisions. In focus, the city of Mostar has been divided between East and West, since the onset of the 1992–1995 Bosnian War. It is a city which has suffered significant violence and destruction of cultural heritage during the war, including the destruction of Stari Most, an Ottoman era bridge. Following the conflict, and at the hand of various international institutional efforts to mitigate political relations, the jurisdictional divisions of the city were enshrined in the constitution of the city. Such spatially based measures replicate divisions of the conflict and demonstrate the lack of social structure-building necessary to transform social divisions of a conflict.

Fundamentally, while the spaces mentioned here are not considered spaces of violent conflict, due to different top-down agreements, it can be observed that they are very much spaces which would benefit from peacebuilding. In such spaces where the state is stagnated structurally, localized forms of peacebuilding can create opportunities which allow for conflict tensions to be mediated or diffused. Therefore, in such contexts we can look closer at localized and bottom-up responses to divisions in order to explore how and if people living in these spaces experience peace.

Space, Place, and Peacebuilding

In 1991 radical critical geographer, Doreen Massey, set out the impact of space and place identity in relation to movement and globalization. Massey (1991, p. 26) observed that while expedited global flows created wider and more frequent use of space, they also restricted and “effectively imprisoned” others through the nexus of space and global flows of capital. Understandings of space have historically been centered around space as empty, and as a vacuum, devoid of meaning (Foucault 1980, p. 177) and space has been analytically marginalised (Gupta Ferguson 1992, p. 7). However, it is notable that place but also space is imbued with complex social relations and therefore essential to consider in peacebuilding. In particular, place is something which we derive formalized sources of identity from, such as passports, which dictate the spaces and places that we have access to (dependent on statehood and the interrelation of this with other states which can impede or expedite movement across borders).

While we live in a world characterized by sharpening borders and walls, socially led initiatives which provide the preconditions for peacebuilding, those rooted in social justice, operate transnationally and are frequently borderless. Increasingly, global movements, such as those tackling violence against women, racial inequality, and the global environmental crisis, have manifested as cross-border protests through resistance to oppressive hegemonies. Such protests and resistance are created in an effort to establish conditions that allow for individuals to live a fulfilled life, which can be considered a process of peacebuilding.

Notably, place is created through shared understandings of what space is and by proxy what it is not; however this will never be a uniform experience. We can therefore say that ideas and understandings of place are built out of conflict. This is a continuous struggle which may or may not be violent (Mitchell 2011, p. 7). As citizens seek to re-negotiate spatial realities of the every day, there may be a conflict of understanding which may involve structures of power. For example, protest is a spatial conflict; it involves the visibility of individuals; it may be for liberation and progress (environmental marches, anti-war) or oppression (far right, fascist marches). Protest are often anti-governmental, which can result in intrastate violence as can be seen in the 2011–2014 Egyptian revolution, 2014 Ukrainian revolution, or the 2019- ongoing protests in Hong Kong, alongside many more occurrences. Therefore, returning to what Martin Luther King Jr set out in 1963, it can be observed that some protests aim to establish positive peace as the presence of justice, and this may involve “tension.”

Spaces of Peacebuilding and “The Local”

Notably, within the field of peace and conflict studies, understandings of what peace is and how peace is experienced differ depending on the positionality of the individual. As Koopman (2017, p. 4976) observes, the variability of what peace means is space-time dependent, “peace means different things at different scales, as well as to different groups and at different times and places.” Critically, it can be observed that the concept of peace has long been an elite and temporal experience. State violence, marginalization, racism, homophobia, transphobia, and xenophobia, among others have long made peaceful space, that which is distinctively dangerous and conflictual, for individuals who face oppression of their identity or intersecting identities (Crenshaw 1989). In focus, our experience of space is a temporal and a spatial intersection, which is influenced by our positionality.

It can be observed that peacebuilding as a process is a spatial conflict and, indeed historically, has operated as a process which instils peace top-down, on instead of in communities. While top-down peace agreements create important conditions, for example, for the cessation of violence and recognition of statehood (Caspersen 2011, 2016; Visoka 2018), such agreements frequently overlook the space of the every day. And as can be seen from the two case studies, the top-down form of peacebuilding has, typically, replicated conflict divisions spatially. This form of peacebuilding, though successful in some spaces, has a poor track record of transforming communities and the conflict narrative and conflict divisions. Such issues with top-down peacebuilding have led to a reorientation toward bottom-up peacebuilding and to the everyday spatial experience of peacebuilding, or “the local turn.”

The local turn describes a refocusing of peace and conflict studies to the level of the every day as part of a larger critical turn in the field (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Richmond et al. 2015). It is a development of peace and conflict studies which focuses on bottom-up peacebuilding, as peace which is established locally. The local turn focuses on local understandings of peace; this has been advanced by “the spatial turn” to include analysis of space and place. Such spatially based analysis, in combination with a critical view of the interplay of structure and agency, can help develop understanding of the interactivity of the “structures of war and peace, as well as the role of individual and collective actors to either engrain them, or to put them openly in to question” (Björkdahl and Kappler 2017, p. 137). This chapter uses the term local to refer to residents of the space of focus, as in those who use the space frequently. It is worth noting that “the local” is not a cure-all for intergroup tensions and may replicate uneven and oppressive power relations. Notably, localized approaches to peace and reconciliation may exclude marginalized groups, for example, women (see chapter “► Gender Justice and Peacebuilding”), or minority groups. This may also exclude youth, working class communities, ethnic or religious groups, individuals from the LGBTIQ+ community (see chapter “► LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding”), elderly people, or people with health conditions or impairments. And of course, this list is not exhaustive and could include intersections of the aforementioned identities, creating significant non-spatial barriers to engagement in peacebuilding in local settings.

However, beyond locally established spaces of peace, localized peacebuilding or everyday peace (see chapter “► Everyday Peace”) occurs in daily geographies, for example, malls, parks, and schools (Kappler 2014; Mac Ginty 2014; Björkdahl 2015; Forde 2018). A closer exploration of the narratives of post-conflict space allows researchers to better understand how residents experience everyday spaces and what this means for peacebuilding. Such developments have the potential to further advance localized understandings of peace and conflict from a participatory approach. Mac Ginty and Firchow’s (2014) work on “everyday peace indicators” demonstrates this through facilitating respondents to define their own experience of peace as a highly localized experience. As observed through earlier case study examples, peace agreements can reaffirm the territorial divisions of the conflict, maintaining the divisive narrative through schooling and homogenous, isolated, communities. It is in such spaces that the utility of human geography informed understandings of space can be of benefit. The refocusing toward the spatial every day entails an exploration of agency and movement.

Notably, traditional understandings of space and place have been informed by top-down understandings of how individuals use space. For example, colonial maps and engineering of space have created the conditions wherein former use of space is drastically reorganized along new power nexuses, creating conflict over understandings of the heritage and use of space. As part of the local turn and the spatial turn in peace and conflict studies, academics and practitioners working in post-conflict space, informed by the fields of anthropology, sociology, psychology, and human geography, have looked toward the agency of local actors as a form of peacebuilding and the transformation of social relations (see chapter “► Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation”) (Kappler 2014; Björkdahl and Kappler 2017).

Agency is as framed by Giddens (1984, p. 14) as the capability of an individual to “make a difference.” In structurally oppressive spaces, wherein top-down peacebuilding (or top-down governance) has established divisive structures which govern everyday movement, and/or the liveability of space, agency has the potential to build everyday peace. Notably, some local actors reinforce the status quo in post-conflict divided spaces, but there are individuals which traverse top-down understandings and conceptualizations of post-conflict spaces. It is the latter which local, and critical peace and conflict studies focus on and through this focus demonstrate the agentive capabilities of local actors to engage in peacebuilding at an everyday level. This may occur in public, through movement, use of space, and the establishment of local shared spaces, or may occur in private spaces through socialization; both of these broad spaces facilitate the transformation of trans-generational narratives of peace and conflict. Theoretically and empirically, a range of authors have engaged with the social use of space in post-conflict or post-violence spaces, including but not limited to Björkdahl and Gusic (2013), Carabelli (2018), Kappler (2014), Palmberger (2013), and Vogel (2018). One of the challenges of understanding this type of highly localized movement and use of space is methodological, and this is also an area wherein geography-based methodologies enhance understanding of post-conflict space and the process of peacebuilding.

Methodologies of Place and Space

Understandings of localized everyday peacebuilding have been developed through the application of various spatial and socially based methodologies. Approaches such as walking interviews, mapping, narrative interviews, and others have been used in practitioner and academic research in post-conflict spaces to better understand relations and interactions alongside the use of space.

Sometimes referred to as “the Troubles,” the conflict in Northern Ireland spanned from the 1960s to the late 1990s, ending with the signing of the Good Friday Agreement. The origin of the conflict is rooted in the colonization and governance of the Ireland by British forces, resulting in sectarian violence spanning hundreds of years. Presently, some cities in Northern Ireland remain divided, for example, some areas of Belfast are still divided by “peace” walls. It is due to the close proximity of the communities that the value of investigating the use of social space at an interpersonal and community level is valuable for researchers aiming to understand the post-conflict use of space and post-conflict memory. For example, in Belfast, Switzer and McDowell (2009, p. 337) and separately Murphy and Murtagh (2010, p. 12) have used mapping to better understand community relations and use of space in the city.

Spatial methodologies are also utilized by practitioners and research-based organizations to better understand the social use of space on a micro level and to increase the everyday security and stability for individuals living in vulnerable conditions. For example, in South Africa, the Sustainable Livelihoods Foundation (SLF), among others, works to improve the lives of individuals living in townships in South Africa through research-based advocacy and activism. The organization uses participatory methodologies which are innovative and engaging to better understand local perceptions and use of community space; this includes mapping local space but also the use of photography and participant-led narratives to tell the story of the space (SLF 2016; Brown et al. 2018). Such locally focused research aims to meet some key goals of peacebuilding, though not framed as such, through the increase in the safety and quality of life that residents can enjoy in these spaces. It also creates a platform for residents to express their understandings of space alongside demonstrating the agency that marginalized actors have in oppressive spaces.

In other cities, such as Jerusalem, Raanan and Shoval (2014) have conducted research on movement and use of city space which involved the GPS tracking of participants’ movement; this was compared to mind maps which the participants produced. While in Mostar, Bosnia and Herzegovina, researchers have used walking and mapping methodologies (Carabelli and Zuljevic 2012; Carabelli 2014; Forde 2018, 2019) in researching the use of public space and public memory. Further still, the interdisciplinary nature of understanding post-conflict, space is demonstrated through Djurasovic’s (2016) work on Mostar, rooted in the field of urban planning and design. A wider range of peace and conflict scholars, such as Björkdahl (2015), Björkdahl and Gusic (2013), Hromadžić (2015), Kappler (2014), Laketa and Suleymanova (2017), Palmberger (2013), and Björkdahl and Selimovic (2015), have also engaged in site-specific research in the city in order to better understand how locals negotiate everyday divided geographies. Critically, how we understand peacebuilding at a local level has been advanced and expanded by related fields which concern the spatial including human geography and related fields of urban studies, urban planning and design, sociology, and anthropology, among others. Such localized approaches create the opportunity for bottom-up narratives of peacebuilding to be featured in research and academic work which has previously often structurally excluded and marginalized such voices.

Summary

While human geography is useful for understanding the logistics of peacebuilding on a large scale, it has strong application potential as a tool for understanding bottom-up peacebuilding or everyday spaces of peace. Through interdisciplinary work and peace and conflict literature that explores the spatial and the every day, a greater understanding of the complexity and diversity of experiences in post-conflict space has been achieved in recent years. While the field of peacebuilding has only recently moved toward what is termed the “spatial turn,” it is observable that peacebuilding has always been spatial in nature. Therefore, notably, though peacebuilding has always concerned human geographies, recent developments in the field have compounded the importance of interdisciplinary understandings of what peacebuilding involves, on all spatial scales. As previously explored, conflict may be that which is transformative and resistant to structural oppression and violence; it may therefore in some cases be a process of peacebuilding. Therein spatial insights from the field of human geography have proved invaluable in advancing the understanding researchers have of the use of post-violence and post-conflict space. Through looking closer at the “every day,” researchers can establish a better understanding of peacebuilding at a local level through reimaged understandings of spaces which resist hegemonic power structures.

Cross-References

► Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation

References

- Anderson, B. (2006). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism. London/New York: Verso.
- Björkdahl, A. (2015). ‘Two schools under one roof’ unification in the Divided City of Mostar. In A. Björkdahl & L. Strömbom (Eds.), Divided cities, governing diversity. Lund: Nordic Academic Press.
- Björkdahl, A., & Gusic, I. (2013). The divided city- a space for frictional peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 1(3), 317.
- Björkdahl, A., & Kappler, S. (2017). Peacebuilding and spatial transformation: Peace. In Space and place. Oxon/New York: Routledge.
- Björkdahl, A., & Selimovic, J. M. (2015). A tale of three bridges: Agency and agonism in peace building. Third World Quarterly. <http://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/01436597.2015.110825>. Accessed 12 Feb 2016.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace. https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/files/A_47_277.pdf. Accessed July 2019.
- Brahimi, L. (2000). Report of the panel on United Nations peacekeeping. <https://undocs.org/A/55/305>. Accessed July 2019.
- Brown, K., Bacq, S., & Charman, A. (2018). Supermarkets, informal micro-enterprises and household consumption: An assessment of the food systems implications in the case of Philippi East. Working draft. http://livelihoods.org.za/wp-content/uploads/2018/09/THE-IMPACT-OF-SUPERMARKETS-IN-PHILIPPI-EAST_-_V1.pdf. Accessed July 2019.
- Carabelli, G. (2014). Gdje si? Walking as a reflexive practice. In T. Shortell & E. Brown (Eds.), Walking in the European City quotidian mobility and urban ethnography. London: Ashgate Publishing.
- Carabelli, G. (2018). The divided city and the grassroots: The (un)making of ethnic divisions in Mostar. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Carabelli, G., & Zuljevic, M. (2012). (Re) collecting Mostar. Mapping public space to produce public memory. In K. Vöckler (Ed.), SEE!: Urban transformation in Southeastern Europe. Wien: ERSTE Foundation, LIT Verlag.
- Caspersen, N. (2011). Unrecognized states: The struggle for sovereignty in the modern international system. Cambridge: Polity.
- Caspersen, N. (2016). Peace agreements: Finding solutions to intra-state conflicts. Cambridge: Polity.
- Crenshaw, K. (1989). Demarginalizing the intersection of race and sex: A black feminist critique of anti-discrimination doctrine, feminist theory and antiracist politics (pp. 139–168). University of Chicago Legal Forum. Iss 1, Article 8.
- Djurasovic, A. (2016). Political transitions and the city: The case of Mostar, Bosnia and Herzegovina. London: Routledge.
- Flint, C. (2005). The geography of war and peace: From death camps to diplomats. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Forde, S. (2019). Cartographies of transformation in Mostar and Cape Town: Mapping as a methodology in divided cities. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 13(2), 139–157. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2018.1528713>.
- Foucault, M. (1976). Lecture 11, 17 March, 239–264. In M. Bertani & F. Alessandro (Eds.), Society must be defended (2003) Lectures at the College de France. New York: Picador Press.
- Foucault, M. (1980). Questions on geography. In C. Gordon (Ed.), Power/knowledge: Selected interviews and other writings, 1972–1977. London: Harvester Wheatsheaf.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Galtung, J. (1976). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking, and peacebuilding. In War and defence: essays in peace research (Vol. II). Impact of Science on Society 1/2 1976. PRIO Publication No. 25–9. https://www.galtung-institut.de/wp-content/uploads/2016/06/galtung_1976_three_approaches_to_peace.pdf. Accessed Apr 2018.
- Galtung, J. (1990). Cultural violence. Journal of Peace Research, 27(3), 291–305. <http://www.jstor.org/stable/423472>. Accessed June 2016.
- Giddens, A. (1984). The constitution of society: Outline of the theory of structuration. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Gupta, A., & Ferguson, J. (1992). Beyond “culture”: Space, identity and the politics of difference. Cultural Anthropology, 7(1), 6–23.

- Hromadžić, A. (2015). Citizens of an empty nation: Youth and state-making in Postwar Bosnia-Herzegovina. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania.
- Kappler, S. (2014). Local agency and Peacebuilding: EU and international engagement in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Cyprus and South Africa. Re-thinking peace and conflict studies. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- King, M. L., Jr. (1963). Letter from a Birmingham Jail. https://www.africa.upenn.edu/Articles_Gen/Letter_Birmingham.html. Accessed June 2019.
- Koopman, S. (2011). Let's take peace to pieces. Political Geography, 30(4), 193–194.
- Koopman, S. (2017). Peace. In D. Richardson (Ed.), The international encyclopaedia of geography: People, the earth, environment and technology, edited by Douglas Richardson. Oxford: Wiley Blackwell.
- Laketa, S., & Suleymanova, D. (2017). Enacting the contested past: Conflict narratives in educational spaces. Geographica Helvetica, 72, 5.
- Lederach, J. P. (2003). The little book of conflict transformation. Intercourse: Good Books.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010614550899>. Accessed 20 Oct 2016.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Firchow, P. (2014). Everyday peace indicators: Capturing local voices through surveys. Shared space, pp 33–39. <https://www.community-relations.org.uk/publications/shared-space>. Accessed 20 June 2018.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. (2013). Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Massey, D. (1991, June). A global sense of place. Marxism Today. http://banmarchive.org.uk/collections/mt/pdf/91_06_24.pdf. Accessed 20 June 2016.
- Massey, D. (1994). Space, place and gender. Cambridge: Wiley.
- Merrington, Z. (2018). SA's murder rate borders on war zone: Bheki Cele. SABC News. <http://www.sabcnews.com/sabcnews/sas-murder-rate-borders-on-war-zone-bheki-cele/>. Accessed Aug 2018.
- Mitchell, A. (2011). Lost in transformation: Violent peace and peaceful conflict in Northern Ireland. Re-thinking peace and conflict studies. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Murphy, A., & Murtagh, B. (2010). Children, policy and the built environment. Working paper no. 1, Queen's University Belfast. <https://www.qub.ac.uk/researchcentres/TheInstituteofSpatialandEnvironmentalPlanning/Impact/WorkingPapers/FileStore/Fileupload,432505,en.pdf>. Accessed 24 Nov 2013.
- Palmberger, M. (2013). Practices of border crossing in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina: The case of Mostar. Identities: Global Studies in Culture and Power. <http://www.tandfonline.com/loi/gide20>. Accessed 20 Oct 2016.
- Raanan, M. G., & Shoval, N. (2014). Mental maps compared to actual spatial behaviour using GPS data a new method for investigating segregation in cities. Cities (London, England), 36, 28–40.
- Richmond, O. P., Kappler, S., & Björkdahl, A. (2015). The 'field' in the age of intervention: Power, legitimacy, and authority versus the 'local'. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 44(1), 23–44.
- Said, E. W. (1979). Orientalism. New York: Random House.
- Sustainable Livelihoods Foundation. (2016). Yolo Ekasi. http://livelihoods.org.za/wp-content/uploads/2018/05/SLF_Yolo_Ekasi_Booklet.pdf. Accessed July 2019.
- Switzer, C., & McDowell, S. (2009). Redrawing cognitive maps of conflict: Lost spaces and forgetting in the Centre of Belfast. Memory Studies, 2(3), 337–353.
- UN Security Council. (2000). Resolution 1325. 31st October 2000. <https://documents-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N00/720/18/PDF/N0072018.pdf?OpenElement>. Accessed July 2019.
- Visoka, G. (2018). Acting like a state: Kosovo and the everyday making of statehood. New York: Routledge.
- Vogel, B. (2018). Understanding the impact of geographies and space on the possibilities of peace activism. Cooperation and Conflict, 53, 431. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836717750202>. Accessed Sept 2018.
- Williams, P., Megoran, N., & McConnell, F. (2014). Introduction: Geographical approaches to peace. In F. McConnell, N. Megoran, & P. Williams (Eds.), The geographies of peace: New approaches to boundaries, diplomacy and conflict resolution. London: I.B Tauris.
- Forde, S. (2018) Movement as Conflict Transformation, Rescripting Mostar, Bosnia-Herzegovina. Rethinking Peace and Conflict Studies, Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.

Human Rights

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Human Rights Advocacy

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America

Human Security

Alexander Gilder

Department of Law and Criminology and Centre for International Security, Royal Holloway, University of London, Egham, UK

Definition

A contested concept such as human security is not easily defined in concrete terms. Instead, human security has two key elements: (1) it aims to shift the referent object of security from the state to the individual giving the individual intrinsic value and placing the interests of the individual ahead of the state; (2) it gives rise to a broader view on what can cause insecurity and that many threats are interconnected and reinforcing.

Introduction

Human security has been the subject of fierce academic debate since it was coined by the United Nations Development Program (UNDP) in 1994 (UNDP 1994). During the twentieth century, security as a concept has been liberalized to become denationalized and both globalized and individualized (Daase 2010). Following the Second World War the referent object of security was argued to be the state with the international community protecting itself from nuclear attack. However, in the 1970s liberal theorists argued that the referent object should be society where “a collective of citizens lives in safety and freedom so that it can develop its productivity and wealth” (Daase 2010, pp. 27–8). Later the concept of human security was suggested to instead give the individual intrinsic value (UNDP 1994). Under a human security approach, where the individual’s interests compete with that of the state or society, the individual should be given priority. This entry recounts some of the early development of the concept of human security and its initial purposes for the UNDP and the states who took an active interest in its advancement. Second, some of the definitional issues will be discussed by looking at the broad versus narrow conceptions of human security. Lastly, the entry will cover some instances where the concept of human security has been used, as an analytical tool, in interdisciplinary studies.

The Emergence of Human Security

Human security stems from “the erosion of the nation-state and the fact that fewer and fewer decisions that affect our lives are taken at the level of the nation-state” (Kaldor 2011). Although human security gained mainstream attention in the 1990s, its origins can be found earlier in the twentieth century as states, and consequently the international community, became more concerned about the individual. Following the Second World War there was a growing critique of national security and the traditional focus of the state being the referent object of security. The critique was based on the state being unable to provide the level of security desired and the reclaiming of rights that had previously been traded upwards to the state (MacFarlane and Foong Khong 2006, p. 109). The post-war international system that emerged balanced state sovereignty under the Westphalian order with the increased recognition of human rights and human dignity. However, the state-based system and its focus on national security continued to prevail during the Cold War.

The Palme Commission in 1982, chaired by former Swedish Prime Minister Olaf Palme, used the term “common security” when reporting on key international security concerns. The report considered nuclear-weapon-free zones and regulations on conventional weapons sales, but importantly for human security, there was investigation into insecurities in developing countries. For example, the commission notes how developing countries build up armaments to defend themselves, but without effective and reliable regimes for their security their vulnerability will increase (Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues 1982, pp. 128–9). It recognized that in all countries security needs to consider both economic progress linked to the freedom from want and the freedom from fear in military terms. The report suggested that security should be viewed globally and not only from the viewpoint of states. However, the position of the state was enshrined with the report reiterating “all states have the right to security,” but states must cooperate to be secure and not seek security at each other’s expense through war and arms buildups (Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues 1982, pp. 138–9).

The Brundtland Commission in 1987 followed, headed by former Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland, with a focus on development. The commission coined the term “sustainable development.” Sustainable development is “not a fixed state of harmony, but rather a process of change in which the exploitation of resources, the direction of investments, the orientation of technological development, and institutional change are made consistent with future as well as present needs” (United Nations World Commission on Environment and Development 1987, p. 30). The report examined the environment with analysis of available resources for the population, food security challenges, different energy sources, and the environment as a cause of conflict. The Brundtland Commission built on the Palme Commission by introducing elements of humanity into their concept of sustainable development where previously development was focused on triggering industrialization and measuring growth through indicators like gross domestic product (GDP), investment, savings, and industrial outputs (Tadjbakhsh and Chenoy 2007, p. 101). Brundtland was part of the shift to “human development,” which argues “economic growth does not automatically trickle down to benefit the well-being of people, and other approaches, such as basic needs, did not hand over the reins of decision making to the beneficiaries themselves” (United Nations World Commission on Environment and Development 1987, p. 104). The Palme and Brundtland Commissions laid important groundwork on securitization and development that contributed to the emergence of human security.

The concept of human security entered the scene in 1994 as part of the UNDP’s 1994

Human Development Report. The UNDP is not a body primarily concerned with “security,” but security became a concern because the needs of people during different forms of emergencies, be it a natural disaster, war, or humanitarian crisis, were understood to be inseparable from development (Murphy 2006, p. 277). The 1994 Report expresses dissatisfaction with traditional practices of development focusing solely on increasing gross national product (GNP) and uses language such as “safety from chronic threats such as hunger, disease and repression” to direct attention away from prevalent physical threats that were focused on during the Cold War (UNDP 1994, p. 23; Acharya 2014, p. 449; Owen 2004, p. 382). This led to human security effectively “securitizing” what were traditionally development issues to increase awareness of new, non-traditional threats of insecurity (Zwierlein and Graf 2010, p. 8).

The team behind the 1994 Report sought to create an approach that “focuses on building human capabilities to confront and overcome poverty, illiteracy, diseases, discrimination, restrictions on political freedom, and the threat to violent conflict” (Acharya 2014, p. 449). The report attempted to change security from its national focus to people’s security and from security through armaments to security through sustainable human development (UNDP 1994, p. 24). The 1994 Report includes a nonexhaustive list of seven dimensions of human security which are as follows: economic, health, personal, political, food, environmental, and community security (UNDP 1994, pp. 24–5). The UNDP Report encourages that resources be directed towards the most prevalent threats regardless of the source, be it a state or nonstate actor, and that the international community should work towards prevention rather than intervention. The UNDP Report represents a “broader normative shift leading to the strengthening of the position of individual human beings at the international scene” (Bilkova 2014, pp. 30–1). However, there are concerns with the 1994 Report and its securitization. For instance, Gasper and Gómez call the seven categories of threats a “rough starting point” and critics have lamented human security as a reductionist idea (Gasper and Gómez 2014, p. 14; Buzan 2004).

In 2000, UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan reiterated the call for freedom from fear and want in his Millennium Report. Annan said that the UN was founded on seeking freedom from fear and want, and that achievement still eludes the international community (Annan 2000, p. 17). Annan elaborated that the UN Charter “reaffirms the dignity and worth of the human person, respect for human rights and the equal rights of men and women, and a commitment to social progress as measured by better standards of life, in freedom from want and fear alike” (Annan 2000, p. 6 (emphasis added)). After the publication of the report, Annan created the Commission on Human Security cochaired by Sadako Ogata and Amartya Sen. The commission published its Human Security Now Report in 2003 (Commission on Human Security 2003). The report identified that human security should have a distinctive focus on humanitarian crises as opposed to underdevelopment that is largely addressed by human development (Farer 2011, p. 47). Importantly the commission emphasizes “[t]he idea is for people to be secure, not just for territories within borders to be secure against external aggression. And unlike traditional approaches that vest the state with full responsibility for state security, the process of human security involves a much broader spectrum of actors and institutions—especially people themselves” (Commission on Human Security 2003, p. 6).

Human security efforts within the UN continued in this period with the United Nations Trust Fund for Human Security (UNTFHS), which was established in 1999, tasked with furthering the efforts towards freedom from fear and want. Following the Human Security Now Report an Advisory Board on Human Security was created in 2003 to liaise with the UN secretary-general and manage the UNTFHS. In 2004, the UNTFHS was transferred to work under the auspices of the Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs and a Human Security Unit (HSU) was created (Thérien 2012, p. 208). The HSU’s purpose is to help adapt the UN to consider human security activities. Nevertheless, the use of human security terminology has waned within the UN in recent years.

The 2005 General Assembly World Summit decided to commission work on creating a definition of human security and a General Assembly Resolution in 2012 outlined the UN’s interpretation of the concept (UN General Assembly 2005, p. 143; UN General Assembly 2012a). The resolution uses the definition:

The right of people to live in freedom and dignity, free from poverty and despair. All individuals, in particular vulnerable people, are entitled to freedom from fear and freedom from want, with an equal opportunity to enjoy all their rights and fully develop their human potential (UN General Assembly 2012a, p. 3(a)).

Narrow Versus Broad Human Security

Following the 1994 Report the UNDP continued to use human security’s seven categories when creating new Human Development Reports, but definitional issues have remained (Gómez et al. 2013, p. 62). In the late 1990s and early 2000s various middle powers including Canada, Norway, and Japan adopted human security approaches in their foreign policies with differing interpretations (Farer 2011, p. 46). Much of the literature on human security unpicks these definitional differences and includes debates that cut to the core of what the concept encompasses. The definitions put forward can be broken into two broad categories: narrow and broad. It should also be said that some authors have attempted to use human security in their work with no concise definition to attempt to operationalization the concept and move the debate forward (Benedek et al. 2011).

In the narrow conception, a human security threat exists where there is the risk of physical violence, no matter the root cause be it economic disaster or health epidemic. This approach is argued to be academically useful and manageable for actors due to the limiting of the type of threats. An illustrative example of the narrow definition in practice is Canada who notably adopted a human security approach based on pervasive violent threats which undermine the rights, physical safety, or lives of people (Moher 2012). Canada deemed the UNDP articulation “unwieldy” and criticized the 1994 Report for ignoring insecurity resulting from violent conflict (Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade 1999). Canada took the approach that the UN Charter, Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and Geneva Conventions embody the core of human security to focus on violent conflict and physical security (Acharya 2001, p. 445). The definition used by Canada is human security as “a condition or state of being characterized by freedom from pervasive threats to people’s rights, their safety, or even their lives” (Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade 1999). Further examples of what Canada sees as progress towards human security are: the Ottawa Convention on Anti-personnel Landmines, the Rome Treaty creating the International Criminal Court, UN prioritization of women and children in armed conflict, and the prevention of small-arms proliferation (Acharya 2001, pp. 445–6; King and Murray 2002, p. 590).

The Canadian definition, despite being characterized as narrow, does not only include safety from violence. Axworthy explains the Canadian position as follows:

human security is much more than the absence of military threat. It includes security against economic privation, an acceptable quality of life, and a guarantee of fundamental human rights. This concept of human security recognizes the complexity of the human environment and accepts that the forces influencing human security are interrelated and mutually reinforcing. At a minimum, human security requires that basic needs are met, but it also acknowledges that sustained economic development, human rights and fundamental freedoms, the rule of law, good governance, sustainable development and social equity are as important to global peace as arms control and disarmament. It recognizes the links between environmental degradation, population growth, ethnic conflicts, and migration. Finally, it concludes that lasting stability cannot be achieved until human security is guaranteed (Axworthy 1997, p. 184).

Importantly though, King and Murray argue that while Canada do accept some broader notions of human security, they instead split the concept into human security as the freedom from fear and human development as the freedom from want (King and Murray 2002, p. 590). The core of Canada’s approach is to use preventative measures, whether it be strengthening legal norms, intervention, or soft diplomacy, to avoid violence that causes physical insecurity (Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade 1999).

Proponents of the narrow definition have a distinct focus on violence. One narrow advocate, Sverre Lodgaard, argues that “[s]ecurity concerns arise when the threat of violence is present, but not all cases of socio-economic disaster lead to violent action; hence they should not be placed under the rubric of human security” (Acharya 2001, p. 447). Proponents argue that a focus on the freedom from want side of human security detracts from serious threats individuals face in times of war and conflict (MacFarlane and Foong Khong 2006, p. 164). Threats under the narrow approach are largely traditional, including armed conflict, human rights violations, organized crime, and public insecurity (Tadjbakhsh and Chenoy 2007, p. 40). Linking security with violence then retains many notions of state-based security. Rebuttals to the necessity of violence in human security include the narrowing of the concept being “grossly out of step with the reality of the globalized threats we face” (Owen 2004, p. 379). Liotta and Owen argue an almost exclusive focus on violence will “do little to protect the millions who will die this year from nonviolent preventable human security threats” (Liotta and Owen 2006, p. 52).

It is argued by others that a narrow definition is favorable because it is analytically and practically useful (Bajpai 2003). Conversely, a broad definition is “nothing more than a shopping list” of wants and desires (Krause 2004, p. 367). Krause claims that there is nothing to be gained by linking issues on the shopping list such as education and public health. Krause also feels that perceiving items on the shopping list like HIV/AIDS and migration as threats builds walls rather than bridges. However, it has also not been proven that narrowing down the broader notions of human security would provide the desired clarity and analytical usefulness. For example, Paris points out that authors often arbitrarily narrow human security, without providing “a compelling rationale for highlighting certain values” (Paris 2001, p. 95). Bajpai includes bodily safety and personal freedom in his narrow view of human security as they are “the most important” but why other aspects are not as important is not elaborated upon (Bajpai 2000). King and Murray base their narrow definition on the expectation of years an individual will live without experiencing generalized poverty (King and Murray 2002, p. 594). The arbitrariness of narrowing can be based on a host of different factors, for example, where authors argue one threat is the most important without discussion of the competing threats (Alkire 2003, p. 22). Some choose their criteria for what are deemed to be critical and pervasive threats based on the probability of the threat occurring while others assess the perception of the individuals affected for what they qualitatively feel are the most critical threats (Alkire 2003, p. 22).

Advocates of narrow definitions point to UN support as crucial evidence of its usefulness as opposed to broad definitions not being widely adopted. For instance, the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) based its 1997 annual report on human security noting that everyone has a right to security and freedom (MacFarlane and Foong Khong 2006, pp. 171–2; UNHCR 1997). The report also highlights nonmilitary sources of instability but overall, the report focuses on violence. Likewise, the UN secretary-general's 1999 report on the legal protection of civilians in armed conflict resulted in two resolutions from the UN Security Council. In one the UN Security Council indicated "its willingness to respond to situations of armed conflict where civilians are being targeted or humanitarian assistance to civilians being deliberately obstructed, including through the consideration of appropriate measures at the Council's disposal" (UN Security Council 1999, p. 10). Furthermore, the UN Security Council recognized that abuses of humanitarian and human rights law in armed conflict could be deemed threats to international peace and security and so could obstruction of humanitarian assistance (UN Security Council 2000, pp. 5, 8). The UN secretary-general emphasizes that "minimum standards of security are a precondition for development" which arguably supports Canada's narrow split of freedom from fear and want (UN General Assembly 2000, pp. 50). These examples show a historic use of human security in terms of violent conflict but it is noted that the General Assembly's definition, quoted above, includes both freedom from fear and want, specifically mentioning poverty and the development work that tackles broad, root causes of insecurity.

The broad conception of human security is distinguished by its recognition that a threat to human security can take many forms, from a multitude of sources, and it is more than violence that can do irreparable damage to human life. The contrasting emblematic example is that of Japan who adopted a broad approach to human security in their foreign policy. Initially, however, Japan did focus on conflicts and the starvation and genocide surrounding them (Acharya 2001, p. 446). Later, Japan's approach altered and it did not wish to think of human security as solely a concept that protects the lives of individuals in armed conflict (Acharya 2001, p. 446). Instead it wished to pursue survival and dignity on equal platforms. Dignity can be seen as the broadening factor where development progress equals an increasing life of dignity. Japan viewed human security as "comprehensively cover[ing] all the measures that threaten human survival, daily life, and dignity—for example, environmental degradation, violations of human rights, transnational organized crime, illicit drugs, refugees, poverty, anti-personnel land- mines and other infectious diseases such as AIDS—and strengthens efforts to confront these threats" (Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs 1999, Chapter 2(3)). Japan also recognized the importance of collaboration between providers of vertical and horizontal protection in encouraging cooperation of states, international organizations, and civil society (Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs 1999, Chapter 2(3)). Japan's interest in broad notions of human security led to the Japanese government making a sizeable financial contribution to help create the UNTFHS.

The root why broad definitions believe the freedom from fear and freedom from want are inseparable is found in the UNDP's 1994 Report: "Without peace, there may be no development. But without development, peace is threatened" (UNDP 1994, p. iii). The freedom from fear and want are therefore interdependent (Abass 2010, p. 3). Human security also "refers to the condition that enables people to exercise these choices safely and freely, and be relatively confident that the opportunities they have today will not be lost tomorrow” (Tadjbakhsh 2014, p. 50). This means that instead of setting overly ambitious goals, broad applications of human security seek to address threats and vulnerabilities to establish minimum standards of life and dignity.

Generally speaking, proponents of broad definitions argue that due to the fact human security changes the referent object of security away from the state, inclusion of the issues beyond violent conflict is necessary. Axworthy says that there must be a recalibration to combat the wider range of harms that have been securitized, essentially suggesting it is time to move away from traditional, realist, notions of security (Axworthy 2004). By considering nonviolent threats, broad definitions recognize that national security forces cannot solely resolve insecurity and new actors are needed to cooperate with the state on a multitude of fronts. Consideration of more than violence best reflects postmodern security’s inclusion of nonmilitary threats and the need for regional and global security synergy.

What can be securitized as a broad threat to human security can vary. For Leaning the broad notion of human security includes psychological, political, and economic vulnerabilities to promote the protection of the individual through time (Leaning 2004). Alkire aligns with the Commission on Human Security’s approach where human security concerns the “vital core” that is the essence of life determined by those affected by insecurity (Alkire 2004). The Commission on Human Security gives a range of examples of what may be deemed human security threats that can then be prioritized by those facing insecurity, including economic harm, health crises, crime, post-conflict instability, and poverty (Commission on Human Security 2003).

Thakur claims human security is “the quality of life of the people of a society or polity. Anything which degrades their quality of life – demographic pressures, diminished access to or stock of resources, and so on – is a security threat” (Tadjbakhsh and Cheney 2007, p. 49). Thakur goes on to limit security threats to only be those which create a crisis (Thakur 2004, p. 347). This includes where environmental disaster or massive migration becomes a crisis. Likewise, Bajpai limits his broad definition by requiring threats to come from “identifiable human agents” and not from structural or natural causes (Bajpai 2004, p. 360). Winslow and Eriksen broaden the interdisciplinary outlook of human security by considering anthropological aspects. They claim cultural and social contexts are important because when people have to work together to rectify a threat or vulnerability, their cultural identity and social structures play a role (Winslow and Eriksen 2004, p. 362). Lastly, Hampson claims that vulnerability is naturally broad and dependent on structural issues and must address threats and build society’s capabilities to combat vulnerability (Hampson 2004, p. 350).

Two features of broad definitions deserve further elaboration. First, most broad approaches have a focus on structural, root causes of conflict emphasizing empowerment building alongside physical protection. In 1992, the UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali highlighted how undermining economic and social development could threaten international peace and security (UN Secretary General 1992, p. 26). Boutros-Ghali requested an early warning system which triggered new discussions on how to promote conflict prevention. Subsequently, Amartya Sen advanced “protective security” that would prevent catastrophic crises (Sen 1999). Sen argued that there must be protection against structural threats, such as sudden deprivation or starvation, to live securely and well (Sen 1999, p. 188). Sen’s capabilities approach and development ideas that subsequently became “development as freedom” clearly played a part in the development of human security in the 1994 UNDP Report. Following this view, if structural issues are only addressed when they trigger violent conflict, under a narrow approach, and not if they simply cause mass deprivation or destruction, then human security fails in the purpose of its title. Second, proponents of a broad approach argue that having a precise definition is not necessary. Using an open-ended, flexible approach which takes into consideration a range of threats that cause more suffering than only violent conflict is a challenge to current power structures in the international sphere. Tadjbakhsh says that “[i]f security is ultimately a feeling, then human security must be a felt experience” (Tadjbakhsh 2005, p. 7). The broad approach allows actors to build a feeling of security through the avenues most relevant to the people experiencing insecurity.

Interdisciplinary Uses of Human Security

Human security has been argued to provide better ideas for conflict prevention “because it is more realistic and nuanced in terms of its interdisciplinary approach” (Hanlon and Christie 2016, p. 11). Harnessing the concept’s interdisciplinary nature, research in a variety of disciplines has used human security as a lens with which to understand peace and conflict in new lights. By applying the various precepts of human security to a peace and conflict issue or different disciplinary context human security can uncover new linkages and deepen our understanding (Gilder 2020a p. 3). This section recounts some of the many examples of where human security has been used as an analytical lens in a variety of interdisciplinary studies, focusing on examples of international law and human rights.

How human security is utilized, “all depends on what human security is understood to be: a political agenda for governments, a rallying cry that forges ad hoc or sustained coalitions of states on single issues, a common concern that brings together single-issue civil society groups under a unifying umbrella, an academic problem, or a new research category” (Oberleitner 2005a, pp. 592–3). Human security is described as a concept by most literature. Therefore, human security is a collection of interrelated ideas and can be a guide to interpretation. Specifically, as an agenda-setting concept, it determines what are the most relevant issues and brings to the forefront neglected problems that have previously not been included in national and international security debates or have been on the periphery (Gilder 2020b). As an agenda-setting concept human security can cross disciplinary boundaries and reshape how researchers view disciplinary issues. Hanlon and Christie have restated the importance of human security for other disciplines noting human security is intimately linked to human rights and “[i]nternational law serves as a basic criteria with which to strengthen work on human security’s objectives” (Hanlon and Christie 2016, pp. 30, 55).

In one of the first studies of human security and its relationship with international law, Gerd Oberleitner claims that “a human security approach to international law can reinforce and strengthen attempts to bring international law into line with the requirements of today’s world” (Oberleitner 2005b, p. 186). Oberleitner argues that most of the values represented by human security are not new to international law and the application of human security to the law can help bring international law closer to meeting the demands of modern crises. He says that implementation of human security “requires overcoming the compartmentalization of security, humanitarian, human rights, and development strategies by focusing on the protection and empowerment of people” (Oberleitner 2005b, p. 188). The current law is not always able to flawlessly interact in unison and therefore Oberleitner suggests further research is needed to see if human security can fill the void between humanitarian law and human rights law during conflicts.

In a 2007 study on human security and international law, Barbara von Tigerstrom said that human security is “a concept that is designed to be used in a variety of ways, including in the interpretation and development of legal norms” (von Tigerstrom 2007, p. 42). von Tigerstrom found that there is not a linear evolution of international law from a law of coexistence to a law of cooperation that enshrines human security (von Tigerstrom 2007, p. 89). Instead, the older, state-centered elements and new human-centered elements coexist in the law. Von Tigerstrom highlights that various international legal regimes that “on the face of it” seem human-centered have been argued to be in fact state-centered and designed to protect state interests.

Following on from the arguments of von Tigerstrom and Oberleitner, Shireen Daft argues that human security can be a “synthesised overarching framework” for international law (Daft 2017, p. 33). Daft says that human security can have legal character by serving as a framework for the expression of existing norms with human security providing a principled future direction for how international law tackles security threats (Daft 2017, pp. 33, 125). Daft believes this is possible if clear principles of human security are articulated with roots and relevance in existing international law. Daft's argument lends well to the current position of states since many believe human security should be pursued under existing international legal frameworks and not through new legal obligations. For instance, Australia has already advanced the view that human security can provide a normative framework which can ensure collective actions are providing preventative protection, empowerment to build resilience, and direct benefits to populations (UN General Assembly 2012b, p. 10). Other states agreed with, for example, Qatar arguing that by using a framework for human security states will be compelled to be proactive (UN General Assembly 2012b, p. 2). Likewise, India stated that human security can be implemented and used as a framework to respond to current challenges, not only as a policy goal (UN General Assembly 2012b, p. 14). If human security is not to be a legal concept in its own right, Math Nortmann and Cedric Ryngaert have suggested what it can do is harness existing international law to pursue human-centric operational goals (Noortmann and Ryngaert 2014, p. 198).

Also applying a human security lens, but specifically in relation to human rights and vulnerability, Dorothy Estrada-Tanck's study concerns the synergies between human security and international human rights law (Estrada-Tanck 2016). Case studies in the book include violence against women and undocumented (female) migrants. Estrada-Tanck conceptualizes that human security can first promote action on threats and vulnerabilities that do not fall under the traditional grave categories of genocide, war crimes, and crimes against humanity. Second, human security can contextualize threats and responses for specific populations (Estrada-Tanck 2016, pp. 38–9). Estrada-Tanck sees human security as a method for identifying where additional human rights protection is needed. Conversely, Rhoda Howard-Hassmann suggests human security threatens the indivisibility of human rights by suggesting "that there are some human rights that society need not acknowledge, safeguard and promote because they do not address basic insecurities" (Howard-Hassmann 2012, p. 106). Yaniv Roznai has related concerns when assessing human security in relation to international human rights law in that human rights may be diluted down to needs that require fulfilling rather than rights, which could detract from state responsibility for domestic human rights violations (Roznai 2014, p. 124).

This section has only been able to touch on some of the many interdisciplinary discussions surrounding human security. The synergies, or lack thereof, between the issues covered by human security and other disciplines can further be developed through inter- and multidisciplinary work that tackles security concerns in a more holistic way.

Conclusion

Human security has suffered from definitional indeterminacy since the proliferation of literature on the concept in the 1990s and 2000s. What this entry has attempted to do is highlight key features of the concept and the two distinct categories of definitions, broad and narrow. Regardless of which category is subscribed to, human security can be said to advance two main tenets: (1) it aims to shift the referent object of security from the state to the individual giving the individual intrinsic value and placing the interests of the individual ahead of the state; (2) it gives rise to a broader view on what can cause insecurity and that many threats are interconnected and reinforcing. Even without agreed definitions authors have operationalized the concept in interdisciplinary research, of which a few are described above, showcasing the usefulness of human security as an analytical tool for enhancing our understanding of peace, conflict, and more.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Conflict and Hunger
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

References

- Abass, A. (2010). Protecting human security in Africa. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Acharya, A. (2001). Human security: East versus west. International Journal, 56(3), 442–460.
- Acharya, A. (2014). Human security. In J. Baylis, S. Smith, & P. Owens (Eds.), The globalisation of world politics (pp. 448–462). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Alkire, S. (2003). A conceptual framework for human security. CRISE working paper #2. <http://www3.qeh.ox.ac.uk/pdf/crisewps/workingpaper2.pdf>
- Alkire, S. (2004). A vital core that must be treated with the same gravitas as traditional security threats. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 359–360.
- Annan, K. (2000). We the peoples': The role of the United Nations in the 21st century. New York: United Nations.
- Axworthy, L. (1997). Canada and human security: The need for leadership. International Journal, 52(2), 183–196.
- Axworthy, L. (2004). A new scientific field and policy lens. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 348–349.
- Bajpai, K. (2000). Human security: Concept and measurement. Kroc Institute occasional paper no. 19:OP:1. <https://www.cusb.ac.in/images/cusb-files/2020/el/psc/4-Abhay%20Kr-MA%20II%20Sem.pdf>
- Bajpai, K. (2003). The idea of human security. International Studies, 40(3), 195–228.
- Bajpai, K. (2004). An expression of threats versus capabilities across time and space. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 360–361.
- Benedek, E., Kettemann, M., & Möstl, M. (Eds.). (2011). Mainstreaming human security in peace operations and crisis management. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Bilkova, V. (2014). Ensuring human security in armed conflicts: The role of non-state actors and its reflection in current international humanitarian law. In C. Ryngaert & M. Noortmann (Eds.), Human security and international law (pp. 29–51). Antwerp: Intersensia.
- Buzan, B. (2004). A reductionist, idealistic notion that adds little analytical value. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 369–370.
- Commission on Human Security. (2003). Human security now. New York. <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/91BAEEDBA50C6907C1256D19006A9353-chs-security-may03.pdf>
- Daase, C. (2010). “National, societal”, and “human security”: On the transformation of political language. Historical Social Research, 35(4), 22–37.
- Daft, S. (2017). The relationship between human security discourse and international law: A principled approach. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade. (1999). Human security: Safety for people in a changing world. <http://www.summit-americas.org/Canada/HumanSecurity-english.htm>
- Estrada-Tanck, D. (2016). Human security and human rights under international law: The protections offered to persons confronting structural vulnerability. Oxford: Hart.
- Farer, T. (2011). Human security: Defining the elephant and imagining its tasks. Asian Journal of International Law, 1(1), 43–55.
- Gasper, D., & Gómez, O.A. (2014). Evolution of thinking and research on human and personal security 1994–2013. UNDP Human Development Report Office occasional paper. http://hdr.undp.org/sites/default/files/gomez_hdr14.pdf
- Gilder, A. (2020a). Human security and the stabilization mandate of MINUSCA. International Peacekeeping, 1–33. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2020.1733423>.
- Gilder, A. (2020b). International law and human security in a kaleidoscopic world. Indian Journal of International Law, 1–27. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s40901-020-00109-w>.
- Gómez, O.A., Gasper, D., & Mine, Y. (2013). Good practices in addressing human security through human development reports. UNDP Human Development Report Office occasional paper. http://hdr.undp.org/sites/default/files/good_practices.pdf
- Hampson, F. (2004). A concept in need of a global policy response. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 349–350.
- Hanlon, R., & Christie, K. (2016). Freedom from fear, freedom from want: An introduction to human security. Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Howard-Hassmann, R. (2012). Human security: Undermining human rights? Human Rights Quarterly, 34(1), 88–112.
- Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues. (1982). Common security: A programme for disarmament – The report of the Independent Commission on Disarmament and Security Issues under the chairmanship of Olof Palme. Clerkenwell: Pan.
- Japanese Ministry of Foreign Affairs. (1999). Diplomatic bluebook 1999: Japan’s diplomacy with leadership toward the new century. <http://www.mofa.go.jp/policy/other/bluebook/1999/index.html>.
- Kaldor, M. (2011). Human security. Society and Economy, 33(3), 441–448.
- King, G., & Murray, C. (2002). Rethinking human security. Political Science Quarterly, 116(4), 585–610.
- Krause, K. (2004). The key to a powerful agenda. If Properly Delimited/Security Dialogue, 35(3), 367–368.
- Leaning, J. (2004). Psychosocial well-being over time. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 354–355.
- Liotta, P. H., & Owen, T. (2006). Why human security. Whitehead Journal of Diplomacy and International Relations, 7, 37–54.
- MacFarlane, N., & Foong Khong, Y. (2006). Human security and the UN: A critical history. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Moher, J. (2012). Canada’s human security agenda. Canada: Department of Foreign Affairs & International Trade. <http://odihpn.org/magazine/canada%C2%92s-human-security-agenda/>
- Murphy, C. N. (2006). The United Nations development programme a better way? Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Noortmann, M., & Ryngaert, C. (2014). Towards a (new) human security-based agenda for international law and

- non-state actors. In C. Ryngaert & M. Noortmann (Eds.), Human security and international law (pp. 195–203). Antwerp: Intersensia.
- Oberleitner, G. (2005a). Porcupines in love: The intricate convergence of human rights and human security. European Human Rights Law Review, 6, 588.
- Oberleitner, G. (2005b). Human security: A challenge to international law? Global Governance, 11(2), 185.
- Owen, T. (2004). Human security – Conflict, critique and consensus: Colloquium remarks and a proposal for a threshold-based definition. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 373–387.
- Paris, R. (2001). Human security: Paradigm shift or hot air? International Security, 26(2), 87–102.
- Roznai, Y. (2014). The insecurity of human security. Wisconsin International Law Journal, 32(1), 95–141.
- Sen, A. (1999). Development as freedom. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Tadjbakhsh, S. (2005). Human security: Concepts and implications with an application to post-intervention challenges in Afghanistan. Les Études du CERI N° 117–118, Sciences Po.
- Tadjbakhsh, S. (2014). In defense of the broad view of human security. In M. Martin & T. Owen (Eds.), Routledge handbook of human security. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Tadjbakhsh, S., & Chenoy, A. (2007). Human security: Concepts and implications. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Thakur, R. (2004). A political worldview. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 347–348.
- Thérien, J. (2012). Human security: The making of a UN ideology. Global Society, 25(2), 191–213.
- UN General Assembly. (2005). 2005 World Summit Outcome. (24 October 2005) UN Doc A/RES/60/1.
- UN General Assembly. (2012a). Follow-up to paragraph 143 on human security of the 2005 World Summit Outcome. (25 October 2012) UN Doc A/RES/66/290.
- UN General Assembly. (2012b). Follow-up to the Millennium Summit (4 June 2012) A/66/PV.112.
- UN Secretary-General. (1992). An agenda for peace (17 June 1992) A/47/277.
- UN Security Council. (1999). Resolution 1265 (17 September 1999) UN Doc S/RES/1265.
- UN Security Council. (2000). Resolution 1296 (19 April 2000) UN Doc S/RES/1296.
- UNDP. (1994). Human development report 1994: New dimensions of human security. <http://www.hdr.undp.org/en/content/human-development-report-1994>
- UNHCR. (1997). The state of the world's refugees 1997: A humanitarian agenda. <http://www.unhcr.org/uk/publications/sowr/3eb789f42/state-worlds-refugees-1997-humanitarian-agenda-chapter-2-defending-refugee.html>
- United Nations World Commission on Environment and Development. (1987). Our common future. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- von Tigerstrom, B. (2007). Human security and international law. Oxford: Hart.
- Winslow, D., & Eriksen, T. H. (2004). A broad concept that encourages interdisciplinary thinking. Security Dialogue, 35(3), 361–362.

- Zwierlein, C., & Graf, R. (2010). The production of human security in premodern and contemporary history. Historical Social Research, 34(4), 7–21.

Humanitarian

- Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Humanitarian Assistance

- Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Neil Cooper
School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Synonyms

Arms control; Disarmament; Non-proliferation; Pariah weapons control; Restraints on war; Weapons governance

Definition/Description

As the discussion below illustrates, there is no settled definition of humanitarian disarmament, or what agreements and initiatives are covered by this term. There is, however, a general consensus on two key defining elements: the application

I am grateful to Mathew Breay Bolton, Michael Pugh, and Anna Stavrianiakis for comments on an earlier version of this entry of humanitarian norms to questions of weapons control; and the enhanced role and influence of civil society actors in the pressure for, and negotiation of, humanitarian disarmament treaties. The early literature on HD sometimes referred to it as “humanitarian arms control,” but “disarmament” is now the preferred term of art, reflecting in part the emphasis in many (but not all) HD agreements on complete bans on specific categories of weapons. A further feature sometimes cited is the innovative introduction of clauses on remediation and victim assistance in the texts of many (though not all HD agreements). For some, the application of humanitarian norms to weapons control is best reflected in treaties such as the 1997 Mine Ban Treaty, the 2008 Convention on Cluster Munitions, and the 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons. For others, the influence of a humanitarian sensibility can also be seen in more traditional treaties such as the Chemical Weapons Convention or the Biological Weapons Convention. While observers may differ on what agreements should be included in the universe of humanitarian disarmament, there has been a tendency in much of the literature to focus on the commonalities that link HD initiatives and thus, implicitly or explicitly, treat them as a monolithic whole. This chapter adopts an alternative approach, one that focuses on the differences between the varied forms of HD, and the implications these differences have for our understanding of both the limits of HD and its radical potential.

I am also grateful to Anuj Gurung for additional background research that informed this chapter

This entry examines one type of disarmament that has reemerged in the post-Cold War era, that of humanitarian disarmament (HD). It begins by locating HD in a broader typology of disarmament and notes that practices of disarmament (including some decidedly nonutopian ones) are currently more common than those of narrow arms control. HD draws on humanitarian norms of proportionality and distinction between combatant and civilian to make the case for weapons control. Many HD agreements also include provisions for remediation and victim assistance. HD itself can be further subdivided into three different models. The first is associated with the pursuit of total bans on conventional weapons often considered unexceptional elements in the armories of military forces (e.g., landmines and cluster munitions (CM)). The second is characterized by regulation, short of a ban (e.g., limits on numbers, use, design, or transfer), and includes both weapons-specific restraints (e.g., on the use of laser weapons designed to blind) and expressly humanitarian nonproliferation initiatives such as the 2013 Arms Trade Treaty (ATT). The third model, exemplified by the 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons (TPNW), is associated with bans on “apex” weapons central to the core security logics, security identities, and security subjectivities of states. Many HD initiatives (but not, for example, the ATT) represent a distinct subcategory of “qualitative disarmament,” albeit a variant that foregrounds humanitarian rationales for control and often includes an enhanced role for civil society in negotiating processes. This entry sets out key claims and critiques of HD and should be read in conjunction with the separate entry in this encyclopedia analyzing case studies of HD, namely the ATT and the TPNW.

The key points enumerated below are the following: HD has resulted in a number of landmark treaties, and its emphasis on remediation and victim assistance represents a novel and substantive innovation in approaches to weapon control. However, model 1 bans and weapon-specific restraints under model 2 are constrained in their ability to control the means of violence because humanitarianism gives equal weight to the norm of military necessity, thus legitimizing the institution of war, including war preparation. Consequently, they simultaneously reflect and construct a hierarchy of legitimized and non-legitimized weapons – with the vast majority, particularly new so-called precision weapons, in the former category. In theory, model 2 nonproliferation initiatives such as the ATT address this deficiency. However, in the case of the ATT, the connection with humanitarianism facilitated the production of a weak treaty that enshrines the legitimacy of the arms trade in general and a “one export at a time” risk model of regulation that permits the trade in all but the most egregious arms exports. The upshot is that the post-Cold War rise of HD, along with the more general ubiquity of disarmament practices, has coincided with quite significant increases in global military expenditure and the arms trade. The current era is therefore best characterized as one of disarmament without disarmament in a more meaningful sense and models 1 and 2 of HD as specific practices of disarmament without disarmament.

In contrast, model 3 HD, with its focus on “apex weapons,” has brought HD into direct contention with the core security logics, identities, and subjectivities of major military powers. The TPNW therefore represents both a qualitatively different kind of HD and a more notable achievement, even if it is more of a stigmatization treaty than a disarmament treaty (a further dimension of disarmament without disarmament). At the same time, the very normative frameworks central to humanitarianism may provide discursive resources for nuclear weapons states (NWS) to legitimize their continued possession. Thus, while certainly not inevitable, the seeds of the TPNW’s ultimate failure may well lie in the normative roots of its very success. Despite this, the expansion of an HD agenda to apex weapons illustrates the potential to connect it to a tradition of qualitative disarmament more clearly rooted in a critique of militarism and a commitment to achieving overall reductions in the means of violence. This route offers the greatest promise for the further evolution of HD.

Locating HD in a Typology of Disarmament

Disarmament as a field of action has been both underconceptualized and derided as an exercise in naïve utopianism. This is largely a consequence of the account of disarmament offered by mainstream arms controllers since its emergence in the late 1950s as the hegemonic paradigm for controlling the means of violence. Arms controllers offered a project concerned with managing the arms dynamic, rather than reversing or eliminating it. In its narrow version, it focused on the promotion and negotiation of cooperative agreements between antagonistic states, particularly the USA and Soviet Union. The broader version (Mueller 2017) notionally embraced both nonproliferation efforts (e.g., the 1968 Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty) and disarmament initiatives (e.g., the 1972 Biological Weapons Convention (BWC)). The formal goals of arms control were defined as: reducing the risks of war, reducing the costs of preparing for war, and reducing the damage should war occur (Schelling and Halperin 1961: 1; Larsen and Wirtz 2009: 10). In practice, however, arms control theory reflected the assumptions and practices of narrow arms control rather than those of its broader version. The core function of arms control in this context was understood as stabilizing nuclear deterrence rather than eliminating nuclear weapons. Consequently, arms controllers privileged the goal of reducing the risk of war at the expense of the other two goals.

The hegemony of arms control, particularly the narrow version, was also predicated on the association of disarmament with a series of largely failed initiatives: the Hague Disarmament Conferences of 1899 and 1906, the League of Nations Disarmament Conference of the 1930s, and successive proposals for general and complete disarmament (GCD) in the early decades of the Cold War. At the same time, arms controllers were not above reframing successful disarmament initiatives such as the BWC as examples of realistic arms control (Larsen and Wirtz 2009: 4), albeit in its broader conceptualization. Consequently, in arms control theory, disarmament was simultaneously understood as a failed utopian project distinct from arms control (Larsen and Smith 2005: 78–79), as “crude and old-fashioned” (Freedman 2013: 98) and a subset of realistic arms control that produced concrete results. In general, however, arms control theorists leaned more toward the former view, expended little effort on theorizing disarmament, and when they did, it was only as part of an effort to demonstrate the naivety of proponents of GCD, rather than to develop a systematized understanding of disarmament practices (e.g., Schelling 1962; Bull 1959; Bull 1961; 30–64).

Despite the depredations of the arms controllers, disarmament as a practice (including some decidedly nonutopian variants) is currently more common than mainstream arms control – a feature of the global architecture of control that remains largely unacknowledged. At the same time, while practices of disarmament have flourished, this has been accompanied by significant rises in global military expenditure and the global arms trade (see below). The present era is therefore better described as one of disarmament without disarmament in a more meaningful sense.

The current dominance of disarmament practices is partly due to the fact that classical arms control was plunged into one of its periodic crises by both the hostility of the Trump administration to multilateral cooperation and heightened tensions with Russia. The upshot has been the end of the INF Treaty, US withdrawal from the Open Skies Treaty and the Iran nuclear deal, as well as failure to renew or renegotiate the 2010 New START Treaty. The new Biden administration is more positive about cooperative arms control and is committed to revitalizing New START and the Iran agreement in particular. Nevertheless, the ubiquity of disarmament practices seems likely to remain a feature of the international system, not least because the Iran nuclear deal itself represents a form of coercive disarmament. A further type of disarmament that has reemerged in the post-Cold War era is humanitarian disarmament. Before analyzing the claims and critiques of HD, it is useful to locate it in a broader typology of disarmament. This includes the following:

Pure Disarmament

This is the idea that all arms and armed forces everywhere should be abolished, an idea often confused with General and Complete Disarmament. In reality, few concrete proposals for disarmament have advocated such a position. The nearest equivalent were proposals made by the Soviet Union in the inter-war years, and later in the 1950s, for “total disarmament,” but even these envisaged the retention of internal security forces (Bull 1961: 34).

General and Complete Disarmament (GCD)

This is often associated with pure disarmament in the popular imagination, and even dismissed as a search for zero weapons in some of the academic literature (Martin 1973: 241). In practice, while proposals for GCD certainly envisaged significant quantitative reductions, they also permitted the retention of substantial force numbers. Indeed, the mechanics of structural disarmament (see below) mean that the armed forces of even quite significant military powers (e.g., the UK) are now substantially below the numbers envisaged in GCD proposals from the 1950s.

Coercive Disarmament

This is a form of disarmament with a long history (Towle 1997). In its modern form, it includes preventive disarmament (e.g., the invasion of Iraq), disarmament of the defeated (e.g., Germany after World War 1, postinvasion Iraq), and disarmament by ostensible neutral third parties to enforce peacebuilding in civil conflicts (examples include Somalia and Sierra Leone). It also includes international arms embargoes imposed on states at war, or in violation of core international norms on human rights or weapons proliferation (e.g., the extensive sanctions regime imposed on North Korea).

Structural Disarmament

This is disarmament by default rather than design, where independent factors (changes in the logic of the Cold War or the impact of inflation or recession) lead to reductions in defense spending and/or defense forces (Neuman 1988). The impact can be quite profound. For example, disarmament proposals submitted by the major Western powers at the UN in 1957 (proposal dismissed as naïve and utopian by arms controllers) envisaged a three-stage reduction in manpower for all armed forces, security, police, and paramilitary forces. For Britain, this started at 750,000 in the first stage, then dropped to 700,000, and finally to 650,000 in the final stage (Noel-Baker 1958: 25). Including reservists, British forces today number 193,000 (Ministry of Defence 2020: 4), and UK police numbers amount to 153,000 (Allen and Zayed 2021: 3). In other words, British forces are currently well below the levels envisaged in the 1950s for even third stage disarmament. Falls in personnel have been accompanied by equally dramatic reductions in equipment numbers. In 1950, the UK had 276 frigates and destroyers and 62 submarines (Cooper 2006: 359). By 2019, it possessed just 19 frigates and destroyers and 10 submarines (Bunkall 2019). Of course, such quantitative reductions have gone hand-in-hand with substantial qualitative improvements in military technology, recent rises in global military expenditure, and what, in many respects, is a deteriorating security environment. Nevertheless, these numerical force constraints may well have had an impact on the nature of the international security environment. Most notably, a defining feature of the modern international system has been the decline of inter-state warfare. This is often explained by reference to the consolidation of normative constraints on war, the economic costs involved, and improvements in international mechanisms of conflict prevention. These are all certainly part of the picture, but it is equally the case that, outside of the major military powers, few states now possess the forces necessary to engage in capital-intensive inter-state warfare on their own. Britain, for example, would almost certainly be unable to rerun the 1982 Falklands War today.

Postconflict Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration of Combatants (DDR)

Although DDR has a longer history, since the late 1980s, it has emerged as a standard element in international peacebuilding operations conducted after – or even during – civil conflicts (Giustozzi 2016). Indeed, one study estimated that spending on all DDR operations in 2006 amounted to almost $2 billion, and over 1.2 million former combatants were involved in some phase of DDR programming (Caramés et al. 2007). As a technology of governance, it has been largely advocated as a response to civil conflicts in the global south, often by the same major powers that view their own military forces as the exclusive preserve of sovereign decision-making. Disarmament in this context is therefore conceived as “a corrective program for deviant ‘war-torn’ societies not as a general and global obligation incumbent on all States, including the great military powers” (Bolton 2016: 10). DDR as a practice therefore aims to foster domestic peace by entrenching hierarchies of legitimate violence inside certain states, while endlessly reconstituting a global hierarchy of sovereign rights over the domestic disposition of armed violence.

The Disarmament of Sacred Spaces

This includes not only the creation of demilitarized zones to separate parties from a conflict but also the more general ascription of exceptional status to a space deemed “off-limits” from what are understood at the time as the “normal” armament policies prevalent in the rest of the international system. Examples include the 1963 Limited Nuclear Test Ban Treaty, the 1967 Outer Space Treaty, and the 1971 Seabed Treaty. The most notable examples, however, are the various Nuclear-Weapon-Free Zones (NWFZ) that collectively cover the entire southern hemisphere and include 115 states (Hanson 2018: 474). Many of these initiatives can also be understood as geographically specific applications of qualitative disarmament (see below).

Qualitative Disarmament

The philosophy of qualitative disarmament was initially applied in the disarmament provisions imposed on Germany after World War I (Noel-Baker 1958: 394–395), but the concept was more fully developed at the League of Nations Disarmament Conference in the 1930s where it was contrasted with quantitative disarmament (the search for across-the-board reductions in military forces). In another example of cooption, arms controllers subsequently adapted the term, referring instead, to “qualitative arms control” (e.g., Schelling and Halperin 1961: 51). In the context of the Disarmament Conference, qualitative disarmament was concerned with banning or reducing weapons that gave advantage to the offense (Bull 1961: 32). For example, in June 1932, US President Herbert Hoover presented a proposal that included the abolition of tanks, bomber planes, large mobile guns, and chemical and biological weapons, plus substantial reductions in submarines, battleships, aircraft carriers, cruisers, and destroyers (Steiner 1933: 213; Davies 2004; Sommer 1989: 36, Noel-Baker 1958: 398). A more expansive understanding includes prohibitions on specified weapons, including new (Noel-Baker 1958: 403) and/or immoral weapons. Vagts (2000), for example (though using the term qualitative arms control), includes prohibitions agreed at the Hague Disarmament Conferences on dum-dum bullets, certain kinds of naval mines, and the use of projectiles designed to diffuse asphyxiating or deleterious gasses. More recently, the BWC and the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention (CWC) banned not just the use but the possession and transfer of these weapons.

Models 1 and 3 of HD can therefore be understood as distinct subsets of qualitative disarmament, where actors (including civil society groups) seek restrictions on specified weapons because of their inhumane effects. The same applies to restraints short of a complete ban imposed on specific weapons under model 2 HD. In contrast, an HD initiative such as the ATT is better described as a more broad-based nonproliferation initiative, rather than a disarmament initiative per se (yet another dimension of HD without disarmament).

Three Models of Humanitarian Disarmament

Docherty (2010: 7) defines HD as disarmament law that “seeks to eliminate the civilian harms caused by problematic weapons” (weapons that are indiscriminate or inhumane) and suggests it is “the newest type of disarmament” (ibid.: 16). Dunworth (2020: 8) identifies two key features of HD. First, the application of a humanitarian lens (as opposed to a state security one) to discussions on whether or not a particular class of weapon should be prohibited or subject to limits on use. This is elevated to the point where disarmament debates “become infused with a humanitarian sensibility.” A second, defining feature is “the participation by, or presence of non-state entities in the negotiation process,” most notably domestic and transnational civil society groups that exercise “bottom-up” power by mobilizing to bring about weapon bans.

The history of attempts to prohibit weapons on explicitly humanitarian grounds stretches back to late nineteenth-century initiatives such as the 1868 St Petersburg Declaration, prohibiting the use in war of explosive projectiles under 400 grams in weight; the (ultimately unratified) 1874 Brussels Declaration prohibiting the use of poisoned weapons and arms calculated to cause unnecessary suffering; and the aforementioned prohibitions on dum-dum bullets, asphyxiating gasses, and balloon-dropped explosives. The potentials and limitations of the humanitarian disarmament approach are illustrated by the St Petersburg Declaration which declares the employment of arms that “uselessly aggravate” suffering is “contrary to the laws of humanity.” At the same time, the declaration also notes the aim of war is to weaken the military forces of the enemy, and it is therefore “sufficient to disable the greatest possible number of men.”¹ In other words, limitations were certainly imposed on the means by which violence was employed but within a framework that permitted mass slaughter of combatants perpetrated with weapons that did not “needlessly” aggravate suffering – a problem characteristic of laws of war more generally (Roberts 2019: 169).

The First Model of HD

For some, a defining feature of HD is the search for outright bans on weapons considered inhumane or indiscriminate, rather than mere attempts to contain them through limits on numbers, design, or use (Docherty 2010: 7–8; Sauer and Pretorius 2014: 246). Key post-Cold War HD agreements in this mode include the 1997 Mine Ban Treaty (MBT) and the 2008 Convention on Cluster Munitions (CCM). For HD campaigners, the problem with these weapons is not that they are designed to kill per se, but that they have particular characteristics which mean their use generates unacceptable levels of civilian harm. In the case of landmines and cluster munitions, for example, it is argued they are incapable of discriminating between combatant and civilian and that they remain long after conflicts are over, thus doubly threatening noncombatants (Grillot et al. 2006: 70). Such initiatives can be classified as the first model of HD, where the aim is to achieve outright bans on new or established conventional weapons, many of which have previously been considered unexceptional elements in the armories of militaries.

¹ See: <https://ihl-databases.icrc.org/applic/ihl/ihl.nsf/Article.xsp?action=openDocument&documentId=568842C2B90F4A29C12563CD0051547C>

The Second Model of HD

Others adopt a more expansive definition of HD that includes “all international weapons regulations and commitments that are explicitly framed as humanitarian” (Benjamin-Britton et al. 2020: 6–7). This captures weapon-specific regulation short of a ban such as the restraints on the employment of laser weapons noted above. It also includes initiatives restricting the trade in conventional weapons on humanitarian grounds (even if more realpolitik considerations also shape them). Examples include the 1890 Brussels Act (the first modern multilateral treaty restricting the trade in arms (Cooper 2018)) and the 2013 Arms Trade Treaty, both framed by supporters in humanitarian terms and both accompanied by significant transnational civil society campaigns.

The Third Model of HD

As will be illustrated below, the TPNW might be conceptualized as a form of third model HD – a humanitarian weapon prohibition applied to “apex weapons,” core strategic weapons perceived as not only central to the military plans of possessors, but also integral to their status, security identity, and security subjectivities. It can be argued that the prominence given to humanitarian considerations plus the significant role played by civil society advocates means the TPNW currently represents a unique form of HD. For example, Docherty has suggested the focus on humanitarianism and human security means HD initiatives are not only distinct from traditional arms control, but also distinct from qualitative disarmament initiatives such as the BWC and the CWC. The argument here is that the driver for the latter kind of disarmament represented a calculation by major military powers that they had a greater security interest in preventing the spread of such weapons to other states than they had in retaining them in their own arsenals. Docherty thus describes such initiatives as examples of “security disarmament” (Docherty 2010: 12). In contrast, Finaud (2017: 25–29) includes both the BWC and CWC in his discussion of humanitarian disarmament, arguing early prohibitions can be traced back to the origins of IHL and that both conventions explicitly reference the notion that disarmament was undertaken “for the sake of all mankind” (p. 25–29). Considine (2017) has also highlighted the similarity in the language of traditional UN disarmament documents and the 2015 Humanitarian Pledge on nuclear weapons adopted by the UN General Assembly (UNGA) in Resolution 70/48. Plesch and Miletic (2020) suggest that humanitarian considerations have always been present in more traditional disarmament initiatives. As this discussion illustrates, the parameters of HD are far from settled, a reflection, perhaps, of its relative infancy as a field of theory. Nevertheless, the TPNW is best situated in the longer history of qualitative disarmament efforts to ban militarily-significant weapons, including efforts at the League of Nations Disarmament Conference and agreements on the BWC and CWC. Finally, it should be noted that HD initiatives may move between these different categories at different times. For example, early action on landmines under the CCW was situated in a model 2 approach focused on regulating use, only later moving to a model 1 ban under pressure from civil society (see below).

Key Claims Made for Humanitarian Disarmament

For supporters, the crucial roles played by civil society and like-minded middle-power states – plus the willingness to move negotiations outside of statist negotiating fora such as the Conference on Disarmament – have led to a democratization of disarmament (Mekata 2018). The voices of people (represented by progressive civil society groups) have been privileged over states, while the preferences of weaker states have been prioritized over those of major powers. For example, the International Campaign to Abolish Nuclear Weapons (ICAN) lists some 550 partner organizations spread across 103 countries of the world (ICAN 2019: 6–7), while over 100 NGOs actively participated and contributed to negotiations on the TPNW (something quite unprecedented for nuclear-weapon-related negotiations (Mukhatzhanova 2017)).

Advocates also argue that HD agreements establish powerful international norms capable of constraining the policies of even nonsignatory states. This idea has been taken to its extreme in the campaign for the TPNW, which faced fierce resistance from the NWS who have all adamantly refused to join. For campaigners, however, the ban campaign was less about changing the actual policies of the NWS (at least in the first instance) and more about “changing the normative international environment,” so as to delegitimize nuclear weapons possession and thus increase the reputational costs of possession (Ritchie 2016: 7). This has led Tannenwald (2020a, b: 116; also see Williams 2018) to suggest “the [nuclear] ban treaty is not itself a disarmament treaty. It is a vehicle for stigmatization politics.” This represents another aspect of disarmament without disarmament. Proponents of HD also claim that the normative principles established with regard to a weapon ban can be “grafted” onto campaigns for further bans, meaning the first ban has the potential to engender the next and so on – a kind of rolling normative expansion of the universe of weapons covered by HD restraints (Mueller 2017). This process is perhaps most obvious in the way the landmine ban provided a normative reference point for the campaign to ban cluster munitions, the latter framed by campaigners as de facto landmines (Petrova 2018: 639).

Finally, observers highlight the way campaigners have drawn on liberal, constructivist, feminist, and poststructural schools of international relations theory to both explain and inform campaigning strategies (Bolton and Mitchell 2014: 2). Others have described HD activists as engaging in the kind of immanent critique and counterhegemonic resistance advocated by critical theorists (Petrova 2018; Ritchie and Egeland 2018). Thus, rather like the field of arms control, HD stands out as an arena where theory and ideas in the academic domain have influenced practice. Whether this has taken the form of eclectic cherry-picking as opposed to rigorous theoretical integration is perhaps more of a moot point. For instance, while postpositive insights about the social construction of technology may have informed efforts to produce an “ideational reframing” of landmines etc., these same insights were actually harnessed to the goal of ever more firmly fixing technologically determinist conceptions of such weapons.

The archetype – and originator of the post-Cold War return to HD – is the campaign for the Mine Ban Treaty which involved over a thousand NGOs from 60 countries (Price 1998: 618). Landmine use was already subject to certain restrictions in the 1980 Convention on Certain Conventional Weapons (CCW), but the convention was weak, fell short of a total prohibition, and was both statist and subject to decision-making by consensus (Thakur and Maley 1999: 283; Dunworth 2020: 112–122). When attempts to strengthen these restrictions at the 1996 CCW review conference were frustrated, NGOs and sympathetic middle-power states convened a series of alternative meetings culminating in Ottawa where the Mine Ban Treaty was adopted.² Agreement on the treaty was grounded in the ability of campaigners to transform what had previously been understood as an unexceptional weapon into an odious one, deemed inherently inhumane, even “evil in themselves” (Bolton 2020: 25). They were similarly successful in questioning the military utility of these weapons (Petrova 2018: 641–642). To date, there are 164 state parties to the treaty (see Table 2), leaving it as the most widely adopted HD treaty. Transfers of landmines appear to have ceased, and 41 states have ceased the production of antipersonnel mines, including 4 not party to the treaty (Egypt, Israel, Nepal, and the USA (International Campaign to Ban Landmines 2019: 15)). The global stockpile of landmines has fallen from 160 million in 1999 to less than 50 million (International Campaign to Ban Landmines 2019: 17). In addition, the organization Geneva Call (GC), formed in 2000, promotes the ban among armed nonstate actors (ANSAs), 53 of whom have signed GC's "Deed of Commitment" on the mine ban (Geneva Call; also see Abramson 2018). A distinctive innovation in the MBT (also the CMB and TPNW but not the ATT) was the inclusion of provisions for remediation and victim assistance (Docherty 2021). This is perhaps the most unique and substantive contribution HD instruments have made to efforts to control the means of violence. For example, in the 5-year period from 2014–2018, donors have provided some $2.6 billion in support for mine action (see below) and an estimated 661,491 landmines have been destroyed (Fig. 1).

²Formally titled, Convention on the Prohibition, Use, Stockpiling, Production and Transfer of Anti-Personnel Mines and their Destruction

Some Challenges to the Claims Made for Humanitarian Disarmament

The analysis of HD proponents can be challenged on a number of counts. First, identifying HD as "the newest type of disarmament" ignores the extensive history of efforts to impose bans or restrictions on pariah weapons. This includes, for example, attempts to impose prohibitions on the use of poison, "Greek fire," the crossbow, and the gun (in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century Japan) (Perrin 1979; Mayor 2009; Payne-Gallwey 2007), restrictions often justified in moral or ethical terms (Cooper 2011: 141–143). At best therefore, HD is better understood as a new, explicitly humanitarian, variant of an age-old phenomenon, and explanations for such pariah weapon prohibitions need to be sought in an understanding of the functions these have performed for different societies and cultures throughout history. For example, the articulation of such prohibitions may simply be part of the story martial cultures tell themselves about why their perpetration of organized mass violence is, nevertheless, morally appropriate because it is subject to certain limitations.

Second, a feature of all HD agreements is that formal provisions for monitoring and verification of compliance are weak or absent, although this has been somewhat offset by extensive civil society monitoring of implementation. Third, the supposed contrast with the statism of traditional disarmament agreements requires qualification. On the one hand, a defining feature of virtually all modern HD negotiating processes has been the commensurately greater role and influence of civil society. Moreover, key agreements (e.g., the landmines ban) have been explicitly framed in humanitarian and human security terms. However, as Sauer and Pretorius (2014: 246) note, "the humanitarian approach starts from the assumption that a treaty that is supported by a very large group of states in the world sets a new standard." Thus, if HD both challenges statist understandings of security and mobilizes a variety of nonstate actors, it also operates on quite statist assumptions about norm-building processes and the international system. Moreover, some HD agreements have been just as infused with statist influences as more traditional disarmament agreements. Support for the ATT from states in Africa and Latin America reflected statist security concerns (the threat from armed rebels and criminal groups) as much as, if not more than, humanitarian concerns. Such concerns at least partly animated support for prohibitions on arms sales to nonstate actors. Conversely, US security interests and great power influence meant it was both willing and able to veto such proposals (Stavrianakis 2019: 69–70). Moreover, the text of the treaty itself is shot-through with statism – references to the interests of states, the rights of states, the political independence of states, and the domestic jurisdiction of states abound, but one searches in vain for any reference to even human security (see case study chapter). Even the nuclear ban treaty permits a state "exercising . . . national sovereignty" to withdraw where extraordinary events have "jeopardized its supreme interests."³

Fourth, the notion that HD has democratized disarmament also requires qualification. It is certainly the case that HD campaigns have drawn on impressive international networks of NGOs and like-minded small and medium powers. Activists have also been able to influence negotiating processes in far more substantive ways than was the case in the arms control negotiations of the Cold War. However, while the landmines campaign certainly garnered public and media interest, even supporters have noted it “was never a huge grassroots movement” (Petrova 2018: 650). To some extent, this judgment may underestimate the wide level of public support in countries heavily affected by mines such as Cambodia. However, subsequent campaigns have become more narrowly based around a core of professional campaigning groups and individuals (ibid). Indeed, as Ritchie and Egeland (2018: 23) have noted, this shaped the campaigning strategies of nuclear ban activists: “given the absence of media attention and mass public protest that might galvanise change at the national level, the humanitarian initiative’s architects focused their efforts on the diplomatic level.”

³See: <http://undocs.org/A/CONF.229/2017/8>

Source: International Campaign to Ban Landmines, Landmine Monitor 2019, p. 84

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Fig. 1 International Support for Mine Action (2008-2018). (Source: International Campaign to Ban Landmines, Landmine Monitor; 2019, p. 84)

This is even more notable when HD is contrasted with the public campaigns and million-plus petitions that accompanied the Hague Disarmament Conferences, the League of Nations Disarmament Conference of the 1930s (Caedel 1980; Knopf 2012: 175), and the nuclear disarmament movement of the early 1980s. In the latter case, for example, between 750,000 and a million people (estimates differ) attended a 1982 rally in New York in favor of nuclear disarmament – the largest political rally in US history (Wittner 2010; Knopf 2012, 178; Van Voorst 1982). In the same year, disarmament campaigners in the USA placed a nuclear freeze proposal on the ballot in numerous state legislatures, cities, and town meetings. In total, 18 million Americans voted on the freeze proposal, with 10.7 million (60%) voting in favor (Cortright 2008: 146). In October 1983, nearly 3 million people marched across cities in Europe to protest US nuclear missile deployments. This included 300,000 people in London, a million people in the Dutch capital, the Hague, and over a million in Germany’s major cities of Hamburg, Bonn, Stuttgart, and West Berlin (Cortright 2008: 148).

In contrast, the remarkable thing about the TPNW is not that it democratized the antinuclear movement but that it was achieved without the kind of sustained mass public engagement that characterized earlier efforts at disarmament often viewed as failures (the extent to which this was the case for campaigns in the 1950s and 1980s is perhaps more debatable (Knopf 1988)). As Tannenwald (2020a, b: 127, also see Gibbons 2018: 36) has noted:

...there is no widespread grassroots anti-nuclear movement the way there was during the 1950s in response to atmospheric nuclear testing or during the 1980s with the nuclear freeze movement. Despite the central involvement of civil society groups in the humanitarian campaign [for the TPNW], the campaign itself was largely an elite and interest group phenomenon. Millions of citizens are not out rallying in the streets to reduce nuclear dangers.

Observers have also highlighted the fact that it is Northern NGOs who have been the principal gatekeepers determining what campaigning issues are prioritized (e.g., landmines versus thermobaric weapons) (Carpenter 2014), while they have been the largest recipients of funding (Stavrianakis 2011: 208; O’Dwyer 2014: 127–133 and 207–220) and have had the largest presence in many HD movements. For example, out of 1,131 organizations involved in the ICBL, the majority (831) hailed from the Northern hemisphere (Grillot et al. 2006: 72). Likewise, over 70% of civil society organizations participating in multilateral disarmament fora are registered in high-income countries, and 95% of civil society statements or presentations delivered in these fora between 2010 and 2014 were by an organization from a high-income state (Minor 2020: 231). The exception here is the TPNW, but this is as much down to the fact that high income NWS and many of their high-income allies effectively boycotted the TPNW negotiations. Furthermore, while Minor’s study of disarmament meetings between 2010 and 2014 found that income disparities in average attendance at disarmament meetings were lower for HD fora (Minor 2020: 232), Hugo and Egeland’s data for 2015–2018 showed less positive trends. Most notably, the average number of low-income and lower middle-income states attending key disarmament forums in the period 2015–2018 was actually lower for HD forums than for more traditional instruments such as the CWC, BWC, and NPT, the only exception being the 2017 negotiating conference of the TPNW (see Table 1). In part, this reflects the fact there has also been greater universalization of the latter treaties compared with HD Treaties (see Table 2). Finally, although the proportion of women attending meetings is broadly the same across all fora, the numbers are marginally higher for traditional disarmament instruments and particularly low for the mine ban treaty (see Table 1). In summary, the broader HD movement still has questions to answer over levels of inclusivity.

Fifth, Vilmer (drawing on the work of Finnemore and Sikkink) argues the strength of a norm is not just a function of the number of states that have signed up to it, but the number of critical states (e.g., states without which the achievement of a norms goals is compromised, or states with a particular moral stature (Vilmer 2020: 6)). This has implications for judgments about the normative strength and potential of different treaties. For example, Finnemore and Sikkink (1998: 901) suggest that in the case of the landmine ban, states that did not produce or use landmines were not critical states, whereas support from landmine producers such as Britain and France facilitated consolidation of the norm. Likewise, South Africa under Nelson Mandela had a moral stature that meant its support for the ban was influential in persuading other states to sign up. Using this criterion, Vilmer argues that (in contrast to the landmine treaty) the TPNW is unlikely to progress beyond the first stage of the norm lifecycle (norm emergence) because it has so little support from critical states. For example, none of the NWS have signed the treaty, nor any NATO states, nor any of the G7 group of states, and nor any of the top ten military powers in the world (who between them accounted for some 75% of global military

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Table 1 Attendance at disarmament forums (2015–2018)

| | Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons (2017 negotiating conference) | Mine Ban Treaty | Cluster Munitions Ban | Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty | Biological Weapons Convention | Chemical Weapons Convention |
|--|--|-----------------|-----------------------|----------------------------------|-------------------------------|-----------------------------|
| Average number of low- and middle-income states attending meetings | 63 | 32.8 | 27.8 | 44.3 | 43.5 | 51.5 |
| Average share of women in meetings (%) | 30 | 23.2 | 30 | 30.8 | 32.4 | 32.6 |

Source: Torbjørn Graff Hugo and Kjølvs Egeland (2020), Patterns of Participation in Multilateral Disarmament Forums, Norwegian People’s Aid: <https://commons.lib.jmu.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2431&context=cisr-globalcwwd>

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Table 2 Number of state parties to key treaties

| | Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons | Convention on Cluster Munitions | Arms Trade Treaty | Mine Ban Treaty | Biological Weapons Convention | Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty | Chemical Weapons Convention |
|---------------|--|---------------------------------|-------------------|-----------------|-------------------------------|----------------------------------|-----------------------------|
| State parties | 51 | 110 | 110 | 164 | 183 | 190 ^a | 193 |

Source: UNODA Disarmament Treaties Database: <http://disarmament.un.org/treaties/>

^a191 including North Korea which announced its decision to withdraw in 2003 but is still listed as a state party to the treaty in UN documents, albeit with its status described as uncertain

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Table 3 Membership of humanitarian disarmament treaties among states with the highest military expenditure

| Top ten countries by military expenditure (2019) | % share world milex 2019 | % share world arms exports 2015–2019 | 1997 Landmines Ban (Ottawa) Treaty | 2008 Cluster Munitions Treaty | 2013 Arms Trade Treaty | 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons |
|--|--------------------------|--------------------------------------|------------------------------------|-------------------------------|------------------------|---|
| USA | 38 | 36 | Not signed | Not signed | Signed but “revoked” | Not signed |
| China | [14] | 5.5 | Not signed | Not signed | Acceded | Not signed |
| India | 3.7 | – | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed |
| Russia | 3.4 | 21 | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed |
| Saudi Arabia | [3.2] | – | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed | Not signed |
| France | 2.6 | 7.9 | Ratified | Ratified | Ratified | Not signed |
| Germany | 2.6 | 5.8 | Ratified | Ratified | Ratified | Not signed |
| UK | 2.5 | 3.7 | Ratified | Ratified | Ratified | Not signed |
| Japan | 2.5 | – | Ratified | Ratified | Ratified | Not signed |
| South Korea | 2.3 | 2.1 | Not signed | Not signed | Ratified | Not signed |
| Total | 74.8 | | | | | |
| Not signed/revoked ATT | 48.3 | 57 | | | | |

Sources: Wezeman et al. (2020a), “Trends in International Arms Transfers, 2019,” SIPRI Fact Sheet: <https://www.sipri.org/publications/2020/sipri-fact-sheets/trends-international-arms-transfers-2019>; Tian, Nan (et al.) (2020), “Trends in World Military Expenditure, 2019,” SIPRI Fact Sheet: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-04/fs_2020_04_milex_0.pdf

expenditure in 2019 (see Table 3)). Likewise, many of the states that traditionally support disarmament initiatives on moral grounds are absent from the TPNW including Japan, Switzerland, and Sweden. In contrast to most other HD treaties, virtually all of Europe (with the exception of Austria, Malta, the Holy See, and Ireland) has yet to sign the treaty. A similar case can also be made for the Arms Trade Treaty. Although a much larger number of critical states have adopted the treaty, including major arms trading states (e.g., China, Britain, and France), the absence of Russia and the USA alone (who between them account for 57% of global arms exports (see Table 3)) means the ATT currently fails to cover the majority of the global arms trade. Moreover, EU states – who were already signed up to the stricter criteria enumerated in the long-standing EU Common Position – accounted for 26% of global arms exports in the same period (Wezeman et al. 2020a: 4). Thus, those states that have signed up to the ATT but were not already signed up to the stricter export criteria of the EU Common Position currently account for just 17% of the global arms trade. This may well change if the new Biden administration recommits to the ATT (with or without ratification by Congress), but to date, the normative “value-added” of the ATT has been quite marginal. Even more notably, many states that have signed up to ATT norms, in principle, also operate a system of norm exceptionalism, whereby certain exports to certain countries are effectively exempted from the application of ATT norms (UK exports to Saudi Arabia being a case in point (Stavrianakis 2020; Acheson 2019)). Thus, even if the number of critical states supporting the treaty rises, the commitment to ATT norms on arms transfers seems likely to remain both shallow and intermittent at best – a situation facilitated by the wording of a treaty that essentially adopts a permissive approach to arms exports (see below).

The notion of a perpetual normative progression also suggests a determinist teleology of weapons norms and weapons law that is in contrast to a long history of norm retrenchment (e.g., the demise of both the ABM treaty and the INF Treaty) and circumvention. It also downplays the potential for counternorms to be re-enshrined by opponents (the norm of deterrence in the case of the TPNW, liberal market norms in the case of the Arms Trade Treaty, or the norm of “home combatant” protection in the case of “killer robots” (Bode and Huelss 2018: 407; Horowitz 2016)); or for the content of existing norms to simply be reinterpreted. Unsurprisingly, therefore, the reality of established HD agreements is that they have already experienced a mix of normative progression and regression. Thus, while China acceded to the ATT in July 2020, the Trump administration essentially reversed Obama era commitments to the ATT. Moreover, China’s accession and American withdrawal have led some observers to worry that the ATT’s “political center of gravity” is currently moving from the West to the East, with negative consequences for the interpretation of ATT humanitarian norms (Vestner 2020: 18). Such oscillation between moments of progression and moments of regression seems as likely to be a feature of HD as it has been for mainstream arms control.

The landmines ban can probably lay claim to be the most widely adhered and effective HD agreement, but there are even signs of normative retrenchment/circumvention here. For example, although the USA has consistently refused to sign the treaty, supporters have pointed to general US adherence to its principles as a sign of normative influence on nonsignatories. However, the Trump administration replaced Obama-era restrictions on the use of landmines outside the Korean peninsula with a policy permitting the production and use of “non-persistent” landmines (those with self-destruct or self-deactivation mechanisms). Even more notably, while the number of casualties from mines and explosive remnants of war dropped in every 5-year period through to 2013, there was a significant rise in the period 2014–2018 (see Table 4). Indeed, the casualty rates for 2016 (9,439) were double those recorded in 2013 (3,457), the lowest recorded year for casualties. These rises partly reflect the impact of the Syrian conflict, and the overall numbers may well decline again (at least until the next major conflict) as the influence of Syria on deaths from armed violence reduces. However, they also reflect a significant rise in the number of casualties from improvised mines. Indeed, the figure for improvised mine casualties alone in 2018 (3,789) was higher than the casualties caused by all mine varieties for 2013. As Njeri et al. (2020: 255) have noted, this raises the question of “whether a ban on one of type of weapon may lead some actors to circumvent norms by using other, similar weapons.”

A further area where there has been retrenchment is in the commitment of states to transparency on implementation of key HD agreements. The proportion of states submitting annual reports on implementation of the ATT has steadily declined from a high of 80% in 2015 to a low of 44% (44 states) in 2019. For the landmine treaty, annual reporting rates have declined from a high of 91% in 2004 to a low of 34% in 2020 (see Fig. 2). Moreover, an assessment of ATT reports actually submitted by states in 2017 found only 29 (33%) submitted a publicly available report containing the minimum amount of information necessary to allow a reader to assess its arms transfers (Control Arms 2019: 39). Worse still, 92% of transactions reported were not comparable – as an export did not have a corresponding import of a similar type of weapon (or vice versa (Control Arms 2019: 101)). These declines in Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Table 4 Number of mine/explosive remnants of war casualties

| | 1999–2003 | 2004–2008 | 2009–2013 | 2014–2018 |
|-------------------------------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------|
| Number of mine/ERW casualties | 42,858 | 31,789 | 21,540 | 34,558 |

Source: International Campaign to Ban Landmines, Landmine Monitor 2019, p. 53. See: <http://www.the-monitor.org/media/3074086/Landmine-Monitor-2019-Report-Final.pdf>

Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Fig. 2 Percentage of states parties to the mine ban treaty submitting annual transparency reports on implementation of the treaty.

(Source: Landmines and Cluster Monitor Factsheet, “Mine Ban Transparency Reporting” (Article 7), June 2020: http://the-monitor.org/media/3148394/factsheet_transparency_final.pdf)

reporting to key HD instruments have also coincided with significant declines in the number of states providing reports to other arms transparency instruments. By 2017, reporting to the UN Arms Register had declined to the point where just 12 states from outside Europe provided reports to the Register (Wezeman 2019). Likewise, participation in the UN Report on Military Expenditure has declined from 81 states in 2002 to just 30 of the 193 UN member states by 2018 (Wezeman et al. 2020b: 10). Those states not reporting in 2018 accounted for an estimated 81% of global military expenditure (ibid.). Two reporting instruments in the Americas – the Inter-American Convention on Transparency in Conventional Weapons Acquisition (CITAAC) and the South American Defense Expenditure Registry (SADER) – appear to be no longer active (ibid., 17). Thus, initial HD successes in promoting norms of transparency have given way to a decidedly more mixed picture.

Humanitarian Disarmament and Disarmament Without Disarmament

An even more substantive problem is that humanitarian weapons law is designed not to address militarism and militarization more generally. This is a problem particularly evident in the narrow weapon-specific bans of model 1 HD. To some extent, the achievement of the nuclear weapon ban may provide both a response to this critique and/or evidence that third model HD is evolving to embrace more traditional disarmament logics. At the same time, however, the humanitarian framing of the TPNW may, ironically, represent an obstacle to the achievement of the very disarmament that is the goal of the nuclear ban.

From the birth of humanitarianism in the nineteenth century, many peace activists viewed both international humanitarian law and organizations such as the Red Cross as unrelated to peace because they aimed not to prevent war, but to humanize it (Mathur 2017: 59; Fry and Nair 2018: 1). More recently, the military historian Michael Howard (2002: 54–55) has suggested the Hague Conferences reflected the fact that liberal internationalists had “abandoned their original objectives of preventing war and building peace in favor of making war more humane for those actually fighting it.” Others have argued the very “fluidity of the language of humanitarianism” means it can be flexibly deployed to support diametrically opposed positions on weapon bans. For example, Chiam and Hood (2019) highlight the way New Zealand and Australia both utilized humanitarian frameworks to legitimize their respective support for, and opposition to, the TPNW.

A key problem is that the emphasis on proportionality and distinction between combatant and civilian at the heart of IHL is offset by the privileging of “military necessity” (a highly elastic term) as a core countervailing norm. Partly because of this, Jochnick and Normand (1994: 50) argue “the laws of war have facilitated rather than restrained wartime violence.” Indeed, the Nuremberg Tribunal concluded as follows:

military necessity permits a belligerent, subject to the laws of war, to apply any amount of and kind of force to compel the complete submission of the enemy with the least possible expenditure of time, life and money. . . It permits the destruction of life of armed enemies and other person whose destruction is incidentally unavoidable. (cited in Jochnick and Normand 1994: 93)

Thus, the umbilical linkage between humanitarianism, IHL, and HD initiatives means the latter are inevitably circumscribed in their ability to constrain the instruments of armed violence because armed violence per se is legitimized by humanitarianism. This problem is put into particularly stark relief in the case of model 1 weapon bans such as those on landmines and cluster munitions. At a minimum, such bans “denounce the weapon without denouncing organized violence” and produce “a resounding silence [my italics] about the broader issues of violence and conflict” (Dunworth 2020: 170). However, in the context of a militarized global society, the attempt to stigmatize particular weapons invariably goes beyond silence about militarism to actively produce a hierarchy of nonlegitimized and legitimized weapons that leaves the vast majority of armaments in the latter category. Indeed, bans on landmines and cluster munitions on the grounds they lack the capacity to discriminate between combatant and civilian also function to reinforce the legitimacy of modern so-called “precision weapons” (Zehfuss 2010: 552–553). In short, at least up to the nuclear weapon ban (see below), HD largely abandoned strategic contestation of global militarism in favor of achieving tactical humanitarian disarmament successes – a one-weapon at a time approach to disarmament.

Nor was this simply an accidental by-product of the humanitarian framework. Rather, for many activists, the HD framework was adopted precisely because it was so unthreatening both to the institution of war and to the major military powers. As Carpenter, (2014: 117) drawing on interviews with activists, has observed:

the very concept of “humanitarian disarmament” was developed in part to reclaim disarmament issues from the antimilitarist movement: to make disarmament about civilian protection, a cause that militaries and humanitarian organizations could get behind, rather than about ending war altogether.

Likewise, organizations such as the ICRC have viewed their credibility with governments as “contingent in part on avoiding connections to peace activism. . . the “no tree huggers” rule” (Carpenter 2014: 105). The Executive Director of ICAN has also emphasized the concern to avoid association with the “traditional peace movement” and its “left-wing, anti-military, anti-capitalist” leanings (Fihn interview, in Mekata 2018: 81). Even Ritchie and Egeland’s (2018: 131) depiction of the campaign for a nuclear weapon ban as a counterhegemonic diplomacy of resistance acknowledges the humanitarian framing was chosen precisely because it was “politically unthreatening.” Of course, in large part, this is why the model 1 HD campaigns, on landmines and cluster munitions in particular, were so successful. Activists found a way to mobilize supporters around ostensibly radical proposals for weapon bans while framing such proposals in a way that reassured states they were not going after their military arsenals and military logics per se. They have even endeavored to portray what were deeply political initiatives as expressions of an apolitical humanitarianism that everyone should be comfortable with.

On one view, this is simply an example of smart campaigning discursive politics aimed at achieving incremental successes in international weapons law. Alternatively, the adoption of HD, with its more limited aims, can be understood as a tactical response on the part of campaigners to both the decline in public engagement and the diminution of diplomatic space for more radical disarmament agendas; a manifestation of the relative weakness of a disarmament movement contending with a revived post-Cold War militarism, rather than an expression of its strength. It should also be noted that the humanitarian disarmament movement is not monolithic. For example, the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF) has actively supported HD treaties while articulating a more general position against militarism (see Acheson 2020). Nevertheless, the center of gravity of HD activism has been focused around efforts to distinguish the problem posed by either individual weapons or specific weapon transfers, rather than militarism and the arms trade per se. Inevitably, this legitimizes the very armament dynamics that either enable actors to find alternatives to those weapons deemed off-limits or which ultimately leave weapon bans irrelevant as processes of military modernization roll over them. In the former case, as noted above, the Trump administration declared it was adopting self-destruct or self-deactivating landmines – thus violating the landmines ban while claiming to honor the norm of civilian discrimination at the heart of the ban. In the latter case, as a recent report by the US Congressional Research Service (2019: 7) has noted, “given current and predicted future precision weaponry trends, cluster munitions might be losing their military relevance.”

Consequently, when judged against the goals of narrow Cold War arms control, model 1 HD weapon bans aim to reduce the damage should war occur but do nothing to reduce either the risk of war or the costs of preparing for war. The contrast with traditional disarmament is even more striking. Up until the end of the Cold War, the preamble of major disarmament treaties described them as a step toward the goal of general and complete disarmament. This includes the 1971 Biological Weapons Convention, the 1977 Environmental Modification Convention, the 1992 Chemical Weapons Convention, and the 1996 Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. Thus, however discrete these specific initiatives may have been, and however formulaic the language, they could also be understood as part of a phased approach to the realization of GCD. In contrast, this ambition is absent from virtually all HD treaties (landmines, cluster munitions, and ATT) apart from the nuclear weapons ban (Bolton 2016: 10).

Ostensibly, model 2 nonproliferation HD instruments address the accommodation with militarism that is a feature of model 1 HD. The ATT, for example, aims to regulate significant elements of the arms trade, and campaigners have hailed it as requiring a “radical shift in behavior by the major arms exporters” (MacDonald 2014). The core of the treaty, and those elements that most clearly deliver on the humanitarian agenda of campaigners, is contained in Articles 6 and 7. However (as elaborated in the accompanying case study chapter), outside of codifying the existing obligations of states (e.g., adherence to UN arms embargoes), the combined effect is to delineate a highly permissive, one export at a time, risk model of arms export licensing that tolerates all but the most egregious arms transfers. For example, the treaty does not prohibit transfers to aggressive states, nor to states at war (unless covered by a UN arms embargo), nor to nonstate actors, nor to repressive regimes, and nor to regions characterized by acute security dilemmas. Neither does it prohibit the transfer of new or destabilizing weapons technology to regions.

Rather, it deliberately permits the vast majority of exports to states, societies, and contexts where people remain in fear of armed violence. Consequently, the impact on the actual arms export licensing decisions of states has been marginal at best and transfers to countries where known violations of human rights and international humanitarian law have continued apace (Acheson 2019; Pytlak 2020: 171). Moreover, the adoption of a narrow humanitarian framework, with its concomitant legitimization of militarism, inevitably made the attempt to circumscribe the treaty that much easier.

As the preceding discussion illustrates, HD in model 1 and 2 modes largely abandoned strategic contestation of global militarism in favor of achieving tactical humanitarian disarmament successes. Unsurprisingly perhaps, the impact of HD on either armament dynamics or overall trends in armed violence has been negligible. Between 1998 (the year after the landmine ban) and 2019, global military expenditure (excluding Iraq) rose by some 82% in real terms (see Table 5), while global arms transfers in the period 2014–2018 were 52% higher than for the period 2000–2004. The flow of arms to the Middle East, the world’s most conflict-ridden region, increased by 87% between 2009–2013 and 2014–2018 (Wezeman et al. 2019). Although inter-state conflicts remain historically low, the overall number of all state-based armed conflicts (including inter-state, intra-state, and internationalized intrastate) in 2019 was the highest recorded (54) in the post-1946 period, driven in part by a surge in conflicts in Africa, which also recorded its highest number of conflicts in the post-1946 period (Pettersson and Öberg 2020). The UN Secretary-General’s 2018 Agenda for Disarmament depicted a world where:

global military spending and capabilities exceed those seen at any point since the fall of the Berlin Wall...[a world characterized by] unrestrained arms competition...[where] limits on major conventional forces have been left aside...[and where] armed conflicts are more protracted, more lethal for civilians and more prone to regional rivalries and external intervention...In all circumstances, the excessive accumulation of arms...fuel violence. (UN Office for Disarmament Affairs 2018: 3)

Clearly, these conflict trends have their roots in a range of local and international dynamics that HD was never designed to address, albeit quite deliberately so. Nevertheless, for a project and an activist movement centered on preventing the human suffering produced by armed violence, this is not the best evidentiary basis on which to root claims of success.

In contrast, the TPNW can be understood as a qualitatively different kind of humanitarian disarmament (see the case study chapter for more detail). In part, this is because the absence of the NWS means the TPNW currently functions solely as a stigmatization treaty, rather than one that actually operationalizes disarmament. However, it is also different because of the nature of the weapons targeted by the treaty. In the case of landmines and cluster munitions, the humanitarian framing permitted activists to carve out critiques of the weapons from broader critiques of militarism and thus made it easier to assemble a coalition of supportive states. Many (if not all) of the world’s leading spenders on defense and the world’s leading arms exporters could safely sign up to these model 1 HD agreements safe in the knowledge that their military establishments would only be marginally impacted. In contrast, nuclear weapons are “apex weapons” perceived as central to the security, prestige, and even identity of NWS states. They are also more intimately connected to the broader logics that sustain war, militarism, and security diplomacy. Given this, the nuclear ban campaign inevitably encountered fierce resistance from the NWS and many of their allies – actors able to wield immense economic and diplomatic power. Furthermore, the focus on nuclear weapons inevitably meant the line drawn in the humanitarian tradition between critiquing specific methods of war, but not war, and militarism itself was at least blurred, notwithstanding the efforts of some campaigners to avoid the association with antimilitarism. This marks out the TPNW as a more signal achievement than either the landmines or cluster munitions bans.

As already noted, however, a fundamental problem with a humanitarian approach to disarmament is that the emphasis on proportionality and distinction is umbilically linked with the Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament, Table 5 Global military expenditure (in constant US$b at 2018 prices)

| | 1998 | 2003 | 2008 | 2009 | 2010 | 2011 | 2012 | 2013 | 2014 | 2015 | 2016 | 2017 | 2018 | 2019 | % change 1998–2019 |
|-----------------------------------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|--------------------|
| GME (excluding Iraq) ^a | 1054 | 1301 | 1637 | 1753 | 1789 | 1794 | 1778 | 1748 | 1743 | 1766 | 1779 | 1800 | 1849 | 1914 | 81.6 |
| GME (including Iraq) | | | 1641 | 1757 | 1793 | 1799 | 1783 | 1756 | 1750 | 1776 | 1785 | 1807 | 1855 | 1922 | |

Source: SIPRI Military Expenditure Database: <https://www.sipri.org/databases/milex>

^aIraq is excluded for certain years because there is insufficient data to make meaningful estimates equally powerful norm of military necessity and the broader legitimization of war and militarism. The challenges this raises for getting down to nuclear zero are neatly illustrated by the 1996 International Court of Justice opinion on the legality of nuclear weapons. On the one hand, the court recognized the uniquely devastating consequences of nuclear war, noting “the destructive power of nuclear weapons cannot be contained in either space or time” (ICJ 1996: para 35). On the other hand, it ultimately declined to take a position on the legality of nuclear weapons, including their compatibility with IHL. Its conclusion essentially balanced the norms of proportionality and distinction against the norm of military necessity, expressed in this case, as self-defense:

...the threat or use of nuclear weapons would generally be contrary to the rules of international law applicable in armed conflict, and in particular the principles and rules of humanitarian law;

However...the Court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defense, in which the very survival of a State would be at stake [my emphasis]. (ICJ 1996: E)

As the ICJ opinion indicates, both the veneration of military necessity and the essentially plastic nature of concepts such as “necessity,” “proportionality,” and “civilian” (Wilke 2018; Lewis and Sagan 2016) provide a route to justify nuclear weapons using exactly the same discursive framework as that deployed by ban proponents. Indeed, as already noted, even the TPNW recognizes the norm of military necessity by stipulating a right to withdraw where “extraordinary events...have jeopardized the supreme interests of a country.”⁴ Thus, while the humanitarian framing was certainly effective in persuading significant constituencies of non-nuclear states to sign a ban treaty, it may be less effective against NWS committed both to a counternormative strategy centered on revalorizing the norm of deterrence (Tannenwald 2020a, b) and a norm reinterpretation strategy based on an alternative understanding of proportionality, distinction, and their correlation with the norm of military necessity (see case study chapter). Instead, a more traditional qualitative disarmament framework rooted in a more broad-ranging philosophy of antimilitarism might actually provide a sounder basis around which to challenge NWS arguments for continued possession. Such a framework, while still based on a concern about the devastating human and ecological consequences of nuclear war, is not only less open to normative reinterpretation but also provides a stronger basis for addressing the multiple interconnections between nuclear disarmament and conventional armament dynamics, as well as justifications of low-yield NW.

Conclusion: Reflections on the Past, Present, and Future of Humanitarian Disarmament

In conclusion, disarmament practices of various kinds are currently more common than the practices of narrow arms control. However, the hegemony of arms control as a paradigm for controlling the means of violence has meant the contemporary ubiquity of disarmament remains largely unacknowledged. In part, this is because the emergence of arms control rested on the equation of disarmament with pure disarmament or general and complete disarmament. This facilitated its dismissal as failed, utopian, crude, and old-fashioned. At the same time, successful disarmament initiatives such as the BWC or the CWC were reframed as examples of successful arms control. Indeed, a perennial feature of arms control theory has been the persistent refusal to acknowledge that examples of successful disarmament might simply be examples of successful disarmament. Contemporary disarmament includes a range of examples, some of them decidedly nonutopian. The most notable are the following: coercive disarmament (of various types), structural disarmament, DDR, the disarmament of sacred spaces, and qualitative disarmament.

The parameters of HD are contested even by supporters, but three distinct models of HD have emerged. The first seeks outright prohibitions on conventional weapons previously considered unexceptional instruments of warfare (e.g., landmines and cluster munitions). The second focuses on establishing regulatory frameworks rather than a blanket prohibition on either specific weapons or arms transfers. The third aims to establish normative prohibitions on “apex weapons.” Most HD practices (with the exception of HD nonproliferation instruments) can be understood as a distinct subset of qualitative disarmament, one that foregrounds humanitarian rationales for control, includes an enhanced role for civil society, and often features provisions for remediation and victim assistance. For supporters, HD has achieved remarkable disarmament successes that have prevented and mitigated human suffering caused by inhumane weapons and irresponsible arms transfers. It has also established powerful norms capable of influencing the behavior of states that remain outside formal HD regimes. Moreover, the enhanced role of civil society and the empowerment of states and voices from the global south has democratized disarmament and enacted a form of disarmament from below, even a counterhegemonic resistance to nuclear and other security logics. However, the content of many HD agreements has also been influenced by statist considerations, even supporters have described it as “politically unthreatening,” public engagement compares poorly with earlier eras of disarmament activism, and (with the exception of the TPNW) actors from the global north still tend to dominate HD fora. State reporting to HD instruments such as the MBT and the ATT has declined, casualty rates from mines and explosive remnants of war have risen, and processes of military modernization may be making the ban on cluster munitions irrelevant. States that signed the ATT, and were not already committed to the EU’s stricter criteria on arms transfers, currently account for just 17% of the global arms trade. This may change if the Biden administration recommits to ATT norms, but irrespective, the actual impact of the treaty on the arms transfer practices of states that are party to the treaty has been minimal, and this seems unlikely to change, with or without US membership.

⁴See: <http://undocs.org/A/CONF.229/2017/8>

More fundamentally, although IHL valorizes norms of proportionality and distinction between combatant and civilian, it also privileges the norm of military necessity, while giving the institution of war a pass. This umbilical linkage between humanitarianism, IHL, and HD means the latter is circumscribed in its ability to constrain the means of violence, because armed violence per se is legitimized by IHL. In model 1 mode, in particular, HD establishes a global hierarchy of legitimized and nonlegitimized weapons that leaves the vast majority of weapons in the former category and fails to address the armament dynamics that drive continuous weapon innovation, including the production of alternatives to banned technologies. This leaves model 1 HD potentially engaged in an endlessly recurring cycle of weapons ban “whack-a-mole.” Model 2 nonproliferation instruments such as the ATT are equally flawed. In the latter case, the humanitarian framing facilitated a narrow conceptualization of problem transfers that permits all but the most egregious exports and falls well short of the kind of restrictions that even a human security framework would have made more likely. Unsurprisingly, the era of HD – and the broader ubiquity of disarmament practices – has coincided with significant rises in global military expenditure and the global arms trade. The current era is therefore best characterized as one of disarmament without disarmament in a more meaningful sense, and models 1 and 2 HD as practices of disarmament without disarmament.

In contrast, the TPNW represents a third and qualitatively different model of HD, one focused on banning apex weapons and one that required HD activists to challenge the core security logics and identities of major military powers. The TPNW therefore represents a more signal achievement than other HD agreements, notwithstanding its current status as a stigmatization treaty rather than a disarmament treaty. At the same time, while the humanitarian framing was sufficient to persuade significant constituencies of states to sign up to the TPNW, the reification of military necessity in IHL also provides a route to norm reinterpretation on the part of NWS concerned to defend the status quo. Although by no means inevitable, the seeds of the TPNW's ultimate failure may well lie in the normative roots of its success.

One final issue concerns the question of whether HD will remain relevant (and if so, which kind) in an era characterized by discrete and interconnected advances in fields such as AI, robotics, cyberspace, remote sensing, microelectronics, biotechnology, and nanotechnology. For example, Rosert and Sauer have argued that the HD "killer robots campaign" to establish a preventive ban on lethal autonomous weapons systems (LAWS) is unlikely to succeed – at least in its original incarnation. In part, this is because "autonomy" is "polymorphic" (a design feature occurring across multiple weapons platforms), so there is no single weapon to be banned and no characteristic injuries of the kind critical to the prohibitions on landmines. But it is also because they may not necessarily violate IHL principles of necessity or distinction. Indeed, defenders argue that future LAWS will be able to "outperform human soldiers in their ethical capacity under comparable circumstances" (Arkin 2010: 339; Rosert and Sauer 2021: 18). Of course, one of the lessons of previous HD campaigns is that weapon technologies, even nuclear weapons, have a thin materiality that leaves their utility, symbolic meaning, and ethical content potentially open to radical reframing by social action. Nevertheless, this materiality still shapes and limits the potentials of social action. Consequently, activists wishing to essentialize LAWS as inhumane killer robots may face greater challenges than those seeking to essentialize landmines or cluster munitions as inherently indiscriminate. Similar arguments can be made with respect to other emerging technologies, whose technical complexity, roots in civilian (dual use) technology, diverse military applications, compound effects, and challenges they present for verification (let alone the secrecy attached to work on novel weaponry) will make the search for model 1 HD agreements difficult to say the least. For example, while humanitarian principles of distinction and proportionality may well be applicable to cyber-warfare, it is hardly a problem resolvable by a ban on the technology – as opposed to agreements eschewing certain kinds of attacks and/or efforts to establish general norms of behavior (Acton 2020: 145; Korzak 2019). This might suggest that model 2 HD will emerge as a more likely response to the varied challenges presented by new and emerging technologies. Indeed, the debate on LAWS is already moving away from proposals for a simple model 1 ban to proposals for regulation governing how and when meaningful human control might be exercised (see Boulanin et al. 2020). Not only is this consonant with military norms emphasizing the importance of the chain of command, but it is returning HD to the more technocratic, more statist, more nuanced, and less activist-orientated realm of traditional arms control. At the same time, generic dual-use technologies such as nanotechnology, AI, or robotics may well give rise to specific weapon-types that possess the kind of characteristics suitable for model 1 HD ban campaigns. Either way, however, the failure of model 1 and 2 HD to properly address militarism and armaments dynamics in general means they will always be relegated to the role of palliative rather than panacea. HD may also end up simply as an empty signifier (a phrase that has been emptied of concrete meaning (Mackillop 2018: 190)) and simply become a vague and fuzzy epithet applied to any and all control initiatives propagated by broadly progressive civil society actors. The post-Cold War expansion of HD initiatives from conventional weapon bans to regulation to nuclear bans hints at this possibility, as does the way in which HD and human security are sometimes treated as interchangeable (see case study chapter). More positively, an expansion of model 3 HD to other "apex" weapons would potentially connect it to a tradition of qualitative disarmament more clearly rooted in both a critique of militarism and a philosophy under which discrete initiatives are expressly pursued as part of a phased approach to achieving overall reductions in the means of violence in the international system. This, in turn, would require the operationalization of a broader and vaguer humanitarian sensibility, one offended by war itself, and not just its much-disputed "excesses." Whether such a transformation of HD is feasible is perhaps debatable, particularly given the resistance to antimilitarism evinced even by leading campaigners. Nevertheless, it is this route that offers most potential for the realization of a truly counterhegemonic form of HD – and the most promise for alleviation of the human suffering produced by armed violence.

Summary

Humanitarian disarmament is one of a number of practices of disarmament that are now a more common feature of international arms governance than traditional arms control agreements. HD can be divided into three models: agreements characterized by total bans on particular weapons; regulation short of a ban and bans on “apex” weapons, the latter exemplified by the TPNW. HD has been widely lauded by supporters for its supposedly radical and transformative potential, and the provisions in many agreements for remediation and victim assistance represent a significant innovation in approaches to arms limitation. However, the legitimization of the norm of military necessity at the heart of the humanitarian tradition means that HD, particularly in model one and two mode, has been constrained in its ability to address militarism and armament dynamics more generally. Similarly, while HD is often characterized as synonymous with the pursuit of human security, the humanitarian framing has facilitated a narrower conception of the universe of restraints, particularly in non-proliferation instruments such as the ATT. The post-Cold War re-emergence of HD has therefore coincided with an era of rising global military expenditure and growth in the international arms trade, both of which spur new weapons development and their spread. In contrast, the TPNW aims to ban a category of weapons that are central to the core security logics, identities, and subjectivities of major military powers. Thus, it is potentially a more signal achievement. However, the veneration of the norm of military necessity that is also central to the humanitarian tradition may offer a discursive route to continued legitimization of nuclear weapons possession by the NWS. Ironically, therefore, the ultimate seeds of the TPNW’s failure may lie in the normative roots of its success.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Human Security
- ▶ Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\)

References

- Abramson, J. (2018). Using non-state initiatives to address non-state actors: Lessons from the Humanitarian Disarmament Approach. In Y. Moser-Puangsuwan et al. (Eds.), Addressing non-state actors: Multiple approaches. A Forum on the Arms Trade Report (pp. 24–27). Forum on the Arms Trade. Available at: https://www.forumarmstrade.org/uploads/1/9/0/8/19082495/nonstateactors_multipleapproaches_2018.pdf#page=30.
- Acheson, R. (2019). Making Sure the Rhetoric Matches the Reality. ATT Monitor, 12(5), 1–2.
- Acheson, R. (2020). COVID-19: Divest, Demilitarise, and Disarm. Women’s International League For Peace & Freedom. <http://www.wilpf.org/covid-19-divest-demilitarise-and-disarm/>. Accessed 15 Jan 2021.
- Acton, J. M. (2020). Cyber warfare and inadvertent escalation. Daedalus, 149(2), 133–149.
- Allen, G., & Zayed, Y. (2021). Police Service Strength. Briefing Paper No. SN-00634. February 2021. House of Commons Library. file:///Users/rcoope28/Downloads/SN00634%20(1).pdf. Accessed 17 Feb, 2021
- Arbatov, A. (2015). An unnoticed crisis: The end of history for nuclear arms control. Carnegie Moscow Center. See: <https://carnegie.ru/2015/06/16/unnoticed-crisis-end-of-history-for-nuclear-arms-control-pub-60408>.
- Arkin, R. C. (2010). The case for ethical autonomy in unmanned systems. Journal of Military Ethics, 9(4), 332–341.
- Arms Control Association. (2000). NPT review conference final document. See: <https://www.armscontrol.org/act/2000-06/2000-npt-review-conference-final-document>
- Armove, A. (2000). Iraq Under Siege. Global Policy Forum. See: <https://www.globalpolicy.org/component/content/article/170/41909.html>.
- Banhöfer, L. (2014). When do disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration programmes succeed. German Development Institute/Deutsche Institut für Entwicklungspolitik. Working Paper No. 8: DIE: Bonn: <https://www.econstor.eu/bitstream/10419/199421/1/die-dp-2014-08.pdf>.
- Benjamin-Britton, T., Bolton, M. B., & Njeri, S. (2020). The humanitarian disarmament movement: An assessment and review. In M. B. Bolton, S. Njeri, & T. Benjamin-Britton (Eds.), Global activism and humanitarian disarmament (pp. 1–24). Palgrave Macmillan.

- Bode, I., & Huelss, K. (2018). Autonomous weapons systems and changing norms in international relations. Review of International Studies, 44(3), 393–413.
- Bolton, M. (2016). Time for a discursive rehabilitation: A brief history of general and complete disarmament. In UNODA (Ed.), Rethinking general and complete disarmament in the twenty-first century (UNODA Occasional Papers, No 28). New York: United Nation. Available at: https://www.academia.edu/28656661/Time_for_a_discursive_rehabilitation_A_brief_history_of_general_and_complete_disarmament.
- Bolton, M. (2020). Imagining Disarmament, Enchanting International Relations. Palgrave Pivot.
- Bolton, M., & Mitchell, C. (2014). The Peloponnesian War and Killer Robots: Norms of protection in security policy. e-International Relations. <https://www.e-ir.info/pdf/51822>.
- Boulanin, Vincent, Neil Davison, Netta Goussac and Moa Peldån Carlsson (2020), Limits on autonomy in weapons systems: Identifying practical elements of human control: SIPRI/ICRC. Available at: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-06/2006_limits_of_autonomy.pdf
- Broad, W., & Sanger, D. E. (2016, January 11). As US modernizes nuclear weapons ‘Smaller’ leaves some uneasy. New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2016/01/12/science/as-us-modernizes-nuclear-weapons-smaller-leaves-some-uneasy.html>.
- Bromley and Wezeman (2019), ‘Multilateral embargoes on arms and dual-use materials’, SIPRI Yearbook 2019: Armaments, Disarmament and International Security. See: <https://www.sipriyearbook.org/view/9780198839996/sipri-9780198839996-chapter-10-div1-067.xml>
- Bull, H. (1959). Disarmament and the international system. The Australian Journal of Politics and History, 5(1), 41–50.
- Bull, H. (1961). The control of the arms race: Disarmament and arms control in the missile age. New York: Praeger.
- Bunkall, A. (2019, July 27). Size of Royal Navy’s warship fleet is pathetic, says chairman of defence select committee. Sky News. See: <https://news.sky.com/story/size-of-royal-navys-warship-fleet-is-pathetic-says-chairman-of-defence-select-committee-11771371>.
- Caedel, M. (1980). The first British referendum: The peace ballot 1934–5. The English Historical Review, 95(377), 810–839.
- Caramés, A., Fisas, V., & Sanz, E. (2007). Analysis of the disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration programs existing in the world during 2006. Barcelona: School for a Culture of Peace Barcelona, Autonomous University.
- Carpenter, C. (2014). Lost causes: Agenda vetting in global issue networks and the shaping of human security. Ithaca/London: Cornell University Press.
- Chadwick, E. (2019). The British view of neutrality in 1872. In P. Lottaz & H. R. Regimbogin (Eds.), Notions of neutralities. Lexington Books. Available at SSRN: <https://ssrn.com/abstract=3337075>.
- Chiam, M., & Hood, A. (2019). Nuclear humanitarianism. Journal of Conflict & Security Law, 24(3), 473–501.
- Congressional Budget Office. (2020). Projected cost of US nuclear forces 2019–2028. See: <https://www.cbo.gov/system/files/2019-01/54914-NuclearForces.pdf>
- Congressional Research Service. (2013). No-fly zones: Strategic, operational and legal considerations for congress. CRS Report for Congress. See: <https://fas.org/sgp/crs/natsec/R41701.pdf>
- Congressional Research Service. (2019). Cluster Munitions: Background and Issues for 2019. See: <https://fas.org/sgp/crs/weapons/RS22907.pdf>
- Control Arms Secretariat (2019). Arms Trade Treaty Monitor Report 2019. New York: Control Arms Secretariat. https://attmonitor.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/07/EN_ATT_Monitor-Report-2019_Online.pdf. Accessed 12 Nov 2020.
- Considine, L. (2017). The ‘standardization of catastrophe’: Nuclear disarmament, the humanitarian initiative and the politics of the unthinkable. European Journal of International Relations, 23(3), 681–702.
- Cooper, N. (2006). Putting Disarmament Back in the Frame. Review of International Studies, 32(2), 353–376.
- Cooper, N. (2011). Humanitarian Arms Control and Processes of Securitization: Moving Weapons Along the Security Continuum. Contemporary Security Policy, 32(1), 134–158.
- Cooper, N. (2018). Race, sovereignty, and free trade: Arms trade regulation and humanitarian arms control in the age of empire. Journal of Global Security Studies, 3(4), 444–462.
- Davies, T. R. (2004). France and the world disarmament conference of 1932–34. Diplomacy and Statecraft, 15(4), 765–780.
- Docherty, B. (2010). Ending civilian suffering: The purpose, provisions, and promise of humanitarian disarmament law. Austrian Review of International and European Law, 15, 7–44.
- Docherty, B. (2021). Completing the package: The development and significance of positive obligations in humanitarian disarmament law. In T. Dunworth & A. Hood (Eds.), Disarmament law: Reviving the field. Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- DOD. (2020, May 21). DOD statement on open skies treaty. See: <https://www.defense.gov/Newsroom/Releases/Release/Article/2195239/dod-statement-on-open-skies-treaty-withdrawal/#:~:text=Tomorrow%20the%20United%20States%20will,from%20the%20Open%20Skies%20Treaty.&text=U.S.%20obligations%20under%20the%20Treaty,%2C%20cooperation%2C%20and%20mutual%20understanding>.
- Dunworth, T. (2020). Humanitarian disarmament: An historical enquiry. Cambridge: CUP.
- Finaud, M. (2017). Humanitarian disarmament: Powerful new paradigm or Naïve Utopia? (Geneva Papers. 21/17). Geneva: Geneva Center for Security Policy.

- Finnemore, M., & Sikkink, K. (1998). International norm dynamics and political change. International Organization, 52(4), 887–917.
- Frate, D., Alvazi, A., & De Martino, L. (2016). A new development agenda: Bridging the development-security divide. Geneva: Small Arms Survey. See: http://www.smallarmssurvey.org/fileadmin/docs/H-Research_Notes/SAS-Research-Note-58.pdf.
- Freedman, L. (2013). Disarmament and other nuclear norms. The Washington Quarterly, 36(2), 93–108.
- Fry, J. D., & Nair, S. (2018). Moral Disarmament: Reviving A Legacy of the Great War. Michigan Journal of International Law, 40(1), 1–45.
- Geneval Call. See <https://www.genevacall.org/what-we-do/>
- Gibbons, R. D. (2018). The humanitarian turn in nuclear disarmament and the treaty on the prohibition of nuclear weapons. NonProliferation Review, 25(1–2), 11–36.
- Giustozzi, A. (Ed.). (2016). Post-conflict Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration: Bringing the State Back. Routledge.
- González Peña, A. D. P. (2018). Exploring the impact of the disarmament, demobilisation and reintegration process on post-conflict peace. PhD Thesis, Department of Government, University of Essex. Available at: http://repository.essex.ac.uk/22364/1/Exploring%20the%20impact%20of%20the%20DDR%20process%20on%20postconflict%20peace_25_June_2018.pdf
- Green, D., & Macdonald, A. (2014). Power and change: The arms trade treaty. See: <https://oxfamlibrary.openrepository.com/bitstream/handle/10546/338471/cf-arms-trade-treaty-160115-en.pdf;jsessionid=D5095F74616749D956B3DD3B70278007?sequence=1>
- Grillot, S., Stapley, C. S., & Hanna, M. E. (2006). Assessing the small arms movement: The trials and tribulations of a transnational network' in Stephen M Hill, Future directions in small arms control. Special Issue of Contemporary Security Policy, 27(1), 60–84.
- Hanson, M. (2018). Normalizing zero nuclear weapons: The humanitarian road to the prohibition treaty. Contemporary Security Policy, 39(3), 464–486.
- Horowitz, M. C. (2016). Public opinion and the politics of the killer robots debate. Research and Politics, 3(1), 1–8.
- Howard, M. (2002). The invention of peace and the reinvention of war. London: Pine Books.
- Hugo, T. G., & Egeland, K. (2020). Patterns of participation in multilateral disarmament forums. Norwegian People's Aid. See: <https://commons.lib.jmu.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?article=2431&context=cisr-globalc wd>.
- Human Rights Council. (2019, September 3). Situation of human rights in Yemen, including violations and abuses since September 2014. A/HRC/42/CRP.1*: https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BFCF9B-6D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/A_HRC_42_CRP_1.pdf
- Hunt, J. (2020). Nuclear arms control in US foreign policy (Oxford Research Encyclopedia, American History). Oxford University Press. See: <https://oxfordre.com/americanhistorical/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780199329175.001.0001/acrefore-9780199329175-e-379?print=pdf>.
- IANS. (2017). Global overview of the small arms problem. See: https://92054894-4da4-47e4-9276-4b6cfef27021.filesusr.com/ugd/bb4a5b_ddb414f7efb243429f804f8eb3f4c3cb.pdf
- ICAN. (2019). ICAN annual report 2019. Geneva: ICAN. Available at: https://d3n8a8pro7vymx.cloudfront.net/ican/pages/131/attachments/original/1579878473/ICAN_Annual_Report_2019.pdf?1579878473.
- International Campaign to Ban Landmines (2019). Landmine Monitor 2019, International Campaign to Ban Landmines-Cluster Munitions Coalition: <http://www.the-monitor.org/media/3074086/Landmine-Monitor-2019-Report-Final.pdf>. Accessed, 20 Nov. 2020.
- International Court of Justice. (1996). Legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons. Advisory Opinion of 8 July 1996. See: <https://www.icj-cij.org/files/case-related/95/095-19960708-ADV-01-00-EN.pdf>
- Jochnick, C. a., & Normand, R. (1994). The legitimization of violence: A critical history of the laws of war. Harvard International Law Journal, 35(1), 49–95.
- Knopf, J. W. (1988). Domestic society and international cooperation: The impact of protest on US Arms Control Policy. Cambridge: CUP.
- Knopf, J. (2012). NGOs social movements and arms control. In R. E. Williams & P. Viotti (Eds.), Arms control. History, theory and policy (Vol. I). Santa Barbara/Denver/Oxford: Praeger.
- Korzak, E. (2019). The US, the UK, Russia and China: Regulating cyber attacks under international law – The potential for dedicated norms. In J. Gow, E. Dijkhoorn, R. Kerr, & G. Verdirame (Eds.), Routledge handbook of war, law and technology. London/New York.
- Kulesa, L. (2020). The crisis of nuclear arms control and its impact on nuclear security (Non-Proliferation and Disarmament Papers, No 66). EU Non-Proliferation and Disarmament Consortium. See: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-01/eunpdc_no_66_kulesa.pdf.
- Lachowski, Z. (2009). The CFE treaty one year after its suspension: A forlorn treaty? SIPRI Policy Brief. See: <https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/files/misc/SIPRIPB0901.pdf>.
- Lamb, G. (2008). Current approaches to the Disarmament, Demobilisation and Reintegration (DDR) programme design and implementation (Thematic Working Paper 1, Center for International Cooperation and Security (CICS)). University of Bradford. Available at: <https://bradscholars.brad.ac.uk/bitstream/handle/10454/7297/DDR%20Working%20Paper%201.pdf?sequence=2&isAll>.
- Landmines and Cluster Monitor Factsheet. (2020, June). Mine ban transparency reporting (Article 7).

- http://the-monitor.org/media/3148394/factsheet_transparency_final.pdf
- Larsen, J. A., & Smith, J. M. (2005). Historical dictionary of arms control and disarmament. Lanham/Toronto/Oxford: The Scarecrow Press, Inc..
- Larsen, J. A., & Wirtz, J. J. (2009). Arms control: And cooperative security. Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner.
- Lewis, J. G., & Sagan, S. D. (2016). The nuclear necessity principle: Making US targeting policy conform with ethics & the laws of the war. Deadalus: Journal of the American Academy of Arts & Sciences, 145(4), 62–74.
- MacDonald, A. (2014). UN Arms Trade Treaty Can Save Many Lives – If it is Robustly Enforces. The Guardian. <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/poverty-matters/2014/sep/25/un-arms-trade-treaty-exports-sales>. Accessed 26 Nov 2020.
- Mackillop, E. (2018). How do empty signifiers lose credibility? The case of commissioning in English local government. Critical Policy Studies, 12(2), 187–208.
- Martin, L. (1973). Arms and strategy: The world power structure today. New York: D McKay.
- Mathur, R. (2017). Red cross interventions in weapons control. Lanham/Boulder/New York/London: Lexington Books.
- Mayor, A. (2009). Greek fire, poison arrows and scorpion bombs: Biological and chemical warfare in the ancient world. New York/London: Overlook Duckworth.
- Mekata, M. (2018). How Transnational Civil Society Realized the Ban Treaty: An Interview with Beatrice Fihn. Journal for Peace and Nuclear Disarmament, 1(1), 79–92.
- Ministry of Defence (2020). UK Armed Forces Quarterly Service Personnel Statistics 1 July 2020, Defence Statistics, MOD. https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/920074/1_July_2020_SPS.pdf. Accessed 17 Feb 2021.
- Minor, E. (2020). Addressing the political impact of inclusion and exclusion in multilateral disarmament forums. In M. B. Bolton, N. Sarah, & T. Benjamin-Britton (Eds.), Global activism and humanitarian disarmament. Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mueller, H. (2017). Arms control and arms reduction in foreign policy. Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics. Retrieved January 6, 2021 from <https://oxfordre.com/politics/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.001.0001/acrefore-9780190228637-e-391>.
- Mukhathanova, G. (2017, September). The nuclear weapons prohibition treaty: Negotiations and beyond. Arms Control Today. <https://www.armscontrol.org/act/2017-09/features/nuclear-weapons-prohibition-treaty-negotiations-beyond>.
- Neuman, S. G. (1988). Arms, aid and the superpowers. Foreign Affairs, 66(5), 1044–1066.
- Noel-Baker, P. (1958). The arms race: A programme for world disarmament. London: Atlantic Books.
- O'Dwyer, D. (2014). 'Global civil society' and hegemonic global governance: a Gramscian analysis of the NGO campaigns to ban landmines and cluster munitions (PhD thesis, Dublin City University).
- Oxfam. (2008). Arms transfer decisions: Considering development (Oxfam briefing Note). Oxfam International. See https://books.google.co.uk/books?hl=en&lr=&id=812YNiFlhZQC&oi=fnd&pg=PA1&dq=1996+UN+Guidelines+for+International+Arms+Transfers&ots=T9BWcQdnfX&sig=olgXrVPyCxav6djYYMt0EtN6pys&redir_esc=y#v=onepage&q=1996%20UN%20Guidelines%20for%20International%20Arms%20Transfers&f=false.
- Paltrow, S. (2017, November 21). Special report: In modernizing nuclear arsenal, US stokes new nuclear arms race. <https://www.reuters.com/article/us-usa-nuclear-modernize-special-report/special-report-in-modernizing-nuclear-arsenal-u-s-stokes-new-arms-race-idUSKBN1DLIAH>
- Payne-Gallwey, R. (2007). The crossbow: Its military and sporting history, construction and use. Ludlow: Merlin Books.
- Perrin, N. (1979). Giving up the gun: Japan's reversion to the sword, 1543–1879. Boston: G.K.Hall.
- Petrova, M. H. (2018). Weapons prohibitions through immanent critique: NGOs as emancipating and desecuritising actors in security governance. Review of International Studies, 44(4), 619–653.
- Pettersson, T., & Öberg, M. (2020). Organized violence, 1989–2019. Journal of Peace Research, 57(4), 597–613.
- Plesch, D., & Miletic, K. (2020). The relationship between humanitarian disarmament and general and complete disarmament. In M. B. Bolton, S. Njeri, & T. Benjamin-Britton (Eds.), Global activism and humanitarian disarmament (pp. 199–224). Geneva: Palgrave Macmillan and Springer Nature.
- Price, R. (1998). Reversing the Gun Sights: Transnational Civil Society Targets Land Mines. International Organization, 52(3), 613–644.
- Pytlak, A. (2020). Are Arms Trade Treaty Meetings Being Used to their Full Potential? Global Responsibility to Protect, 12(2), 156–177.
- Ritchie, N. (2017). A rebuttal to critics of the nuclear weapon ban treaty. Bulletin of Atomic Scientists. Available at: file:///Users/rcoope28/Desktop/2017_July_24_-_A_rebuttal_to_critics_of_the_nuclear_weapon_ban_treaty_Bulletin_of_the_Atomic_Scientists.pdf.
- Ritchie, N. (2016). Pathways to nuclear disarmament: Deligitimizing Nuclear Violence (Working Paper). Open-Ended Working Group.
- Ritchie, N., & Egeland, K. (2018). The diplomacy of resistance: Power, hegemony and nuclear disarmament. Global Change, Peace and Security, 30(2), 121–141.
- Roberts, A. (2019, July). Foundational myths of the laws of war: The 1863 Lieber Code and the 1864 Geneva Convention. Melbourne Journal of International Law, 20(1), 158–196.
- Rosert, E., & Sauer, F. (2021). How (not) to stop the killer robots: A comparative analysis of humanitarian

- campaign disarmament strategies. Contemporary Security Policy, 42(1), 4–29.
- Rumer, E. (2018). A farewell to arms control. US-Russia Insight, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. See: <https://carnegieendowment.org/2018/04/17/farewell-to-arms-...-control-pub-76088>.
- Sauer, T., & Pretorius, J. (2014). Nuclear weapons and the humanitarian approach. Global Change, Peace and Security, 26(3), 233–250.
- Schelling, T. (1962). The role of deterrence in total disarmament. Foreign Affairs, 40(3), 392–406.
- Schelling, T. C., & Halperin, M. H. (1961). Strategy and arms control. New York: The Twentieth Century Fund (reproduced by Martino Publishing 2014).
- Small Arms Survey. (2018). Small arms survey reveals: More than one billion firearms in the world. See: http://www.smallarmssurvey.org/fileadmin/docs/Weapons_and_Markets/Tools/Firearms_holdings/SAS-Press-release-global-firearms-holdings.pdf
- Sommer, M. (1989). Qualitative disarmament: An idea before its time? Peace Review: A Journal of Social Science, 1(2), 33–37.
- Stavrianakis, A. (2011). Small arms control and the reproduction of imperial relations. Contemporary Security Policy, 32(1), 193–214.
- Stavrianakis, A. (2019). Controlling Weapons Circulation in a Post-Colonial Militarized World. Review of International Studies, 45(1), 57–76.
- Stavrianakis, A. (2020). Requiem for risk: Non-knowledge and domination in the governance of weapons circulation. International Political Sociology, 14(3), 233–251.
- Steiner, H. A. (1933). The Geneva disarmament conference of 1932. Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 168, 212–219.
- Tannenwald, N. (2020a). Life beyond arms control: Moving toward a global regime of nuclear restraint and responsibility. Deadalus: The Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 49(2), 205–221.
- Tannenwald, N. (2020b). The humanitarian initiative: A critical appreciation. In T. Sauer, J. Kustermans, & B. Segaeert (Eds.), Non-nuclear peace: Beyond the nuclear ban treaty (pp. 115–129). Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tannenwald, N., & Action, J. M. (2018). Meeting the challenges of the new nuclear age: Emerging risks and declining norms in the age of technological innovation. Cambridge, MA: American Academy of Arts and Sciences. Available at: https://www.amacad.org/sites/default/files/publication/downloads/New-Nuclear-Age_Emerging-Risks.pdf.
- Thakur, R., & Maley, W. (1999). The Ottawa convention on landmines: A landmark humanitarian treaty in arms control. Global Governance, 5(3), 273–302.
- The Guardian. (2019, June 20). UK arms sales to Saudi Arabia unlawful court declares. <https://www.theguardian.com/law/2019/jun/20/uk-arms-sales-to-saudi-arabia-for-use-in-yemen-declared-unlawful>
- The Guardian. (2020, June 21). UK accused of selling arms to Saudi Arabia a year after court ban. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2020/jun/21/uk-accused-of-selling-arms-to-saudi-arabia-a-year-after-court-ban>
- Tian, N., et al. (2018). Trends in world military expenditure 2018 (SIPRI Fact Sheet). Stockholm: SIPRI. Available at: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2019-04/fs_1904_milex_2018_0.pdf.
- Tian, N., et al. (2020). Trends in World military expenditure 2019 (SIPRI Fact Sheet). Stockholm: SIPRI. Available at: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-04/fs_2020_04_milex_0_0.pdf.
- Towle, P. (1997). Enforced disarmament: From the napoleonic campaigns to the Gulf War. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- United Nations. (1978). Resolutions and decisions adopted by the general assembly during its tenth special session. 23 May–30 June 1978, General Assembly, Tenth Special Sessions, Supplement No 4 (A/S-10/4). See: <https://www.un.org/disarmament/wp-content/uploads/2017/05/A-S10-4.pdf>
- United Nations. (1991). Study on ways and means of promoting transparency n international transfers of conventional arms. Report of the Secretary-General. UN Document A/46/301. See: <https://digitallibrary.un.org/record/128250?ln=en>
- United Nations General Assembly. (1982, July 9). A/S-12/32. See: <http://www.undocs.org/A/S-12/32>
- United Nations Office for Disarmament Affairs. (2018). Securing our common future: An agenda for disarmament. New York: United Nations.
- UNSC (UN Security Council). (2015). Resolution 220 (2015) Adopted by the Security Council at its 7447th Meeting on 22 May, 2015. S/RES/2220 (2015). See: https://undocs.org/S/RES/2220\(2015\))
- Vagts, D. F. (2000). The Hague convention and arms control. The American Journal of International Law, 94(1), 31–41.
- Valentino, B., & Sagan, S. D. (2017). The nuclear weapons ban treaty: Opportunities lost. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. Available at: <https://thebulletin.org/2017/07/the-nuclear-weapons-ban-treaty-opportunities-lost/>.
- Vestner, T. (2020). The new geopolitics of the arms trade treaty. Arms Control Today, 50(10), 14–20.
- Vilmer, J.-B. J. (2020). The forever emerging norm of banning nuclear weapons. Journal of Strategic Studies.
- Voorst, L. B. v. (1982). The critical masses. Foreign Policy, 48, 82–93.
- Wezeman, S. T. (2019). Reporting to the United Nations register of conventional arms for 2017 (SIPRI Background Paper). Stockholm: SIPRI. See: <https://www.sipri.org/publications/2019/sipri-background-papers/reporting-united-nations-register-conventional-arms-2017>.
- Wezeman et al (2019) Trends in International Arms Transfers, 2018, SIPRI Fact Sheet, March 2019. See: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2019-03/fs_1903_at_2018.pdf

- Wezeman, P. D., et al. (2020a, March). Trends in international arms transfers, 2019. SIPRI FACT Sheet: Available at: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-03/fs_2003_at_2019.pdf
- Wezeman, Pieter D, Lucie Béraud-Sudreau, and Siemon T. Wezemen (2020b), ‘Transparency in arms procurement: Limitations and opportunities for accessing global armament development’, SIPRI Insights on Peace and Security, No, 2020/10.
- Wilke, C. (2018). How international law learned to love the bomb: Civilians and the regulation of aerial warfare in the 1920s. Australian Feminist Law Journal, 44(1), 29–47.
- Williams, H. (2018). A nuclear babel: Narratives around the treaty on the prohibition of nuclear weapons. The Nonproliferation Review, 25(1–2), 51–63.
- Wittner, L. S. (2010). Looking Back: The Nuclear Freeze and Its Impact. Arms Control Today, 40(10), 53–56.
- World Bank Group, UN Peacekeeping and Social Science Research Council. (undated). The changing landscape of armed groups: Doing DDR in new contexts. Available at: https://peacekeeping.un.org/sites/default/files/the_changing_landscape_of_armed_groups.pdf
- Zehfuss, M. (2010). Targeting: Precision and the production of ethics. European Journal of International Relations, 17(3), 543–566.

Humanitarian Disarmament II: Case Studies

Neil Cooper
School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Abstract

This chapter examines two prominent cases of humanitarian disarmament (HD) in action: the 2013 Arms Trade Treaty and the 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons. In theory, both treaties address a key problem with the HD bans on landmines and cluster munitions – that they exempt the vast majority of military technologies from scrutiny for pressure and restraint. In contrast, the ATT seeks to apply principles of humanitarianism and human rights to the regulation of a range of weapons categories that cover a significant proportion of the global trade in arms. Moreover, elements of the treaty represented notable victories for campaigners, who generally lauded it as a remarkable accomplishment capable of altering the behavior of actors in the international arms market. However, the humanitarian framing of the treaty also facilitated a narrow conceptualization of problem arms transfers that falls well short of both the original vision for a code of conduct on arms transfers set out by Nobel Laureates in 1997 and proposals to curb the arms trade set out in the 1994 UNDP Human Development Report – the founding document of the human security agenda. Thus, while the ATT may have caused some exporters to revise their processes of export approval, evidence that it has substantially altered the arms transfer decisions of states remains thin on the ground. In contrast, the TPNW is a qualitatively different kind of HD, one that brought HD into contention with the core security identities and security logics of major powers. It, therefore, represents a more signal achievement than other HD instruments, even if the absence of the nuclear weapons states means it currently remains more of a “stigmatization treaty” than a disarmament treaty. However, the reification of the norm of military necessity that is so central to IHL may also provide a route to norm reinterpretation on the part of nuclear weapons states. Although by no means certain, the seeds of the TPNW’s ultimate failure may well lie in the normative roots of its success.

Introduction

This chapter accompanies the chapter Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament. More specifically, it provides case studies of two examples of disarmament in action: the 2013 Arms Trade Treaty (ATT) and the 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons (TPNW). To briefly recap the discussion in the preceding chapter: humanitarian disarmament (HD) draws on humanitarian norms of proportionality and distinction between combatant and civilian to make the case for weapons control. HD itself can be further subdivided into three different models. The first is associated with the pursuit of total bans on conventional weapons often considered unexceptional elements in the armories of military forces (e.g., landmines and cluster munitions). The second is characterized by regulation short of a ban (e.g., limits on numbers, use, design, or transfer), and includes both weapons-specific restraints (e.g., on the use of laser weapons designed to blind) and expressly humanitarian nonproliferation initiatives such as the Arms Trade Treaty (ATT). The third model, exemplified by the Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons (TPNW), is associated with bans on “apex” weapons central to the core security logics, security identities, and security subjectivities of states. Arguably, the TPNW currently represents the only example of model 3 HD. The emphasis, in many HD initiatives, on remediation and victim assistance represents a novel and substantive innovation in approaches to weapons control. However, model one bans and weapons-specific restraints under model two are constrained in their ability to control the means of violence because humanitarianism gives equal weight to the norm of military necessity, thus legitimizing the institution of war, including war preparation. Consequently, they simultaneously reflect and construct a hierarchy of legitimized and non-legitimized weapons – with the vast majority, particularly the new so-called precision weapons, in the former category. In theory, model two nonproliferation initiatives such as the ATT address this deficiency. However, as will be illustrated below, in the case of the ATT, the connection with humanitarianism has facilitated the production of a weak treaty that enshrines the legitimacy of the arms trade in general and a “one-export at a time” risk model of regulation that permits the trade in all but the most egregious arms exports. The upshot is that the era of the ATT (and HD more generally) has coincided with quite significant increases in both global military expenditure and the arms trade.

In contrast, model three HD, with its focus on “apex weapons,” has brought HD into direct contention with the core security logics, identities, and subjectivities of major military powers. The TPNW therefore represents both a qualitatively different kind of HD and a more notable achievement, even if it is more of a stigmatization treaty than a disarmament treaty (see below). At the same time, the very normative frameworks central to humanitarianism may provide discursive resources for nuclear weapons states (NWS) to legitimize their continued possession. Thus, while certainly not inevitable, the seeds of the TPNW’s ultimate failure may well lie in the normative roots of its very success. Despite this, the expansion of an HD agenda to apex weapons illustrates the potential to connect it to a tradition of qualitative disarmament more clearly rooted in a critique of militarism and a commitment to achieving overall reductions in the means of violence. This route offers the greatest promise for the further evolution of HD.

A Case Study of Model Two Humanitarian Disarmament: The Arms Trade Treaty

Ostensibly, model two nonproliferation HD instruments address the accommodation with militarism that is a feature of model one HD. The ATT, for example, covers the trade in a significant, if not exhaustive list of defense equipment:

- Battle tanks
- Armored Combat Vehicles
- Large-caliber artillery systems
- Attack helicopters
- Warships
- Missiles and missile launchers
- Small arms and light weapons

Anna Macdonald (2014) director of the Control Arms Coalition has suggested the ATT not only “demands a radical shift in behavior by the major arms exporters” but will “create a strong deterrent for all countries. . . to end uncontrolled arms transfers.” Garcia has (2014: 425 and 427) described it as a “remarkable diplomatic accomplishment with the potential to improve human security,” one that signaled “progress towards more principled international relations among all states.” She predicted (ibid, 431) it would “likely be nearly universal and generate new behavior.”

The final version of the treaty certainly reflected some notable victories for campaigners. The “reduction of human suffering” was included in the object and purpose of the ATT, language described by Bolton and James (2014: 448) as “a major normative reorientation.” The scope of the treaty includes small arms (a key issue for civil society) and states are required to “take into account” the risk of arms being used to commit or facilitate “serious acts” of gender-based violence. Enloe (2014: 23) has described the latter as a “transnational feminist success.” Sympathetic scholars and civil society advocates argue the treaty establishes global norms on the arms trade that (like the landmines ban) have the capacity to influence the actions of even non-signatories (Garcia, 2014; MacFarquhar, 2013; Bolton and James, 2014).

However, the history of the campaign for an arms trade treaty is also one of radical incremental retreat from the original ambition for a treaty to significantly curb the arms trade. The roots of the campaign date back to the Nobel Peace Laureates call in 1997 for an International Code of Conduct on Arms Transfers (Bromley et al., 2012: 1038). This offered a more expansive definition of arms and stipulated transfers could be conducted only if it could be “reasonably demonstrated” they would “not be used” to commit “grave violations of human rights.” Likewise, transfers were only permitted to states: not engaged in or sponsoring “grave breaches” of the laws and customs of war; to states that provided regular access to humanitarian NGOs; and to states that co-operated with relevant international tribunals. There were also clear and restrictive criteria on democracy, development, and the supply of destabilizing weapons. In short, this was an ambitious document that established a presumption of denial unless certain criteria for exports were met.

Box 1: Nobel Laureates International Code of Conduct on Arms Transfers: Selected Extracts

Article 1

“Arms include. . . all weapons, munitions, sub-components and delivery systems. . . all types of ammunition. . . sensitive military and dual-use technologies including, for example, encryption devices, certain machine tools, super-computers, gas turbine and rocket propulsion technology, avionics, thermal imaging and chemical irritants. . . Military and security training. . .”

Article 3: Compliance with international human rights standards

“Arms transfers may be conducted only if it can be reasonably demonstrated that the proposed transfer will not be used by the recipient . . . to contribute to grave violations of human rights. . .”

Article 4: Compliance with international humanitarian law

“Arms transfers may be conducted only if the proposed recipient. . . does not engage in, or sponsor, grave breaches of the laws and customs of war. . . provides access on a regular basis to humanitarian non-governmental organisations. . . cooperates with international tribunals, either ad hoc or general, with the power to adjudicate of the rules. . .”

Article 5: Respect for democratic human rights

“Arms transfers may be conducted only if the proposed recipient state: (a) Allows its citizens to choose their representative through free and fairly contested periodic elections that feature secret balloting; (b) Permits its citizens to express their political views through the freedom to speak, disseminate ideas and information, assemble, associate and organise, including the organisation of political parties; (c) Has civilian institutions that determine national security policy. . .”

Article 8: Commitment to promote regional peace, security and stability

“Arms transfers may be conducted only if the proposed recipient state or recipient party in the country of final destination . . . is not involved in an armed conflict in the region, unless it is recognized by the UN as engaged in an act of self-defence. . . or is playing a role in a UN-mandated operation. . . is not . . . introducing weapons beyond those considered appropriate for its legitimate self-defence; or introducing a significantly more advanced military technology into the region. . . does not advocate national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence. . . is not engaged in armed actions or practices which are likely to lead to a significant number of displaced persons or refugees. . .”

Article 10: Promotion of human development

“Arms transfers may be conducted only if the recipient state’s expenditure on health and education combined exceed its military expenditures. . .”

Source: <http://internationalhumanrightsllexicon.org/hrdoc/docs/armsnobel.htm>

The journey from the Nobel Laureates proposal first began with a shift from this presumption of denial to a presumption of approval unless certain “risks” arising from each individual arms transfer could be established (e.g., breaches of IHL). Even after this turn to a “risk model” of assessment, the criteria for assessing risk advocated by NGOs was progressively relaxed from “reasonable risk” and then to “substantial risk.” But even this latter formulation proved unacceptable to the USA, which made inclusion of “overriding risk” a condition of its support for the Treaty (Pytlak and Kirkham, 2013: 2) – and then subsequently disowned the treaty anyway under the Trump administration. It should be noted that the more rigorous risk criteria used by EU states to govern arms transfers (a requirement for “clear risk” to be established) has not prevented states such as the UK and France from supplying large volumes of arms to Saudi Arabia during its conflict in Yemen (Cops and Ducquet, 2019: 6–7), despite extensive evidence of violations of international humanitarian law (Human Rights Council, 2019). Given this, the notion that the ATT formulation of “overriding risk” would impose significant restraints on defense exporters was always difficult to credit, and experience of ATT implementation bears this out (see below).

The core of the treaty and those elements that most clearly appear to realize the humanitarian goals at the heart of HD can be found in Articles 6 and 7. The former prohibits transfers that would violate UN arms embargoes or other international agreements to which a state is Party. This essentially codifies the existing obligations states have signed up to. Crucially, Article 6 also prohibits transfers if “a state has knowledge at the time of authorization” that the arms would be used in commission of genocide, crimes against humanity or “other war crimes as defined by international agreements to which it is a party [italics added]”. If an export is not prohibited under Article 6, then Article 7 obliges states to assess the potential that arms:

- (a) Would contribute to or undermine peace and security
- (b) Could be used to:
 - (i) Commit or facilitate a serious violation of international humanitarian law

- (ii) Commit or facilitate a serious violation of international human rights law
- (iii) Commit or facilitate an act constituting an offence under international conventions or protocols relating to terrorism to which the exporting State is a Party; or
- (iv) Commit or facilitate an act constituting an offence under international conventions or protocols relating to transnational organized crime to which the exporting State is a Party¹

When undertaking this assessment states are also required to consider “whether there are measures that could be undertaken to mitigate risks identified in (a) or (b).” If, after going through these various steps (!) states conclude there is still “an overriding risk” of the negative consequences listed above, only then are they required to prohibit a proposed export under Article 7. The combined effect is to set a very high bar for restraint. First, the requirement in Article 6 for “knowledge at the time of authorization,” requires an evidentiary basis for restraint not always available in cases of human rights abuse or wartime atrocity. This is compounded by the fact that many arms exporting states actively employ what Stavrianakis (2020) describes as strategies of “not-knowing” about IHL violations. For example, in 2016, the British Courts found UK exports to Saudi Arabia were in violation of its commitments under the EU Common Position, highlighting the fact that the government had quietly removed a column headed “IHL breach” from a database established to monitor Saudi-led coalition airstrikes (The Guardian 20 June 2019). Such strategies of not-knowing were also satirized in the British comedy series, Yes Minister (see <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cIYfiRyPi3o>). Second, the requirement in Article 7 to assess the contribution of an export to peace and security – inserted at US insistence – leaves open the potential to make a peace and security evaluation in favor of exports. Third, the obligation to consider risk mitigation measures opens a loophole that can be exploited to legitimize controversial exports.

¹For the treaty text see: <https://unoda-web.s3-accelerate.amazonaws.com/wp-content/uploads/2013/06/English7.pdf>

Moreover, the USA and Russia, which currently remain outside the ATT, accounted for 57% of global arms exports in the period 2015–19 (See chapter on ► “Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament”). EU states that were already signed up to the stricter criteria enumerated in the longstanding EU Common Position accounted for 26% of global arms exports in the same period (Wezeman et al., 2020: 4). Thus, those states that have signed up to the ATT but were not already signed up to the stricter export criteria of the EU Common Position currently account for just 17% of the global arms trade. This may well change if the Biden administration re-commits to the ATT but, to date, the normative “value-added” of the ATT has been quite marginal.

Even more notably, the treaty itself has had little impact on the actual arms export decisions of States parties to the treaty. Indeed, even those who campaigned for the treaty now lament that:

... Arms transfers to countries where there are known violations of human rights and international humanitarian law (IHL). . . have continued since the treaty entered into force – such as to Cameroon, India, Saudi Arabia and many others. When it comes to Saudi Arabia, many of the ATT states parties and signatories are engaged actively in war profiteering (Acheson, 2019a: 1).

For some, this reflects a failure of states to implement the provisions of the treaty (Pytlak, 2020: 171). However, the failure to stem controversial transfers is as much, if not more, a function of the very limits built into the treaty. Indeed, the preamble of the treaty contains four separate references to the legitimacy of the trade in arms, two separate references to the right of states to self-defense (common code for the right to purchase arms) and one reference to the sovereign right of individual states to regulate conventional arms within their own territory. In part, such design flaws simply reflect the realpolitik efforts of states to circumscribe the treaty during its negotiation. Certainly, the language of “overriding risk” and “knowledge at the time of authorization” was quite deliberately crafted to permit virtually any and all transfers (plus addressing more statist concerns about transfers to terrorists and organized crime groups). At the same time, the adoption of a humanitarian framework – with its concomitant legitimization of militarism – inevitably made this work of circumscription that much easier.

A further point to note in this context is that supporters often describe the ATT as realizing both a humanitarian agenda and a human security agenda. However, the humanitarian framing of the treaty meant its elements were intimately connected to international human rights law and international humanitarian law. This, in turn, permitted a far narrower framing of issues than required by a human security agenda. The latter concept includes both narrow (freedom from fear) and broad (freedom from want) versions (Chandler and Hynek, 2011; Paris, 2001). The ATT certainly failed to adequately address the intersection between the arms trade and the broader dimensions of the human security agenda such as the arms and environment nexus and the arms and corruption nexus (which states are merely “encouraged” to address) and the arms-conflict-underdevelopment nexus (vaguely alluded to in the preamble but not in the actual Articles of the Treaty). It has also failed to address many aspects of even the narrower freedom from fear agenda. The ATT does not prohibit transfers to aggressive states, nor to states at war (unless subject to a UN arms embargo), nor to non-state actors, nor to repressive regimes, nor to regions characterized by acute security-dilemmas. Neither does it prohibit the transfer of new or destabilizing weapons technology to regions. Rather, it deliberately permits the vast majority of exports to states, societies and contexts where people remain in fear of armed violence. Even apparent successes on this front, such as the requirement to “take into account” (a notably weak formulation) the risk that transfers of the arms covered by the treaty would be used to commit GBV have proved illusory so far. For example, one survey of government officials found that GBV had not been the sole or primary reason for an export denial by any of the states surveyed and respondents found it difficult to imagine a scenario in which GBV would be the main reason for denial (Control Arms, 2019: 28; also see Acheson, 2019: 1). It is certainly the case that the ATT failed to deliver on most of the proposals to reign in militarism and the arms trade offered in the 1994 UNDP Report – the founding text of the human security agenda. This included phasing out military assistance, the development of a list of sophisticated weapons that should not be exported at all, regulation or elimination of subsidies for defense exporters, a tax on arms sales to finance peacekeeping and using savings from a post-Cold War peace dividend to fund domestic demilitarization such as the conversion of arms factories (UNDP, 1994: 47–60).

Thus, while the conflation of the humanitarian and human security agenda may have been useful from a campaigning perspective, it actually obscured the failure of the ATT to deliver on even a radically circumscribed human security agenda. Indeed, the phrase human security is completely absent from the treaty, whereas references to the interests of states, the rights of states, the political independence of states, and the domestic jurisdiction of states abound. It is a treaty not only shot-through with statism but very deliberately constructed to ignore all but the most egregious violations of human security – and even then, the decision on what violations get over this bar is left to those States Parties that currently make up the 17% of the arms export market not covered by those outside the Treaty or which are already operating under the stricter criteria imposed by the EU regime.

As the preceding discussion illustrates, HD in model one and two modes largely abandoned strategic contestation of global militarism in favor of achieving tactical humanitarian disarmament successes. In the case of model one HD this took the form of individual weapons bans – a one-weapon at a time approach to disarmament that not only left the majority of weapons untouched but indirectly legitimized modern precision weapons constructed as the very antithesis of the indiscriminate landmine and cluster bomb. In model two nonproliferation mode, while the ATT certainly reaffirms the existing obligations of states to respect UN arms embargoes, at its core, it represents a highly permissive, one export at a time approach to arms transfer decisions that does little to address the broader threats to human security presented by the arms trade.

A Case Study of Model Three Humanitarian Disarmament: The Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons

The TPNW can be understood as a qualitatively different kind of HD, one that inevitably brings HD into contention with the core security identities and security logics of major powers. The campaign for the TPNW also represented a notable shift from earlier efforts to promote a detailed Nuclear Weapons Convention that included the NWS to promoting a declaratory ban without them. An example of the former was the NGO initiative led by the Lawyers Committee on Nuclear Policy to draft a convention, subsequently submitted to the UN for circulation as an official document in April 1997 (Gibbons, 2018: 13). This was a substantial, sixty-page document that described the threat and use of nuclear weapons use as “incompatible with civilized norms, standards of morality and humanitarian law.”² The Convention prohibited the development, testing, production, stockpiling, transfer, use, and threat of use of nuclear weapons and set out a phased process for the elimination of nuclear weapons (Weiss, 2011: 783–4): taking them off alert, removing weapons from deployment, removing nuclear warheads from their delivery vehicles, disabling the warheads, removing and disfiguring the “pits,” and placing the fissile material under international control. It also set out extensive verification measures, including the creation of an Agency for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons to ensure implementation, a Technical Secretariat (TS), and an International Monitoring System.

²See: <http://undocs.org/A/C.1/52/7>

The roots of the TPNW itself can be traced to the failure of the 2005 NPT (Nuclear-Non-Proliferation Treaty) Review Conference to achieve a consensus. This prompted the group, International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War to establish the International Campaign to Abolish Nuclear Weapons (ICAN). The first ICAN office opened in Melbourne in November 2006, the campaign was formally launched at the 2007 NPT Preparatory Committee meeting in Vienna, and in July ICAN presented an updated version of the Nuclear Weapons Convention. However, while the notion of a Convention attracted support from the non-aligned movement (NAM) it failed to gain any notable traction with NWS and their allies. A key moment in the shift away from action focused on promoting a Convention came before the 2010 NPT Review Conference when the ICRC President, Jacob Kellenberger (2010), made a speech framing the problem of nuclear weapons as a humanitarian issue and calling for states “to bring the era of nuclear weapons to an end.” The final document of the Review Conference also included specific language on the humanitarian impact of nuclear weapons. This would subsequently be cited as providing both a reference-point and legitimization for the humanitarian initiative to ban nuclear weapons.

Crucially, ICAN itself gradually moved from promoting a detailed nuclear weapons convention, which presumed buy-in from the NWS, to campaigning for a treaty prohibiting nuclear weapons (Gibbons, 2018: 18–19). Action on what was now labeled “the humanitarian initiative” was also pursued at three successive conferences held outside the framework of the normal disarmament machinery and involving diplomats from over 125 countries, representatives of ICAN, ICRC, and various UN agencies (Docherty, 2018: 172). The first, in March 2013, took place in Oslo, the second February 2014 meeting was in Nayarit, Mexico, and the third December 2014 meeting took place in Vienna. The latter resulted in a Humanitarian Pledge in which states committed to “stigmatize, prohibit and eliminate nuclear weapons in light of their unacceptable humanitarian consequences. . . .”³ In December 2015 the UN General Assembly adopted a resolution calling for the creation of an Open-Ended Working Group and the group’s report of August 2016 asked the General Assembly to convene a conference to negotiate a legally binding instrument to prohibit nuclear weapons. Negotiations took place in New York beginning in March 2017 and in July the TPNW was adopted, with 122 governments voting in favor, one against (the Netherlands), and one abstaining (Singapore) (Mukhatzhanova, 2017). The treaty prohibits the acquisition, development, production, manufacture, possession, transfer, receipt, testing, hosting, use, and threat of use of nuclear weapons (Thakur, 2018: 71). On October 20, 2020, the 50th state (Honduras) delivered its instrument of ratification, thus meeting the threshold for the TPNW to enter into force on January 22, 2021.

The TPNW is generally depicted as simply a further iteration of earlier HD campaigns on landmines and cluster munitions, with emphasis placed on the elements of continuity: the humanitarian framing and the similarity in campaigning strategies, key organizations and even individual personnel. However, the nuclear-ban campaign was different in a number of respects. First, while there had certainly been efforts to problematize both landmines and cluster munitions dating back to the 1970s (Dunworth, 2020), the subsequent ban campaigns were essentially faced with the task of inventing a taboo (particularly in the popular imagination) against weapons either considered unexceptional elements in the armory of states – or more commonly, not considered at all by the general public. In contrast, the nuclear ban campaign was able to build-on a long-standing, powerful and universal taboo against the threat and use of nuclear weapons (Tannenwald, 2007), as well as an equally powerful norm against their spread (Ruble, 2009).

³Humanitarian Pledge: See: https://www.bmeia.gv.at/fileadmin/user_upload/Zentrale/Aussenpolitik/Abruestung/HINW14/HINW14vienna_Pledge_Document.pdf

Decades of disarmament activism had also created significant constituencies among both states and global public opinion that even viewed possession of nuclear weapons as illegitimate. Of course, this co-existed (and still does) with an equally powerful view of nuclear weapons as central to the security, status, and even identity of NWS. Nevertheless, the ability to draw on and adapt powerful preexisting stigmas around nuclear weapons meant the ban campaign was, in this respect at least, faced with an easier task than that faced by the campaigns on landmines and cluster munitions.

Second, ban supporters have claimed the humanitarian framing “revolutionized” the diplomatic debate on nuclear weapons (Docherty, 2018; also see Ritchie and Egeland: 5), changing the discourse around them from “nuclearism” (under which nuclear weapons and deterrence are viewed as inevitable and acceptable elements of international security) to “humanitarianism” (Hanson, 2018). However, the TPNW is better described as “the culmination of over seventy years of campaigning against nuclear weapons. . . [campaigns which] from the beginning were humanitarian in ethos”, if not explicitly packaged in humanitarian terms (Dunworth, 2020: 180–181). This long-standing discursive heritage provided a foundation for campaigners to build on that was largely absent in the case of landmines and cluster munitions – and to the extent it did exist, was more recent and far less significant.

Third, the nuclear ban campaign was able to draw on constituencies of states with a record of support for disarmament, often couched in humanitarian terms, that long-preceded the launch of ICAN – most notably the Non-Aligned Movement of states and the New Agenda Coalition of States (Wunderlich et al., 2013; Strydom, 2007; Green, 2000; DiFilippo, 2006: 94–109). This contrasted with the campaigns on landmines and cluster munitions. A few states certainly supported efforts to impose restraints on these technologies from the 1970s onwards but both campaigns were still faced with building a meaningful coalition of states largely from scratch.

Fourth, the nuclear ban campaign was able to harness growing frustration among non-nuclear states at the increasingly glacial pace of action on nuclear disarmament by the NWS and in established disarmament fora. This dynamic certainly echoed the way HD campaigns on landmines and cluster munitions reflected – and magnified – frustration at the failure of more conventional diplomacy to deliver results. However, frustration at the lack of action on nuclear disarmament was more long-standing (dating back to the early years of the Cold War), more widespread, and even more deep-seated. The nuclear ban campaign was therefore able to tap almost 50 years of frustration at the failure of the NWS to deliver on the disarmament commitments enshrined in the NPT and a broader failure harking even further back. Indeed, it is perhaps a moot question whether, given this deep well of frustration, a nuclear ban campaign shorn of its specifically humanitarian framing might have been equally successful.

The most significant point of difference with previous ban campaigns, however, was in the very nature of the weapons targeted for prohibition. In the case of landmines and cluster munitions, the humanitarian framing of the campaigns permitted activists to carve out critiques of the weapons from broader critiques of militarism and thus made it easier to assemble a coalition of supportive states. Many (if not all) of the world’s leading spenders on defense and the world’s leading arms exporters could safely sign up to these model one HD agreements safe in the knowledge that their military establishments would only be marginally impacted. In contrast, nuclear weapons are “apex weapons” perceived as central to the security, prestige, and even identity of NWS states. They are also more intimately connected to the broader logics that sustain war, militarism, and security diplomacy. Given this, the nuclear ban campaign inevitably encountered fierce resistance from the NWS and many of their allies – actors able to wield immense economic and diplomatic power. This alone marks out the TPNW as a more signal achievement than either the landmines or cluster munitions bans (even after taking into account the other factors noted above). Thus, while the campaign may have shared the same discourse, strategies, and even personnel as those on landmines and cluster munitions, it also represented a qualitatively different kind of humanitarian disarmament. In particular, the focus on nuclear weapons inevitably meant the line drawn in the humanitarian tradition between critiquing specific methods of war but not war and militarism itself was at least blurred, notwithstanding the efforts of some leading campaigners to avoid the association with anti-militarism (see chapter X). Whether this signals a more fundamental shift in HD to embrace a more traditional qualitative disarmament agenda rooted in anti-militarism remains to be seen. The answer to this question also bears on the issue of whether the humanitarian framework is actually the most effective vehicle for realizing nuclear disarmament.

The TPNW, Humanitarianism, and the Potential for Norm Reinterpretation by NWS

As Tannenwald (2020: 116) has noted, the TPNW is not so much a disarmament treaty as a stigmatization treaty, one that defers the hard task of getting the NWS down to nuclear zero. As Müller and Wunderlich (2020: 184) have observed, the TPNW “is not the philosopher’s stone to solve all problems of nuclear disarmament” and it “will not move operative disarmament or establish new cogent international law.” At some point, states will therefore need to return to devising either the kind of detailed Nuclear Weapons Convention originally advocated by ICAN and/or a series of phased initiatives (adopted by NWS) and designed to progress nuclear disarmament to global zero (Thakur, 2018: 82). In addition, advocates highlight the need for ratification of the Comprehensive Ban Treaty (CTBT), wider adoption of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAE) Additional Protocol (the most effective framework for verifying civil nuclear activities are not diverted for military purposes) and negotiations on a Fissile Material Cut-Off Treaty. These in turn will be difficult – if not impossible – to cordon off from broader discussions about conventional forces, not least because nuclear weapons are used by some powers (e.g., Pakistan, North Korea and even Russia) to offset disadvantages in their conventional forces.

Of course, the theory of change advanced by supporters is that the normative power exercised by a humanitarian nuclear ban will shape behavior in the same way as other HD treaties, and the NWS will ultimately feel compelled to abandon their nuclear armories. The reference point here for supporters is the landmines ban and the cluster munitions ban. However, the failure of the ATT to significantly impact the arms transfer practices of major suppliers suggests that other outcomes – particularly where core economic and security interests are perceived to be at stake – might be equally as likely. Moreover, agreement on the TPNW did not necessarily signal full-throated embrace of humanitarianism per se by all of its supporters. Indeed, one of the paradoxes of the TPNW is that states such as Cuba, Venezuela and Nicaragua that have been consistently skeptical about the application of humanitarian principles in other spheres (e.g., The Responsibility to Protect (Welsh, 2019: 59)) were willing to sign up to it, while those states most associated with supporting them (the USA and its Western allies) have actively opposed the TPNW (Hanson, 2018: 480). This may signal that for states in the former category, support for the TPNW was rooted as much, if not more, in the same traditional concerns about sovereignty and state security that animated skepticism towards RtoP – in particular, the fear that major powers might use preponderant military power to threaten and coerce weaker states.

There is also ongoing debate about whether the TPNW strengthens or undermines existing nuclear nonproliferation and disarmament instruments. Critics argue it fails to even reference the CTBT and undermines the NPT by establishing a competing framework for disarmament – in particular, by subordinating it (in Article 18) to the ban treaty (Vilmer, 2020: 12) and by providing a pretext for TPNW parties to leave the NPT. They also highlight the absence of any reference to the IAEA Additional Protocol. In addition, verification of the “irreversible elimination” of nuclear weapons is left to an unspecified “competent international authority.” This raises the possibility of a new verification authority, thus further undermining the IAEA while also leaving the question of how disarmament will be guaranteed unanswered. Finally, it is argued that civil society pressure for NWS to sign up to a ban is more likely to succeed in Western democracies, thus undermining extended deterrence, and potentially leading to a China-Russia nuclear oligopoly rather than a nuclear weapon-free world (Ford, 2017; Highsmith and Stewart, 2018: 144; Müller and Wunderlich, 2020: 180).

Ban proponents respond that the TPNW represents a reaction to serial undermining of the NPT and other disarmament instruments by the NWS (Müller and Wunderlich, 2020: 178); that it reinforces the NPT (particularly its disarmament provisions); closes a legal gap in the latter by expressly banning nuclear weapons; and that no party to the TPNW has actually withdrawn from the NPT (Hamel-Green 2018: 442). They also note that parties to the TPNW carry the same verification obligations as they currently possess under the NPT and that the express purpose of the TPNW is to establish a normative prohibition, and a focal point for stigmatization politics (Tannenwald, 2020: 122). The whole rationale behind the treaty was to leave negotiation of a detailed nuclear weapons convention and associated verification provisions for the future (Ritchie, 2017). It is also argued that asymmetric nuclear disarmament by democracies is not only unrealistic but that the TPNW is already stimulating a broad array of nuclear powers to more actively engage with traditional disarmament machinery such as the Conference on Disarmament (Hamel-Green 2018).

As already noted, however, a fundamental problem with a humanitarian approach to nuclear disarmament is that the emphasis on proportionality and distinction is umbilically linked with the equally powerful norm of military necessity and the broader legitimization of war and militarism. The challenges this raises for getting down to nuclear zero are neatly illustrated by the 1996 International Court of Justice opinion on the legality of nuclear weapons. On the one hand, the Court recognized the uniquely devastating consequences of nuclear war, noting “the destructive power of nuclear weapons cannot be contained in either space or time” (ICJ, 1996: para 35). On the other hand, the court ultimately declined to take a position on the legality of nuclear weapons, including their compatibility with IHL. Its conclusion essentially balanced the norms of proportionality and distinction against the norm of military necessity, expressed in this case, as self-defense (see chapter X). Indeed, as Hood (2020: 21) has noted, the Court’s opinion can even be read as a validation of the status of nuclear weapons as the ultimate weapon for the defense of a state.

As the ICJ opinion indicates, both the veneration of military necessity and the essentially plastic nature of concepts such as “necessity,” “proportionality,” and “civilian” (Wilke, 2018; Lewis and Sagan, 2016) provide a route to justify nuclear weapons using exactly the same discursive framework as that deployed by ban proponents. For example, in its submission to the ICJ, the USA noted “the law of armed conflict governs the use of nuclear weapons – just as it governs the use of conventional weapons” (cited in ICJ, 1996: para 86). More recently, Tannenwald (2020: 117) has highlighted the belief in the US military that plans on nuclear use are shaped by just war principles of proportionality and discrimination in targeting between combatant and civilian. These same principles are also reflected in the representation of new “more discriminating” types of nuclear weapons as less likely to produce collateral damage. For example, the upgraded B61–12 bomb has been described as a “smart atom bomb of great precision” (Broad and Sanger, 2016). It has a guidance system that permits more accurate targeting and a “dial-down” capacity that allows the military to adjust the power of an explosion down to 2% of the power of the Hiroshima bomb (Paltrow, 2017; Broad and Sanger, 2016). As former US undersecretary of defense for policy James N Miller has noted of such innovations: “minimizing civilian casualties if deterrence fails is both a more credible and more ethical approach” (cited in Tannenwald, 2020: 118). The Official US Nuclear Employment Guidance rules state “the United States will not intentionally target civilian populations or civilian objects” with nuclear weapons and “all plans must be consistent with the . . . principles of distinction and proportionality” (cited in Valentino and Sagan, 2017). Likewise, Valentino and Sagan (ibid) have argued that use of a low yield nuclear weapon against the remote, deeply buried Al Qaeda caves in Tora Bora might have met the legal criteria of necessity and proportionality. Indeed, even the TPNW recognizes the norm of military necessity by stipulating a right to withdraw where extraordinary events have jeopardized the supreme interests of a country. This is not to suggest such arguments constitute a valid case for continued nuclear weapon possession, but rather to highlight the way the very norms embedded in IHL provide discursive resources that can be deployed by NWS to legitimize nuclear weapons possession.

Summary

In conclusion, the Arms Trade Treaty and the TPNW represent archetypes of models two and three of HD. In theory, both address the key problem with model one HD: that the focus on individual weapons such as landmines or cluster munitions, exempts the vast majority of military technologies from scrutiny and pressure for restraint. Indeed, to the extent that model one weapons bans effectively reify the use of precision and discrimination as models for the legitimate exercise of military force, they also legitimize the new generation of weapons heralded as exhibiting precisely these characteristics. Consequently, the broader problems of militarism and the arms trade are not just left unproblematized by model one bans, but in many respects, they effectively legitimize the very weapons central to twenty-first-century militarism. The promise of both the ATT and the TPNW is that, in different ways, they address these lacunae in the HD agenda. In the case of the ATT, it seeks to apply a humanitarian regulatory framework to range of generic weapons categories that cover a large proportion of the international arms trade. In the case of the TPNW, the connection of nuclear weapons to the status, identity, security subjectivities, and security logics of NWS and their allies means that attempts to ban them inevitably challenge militarism in far more fundamental ways than HD one weapons bans. The TPNW therefore represents a more signal achievement than other HD agreements, notwithstanding its status as a stigmatization treaty.

However, as illustrated above, the humanitarian framing of the ATT facilitated a narrow conceptualization of problem transfers that permits all but the most egregious exports and falls well short of the kind of restrictions that even a human security framework would have made more likely. Indeed, while the ATT may have caused some exporters to revise their processes of export approval, evidence that it has substantially altered the actual content of arms export decisions remains thin on the ground. Unsurprisingly, the era of both HD in general and the ATT specifically has actually coincided with significant rises in the global arms trade. In the case of the TPNW, while the humanitarian framing was sufficient to persuade significant constituencies of states to sign up to it, the reification of military necessity in IHL also provides a route to norm reinterpretation on the part of NWS concerned to defend the status quo. Although by no means inevitable, the seeds of the TPNW’s ultimate failure may well lie in the normative roots of its success.

More positively, an expansion of model three HD to other “apex” weapons would potentially connect it to a tradition of qualitative disarmament more clearly rooted in both a critique of militarism and a philosophy under which discrete initiatives are expressly pursued as part of a phased approach to achieving overall reductions in the means of violence in the international system. Admittedly, this would require the operationalization of a broader and vaguer humanitarian sensibility, one offended by war itself, and not just its much-disputed “excesses.” Whether this transformation of HD is feasible is perhaps debatable – not only would it stretch the original link with humanitarianism to possible breaking point but it seems likely to come up against the hostility to anti-militarism evinced by some leading HD campaigners. Nevertheless, it is this route that offers most potential for the realization of a truly counter-hegemonic form of HD – and the most promise for alleviation of the human suffering produced by armed violence.

Cross-References

- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Human Security
- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament
- ▶ Pacifism and Peace

Bibliography

- Acheson, R. (2019). Making sure the rhetoric matches the reality. ATT Monitor, 12(5), 1–2.
- Arms, C. (2019). Arms trade treaty monitor report 2019. New York: Control Arms Secretariat. See: https://attmonitor.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/07/EN_ATT_Monitor-Report-2019_Online.pdf.
- Bolton, M. B., & James, K. (2014). Nascent Spirit of New York or ghosts of Arms control past? The normative implications of the Arms trade treaty for global policymaking. Global Policy, 5(1), 439–452.
- Broad, W., Sanger, D. E. (2016). ‘s US modernizes nuclear weapons ‘smaller’ leaves some uneasy. New York Times, Jan 11. <https://www.nytimes.com/2016/01/12/science/as-us-modernizes-nuclear-weapons-smaller-leaves-some-uneasy.html>
- Bromley, M., Cooper, N., & Holtom, P. (2012). The UN Arms trade treaty: Lessons from history. International Affairs, 88(5), 1029–1048.
- Chandler, D., & Hynek, N. (Eds.). (2011). Critical perspectives on human security: Rethinking emancipation and power in international relations. London/ New York: Routledge.
- Cops, D., & Duquet, N. (2019). Reviewing the EU common position on Arms exports: Whither EU Arms transfer controls?, Policy Brief. Brussels: Flemish Peace Institute.
- DiFilippo, A. (2006). Japan’s nuclear disarmament policy and the US security umbrella. New York and Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Docherty, B. (2018). A ‘light for all humanity’: The treaty on the prohibition of nuclear weapons and the progress of humanitarian disarmament. Global Change, Peace and Security, 30(2), 163–186.
- Dunworth, T. (2020). Humanitarian disarmament: An historical enquiry. Cambridge: CUP.
- Enloe, C. (2014). Bananas, beaches and bases: Making feminist sense of international politics (2nd ed.). Berkeley/Los Angeles/London: University of California Press.
- Ford, Christopher (2017). Briefing on nuclear ban treaty by NSC Director Christopher Ford. Carnegie Endowment, August 22. Available at: <https://carnegieendowment.org/2017/08/22/briefing-on-nuclear-ban-treaty-by-nsc-senior-director-christopher-ford-event-5675>
- Garcia, D. (2014). Global norms on Arms: The significance of the Arms trade treaty for global security in world politics. Global Policy, 5(4), 425–431.
- Gibbons, R. D. (2018). The humanitarian turn in nuclear disarmament and the treaty on the prohibition of nuclear weapons. Nonproliferation Review, 25(1–2), 11–36.
- Green, R. (2000). A fast track to zero nuclear weapons: The middle powers initiative and the new agenda coalition. Medicine, Conflict and Survival, 16(1), 24–36.
- Hamel-Green, M. (2018). The nuclear ban treaty and 2018 disarmament forums: An initial impact assessment. Journal for Peace and Nuclear Disarmament, 1(2), 436–463.
- Hanson, M. (2018). Normalizing zero nuclear weapons: The humanitarian road to the prohibition treaty. Contemporary Security Policy, 39(3), 464–486.
- Highsmith, N., & Stewart, M. (2018). The nuclear ban treaty: A legal analysis. Survival, 60(1), 129–152.
- Hood, A. (2020). Questioning international nuclear weapons law as a field of resistance. In J. L. Blackburn & D. Fleck (Eds.), Nuclear non-proliferation in international law. Volume V. Legal Challenges for Nuclear Security and Deterrence (pp. 11–30). The Hague: TMC Asser Press.
- International Court of Justice. (1996). Legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons. Advisory Opinion of 8 July 1996. See: <https://www.icj-cij.org/files/case-related/95/095-19960708-ADV-01-00-EN.pdf>
- Kellenberger, J. (2010). Bringing the era of the nuclear weapons to an end. Statement by Jacob Kellenberger, President of the ICRC, to the Geneva Diplomatic Corps, 20 April 2010. See: <https://www.icrc.org/en/doc/resources/documents/statement/nuclear-weapons-statement-200410.htm>
- Lewis, J. G., & Sagan, S. D. (2016). The nuclear necessity principle: Making US targeting policy conform with Ethics & the Laws of the war. Deadalus: Journal of the American Academy of Arts & Sciences, 145(4), 62–74.
- MacDonald, A. (2014). UN arms trade treaty can save many lives – If it is Robustly Enforces. The Guardian, 25 Sept: See: <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/poverty-matters/2014/sep/25/un-arms-trade-treaty-exports-sales>
- MacFarquhar, N. (2013). UN treaty is first aimed at regulating global arms sales. New York Times, April 2. See: <https://www.nytimes.com/2013/04/03/world/arms-trade-treaty-approved-at-un.html>
- Mukhathanova, G. (2017). The nuclear weapons prohibition treaty”: Negotiations and beyond. Arms Control Today, Sept 2017: <https://www.armscontrol.org/act/2017-09/features/nuclear-weapons-prohibition-treaty-negotiations-beyond>
- Müller, H., & Wunderlich, C. (2020). Nuclear disarmament without the nuclear-weapon states: The nuclear

- weapons ban treaty. Daedalus: The Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, 149(2), 171–189.
- Paltrow, S. (2017). Special report: In modernizing nuclear arsenal. US Stokes New Nuclear Arms Race', 21 Nov: <https://www.reuters.com/article/us-usa-nuclear-modernize-specialreport/special-report-in-modernizing-nuclear-arsenal-u-s-stokes-new-arms-race-idUSKBN1DL1AH>
- Paris, R. (2001). Human security: Paradigm shift or hot air? International Security, 26(2), 87–102.
- Pytlak, A. (2020). Are Arms trade treaty meetings being used to their full potential? Global Responsibility to Protect, 12(2), 156–177.
- Pytlak, A., & Kirkham, E. (2013). Arms trade treaty approved. Disarmament Times, 36(2), 1–2.
- Ritchie, Nick (2017) A rebuttal to critics of the nuclear weapon ban treaty. Bulletin of Atomic Scientists. Available at: file:///Users/rcoope28/Desktop/2017_July_24_A_rebuttal_to_critics_of_the_nuclear_weapon_ban_treaty_Bulletin_of_the_Atomic_Scientists.pdf
- Ritchie, N., & Egeland, K. (2018). The diplomacy of resistance: Power, hegemony and nuclear disarmament. Global Change, Peace and Security, 30(2), 121–141.
- Rublee, M. R. (2009). Nonproliferation norms: Why states choose nuclear restraint. Athens: University of Georgia Press.
- Stavrianakis, A. (2020). Requiem for risk: Non-knowledge and domination in the governance of weapons circulation. International Political Sociology, 14(3), 233–251.
- Strydom, H. (2007) The Non-Aligned Movement and the Reform of International Institutions. in A von Bogdandy and R Wolfrum (eds), Max Planck yearbook of United Nations Law, volume 1, pp. 1–46. See: https://brill.com/view/journals/mpyo/11/1/article-p1_2.xml
- Tannenwald, N. (2007). The nuclear taboo: The United States and the non-use of nuclear weapons since 1945. Cambridge: CUP.
- Tannenwald, N. (2020). The humanitarian initiative: A critical appreciation. In T. Sauer, J. Kustermans, & B. Segaert (Eds.), Non-Nuclear Peace: Beyond the Nuclear Ban Treaty (pp. 115–129). Palgrave Macmillan.
- Thakur, R. (2018). The nuclear ban treaty: Recasting a normative framework for disarmament. The Washington Quarterly, 40(4), 71–95.
- The Guardian. (2019). UK arms sales to Saudi Arabia unlawful court declares. 20 June: <https://www.theguardian.com/law/2019/jun/20/uk-arms-sales-to-saudi-arabia-for-use-in-yemen-declared-unlawful>
- UNDP (United Nations Development Programme). (1994). Human development report: New dimensions of human security. New York: OUP.
- Valentino, B., & Sagan, S. D. (2017). The nuclear weapons ban treaty: Opportunities lost. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists. Available at: <https://thebulletin.org/2017/07/the-nuclear-weapons-ban-treaty-opportunities-lost/>.
- Vilmer, J.-B. J. (2020). The forever emerging norm of banning nuclear weapons. Journal of Strategic Studies, 1–27.
- Weiss, P. (2011). Taking the law seriously: The imperative needs for a nuclear weapons convention. Fordham International Law Journal, 34(4), 776–787.
- Welsh, J. M. (2019). Norm robustness and the responsibility to protect. Journal of Global Security Studies, 4(1), 53–72.
- Wezeman, S. T. et al (2020). Trends in international Arms transfers, 2019. SIPRI Fact Sheet, SIPRI. See: https://www.sipri.org/sites/default/files/2020-03/fs_2003_at_2019.pdf.
- Wilke, C. (2018). How international law learned to love the bomb civilians and the regulation of aerial warfare in the 1920s. Australian Feminist Law Journal, 44(1), 29–47.
- Wunderlich, C., et al. (2013). Non-aligned reformers and revolutionaries: Egypt, South Africa, Iran, and North Korea. In H. Müller & C. Wunderlich (Eds.), Norm dynamics in multilateral Arms control: Interests, Conflicts and Justice (pp. 51–81). Athens/London: University of Georgia Press.

Humanitarian Intervention

- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions

Humanitarian Interventions

- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions

Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice

Robert Muharremi
Public Policy and Governance, Rochester Institute of Technology – Kosovo Campus, Prishtina, Kosovo

Definition

The United Nations defines transitional justice as “the full range of processes and mechanisms associated with a society's attempts to come to terms with a legacy of large-scale past abuses, in order to ensure accountability, serve justice and achieve reconciliation" (United Nations 2004). It refers to the policies and instruments that deal with past atrocities to overcome social divisions (Costi 2006) caused by past repressive regimes. The central idea of transitional justice is how to achieve justice by providing a just social response to past abuses of human rights and through social transformation. What is just depends on the social context and historical experience of a society and "is contingent and informed by prior injustice" (Teitl 2000). The purpose is to comprehensively address the root causes of conflicts and violations of human rights, which were committed during such conflict (United Nations 2004), to effectively deal with the past and to create just and fair foundations from where to move on as a transformed society.

Introduction

Transitional justice, as a concept, developed in the context of democratization processes that began in response to the collapse of communism and the end of the Cold War primarily in Latin America and Europe. The "transition" is understood as a process of social transformation from "repressive rule or armed conflict" (Costi 2006) to a form of liberal democracy (Teitl 2000; Kora 2010). From an instrument of democratization, good governance, and respect for human rights, the idea of transitional justice has now expanded to become an essential component of any "liberal peace-building operation that addresses a post-conflict situation" (Kora 2010). Criminal trials, including national and international criminal courts, are an essential part of transitional justice (United Nations 2004). More recently, the international community has started to pay increased attention to hybrid courts as a way of addressing past atrocities and delivering on transitional justice. Transitional justice encompasses a variety of instruments. It includes "judicial and non-judicial processes and mechanisms, such as truth-seeking, prosecution initiatives, reparations programmes, institutional reform, or an appropriate combination thereof" (United Nations 2004). It also involves wide-ranging political, economic, cultural, sociological, and psychological actions, such as "lustration, public access to police and government records, public apology, public memorials, reburial of victims, compensations, reparations, literary and historical writings, and blanket or individual amnesty" (Kora 2010). An optimal transitional justice approach combines different judicial and non-judicial policies and instruments in a holistic approach, as none of the policies and instruments alone are capable of achieving the objectives of transitional justice (Kora 2010).

Key Issues and International Perspectives

Transitional Justice and Human Rights

Respect for human rights and the rule of law are key aspects of transitional justice. In the context of transitional justice, law is the primary instrument for social change (Teitl 2000). The dynamic and transformative character of law is at the forefront of transitional justice. For the United Nations, rule of law rests on the four pillars of the modern international legal system, i.e., international human rights law, international humanitarian law, international criminal law, and international refugee law, all of which represent universally applicable standards (United Nations 2004).

International human rights law emphasizes the importance of criminal investigation and prosecution of crimes committed by past regimes. States do not only have a (negative) obligation to refrain from interfering with human rights without reasonable justification. They have also a (positive) obligation to protect individuals from human rights violations and to ensure the effective enjoyment and fulfilment of such rights. The latter requires states to ensure that individuals have accessible and effective legal remedies (Human Rights Committee 2004). In addition, states have the obligation to investigate and prosecute perpetrators of human rights violations. Failure to investigate and prosecute is in itself a human rights violation (Human Rights Committee 2004). The establishment of a functioning judicial system and the promulgation of rules and procedures for the investigation and prosecution of criminal offences, which amount to human rights violations, are therefore an essential part of a state's positive obligation to protect and fulfill human rights.

Transitional Justice and Criminal Prosecution

The United Nations emphasizes the importance that criminal trials play in transitional contexts (United Nations 2004). According to the United Nations, criminal trials are important for transitional justice because they would:

- Express public denunciation of criminal behavior
- Provide a direct form of accountability for perpetrators and ensure a measure of justice for victims by giving them the chance to see their former tormentors made to answer for their crimes
- Enable victims to present their views and concerns at trial and reclaim their dignity
- Contribute to greater public confidence in the State's ability and willingness to enforce the law
- Help societies to emerge from periods of conflict by establishing detailed and well-substantiated records of particular incidents and events
- Help to de-legitimize extremist elements, ensure their removal from the national political process, and contribute to the restoration of civility and peace and to deterrence (United Nations 2004, p. 13)

National courts and international criminal courts are responsible for conducting criminal trials. However, in a post-conflict situation, national courts have limited legitimacy because they are usually associated with the past regime that has committed human rights violations (Dickinson 2003). Very often, they are also prone to bias, especially after internal ethnic conflicts. They may also have suffered from loss of personnel and damage of infrastructure, which compromises their capacity to deliver justice in an impartial and effective manner.

An alternative to national courts are international criminal courts, such as the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR), and the International Criminal Court (ICC). These courts were established by the Security Council to prosecute and adjudicate international crimes, i.e., crimes against humanity, war crimes, and genocide. The ICTY operated from 1993 to 2017 and the ICTR from 1994 to 2015. Both were replaced by the International Residual Mechanism for Criminal Tribunals, which follows up on issues not completed by the ICTY and ICTR, such as remaining fugitives, appeal, and revisions of decisions. The ICC was established in 1998 by way of a multilateral agreement. These courts are international because (i) they are established by international treaty or by resolution of an international organization, (ii) they have subject-matter jurisdiction over international crimes, and (iii) there is significant international representation among the judiciary and other judicial officers (Schabas 2014). In contrast to international criminal courts, national courts are established by national legislation; they apply national law and employ primarily national personnel.

The overall impression is that the ICTY and ICTR have played an important role in delivering justice in the former Yugoslavia and in Rwanda, something that national courts at that time would not have been able to do (United Nations 2004). They have also helped in developing jurisprudence in the field of international criminal law, which has led to more legal certainty in respect of defining international crimes (United Nations 2004).

Despite initial enthusiasm for international criminal courts, a "tribunal fatigue" emerged at the Security Council as of the mid-1990s (Scharf 1995). Scharf identifies four reasons why the Security Council did not continue with the establishment of international criminal tribunals:

- A politically cumbersome and time-consuming process of reaching consensus on the structure of the court.

- Permanent members of the Security Council were concerned about their own possible legal exposure.
- Other United Nations member states viewed international courts as unfair, as they shielded powerful states and their allies from legal exposure.
- Financial constraints (Scharf 1995, pp 169–170).

Despite their contribution to international justice, the ICTY and ICTR are criticized for having grown into large institutions requiring large budgets (United Nations 2004) while they were dealing only a relatively small number of cases. The “stark differential between cost and number of cases processed” raised serious questions about the efficiency of these courts and concerns about their ability to “provide for an effective system for delivery of justice” (United Nations 2004). Many trials have taken a very long time to complete which is partly due to complex legal procedures (United Nations 2004). The location of these courts outside the countries where the crimes were committed also raised concerns about their acceptance by the local population. While a location outside the country helped to protect the courts’ security and independence (United Nations 2004), trials in the concerned countries would have allowed for easier interaction with the local population and closer proximity to the evidence and witnesses, and victims would have had easier access to the court and its proceedings (UN 2004). Further to that, the ICTY failed to promote reconciliation between the conflicting parties in the former Yugoslavia where nationalism has re-emerged (Hehir 2019). In Rwanda, a National Unity and Reconciliation Commission had to be established to deal with reconciliation, as the ICTR alone could not achieve this objective.

The establishment of the ICC was also initially praised as a success for international criminal justice. However, it was soon criticized for selective targeting of individuals primarily from African countries while neglecting international crimes committed by individuals who are nationals of great powers and their allies. Failure by the ICC to initiate prosecutions for international crimes committed in Syria and Yemen and against the Rohingya and the open rejection of the court by the United States have tainted its image as an impartial court. The fact that the United States, China, and Russia are not members of the ICC has also undermined its effectiveness, the former even displaying an aggressive attitude against ICC investigation and prosecution that involves US nationals.

Transitional Justice and Hybrid Courts

The Concept of Hybrid Courts

In response to the shortcomings of the international criminal courts, the international community started to pay attention to hybrid courts as a way of addressing past atrocities (Costi 2006). Hybrid courts is a term used to describe judicial institutions, which combine international and national elements and which due to such combination distinguish them from pure national courts and international criminal courts. The combination of international and national elements in hybrid courts is expected to bring together the strengths of international criminal courts with the benefits of local institutions (Nouwen 2006), to improve their legitimacy among the local population and to strengthen the national justice system (McAuliffe 2011). Hybrid courts would promise at least partial responses to problems of legitimacy, capacity building, and norm penetration which international criminal courts and national courts usually lack (Dickinson 2003). Hybrid courts would also protect fundamental values of the international community as a whole in the context of United Nations post-conflict peace-building activities (Cimiotta 2016). Besides implementing international criminal law and punishing perpetrators, such courts would contribute to developing and improving domestic criminal law systems with a focus on the investigation and prosecution of international crimes (Cimiotta 2016). This particular function would make hybrid courts a separate functional category different from international and domestic criminal courts (Cimiotta 2016).

A major point of criticism is that there is still no generally accepted definition of what would constitute a hybrid court (Muharremi 2018). The concept of hybrid courts would be a creation of academic discourse, which is not reflected in legal practice and case law (Muharremi 2018). The main problem is that every court, which is considered a hybrid, is different in structure (Donlon 2011) and there is no uniform model (McAuliffe 2011). The terminology is inconsistent as such courts are frequently referred to as “internationalized criminal courts,” “internationalized domestic tribunals” (Linton 2001), or “mixed criminal tribunals” (Cimiotta 2016). A further problem is how to distinguish hybrid courts from domestic and international criminal courts (Kjeldgaard-Pedersen 2015). Hybrid courts are considered a special category of courts, neither genuinely international courts nor national courts (Higonnet 2006). Hybrid courts would reflect a “mixed judicial model” in contrast to an “international” and a “national” judicial model (Bassiouni 2012). As a hybrid, they would form a blend of the international and the domestic (Dickinson 2003).

Attempts to establish the legal status of such courts usually focus on the common features of courts, which are considered as hybrid. The key characteristic would be that foreign and national judges would try cases prosecuted and defended by teams of local lawyers working with those from other countries (Dickinson 2003). The judges would apply domestic law that was reformed in line with international standards. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights also defines hybrid courts as courts of mixed composition and jurisdiction, encompassing both national and international aspects, usually operating within the jurisdiction where the crimes occurred (Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights 2008). Hybrid courts would be formally an internal matter to the state they belong to, and their legal effect would be primarily on individuals rather than states (Cimiotta 2016). They would use domestic law enforcement authorities to support their judicial functions, the collection of evidence would be limited to the state where such court is located and where the crimes were committed, and their actions would be legally attributable to a particular state (Cimiotta 2016).

However, a closer look at the different courts reveals that some of the hybrid courts are in fact national courts with some form of international involvement or international courts (Reiger 2012). In addition, with the creation of new “hybrid” courts, with each of them having different structural features, Nouwen (2006) concluded that the “only defining commonality” of hybrid courts would be panels composed of international and domestic judges. The Kosovo Specialist Chambers, which is composed exclusively of international judges, removed even that “only defining commonality.” Other authors try to define hybrid courts by looking at their legal effects. Hybrid courts would have legal effect primarily and directly upon individuals rather than upon states (Cimiotta 2016). International criminal courts would not have such direct effect. This does not seem to be a convincing argument as academic literature provides plenty of evidence that international criminal courts can have direct legal effects on individuals (Lüder 2002).

A different approach is pursued by Williams (2012), who distinguishes between “true” international criminal courts, hybrid courts, internationalized tribunals, and domestic courts depending on the degree of international involvement and the legal basis for their establishment. International criminal courts would be judicial bodies, which are established based on international law, i.e., either Security Council resolution or international agreement, and where international involvement would be maximal, such as the ICC, ICTY, and ICTR (Williams 2012). At the other end of the spectrum would be “pure” domestic courts assisted, usually on an ad hoc basis, by other states or international organizations (Williams 2012) and which are based on national law, and not international law. Hybrid courts and internationalized courts would be conceptually positioned between the two others. Hybrid courts would more closely resemble the international model, and, despite a mix of national and international elements, they would not be part of the domestic legal system as they would be established based on international law (Williams 2012). The legal basis of the judicial body would thus be essential to characterizing it as internationalized or hybrid. The use of the term “hybrid court” is primarily limited to academic discourse and has little practical relevance. The International Court of Justice (Arrest Warrant of 11 April 2000, Democratic Republic of the Congo v. Belgium, 14 February 2002, International Court of Justice, Provisional Measures, I.C.J. Reports 2000) and the case law of the SCSL, ECCC, and STL do not use the term “hybrid courts.”

Examples of Hybrid Courts

Hybrid courts were established in East Timor, Kosovo, Cambodia, Sierra Leone, Lebanon, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Iraq. The latest developments are the establishment of the Kosovo Specialist Chambers and the Extraordinary African Chambers within the courts of Senegal as well as proposals for the establishment of a hybrid court for South Sudan, the Democratic Republic of Congo, and Sri Lanka. The United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) established within the District Court of Dili and the Court of Appeal special hybrid panels composed of East Timorese and international judges to try serious violations of international law (Donlon 2011). It also established a Serious Crimes Unit within the East Timor Public Prosecution Service (UNTAET Regulation No. 2000/16) to investigate and prosecute persons responsible for the atrocities committed in East Timor in 1999.

The United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) established Regulation 64 Panels (UNMIK Regulation 2000/64) to which it could assign a majority of international judges. UNMIK could also assign the investigation and prosecution for any criminal offence to an international prosecutor (Donlon 2011). In 2008, the European Union established the European Union Rule of Law Mission in Kosovo (EULEX) to take over from UNMIK responsibilities in the area of rule of law in respect of Kosovo, including the assignment of international judges and prosecutors. The Kosovo Specialist Chambers and Specialist Prosecutor’s Office (‘Special Court’) was established by Kosovo in 2015 with the mandate to prosecute and adjudicate allegations of certain international crimes which were described in a report titled the “Inhuman Treatment of People and Illicit Trafficking in Human Organs in Kosovo” (the “Report”) endorsed by the Council of Europe in 2011. The judges, prosecutors, and administrative personnel are internationals who are appointed by EULEX (Muharremi 2019). The court has jurisdiction over international crimes, such as crimes against humanity and war crimes.

In 2003, Cambodia and the United Nations agreed to establish the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) to try crimes committed by the Khmer Rouge between 1975 and 1979. The ECCC functioned within Cambodia’s existing court structure, and the majority of the judges were Cambodian nationals. The Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL) was established in 2002 to prosecute serious crimes against civilians and UN peacekeepers committed during the civil war in Sierra Leone (1991–2002). After the closure of the SCSL in 2013, the Residual Special Court for Sierra Leone (RSCSL) was established in 2010 in agreement with the United Nations to manage the ongoing and ad hoc residual functions, such as reviews of convictions and acquittals and requests for compensation. The UN established the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) in 2007 to try individuals who were responsible for the assassination of the former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafic Hariri in 2005. The STL is the first tribunal, which has jurisdiction over the crime of terrorism (Ambos 2011).

The War Crimes Sections in the Court and Prosecutor’s Office of Bosnia and Herzegovina were established in 2005 as a hybrid judicial mechanism to complement the ICTY, which was to end its work in 2010. They had jurisdiction to investigate, prosecute, and try cases transferred from the ICTY and highly sensitive national cases (Donlon 2011). During a 5-year transitional period from 2005 to 2009, the High Representative appointed international judges to the war crimes sections. In 2003, the Coalition Provisional Authority established the Iraqi Special Tribunal (IST) to try crimes committed in Iraq between 17 July 1968 and 1 May 2003. The Coalition Provisional Authority also established a Crimes Against Humanity Investigations Unit staffed by American prosecutors and investigators to assist investigations and the IST. The Extraordinary African Chambers (EAC) within the courts of Senegal was established in 2012 by an agreement between the African Union and Senegal with the mandate to try international crimes committed in Chad between 1982 and 1990 (Cimiotta 2015). The Chambers are composed of Senegalese judges appointed by a commission established by the African Union, and the Presidents of the chambers are nationals of the African Union, other than Senegal (Cimiotta 2015).

Hybrid Courts: An Evaluation

On the positive side, hybrid courts have prosecuted and convicted persons charged with criminal offences within their jurisdiction (Reiger and Wierda 2006), which has contributed to the public perception of at least some accountability for past atrocities (Open Society Foundations 2016). They also seem to have contributed to the removal from power of individuals, who were considered dangerous or obstructive for peace processes (Jalloh 2011). The threat of judicial proceedings and indictments before such courts has, in some instances, reduced the will of conflicting parties to engage in violent political action (Jalloh 2011). Hybrid courts have also contributed to establishing and improving historical records of crimes, which are relevant for subsequent public discourse and education about the causes of past atrocities (Open Society Foundations 2016).

However, a major criticism of hybrid courts is that they are susceptible to national and international political influence. Narrow definitions of the court's jurisdiction would lead to de facto impunity of senior officials with political power and influence (Open Society Foundations 2016). In addition, there are instances of direct national and international political interference with judicial procedures, especially in situations where the accused is important for political stability or security reasons (Chatham House 2008). Lack of adequate oversight and accountability mechanisms for hybrid courts, and lack of political and financial backing by international actors, such as the UN, would facilitate such political influence (Open Society Foundations 2016). Unchecked prosecutorial discretion who to prosecute would also allow political consideration to influence judicial proceedings and thus establish the perception of selective justice (Jalloh 2011). Hybrid courts have met resistance and lack of cooperation by governments where the prosecution was harmful to their foreign policy or other strategic considerations (Reiger and Wierda 2006). The legitimacy of judicial proceedings was questioned when the prosecution used evidence obtained by government which were politically hostile to the local government or political forces (Humphrey 2011). A further concern is that hybrid courts have not delivered on the promise of enhanced legitimacy, capacity building, and norm penetration as originally expected, especially when they were created on a "top-down" basis without taking into account local norms, beliefs, and practices (Millar 2014). The creation of hybrid courts is very often driven by political considerations, primarily to shield powerful countries from criminal responsibility (Muharremi 2019), which furthers the perception of selective justice and questions the legitimacy of such courts.

Where hybrid courts lack legitimacy among the local population, there is the danger that court proceedings will fuel internal political conflicts which may lead to social instability. A lack of legitimacy leads to resentment and resistance by the local population (Hehir 2019). This may not only negatively affect the willingness of local institutions to cooperate with the court but also compromise efforts to achieve reconciliation and other core objectives of transitional justice (Hehir 2019). Even where criminal prosecutions lead to individual accountability for past crimes, the effect of such criminalization of political violence tends to be controversial and politically destabilizing especially when such criminalization relates to behavior conducted out of a duty toward a particular political community (Leebaw 2008). While criminal prosecution serves the transitional justice objective of individual accountability and reinforcement of rule of law, it may compromise reconciliation and political and social stability, which may be better served by noncriminal instruments, such as truth commissions (Leebaw 2008). In fact, there is no evidence that hybrid courts have contributed to post-conflict national reconciliation, and in some instances, such as in Sierra Leone, the court has deepened national separation when only one national group was prosecuted (Jalloh 2011; Hehir 2019). While court proceedings have contributed to the collection of historical records, this does not mean that they have also served truth-finding as many of the records were questionable as to the truthfulness of the statements made by witnesses and those indicted (Open Society Foundations 2016). Very often, prosecutorial statements were strategic narratives to delegitimize political actors by constructing their acts as criminal rather than political (Kelsall 2006). Hybrid courts, like international criminal courts, are prone to abuse for political purposes, including the change of historical narratives of conflicts by criminalizing political behavior (Nice 2017), and to create a criminal image of political movements thereby creating the perception of the court being an instrument of political conflict rather than of justice (Kelsall 2006).

Summary

The present proliferation of hybrid courts in different formats indicates that there is a tendency to continue with the establishment of such courts as an alternative to pure international criminal courts, like the ICTY or OCTR. Criminal trials of past human rights abuses and violations will also remain a central element of transitional justice. However, it is important that hybrid courts have domestic support before they are established if they are to be successful (Hehir 2019) and that their structure allows for a meaningful involvement of local actors in order to achieve the objectives of enhanced legitimacy, capacity building, and norm penetration. Hybrid courts should also avoid the mistakes made by international criminal courts, such as too lengthy procedures, limit public outreach, and a disconnect between court and local population. Special safeguards must be in place to minimize national and international political interference with judicial procedures, or, alternatively, there must be a more realistic assessment when judicial procedures should not take priority over political processes that are important for political stability, peace processes, and national reconciliation. Finally, hybrid courts cannot be used alone as an instrument of transitional justice. They should be complemented with reforms aimed at strengthening local judicial systems and non-judicial instruments, such as truth commissions, review of historical narratives, apologies, and education which aims at changing the mind-set, perceptions, and interpretations of the people in a manner that promotes reconciliation, peace, and stability. Striking a fair balance between, on the one hand, the need for justice and individual accountability for past human rights violations and, on the other hand, political stability and reconciliation will remain the fundamental challenge of any transitional justice endeavor.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Search for Peace, the

References

- Ambos, K. (2011). Judicial creativity at the special tribunal for Lebanon: Is there a crime of terrorism under international law? Leiden Journal of International Law, 24(3), 655–675.
- Bassiouni, C. (2012). Introduction to international criminal law. Leiden: Brill.
- Chatham House. (2008). The Iraqi tribunal: The post-Saddam cases. https://www.chathamhouse.org/sites/default/files/field/field_document/Discussion%20Group%20Summary%20The%20Iraqi%20Tribunal.pdf

- Cimiotta, E. (2015). The first steps of the extraordinary African chambers. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 13, 177–197.
- Cimiotta, E. (2016). The specialist chambers and the specialist Prosecutor's Office in Kosovo. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 14, 53–72.
- Costi, A. (2006). Hybrid tribunals as a viable transitional justice mechanism to combat impunity in post-conflict situations. New Zealand Universities Law Review, 22, 213–239.
- Dickinson, L. (2003). The promise of hybrid courts. American Journal of International Law, 97, 295–310.
- Donlon, F. (2011). Hybrid tribunals. In W. Schabas & N. Bernaz (Eds.), Routledge handbook of international criminal law (pp. 85–101). New York: Routledge.
- Hehir, A. (2019). Lessons learned? The Kosovo specialist chambers' lack of local legitimacy and its implications. Human Rights Review, 20, 1–21. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s12142-019-00564-y>.
- Higonnet, E. (2006). Restructuring Hybrid Courts: Local Empowerment and National Criminal Justice Reform. Arizona Journal of International and Comparative Law, 23(2), 347–435.
- Human Rights Committee. (2004). General Comment No. 31 [80]. <https://www.refworld.org/docid/478b26ae2.html>
- Humphrey, M. (2011). The special tribunal for Lebanon: Emergency law, trauma and justice. Arab Studies Quarterly, 33(1), 4–22.
- Jalloh, C. (2011). Special court for Sierra Leone: Achieving justice? Michigan Journal of International Law, 32, 395–460.
- Kelsall, T. (2006). Politics, anti-politics, international justice: Language and power in the special court for Sierra Leone. Review of International Studies, 32(4), 587–602.
- Kjeldgaard-Pedersen, A. (2015). What defines an international criminal court?: A critical assessment of “the involvement of the international community” as a deciding factor. Leiden Journal of International Law, 28, 113–131.
- Kora, A. (2010). Transitional justice: A new discipline in human rights. <https://www.sciencespo.fr/mass-violence-war-massacre-resistance/fr/document/transitional-justice-new-discipline-human-rights-0>
- Leebaw, B. (2008). The irreconcilable goals of transitional justice. Human Rights Quarterly, 30, 95–118.
- Linton, S. (2001). Cambodia, East Timor and Sierra Leone: Experiments in international justice. Criminal Law Forum, 12, 185–246.
- Lüder, S. (2002). The legal nature of the international criminal court and the emergence of supranational elements in international criminal justice. International Review of the Red Cross, 84, 79–92.
- McAuliffe, P. (2011). Hybrid tribunals at ten – How international criminal justice's golden child became an orphan. Journal of International Law and International Relations, 7, 1–65.
- Millar, G. (2014). Disaggregating hybridity: Why hybrid institutions do not produce predictable experiences of peace. Journal of Peace Research, 51(4), 501–514.
- Muharremi, R. (2018). The concept of hybrid courts revisited: The case of the Kosovo specialist chambers. International Criminal Law Review, 18, 623–654.
- Muharremi, R. (2019). The Kosovo specialist chambers from a political realism perspective. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 13, 290–309.
- Nice, G. (2017). Justice for all and how to achieve it: Citizens, lawyers and the law in the age of human rights. London: Scala Arts & Heritage Publishers.
- Nouwen, S. (2006). “Hybrid courts” – The hybrid category of a new type of international crimes courts. Utrecht Law Review, 2(2), 190–214.
- Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. (2008). Maximizing the legacy of hybrid courts. <https://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Publications/HybridCourts.pdf>
- Open Society Foundations. (2016). Performance and perception – The impact of the extraordinary chambers in the Court of Cambodia. <https://www.justiceinitiative.org/publications/performance-and-perception-impact-extraordinary-chambers-court-cambodia>
- Reiger, C. (2012). Hybrid and internationalized tribunals. In C. Giorgetti (Ed.), International litigation in practice – volume 4: Practice and jurisprudence of international courts and tribunals (pp. 283–320). Leiden: Brill, Martinus-Nijhoff.
- Reiger, C., & Wierda, M. (2006). The serious crimes process in Timor-Leste: In retrospect. International Center for Transitional Justice. <https://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-TimorLeste-Criminal-Process-2006-English.pdf>
- Schabas, W. (2014). International criminal courts. In C. Romano, K. Alter, & C. Avgerou (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of international adjudication (pp. 205–224). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Scharf, M. (1995). The politics of establishing an international criminal court. Duke Journal of Comparative and International Law, 6(1), 167–174.
- Teitel, R. (2000). Transitional justice. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- United Nations. (2004). The rule of law and transitional justice in conflict and post-conflict societies. https://digitallibrary.un.org/record/527647/files/S_2004_616-EN.pdf
- Williams, S. (2012). Hybrid and internationalized criminal tribunals – Selected jurisdictional issues. (Doctoral Thesis, Durham University). <http://etheses.dur.ac.uk/38/>

Hybrid Peace

- Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject

Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace

Volker Boege

The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Definition

The concepts of hybrid political order and hybrid peace challenge the liberal peacebuilding and statebuilding discourse which has dominated peace and conflict studies and interventionist political practice of international organizations and leading states of the Global North in the post-Cold War era. This discourse evaluated states and peace against a reified and idealized Western notion of peace and statehood. By contrast, the hybrid political orders and hybrid peace approach engage with the complex social, political, economic, and cultural context of the intervened-upon localities and societies. It acknowledges the coexistence, competition, entanglement, and blending of different types of legitimate authority and different understandings and forms of peace (formation). According to this approach, the “emergence of hybridity is the result of the clash and connection of fundamentally different forms of political organisation and community” (Richmond 2011, p. 19).

In hybrid political orders, diverse and competing authority structures, sets of rules, and logics of order coexist, compete, overlap, interact, intertwine, and blend, combining elements of introduced Western models of governance with elements stemming from local indigenous traditions of governance and politics, with further influences exerted by the forces of globalization and associated societal fragmentation (in various forms: ethnic, tribal, religious, . . .). Consequently, these orders are characterized by the closely interwoven texture of their separate sources of origin: they are hybrid (Boege et al. 2009, 2010) – and so are the forms of peace that emerge in the course of the interactions between liberal international interveners and the local institutions and actors shaping – and being shaped by – hybrid political orders.

Introduction

For more than two decades, international peacebuilding practice has been informed by what has been called the “liberal peace” approach, and the academic debate has revolved around this approach and its critique ► “Liberal peace”. As a consequence of the extensive criticism it has been subjected to, some commentators “now argue that the idea of a liberal peace is in major crisis or, indeed, already dead” (Kappler 2017, p. 32). Its practices, however, are still pretty much alive (ibid., p. 33). Linked to the discourse on state fragility, liberal peacebuilding was conceptualized as closely linked to statebuilding, with statebuilding following the internationally hegemonic understanding of “the state” as the Western Weberian state, and operationalized as building the institutions of the state and their capacity. Accordingly, a core aim of peacebuilding was the establishment of a “proper” state as the guarantor of internal peace, with a liberal market economy and a liberal democratic civil society as underpinnings of such a liberal state. This paradigm of peacebuilding-as-statebuilding (Richmond 2011) is pursued as an exercise of standardization and homogenization.

The proclaimed aim of statebuilders – both from the national political elite of the country in question and its international supporters – is a state pretty much the same as the model Western liberal state with its monopoly over the legitimate use of physical force as providing the basis for peace and order and the framework for the nonviolent conduct of societal conflicts (Fukuyama’s “getting to Denmark”). This ideal type of the Weberian state is (still) the internationally hegemonic, taken-for-granted, nonnegotiable, and concept of statehood. It “has penetrated deeply into society, even in countries where state practices are widely divergent from this idea. It defines the limits of what can be legitimately said or done” (Eriksen 2017, p. 781). Attempts to enforce this model state, however, in reality are met by a conglomerate of adoption, adaptation, mimicry, subversion, autonomous counter-organization, resistance, and avoidance, based on the social, cultural, and political-economical specifics of the place that is subjected to those attempts.

In the course of numerous international peacebuilding-as-statebuilding interventions, it turned out that local populations were not just passive recipients of a standardized peace and state delivered to them from the outside. Local people demonstrated agency of their own, often beyond forms of politics familiar to liberal Western views. The concept of peacebuilding-as-statebuilding is thus confronted with the messy realities of governance in the intervened-upon societies.

This reality has been acknowledged by the “local turn” in peace and conflict studies (and the concomitant “ethnographic turn” (Millar 2018)). Local actors have become to be seen as impacting on the internationals’ predetermined peacebuilding/statebuilding agenda and its implementation through various forms of agency, and as capable of appropriating international agendas and resources for their own purposes (Richmond 2011; Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013). “The local” is acknowledged as the core arena of peacebuilding, the site of ongoing processes of interchange, entanglement, permeation, reassemblage, and reconfiguration, as co-created and shared by a variety of interacting local, national, regional, and international actors and institutions (Mac Ginty 2015, 2016; Kappler 2014; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Albrecht and Moe 2014).

In this mix, local actors and societal structures and institutions which do not fit into the Western liberal format of “state,” “civil society,” or “business/economy” warrant particular attention: this is the realm of the “local local” (Richmond 2012, p. 6), which first and foremost comprises of indigenous customary networks and their institutions and actors. Mac Ginty’s observation that international peacebuilders and statebuilders have difficulties to engage with the local holds particularly true for this sphere. Internationals are “poorly equipped to see the local” (Mac Ginty 2016, p. 207), not only because of lack of access but also because of “epistemological biases” (ibid.). Accordingly, in the “local ownership” discourse, which is so fashionable with international donors and peacebuilders, only a rather narrowly understood local is appealed to: “the local that is part of the Western civil society imaginary while the rest is deemed violent and intolerable” (Richmond 2011, p. 153).

This “rest,” however, that is, the societal realm beyond Western conceptualizations of the state, governance, civil society, the economy, and other compartmentalized sections of society, is crucial for the actual processes of peace and state formation. In other words: These processes take place in the context of on-the-ground hybridity of political order, shaped by this order and shaping it, letting hybrid forms of peace emerge.

Hybrid Political Order

Taking note of the “local local,” first and foremost means to acknowledge the importance of traditional, customary societal structures – extended families, lineages, clans, tribes, religious brotherhoods, village communities – and traditional authorities such as village elders, clan chiefs, healers, big men, tribal kings or queens, and spiritual leaders, and the customary law and indigenous knowledge that comes with them, for the everyday maintenance of governance, peace, and order in postcolonial states even today.

Today’s customary or traditional actors, institutions, procedures are of course not those of the precontact and precolonial past. Societies everywhere in the world have come into contact with outside influences and have not been left untouched by – originally European – capitalist expansion, colonialism, missionizing, imperialism, and globalization. Therefore, there are no clear-cut boundaries between the exogenous “modern” and the endogenous “traditional” or “customary,” rather there are ongoing processes of assimilation, articulation, transformation, and/or adoption. Nevertheless, the use of the terms “custom,” “customary institutions,” “traditional,” “traditional authorities,” etc. is warranted because they mark specific characteristics, which are rooted in precolonial/precontact times that distinguish them from introduced institutions which belong to the realm of the state, the market economy, and civil society. It has to be kept in mind, however, that these terms and the social institutions they refer to are not well defined and fixed but contested, fluid, and constantly changing. Custom is not static; it is in constant flux. It adapts to new circumstances, exposed to external “modernizing” factors, and at the same time itself exerting influence on these factors. And these processes of interaction and mutual permeation let hybrid forms of political order, security governance, and peace emerge.

Customary institutions of governance that had existed prior to colonial rule and the subsequent declaration of the independence of newly formed postcolonial states have survived the onslaught of colonialism and “national liberation.” They have been subject to considerable change and had to adapt to new circumstances. They have, however, proven to be remarkably resilient.

By contrast, attempts to consolidate the introduced form of statehood after it had been formally established as a result of decolonization met with manifold obstacles. The import or imposition of the modern Western state structures in the course of decolonization did not lead to the establishment of the “modern” state (that is: a state along the lines of the Western model) – as might have been expected by the former colonial powers and the indigenous political elites who steered their countries towards independence. At the time of independence, “the state” more often than not was nothing more than an empty shell. Many of the newly independent states had no history of pre-colonial unitary rule, and people did not have a sense of shared citizenship and national identity.

For many states in the Global South, even today it is difficult to exercise sovereign control, to deliver effective governance, to guarantee order, and, based on these services, to gain legitimacy. They have not reached out to and permeated the entirety of their territories and their societies. In certain areas (be it remote rural regions or informal settlements at the fringes of urban centers), only “outposts” of the state can be found. For many people, the state is “far away,” not only physically but also mentally. Its institutions are more often than not seen as a threat rather than as providers of security, peace, justice, and other services.

Under such conditions, one way to make state institutions work is through the utilization of kin-based and other traditional networks. This, however, allows these networks to imbue (incomplete) state structures with their own logic and their own rules of operating. The state is “infiltrated” by “informal” indigenous societal institutions and social forces. This leads to its aberration from the ideal type of what a “proper” (Western, Weberian) state is supposed to look like (hence the lament about neopatrimonialism, nepotism, corruption, etc.).

On the other hand, the partial intrusion of state agencies impacts on non-state local orders as well. Customary systems are subjected to deconstruction and reformation as they have to engage with state institutions. In the course of the interchange with the state apparatus, customary institutions and customary authorities adopt an ambiguous position with regard to the state, appropriating state functions and “state talk,” but at the same time pursuing their own agenda under the guise of the state surface. This, however, also means to change one’s original positionality detached from the state.

The fact that traditional leaders like chiefs are both “state” and “non-state” – that they are “doubly embedded” – comes with the challenge to have to operate in two sociopolitical contexts (Thelen et al. 2014; Holzinger et al. 2016; Kyed 2017). Or, to put it in another way, chiefs are like turtles: The former CEO of the National Council of Chiefs in Vanuatu compares chiefs to turtles, saying: turtles have to live in two worlds, in the water and on land. They have to swim in the water and to crawl on land. They cannot swim on land or crawl in water. They have to adapt to the environment. Chiefs in their locality act according to kastom, in the National Council of Chiefs, the Malvatumauri, which is a formal constitutional body; however, they have to act according to the laws of the state, the Chiefs’ Act, etc. (The term kastom, a Pidgin derivative of the English “custom,” is frequently used today in Vanuatu and other Melanesian countries, both by people in the villages and politicians in order to stress their cultural heritage and the difference between their own ways and foreign ways of governance, economics, conflict resolution, peacebuilding, etc., often depicting kastom as rooted in ancient pre-colonial traditions, a set of rules developed by the ancestors. Kastom governance is thus presented as the other of, or even alternative to, introduced state-based governance. At the same time, kastom is different from the customs of the precontact and precolonial past. It has developed since the times of first contact and colonization due to interaction and exchange with various external influences, and it continues to change today. In other words: kastom is hybrid; Interview with Selwyn Garu, Port Vila 10 April 2011.) Accordingly, the Malvatumauri's CEO has to have one leg in kastom and the other leg in the state system. He has a Public Service Commission position but at the same time has to do kastom work. The Malvatumauri itself is linked to the Ministry of Justice. Similar arrangements can be found in numerous postcolonial states.

Hence chiefs are not "pure," "non-state," "customary" actors any more. But they are still around. Contrary to the prophecies (and hopes) of all sorts of modernization theorists, "chieftaincy did not wither and die" (Ubink 2008, p. 10) – chiefs and other traditional leaders are still with us today, and they will not disappear any time soon.

So there is change and adaptation in both directions: On the one hand, customary actors and institutions change and adapt in the course of interaction with state institutions, and, more generally, in light of the all-powerful, ever-present, taken-for-granted idea of the state. On the other hand, state actors and institutions change and adapt in the course of interaction with the customary sphere.

This complex nature of governance is further complicated by the emergence of movements and formations whose origins lie in the effects of and reactions to globalization, including warlords and their militias in outlying regions, gang leaders in townships and squatter settlements, vigilante-type organizations, ethnically based protection rackets, millenarian religious movements, transnational networks of extended family relations or organized crime and religiously motivated terrorism, and new forms of tribalism. Their emergence is not least a result of poor state performance, and their activities can contribute to the further weakening of state structures. Where state agencies are unable or unwilling to deliver security and other public goods, people will turn to other social entities for support. Sometimes such new formations manage to seize power in certain regions of a given state (be it a remote mountainous region or a squatter settlement in the capital). They have the capacity to exert violence against outsiders and to control violence within their respective strongholds. The new formations sometimes manage to capture "bits" of state or infiltrate state institutions, and they are often linked to traditional societal entities and attempt to instrumentalize them for their own goals, such as power and profit. The protagonists of traditional societal entities such as lineages, clans, tribes, or religious brotherhoods, on the other hand, also introduce their own agendas into the overall picture. These agendas are not reducible to political aims, such as political power, or to economic considerations, such as private gain and profit, but include concepts such as "honor," "revenge," or "right to (violent) self-help." Thus non-state traditional actors and institutions, their motives and concerns, and their ways of doing things, blend with new "private" formations and their motives. Clan leaders might become warlords (or warlords might strive for a position of authority in the customary context) or tribal warriors might become private militias (or be incorporated into the state army or police, under the command of their warlord/clan leader), and a political economy based on extensive use of violence might emerge as locally embedded orders increasingly link into the globalized market and global society, for example, via drug trafficking, migration, remittances, trade networks, or religious affiliations. Traditional local entities become integrated into transnational, regional, and even global networks. Again, as in the case of the relationship between introduced state institutions and indigenous customary societal institutions, a situation of coexistence, overlap, and blending emerges.

All these processes of diffusion, interaction, and permeation lead to the hybridization of governance and let hybrid political orders emerge. In hybrid political orders, diverse legitimate authority structures, institutions and actors of governance, sets of rules, logics of order and claims to power coexist, compete, overlap, intertwine, and blend, emerging from genuinely different societal spheres – spheres, however, which do not exist in isolation, but permeate each other (Boege et al. 2009, 2010; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2016; Brown 2018; Hunt 2018; Boege 2018). The specific relations between the various actors and institutions of governance in hybrid political orders differ from place to place and change over time. Hybrid political order is not static but in constant flux.

Hybrid political orders differ fundamentally from (the ideal type of) the Weberian state as the framework for maintenance of peace and order. Peace and order are not based on the state monopoly over the legitimate use of physical force (the core of the Weberian concept of the state), but on the relations and interactions of a plethora of state and non-state (traditional, civil society and private) actors and institutions, with the state/non-state divide blurred, incoherent and in flux.

Hybrid Security Governance

In postcolonial states, everyday peace and order in the local context is more often than not maintained not so much by state institutions, but by village chiefs and clan elders, healers, male and female community leaders, and religious leaders. Their strength is rooted in closely knit communities, with kinship-based networks underpinning social order and well-being and regulating the management of everyday life. By contrast, the police, courts, and other institutions charged with maintaining domestic peace in the fully fledged states of the Global North hardly penetrate the rural areas of these countries. They lack the capacity to make their presence felt in the communities, and, more often than not do not even assume that peace and order is primarily their responsibility. They are happy to leave this duty to local authorities, and their effectiveness and legitimacy very much depend on good – more or less formal or informal – working relationships with those authorities. Customary authorities deal with conflicts and disturbances by applying the customary law of the particular locality rather than the written law of the state. In many places, customary law is strong and vital, whereas the state judicial system is weak. People generally find customary law easier to understand, more accessible, fairer, cheaper, more transparent, faster, and more efficient, and also more legitimate because it is embedded in local culture. The interface between customary law and state law is often uneasy, characterized by (partial) contestation, (partial) complementarity, and (partial) incompatibility, often with no clear regulation of their relationship.

But it is not just this coexistence of state and non-state security providers and the significance of the non-state actors which characterize “hybrid security governance” (Schroeder et al. 2014). Rather, security actors and institutions straddle the state/non-state boundary, and thus call into question the state/non-state dichotomy. While some entities can be at first sight be seen as “state” (the police, the army, the courts) and some as “non-state” (priests, vigilantes, chiefs), a closer look reveals blurred boundaries and intersections, with intense interactions and relationships: chiefs who are both “state” and “non-state,” community police that are more “state” in some contexts and more “non-state” in others, overlap between vigilantes and police or police and community watch groups, intersection between the formal state justice system and informal customary law. Just to take the last point: Customary law has a specific relationship to the state – it is non-state, distinct from the laws of the state, but at the same time accepted by the state as a source of law in its own right, alongside statutory law. Formally, customary law is often inferior to state law and confined to certain areas of jurisdiction, with serious crimes such as murder or rape being the prerogative of state law. De facto, however, boundaries are fluid, and customary law often reaches beyond its formal restrictions. Moreover, forms of customary law not sanctioned by the state are also practiced, and customary law covers areas which are not (and cannot) be covered by state law but are of major importance in community life, such as sorcery or witchcraft.

This hybridization of security governance renders obsolete the Western concept of the state as the central overarching entity holding the monopoly over the legitimate use of physical force. Governments might claim or pretend that it does exist, but in reality, there is no central dominance over and control of the huge variety of providers of peace, security, and justice, nor over their relationships and interactions, which are complex, fluid, and constantly changing. Continuous hybridization and processes of emergence are thus the main features of the provision of peace and security, rather than the centrally orchestrated and controlled “building” of a uniform system of peace and order. The endeavors of governments and their international supporters – security sector reform, state capacity-building, justice sector reform, etc. – are only elements in a much broader mix of processes of state and peace formation. It is illusionary to believe that these processes will finally culminate in a Western liberal peace and state based on the monopoly over the legitimate use of physical force. While statebuilding suggests a planned, technical, linear, and predictable endeavor, state formation by contrast is a messy, contradictory, nonlinear, and complex long-term process which involves a wide and diverse range of actors and institutions, be they state, para-state, or “non-state”/“customary”/“traditional.” Statebuilding can only be part of such complex state formation.

Hybrid Forms of Peace

Beyond the provision of everyday peace and order in the local context, customary ways of building and maintaining peace also play a role in the internationally supported peacebuilding endeavors in the post-conflict regions of the Global South (for case studies, see Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Aning et al. 2018).

Customary institutions and actors in many places and on many occasions have proven their capabilities and legitimacy in building peace, preventing and transforming conflicts and maintaining societal order. Protagonists of liberal peacebuilding and statebuilding, however, have problems engaging with this “local-local” “i.e. what lies beneath the veneer of internationally sponsored local actors and NGOs constituting a ‘civil’ as opposed to ‘uncivil’ society” (Richmond 2011, p. 10). They hesitate to acknowledge and engage with such unfamiliar forms of peace(building) as they cling to their idea of what a proper peace (and state) should look like. But peacebuilding interventions everywhere have to engage with local customary forms of peace(building).

International peacebuilding interventions get entangled in the complex on-the-ground realities of hybrid political orders, and in the course of engagement with these local realities, peacebuilding itself becomes hybridized, letting hybrid forms of peace emerge (Richmond and Mitchell 2012). Intervened-upon societies are not just blank pages on which the international liberal peacebuilding agenda could be written. Peacebuilding is not the “implementation” of a preplanned international agenda, not a unilinear “delivery” of a fixed and homogenous universal peace – the Western liberal peace international organizations and the intervening powers of the Global North hold high and promote as the universal, only valid emanation of peace – but a complex and complicated multifaceted exchange, shaped by fluid and dynamic relations, between interveners and a multitude of local actors and institutions in the intervened-upon hybrid political orders. Locals introduce their custom/kastom way of knowing and doing peace, thus derailing or redirecting preplanned peacebuilding interventions (Millar 2018, p. 4).

Hybridization thus refers to the ways in which local actors “attempt to respond to, resist and ultimately reshape peace initiatives through interactions with international actors and institutions” (Richmond and Mitchell 2012, p. 8). These interactions lead to the emergence of new hybrid forms of peace (Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Mac Ginty 2011). They shape those hybrid forms, and they change in the course of hybridization.

Peacebuilding thus is fundamentally relational and procedural, an ongoing cross-cultural interchange, characterized by entanglement and mutual permeation of institutions, actors, procedures, worldviews, epistemologies, and norms, taking place at the interface between the local and international. In peacebuilding interventions, more often than not fundamentally different notions of what peace and security actually comprises, collide, and so do fundamentally different conceptualizations of core elements of peacebuilding, such as gender, time, development, religion/spirituality, justice, reconstruction, emotions, memory, and healing. Introduced liberal approaches and local customary approaches coexist and influence each other, at various policy levels, from the local to the high politics of negotiations, peace settlements, and agreements. Usually, in the local context, customary ways prevail, for example, traditional forms of reconciliation and retributive justice, spiritually laden ceremonies, and restoration of relationships. But customary peace processes are also “modernized,” taking on board introduced liberal peacebuilding knowledge and formats, e.g., workshops on mediation and facilitation offered by international NGOs, reintegration of ex-combatants, externally supported rehabilitation and reconstruction. In order to be legitimate, effective, and sustainable, however, these introduced approaches have to be adapted and localized. Hence, peacebuilding in the local context can be described as a local-liberal hybrid, with the local predominating. High-level “political” peacebuilding, by contrast, usually is a liberal-local hybrid, by and large following liberal international templates. Local aspects often are much less visible, but activities and settlements in this context – negotiations, ceasefires, peace agreements, constitution-making, capacity-building of state institutions, democratization, disarmament, security sector reform, . . . – are also infused with local patterns of appropriate behavior, norms, and interests. Hence high-level “political” peacebuilding is also hybridized.

In these processes, both the local customary and the international liberal are transformed, leading to hybrid forms of peace which might differ considerably from the “peace” originally envisioned by international liberal peacebuilders (and from traditional forms of peace as well).

These forms are not necessarily benign, effective, and legitimate and sustainable. The quality and sustainability of hybrid forms of peace very much depends on the local context and the local processes – at the top and at the bottom – the linkages between top and bottom, and between introduced liberal and local customary approaches, and on the –fluid – distribution of power, which may oscillate between an at times almost all-powerful liberal peace approach and “recipients” of that approach which on other occasions might turn out to be more powerful than expected, maintaining autonomy and agency, grounded in the hybridity of political order. Hence the local-international dynamics and interactions “make every form of peace unique, dynamic, contextualized and contested” (Richmond and Mitchell 2012, pp. 1–2).

Hybrid forms of peace emerge in an unplanned manner in the course of peace formation (which itself is always hybridized), behind the backs of the involved actors so to speak, for the most part independent from their intentions and assumptions, determined by power relations. One could imagine, however, a paradigm shift from today’s mainstream liberal peacebuilding to “relational peacebuilding” (Brigg 2016, p. 58) as a deliberately planned relational approach, which would open space for cross-cultural dialogue – dialogue which does not privilege one set of worldviews, values, norms, and practices (the liberal international) over the other. A prerequisite for such a dialogue actually to happen is understanding and engaging with the hybridity of political order and peace. On this basis, the capability and willingness to work with and across difference could evolve, acknowledging that peacebuilding first and foremost is an exercise of working with and across cultural difference.

Summary

The hybridity concept was put forward to grasp complex heterogenous features of governance in postcolonial so-called fragile states, widening the perspective both beyond the “idea of the state” and beyond state institutions (Bonacker et al. 2017; Eriksen 2017). It challenges the conventional state fragility and statebuilding discourse which evaluates states against a “Weberian” ideal-type (Lemay-Hebert and Lottholz 2016). It encourages a change of perspective: not to focus on deficiencies, on what is lacking, “not yet properly built,” or “already failed again” (statehood in the Western sense) – but on what is actually there (Dinnen and Kent 2015).

The aim of such an approach is not to get rid of “bad” states in favor of “good” hybrid political orders. Nor does it provide an alternative plan, to be applied in interventions in order to do statebuilding better, with hybrid outcomes “as plannable and predictable (...) as one more element of project implementation” (Millar et al. 2013, p. 139). It would be misleading to think of the concept of hybrid political orders as prescriptive and normative, suggesting that hybrid political orders are “better” than states, and that interventions now have to pursue the “building” of hybrid political orders instead of statebuilding, thus coming to the rescue of the liberal peace approach (Millar 2014). Such a way of thinking about hybridity is in danger of instrumentalization of the hybridity approach for purposes of reasserting and intensifying outsiders’ control, incorporating selected elements of “local” culture and governance into standardized formats, in the interest of international interveners, not the intervened-upon locals (Brown 2017; Bjoerkdahl et al. 2016). Against such prescriptive or instrumental readings of hybridity, it has to be stressed that hybrid governance and security arrangements are not and cannot be the outcomes of preplanned interventions. Rather, they emerge in the context of interactions of a host of actors and institutions, in nonlinear, contingent, unpredictable, and unexpected ways, beyond central planning and control (Millar et al. 2013). Furthermore, they are not per se benign – they are imbued with power disparities and structures of dominance, they can be oppressive and can marginalize certain societal groups along the lines of age, gender, class, religion, or ethnicity (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2016; Bagayoko et al. 2016). But hybridization is what is the case on the ground and hence what has to be engaged with. Only with regard to this plea to take account of and work with hybridity is the concept normative, not in the sense of declaring hybrid political orders to be the political aim of interventions (Hunt 2017). In other words: hybridity is an “analytical device (...) a way of seeing the world and capturing change and lack of fixity between categories” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2016, p. 223). (Anne Brown makes a useful distinction between “three different ways of using notions of hybridity as a theoretical tool” (Brown 2018, p. 29): (a) as an analytical or descriptive category (the approach taken here); (b) as normative and prescriptive, with hybridity “as something to be aimed at,” with the emphasis on “an imagined outcome – a newly constructed hybridity,” hence hybridity as “a solution” (ibid., p. 32); and (c) as instrumental, focused on management and control, “reminiscent of colonial mechanisms of ‘indirect rule’” (ibid., p. 32). See also Brown (2017), Dinnen and Kent (2015), Millar (2014), Mac Ginty and Richmond (2016).)

A major critique of the hybridity approach, however, is that it reifies binaries (Laffey and Nadarajah 2012; Brigg 2016; Dinnen and Kent 2015; Hunt 2017; Hameiri and Jones 2017, 2018; Kent et al. 2018). This critique points to a dilemma: in order to overcome the state-centricity of the mainstream statebuilding and peacebuilding discourse, hybridity as an alternative approach had to build a case for the focus on the “non-state,” and in doing so, there was the danger of reification of binaries. On the other hand, however, exactly the shift away from monolithic entities and from binaries (such as traditional and modern, formal and informal, state and non-state) is the work that the concept of hybridity is supposed to do, capturing fluidity, relations, interactions, entanglements, mutual permeation, and enmeshment; it can be argued that the concept in fact allows to do both: draw attention to the realm of governance beyond the state, overcoming the state centricity of liberal peacebuilding and statebuilding scholarship and practice, bringing the non-state dimension – as a much wider range of governing institutions, actors, worldviews and ways of knowing – in, at the same time addressing the transgressions of the state/non-state boundary, focusing on relations, interactions, and enmeshment, in other words: question the fixity of categories and boundaries, take note of the traditional within the modern, the modern within the traditional, the formal within the informal, the informal within the formal, the state within the non-state, the non-state within the state, etc. (Albrecht and Moe 2014).

The concept of hybridization thus allows to acknowledge distinct ways of being and of ordering, it alerts us to fundamental difference and at the same time enables us to think in terms of relationality, fluidity, and process. Talking about the process of hybridization in fact allows to shift attention from fixed entities to relations and hence to overcome thinking in static binaries (Albrecht and Moe 2014; Hunt 2018; Albrecht 2018). This shift away from binaries is “the primary appeal of hybridity and hybridization” (Peterson 2012, p. 12). Such an understanding of hybridity can be linked in with the “relational turn” in peace studies, which foregrounds relations rather than entities and captures the fluidity and dynamism of peace and state formation and the emergence of peace and political order as hybridized.

Since the concept of hybrid political orders and hybrid peace was introduced into the peacebuilding and statebuilding discourse more than a decade ago, it has been taken into diverse directions (descriptive, analytical, prescriptive, normative, and instrumental), it has become more and more sophisticated, elaborated, and diversified, and it has become the object of significant critical scrutiny. Most importantly, it has crossed into the policy world – trendy, shallow, tokenistic, and instrumentalized as one might argue (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2016). This demonstrates one more time that research findings can be used – misused from the researcher’s perspective – for purposes and by actors that he or she does not agree with or is even opposed to; this to a certain extent has happened to the hybridity approach (Millar 2014). In fact, in the world of realpolitik, the concept is open in both directions: it potentially can lead to more emancipatory peacebuilding and statebuilding practices beyond the liberal peace approach (as the best case) – and/or to a refinement of counterinsurgency strategies (as the worst case).

Although the latter trend gives reason for concern, the good news is that hybrid political orders, hybrid security governance, hybrid peace cannot be instrumentally designed, engineered, crafted, or constructed entirely. Any endeavors of international interveners will always be nothing but – more or less benign or malign, more or less powerful – elements in a complex and fluid web of relationships and interactions in a much broader mix of processes of peace and state formation.

Cross-References

- ▶ Liberal Peace
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ Statebuilding

References

- Albrecht, P. (2018). The interplay of interventions and hybridisation in Puntland’s security sector. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(2), 216–236.
- Albrecht, P., & Moe, L. W. (2014). The simultaneity of authority in hybrid orders. Peacebuilding, 3(1), 1–16.
- Aning, K., Boege, V., Brown, M. A., & Hunt, C. T. (Eds.). (2018). Exploring peace formation. Security and justice in post-colonial states. London/New York: Routledge.
- Bagayoko, N., Hutchful, E., & Luckham, R. (2016). Hybrid security governance in Africa: Rethinking the foundations of security, justice and legitimate public authority. Conflict, Security & Development, 16(1), 1–32.
- Bjoerkdahl, A., et al. (2016). Peacebuilding through the lens of friction. In C. Haeglund et al. (Eds.), Peacebuilding and friction. Global and local encounters in post-conflict societies. London/New York: Routledge.
- Boege, V. (2018). The hybridisation of peace, security and justice: Cases from West Africa and Oceania. In K. Aning, V. Boege, M. A. Brown, & C. T. Hunt (Eds.), Exploring peace formation. Security and justice in post-colonial states (pp. 207–225). London/New York: Routledge.
- Boege, V., et al. (2009). On hybrid political orders and emerging states: What is failing – States in the global south or research and politics in the west? In M. Fischer & B. Schmelzle (Eds.), Building peace in the absence of states: Challenging the discourse on state failure (Berghof handbook dialogue series) (Vol. 8,

- pp. 15–35). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Boege, V., et al. (2010). Challenging statebuilding as peacebuilding – Working with hybrid political orders to build peace. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 99–115). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bonacker, T., Distler, W., & Ketzmerick, M. (2017). Introduction: Securitization in statebuilding and intervention. In T. Bonacker, W. Distler, & M. Ketzmerick (Eds.), Securitization in statebuilding and intervention (pp. 9–27). Baden-Baden: Nomos.
- Brigg, M. (2016). Relational peacebuilding. Promise beyond crisis. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneckener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 56–69). London/New York: Routledge.
- Brown, M. A. (2017). Hybridity and dialogue – Approaches to the hybrid turn. Third World Thematics, 2(4), 446–463.
- Brown, M. A. (2018). The ‘hybrid turn’: Approaches and potentials. In J. Wallis et al. (Eds.), Hybridity on the ground in peacebuilding and development. Critical conversations (pp. 21–36). Canberra: ANU Press.
- Dinnen, S., & Kent, L. (2015). Hybridity in peacebuilding and development: A critical interrogation (SSGM in brief 2015/50). Canberra: ANU.
- Eriksen, S. S. (2017). State effects and the effects of state building: Institution building and the formation of state-centred societies. Third World Quarterly, 38(4), 771–786.
- Hameiri, S., & Jones, L. (2017). Beyond hybridity to the politics of scale: International intervention and ‘local’ politics. Development and Change, 48(1), 54–77.
- Hameiri, S., & Jones, L. (2018). Against hybridity in the study of peacebuilding and statebuilding. In J. Wallis et al. (Eds.), Hybridity on the ground in peacebuilding and development. Critical conversations (pp. 99–112). Canberra: ANU Press.
- Holzinger, K., Kern, F. G., & Kromrey, D. (2016). The dualism of contemporary traditional governance and the state: Institutional setups and political consequences. Political Research Quarterly, 63(3), 469–481.
- Hunt, C. T. (2017). Beyond the binaries: Towards a relational approach to peacebuilding. Global Change, Peace & Security, 29(3), 209–227.
- Hunt, C. T. (2018). Hybridity revisited: Relational approaches to peacebuilding in complex sociopolitical orders. In J. Wallis et al. (Eds.), Hybridity on the ground in peacebuilding and development. Critical conversations (pp. 51–65). Canberra: ANU Press.
- Kappler, S. (2014). Local agency and peacebuilding. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kappler, S. (2017). The securitization of international peacebuilding. In T. Bonacker, W. Distler, & M. Ketzmerick (Eds.), Securitization in statebuilding and intervention (pp. 31–52). Baden-Baden: Nomos.
- Kent, L., et al. (2018). Introduction. In J. Wallis et al. (Eds.), Hybridity on the ground in peacebuilding and development. Critical conversations (pp. 1–17). Canberra: ANU Press.
- Kyed, H. M. (2017). Hybridity and boundary-making: Exploring the politics of hybridization. Third World Thematics, 2(4), 464–480.
- Laffey, M., & Nadarajah, S. (2012). The hybridity of liberal peace: States, diasporas and insecurity. Security Dialogue, 43(5), 403–420.
- Lemay-Hebert, N., & Lottholz, P. (2016). Re-reading Weber, reconceptualising state-building: From neo-Weberian to post-Weberian approaches to state, legitimacy and state-building. Cambridge Review of International Affairs, 29(4), 1467–1485.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2016). What do we mean when we use the term ‘local’? Imagining and framing the local and the international in relation to peace and order. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneckener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 193–209). London: Routledge.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. (2016). The fallacy of constructing hybrid political orders: A reappraisal of the hybrid turn in peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 23(2), 219–239.
- Millar, G. (2014). Disaggregating hybridity: Why hybrid institutions do not produce predictable experiences of peace. Journal of Peace Research, 51(4), 501–514.
- Millar, G. (2018). Introduction: The key strengths of ethnographic peace research. In G. Millar (Ed.), Ethnographic peace research. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Millar, G., van der Lijn, J., & Verkoren, W. (2013). Peacebuilding plans and local reconfigurations: Frictions between imported processes and indigenous practices. International Peacekeeping, 20(2), 137–143.
- Peterson, J. H. (2012). A conceptual unpacking of hybridity: accounting for notions of power, politics and progress in analyses of aid-driven interfaces. Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 7(2):9–22.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London/New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2012). A pedagogy of peacebuilding: Infrapolitics, resistance and liberation. International Political Sociology, 6, 1–17.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mitchell, A. (Eds.). (2012). Hybrid forms of peace: From everyday agency to post-liberalism. Houndmills/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Schroeder, U., Chappuis, F., & Kocak, D. (2014). Security sector reform and the emergence of hybrid security governance. International Peacekeeping, 21(2), 214–230.
- Thelen, T., Veters, L., & von Benda-Beckmann, K. (2014). Introduction to stategraphy. Toward a relational anthropology of the state. Social Analysis, 58(3), 1–19.
- Ubink, J. (2008). Traditional authorities in Africa: Resurgence in an era of democratisation. Leiden: Leiden University Press.

Hybridity

- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State
- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

I4P

► Peace Infrastructures

Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Analysis of multiparty multi-issue disputes;
Stability analysis

Description

Fraser and Hipel (1984) proposed a method for identifying acceptable stable, solutions to multiparty, multi-issue disputes if each disputant is able to rank each issue by relative importance to himself. It is a useful tool for both negotiators and mediators in devising proposals that not only may satisfy all sides in a conflict but also to prove sustainable.

Method

Consider a couple discussing where to retire. While other couples may have more, fewer, or different concerns, in this case, theirs are limited to whether to live in a large city or small town, minimizing the cost of living because they will be living on a pension and availability of good medical care. As he is 30 years older than her, they rank their importance differently.

First, list the issues in any order; then using 1 to propose and 0 to oppose, alternate 0 and 1 in the first row and then alternate 0011 on the next row. Continue doubling the number of adjacent zeros and ones in each subsequent row until a row appears in which all the zeros appear on the left and all the ones on the right. Every possibility is included in Fig. 1:

Next, identify and eliminate absurd combinations. The couple can only afford one home, so eliminate the columns implying two, specifically 0101 1101, 1011, 0111, and 1111. Have each party rank the remaining strategies in preference order from left to right. In a multiparty dispute, if two or more disputants for whatever reason including the possibility of a coalition have identical preferences, eliminate any duplicate arrays.

A sophisticated method for identifying solutions to multiparty, multi-issue disputes likely to prove stable if adopted by the parties, requiring only that the disputants be able to rank the issues by importance to themselves.

Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts,
Fig. 1 All possible resolutions

| | | | | | | | | | | | | | | | | |
|----------------|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Large city | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | | |
| Cost of living | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 |
| Small town | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 |
| Medical care | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 |

Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts,
Fig. 2 Preference vectors of each party

| | | | | | | | | | | | | |
|-----------------------|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|----|----|----|
| Large city | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 |
| Cost of living | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Small town | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 |
| Medical care | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 |
| Her preference vector | 0 | 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 | 9 | 8 | 12 | 12 | 12 |

| | | | | | | | | | | | | |
|-----------------------|---|----|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Large town | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Cost of living | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 |
| Small town | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Medical care | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| His preference vector | 8 | 12 | 9 | 5 | 6 | 4 | 3 | 1 | 2 | 0 | 0 | 0 |

Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts,
Fig. 3 Vector analysis for each party

| | | | | | | | | | | | | |
|-----------------------|---|----|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|----|----|----|
| Large town | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Cost of living | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Small town | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 |
| Medical care | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 1 |
| Her preference vector | 0 | 1 | 2 | 3 | 4 | 5 | 6 | 9 | 8 | 12 | 12 | 12 |
| | | | | | 0 | 0 | 0 | | 4 | 4 | 4 | UI |
| | | | | | 1 | 1 | | | 5 | 5 | | UI |
| | | | | | 2 | | | | 6 | | | UI |
| | r | u | u | u | r | u | u | u | r | r | | |
| Large town | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Cost of living | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 0 |
| Small town | 0 | 1 | 0 | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| Medical care | 1 | 1 | 1 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| His preference vector | 8 | 12 | 9 | 5 | 6 | 4 | 3 | 1 | 2 | 0 | 0 | 0 |
| | | | | | 8 | | | | | | | UI |
| | r | u | r | r | r | r | r | r | r | r | r | |
| | E | | | | E | | | | E | E | | |

Provide each possibility with its own unique identification by converting each column to base ten. To make the conversion, multiply each binomial times the power of two to which the location corresponds, using the top number as the low-order digit. For example, 1001 = 1 * 2⁰ + 0 * 2¹ + 0 * 2² + 1 * 2³ = 1 + 0 + 0 + 8 = 9. Have each disputant rearrange the possible choices in rank order, resulting in a “preference vector” for each as shown in Fig. 2:

Next, identify “unilateral improvements,” designating them with a “u”. These occur if one party can improve its position without provoking the other parties to change theirs. For example, he can move from strategy 12 to strategy 8 because she assigns the same values to the first two strategies in both instances. They occur whenever the opponent’s preferences do not change from left to right. While this is the only unilateral improvement for him, she has several, as indicated in Fig. 3.

The next step is to determine stabilities, there being four possible types. The analysis is a matter of inspection and logic. First, identify situations in which the disputant being analyzed has no unilateral improvement to make from that outcome: it is the best possible strategy given the selection by the other player. Figure 3 indicates each one by the symbol r , meaning a rational stability. In this situation, she has four, while he has nine rational stabilities.

Now, check for sequentially sanctioned stabilities. These occur when a disputant has an improvement that allows the opponent to respond unilaterally and leaves the disputant worse off. Identify them by checking each disputant's unilateral improvements one by one. There are none in the current situation, but to illustrate if he switched from 2 to 1, she would then move from 1 to 0, which he would regard as a worse outcome than sticking with 2. Therefore, he is "sequentially sanctioned" against strategy 1.

Third, identify unstable strategies. These occur if a disputant can make an improvement in his position that the opponent cannot respond to without choosing a less preferred outcome for himself. Any strategy not already identified by an r or an s is unstable and can be labeled with a u . Figure 3 indicates them for both parties.

Any outcome rated r or s for all disputants (four in this example) is a possible resolution to the conflict and is labeled E for equilibrium.

Rank ordering does not eliminate the intensity and degree of emotion associated with the issues. Methods for resolving disputes and reaching a final choice among the four possibilities—arbitration, conciliation, facilitation, mediation, negotiation, or something else—involve their own "dance." Finally, personalities differ.

Summary

The example illustrates a method to identify solutions to complex conflicts that are likely to prove acceptable by all parties involved and prove stable in the long run. As the parties and issues multiply, a computer soon is required to conduct the analysis.

Fraser and Hipel (1984) provide numerous examples of the method such as the Cuban Missile Crisis, a dispute over water in a river crossing an international boundary, and the Suez Canal Crisis, each introducing additional factors, with detailed explanations of the method and underlying mathematics as well as suggestions for using the information to reach lasting solutions to disputes with each particular set of circumstances.

Cross-References

- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions
- ▶ Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Fraser, N., & Hipel, K. (1984). Conflict analysis: Models and resolutions. New York: North Holland/Elsevier.

Identity and Conflict

- ▶ Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis
- ▶ Kashmir Conflict, The

Identity and Political Violence

Andrea Peinhopf
School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University College London, London, UK

Synonyms

Ethnic conflict; Nationalism; Violent conflict

Definition

This chapter explores the relationship between identity, in particular ethnic identity, and political violence. To what extent are war and violence the outcome of antagonistic identities? And once violence erupts, what impact does it have on how people identify themselves and others? There are two dominant approaches in the literature. The identity-based approach tends to regard conflict and violence as a consequence of preexisting ethnic antagonism. Violence-based approaches, in contrast, have challenged this causality, stressing that ethnic antagonism is often the outcome of violence rather than its direct cause. The chapter argues that both are problematic in different ways: whereas identity-based theories do not take the generative power of violence seriously enough, violence-based theories run the risk of taking it too seriously and often do not pay significant attention to individual agency and people's ability to resist violence. However, it is not only individual responses to violence that differ but attitudes toward violence can also change over time.

Introduction

With the disintegration of Yugoslavia and the Soviet Union, the 1990s witnessed the eruption of several major "ethnic wars," which in many cases resulted in ethnic cleansing and the forced expulsion of people from their homes. This includes the wars in Croatia, Bosnia, and Kosovo, which produced several millions of refugees and Internally Displaced Persons (IDPs), as well as the lesser known wars in Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and Nagorno-Karabakh that led to the emergence of so-called unrecognized states and the long-term displacement of hundreds of thousands of civilians. But atrocities were not just limited to the European and Eurasian context: there was also the genocide in Rwanda, in which over half of the country's Tutsi population was killed. What these conflicts have in common is not just the brutality with which they were fought, but also the degree of intimacy involved. Often, the people who were fighting each other had a long history of co-habitation. This raises important questions: how did bloodshed on such a large scale and between people who had been living side by side peacefully for decades become possible? Was this violence the culmination of long-standing ethnic or national cleavages that finally surfaced?

The aim of this chapter is to address these issues by exploring the causal relationship between identity, in particular ethnic identity, and political violence. To what extent are war and violence the outcome of antagonistic identities? And once violence erupts, what impact does it have on how people identify themselves and others? There are two dominant approaches in the literature. The identity-based approach tends to regard conflict and violence as a consequence of preexisting ethnic antagonism. Violence-based approaches, in contrast, have challenged this causality, stressing that ethnic antagonism is often the outcome of violence rather than its direct cause. The chapter argues that both are problematic in different ways: whereas identity-based theories do not take the generative power of violence seriously enough, violence-based theories run the risk of taking it too seriously and often do not pay significant attention to individual agency and people's ability to resist violence. However, it is not only individual responses to violence that differ but attitudes toward violence can also change over time.

The chapter thus highlights the importance of studying violence not simply as epiphenomenal, but as a phenomenon in its own right. By attending to the experience of those affected on the ground, it also goes beyond a more traditional focus on military and political institutions (for a detailed discussion of the relevance of an anthropological approach in peace and conflict studies, see ► "Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research"). As anthropologist Carolyn Nordstrom (1997, p. 115) has argued, "to understand war is to understand not only the places where it is formulated and directed, but the places where violence is enacted in the name of war." Such a bottom-up and agency-centered approach not only accounts for the ways in which ordinary people reproduce ethnic antagonism but is also sensitive to people's ability to resist antagonistic nationalism and violence, both during warfare and in its aftermath.

The sections that follow discuss the two dominant approaches and identify their main gaps and shortcomings. The first section focuses on primordialist and constructivist theories of identity that tend to regard violence as an outcome of either innate antipathies or antagonistically constructed identities. The second section shifts the attention from the role of elites to the sphere of the “everyday,” focusing on how mass violence can profoundly change social realities on the ground. The third section looks at the postwar condition and asks: how is coexistence possible once war is over? Drawing on ethnographic research from Bosnia, it demonstrates that even though postwar societies are characterized by a polarized atmosphere, postwar identities are not necessarily unambiguous. The chapter concludes with a brief summary and some reflections.

Violence as the Culmination of Ethnic Antagonism: From Ancient to Modern Hatred

The question of how neighbors turn into deadly enemies has received significant scholarly attention in recent decades. From a rationalist perspective, people are expected to choose peace over war, as the economic consequences of war and violence are usually disastrous. As Rui de Figueiredo and Barry Weingast (1999, p. 262) put it, “the individuals and groups locked in these struggles forgo the enormous benefits of economic and social cooperation in favour of bitter violence and hardship. Why do citizens take actions leading to this negative-sum outcome?”

Some have looked for answers to this paradox in the realm of collective identity, that is, our belonging to a group. Psychologists have argued that it is a natural function of the brain to categorize ourselves and others into collectives (Hogg and Abrams 1998; Hogg et al. 1995; e.g., Tajfel and Turner 1986). According to Michael Hogg and Dominic Abrams (1998, p. 64), “categorization is a fundamental and universal process [...] because it satisfies a basic human need for cognitive parsimony.” It “imposes structure on the world and our experiences therein” and “brings the world into sharper focus and creates a perceptual environment in which things are more black and white, less fuzzy and ambiguous.” However, while psychological theories have highlighted the cognitive foundations of group identification, they make no assumptions about the kind of group with which people identify.

In recent times, it has been the nation, or ethnic group, that has been singled out as the most meaningful source of collective identification. So-called primordialists conceive of ethnic and national groups as timeless and naturally occurring; they believe “that humanity is naturally divided into separate and distinct nationalities or nations” and that “members of a nation reach full freedom and fulfillment of their essence by developing their national identity and culture, and their identity with the nation is superior to all other forms of identity – class, gender, individual, familial, tribal, regional, imperial, dynastic, religious, racial, or state patriotic” (Suny 2014, p. 870). Applied to war and violent conflict, this thinking has manifested itself in the belief that current conflicts are eruptions of so-called “ancient hatreds” that have existed between certain groups throughout history. These antagonisms are seen as a direct consequence of the unchanging, essentialist nature of the identities of ethnic groups, making them prone to out-group hostility, and ultimately, if too close in proximity, intergroup violence. In short, according to primordialists, “ethnic violence results from antipathies and antagonisms that are enduring properties of ethnic groups” (Fearon and Laitin 2000, p. 849).

Primordialist assumptions, which date back to the eighteenth-century German Romantic philosophers Fichte and Herder, have long lost their credibility in academia and there is hardly a scholar who would apply this label voluntarily in relation to their work (the two names most commonly associated with primordialism are Pierre van den Berghe (1978) and Edward Shils (1957)). Instead, it has become common sense to look at nations – and ethnic groups – not as ancient entities that have a timeless existence in the world, but as fundamentally modern phenomena. Of particular significance in this context were the ground-breaking works of Ernest Gellner and Benedict Anderson. Gellner (1983) famously argued that nation-states were constructed by elites in order to facilitate industrialization. While he recognized that elites draw on some preexisting “stuff” in their construction of the nation, he did not regard any specific preexisting material as necessary; as he put it, “[t]he cultural shreds and patches used by nationalism are often arbitrary historical inventions. Any shred and patch would have served as well” (1983, p. 55). Anderson (1991, p. 6), on the other hand, has referred to the nation as an “imagined political community” – a community that is based on communicative practices that create an “imagined” bond between people who are, in fact, strangers. Both Gellner and Anderson regard nations as top-down constructions that rely on the homogenizing power of educational and cultural institutions, and – in Anderson’s case – the media, in particular.

Anderson’s focus on language paved the way for post-modern and post-structuralist approaches that highlight the power of discourse in creating a sense of “we-ness.” In his book Banal Nationalism (1995), Michael Billig turned to the production of a national common sense through symbolic practices. Whether it is a sports event or the weather forecast, “in so many ways, the citizenry are daily reminded of their national place in a world of nations” (1995, p. 8). Seemingly banal practices of “flagging,” such as the flashing of an emblematic flag on the screen when a television newscaster mentions a foreign country, instill a deep-seated natural division of the world into “us” and “them,” as they “continually remind us that we are ‘us’ and, in so doing, permit us to forget that we are being reminded” (1995, p. 175). Billig’s emphasis on the power of language as something that does not simply describe but constitutes reality thus further dismantled the idea of groups as natural and timeless and highlights the constitutive role of discursive practices. As critical discourse theorists have argued, the “group” is not a real thing in the world, but an object of constant discursive re-creation and re-negotiation – and manipulation (Wodak et al. 2009, p. 9).

Despite certain differences, what both modern and post-modern approaches to nationhood and nationalism agree on is that the nation is fundamentally a social construct that in some way or another serves the interests of those in power. Against this background, scholars of political violence have moved away from the “ancient hatred” model and instead focused on how elites invoke a discourse of centuries-old nationhood to mobilize the public in favor of violent interventions. Stuart Kaufman (2001), for instance, has argued that ethnic conflict is the outcome not of ancient but “modern” hatreds – modern in the sense that they “are renewed in each generation by mythologies that are typically modern revisions of older stories with quite different messages” (2001, p. 11). He thus distances himself from the primordial conception of ethnic groups as timeless and naturally occurring, but is also critical of so-called elite manipulation approaches which sharply differentiate between the interests of elites and that of the masses (e.g., Brass 1991, 1997). Instead, Kaufman aligns himself with the tradition of ethnosymbolism, which views nations as modern constructs that have their origin in premodern ethnic communities (so-called ethnies) which provide the basis for the myths, symbols, memories, and key values that, according to ethnosymbolists, define modern nations (Smith 1986, 2009). Ethnosymbolism thus stresses the relationship between elites and masses as a two-way street, and, in doing so, seeks to explore “the ‘inner world’ of the members of nations” (Smith 2015, p. 2).

From this perspective, ethnic symbols are indeed used by manipulative elites, “but they only work when there is some real or perceived conflict of interest at work and mythically based feelings of hostility that can be tapped using ethnic symbols” (Kaufman 2001, p. 12). What is essential for the outbreak of violence is a combination of hostile myths, ethnic fears, and a window of opportunity to act on them. An example is the to date unresolved Georgian-Abkhaz conflict (for a detailed discussion, see ► “Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict”), which, according to Kaufman, was fueled by two mutually exclusive myths: whereas Georgians stressed that Abkhazia was a historical part of Georgia and therefore belonged to the Georgian state, ethnic Abkhazians grounded their claims for independent statehood in their own self-understanding as the indigenous inhabitants of the region. Perestroika provided the opportunity for these ambitions to be voiced more prominently. While elites initially tried to restrain mobilization, “violence quickly resulted anyway because hostile feelings and attitudes led the groups to rule out compromise” (2001, p. 86). Yet, the hostile myths at the heart of the conflict were not simply “ancient” but served a contemporary purpose: to claim exclusive territorial ownership, a notion that was significantly strengthened by the Soviet territorialization of national identity through homeland republics (Kaiser 1994). As Donald Horowitz (1985, p. 99) has noted, although “history can be a weapon, [...] a current conflict cannot generally be explained by simply calling it a revived form of an earlier conflict.”

Everyday Ethnicity and the Transformative Power of Violence

The approaches discussed in the previous section demonstrate that there is nothing – or at least not much – “natural” about national consciousness and that group antagonism is more often than not the result of certain political interests or policies rather than innate differences or antipathies. However, while there is an abundance of studies on how elites construct or reinforce – often antagonistic – identities, much less is known about ethnicity as “lived experience,” that is, how people on the ground engage with these policies and practices.

In fact, although the scholars discussed in the previous section are generally critical of primordial assumptions and stress the constructed nature of ethnic or national identity, their focus on “state-sponsored ethnicity” as a representation of “the sum total of ethnic meaning in all of social and political life” (Fujii 2009, p. 11) runs the risk of taking the existence of stable “ethnic groups” for granted. For instance, grand theories like Gellner’s and Anderson’s show how national identification is produced through certain institutions and practices, but they do so without paying much attention to the individual agents themselves, and in particular their strength of identification; instead, “it [the nation] appears to exist above and beyond the agency of any of us as individuals” (Thompson 2001, p. 20). But ethnosymbolists are not immune to this criticism either, for even though they claim to explore the “inner world” (Smith 2015, p. 2) of the members of an ethnic or national community by paying attention to myths, memory, value, traditions, and symbols, they similarly tend to assume rather than reconstruct the power of nationalism on the ground. Thus, accounts that start off as constructivist all too quickly fall into a primordial mode, for once “constructed,” national identity is conceived of as supreme, monolithic, and unchangeable.

As Eric Hobsbawm (1992, p. 10) has argued, although nations are “constructed essentially from above,” they “cannot be understood unless also analyzed from below, that is in terms of the assumptions, hopes, needs, longings and interests of ordinary people, which are not necessarily national and still less nationalist.” To counter the top-down tendency of the literature on nationalism and ethnicity, sociologists such as Rogers Brubaker and Jon Fox have developed an everyday approach that, instead of inferring the meanings ordinary people ascribe to and the uses they make of the nation or ethnic group from the intentions and meanings that elites impose on them, examines “the actual practices through which ordinary people engage and enact (and ignore and deflect) nationhood and nationalism in the varied contexts of their everyday lives” (Fox and Miller-Idriss 2008, p. 537). This approach has important implications for both how to study group identities and the way we understand identities. Methodologically, it shifts the focus from the study of texts and utterances to contextually situated social interactions. Where discourse analysts would include interviews and focus groups to understand how individuals talk about the nation, analysts of the everyday are equally if not more interested in the when: “When called upon, ordinary people can call forth and articulate their more-or-less taken-for-granted assumptions about what the nation means to them. But when are they called upon? Just because people can talk about the nation doesn't mean that they do" (2008, p. 540).

Conceptually, the everyday approach replaces the traditional view of groups as "discrete, concrete, tangible, bounded and enduring" (Brubaker 2002, p. 167) with attention to groupness, that is, "phases of extraordinary cohesion and moments of intensely felt collective solidarity" (2002, p. 168) and group-making. To study groupness as a variable, Brubaker proposes a distinction between ethnic groups as bounded collectivities, on the one hand, and categories, which are "at best a potential basis for group-formation or 'groupness'" (2002, p. 169), on the other. Ethnicity, then, is no longer conceptualized as something that we "have," but something that we "do." As Brubaker and his colleagues (2006, p. 208) observed during their fieldwork in Romania, "although we routinely speak of them as being Hungarian or Romanian, we might more aptly speak of them becoming Hungarian or Romanian, in the sense that 'Hungarian' or 'Romanian' becomes the relevant, operative description or 'identity' or self-understanding at that particular moment in that particular context."

Consequently, an everyday approach can advance our understanding of ethnicity by paying attention to when ethnicity matters, how it matters, and when it does not (and why not). Yet, it does not necessarily treat the "everyday" as a sphere of unconstrained individual agency. Rather, it aims to uncover "the different options that actors may pursue to react to existing boundaries, to overcome and to reinforce them, to shift them to exclude new groups of individuals or include others, or to promote other, nonethnic modes of classification and social practice" (Wimmer 2013, p. 46). The notion of the "social situation" is particularly helpful to conceptualize agency in this context. Instead of a narrow focus on "the macroscopic political, administrative, and economic structures," social situations reveal the "different courses of action actors may then pursue according to their understanding of their personal circumstances within this framework"

(Okamura 1981, p. 453). The everyday perspective is therefore closely linked to the situational approach to ethnicity within anthropology, which, drawing on Max Gluckman's (1940, p. 29) notion of situational selection, sees ethnic salience in a given situation as dependent on the different values, interests and motives of individuals, allowing them to assert "either their primary ethnic identity or other social identities, such as those derivative of class or occupation" (Okamura 1981, p. 460).

But what are the kinds of "situations" in which ethnicity can become salient? According to Brubaker (2002), violence – whether from above or below – is one of the most effective strategies of turning categories into groups. Writing about how the attacks by the Kosovo Liberation Army on Serb policemen provoked massive regime reprisals that ultimately led to a vicious cycle of attacks and counterattacks and thus significantly increased groupness on both sides, he argues that ethnic polarization was largely the result of violence, not its cause. For even though groupness was relatively high before the attacks were carried out, there was still significant scope for conscious "group-making" strategies: "Certain dramatic events, in particular, can serve to galvanise and crystallise a potential group, or to ratchet up pre-existing levels of groupness. This is why deliberate violence, undertaken as a strategy of provocation, often by a very small number of persons, can sometimes be an exceptionally effective strategy of group-making" (2002, p. 171).

Over the past decades, an increasing number of works both in anthropology (e.g., Appadurai 1998; Feldman 1991) and civil war studies (e.g., Kalyvas 2008; Sambanis and Shayo 2013; Wood 2008) have indeed shown that highly antagonistic identities are often the result of violence and not the other way around. These studies have criticized identity-based approaches for paying little attention to violence in its own right, that is, why it happens in a particular place and how it then impacts the communities (and identities) where it occurs. One of their key findings is that violence itself does not have to be "ethnically" motivated; however, once it unfolds, it can have powerful "ethnicizing" consequences. For example, in his ground-breaking study of the genocide in Rwanda, Scott Straus (2006) has argued that it was not preexisting ethnic animosity that caused Hutus to kill Tutsi. Rather, it was a climate of insecurity following the assassination of president Juvénal Habyarimana and the renewed onset of war that triggered a process of antagonistic collective ethnic categorization, whereby “a whole category of people is blamed for the actions of one or a few” (2006, p. 165), paving the way for genocide.

The concept of “antagonistic collective categorization” put forward by Straus was further developed by historian Max Bergholz (2016) in his in-depth study of the dynamics of violence in Kulen Vakuf, a small town in rural north-West Bosnia, where a massacre took place in 1941 in which 2,000 people were killed. In this work, he shows that deep-seated ethnic cleavages on the ground are not a necessary precondition for mass atrocities to erupt. Rather, it is often situational factors – such as greed – that motivate micro-level actors to pursue violence on an ethnic axis. However, once violence is employed, it can have “a deeply polarizing effect on intercommunal relations, leading to a rapid transformation of neighbors into collective categories of enemies, and calls for retaliation along such lines” (2016, p. 111). What is remarkable about Bergholz’s work is not only that he, like others before him, demonstrates how situational violence has the power to produce highly antagonistic ethnic identities, but that he also uncovers instances of interethnic rescue where intercommunal friendship was not suspended by violence but instead grew even deeper, suggesting that “contexts of extreme inter-ethnic violence, which often produce the antagonistic collective categorization that may further intensify violence, can simultaneously strengthen inter-ethnic social ties, or create new ones” (2016, p. 137).

To account for individual variations, political scientist Lee Ann Fujii (2009, p. 12) has conceptualized state-sponsored ethnicity as a “script” for violence, that is, a “dramaturgical blueprint” that is typically created by threatened elites in the center and then diffused through various channels – such as the mass media, meetings, and rallies – to local elites, which then create their own local version of the “production” that fits local needs and allows them to consolidate their power. The realization of the script, however, depends on the actors, whose skills, motivations, interests, and level of commitment can be expected to be of different degrees. What follows is a variety of performances, where “some actors will follow the text closely, such as when killers go after Tutsi and only Tutsi. Some will stray from the text as when killers target Hutu as well as Tutsi for killing. Some may abandon the script altogether as when killers help Tutsi instead of hurt them” (2009, p. 13). The notion of the script thus provides an alternative lens that shifts attention to “the directors and actors, and by doing so, provides the possibility for agency at every level, not only on the part of leaders, but also among their supposed followers” (2009, pp. 13–14). This demonstrates that while it is indeed important to take the force of violence seriously, one should also be careful not to take it for granted, for even if violence is successful at generating high levels of groupness, it does not suspend individual agency and alternative forms of solidarity altogether.

Beyond the “Event”: Identity After Violence

But there is another important question: How does groupness develop when war is over? Just like it is necessary to ask what there was before violence broke out, it can be equally insightful to ask what happens after. Yet, while many studies have focused on how war and violence produce high levels of groupness, fewer studies have adopted a longer-term perspective and investigated changing levels of groupness beyond the immediate experience of war and violence. The implicit assumption seems to be that, once identities are “hard,” it becomes almost impossible to soften them. However, that experiences of violence produce highly cohesive “ethnic groups” does not imply that those “groups,” once formed, are then unchangeable – believing so would be just another case of “groupism,” that is “the tendency to take discrete, sharply differentiated, internally homogeneous, and externally bounded groups as basic constituents of social life, chief protagonists of social conflicts, and fundamental units of social analysis” (Brubaker et al. 2004, p. 45). As Brubaker (2002, p. 177) has noted, “once ratcheted up to a high level, groupness does not remain there out of inertia. If not sustained at high levels through specific social and cognitive mechanisms, it will tend to decline, as everyday interests reassert themselves, through a process of what Weber (in a different but apposite context [1968 (1922): 246–254]) called ‘routinization’ (Veralltäglichsung, literally ‘towards everydayness’).”

Some answers can be found in the literature on reconciliation and postwar reconstruction, in particular in the former Yugoslavia, as well as the literature on everyday peace (e.g., Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Mac Ginty 2014). Much of the scholarship on reconciliation supports the assumption that identities remain “hard”: For example, in Bosnia, where the war ended in 1996 with the Dayton agreement, which stipulated not only the right of internationally displaced persons (IDPs) and refugees to return to their place of origin but also to have their property restored (e.g., Stefansson 2006), many chose not to return, and those who did faced significant challenges. As political geographers Gerard Toal and Carl Dahlman (2011, p. 174) observed, returning not only meant “confronting a landscape of trauma and fear where one’s persecutors were most likely still in charge” but also unemployment and economic hardship. In their assessment, “violence and war had not only ethnically divided Bosnian space but also broken its infrastructural coherence, legitimated its material division, obstructed movement, and implanted fear and dread in the minds of the displaced. Bosnia-Herzegovina’s partition ran deep” (2011, p. 174).

Adopting a more localized lens, anthropologist Anders Stefansson (2006) has described the estrangement and isolation that many Muslim Bosnian repatriates experienced in the once multiethnic town of Banja Luka that was now Serbian-dominated. Although the international community saw repatriation as essential to postwar reconstruction, in reality, people who returned not only felt culturally estranged but were often fearful to leave their houses. The house thus “functioned as a sort of ‘prison’ because the returnees perceived the society beyond the protective walls of the house or the local neighbourhood as a ‘Serb’ and non-homely place” (2006, p. 125). According to Stefansson (2006, p. 132), “war and mass displacement bring profound changes to society, and it is illusory to believe that all those transformations can be, and perhaps should be, reversed after the signing of peace agreements.” Gëzim Visoka (2020) has described similar difficulties in Kosovo, where Albanians wanting to return to the Serbian-dominated north as well as Serbs returning to other parts of Kosovo are often faced with peace-breaking acts of what he calls “everyday vernacular nationalism,” such as hate crimes, robbery, or property damage. According to Visoka (2020, p. 442), “[t]hese vernacular acts can serve as bottom-up signals for mobilising populist sentiments and side-lining efforts for reconciliation. They demonstrate that nationalism is not only found in the actions of ethnic elites, but it is also prevalent in the wider population.”

Yet, amid widespread segregation and isolation, scholars, especially those working on Bosnia, have also noted cases of interethnic engagement. For example, Stefansson (2010) observed instances of renewed interethnic contact between the Bosniak (Muslim) returnees and displaced Serbs who moved to Banja Luka from their homes in other areas and thus shared the experience of displacement. Although these encounters were based on economic interest, initial economic transactions were often followed by coffee visits. Interethnic cooperation was thus not only driven by material gains but “also provided a first and seemingly quite ‘neutral’ stage for social interaction between members of different ethnic groups on which a measure of respect, civility, and tolerance for the Other had to be publicly displayed” (2010, p. 68). Similarly, Torsten Kolind (2007, 2008), who conducted ethnographic research among Muslim returnees in the Bosnian town of Stolac, noticed that even in the aftermath of war, people continued to employ a variety of categorizations to identify themselves and others. In the everyday lives of the returnees, moral qualities such as decency – that is, behaving like a “decent” person even in the context of war – were just as important as ethnicity.

As anthropologist Stef Jansen (2010, 2015) has argued, people in postwar Bosnia have in many ways been much more concerned with re-establishing “normal lives” than with issues of identity. When Bosnians engaged in interethnic encounters after the war, this was not usually perceived “as moral acts in a reconciliation process” (2010, p. 45), like abstract, foreign-imposed notions of reconciliation would suggest, but as a process of securing a sense of normality or a “normal life.” Like Stefansson, Jansen stresses the importance of avoiding controversial issues through “selective silence” in order to make these “normal” encounters possible (for a detailed discussion of the different roles that silence can play in conflict-affected societies, see ► “Silence and Peacebuilding”). Although this might cast doubt on the prospect of ever reaching reconciliation in a “thick,” idealist sense that foregrounds the restoration of relationships through dialogue, empathy, and forgiveness (e.g., Amstutz 2005; Lederach 1997), these studies nevertheless demonstrate the ability – and to some extent even the willingness or desire – of postwar actors to engage with those associated with the enemy on the basis of non-ethnic bonds of neighborhood or gender, among others. Hence, without denying the reality and strength of ethnic cleavages in the wake of war, they also highlight the multiplicity of social entanglements on the ground. As Kolind (2008, p. 40) noted, “violence plays a part in constructing a general polarised atmosphere of ‘us and them’, but this does not say anything about how people react or relate to such a dichotomised space of identity.”

Summary and Concluding Reflections

The aim of this chapter was to explore the causal relationship between identity and political violence. In the first section, it outlined “identity-based” approaches which tend to conceive of violence as a by-product of antagonistic identities. As the chapter stressed, it is no longer common sense in academia to look at ethnic and national groups as timeless entities; instead, it has become widely accepted to view groups as social and political constructs. To say that violence is the outcome of “antagonistic identities” therefore not necessarily refers to innate antipathies that ancient-old nations hold vis-à-vis each other, but invites us to take a closer look at how identities are socially and politically constructed in a way that can foster violent conflict. From this perspective, then, identities are not essentially primordial, but can be constructed in a primordial way.

However, the problem with this view is that it does not sufficiently attend to ethnicity as lived experience. While it is tempting to think of the ethnic wars of the 1990s as mere “escalations” of politically constructed animosities, a closer look at the social realities on the ground often reveals a more ambiguous picture that complicates clear-cut categorizations into “us” and “them.” But if there was no widespread and deep-seated hatred that turned people into enemies, what was it? To answer this question, the chapter looked at approaches that argue that the causal relationship between identity and violence is reverse, conceiving of violence as the cause, not the result of ethnic antagonism. Often, violence is less an “escalation” than facilitated by certain situational factors. For example, in the case of the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict, the war did not start with the escalation of micro-level unrest but with the decision to send troops to Abkhazia that was taken on the level of the republican center in Tbilisi. Even Kaufman (2001, p. 126), who, as shown earlier, stresses the highly symbolic nature of the conflict, concedes that “in many ways the war in Abkhazia was highly artificial. [...] In sum, if mass passions were driving political conflict and personal confrontation, individual leaders’ decisions turned those elements into war.”

Therefore, while war does not have to be triggered by ethnic passions, mass violence certainly has the power to transform realities on the ground and “construct actors or meanings or relationships that did not previously exist” (Gagnon 2004, p. 12). For those who survive atrocities or have lost family members or friends, the experience of extreme violence can instill a trauma that goes so deep that it becomes almost impossible to undo. In this sense, antagonism can become imprinted into the psyche and thus very “real.” As Kate Brown (2003, p. 2010) has noted, during war identities are “not simply ‘imagined,’ but [...] bestowed, dispensed, and forged through violence.” Thus, without wanting to negate the significance of nationalist or ethnic sentiments, the chapter urges to treat mass violence not as epiphenomenal, but as a phenomenon worth looking at in its own right.

However, while the chapter highlights the generative force of violence, it also stresses the significance of human agency. Not only can individuals respond differently to violence, but people’s attitudes toward past events might change over time, depending not only on their personal histories and experiences but also on their interests and concerns in the present. It thus invites those with an interest in violent ethnic conflict to look beyond the “event” of war and attend to the many ways in which ethnic antagonism continues to be resisted by postwar actors. Torsten Kolind (2007, p. 124), for example, has described everyday life in the Bosnian town Stolac as marked by “a constant tension between a nationalistic discourse informed by war – excluding the ethnic other in general and arguing for the impossibility of future co-existence – and local modes of identification related to concrete situations – rejecting ethnic stereotypes and trying to facilitate co-existence and rebuild everyday life.” Hence, what defines postwar and post-violence societies is not necessarily a lack of ambiguity, but complexity, flexibility, and inconsistency.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research
- ▶ Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

References

- Amstutz, M. R. (2005). The healing of nations: The promise and limits of political forgiveness. Lanham: Rowman and Littlefield.
- Anderson, B. (1991). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism. London/New York: Verso.
- Appadurai, A. (1998). Dead certainty: Ethnic violence in the era of globalization. Public Culture, 10(2), 225–247.
- Bergholz, M. (2016). Violence as a generative force: Identity, nationalism, and memory in a Balkan community. Ithaca/London: Cornell University Press.
- Billig, M. (1995). Banal nationalism. London/Thousand Oaks/New Delhi: SAGE Publications.
- Brass, P. R. (1991). Ethnicity and nationalism: Theory and comparison. In Pacific affairs. New Delhi: SAGE Publications.
- Brass, P. R. (1997). Theft of an idol: Text and context in the representation of collective violence. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Brown, K. (2003). A biography of no place: From ethnic borderland to soviet heartland. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Brubaker, R. (2002). Ethnicity without groups. European Journal of Sociology/Archives Européennes de Sociologie, 43(2), 163–189.
- Brubaker, R., Loveman, M., & Stamatov, P. (2004). Ethnicity as cognition. Theory and Society, 33(1), 31–64. <https://doi.org/10.1023/B:RYSO.0000021405.18890.63>.
- Brubaker, R., Feischmidt, M., Fox, J., & Grancea, L. (2006). Nationalist politics and everyday ethnicity in a Transylvanian town. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- de Figueiredo, R. J. P., & Weingast, B. R. (1999). The rationality of fear: Political opportunism and ethnic conflict. In B. F. Walter & J. Snyder (Eds.), Civil wars, insecurity, and intervention (pp. 261–302). New York: Columbia University Press.
- Fearon, D., & Laitin, D. D. (2000). Violence and the social construction of ethnic identity. International Organization, 54(4), 845–877.
- Feldman, A. (1991). Formations of violence: The narrative of the body and political terror in Northern Ireland. Chicago/London: University of Chicago Press.
- Fox, J. E., & Miller-Idriss, C. (2008). Everyday nationhood. Ethnicities, 8(4), 536–563. <https://doi.org/10.1177/14687968080808925>.
- Fujii, L. A. (2009). Killing neighbors: Webs of violence in Rwanda. Ithaca/London: Cornell University Press.
- Gagnon, V. P. (2004). The myth of ethnic war: Serbia and Croatia in the 1990s. Ithaca/London: Cornell University Press.
- Gellner, E. (1983). Nations and nationalism. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Gluckman, M. (1940). Analysis of a social situation in modern Zululand. Bantu Studies, 14(1), 1–30. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02561751.1940.9676107>.
- Hobsbawm, E. J. (1992). Nation and nationalism since 1780: Programme, myth, reality. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hogg, M. A., & Abrams, D. (1998). Social identifications: A social psychology of intergroup relations and group processes. London/New York: Routledge.

- Hogg, M. A., Terry, D. J., & White, K. M. (1995). A tale of two theories: A critical comparison of identity theory with social identity theory. Social Psychology, 58(4), 255–269.
- Horowitz, D. L. (1985). Ethnic groups in conflict. Berkeley/London: University of California Press.
- Jansen, S. (2010). Of wolves and men: Postwar reconciliation and the gender of inter-national encounters. Focaal, 2010(57), 33–49. <https://doi.org/10.3167/fcl.2010.570103>.
- Jansen, S. (2015). Yearnings in the meantime: “Normal lives” and the state in a Sarajevo apartment complex. In Yearnings in the meantime: “Normal lives” and the state in a Sarajevo apartment complex. New York/Oxford: Berghahn Books.
- Kaiser, R. (1994). The geography of nationalism in the USSR. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Kalyvas, S. N. (2008). Ethnic defection in civil war. Comparative Political Studies, 41(8), 1043–1068. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010414008317949>.
- Kaufman, S. J. (2001). Modern hatreds: The symbolic politics of ethnic war. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Kolind, T. (2007). In Search of “decent people”: Resistance to ethnicization of everyday life among the Muslims of Stolac. In X. Bougarel, E. Helms, & G. Duijzings (Eds.), The new Bosnian mosaic: Identities, memories and moral claims in a post-war society (pp. 123–138). Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Kolind, T. (2008). Post-war identification: Everyday muslim counterdiscourse in Bosnia Herzegovina. Aarhus: Aarhus University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010614550899>.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Nordstrom, C. (1997). A different kind of war story. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Okamura, J. Y. (1981). Situational ethnicity. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 4(4), 452–465. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.1981.9993351>.
- Sambanis, N., & Shayo, M. (2013). Social identification and ethnic conflict. American Political Science Review, 107(2), 294–325. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0003055413000038>.
- Shils, E. (1957). Primordial, personal, sacred and civil ties some particular observations on the relationships of sociological research and theory. The British Journal of Sociology, 8(2), 130–145.
- Smith, A. D. (1986). The ethnic origin of nations. Oxford/Carlton: Blackwell Publishing.
- Smith, A. D. (2009). Ethno-symbolism and nationalism: A cultural approach. London/New York: Routledge.
- Smith, A. D. (2015). Ethnosymbolism. In The Wiley Blackwell encyclopedia of race, ethnicity, and nationalism. Chichester: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Stefansson, A. H. (2006). Homes in the making: Property restitution, refugee return, and senses of belonging in a post-war Bosnian town. International Migration, 44(3), 115–139.
- Stefansson, A. H. (2010). Coffee after cleansing? Co-existence, co-operation, and communication in post-conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina. Focaal, 2010(57), 62–76. <https://doi.org/10.3167/fcl.2010.570105>.
- Straus, S. (2006). The order of genocide: Race, power, and war in Rwanda. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Suny, R. G. (2014). Constructing primordialism: Old histories for new nations. The Journal of Modern History, 73(4), 862–896.
- Tajfel, H., & Turner, J. C. (1986). The social identity theory of intergroup behaviour. In W. G. Austin & S. Worchel (Eds.), Psychology of intergroup relations (pp. 7–24). Chicago: Nelson Hall.
- Thompson, A. (2001). Nations, national identities and human agency: Putting people back into nations. The Sociological Review, 49(1), 18–32. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1467-954X.00242>.
- Toal, G., & Dahlman, C. T. (2011). Bosnia remade: Ethnic cleansing and its reversal. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- van den Berghe, P. L. (1978). Race and ethnicity: A sociobiological perspective. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 1(4), 401–411.
- Visoka, G. (2020). Everyday peace capture: Nationalism and the dynamics of peace after violent conflict. Nations and Nationalism, 26(2), 431–446. <https://doi.org/10.1111/nana.12591>.
- Wimmer, A. (2013). Ethnic boundary making: Institutions, power, networks. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Wodak, R., De Cillia, R., Reisigl, M., & Liebhart, K. (2009). The discursive construction of national identities. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Wood, E. J. (2008). The social processes of civil war: The wartime transformation of social networks. Annual Review of Political Science, 11(1), 539–561. <https://doi.org/10.1146/annurev.polisci.8.082103.104832>.

Identity Politics – Politics Centred on Leadership Figures, Sectarian and Other Groups

► Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peace-keeping Operations

In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda

Patrick Tom
Independent Researcher, St Andrews, UK

Synonyms

Peace agreement; Peace deal; Peace negotiations; Peace process; Peace talks

Definition

More than a decade after the collapse of the Juba peace talks in South Sudan between the Lord's Resistance Army/Movement (LRA/M) and the government of Uganda (GoU) to end the northern Uganda conflict (see "► Conflict"), the journey toward achieving justice for the victims and survivors and reconciliation (see "► Reconciliation") and building durable and sustainable peace in the region has been fraught with disagreements and challenges. Although justice is often seen as a prerequisite for reconciliation and lasting peace (see "► Peace"), there is no agreement among the users of the concept on what it means to call a situation just or unjust. In the case of northern Uganda, for those who support the International Criminal Court (ICC), justice entails retribution and punishing those who committed the most serious crimes against civilians, what has been called retributive justice. However, in post-conflict northern Uganda, advocates of retributive justice have come into conflict with the locals, the majority of them the Acholi and the most affected by the conflict, who have advocated the use of traditional justice mechanisms to cope with the aftermath of the conflict. Such traditional justice is based on the traditions, customs, and cultures of the people and are restorative in nature. Restorative justice (see "► Restorative Justice") is a paradigm of justice that aims at addressing some of the inadequacies of retributive justice. Lederach (1997, 2003) has shown the importance of transforming relationships in deeply divided societies.

The common goal of the traditional justice systems in various communities of northern Uganda is the restoration of social cohesion and of the relationship between the offender and the victim and with the community at large in accordance with their worldviews. In this regard, the harm resulting from wrongdoing impacts negatively the relationships between the parties involved, and as such, it becomes important to work out on ways that would address the harms done through involving all the parties including the society at large. Traditional justice also plays a significant role in reintegrating the offender into the community, something that retributive justice mechanisms such as the ICC and national courts tend to ignore. However, the social suffering being experienced in post-conflict northern Uganda calls for the need to go beyond justice related to the armed conflict between the LRA and the GoU, to include dealing with structural violence (socioeconomic injustices).

Like justice, the concept of peace does not have a universally accepted definition. Various definitions of peace exist ranging from a narrow definition which associates peace with the absence of war (see "► War") or overt violence, what has been called negative peace, to a broader and positive definition which is more than the absence of violence (see Galtung 1985). Positive peace is established through efforts that promote social justice and eliminate structural violence. Galtung introduced the term structural violence to refer to situations where "injustice, repression, and exploitation are built into the fundamental structures in society, and where individuals or groups are damaged due to differential access to social resources built into a social system" (cited Parlevliet 2002, p. 8). Positive peace is much more difficult to achieve than negative peace, and as such, it should be viewed more as "an ongoing process rather than discrete outcome" (van Willigen and Kroezen 2013, p. 105). The International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ) conducted a study on the attitudes about social reconstruction, justice, and peace in northern Uganda in which a total of 2875 people were interviewed. The study showed multiple definitions of peace among the respondents, and it found that the majority of the respondents defined peace as the “absence of violence” (negative peace) and others associated it with human development, a return to their home villages, and return of the LRA, reconciliation, and education (2007, p. 30). In addition, like other African societies, traditional societies in northern Uganda perceive peace as based on morality and order with ancestors believed to act as guarantors and the basis of social order, security, and peace. As the author of this entry has noted elsewhere (Tom 2017), in general, in order for ancestors to guarantee individual and social peace as well as security, the living ought to maintain harmonious relationships with fellow members of the community, ensuring that they do everything possible to address threats or breaches for the purpose of maintaining such relationships. Moreover, it is vital for community members to respect social norms and values. Failure to do so is believed to attract punishment from ancestors. Peace in this case is conceived as a gift from ancestors.

Like the other two concepts (justice and peace), despite the concept of reconciliation being acknowledged as significant in post-conflict situations, there is no universally accepted definition of the term. The term means different things to different people. This has been attributed to the fact that reconciliation is both a goal or an end state (something that needs to be achieved) and a process (a way to realize that goal), not an event (Bloomfield 2003). For instance, Lederach understands reconciliation to be “dynamic, adaptive processes aimed at building and healing the torn fabric of interpersonal and community lives and relationships” (2001, p. 842). He further notes that reconciliation is:

a process of change and redefinition of relationships [...] pushes beyond the resolution of a particular issue and toward a framework that embeds that issue in the context of the broader system and the root causes that underlie the symptomatic expression of the conflict. (Lederach 2001, p. 846)

In the IDEA Handbook, reconciliation is defined as “a process through which a society moves from a divided past to a shared future” (Bloomfield 2003, p. 12). Moreover, the search for forgiveness, truth, healing, and justice is considered an essential aspect of the process. This entry considers reconciliation as a many-sided concept that “revolves around the complex relationships among trauma, truth, history/politics and justice” (Weinstein 2011, p. 7). Given the contested nature of the concepts of justice, peace, and reconciliation, the entry proposes an integrated approach to promoting justice and reconciliation and achieving lasting peace in post-war northern Uganda.

Introduction

In July 2006, the Juba peace process commenced in Juba, the capital of South Sudan. The peace negotiations were aimed at bringing to an end two decades of a brutal armed conflict in northern Uganda between the GoU and the rebel movement, the LRA. However, in 2008, the talks collapsed as Joseph Kony, the LRA leader, refused to sign the final peace agreement demanding the withdrawal of the ICC arrest warrants against the top LRA commanders. The ICC intervention in northern Uganda generated a lot of controversy as it was seen as an impediment to peace in the region, and the local community had its own understanding of justice, which was seen as essential in promoting justice, reconciliation, and peace. Traditional justice mechanisms have been used to foster peace and reconciliation as well as the reintegration into the community of LRA returnees. However, 12 years after the collapse of the Juba peace process, challenges and disagreements have remained negatively impacting on achieving justice, reconciliation, and lasting peace in the north. In order to reduce the stigmatization of LRA returnees and promote their reintegration as well as create conditions for achieving justice, reconciliation, and lasting peace, this entry proposes the designing of holistic, integrated interventions, which among others are sensitive to the local culture, history, and conditions.

A Brief Background to the Conflict in Northern Uganda

The LRA war in northern Uganda is the continuation of a series of insurgencies in the region against the GoU which began in 1986 soon after Yoweri Museveni and his National Resistance Movement (NRM) came into power through a coup. The insurgencies include the West Nile Bank Front (WNBFB), Uganda People's Democratic Army (UPDA), Uganda People's Army (UPA), Holy Spirit Movement I (HSM I), Holy Spirit Movement II (HSM II), and Allied Forces (ADF). Museveni overthrew Tito Okello, who in the previous year had overthrown Milton Obote. Okello's Acholi ethnic group, at the time, formed the backbone of the Ugandan military. The creation of an Acholi military ethnocracy in Uganda can be traced back to British colonial rule, which forced the Acholi and other northern ethnic groups to do most of the country's manual labor and came to have the greatest concentration of fighters, while southern ethnic groups, especially the Baganda, were encouraged to develop economically and politically (see Bainomugisha and Tumushabe 2005).

There is an intense debate about the root causes of the northern Uganda conflict. Finnström (2006) has identified two strands in this debate. One strand argues that those from the north started the conflict in an attempt to regain political power that they had lost to Museveni (see Bainomugisha and Tumushabe 2005). Following the demise of Idi Amini (a Kwaka) who came from northwestern Uganda, two of Uganda's former leaders, Milton Obote (a Lango) and Tito Okello came from the north (Finnström 2006). As Finnström further writes, "[w]ith Museveni's takeover, the presidency was handed over to a Ugandan from the south (Museveni is a Munyankole), and this, it has been suggested, people from the north simply could not accept" (2006, p. 202).

Another explanation of the root cause of the war is more contextual as it pinpoints to the realities on the ground (Finnström 2006). Museveni's coming into power witnessed the deployment of undisciplined National Resistance Army (NRA) soldiers, the military wing of the NRM, into northern Uganda. The deployment of the NRA aimed at pursuing Acholi soldiers who had served in the former government and had retreated to the north. The NRA was brutal to civilians in northern Uganda, and to escape this brutality, "some of the Acholi ex-soldiers took up their weapons again and went into the bush to join the newly founded UPDA [Uganda Peoples Defence Army]" (Behrend 1991, p. 165). Besides committing atrocities, the NRA soldiers and the Karamojong warriors from northeastern Uganda, with the support of the Museveni regime, looted cattle from northern Uganda. As Finnström notes, "an additional experience of the war, the mass looting of cattle, was especially painful in the eyes of middle-aged and elderly Acholi, and elders and other influential members of Acholi society were eventually to be instrumental in the increased recruitment of young people to rebel ranks" (2006, p. 203). This was confirmed by the LRA representatives at the Juba peace talks who cited "persecution of the northern and eastern tribes" and "cattle rustling and destruction of property" as some of the reasons for the insurgency (Ssemujju 2006, p. 11). Between 1988 and 1990, the NRA defeated several rebel groups from the north including the Uganda People's Defence Forces, Alice Lakwena's HSM I, and Severino Lukoya's HSM II (Apuuli 2006). The defeat of Alice's HSM saw Joseph Kony succeeding her. Joseph Kony became the commander of the new LRA, comprising of the HSM remnants.

The Northern Uganda Conflict

The LRA was able to establish bases in southern Sudan with the support of the Sudanese government. It has been noted that the Sudanese government supported the LRA rebellion for the following two reasons: one, it needed the support of the LRA to fight its war against the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA), a rebel group in Sudan; and two, it linked Museveni's government with the SPLA rebellion (Akhavan 2005).

The LRA rebel movement thus became strong militarily and logistically. As a result, it was able to launch its attacks in Uganda.

The LRA not only waged a war on the GoU but also targeted civilians, the majority of them their own tribe, the Acholi. The severely affected districts in northern Uganda were Gulu, Pader, and Kitgum, where the primary ethnic group are the Acholi. The war was characterized by widespread and systematic violations of human rights against civilians, including mass killing, mass displacement, rape and sexual abuse, amputations, and abductions and forced recruitment of thousands of children and young adults who were forced to commit atrocities. For instance, on February 21, 2004, the LRA rebels massacred 200 people, including children at Barlonya camp (Allen 2006). However, serious human rights violations in the north were also attributed to government forces, the Uganda People's Defence Forces (UPDF). Human Rights Watch (2003) reported that the UPDF committed human rights abuses, including rape, torture, summary executions, and child recruitment among others. However, it is not clear whether the government soldiers' atrocities toward civilians resulted from a deliberate government policy as the government did not publicly call for the targeting of civilians.

In 2003, the then United Nations (UN) Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs Jan Egeland described the situation in northern Uganda as "one of the worst humanitarian crises in the world" (UN 2003), thus helped bring international attention to the conflict. In the following year, he briefed the UN Security Council about the humanitarian situation in northern Uganda leading the Council to issue a statement strongly condemning the LRA and demanding the rebel group to stop immediately all acts of violence against civilians (UN 2004a). The Security Council further stressed "the importance of exploring all peaceful avenues to resolve the conflict, including through creating a climate in which a solution based on dialogue might be found" (UN 2004b).

The GoU responded to the armed conflict through direct military action and peace negotiations as well as offering general amnesty to the LRA rebels. Furthermore, it adopted a counter-insurgency policy in which it forced the civilian population to move out of their villages for their own safety to internally displaced people (IDP) camps, which the UPDF guarded on behalf of the state. This brought untold suffering to the inhabitants of the camps as the GoU failed to provide adequate support and protection to them against the LRA, hunger, and communicable diseases. In addition, as noted earlier, the UPDF were also accused of committing atrocities in the camps against the very people they were supposed to protect.

In light of the global War on Terror (WoT), in March 2002, the GoU enacted an Anti-Terrorism Act "making membership of the LRA a criminal offence, a year after the US State Department had posted the LRA on its 'B-list' of 'other terrorist organizations'" (Dolan 2010, p. 8). This was a major blow to ongoing grassroots peace initiatives in the north as civilians attempting to promote conflict resolution through dialogue became exposed to treason charges, and it also raised the stakes of any governments considering supporting them (Dolan 2010). However, these strategies were not effective in bringing the conflict to an end.

In December 2003, the GoU formally referred the situation in northern Uganda concerning the LRA to the ICC claiming that this would bring peace and justice to the war-ravaged region. In July 2004, the ICC opened investigations focusing on alleged crimes against humanity and war crimes in the context of the northern Uganda conflict since July 2002. Following the investigations, in 2005, arrest warrants for top five LRA commanders were unsealed. However, the ICC was accused of bias for its failure to investigate and prosecute members of the UPDF who allegedly committed atrocities in the north. Questions were raised whether it was fair for the ICC to hold to account only one side in the conflict. In 2010, the former UN Under-Secretary for Children Olara Otunnu who had argued that the UPDF was equally capable for war crimes and crimes against humanity as the LRA met the then ICC Chief Prosecutor Luis Moreno-Ocampo and gave information regarding the alleged atrocities committed by the UPDF. However, shortly after his meeting with Otunnu, Moreno-Ocampo said that the ICC selected the gravest cases in northern Uganda, and it was a fact that the LRA committed most of the crimes in the region (Ntale 2010). In addition, he pointed out that most of the complaints against the UPDF were from before the ICC came into existence, and the ICC had no jurisdiction to investigate such crimes. The indictment of the five LRA leaders sparked a fierce debate in Uganda and the international sphere over the best approach to bring justice and peace in the north. At the time, the LRA had withdrawn its forces from southern Sudan to Garamba National Park in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) resulting in the security situation in northern Uganda improving significantly.

The Juba Peace Negotiations

In late 2005, church leaders in northern Uganda and South Sudan requested Pax Christi, an international Catholic peace movement, to look into the possibilities of a political solution to the conflict (Paxi Christi 2006; also see Simonse et al. 2010). Following this, communication links with the LRA top leadership were initiated eventually leading to the LRA's decision to participate in the peace negotiations. Riek Machar, the then vice president of South Sudan, agreed to mediate the peace talks between the LRA/M and GoU, which offered the best opportunity to end Uganda's longest running conflict. This was the first time during the war that an external mediator who had vested interests was helping find a solution to the conflict – the LRA posed a security threat to the new government of South Sudan and its citizens (Atkinson 2010).

The Juba peace negotiations took place between July 2006 and December 2008 in the context of the ICC arrest warrants against top LRA leaders. The agenda of the talks was arranged around five items: cessation of hostilities; comprehensive solutions; accountability and reconciliation; disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration; and a formal ceasefire. The GoU and representatives of the LRA/M signed agreements on the five agenda items. The August 2006 cessation of hostilities agreement between the GoU and the LRA/M resulted in an increase in security in the north as LRA attacks had declined. Furthermore, the GoU and humanitarian organizations could access conflict-affected populations in the region. There was a significant improvement in the situation in the region bringing hope to the people of the north. However, in 2008, the talks collapsed when Kony declined to sign the final peace agreement. Kony argued that he would only sign the peace deal if the ICC arrest warrants against him and his top commanders were dropped and also if all the LRA soldiers were integrated into the UPDF (New Vision 2008). In December 2008, Uganda, DRC, and South Sudan forces with the support of the USA launched a joint military offensive against LRA dubbed Operation Lightning Thunder targeting the rebels' main camp in Garamba National Park in the DRC. The military objective of the operation was to defeat the LRA. However, while the GoU claimed that Operation Lightning Thunder was a military success, the operation failed to destroy the LRA or to capture Kony and his top commanders, and more than a decade later, Kony remains at large.

The Peace Versus Justice Debate During the Juba Peace Process

When the Juba peace talks formally commenced on July 14, 2006, the "peace versus justice" debate – whether to try war criminals or to end the violence without trials – became a central theme in discussions on the politics of international criminal justice in the context of northern Uganda. Despite the ICC arrest warrants, in July 2006 the government of Uganda offered to grant a blanket amnesty to the indicted LRA leaders if peace talks between the two warring parties succeed. President Museveni argued that it was against African culture to arrest Kony after granting him amnesty: "This is not part of our African culture. Once you give your word that is your word" (Nyanzi 2006, p. 2). As Mazrui has contended, the most important cultural resource that Africans have that may be tapped to help contain or end conflict is "Africa's short memory of hate” (1995, p. 86). For example, despite being tormented by the White colonial regime, at independence in 1980, Prime Minister Robert Mugabe of Zimbabwe displayed this traditional more of limited memory of animosity when he said:

If yesterday I fought you as an enemy, today you have become a friend and ally with the same national interest, loyalty, rights and duties as myself. If yesterday you hated me, today you cannot avoid the love that binds you to me and me to you. Is it not folly, therefore, that in these circumstances anybody should seek to revive the wounds and grievances of the past? The wrongs of the past must now stand forgiven and forgotten [...] Our majority rule could easily turn into inhuman rule if we oppressed, persecuted or harassed those who do not look or think like the majority of us [...]. (De Waal 1990, pp. 48–49)

Instead of seeking revenge, Mugabe sought reconciliation and urged White Rhodesians, including the former Prime Minister of Rhodesia Ian Smith, to stay and help rebuild Zimbabwe. While this traditional more of limited memory of animosity is not celebrated internationally, Africans have frequently displayed it (Mazrui 1995). However, since the liberal view, which places emphasis on retributive justice, remains dominant, it is not surprising that the ICC rejected Museveni’s amnesty offer pointing out that the arrest warrants against the LRA’s top commanders could not be withdrawn. The ICC further stated that Museveni’s offer was illegal as it violated the Rome Statute that created the ICC, which the GoU had ratified. Moreover, the Court reminded Uganda, the DRC, and Sudan of their legal obligation to implement the arrest warrants if the LRA’s senior commanders are in their territory. Furthermore, the then UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, and the French and the US governments disapproved Museveni’s amnesty offer to the LRA leadership. For instance, the then US Embassy Public Affairs Officer in Uganda, Alyson Grunder, pointed out that the US government supported the ICC indictments against the LRA top commanders:

While the United States appreciated that the initiative of the government of Southern Sudan to broker peace talks between the LRA and Kampala was based on the hope that these talks would put an end to the insurgency, the US government expected

Museveni to cooperate with the ICC in apprehending Kony to answer charges of crimes against humanity. (Daily Monitor 2006, p. 2)

The language that the ICC and supporters of its actions, such as the US Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, used placed a strong emphasis on international law and “a specific way in which crimes, and their relative levels of seriousness were defined,” a kind of language that was unfamiliar to many people in Uganda, including the victims of the civil war (Hovil 2011, p. 5). While local actors were divided on the issue, a number of them including the Refugee Law Project, the Acholi Religious Leaders Peace Initiative (ARLPI), the Acholi traditional leaders, and politicians (including some in the GoU) opposed the ICC intervention. As Nnyago (2006, p. 10) pointed out, “Opposition groups and government are united, at least for now, in giving peace a chance.” ICC intervention in Uganda was seen as an obstacle to peace in the north, and there were fears that this would exacerbate violence and prolong the conflict. Contrary to this, Richard Dicker from the Human Rights Watch argued that “When there is impunity for these kind of crimes, for those responsible, then the peace that follows can at best be fragile” (Nyanzi 2006, p. 2). Similarly, the then French Ambassador to Uganda, Bernard Garancher, also wanted the LRA leaders to be arrested arguing that it was vital not to ignore such crimes for the sake of lasting peace. Furthermore, the then ICC Chief Prosecutor, Luis Moren-Ocampo, expressed that “[w]e believe the best way to stop conflict and re-establish security in the region was to arrest the top commanders” (Nyanzi 2006, p. 2). Due to its claims of universal justice which follows a retributive justice framework, the ICC showed intolerance to legal (e.g., the Uganda Amnesty Act 2000) and non-legal alternatives to dealing with serious human rights violations committed during the northern Uganda conflict.

However, opponents of the ICC intervention in Uganda like Archbishop John Baptist Odama, then chairman of the Acholi Religious Leaders Peace Initiative (ARLPI), urged the Court to “keep away as far as possible from the Juba talks” pointing out that “[w]e don’t want to lose this golden chance again. Our people have suffered enough. They are tired of staying in camps” (Odongo 2006). Concerned about the ICC intervention and its implications for peace in the north, in March and April 2005, the ARLPI sent delegations to the ICC in The Hague to lobby against its involvement (IRIN 2005a). Such opponents of the ICC intervention wanted local mechanisms for conflict resolution and reconciliation to take precedence over trials. Local mechanisms were considered more appropriate in promoting social reconciliation and peace than the ICC. The ICC, in this case, was seen as a neo-colonial intervention divorced from local realities, which ignores the understandings of the local, including the victims. Furthermore, there were concerns that the Court was sidelining traditional justice mechanisms in the north. As Sriram rightly pointed out, “[...] citizens of countries emerging from civil war [...] may rightly view the relationship between peace and justice differently” from those in established democracies such as the USA and the UK where “the linkage of peace and justice appears quite logical” (2004, p. 1). The desire for “peace first, justice later” in northern Uganda is understandable given the suffering civilians in the region went through due to the war. At the same time, the call for traditional mechanisms to deal with the situation is evidence that victims of the conflict also “desire some type of justice or accountability for the losses they sustained” (Sriram 2004, p. 1). It is crucial to note that the peace and justice debate on the northern Uganda crisis showed that religious and traditional leaders and a number of victims preferred restorative justice over retributive justice to end the conflict.

A year before the start of the Juba peace talks, the International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ) (2005) conducted a study in four northern districts of Lira, Gulu, Soroti, and Kitgum, which among its objectives included capturing the attitudes and opinions of the victims of the conflict about specific transitional justice mechanisms like traditional justice, truth commissions, trials, and reparations, as well as to obtain views on the relationship between justice and peace in northern Uganda. Prior to this study, several qualitative studies had examined factors influencing peace and justice considerations in the region drawing primarily on interviews with traditional and religious leaders, former LRA members, humanitarian workers, Ugandan government officials, and others (ICTJ 2005). The ICTJ work provided extremely important data showing that people at the grassroots wanted peace more than anything, but they also wanted some accountability, especially for the leadership of the LRA. However, it is crucial to point out that a spectrum of opinion existed among respondents about what exactly needed to be done about atrocities committed during the war (ICTJ 2005). The study also showed that although respondents considered justice and peace as a complex relationship, they did not see them as mutually exclusive.

In 2007, ICTJ conducted a population-based survey in eight districts most affected by the war with an objective to capture attitudes about social reconstruction, justice, and peace at the time the Juba peace talks were taking place. The study showed that the majority respondents (90%) believed that peace could be achieved through engaging in dialogue with the LRA or through pardoning them for their crimes (86%) (ICTJ 2007, p. 3). Similar to their 2005 findings, in 2007, ICTJ found that the majority of the respondents (70%) wanted those responsible for committing violations of international humanitarian law and human rights in the north to be held to account. ICTJ further found that half of the respondents wanted LRA leaders to be held to account, while 48% wanted all LRA rebels. In addition, 70% of the respondents pointed out that UPDF had committed human rights abuses and war crimes in the north with 55% wanting those responsible for committing atrocities to be put on trial. Furthermore, according to the ICTJ, unlike in 2005, respondents also emphasized truth-seeking as essential for the victims, and there was also “an increased willingness to compromise through amnesties or pardons in order to allow the peace process to succeed” (2007, p. 3). In regard to the relationship between amnesty, criminal justice, and peace, the study found that the 80% of the respondents favored peace with amnesty. Furthermore, most respondents wanted those offered amnesty to apologize first to the victims before returning to their communities (ICTJ 2007). The study further found that while many respondents considered the ICC as a useful source of pressure on the LRA to engage in the peace, they did not want the court to act as a stumbling block to a peace agreement that would bring the conflict to an end and create conditions for lasting peace. From this study, it shows that the Juba peace process had brought a lot of hope for peace in the north, and the ICC was largely perceived as contributing negatively to the peace process as the LRA demanded that the arrest warrants be withdrawn for them to sign the peace agreement. It also showed that there seemed to be an agreement that some type of justice needed to be done in northern Uganda. However, parties interested in the conflict appeared to be conceptualizing justice differently and how sustainable peace could be achieved in the region.

Traditional Justice in Northern Uganda: Mato Oput

As noted in the previous section, the GoU's referral of the northern Uganda situation in 2003 saw traditional justice mechanisms increasingly gaining prominence in the country as mechanisms through which transitional justice could be implemented in the north. Such mechanisms were seen as "alternatives or compliments to the ICC" (JRP and IJR 2011, p. 1; Tom 2006). For instance, in support of traditional justice, the GoU spokesman for the Juba peace talks, Captain Paddy Ankunda, said that:

We will have to convince them (ICC) that traditional justice will be put to use to ensure that there is no impunity and to make sure there is reconciliation between the rebels and community [...] What will happen is that the rebels will apologise, there is a cleansing ceremony and reconciliation like it has been done in the post apartheid South Africa [...]. (Matsiko et al. 2006, p. 2)

In northern Uganda, traditional justice mechanisms include the various customary and traditional practices that different ethnic groups in the region have used over centuries for conflict resolution and maintaining social order. Clause 3.1 of item 3 of the June 2007 Agreement on Accountability and Reconciliation between the LRA/M and the GoU provides that traditional justice mechanisms "as practiced in the communities affected by the conflict shall be promoted, with necessary modifications, as a central part of the framework for accountability and reconciliation." Between November 2010 and February 2011, the Justice and Reconciliation Project (JRP) and the Institute for Justice and Reconciliation (IJR) engaged in a series of consultations with conflict victims in northern Uganda focusing on traditional justice, truth-telling, gender justice, and reparations in the context of Uganda's transitional justice processes. JRP and IJR (2011) found that among the grassroots, many considered traditional mechanisms that could promote healing and reconciliation within conflict-affected communities. Traditional justice mechanisms practiced in northern Uganda that the Agreement on Accountability and Reconciliation referred to include Mato Oput, Ailuc found among the Madi, Toni ci Koka among the Madi, Culo Kwor among the Acholi and the Lango, and Kayo Kuc among the Langi. Uganda's National Transitional Justice Policy of 2019 also recognizes that these traditional justice mechanisms play an invaluable role in dispute and conflict resolution especially among disadvantaged communities in conflict and post-conflict situations (Uganda, Ministry of Internal Affairs 2019, p. 10). However, in northern Uganda Mato Oput appears to be the most popular. For instance, many respondents in the 2007 ICTJ study wanted the LRA returnees to participate in traditional ceremonies with Mato Oput, receiving the highest level of support. Such people opted to promote restorative justice rather than retributive justice, to create conditions for ending the war and promote reconciliation and community building.

Mato Oput is a community-based traditional mechanism for promoting justice and reconciliation among the Acholi people. In the Acholi language, Mato Oput literally means "to drink a bitter potion made from the leaves of the oput tree" (New Vision 2005). It is both a process and a ritual ceremony the Acholi used in cases of accidental killings or intentional murder encompassing "the same principles of truth, accountability and compensation, and restoration of relationships as other justice processes” (Lui Institute for Global Issues 2006, p. 3). The ceremony, which is conducted by elders, aims to restore relationships between the victim and offender and the community at large.

Although the Mato Oput ceremonies vary across clans, there are some commonalities: “Most of involve sacrificing a sheep or goat, conducting ritualistic separation such as a mock fight, and then sharing the sacrificed animal or food” (Cline 2013, p. 118). Furthermore, a ceremony involving the drinking of a bitter drink is normally conducted. Drinking of the bitter herb by both the perpetrator and the victim implies that both parties have accepted the bitterness of the past and promised never to taste such bitterness again, which symbolizes forgiveness and reconciliation. Following the ceremony, the victim is compensated for the wrong done, the payment of which can be in the form of cows or sheep. Compensation by the offenders is considered a core element of the Mato Oput ceremony. Retired Bishop Macleod Baker Ochola II, one of the founders of the Acholi Religious Leaders Peace Initiative, pointed out that unlike the court system, which is “retributive, promotes polarization, alienating both sides. . . [Mato Oput] brings restoration to broken human relationships, transforms lives and heals the hearts of those involved” (Nzwili 2017). As such, formerly abducted persons (FPAs) including ex-child soldiers are said to have been reintegrated in the community through the traditional methods of forgiveness and reconciliation, such as Mato Oput.

Stigmatization and the Reintegration of LRA Returnees

While it has been argued that Mato Oput helps in restoring broken relations, promotes reconciliation, and transforms lives, numerous studies and reports show that in northern Uganda former LRA rebel returnees, many of them forcibly recruited or abducted, often confront multiple challenges in their daily lives because of their past (Mukasa 2017; Ndossi 2011; IRIN 2005b; Denov and Lakor 2017; Okiror 2018; Bogner and Rosenthal 2017; Kiconco and Nthakomwa 2018; MacDonald and Kerali 2020). Such challenges include socioeconomic marginalization, rejection, violence, resentment, and stigmatization by their family and the community, which can hinder their reintegration and recovery. For instance, in 2005, an ex-LRA abductee, Jacqueline Auma, aged 14 at the time, confessed: “We go through the ceremony and we are told we have been forgiven. But the truth is people can never forget what we have done. People still call me a killer, and few of my peers will even talk to me” (IRIN 2005b). Similarly, Agnes Acayo, a returnee mother, who was abducted by the LRA at the age of 9, describes how the community generally perceive them and their children:

When the community knows you are a former rebel fighter, people finger-point and look at you as a killer. You are called all sorts of names. Rebel, rebel, Kony and killer, killer. Our children face the same situation. They can’t play and interact with other children freely. They are always harassed and abused. The children are seen as a curse and burden to the community. (Okiror 2018)

Stigma against female LRA ex-abductees as testified by Agnes also negatively affects their access to vital community relationships, such as marriage, thus hampering social and economic opportunities essential for reintegration and recovery (Kiconco and Nthakomwa 2018). Furthermore, research supports Agnes’s claim regarding the labelling and stereotyping of children born in LRA captivity, which impedes their integration into the community. Denov and Lakor’s recent study on the post-war experiences of children born in LRA captivity found that they are often portrayed as “rebel children” and “dangerous,” having “bad behavior” and possessing “bad spirits” (cen) of the dead that they brought with them from the bush (2017, p. 260). Because of the post-war community stigma and rejection resulting from being born in LRA captivity, many of them wish to return to the bush and re-join the rebel group (Denov and Lakor 2017). As a strategy to manage their stigmatization, LRA returnees conceal their past in the bush, including relocating to urban centers such as Gulu for anonymity (Bogner and Rosenthal 2017). Given this, can we talk of genuine reconciliation, forgiveness, and reintegration in post-war northern Uganda? It is not surprising that a number of the ex-combatants who have gone through Mato Oput feel that the process of forgiveness is superficial (IRIN 2005b). In an attempt to address the issue of stigma against LRA returnees, various actors, including religious organizations and NGOs, have engaged in community sensitization programs.

However, MacDonald and Kerali have criticized such interventions for failing to seek to understand, before all else, “how and why stigmatization functions in social relationships and ‘local words’” (2020, p. 20). While all LRA returnees may be vulnerable to stigma due to their association with and having being part of this rebel group, not all of them experience stigmatization. MacDonald and Kerali observe that stigmatization is profoundly entrenched in the “moral experience” of post-conflict Acholi “local worlds,” which serves to manage the presence and behavior of LRA returnees so as to restore “normality” in a situation of continued social suffering:

Depending on “what matters most” and “what is crucially at stake”, it can happen as part of the “moral experience” of appeasing cen; protecting community members from physical attacks; guaranteeing access to land; regulating village governance or a combination of these things. (2020, p. 20)

Their study suggests that a broader understanding of stigmatization would show that while it is usually carried out as a form of “social control,” it is also “based on cultural ideas related to the importance of cleaning and/or shame in resocializing individuals after wrongdoing,” and therefore, its purpose can be reintegrative rather than merely exclusionary (MacDonald and Kerali 2020, p. 3). As such, for them, anti-stigma interventions which draw on a narrow understanding of stigmatization miss the multiple functions and many sides of stigmatization among the Acholi, including its reintegrative function. This does not imply that the exclusionary function of stigmatization in this case should be ignored.

It is not surprising that local communities often resist dominant approaches to ending

stigmatization that pay little attention to the local culture, history, beliefs, and realities. Traditionally, the Acholi believe in the world of divine spirits and of what Mbiti (1969) calls the “living-dead” who are believed to actively participate in the world of the living creating “communities of both the living and the dead” (Kopytoff 1971, p. 129). Mbiti (1969) has noted that the world of the “living-dead” is a world of spirits and in that world, they are not dead. They are also not dead in the world of the living human beings because the living continues to remember them and communicate with them asking for assistance from them in the event of trouble or sickness. The Acholi’s belief in this world plays a significant role in shaping how they see justice, peace, and reconciliation.

According to the Liu Institute for Global Issues and the Gulu District NGO Forum, “Jok (Gods or divine spirits) and ancestors guide the Acholi moral order, and when a wrong is committed, they send misfortune and illness (cen) until appropriate actions are taken by Elders and the offender” (2005, p. 10). As a result, the Acholi discourage an individual from being a troublemaker since the individual’s actions can have grave consequences for his/her whole clan. This notion of cen reflects the significance of “relationships between the natural and the supernatural in Acholi, the living and the dead, the normative continuity between an individual and the community” (Liu Institute for Global Issues and Gulu District NGO Forum 2005, p. 72). The “living-dead” play an active role and have a lot of influence in the world of the living. This illustrates that despite the fact that most Acholi people acknowledge that, for example, many ex-LRA female returnees were forcibly abducted or recruited, they view them as having participated in killings during the war and contaminated with the evil spirits of their victims (Kiconco and Nthakomwa 2018). Whereas humanitarian NGOs may view returning children and young adults as innocent, their families and communities, however, perceive them as potentially dangerous. As such, those seen as carriers of bad spirits are required to undergo cleansing rituals as in local practices what matters most is that returnees live in harmony with others and do not pose a danger to the community.

However, as noted earlier, a call to consider the various functions of stigmatization among the Acholi, including its integrative role, does not mean that the harmful effects of the stigmatization of LRA returnees should be ignored. A study by Schneider et al. on the prevalence of stigmatization in a large number of LRA war survivors, including a significant number of formerly child soldiers and abducted individuals, found that “the experience of stigmatization and discrimination combined with trauma load is associated with PTSD prevalence, the likelihood of spontaneous remission and therapy success” (2018, p. 8). They, thus, recommended the development of programs that raise awareness in the community about the negative impacts of stigmatization and highlighting the necessity of reducing it and discrimination so as to enable survivors to recover and reintegrate into the community. However, as research has shown, intervention programs which fail to take into account the multiple functions of stigmatization among the Acholi, including its reintegrative purpose, are met with resistance from the local community (MacDonald and Kerali 2020). As such, they have proved not very effective in ending the stigmatization of the LRA returnees in northern Uganda. It is therefore vital that the perspectives of the returnees and those of the community are taken into account when designing programs aimed at reducing stigmatization and promoting reconciliation and reintegration.

Summary

Post-conflict northern Uganda has seen some improvement in security and in the lives of its inhabitants. However, more than a decade after the LRA withdrawal from the region, the search for justice, reconciliation, and durable peace continues to be fraught with challenges in the midst of social suffering. The LRA leader Joseph Kony remains at large and continues to wreak havoc in central Africa, where he and his LRA retreated to. External attempts (as in the case of the ICC) at promoting retributive justice in the hope that this will act as deterrent and eventually lead to peace have often faced resistance in northern Uganda. Such interventions are seen as neo-colonial and divorced from local realities. In addition, NGO interventions aimed at sensitizing the community about the negative impacts of stigmatization on the LRA, and their reintegration needs to also engage local culture and needs in order to understand the various functions of stigmatization among the Acholi. This is vital in designing intervention programs that are more effective in reducing stigmatization and promoting reintegration, reconciliation, and peace. As such, interventions that take into account the various functions of stigmatization, culture, local history, traditional and formal justice mechanisms, the needs of the community, and community fears as well as the interests and needs of former combatants may be useful in designing holistic, integrated, and effective approaches vital for creating conditions for proper reintegration of former LRA combatants and abductees, reconciliation, justice, and lasting peace in the region.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict
- ▶ Peace
- ▶ Reconciliation
- ▶ Restorative Justice
- ▶ War

References

- Akhavan, P. (2005). The Lord’s Resistance Army case: Uganda’s submission of the first state referral to the International Criminal Court. The American Journal of International Law, 99(2), 403–421.
- Allen, T. (2006). Trial justice: The International Criminal Court and the Lord’s Resistance Army. London: Zed Books.
- Apuuli, K. P. (2006). The ICC arrest warrants for the Lord’s Resistance Army leaders and peace prospects for northern Uganda. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 4(1), 179–187.
- Atkinson, R. R. (2010). ‘The realists in Juba’? An analysis of the Juba peace talks. In T. Allen & K. Vlassenroot (Eds.), The Lord’s Resistance Army: Myth or reality. London: Zed Books.

- Bainomugisha, A., & Tumushabe, G. (2005). The 'torturous peace process' in northern Uganda: An analysis of peace initiatives and prospects for a settlement (MACOMBA policy and academic research series no. 1). Kampala: Makerere University.
- Behrend, H. (1991). Is Alice Lakwena a witch? The Holy Spirit Movement and its fight against evil in the north. In H. B. Hansen & M. Twaddle (Eds.), Changing Uganda: The dilemmas of structural adjustment and revolutionary change. London: James Currey.
- Bloomfield, D. (2003). Reconciliation: An introduction. In D. Bloomfield, T. Barnes, & T. Huyse (Eds.), Reconciliation after violent conflict: A handbook. Stockholm: International IDEA.
- Bogner, A., & Rosenthal, G. (2017). Rebels in northern Uganda after their return to civilian life: Between a strong we-image and experiences of isolation and discrimination. Canadian Journal of African Studies/Revue Canadienne des Études Africaines, 51(2), 175–197.
- Cline, L. E. (2013). The Lord's Resistance Army. Santa Barbara: Praeger.
- Daily Monitor. (2006). Kony rejects amnesty offer. Daily Monitor, July 7.
- De Waal, V. (1990). The politics of reconciliation: Zimbabwe's first decade. London: Hurst & Company.
- Denov, M., & Lakor, A. A. (2017). When war is better than peace: The post-conflict realities of children born of wartime rape in northern Uganda. Child Abuse and Neglect, 65, 255–265.
- Dolan, C. (2010). Peace and conflict in northern Uganda 2002–06. In E. Drew (Ed.), Initiatives to end the violence in northern Uganda: 2002–09 and the Juba Peace Process (11 supplement). London: Conciliation.
- Finnström, S. (2006). Wars of the past and war in the present: The Lords Resistance Movement/Army in Uganda. Africa, 76(2), 200–220.
- Galtung, J. (1985). Twenty-five years of peace research: Ten challenges and some responses. Journal of Peace Research, 22(2), 141–158.
- Hovil, L. (2011). A poisoned chalice? Local civil society and the International Criminal Court's engagement in Uganda. International Refugee Rights Initiative, discussion paper no. 1, October. <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/PoisonChaliceFINAL1.pdf>. Accessed 30 Jan 2020.
- https://www.newvision.co.ug/new_vision/news/1145054/bishop-tells-icc-talks. Accessed 11 Feb 2020.
- Human Rights Watch. (2003). Abducted and abused: Renewed conflict in northern Uganda. <http://www.hrw.org/reports/2003/uganda0703/uganda0703.pdf>. Accessed 06 Feb 2020.
- ICTJ. (2005). Forgotten voices a population-based survey on attitudes about peace and justice in northern Uganda. International Center for Transitional Justice and the Human Rights Center, University of Berkeley. <https://ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-HRC-Uganda-Voices-2005-English.pdf>. Accessed 13 Feb 2020.
- ICTJ. (2007). When the war ends: A population-based survey on attitudes about peace, justice and social reconstruction in northern Uganda. International Center for Transitional Justice and the Human Rights Center, University of Berkeley. <https://hhi.harvard.edu/publications/when-war-ends-population-based-survey-attitudes-about-peace-justice-and-social>. Accessed 13 Feb 2020.
- IRIN. (2005a). The ICC and the northern Uganda Conflict. 9 June. <https://www.thenewhumanitarian.org/report/54857/uganda-icc-and-northern-uganda-conflict>. Accessed 05 Feb 2020.
- IRIN. (2005b). Uganda: Traditional ritual heals communities torn apart by war. 9 June. <https://www.thenewhumanitarian.org/report/54857/uganda-icc-and-northern-uganda-conflict>. Accessed 15 Mar 2020.
- JRP, & IJR. (2011). Traditional justice and war crimes in northern Uganda. JRP-IJR policy brief no. 1, August. <http://www.justiceandreconciliation.org/publications/statements-briefs/2011/traditional-justice-and-war-crimes-in-northern-uganda-policy-brief-no-1/>. Accessed 01 Mar 2020.
- Kiconco, A., & Nthakomwa, M. (2018). Marriage for the 'new woman' from the Lord's Resistance Army: Experiences of female ex-abductees in Acholi region of Uganda. Women's Studies International Forum, 68, 65–74.
- Kopytoff, I. (1971). Ancestors as elders in Africa. Journal of the African Institute, 41(2), 129–142.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: USIP.
- Lederach, J. P. (2001). Civil society and reconciliation. In C. A. Crocker, F. O. Hampson, & P. Aall (Eds.), Turbulent peace: The challenges of managing international conflict. Washington, DC: USIP.
- Lederach, J. P. (2003). The little book of conflict transformation. Intercourse: Good Books.
- Liu Institute for Global Issues and Gulu District NGO Forum. (2005). Roco Wati Acoli: Restoring relations in Acholi-land traditional approaches to reintegration and justice. https://sppga.ubc.ca/wp-content/uploads/sites/5/2016/03/15Sept2005_Roco_Wat_I_Acoli.pdf. Accessed 10 Feb 2020.
- Lui Institute for Global Issues. (2006). Accountability, reconciliation and the Juba peace talks: Beyond the impasse. https://sppga.ubc.ca/wp-content/uploads/sites/5/2016/03/18Oct2006_AccountabilityAndReconciliation_JRP.pdf. Accessed 17 Feb 2020.
- MacDonald, A., & Kerali, R. (2020). Being normal: Stigmatization of Lord's Resistance Army returnees as "moral experience" in post-war northern Uganda. Journal of Refugee Studies. <https://doi.org/10.1093/jrs/fez117>.
- Matsiko, G., Nyakairu, F., & Murondo, E. (2006). Kony fighters enter Juba as Amama rushes to Hague. Daily Monitor, 12 July.
- Mazrui, A. A. (1995). Towards containing conflict in Africa: Methods, mechanisms and values. East African Journal of Peace and Human Rights, 2(1), 81–90.
- Mbiti, J. S. (1969). African religions and philosophy. London: Heinemann.

- Mukasa, N. (2017). War-child mothers in northern Uganda: The civil war forgotten legacy. Development in Practice, 27(3), 354–367.
- Ndossi, E. (2011). Stigma as encountered by female returnees and the role of the church in northern Uganda. In M. Bard (Ed.), Culture, religion, and the reintegration of female child soldiers in northern Uganda. New York: Peter Lang.
- New Vision. (2005). Acholi pardons rebels. New Vision, 14 June. https://www.newvision.co.ug/new_vision/news/1123166/acholi-pardon-rebels. Accessed 01 Apr 2020.
- New Vision. (2008). Kony fails to show up for peace signing. New Vision, 30 November. https://www.newvision.co.ug/new_vision/news/1175982/kony-fails-peace-signing. Accessed 10 Feb 2020.
- Nnyago, K. O. (2006). If Kony is defeated, why then do we need talks? Daily Monitor, 7 July.
- Ntale, S. (2010). ICC to investigate Ugandan army. CNN. 3 June. <http://edition.cnn.com/2010/WORLD/africa/06/03/uganda.army.icc/index.html>. Accessed 28 Mar 2020.
- Nyanzi, P. (2006). Museveni wants Kony amnesty debated. Daily Monitor, 8 July.
- Nzwili, F. (2017). Retired Ugandan bishop seeks restorative justice for former child soldiers. Religious News Service, 4 January. <https://religionnews.com/2017/01/04/retired-ugandan-bishop-seeks-restorative-justice-for-former-child-soldiers/>. Accessed 17 Apr 2020.
- Odongo, A. (2006). Bishop tells ICC to keep off talks. 10 July.
- Okiror, S. (2018). Abducted at nine to be a girl soldier for Kony: “Now people call me a killer”. The Guardian, 8 January. <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2018/jan/08/abducted-girl-soldier-joseph-kony-lra-lords-resistance-army-uganda>. Accessed 03 Apr 2020.
- Parlevliet, M. (2002). Bridging the divide: Exploring the relationship between human rights and conflict management. Track Two, 11(1), 8–43.
- Paxi Christi. (2006). Pax Christi: Breakthrough in peace talks in northern Uganda. 26 August. <https://reliefweb.int/report/uganda/pax-christi-breakthrough-peace-talks-northern-uganda>. Accessed 18 Feb 2020.
- Schneider, A., Conrad, D., Pfeiffer, A., Elbert, T., Kolassa, I. T., & Wilker, S. (2018). Stigmatization is associated with increased PTSD risk after traumatic stress and diminished likelihood of spontaneous remission—A study with East-African conflict survivors. Front Psychiatry, 9, 1–10.
- Simonse, S., Verkoren, W., & Junne, G. (2010). NGO involvement in the Juba peace talks: The role and dilemmas of IKV Pax Christi. In T. Allen & K. Vlassenroot (Eds.), The Lord’s Resistance Army: Myth or reality. London: Zed Books.
- Sriram, C. L. (2004). Confronting past human rights violations: Justice vs peace in times of transition. London: Frank Cass.
- Ssemujju, I. N. (2006). Inside Kony talks. The Weekly Observer, 10–11 July.
- Tom, P. (2006). The Acholi traditional approach to justice and the war in northern Uganda. The Beyond Intractability Knowledge Base Project, University of Colorado. <https://www.beyondintractability.org/casestudy/tom-acholi>. Accessed 22 Jan 2020.
- Tom, P. (2017). Liberal peace and post-conflict peacebuilding in Africa. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Uganda, Ministry of Internal Affairs. (2019). National transitional justice policy. Kampala: Ministry of Internal Affairs. https://drive.google.com/file/d/1zbqYZgRVpUpDrQUTM5c_GeMsultrB9O2/view. Accessed 13 Feb 2020.
- UN. (2003). Head of UN Humanitarian Affairs Office visits northern Uganda, says ‘deeply shocked’ by ‘war against children.’ AFR/750-IHA/820, November 10. <https://www.un.org/press/en/2003/afr750.doc.htm>. Accessed 22 Jan 2020.
- UN. (2004a). Security Council condemns rebel group’s atrocities against children in Uganda. April 14. <https://news.un.org/en/story/2004/04/100232-security-council-condemns-rebel-groups-atrocities-against-children-uganda>. Accessed 22 Jan 2020.
- UN. (2004b). Press statement on northern Uganda by Security Council President. SC8057-AFR/900. April 14. <https://www.un.org/press/en/2004/sc8057.doc.htm>. Accessed 22 Jan 2020.
- van Willigen, N., & Kroezen, J. (2013). End of war. In Y. Hwang & L. Cerna (Eds.), Global challenges: Peace and war. Leiden: Koninklijke Brill NV.
- Weinstein, H. M. (2011). Editorial note: The myth of closure, the Illusion of reconciliation: Final thoughts on five years as co-editor-in-chief. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 5(1), 1–10.

Inclusion

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict
- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace
- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy
- ▶ Women’s Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Inclusive Mediation

- ▶ Gender and Mediation

Independent Bodies

- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements

Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements

Dawn Walsh
University College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Independent bodies; Independent committees; Non-majoritarian institutions

Definition

How do independent commissions operate in post-conflict societies? Commissions, which possess and exercise some specialized public authority but are neither directly elected nor directly managed by elected officials, are crucial elements of peace settlements as they are mandated to carry out vital tasks including monitoring ceasefires or overseeing elections (see chapter “► Post-conflict Elections”). The successful completion of such tasks is vital to the sustainability of peace accords. The use of independent commissions is not restricted to post-conflict contexts; rather they have been an increasing popular tool of governance in North America and across Europe. Such bodies

- (a) Possess and exercise some grant of specialized public authority, separate from that of other institutions.
- (b) Are neither directly elected by the people nor directly managed by elected officials. They exclude state powers organized within the bureaucracy, when the exercise of such powers is placed under the direct control of ministers and the civil service but includes a specialized organ or agency that may be linked to a ministry in certain formal ways, so long as that body is not merely a department or administrative office of a larger bureaucratic entity (Thatcher and Sweet 2002).

Introduction

How do independent commissions operate in post-conflict societies? Commissions, which possess and exercise some specialized public authority but are neither directly elected nor directly managed by elected officials, are crucial elements of peace settlements as they are mandated to carry out vital tasks including monitoring ceasefires or overseeing elections (see section “► Post-conflict Elections”). The successful completion of such tasks is vital to the sustainability of peace accords. The use of independent commissions is not restricted to post-conflict contexts; rather they have been an increasing popular tool of governance in North America and across Europe. Such bodies

- (a) Possess and exercise some grant of specialized public authority, separate from that of other institutions.
- (b) Are neither directly elected by the people nor directly managed by elected officials. They exclude state powers organized within the bureaucracy, when the exercise of such powers is placed under the direct control of ministers and the civil service but includes a specialized organ or agency that may be linked to a ministry in certain formal ways, so long as that body is not merely a department or administrative office of a larger bureaucratic entity (Thatcher and Sweet 2002).

Despite concerns about the legitimacy of such bodies due to their unelected and arguable unaccountable nature, their use is widespread in both post-conflict and non-conflict environments. This is the result of their ability to help the principals (i.e., the executive or/and legislators with existing legislative power in an area to (a) overcome commitment problems, (b) overcome technical complexity, and (c) lower the cost of decision-making). While being developed to explain delegation in non-conflict contexts, all three of these logics can account for delegation in post-conflict contexts.

The “credibility hypothesis” argues that “political sovereigns are willing to delegate important powers to independent groups in order to increase the credibility of their policy commitments” (Majone 2001). The long-term credibility of policies is undermined by competing preferences among politicians. This justification for establishing independent commissions is convincing in explaining the bodies in the post-conflict context. Conflict parties frequently have differing preferences in relation to a wider range of policies. Even where a peace agreement has resolved the core issues which led to conflict, the parties may still have different preferences with regard to the specifics of reforms to be implemented in certain sectors. In this environment the delegation of powers to an independent body can overcome logjams which could otherwise become serious obstacles to political progress. Yet, political leaders will only delegate powers to such a body if it has confidence that it will not work in such a way as to undermine their interests.

Delegation of certain tasks to independent commission is also explained by its ability to lower the political cost of making decisions. Certain decisions may be unpopular with important constituents of the principals while being beneficial to wider society. It can be very difficult for principals to take these decisions, regardless of their desire to enact the policies which benefit the majority, as such decisions can be damaging or fatal to their careers. Delegation allows principals to place the “blame” for such decisions on the agents and insulate themselves from political fallout (Walsh 2015). This explanation for the use of independent commissions may be particularly applicable to the post-conflict context where leaders are reluctant to become directly connected to concessions or compromises which are often central to peace agreements.

Theories of delegation have little to say about the composition of independent bodies, beyond stressing the role of technical expertise as discussed above. However, when operating in a post-conflict context, the group identity of commission members has the ability to either support or undermine the work of the body. Conflict parties will only agree to the delegation of significant issues to an independent commission if they can be confident that the body will include representation from their group and that such members will have a real impact on the work of the commission.

Independent Commissions: Power-Sharing and Power-Dividing

Power-sharing in general, and consociationalism in particular, advises against simple majoritarian decision-making as it facilitates the permanent exclusion of certain groups. Instead consociationalists advocate for proportional representation of different groups in important institutions and for anti-majoritarian mechanisms such as qualified majority voting (Lijphart 2004). Policy-makers have implemented such recommendations widely, including by structuring independent commissions according to such principles (Walsh 2015, 2016). Commissions and bodies across a range of areas including judicial, military, economic, and culture have all been established to reflect these norms. For example, the National Petroleum Commission in Sudan provided for in the 2004 Agreement on wealth sharing during the pre-interim and interim period in Sudan and the Independent Commission of Inquiry provided for in the 1992 National Pact in Mali.

In non-conflict contexts the behavior of independent commissions is often viewed as legitimate as a result of the expertise of its members. As many policy areas become increasingly technical, independent bodies are used to mitigate against the inability of politicians to have necessary expertise across a wide range of policy areas. Where an independent commission is composed of recognized experts in a particular field, its work is viewed as legitimate, as representing best practice in that sector. In such an environment, politicians are often content to leave such technical issues to commissions and view their work as being non-partisan. In post-conflict contexts, the contentious nature of intergroup relations often results in matters which are non-controversial in other environments becoming contested and issues that are somewhat controversial in other contexts being extremely sensitive. Against such a backdrop, independent commissions need not only to be composed of recognized experts to be viewed as legitimate, but they also need to be seen as taking the needs of different groups into consideration. Thus, both their membership and operational procedures need to recognize the sensitive nature of the post-conflict context.

The use of independent commissions in post-conflict societies also draws on Roeder's power-dividing theory; while he focused on the traditional separation of powers, he also referred to the possible role of "independent special purpose administrations" highlighting that "by creating independent organs with specialized decision-making authority, power-dividing balances efficient decision-making in specific areas against the dangers of tyranny by a single majority across issue areas" (Roeder 2005). Current literature on independent commissions focuses on independent bodies which provide a regulatory function. Given the very different environment independent commissions provided for in peace agreements tend to be assign different types of tasks. The commissions can be divided into three categories based on the role which they are assigned: monitoring and verification, implementation, and administrative.

Types of Commissions

Conflict parties in divided societies often have negative past experiences of interacting with each other. They usually do not have a history of cooperation or reciprocal compromise; rather there may have been atrocities committed by both sides and long-standing patterns of discrimination. This creates a deficit of trust. Even where the parties feel that the provisions within a peace accord are preferable to continued violence, they may not trust that the accord will endure, each conflict party not trusting the others to uphold their commitments. This creates a need for a mechanism to oversee and validate the implementation of the peace agreement. Without such a mechanism, conflict parties will not have any confidence that the agreement is being faithfully implemented, and fears about possible renegeing can even lead to parties pre-emptively withdrawing from peace processes. Commissions can be mandated to supervise and authenticate the implementation of the peace agreement in its entirety or be directed to focus on specific elements of the agreement. Those tasked with monitoring ceasefires or verifying weapons decommissioning and demobilization are central. As Walter has argued, when conflict groups disarm or make other concessions, they become more vulnerable – both physically and politically. This increasingly tense situation makes parties more sensitive to real or perceived defections from other actors and makes it increasingly less likely that they will fulfill their obligations. This can lead to conflict parties returning to war even if the agreement has provided a meaningful resolution to the conflict issues (Walter 1999). Commissions monitoring and verifying disarmament, demobilization, or other concessions can help to overcome the potential destabilizing effect of this phase.

Implementation commissions are mandated with applying principles agreed in peace accords; see, for example, the Joint Implementation Committees provided for in the 1999 Memorandum of Agreement between the Government of Lesotho and the Interim Political Authority (IPA) and the 1999 peace agreement between the government and Revolutionary United Front in Sierra Leone. It may be argued that if the terms of the peace agreement were clearly specified, the implementation phase would simply involve the logical and smooth execution of these terms. But implementation of agreements is not usually a straightforward process. This is due to both the role of "constructive ambiguity" in reaching agreement and the fact that the depth and breadth of reforms needed in a post-conflict society mean that it is difficult if not impossible to specify every element in a formal agreement. "Constructive ambiguity" refers to the way in which certain actors may selectively interpret a peace agreement in order to make its provisions more attractive to its constituents. In some cases, the source of ambiguity is deliberate ambiguity in the text; in other cases, the text may be clearer, but actors may still engage in a degree of interpretation. As Bekou (2003) argued, a review of case studies shows that there is a gap between the concessions promised in peace agreements and the smaller steps needed to realize those provisions.

Administrative commissions in post-conflict societies align most closely with the use of independent commissions in non-conflict contexts. They may be assigned tasks which are associated with the peace agreement and associated reforms, such as establishing new electoral registers. Electoral commissions have been provided for in peace agreements in a large number of countries including Bosnia, Liberia, Mozambique, and Togo. However, much of their work is ongoing and mirrors work carried out in other contexts, such as managing elections. While such work is also carried out in non-conflict contexts, this work has a greater tendency to become controversial in the sensitive and divided post-conflict environment, and thus the work of these commissions has a greater potential to become contested than their equivalent in other contexts.

The mandates of independent commissions can be carefully constructed to ensure that they have the necessary powers to manage or overcome specific challenges. It can be difficult to predict what powers a commission will need, so commissions provided for in peace agreements – or shortly before or after – may need to be given latitude in their remits to ensure that they can manage the challenges. While there are dangers that a commission may exceed the expected remit if there is too much latitude, this can be avoided if members have appropriate professional experience. International members who have previous experience working on similar bodies (see below) can be particularly useful in this area drawing on these experiences to appropriately interpret mandates. It may appear easier to wait and set up such bodies on an ad hoc basis. However, the inclusion of these bodies in a peace agreement may be necessary to convince conflict parties to accept an agreement in environments of low trust, and commissions established after a peace agreement may be viewed as less legitimate than those established by agreements that have popular support. For example, in Northern Ireland, the Independent International Commission on Decommissioning in Northern Ireland had to be established before multi-party peace negotiations could even begin in order to provide some assurance to unionist political parties that the Irish Republican Army (IRA) would disarm as part of a peace process. Their establishment ensures conflict parties that the interpretation of ambiguity and the implementation of reforms will be overseen by an even-handed commission. Furthermore, being provided for in widely accepted agreement increases the legitimacy of commissions. It is easier for groups to dismiss bodies set up later if they act in ways which they do not like. For example, also in Northern Ireland, the Independent Monitoring Commission was criticized by Sinn Féin on the basis that it was not provided for in the 1998 peace agreement and as such is not a valid part of the peace process. That is not to say that commissions should not be set up if new needs emerge but rather that commissions set up at the time of agreement are preferable.

International Involvement and Independent Commissions

International involvement in peace agreements is a widespread practice. International organizations, third-party states, or high-profile individuals act in a wide range of roles: from the early stages of the peace process where they may help in negotiating ceasefires to overseeing elections and helping to re-build human and physical infrastructure in the peace-building stage. All three main theories of conflict resolution (consociational and integrative power-sharing and power-dividing) envisage a role for such actors, though they differ as to what this role should be: power-dividers see a limited, transitional role for them; advocates of both consociational and integrative power-sharing embrace them more willingly as facilitators and guarantors of settlements.

Independent commissions provide a vehicle through which international actors can remain involved in peace processes providing important post-agreement support to domestic parties. They allow for the level of international involvement to be adapted depending on need. Newly reached peace agreements are most vulnerable, they cannot rely on historic acceptability, and the lack of trust between local parties may be greatest as the legacy of the conflict is fresh. As trust grows, hybrid commissions provide for an institutionalized process where international actors can gradually withdraw. If the peace process suffers a setback due to a specific incident or a number of events, these mechanisms offer opportunities for international actors to reengage until the situation stabilizes.

External guarantor theory focuses on the role of international actors as verifiers during the implementation stage of a peace process. During the implementation of peace settlements, the international community can act as necessary verifiers of compliance (Walter 1999). Pronouncements by such an actor that one of the conflict parties has violated an agreement will carry significant weight, even without any material sanction. Such claims will be much more difficult for the accused party to dismiss than similar charges levied by domestic competitors. This suggests that international actors should have a strong role to play on independent commissions tasked with monitoring and verification duties.

Implementation bodies can also include international actors. This inclusion may be necessary where the coordination of policy or implementation of agreed reforms has a cross-border element. Neighboring states, regional powers, and other states with particular historical links to conflict parties may be particularly affected by changes instigated; by an agreement for example, where there are refugee flows or issues around diasporas from the conflict parties residing in other states. International members of these bodies can also be a valuable resource, they can be perceived as an honest broker, and can enjoy a high status as a result of personal expertise in a specific area or the leverage which they can exercise due to their home country.

Administrative commissions may also make use of perceived neutrality, expertise, or leverage of international actors. However, the permanent design of these institutions makes it less likely that international actors will be involved in their long-term operation. Both improving domestic circumstances and the wider international system make long-term commitment of international actors to peace processes difficult. Binder's study of the UN Security Council finds that the Council's interventions are directly correlated with the level of humanitarian suffering (Binder 2015). This is very understandable but it also suggests that the international community may turn their attentions to more acute crises and be less willing to intervene in the long term where the acute human suffering has dissipated.

International involvement can also sharpen the traditional criticism of delegated bodies, that they are unelected and unaccountable. Hampson argued that broad international intervention in peace agreements can lack legitimacy and the involved actors may be viewed as acting to progress their own interests in the state or region (Hampson 1997). Internationals may also be viewed as having insufficient understanding of the local circumstances. External involvement in domestic institutions can raise concerns over the legitimacy of internal commission processes, for example, in relation to simple majority voting processes, externals can have equal power to the arguably more legitimate domestic actors. Concern over the legitimacy of including internationals independent commissions is also sharpened if external members are seen as favoring a particular conflict party. Furthermore, excessive reliance on international actors to promote or incentivize domestic actors into arrangements can be indicative of lack of a domestic spirit of cooperation or accommodation (Roeder and Rothchild 2005). Such failures can lead to excessively lengthy international involvement in domestic institutions.

Summary

Independent commissions are mandated to carry out tasks which are central to peace-making, peace-building, and long-term governance. They can carry out monitoring and verification, implementation, or administrative roles. A lack of democratic accountability can raise questions as to the legitimacy of their work. However, in both post-conflict contexts and, more widely, delegation logics and the expertise of members can provide these institutions with legitimacy. Furthermore, the inclusion of representatives of previously conflict parties can ensure that different perspectives are considered in the commissions' work. International actors may also be members of commissions which can provide expertise that may be lacking domestically and allows internationals and local actors to work together to forward certain policies.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Post-conflict Elections
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

References

- Bekoe, D. (2003). Towards a theory of peace agreement implementation: The case of Liberia. Journal of Asian and African Studies, 38(2–3), 256–294.
- Binder, M. (2015). Paths to intervention: What explains the UN's selective response to humanitarian crises? Journal of Peace Research, 52(6), 712–726.
- Hampson, F. (1997). Can peace building work? Cornell International Law Journal, 30(3), 701–716.
- Lijphart, A. (2004). Constitutional design for divided societies. Journal of Democracy, 15(2), 96–109.
- Majone, G. (2001). Nonmajoritarian institutions and the limits of democratic governance: A political transaction-cost approach. Journal of Institutional and Theoretical Economics, 157, 57–78.
- Roeder, P. (2005). Power dividing as an alternative to ethnic power sharing. In P. Roeder & D. Rothchild (Eds.), Sustainable peace, power and democracy after civil wars (pp. 51–82). London: Cornell University Press.
- Roeder, P., & Rothchild, D. (Eds.). (2005). Sustainable peace: Power and democracy after civil wars. London: Cornell University Press.
- Thatcher, M., & Sweet, A. (2002). Theory and practice of delegation to non-majoritarian institutions. West European Politics, 25(1), 1–22.
- Walsh, D. (2015). Northern Ireland and the independent parades commission: Delegation and legitimacy. Irish Political Studies, 30(1), 20–40.
- Walsh, D. (2016). Human needs theory as a basis for the use of consociationalism: The Good Friday Agreement in Northern Ireland. Ethnopolitics, 15(3), 285–302.
- Walter, B. (1999). Designing transitions from civil war: Demobilization, democratization and commitments to peace. International Security, 24(1), 127–155.

Independent Committees

- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements

India

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Indigenous Approaches to Peace

Morgan Brigg¹ and Polly O. Walker²

¹The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

²Baker Institute for Peace and Conflict Studies, Juniata College, Huntingdon, PA, USA

Synonyms

Aboriginal conflict management; Indigenous diplomacies; Indigenous peacemaking

Definition

Indigenous approaches to peace are emplaced and relational processes designed to move challenging and conflictual dynamics toward balance and harmony. They do not often feature in peace and conflict studies scholarship or conflict resolution practice because dominant political systems have actively disavowed Indigenous ways of knowing, being and doing. To engage with Indigenous approaches to peace therefore involves grappling with challenging knowledge politics. Although characterized by remarkable diversity linked with place-based ways of being, Indigenous approaches to peace tend to share similar underlying ontological and epistemological patterns and characteristics. These include networked relationality beyond the human and the pursuit of balance and harmony that nonetheless acknowledges and works with agonism and conflict. Examples of Indigenous conflict management, ranging from inter-person to inter-nation and inter-species processes tend to link personal self-regulation with broader relational-cosmological ordering. Accessing and engaging with Indigenous approaches to peace raises challenging questions about the effect of dominant political orders that peace and conflict studies is only beginning to recognize.

Introduction

Indigenous peacemaking continues to guide Indigenous individuals, communities, and nations despite often severe colonial impacts and the ongoing challenges of living amid dominant political orders. Many Indigenous nations have maintained their traditional peacemaking and conflict management processes in the face of oppression (see Indigenous Peacemaking Initiative, n.d.; Bluehouse & Zion, 1993; Graham, Brigg & Walker, 2010). Others are recuperating and revitalizing culturally based approaches to peace, drawing on traditional values and teachings to create robust, sustainable processes designed to address contemporary challenges (see Brigg et al., 2017; Huber, 1993; Vaai, 2019; Walker, 2013). Indigenous approaches to peace are remarkably diverse because context and experience are crucial to Indigenous ways of knowing, being, and doing. There are thousands of Indigenous peacemaking processes and techniques around the world, with no pan-Indigenous paradigm. Sustaining this multiplicity is central to who Indigenous people are.

Peace and conflict studies scholarship seldom engages Indigenous approaches to peace because Indigenous peoples and their ways of knowing, being, and doing have been disavowed in the establishment and consolidation of dominant political orders. This produces worldview blindness and ethnocentrism that generates risks of assimilation and tokenism in current engagements with Indigenous peacemaking. Respectful and ethical engagement with Indigenous approaches to peace is not a matter of simply adding to the peace and conflict studies field, incorporating elements of Indigenous peacemaking, or revealing what may be seen as “ancient wisdoms”. These moves commit epistemological violence by attempting to understand Indigenous approaches or incorporate them within the terms of the dominant society. Adequately considering Indigenous approaches to peace requires engaging with colonialism, the politics of knowing in colonized contexts, and with how Indigenous lives are entangled with the nation-state and the accompanying dominant ways of conceptualizing peace and addressing conflict. This is a significant challenge that the peace and conflict studies field has only begun to recognize alongside recent efforts to engage with cultural difference (see, e.g., Väyrynen, 2001; Brigg, 2010; Avruch Culture and Conflict Resolution).

Given the challenges of colonial impacts, diversity, and the politics of knowledge, this entry is invariably perspectival and partial. The authors write, respectively, from Australia and Turtle Island (North America). More specifically, the authors, one of settler-descent and the other of Tsalagi descent, do not have the authority to speak that is usually claimed in dominant social science. It follows that this entry resists social science demands for definitive and generalizable knowledge. Instead, it aims to evoke rather than specify, and to suggest rather than define.

Despite remarkable diversity, Indigenous peoples tend to share a strong orientation to land and place, often as the first peoples of a place and as people tightly bound with it. This makes it possible for this entry to discuss Indigenous approaches to peace as broadly informed by thoroughgoing relationalism that binds humans with diverse beings, entities, and forces that constitute the cosmos. The entry then discusses the central influence of the pursuit of balance and harmony in Indigenous approaches to peace. Finally, it provides some exemplification of the operation of Indigenous approaches. The entry also considers how peace and conflict studies might face the challenges of engaging with Indigenous approaches, including by addressing the politics of knowledge through epistemological pluralism.

Relationalism

Indigenous relationalism arises out of the emplacement of human beings in a living cosmos. The origin and development of human life tends to be conceptualized through origin narratives in which diverse beings and entities (including humans) form and come into existence. Examples include “Sky Woman and Turtle” (Kimmerer, 2020) in the North American context and many “Dreamings” in the Australian context (Stanner, 1979 pp 23–40). Ontogeny is thus spiritual and existential. Persons are not primarily separate individuals who have relations with others, but relational beings who are intrinsically networked and called into existence with others. One result is that people tend to be intimately and inextricably connected with ancestors, other beings, and landscapes. Humans are thus always related in Indigenous cosmologies and are sometimes considered to be the younger, less experienced, and less knowledgeable relations of others. Becoming a good relation worthy of one’s ancestors, and becoming an ancestor oneself, requires responsible and reciprocal behaviors with others and the cosmos.

The possibility and maintenance of order – cosmological, social, and political – lies in attending carefully and persistently to the foregoing relations, including to accompanying patterns, contingencies, and ethical obligations. Peace is often described as a form of balance and harmony among all the relations that make up the cosmos (see Belt, 2009; Bluehouse & Zion, 1993). The patterning and durability of certain sets of relations – including those around trade, marriage, and kinship and ceremonial responsibilities – serve as guidelines for peaceful interaction among groups, and these may be more or less didactic or strict depending upon the group. However, these patterns tend not to be fixed or inflexible. While certain realms such as the cosmic or ancestral time may be seen as enduring and unchanging, these are also periodically renewed and recast in the present (LittleBear, 2000). The idea of any people or set of relations having a fixed or unchanging character tends not to resonate among Indigenous peoples. One result is that the balance and harmony sought is not static but involves constant movement, seeking harmony amid the flux of the cosmos (LittleBear, 2000; Cajete, 2000) and the natural tensions of social existence.

Disrespect of the mutually recognized patterns and relations that are deemed necessary for balanced life is seen as a key underlying cause of conflict. Efforts to maintain, repair or renew these relations – whether through the advice and direction of senior knowledge holders, interactive processes from discussions to ceremonies, or personal reflection and self-regulation – are integral to managing conflict and building peace. It is impossible to precisely specify the principles that inform diverse Indigenous peoples’ pursuit of peace, but in broad terms one key principle may be approximated as the seeking of balance and harmony among diverse beings, entities, and forces that constitute the cosmos.

Balance and Harmony

The multiple connections borne of relationalism bring into play concepts of balance and harmony, yet this does not indicate a state of perfection devoid of conflict. The pursuit of balance and harmony must not be conflated with their presence. Conflict is assumed to be a natural part of the human condition, and people therefore seek balance and harmony on an ongoing or processual basis rather than in pursuit of an end state. Constant movement toward balance can be seen in Navajo peacemaking ceremonies, designed to support “hozho,” a harmony in which “everything is in its proper place, functioning well with everything else” (Yazzie, 2004, p. 130). Aboriginal Australian philosophy also emphasizes balance, with one formulation being that all perspectives are “valid and reasonable,” although not equal in weight or authority, with balance at times being restored through performatively managing contested viewpoints (Graham, Brigg & Walker, 2010, p 82). In Aboriginal Australian conflict management balance does not require emotional restraint, but rather encourages people to “be real” in expressing their emotions so that balance can be restored and conflict managed in a sustainable manner.

In dealing with the complexity and challenge of seeking balance in networked relationalism, people may draw on humor to remind individuals to find ways of seeking balance amid unexpected challenges. Native peoples in Turtle Island draw on trickster stories and performances in which the trickster figure behaves in ways that are unsanctioned, representing the flux of the cosmos, and reminding people that creative and flexible responses are often required to restore balance within the expansive network of relationships. Humor may also be used to balance heaviness and grief occasioned by conflict.

Balance is also established, calibrated, and restored by being emplaced in relationships of respect and reciprocity with the natural and spiritual worlds. Being emplaced diminishes human concerns of being isolated or estranged (Graham, 1999). People do not always behave in ways that demonstrate respect or support reciprocity, thus generating imbalances, but by engaging respectfully within an emplaced network of relationships, balance can be restored. Indigenous peacemaking is founded in a balance that supports both physical and mental health. Related processes include participants dancing, singing, or engaging in other performative rituals that extend beyond those physically present, including honored elders who have died, with many Indigenous forms of peacemaking beginning by ritually calling in the ancestors.

Seeking Relational Peace

Pursuing relational balance and harmony takes a wide range of forms, though these are less institutionalized and formalized than dominant peace and conflict studies tends to expect. Because people are already-social and relational beings who exercise personal autonomy vis-a-vis others and the relational systems they inhabit, there is no need for a centralized state or authority structure to direct conflict management. Persons and groups may be set against others in conflict situations, but cross-cutting or connecting ties are typically also accessible. Because persons inhabit a relational and relatively non-hierarchical cosmos, they are either already their own representatives or have very direct access to political participation through kinship or similar networks for the purposes of conflict management. This does not imply that people are equal. Individuals are differentially positioned – most commonly by age, gender, skill, and experience – both as conflict protagonists and as those who might assist with conflict management and processing.

Conflicts may be processed through particular institutionalized processes such as those of the “Great Law of Peace” of the Haudenosaunee Confederacy (Williams, 2018) on Turtle Island or the Jardiwarnpa fire ceremonies in Aboriginal Australia (Curran, 2019; Landers & Perkins, 1993). Yet ceremonies typically have multiple purposes so rather than being dedicated solely to conflict resolution among protagonists they may also serve to reopen or restore relations more broadly. Leaders, elders, or kinship-based senior people often have specific roles in such processes, yet individuals are also expected to self-regulate and self-manage in ways that will help to restore balance, much as they are expected to do to manage conflict more generally in the contexts of the suggestions, directions, or counsel of elders or kin. The relatively non-hierarchical nature of Indigenous political life enables extensive participation and deliberation in the pursuit of balance in Indigenous conflict management processes but achieving a balanced consensus or compromise can be tense, frustrating, agonistic, hostile, and time-consuming. There tends to be no expectation that coming to a decision or resolution should be subject to a timetable or to other expectations such as those of the more powerful players.

While Indigenous approaches to ordering and peace are emplaced, a related key feature – the place of other species and the world – also means that they are expansive. In Aboriginal Australia other species are totemic ancestors that are routinely represented and manifest in ceremonial processes that “travel” across the continent. In Turtle Island (North America), many Plains Native Nations refer to horses as The Great Horse Nation (West, 2006), while Lakota and other Native Nations acknowledge the status of the Buffalo Nation (Eiring, 2020) and Star Nation (Howe, cited in, Lockett, 2018) to reference relations throughout the universe. These relations create expansive networks, including those mobilized in The Buffalo Treaty, an intertribal alliance that aims to restore bison to 6.3 million acres of tribal and non-tribal lands on lands crossed by the United States/Canadian border (The Buffalo Treaty, n.d.).

Such expansiveness means that Indigenous approaches to peace are not only for use by and among Indigenous peoples. Indigenous peoples have routinely sought to restore balance in relationships with colonizers. Aboriginal people have revealed sacred objects to settlers and opened conflict resolution ceremonies to them to invite settler responsibility and rebalance relationships with settlers (Berndt, 1962, Brigg & Tonnaer, 2008). The Buffalo Treaty involves settlers and government officials in attempts to redress the previous attempted annihilation of bison by the United States government and settlers (The Buffalo: A Treaty, n.d.). And Nimipu leaders see the restoration of “the way of the horse” to their people as a significant aspect of the conflict transformation that has occurred over an extended period between the Nimipu, the United States Army, and settler descendants following the massacre of Nimipu horses at the end of the War of 1877 (Winfried Scott, Nimipu & Horace Axtell, Nimipu, personal communication [Walker] 2009).

Even though Indigenous peoples live amid asymmetric relations of dominance beset with worldview blindness and ethnocentrism that risk assimilation and tokenism in engagements with Indigenous peacemaking, there are options for engaging appropriately and respectfully with Indigenous approaches to peace. One possibility is to develop collaborations of integrity (Maryboy et al., 2012) that incorporate “two way seeing” (Lee, 2021), including by re-centering previously disavowed Indigenous epistemologies. Two way seeing does not attempt to blend different approaches together, a practice that has often proceeded at the expense of Indigenous ways of knowing. It pursues an active engagement with both ways of knowing, engaging resonances, and grappling with dissonances, thus creating a “mutualism of knowledge” (Kimmerer, 2020). This is a positive process that pursues collaboration while respecting difference. In the idiom of some Aboriginal Australian thinkers, it is “Together, but not mixed up” (Miyarrka Media, 2019, p.54).

There is somewhat unexpected evidence for the possibility of two way seeing on the colonial frontier. Before the marginalization and disavowal of Indigenous approaches to peace in Turtle Island and Aboriginal Australia through military domination, colonists sometimes engaged with and made use of Indigenous approaches to conflict and diplomacy in order to navigate relationships. When the balance of power shifted in favor of colonists, settlers forced Indigenous peoples to engage in Western style political ordering and power relations, including making many Indigenous ceremonial peacemaking processes illegal. This exacerbated worldview blindness that has impacted knowledge politics and settler understanding of Indigenous peacemaking. Indigenous peoples have meanwhile held open the possibility for engaging Indigenous approaches to peace amid colonial domination. Possibilities are also suggested by more recent openings to engage in the peace and conflict studies field. The United Nations Guidance for Effective Mediation (2012), for instance, suggests drawing on “indigenous forms of conflict management and dispute resolution.”

Summary

Colonialism and the location of Indigenous peoples within dominant political orders has damaged many Indigenous peacemaking processes. These same dynamics have gravely compromised the scope for expressing the ideas underpinning and recuperating Indigenous approaches to peace. Indigenous peoples are nonetheless sustaining and revitalizing Indigenous approaches and grappling with the accompanying tensions and dilemmas.

Indigenous approaches to peace connect persons and their conduct with socio-relational processes that link humans with diverse beings, entities, and forces in the cosmos. Indigenous conflict resolution and diplomacy is thus simultaneously personal, locally grounded, and cosmologically expansive. The connections that are forged are enduring yet flexible; they are bound with place(s) and the time of ancestors, and yet persons are responsible for how they interpret and enact the relational requirements of existence in the present. They may be mobilized in conflict management through the guidance of an Elder or in conflict resolution ceremony, but it is persons who are responsible for their conduct and moving relations toward harmony and balance.

Western conflict resolution has until recently tended to either participate in a wider colonial disavowal of Indigenous approaches or their selectively appropriation as inspiration for developing alternatives or modifications to its own practice. These moves perpetuate worldview blindness and ethnocentrism or risk assimilation and tokenism. Engaging with Indigenous approaches to peace requires facing and dealing with these historical tendencies: the challenging politics of knowledge accompanying Indigenous approaches to peace cannot be avoided.

Despite the challenges of engaging ethically with Indigenous peoples and their approaches to peace, there are ways forward. There are sound foundations and impetus for engaging with Indigenous approaches to peace if peace and conflict studies scholars and practitioners are interested and willing to engage in epistemologically pluralistic processes.

Cross-References

► Culture and Conflict Resolution

References

- Belt, T. (2009). Tohi: The Cherokee concept of well-being. In L. J. Leffler (Ed.), Under the Rattlesnake: Cherokee health and resiliency (pp. 9–22). Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama.
- Berndt, R. M. (1962). An adjustment movement in Arnhem Land, Northern Territory of Australia. Mouton.
- Bloch, L. J. (2019). Past as prophecy: Indigenous diplomacies beyond liberal settler regimes of recognition, as told in shell. Religions, 10(9), 2–25.
- Bluehouse, P., & Zion, J. W. (1993). Hozhooji Naut'aanii: The Navajo justice and harmony ceremony. Mediation Quarterly, 10(4), 327–337.
- Brigg, M. (2010). Culture: Challenges and possibilities. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 329–346). Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brigg, M., & Tonnaer, A. (2008). Mawul Rom project: Openness, obligation and reconciliation. Australian Aboriginal Studies, 2008(2), 3–15.
- Brigg, M., Memmott, P., Venables, P., & Zondag, B. (2017). Gununa peacemaking: informalism, cultural difference and contemporary Indigenous conflict management. Social and Legal Studies, 27(3), 345–366.
- Cajete, G. (2000) Native science: Natural laws of interdependence. Clear Light Publishers.
- Curran, G. (2019). 'Waiting for Jardiwanpa': history and mediation in Warlpiri Fire ceremonies. Oceania, 89(1), 20–35.
- Eiring, Z. (2020). Picturing the Buffalo nation through words. Intertribal Buffalo Council. <https://itbcbuffalonation.org/blog/picturing-the-buffalo-nation-through-words/>
- Graham, M. (1999). 'Some thoughts about the philosophical underpinnings of aboriginal worldviews. Environment, Culture, Religion, 3(2), 105–118.
- Graham, M., Brigg, M., & Walker, P. (2010). Managing conflict through place and relatedness. In M. Brigg & R. Bleiker (Eds.), Mediating across difference: Indigenous, oceanic and asian approaches to conflict resolution (pp. 73–99). University of Hawaii Press.
- Huber, M. (1993). Mediation around the Medicine Wheel. Mediation Quarterly, 10(4), 355–365.
- Indigenous Peacemaking Initiative (n.d.). Retrieved June 22, 2021 from <https://peacemaking.narf.org/>
- Kimmerer, R. W. (2013). Braiding sweetgrass: Indigenous wisdom, scientific knowledge and the teachings of plants. Milkweed Editions.
- Kimmerer, R. (2020). The fortress, the river and the garden: A new metaphor (or symbiosis between indigenous and scientific knowledges. (Webinar) IEI Series, A sense of place: Indigenous perspectives of land and sky. Retrieved Feb. 7, 2021, from <http://indigenouseducation.org/multimedia/>
- Landers, N., & Perkins, R. (1993). Jardiwanpa: a Warlpiri fire ceremony [1 videocassette (VHS) (56 min.):]. Sydney: SBS.
- Lee, A. (2021). "Two-eyed seeing: Navajo (Dine) indigenous astronomy & NASA moon to mars". (Webinar). Native skywatchers series. <https://nativeskywatchers.com>
- Little Bear, L. (2000). Foreword. In: G. Cajete (Ed.), Native science: Natural laws of interdependence. Clear Light Publishers.
- Lockett, C. (2018). Lakota star knowledge milky way spirit path, SDPB Radio Fresh Air. <https://listen.sdpb.org/post/lakota-star-knowledge-milky-way-spirit-path>
- Maryboy, N., Begay, D., Peticolas, L., Stein, J., & Valdez, S. (2012). The cosmic serpent: Bridging native ways of knowing and western science in museum settings. IEI Publications.
- Maryboy, N., Begay, D., & Nichol. (2020). Paradox and transformation. International Journal of Applied Science and Sustainable Development, 2(1), 15–24.

- Miyaruka Media. (2019). Phone & spear: A Yuta anthropology. Goldsmiths Press.
- Stanner, W. E. H. (1979). White man got no dreaming: essays, 1938–1973. Australian National University Press.
- The Buffalo: A Treaty of Cooperation, Renewal and Restoration. (n.d.) The treaty. Retrieved June 15, 2021, from <https://www.buffalotreaty.com/treaty>
- United Nations. (2012). United Nations guidance for effective mediation. Retrieved from <https://peacemaker.un.org/guidance-effective-mediation>
- Vaai, U. L. (October, 2019). “We are therefore we live”. Pacific eco-relational spirituality and changing the climate change story. Policy Brief 56. Toda Peace Institute.
- Väyrynen, T. (2001). Culture and International Conflict Resolution. Manchester University Press.
- Walker, P. (2013). Storytelling: Building on indigenous knowledge to enhance Ni-Vanuatu Mediative Capacity. Conflict Resolution Quarterly Special Issue: Colloquy on Indigenous and Local Conflict Resolution Processes, 30(3), 309–328.
- West, R. W. (2006). Introduction. In G. P. Horse Capture & E. H. M. Horses (Eds.), Song of the horse nation: The horse in native American cultures (pp. 5–6). National Museum of the American Indian, Smithsonian Institution.
- Williams, K. P. (2018). Kayanerenkó:wa: The great law of peace. University of Manitoba Press.
- Yazzie, R. (2004). Navajo peacemaking and intercultural dispute resolution. In C. Bell & D. Kahane (Eds.), Intercultural dispute resolution in Aboriginal contexts (pp. 107–115).

Indigenous conflict resolution

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

Indigenous Diplomacies

- ▶ Indigenous Approaches to Peace

Indigenous Peacemaking

- ▶ Indigenous Approaches to Peace

Infrastructures for Conflict Transformation

- ▶ Peace Infrastructures

Infrastructures for Peace

- ▶ Peace Infrastructures

Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Cedric de Coning
Norwegian Institute of International Affairs, Oslo, Norway

Synonyms

Complexity; Complex adaptive systems; Conflict resolution; Peacebuilding; Emergence; Self-organization; Adaptation; Uncertainty; Resilience

Description

We often hear it said that a particular conflict is complex or that conflict resolution and peacebuilding are a complex undertaking. Beyond this commonsense use of the term, complexity theory, applied to the social world, can offer insights about social behavior and relations that are highly relevant for peace and conflict studies. Complexity theory offers a theoretical framework helpful for understanding how complex social systems can prevent, manage, transform, or recover from violent conflict. Insights from complexity theory about how best to influence the behavior of complex systems, how such systems respond to pressure, and how to avoid unintended consequences should thus be valuable for peace and conflict studies.

Introduction

The use of complexity theory is growing in political science and international relations (Axelrod 1997; Rosenau 1990; Jervis 1997; Kavalski 2015). It has had a faster uptake in related fields such as development studies (Rihani 2002; Jones 2008; Ramalingam 2013), and it is increasingly applied to international conflict resolution and peace and conflict studies (Hendrick 2009; Körppen et al. 2011; Millar 2019). Apart from those that consciously make use of complexity theory, many others have been influenced by the premises and insights derived from the study of complexity. These influences can be traced, among others, by the contagion throughout the social sciences of many of the key concepts of complexity such as feedback, bifurcations, self-organization, and emergence.

Peace and conflict studies are ultimately about influencing the behavior of social systems that have been or are at risk of being affected by violent conflict. A society is managing to self-sustain peace when its social institutions are able to ensure that political differences are managed peacefully and that no significant social or political group uses violence to achieve its ends (Caplan 2019, p. 22). Peace and conflict studies want to assist societies to prevent and mitigate the risk of violent conflict. When violent conflict has erupted, the United Nations or others may intervene through stabilization or peacekeeping operations that attempt to influence the behavior of those opting to use violence through persuasion, inducement, and coercion (Howard 2019). This can, however, at best only serve as a short-term alleviation of the problem. For peace to be self-sustainable, the society needs to have sufficiently strong social institutions to identify, channel, and manage disputes peacefully.

Insights from complexity theory about how best to influence the behavior of complex systems, how such systems respond to pressure, and how to avoid unintended consequences should thus be valuable for those involved in understanding and undertaking conflict resolution and peacebuilding (Clemens 2001; Hunt 2017; Ramalingam and Jones 2008).

Complexity

Complexity theory describes the characteristics and functions of a particular type of holistic system that has the ability to adapt and that demonstrates emergent properties, including self-organizing behavior. Such systems emerge and are maintained, as a result of the dynamic and non-linear interactions of its elements, based on the information available to them locally, as a result of their interaction with their environment, as well as from the modulated feedback they receive from the other elements in the system (de Coning 2016, p. 168; Cilliers 1998, p. 3).

Societies, or social systems, are empirically complex (Byrne 1998). This means that they demonstrate the ability to adapt and that they have emergent properties, including self-organizing behavior (Kaufmann 2013). As social systems are highly dynamic, non-linear, and emergent, it is not possible to find general laws or rules that will help us predict with certainty, how a particular society or community will behave (Cilliers 2002). We cannot undertake a project, for example, a reconciliation initiative in Somalia, and predict with any certainty what the outcome will be. Nor can we use a model that was assessed to have performed well elsewhere, for instance, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission in South Africa and expect that it will have the same effect in another context, or even in the same country, but in a different context.

This uncertainty is an intrinsic quality of complex systems, not a result of imperfect knowledge or inadequate analysis, planning, or implementation. Recognizing this uncertainty when attempting to influence complex social systems has significant implications for the way we think about peace and conflict and undertake conflict resolution and peacebuilding.

Until fairly recently the peace and conflict community were confident in its ability to diagnose the problems affecting a society emerging from conflict and to prescribe the steps such a society needed to take to achieve peace (World Bank 2011). The outcome was believed to be more or less guaranteed if the design was followed, and uncertainty was seen as a risk that could be managed with good planning (Eriksen 2009, p. 662). Complexity provides us with the theoretical framework for understanding the hubris of these assumptions. Recognizing uncertainty as a starting point is what Barnett refers to as cultivating “a spirit of epistemological uncertainty” (quoted in Benner et al. 2011, p. 225). Hughes (2012, p. 116) specifically applies it to the peace and conflict context and argues that “an explicit, reflexive awareness of the incompleteness of our understanding is (...) vital so that decisions are taken with a large degree of caution (and humility) while at the same time demanding that we think through the possible ramifications.”

Peace, Complexity, and Epistemology

One of the primary insights from complexity is thus the recognition that our ability to gain knowledge of the complex social systems we are dealing with is inherently limited (Byrne 1998). Insights from complexity indicate that the study of complex systems may improve our understanding of social systems but cannot help us to predict or control the behavior of a specific complex system (Cilliers 2002). Complexity reminds us that any insights or knowledge we may have gained about any given complex system is provisional, because the non-linear and highly dynamical nature of complex systems implies that the system will continue to change in unpredictable ways.

In hindsight it may be possible to connect the dots; however, it remains impossible to predict future events, even if the circumstances appear similar to others already encountered, because complex systems are non-linear and dynamic (Cilliers 1998). In other words, causality can be traced looking back, but it cannot be used to project forward into, or to predict, the future – at least not beyond a very short horizon. Complexity does not generate definitive answers to policy problems. In fact, it clarifies why, in the context of complex phenomena, the search for definitive answers and the pursuit of imagined definitive solutions are flawed. Coleman (2004, p. 226) notes that one contribution of a complex systems approach is “that it shifts our understanding away from static, simplified views of conflict” and helps us to appreciate the “complex, multilevel, dynamic, and cyclical nature of these phenomena.”

It is not just the conflict systems that are complex; the international peacebuilding instruments share the same messy characteristics (de Coning 2016). It needs to be recognized that the international peacebuilding system does not have a superior claim to knowledge about managing specific transitions. There are no off-the-shelf solutions, and neither is there a single theory of change or model of state transformation, such as the liberal peace model, that can claim universal applicability. Complexity reminds us to be skeptical of results and findings, regardless of the method used to obtain them, because all methods are limited when considering highly dynamic and non-linear phenomena (Cilliers 1998).

Insights from complexity suggest that one should not see peace as a problem to be solved. Peace does not, in any given context, have a stopping rule. There is no one right or wrong peace. Instead, from a complex systems perspective, peace is emergent and thus has to be context specific. Making choices about a “good enough” peace and determining whether specific policy choices have resulted in a better or worse outcome can thus ultimately only be done by those embedded in a given context. From the perspective of a particular peacebuilding agent, one can perhaps talk about an undesirable state based on the negative impact such a state is perceived to have on, for instance, a society or parts of that society. One can also talk about better or worse approaches, i.e., a scale of policy responses that range from having improved the situation from the perspective of what the policy set out to achieve on the one end of the scale, to policy approaches that made things worse, on the other. In all these cases, it will be important to consider who the agents that make these decisions are, and especially whether such judgments are made by the societies themselves, or by others on their behalf. The overall point, however, is that when it comes to complex social conflicts, one cannot talk about problems and solutions as if there is a right, correct, or best solution for a problem that is just waiting to be discovered (Brusset et al. 2016).

Peace, Complexity, and Practice

Peacebuilding is essentially about stimulating and facilitating the capacity of societies to self-organize. Self-organization in this context refers to the various processes and mechanisms a society makes use of to manage its own peace consolidation process, i.e., the overall ability to manage its own tensions, pressures, disputes, crises, and shocks without relapsing into violent conflict (de Coning 2016). The robustness and resilience of the self-organizing capacity of a society determine the extent to which it can withstand pressures and shocks that risk a (re)lapse into violent conflict. Peacebuilding should thus be about safeguarding, stimulating, facilitating, and creating the space for societies to develop robust and resilient capacities for self-organization (de Coning 2018).

International peacebuilding interventions should provide security guarantees and maintain the outer parameters of acceptable state behavior in the international system, and they should stimulate, facilitate, and create the space for the emergence of robust and resilient self-organized systems. However, international peacebuilding interventions should not interfere in the local social process with the goal of engineering a specific outcome. Trying to control the outcome will, in all probability, produce the opposite of what peacebuilding aims to achieve; it will generate ongoing instability, and dependence, and it will undermine self-sustainability (de Coning 2016).

Many international peacebuilding interventions to date have made the mistake of interfering so much that they ended up undermining the ability of the local society to self-organize. The key to successful peacebuilding thus lies in finding the appropriate balance between international support and local ownership.

Local ownership cannot be reduced to a type of hybridity where the international community gives some space to the local society to add local flavor to an internationally-designed model. Local ownership is not power, authority, and legitimacy given by international peacebuilders to the local society (Donais 2012). Local ownership is the recognition that peace can only be achieved if it is emergent from the local society. For peace to be self-sustainable, it has to be home-grown. Local ownership, therefore, is an essential precursor for self-sustainable peace.

The role of international peacebuilders needs to be negotiated in every specific case to suit that particular context. They can have almost no role, as in South Africa's transition, a minimum role, such as in Rwanda or Ethiopia, or a significant role, such as in Liberia or South Sudan, but they cannot have a dominant role, such as in Afghanistan and Iraq, because that is incompatible with self-sustainable peace.

Hybridity may thus be reframed to refer to the role that would be appropriate for the international community to have in any given peacebuilding process. Local ownership needs to be understood as a necessary, but not necessarily a sufficient, condition for self-sustainable peace. In some cases, the assistance of the international community may be needed. The critical difference between this approach to hybridity and the approach most generally associated with hybridity (Mac Ginty 2011; Richmond 2011) is that it is not the degree of local ownership that is regarded as the variable that defines the degree of hybridity in a given case but rather the level of international interference.

There may be cases where external parties have such a strong interest in seeing a particular norm adhered to, or a particular state of affairs maintained, that they are willing to sacrifice the goal of self-sustainability and accept the cost of continued interference. However, such a type of intervention could not be categorized as peacebuilding, even though, for political reasons of legitimacy and credibility, the countries involved may choose to frame it as “peacebuilding” and may include references to “self-sustainability” in their stated goals. One thus needs to draw a distinction in some cases between peacebuilding rhetoric aimed at creating a legitimizing narrative for an intervention that is aimed at norm enforcement, or that may pursue some other overriding national interest, and peacebuilding interventions that genuinely pursue self-sustainable peace consolidation.

In addition, there may, of course, be exceptional situations where the international community chooses to intervene against the wishes of some parts of the local society in order to stop or prevent genocide, severe abuse of human rights, or war crimes, such as was recently the case in Darfur, Libya, and Cote d’Ivoire. These exceptional powers are provided for under the enforcement articles of Chapter VII of the UN Charter. The interventions that flow from such authority are not peacebuilding interventions but are aimed at the protection of civilians, the atrocity prevention, and the stabilization of affected societies. However, once such situations have been sufficiently pacified, they typically change into a new phase where self-sustainable peace consolidation becomes the new goal of the operation, and when this happens, there has to be a significant shift in the ownership of the process from the international to the local for it to be successful.

The essential difference between the complex systems approach and a determined-design approach like the liberal peace model is that, under the latter, the solution is understood to come from the outside. The agency to solve the problem resides in the international capacity to assess the situation and to design a solution and to then undertake an intervention where the solution is applied. The insight from complexity for peace and conflict studies is that, for any society to live sustainably in peace, it needs to generate its own capacity to self-organize. This is a process that can be facilitated and supported by external peacebuilders, but it ultimately has to be a bottom-up and home-grown process. Self-organization cannot be imposed. Any attempt to make a society self-organize will constitute interference and disruption in the system, and the more you intervene, the more you will undermine the process of self-organization (de Coning 2016).

The essential difference between these two approaches is thus the recognition that self-sustainable peace is directly linked to, and influenced by, the extent to which a society has the capacity, and space, to self-organize. For peace consolidation to be self-sustainable, it has to be the result of a home-grown, bottom-up, and context-specific process. In this understanding, the art of peacebuilding lies in pursuing the appropriate balance between international support and home-grown context-specific solutions. The international community has, to date, failed to find this balance. In the process, many peacebuilders have contributed to the very weaknesses and fragilities in complex social systems that they intended to address.

Peace, Complexity, and Ethics

Our understanding of how complex systems function has important ethical implications for interventions in social systems. Complexity holds that we cannot predict the future and cannot control future behavior, but it also argues that this does not mean that we are somehow powerless or without agency. Woermann (2010, p. 121) explains that a complexity approach implies a shift from trying to discover “the Truth” about given situations, to a process of making choices and developing strategies for living and acting, and for dealing with the often-unexpected outcomes of these strategies. An uncertain future can be meaningfully anticipated, influenced, adapted to, and engaged, but such engagement needs to be informed by an awareness of the limits of anyone’s ability to ultimately fully know complex systems, and that awareness has important implications for the ethical status of interventions into such systems.

No party can claim moral superiority based on predetermined models or lessons learned elsewhere, nor can anyone hide behind ignorance, because it is known that complex systems are non-linear and dynamic. Therefore, peacebuilders need to be careful, cautious, and self-critical when considering and reflecting on the choices they make, because their actions may have negative consequences for the people affected by those decisions and actions (Aoi et al. 2007).

The dynamic and non-linear nature of complex systems implies that competing theories of change need to be contextualized before their validity and applicability can be judged. Choices will thus have to be made by taking a range of factors into account and the selection of a given approach ultimately would need to be a local and context-specific informed choice.

It is the local societies who have to live with the consequences of peacebuilding operations, who have to pay the cost of any lapses into violent conflict, and who are best positioned to make such judgments. They should thus have the ultimate right to make decisions about their own future. Rights also imply responsibility, but local societies can only have that responsibility if they have agency over the outcome. The international community cannot expect a local society to take responsibility for the peacebuilding process when they continue to insist on a predetermined end state. Local ownership implies taking ethical responsibility for the process and its results and thus implies that the international community must be willing to give up control over the outcome of the process.

The acknowledgment that the decisions made when choosing a given peacebuilding approach are the product of a deliberate choice, as opposed to a choice based on a proven optimal model, represents a significant shift in locating ethical responsibility for the outcomes of a peacebuilding intervention squarely with those exercising such a choice (de Coning 2018). The ethical responsibility thus clearly shifts from the perceived predetermined virtue of a proven model or theory of choice to those that have the agency to choose which model or theory of change will be applied in a given context.

However, any local society is also part of the international system and, as such, cannot exist in isolation. While the local society has the right and responsibility to control its future, it should also be recognized that their freedom to choose future paths is constrained by the international parameters set for responsible behavior in the international system. The international system will act to prevent, and may even use force to stop, mass abuse of human rights, genocide, and war crimes.

The implications are that the international peacebuilding agents have a role in assisting local societies to develop the capacity to become responsible members of the international community, but this role does not give them the agency to make decisions on behalf of the local society. The exception would be those extraordinary circumstances where local behavior crosses the parameters set for acceptable behavior in the international system, i.e., in cases where genocide, severe abuses of human rights, or war crimes result in an internationally sanctioned intervention to protect civilians. However, when such a situation has been sufficiently stabilized and the focus shifts to self-sustainable peace consolidation, the agency has to shift again to the local.

The notion of local ownership raises several valid concerns, such as that local societies are not necessarily well informed about their options and that there seem to be persistent and challenging questions about who can legitimately speak on behalf of these local societies (Donais 2012). These are legitimate concerns that need to be addressed, but the fact that it has been challenging to operationalize local ownership does not imply that the principle lacks an ethical foundation. The soundness of the principle, now also supported by the perspective of a complexity theory-informed analysis, should inspire policymakers and practitioners to find new ways of engaging with, empowering, and giving space to local societies, so as to give practical meaning to the notion of local ownership.

This does not exclude international actors from having a role in assisting local societies in understanding their choices and otherwise supporting and facilitating their transition, but it does imply that such actors offering assistance should stop short of taking decisions on behalf of local societies based on superior claims to knowledge about what is in the best interest of those societies. Hence, a much clearer understanding needs to be developed of what are, and are not, appropriate degrees of influence for international peacebuilders and how intrusive peacebuilding should be.

Complexity thus implies that the peacebuilders, local and international, have to take responsibility – ethically – for their choices and actions. Taking responsibility means that peacebuilders need to think through the ethical implications of both their macro-theories of peacebuilding and their specific choices and actions in any given context. They cannot base their decisions on the claimed superiority of one or other theory of change, because no one model, e.g., the liberal peace model, can be held up as inherently superior. They have to understand the choices they make and the potential consequences of their actions for each specific context and take responsibility for them (de Coning 2018).

Adaptive Peacebuilding

Conflict resolution and peacebuilding are delicate processes. There is an inherent tension in the act of promoting a process of self-organization from the outside. Too much external interference will undermine self-organization. From a complexity perspective, one can say that every time an external peacebuilder intervenes to solve a perceived problem in the local system, they interrupt the internal feedback process and thus deny the local system from responding to its own stimuli. The result is a missed opportunity to contribute to the development of self-organization and resilience, and in its place such interruptions build dependency. Each external intervention thus comes at the cost of depriving the local system of an opportunity to learn how to respond to a problem or challenge itself. State and social institutions develop resilience through trial and error over generations. Too much filtering and cushioning slow down and inhibit these processes. Understanding this tension – and the constraints it poses – helps us to understand why many international conflict resolution and peacebuilding interventions have made the mistake of interfering so much that they ended up undermining the ability of the local system to self-organize.

The Adaptive Peacebuilding approach provides us with a methodology for navigating this dilemma. It provides us with a process where peacebuilders, together with the communities and people affected by the conflict, actively engage in a structured process to sustain peace and resolve conflicts by employing an iterative process of collaborative learning and adaptation (de Coning 2018).

The adaptive approach for coping with complexity in conflict resolution and peacebuilding can be summarized in the following six principles of Adaptive Peacebuilding:

- First, the actions taken to influence the sustainability of a specific peace process have to be context- and time-specific, and they have to be emergent from a process that engages the societies themselves.
- Second, Adaptive Peacebuilding is a goal-orientated or problem-solving approach, so it is important to identify, together with the society in question, what the peacebuilding project should aim to achieve.
- Third, Adaptive Peacebuilding is agnostic about how best to pursue its goals, but it does follow a specific methodology – the adaptive approach – that is a participatory process that facilitates the emergence of a goal-orientated outcome.
- Fourth, one half of the key to the adaptive approach methodology is variety; as the outcome is uncertain, one must experiment with a variety of options across a spectrum of probabilities.
- Fifth, the other half is selection; one has to pay close attention to feedback to determine which options have a better effect. Adaptive Peacebuilding requires an active participatory decision-making process that abandons those options that perform poorly or have negative side-effects, while those that show more promise can be further adapted to introduce more variety or can be scaled-up to have a greater impact. At a more strategic level, this implies reviewing assumptions and adapting strategic planning.
- Six, Adaptive Peacebuilding is an iterative process. It is repeated over and over because, in a highly complex context, our assessments are only relevant for a relatively short window before new dynamics come into play.

In the Adaptive Peacebuilding approach, the core activity of a conflict resolution or peacebuilding intervention is one of process facilitation. Conflict resolution and peacebuilding are about stimulating the processes in a society that enable self-organization and that will lead to strengthening the resilience of social institutions that manage internal and external stressors and shocks. It is not possible to direct or control self-organization from the outside; it has to emerge from within. However, conflict resolution and peacebuilding agents can assist a society by facilitating and stimulating the processes that enable self-organization to emerge (de Coning 2016, p. 175).

It is crucial, as captured in the first principle of the Adaptive Peacebuilding approach, that the societies and communities that are intended to benefit from a conflict resolution or peacebuilding intervention are fully involved in all aspects of the initiative. In other words, as highlighted in the 2nd principle of the Adaptive Peacebuilding approach, the affected community should be sufficiently represented in the processes that determine the aims and objectives of the initiative, as well as in all choices related to the analysis, assessment, planning, monitoring of effects, evaluation, and selection processes.

While international or external peacebuilders can influence complex social systems by enabling and stimulating the processes that enable resilience and inclusiveness to emerge, the prominent role of self-organization in complex system dynamics suggests that it is important the affected societies and communities have space and agency to drive their own process (Burns 2007). This is why local adaptation processes are ultimately the critical element for inclusive political settlements to become self-sustainable. Adaptive Peacebuilding cannot be free or distinct from the dynamics of politics or power. The process is not technical or abstract. It is a process that engages with all aspects and elements of societal change that is needed for self-sustainable peace to emerge, and it lends itself to a relational approach that seeks to account for how power is distributed through and within relationships (Day and Hunt 2020).

The Adaptive Peacebuilding approach thus requires a commitment to engage in a structured learning process together with the society or community that has been affected by conflict. This commitment comes at a cost, in terms of investing in the capabilities necessary to enable and facilitate such a collective learning process, in taking the time to engage with communities and other stakeholders, and in making the effort to develop new innovative systems for learning together with communities as the process unfolds.

Complex systems cope with challenges posed by changes in their environment by co-evolving together with their environment in a never-ending process of adaptation (Barber 2011). This iterative adaptive process, captured in the third, fourth, and fifth principles of the Adaptive Peacebuilding approach, utilizes experimentation and feedback to generate knowledge about its environment. This is essentially the way natural selection works in the evolution of complex systems. The two key factors are variation (the fourth principle) and selection (the fifth principle). There needs to be variation, i.e., multiple parallel interventions, and there needs to be a selection process that replicates and multiplies effective interventions and discontinues those that do not have the desired effect.

The analysis-planning-implementation-evaluation-selection project cycle is already well established in the development and peacebuilding communities. However, these communities of practice are not good at generating sufficient variation. They are also notoriously bad at selection based on effect, and they are especially poor at identifying and abandoning underperforming initiatives (Rosén and Haldrup 2013). To remedy these shortcomings, the Adaptive Peacebuilding approach utilizes structured and iterative (the sixth principle) adaptation to help generate institutional learning.

An Adaptive Peacebuilding approach recognizes the role of entropy and cultivates an awareness that those interventions that appear to be effective today will not continue to be so indefinitely. Even successful programs need to be monitored for signals that may indicate that an intervention is no longer having the desired effect or is starting to generate negative side effects. Jervis (1997, p. 6) observes that we often intuitively expect linear relationships. For example, if foreign aid increases economic growth, we tend to expect that more aid should produce greater growth. However, complex systems often display behavior that cannot be understood by extrapolating from the units or their relations, and many of the effects generated are unintended. Non-linearity, in this context, thus refers to behaviors in which the relationships between variables in a complex social system are dynamic and disproportionate (Kiehl 1995). One must thus not only monitor for intended results but also unintended consequences and be ready to take steps to try to deal with the perverse effects that may come about due to an intervention (Aoi et al. 2007).

Summary

The insights from complexity for peace and conflict studies that were introduced in this chapter suggest that the way in which knowledge about any particular complex social system is generated needs to be based on the recognition that such systems are empirically complex and that our ability to fully understand complex systems is thus inherently limited. Peacebuilding itself also needs to be understood as complex and that this implies that we need to recognize that any particular peacebuilding system will be self-organized and emergent. This has implications for how assessments, planning, coordination, leadership, and evaluating specific peacebuilding interventions are undertaken.

Complexity helps us understand how social systems lapse into violent conflict, how they can prevent or recover from conflict, and what can be done to strengthen their resilience. For a peace process to become sustainable, resilient social institutions need to emerge from within, i.e., from the local culture, history, and socioeconomic context. External actors can assist and facilitate this process, but if they interfere too much, they will undermine the self-organizing processes necessary to sustain resilient social institutions.

The most fundamental implication of complexity for how we understand and approach conflict resolution and peacebuilding is the realization that for a peace process to become self-sustainable, a social system needs to develop its own institutions so that it has the resilience to manage its own internal conflicts peacefully. The key to successful conflict resolution and peacebuilding thus lies in finding the appropriate balance between international support and local self-organization, and this will differ from context to context. A complexity-informed approach to peace and conflict studies suggests that those engaged in conflict resolution and peacebuilding limit their efforts to safeguarding, stimulating, facilitating, and creating the space for societies to develop resilient capacities for self-organization.

Adaptive Peacebuilding is an approach that can help to navigate this delicate balance. It is an approach where peacebuilders, together with the communities and people affected by the conflict, actively engage in a structured process to sustain peace by employing an iterative process of learning and adaptation. The Adaptive Peacebuilding approach is aimed at supporting societies to develop the resilience and robustness they need to cope with and adapt to change, by helping them to develop greater levels of complexity in their social institutions.

We have to be sensitive to how complex systems process information, self-organize, and adapt. Adaptive Peacebuilding can assist external peacebuilders to purposefully co-evolve with the systems they are attempting to influence. However, one needs to be very cautious of the assumptions that are made about the framing of borders and boundaries and that the extent to which local societies can be judged to be fully self-organized and self-sustainable in a highly globalized and interconnected world is a matter of degree, rather than of absolute categories.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Peacebuilding

References

- Aoi, C., de Coning, C. H., & Thakur, R. (2007). The unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Axelrod, R. (1997). The complexity of cooperation. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press.
- Barber, O. (2011). Development, complexity and evolution. Online Blog. <http://media.owen.org/Evolution/player.html>. Accessed 14 July 2011.
- Benner, T., Mergenthaler, S., & Rotmann, P. (2011). The new world of UN peace operations: Learning to build peace? Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Brusset, E., de Coning, C. H., & Hughes, B. (2016). Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Burns, D. (2007). Systemic action research: A strategy for whole system change. London: Polity Press.
- Byrne, D. (1998). Complexity theory and the social sciences: An introduction. London: Routledge.
- Caplan, R. (2019). Measuring peace. London: Oxford University Press.
- Cilliers, P. (1998). Complexity and postmodernism: Understanding complex systems. London: Routledge.
- Cilliers, P. (2002). Why we cannot know complex things completely. Emergence, 4(1/2), 77–84.
- Clemens, W. C., Jr. (2001). Complexity theory as a tool for understanding and coping with ethnic conflict and development issues in post-Soviet Eurasia. International Journal of Peace Studies, 6(2), 1–16.
- Coleman, P. (2004). Paradigmatic framing of protracted, intractable conflict: Toward the development of a meta-framework. Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology, 10(3), 197–235.
- Day, A. C., & Hunt, C. T. (2020). UN stabilisation operations and the problem of non-linear change: A relational approach to intervening in governance ecosystems. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 9(1), 2.
- de Coning, C. H. (2016). From peacebuilding to sustaining peace: Implications of complexity for resilience and sustainability. Resilience, 4(3), 166–181.
- de Coning, C. H. (2018). Adaptive peacebuilding. International Affairs, 94(2), 301–317.
- Donais, P. (2012). Peacebuilding and local ownership: Post-conflict consensus-building. New York: Routledge.
- Eriksen, S. (2009). The liberal peace is neither: Peacebuilding, statebuilding and the reproduction of conflict in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. In Lidén, K., Mac Ginty, R., and Richmond, O. P. (Eds.), Liberal peacekeeping reconstructed. Special issue, International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 662.
- Hendrick, D. (2009). Complexity theory and conflict transformation: An exploration of potential and implications (Working paper 17). Bradford: Department of Peace Studies, University of Bradford.
- Howard, L. M. (2019). Power in peacekeeping. Cambridge University Press.
- Hughes, B. (2012). Peace operations and the political: A pacific reminder of what really matters. Journal of International Peace Operations, 16(1–2), 99–118.
- Hunt, C. T. (2017). All necessary means to what ends? the unintended consequences of the ‘robust turn’ in UN peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 24(1), 108–131.
- Jervis, R. (1997). System effects: Complexity in political and social life. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Jones, H. (2008). Outcome mapping and complexity. Outcome Mapping Learning Community, Newsletter 2.
- Kaufmann, M. (2013). Emergent self-organisation in emergencies: Resilience rationales in interconnected societies. Resilience, 1(1), 53–68.
- Kavalski, E. (2015). World politics at the edge of chaos: Reflections on complexity and global life. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Kiehl, D. (1995). Chaos theory and disaster response management: Lessons for managing periods of extreme instability. In Koehler G. A. (Ed.), What disaster management can learn from chaos theory? Conference Proceedings, May 18–19.
- Körppen, D., Ropers, N., & Giessmann, H. J. (Eds.). (2011). The non-linearity of peace processes: Theory and practice of systemic conflict transformation. Opladen: Barbara Budrich.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Millar, G. (2019). Toward a trans-scalar peace system: Challenging complex global conflict systems. Peacebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1634866>
- Ramalingam, B. (2013). Aid on the edge of chaos. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ramalingam, B., & Jones, H. (2008). Exploring the science of complexity: Ideas and implications for development and humanitarian efforts (Working paper 285). London: Overseas Development Institute.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). Resistance and the post-liberal peace. In S. P. Campbell, D. Chandler, & M. Sabaratnam (Eds.), A liberal peace? The problems and practices of peacebuilding. London: Zed Books.
- Rihani, S. (2002). Complex systems theory and development practice. London: Zed Books.
- Rosén, F. F., & Haldrup, S. V. (2013). By design or by default: Capacity development in fragile states and the limits of programming. Stability: International Journal of Security & Development, 2(46), 1–8.

Rosenau, J. N. (1990). Turbulence in world politics; a theory of change and continuity. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

Woerman, M. (2010). A complex ethics: Critical complexity, deconstruction, and implications for business ethics, PhD Dissertation. Stellenbosch: University of Stellenbosch.

World Bank. (2011). World development report 2011: Conflict, security, and development. Washington, DC: World Bank.

Institutions

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Instrumentalization of Religion

- ▶ Islam and Peace

Insurgency

- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict

Integrative Negotiation

- ▶ Negotiation

Intentionality

- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences

Interconnection

- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace

Intergovernmental Organizations

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts

International

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY)

- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

International Humanitarian Law

- ▶ Cyber Conflict

International Intervention

- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia

International Interventions

- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions

International Order

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts

George Kyris
University of Birmingham,
Birmingham, UK

Synonyms

Conflicts of de facto states; Conflicts of unrecognized states; Intergovernmental organizations; Regional organizations; Secessionist conflicts; Separatist conflicts; Sovereignty conflicts; Territorial conflicts

Definition/Description

Statehood conflicts are conflicts emanating from incompatible claims to and substantial efforts at statehood over the same territory. The main actors involved are the different claimants to statehood, usually but not always a recognized state and a group that seeks secession from it. While often defined by intractability, typical solutions of such conflicts include forceful or peaceful (re)integration to the parent state or, more rarely, independent statehood. International organizations are usually involved through conflict prevention, management, and resolution and, by doing so, constitute major external actors to such conflicts. Their involvement carries important consequences for statehood conflicts, specifically which statehood claims are supported or not.

Introduction

International organizations matter for statehood conflicts, and statehood conflicts matter for international organizations. Perhaps the clearest way in which organizations are important for this type of conflict is because they often lead international efforts at their management. The other way round, conflicts matter because they pose challenges to international peace and security, whose promotion lies at the heart of the mission of many international organizations. One way in which statehood conflicts are particularly important for international organizations is because they emanate from competition over principles that are fundamental to these bodies, not least sovereignty, territorial integrity, and self-determination. This entry, therefore, is not a holistic account of the role of international organizations in such disputes. Rather, the focus is on how certain statehood-related principles and issues, which are so central to this type of disputes, shape the responses of international organizations. International organizations are hereby understood as including regional organizations (see also Butler 2009; Edwards and DiCicco 2018). For illustration purposes, this entry concentrates more on major intergovernmental organizations like the United Nations (UN), the EU, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE), the African Union (AU), and the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) – this approach rests on the assumption that such all-encompassing international organizations based on state membership (such as AU for all African states, or the UN for all states) are more useful for reflecting on matters of statehood and conflicts over them (as opposed to more functional/thematic bodies like the World Trade Organization). However, this is not to undermine the significance of nongovernmental organizations for security and for statehood conflicts in particular, as also reflected in the final part of this entry.

The next section offers a reflection on the ways in which international organizations respond via conflict management and resolution, followed by a more detailed discussion of how statehood issues and principles shape those responses: international organizations seem to engage with statebuilding activities in territories whose group is seen as having a right to external self-determination and independence. Oppositely, where international organizations prioritize the sovereignty of a parent state, their engagement seeks to respect this and other associated principles, such as territorial integrity, for example, via reintegration of the independence-seeking group. What is more, issues of statehood, such as territorial control and recognition, also shape the position, strategies, and day-to-day engagement of international organizations. The final section reflects on a series of ideas for further avenues for researching statehood conflicts, including more focus on how the role of international organizations is shaped by external rather than just internal dimensions of statehood, a more extensive investigation of the relationship between international conflict management and resolution and the interrelationship between international governmental and nongovernmental organizations, and, finally, a more in-depth look into methodological challenges and opportunities for researching the role of international organizations in statehood conflicts.

International Organizations and Statehood Conflict

Statehood conflicts are covered elsewhere (“► Statehood Conflicts” section), but as a summary, these are conflicts that arise from the incompatibility of the simultaneous efforts of different groups to claim and pursue statehood over the same territory. Therefore, the main actors involved in these conflicts are the different claimants to statehood, and these are usually a statehood-seeking group and the parent state, which the group tries to separate from, for example, Chechnya seeking to separate from Russia in the 1990s (see, e.g., Hughes 2007) or Tamil Eelam from Sri Lanka (see Welhengama and Pillay 2014). Less often, there are more than two statehood claimants. Also, sometimes conflict occurs between sides that, unlike the parent state, did not enjoy de jure sovereignty over the area before. For example, the early phase of the conflict over Western Sahara involved the Polisario Front, Morocco, and Mauritania competing for territory previously belonging to Spain. Finally, these conflicts are rarely local-only. They involve a variety of regional and international actors – take, for example, the conflict in Eastern Ukraine which involves the separatists in Donetsk and Luhansk and the Ukrainian government locally, Russia and the European Union (EU) more regionally, the USA and NATO more internationally (see, e.g., Maass 2020).

International organizations, often seen as a configuration of the international community (Zaum 2007), have a major role to play in the management of statehood conflicts. Many studies have offered important insights into the management of conflicts including statehood conflicts from international organizations, such as the UN (Thakur 2016), the AU (Badmus 2015), the EU (e.g., Hughes 2010; Whitman and Wolff 2012), the OSCE (Sandole 2007), or the ASEAN (Oishi 2019). Efforts to deal with conflict are hereby categorized into conflict management and resolution. Conflict management has been seen as the effort to contain an existing conflict, when a resolution does not seem probable or eminent (e.g., Butler 2009; Lutmar and Miller 2016), and often includes peacekeeping elements (e.g., Bellamy et al. 2010). Conflict management is conceptualized as including conflict prevention, which refers to efforts to prevent a conflict from re-/occurring (e.g., Zartman 2015) during its early stages or pre-stages. Such a conceptualization reflects similar approaches of international organizations that see conflict prevention in the context of their involvement in already existing but often “frozen” conflicts (see, e.g., UN 2006). Finally, conflict resolution (often also known as conflict settlement or peacemaking) occurs after a conflict has started, and it is the most ambitious of approaches (e.g., Walter 2002; Wallensteen 2015; Ramsbotham et al. 2016). In this sense, mediation can be seen as an extension of peaceful conflict resolution (Greig and Diehl 2013). Peaceful here denotes approaches that are not coercive, unlike, for example, sanctions or interventions. The difference of mediation to negotiations is that the former suggests the presence of a third party, which often is an international organization.

The Peace and Security Council (PSC) of the AU is a good example of an umbrella organ for the prevention, management, and resolution of conflicts. More specifically about the subcategories of conflict management, a good example of conflict prevention is the OSCE’s Berlin Mechanism, which outlines measures that can be applied in the case of serious emergency situations that may arise from a violation of one of the principles of the Helsinki Final Act or as the result of major disruptions endangering peace, security, or stability, and which has been activated with reference to statehood conflicts (by 2011 it was activated five times: four times during the dissolution of Yugoslavia and one with reference to Nagorno Karabakh). Examples of the role of international organizations in conflict management also include the EU Mission in Georgia, which, inter alia, aims at ensuring there is no return to hostilities, facilitating the resumption of safe and normal life for the locals along typical lines of conflict management (for more, see Dobrescu and Schumacher 2020). Finally, conflict resolution examples include various UN-led or UN-supported efforts at mediation to secure an agreement between the different parts of the conflicts, such as the Dayton agreements that, among else, resolved the conflict involving Republika Srpska or various agreements for the Bougainville conflict.

As shown in the next section, the management and resolution of statehood conflicts in specific is impacted by statehood-related principles, particularly sovereignty, territorial integrity, and self-determination, which are often constitutionally safeguarded in many international organizations. This means that these bodies are on paper against any instances in which these principles might be challenged, such as by secession. For example, Article 2 of the UN charter provides that “all Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state.” The ASEAN declaration also subscribes to the UN charter. Similarly, the (Arab League 1945) aims at “co-operation between members and the “safeguard[ing] of their independence and sovereignty.” At the same time, the principle of self-determination is also important for international organizations, such as the AU, whose establishment drew a lot on the process of decolonization that gave many members their independence. Interestingly, sovereignty and related norms are virtually absent from all EU treaties, but the recent Global Strategy for Foreign and Security Policy (2016) is an exception: “The sovereignty, independence and territorial integrity of states... are key elements of the European security order. These principles apply to all states, both within and beyond the EU’s borders... Russia’s violation of international law and the destabilisation of Ukraine, on top of protracted conflicts in the wider Black Sea region, have challenged the European security order at its core.” This rare EU mention of sovereignty and territorial integrity is especially important for our discussion because it is explicitly linked to statehood conflicts in the post-Soviet space. Finally, the OSCE Helsinki Act is a very interesting example of the principles of territorial integrity and self-determination coexisting in the same document. The Act provides that “the participating States will respect the equal rights of peoples and their right to self-determination, acting at all times in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with the relevant norms of international law, including those relating to territorial integrity of States.”

Between Internal and External Self-Determination

Let us now bring together the themes presented so far and explore how conflict management and resolution by international organizations is affected by statehood-related principles and issues. Here, there are schematically two broad categories of how the resolution of statehood conflicts is approached, in relation to self-determination (see also Table 1). International organizations look at the satisfaction of self-determination in two main ways: through internal self-determination, i.e., within the confines of a state (usually via some degree of autonomy for the group that seeks self-determination), or through external self-determination, i.e., through independent statehood for the group in question (Seymour 2011).

In the first instance, international organizations might seek to contribute to the resolution of the conflict via a peaceful, negotiated (re)integration

International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts, Table 1 International organizations and statehood conflicts

| | | |
|----------------------------|--|--|
| Conflict management | Conflict prevention E.g., OSCE's Berlin Mechanism Peacekeeping E.g., UN in Cyprus | |
| Conflict resolution | Mediation E.g., AU in Western Sahara | |
| | Statebuilding toward independence E.g., EU in Palestine | Statebuilding toward (re)integration (+ possible engagement without recognition) E.g., UNTAES in Croatia |
| | ↑ Recognition of claim to statehood (external self-determination) | ↑ No recognition of claim to statehood (internal self-determination) | of the independence-seeking group back to the parent state (see also Anderson 2011; Csergo et al. 2017). The contribution of international organizations can take the form of mediation, for example, the OSCE mediation in the conflict between Gagauzia and Moldova, and/or international transitional administrations seeking to help (re)integration to the parent state, for example, the 1996–8 UNTAES administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium in Croatia (see also Šimunović 1999). This approach usually seeks to respect the sovereignty of the parent state, as evident, for example, in the UNSCR 1037 (1996) which established UNTAES.

In a different instance, international organizations might endorse the efforts of a group towards independence. Major international organizations have issued statements and resolutions that have recognized a right to statehood, either for a type of cases (e.g., the Declaration on the Granting of Independence to Colonial Countries and Peoples, adopted by the General Assembly resolution 1514 of 14 December 1960) or for specific state-seeking groups. Interestingly, some claimants to statehood have extensively based their campaigns on such support from international organizations – one prime example here is the Palestinians (e.g., Abbas 2019), while campaigns for the independence of East Timor also centered on the respect of UN resolutions that condemned Indonesia's occupation of the territory (McCloskey 2000, 7). In this scenario, which is generally rarer, international organizations might be involved with statebuilding, i.e., assisting the emergence of a state where they see statehood as a way in which the right to (external) self-determination must be satisfied. Many times, such statebuilding efforts are explicitly within the framework of conflict resolution, and there are a few studies on this and international organizations in specific (e.g., Caplan 2012; Lemay-Hébert 2013; Cebeci 2020). A prominent example here is UNTAET, which prepared Timor-Leste for full independence. In this case, the administration was given power to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice in order to provide security and rule of law, establish an effective administration and assist the development of public services, ensure the coordination and delivery of aid, support capacity-building for self-government, and assist in the establishment of conditions for sustainable development (for more, see Lemay-Hébert 2012). Although not technically an international administration, the EU's involvement in Palestine is based on a similar logic of resolving the conflict via fostering a Palestinian state, which is envisaged to exist alongside Israel.

In this regard, where international organizations acknowledge a right to external self-determination, there seems to be a willingness to recognize and even help fulfil statehood aspirations. This also relates to instances in which the international community conditions recognition of independence upon statebuilding efforts, such as with the “standards before status” approach in Kosovo (Ker-Lindsay and Economides 2012) or the performance-based “roadmap for peace” that aimed at Palestinian statebuilding towards resolving the conflict via a two-state solution (Turner 2011). Where international organizations see the right to self-determination as one that should be satisfied internally, then independence movements are not endorsed and solutions for the reintegration of that group in the parent state from which they try to separate are supported, like with the examples in Moldova or Croatia mentioned above. Therefore, in these two different approaches, i.e., statebuilding vs. (re)integration to the parent state, the fundamental principles of territorial integrity and of self-determination seem to be playing out in very interesting ways.

Two further points are worth mentioning here. First, there have been instances in which international organizations have linked the violation of the right to internal self-determination (e.g., via suspension of autonomy arrangements) to a more positive view of the right to external self-determination via independence – for example, this has been argued to be the case in Kosovo by a NATO report (Kumbaro 2001). This echoes the Canada Supreme Court Secession of Quebec Judgment of 20 August 1998 that provided that international law establishes that “the right to self-determination of a people is normally fulfilled through internal self-determination – a people’s pursuit of its political, economic, social and cultural development within the framework of an existing state” but also that a right to external self-determination is generated also “where a people is oppressed [. . .] or where a definable group is denied meaningful access to government to pursue their political, economic, social and cultural development.” Secondly, there are cases in which international organizations might support both options of internal and external self-determination at the same time. For example, efforts at resolving the conflict in Western Sahara supported by the UN and others, such as the Peace Plan for Self-Determination for the People of Western Sahara, have provided for a referendum with a choice between independence (external self-determination) and integration into Morocco (internal self-determination).

Navigating Statehood Conflict

Statehood-related principles and realities influence not only the options for conflict resolution outlined so far but also the way in which international organizations develop conflict management, including more operational dimensions of their role. Firstly, the involvement of international organizations in statehood conflicts creates a range of diplomatic challenges precisely because of the sensitive and contested issues of statehood at the heart of such disputes. Most often, international organizations lend their support to the sovereignty of the parent state (which is often their member), although this does not mean a blank check to any type of action or position. But, at the same time, this support results in international organizations facing particular challenges in engaging with the other side of the conflict, when they do not recognize their claims to and efforts at independent statehood. Also because they often enjoy de facto control of territories at the heart of the dispute (see, e.g., OSCE 2014, 48), these groups need to be engaged for many reasons, such as for facilitating humanitarian aid or for taking part in peace talks. However, engaging with these parties runs the risk for international organizations to recognize these groups “by implication.” This problem seems to be particularly acute where the statehood-seeking group has managed to introduce state-like institutions that the international organizations need to avoid legitimizing by interacting with them (Kyris 2018).

A constantly growing literature is focusing on the so-called engagement without recognition, which refers to how international actors engage with unrecognized states in a range of political, economic, social, and cultural issues but in a way which is different to normal diplomatic practice and without recognizing independent statehood. This approach has been used towards many conflicts, not least those of the post-Soviet space. Studies have focused on the benefits of this type of engagement by international organizations (Fischer 2010; Caspersen and Herrberg 2010), their more specific practices and approaches in this context (e.g., Axyonova and Gawrich 2018; Coppieters 2018; Relitz 2019), the impact of this approach on conflict resolution (Kyris 2018), or how does it compare to statebuilding (Bouris and Kyris 2017). Indeed, in some respects, engagement without recognition can be seen as a mirror image of international statebuilding, in the sense that, unlike the latter that aims to help a state emerge, it seeks to “avoid” the state (Kyris 2020) and deny its legitimacy (both terms in italics in Table 1). Furthermore, it is also often the case that where international organizations see the pursuit of independence as a threat to the territorial integrity of the state to which the territories de jure belong, the parent state will be the base of their operations. This is the case with many missions of international organizations such as the EU Monitoring Mission, which is based in Georgia.

Here, therefore, statehood-related issues, such as territorial control, seem to be impacting, if not obstructing, the way in which international organizations engage with such conflicts – for example, territorial control by unrecognized states makes it more difficult for international organizations to engage in those territories. The so-called engagement without recognition is a way in which external actors, including international organizations, have sought to overcome some of the particular challenges present in statehood conflicts. While constructive in the short term, such an engagement risks undermining the neutrality of international involvement, especially where a part of the conflict is member to that organization (see, e.g., Heraclides 1991). This makes cooperation from the group that is perceived as biased against (most often the secessionists) difficult. Especially when considering the role of international organizations in the longer term, there is some evidence that engagement without recognition actually makes the achievement of conflict resolution more difficult, for example, by pushing the nonrecognized towards intransigence in the negotiations or by taking away motives for the recognized part to cooperate towards resolution (Kyris 2018).

Further Research Avenues

There is considerable literature on issues of internal statehood and especially state institutional solutions that might provide a framework for resolving statehood conflicts, e.g., via assisting the building of a state for a state-seeking group or facilitating its (re)integration into the parent state. With reference to the second option, a few institutional frameworks for self-governance have been discussed in the literature. However, statehood conflicts are also about more external dimensions of statehood, and here more research is welcome. For example, the relevance of international organizations for recognition has been less explored, possibly as a result of the fact that international law perspectives tend to dominate the discussion (Ker-Lindsay 2017), therefore rendering international organizations as irrelevant in what is seen as a state-centric process of recognition. However, international organizations are important for recognition, even if this is in a more political rather than legal way (see also Wydra 2020). As noted earlier, ways in which international organizations are important for recognition include their positioning (e.g., via statements and resolutions) on whether a group has a legitimate right to statehood or not, as well as their missions on the ground that might assist or “kill” the actualization of statehood, via statebuilding or the (re)integration into the parent state, respectively. Furthermore, the discussion will benefit by a more detailed look into internal dynamics of international organizations, including potential differences between recognition-related positions of intergovernmental and more supranational organs (for a rare account, see Fernández-Molina 2016).

Related to this is a need to problematize more the relationship between conflict management and resolution. Statehood conflicts are notoriously difficult to solve, and, as such, they pose challenges to international organizations that often have the promotion of international security at the heart of their objectives. This entry elaborated on how issues of statehood influence the solutions that international organizations support (e.g., the realization of independence via statebuilding, or putting an end to independence aspirations by assisting reintegration into the parent state; see earlier). The impact of statehood issues on conflict management and the more immediate engagement of international organizations was also explored. However, it seems that these more immediate approaches might carry consequences for the longer-term resolution of the conflict – for example, engagement without recognition might undermine conflict resolution by creating intransigence in the negotiations. In this regard, more research is welcome on the relationship between the more immediate nature of conflict management and the longer-term objective of conflict resolution by international organizations in statehood conflicts.

While this entry focused on intergovernmental international organizations, there is room to reflect on nongovernmental organizations and their relevance to the statehood conflicts. Like with other types of conflict, they are often important for providing aid and relief – prominent examples of such statehood conflicts here include Somaliland, where a range of humanitarian NGOs, such as the International Committee of the Red Cross, were the first internationals to respond before intergovernmental organizations (Bradbury 2008, 47), or Eritrea (Smith 1987). Elsewhere, local NGOs were proven instrumental in raising international awareness of the independence plight – for example, the East Timor Action Network (Scheiner 2000). Even more important for statehood conflicts, studies suggest that nongovernmental organizations might be important because of the contested nature of the statehood claims. There is, for example, evidence that nongovernmental actors are quite central in some engagement without recognition approaches, in the sense that international organizations choose to work with such non-state actors instead of authorities of the state in order to not endorse the legitimacy of the latter (Kyris 2013). Therefore, more research is needed on the relationship between intergovernmental international organizations and nongovernmental organizations and actors in more general, including a potential shift in the balance of power in favor of the latter ones.

Finally, more reflection is needed into methodological opportunities and challenges of researching the role of international organizations in statehood conflicts, which could contribute to some already fruitful discussion on conducting conflict-related research (e.g., Rivas and Browne 2018; Browne 2020). What do the specificities of this particular topic mean for the conduct of research? Does, for example, the contestation of territories and legitimacy, which is so central to these disputes, impact the prospects, nature, and findings of research? How credible is data collected via fieldwork in such hotly contested territories? Given the diplomatic minefield that international actors walk, can interviews with people working in international organizations be considered as a reliable source of information? For example, it has been shown that international organizations do not issue press releases when they meet with de facto authorities of secessionist entities in order to avoid controversy and accusations that they recognize those authorities by implication (e.g., Kyris 2018). Based on this, one could assume that interviewees might not be keen to confirm such meetings or other contacts with a researcher during an interview. In this instance, could interviews be better for triangulating findings collected otherwise? Are other data collection techniques, like observational fieldwork, particularly conducive for researching the role of international organizations in statehood conflicts? The significance of physical elements to statehood conflicts, such as borders, refugee camps, or buffer zones often administered by international organizations (e.g., UN-supported refugee camps for Palestinians or the buffer zone in Cyprus), might suggest that this is the case. A more inward look into how we get to know about the role of international organizations in statehood conflicts will contribute to what we know about the topic.

Summary

Statehood conflicts continue to be some of the world's most intractable disputes. As such, they have seen the extensive involvement of international organizations, which have tried to contribute to local, regional, and international security via the resolution of these disputes. In doing so, the role of international organizations is often informed by specific statehood-related principles, especially sovereignty, territorial integrity, and self-determination. For example, the respect of sovereignty has informed solutions based on the (re)integration of contested territories to a parent state. More rarely, the right to self-determination has led to the support (and assistance) for independent statehood. Although successful in some cases, the role of international organizations is impacted significantly by the very competition over statehood that lies at the heart of such disputes, for example, issues of state recognition often mean that international organizations have a very fine balancing act to perform locally in trying to engage both sides of the conflict, including those statehood claimants that are not recognized. Our understanding of international organizations in such conflicts will benefit by more research on the significance of external rather than just internal dimensions of statehood (such as recognition), the relationship between international conflict management and resolution but also the study of international organizations alongside nongovernmental organizations and, lastly, a greater reflection onto methodological issues of such research.

Cross-References

► Conflict Fieldwork

References

- Abbas, M. (2019). The road to Oslo. In A. Dowty (Ed.), The Israel/Palestine reader. Cambridge: Polity.
- Anderson, L. (2011). Reintegration unrecognised states. In G. Stansfield & N. Caspersen (Eds.), Unrecognised states in the international system. London: Routledge.
- Arab League. 1945. Charter of the Arab League.
- Axyonova, V., & Gawrich, A. (2018). Regional organizations and secessionist entities: Analysing practices of the EU and the OSCE in post-soviet protracted conflict areas. Ethnopolitics, 17(4), 408–425.
- Badmus, I. (2015). The African Union's role in peacekeeping: Building on lessons learned from security operations. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Bellamy, A. J., Williams, P. D., & Griffin, S. (2010). Understanding peacekeeping. Cambridge: Polity.
- Bouris, D., & Kyris, G. (2017). Europeanisation, sovereignty and contested states: The European Union in Palestine and northern Cyprus. The British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 19(4), 755–771.
- Bradbury, M. (2008). Becoming Somaliland. London: Progression.
- Browne, B. C. (2020). 'Writing the wrongs: Keeping diaries and reflective practice' in, Rivas, A.-M. and Browne, B. C., eds., Experiences in Researching Conflict and Violence Fieldwork Interrupted. Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Butler, M. J. (2009). International conflict management. Oxon: Routledge.
- Caplan, R. (2012). Exit strategies and statebuilding. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Caspersen, N., & Herrberg, A. (2010). Engaging unrecognised states in conflict resolution: An opportunity or challenge for the EU? Initiative for peacebuilding. Available at <http://themediateur.eu/wp-content/uploads/2017/12/1012CMI.pdf>. Accessed 15 Apr 2020.
- Cebeci, M. (2020). Representing peace? The EU's temporal selves and its statebuilding. Geopolitics, 25(2), 294–314.
- Coppieters, B. (2018). 'Statehood', 'de facto authorities' and 'occupation': Contested concepts and the EU's engagement in its European Neighbourhood. Ethnopolitics, 17(4), 343–361.
- Csergo, Z., Roseberry, P., & Wolff, S. (2017). Institutional outcomes of territorial contestation: Lessons from post-communist Europe, 1989–2012. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 47.
- Dobrescu, M., & Schumacher, T. (2020). The politics of flexibility: Exploring the contested statehood–EU actorness Nexus in Georgia. Geopolitics, 25(2), 407–427.
- Edwards, M. S., & DiCicco, M. (2018). International organizations and preventing war. Oxford Research Encyclopedias. <https://oxfordre.com/internationalstudies/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780190846626.001.0001/acrefore-9780190846626-e-407>.
- Fernández-Molina, I. (2016). The EU, the European Neighbourhood Policy and the Western Sahara conflict: Executive continuity and parliamentary detours. In D. Bouris & T. Schumacher (Eds.), The revised European Neighbourhood Policy: Continuity and change in EU Foreign Policy. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Fischer, S. (2010). The EU's non-recognition and engagement policy towards Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Retrieved from https://www.iss.europa.eu/sites/default/files/EUISSFiles/NREP_report.pdf. Accessed 15 Apr 2020.
- Greig, M. J., & Diehl, P. F. (2013). International mediation. Cambridge: Polity Press.

- Heracleides, A. (1991). The self-determination of minorities in international politics. London: Routledge.
- Hughes, J. (2007). Chechnya: From nationalism to jihad. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Hughes, J. (Ed.). (2010). EU conflict management. London: Routledge.
- Ker-Lindsay, J. (2017). Secession and recognition in Foreign Policy. Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics. <https://oxfordre.com/politics/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.001.0001/acrefore-9780190228637-e-478>.
- Ker-Lindsay, J., & Economides, S. (2012). Standards before status before accession: Kosovo's EU perspective. Journal of Balkan and Near Eastern Studies, 14(1), 77–92.
- Kumbaro, D. (2001). The Kosovo Crisis in an International Law Perspective: Self-determination, Territorial Integrity and the NATO Intervention. Available at <https://www.nato.int/acad/fellow/99-01/kumbaro.pdf>. Accessed 15 Apr 2020.
- Kyris, G. (2013). Europeanization beyond contested statehood: The European Union and Turkish-Cypriot civil society. Journal of Common Market Studies, 51(5), 866–883.
- Kyris, G. (2018). Sovereignty and engagement without recognition: Explaining the failure of conflict resolution in Cyprus. Ethnopolitics, 17(4), 426–442.
- Kyris, G. (2020). The European Union in northern Cyprus: Conceptualising the avoidance of contested states. Geopolitics, 25(2), 346–361.
- Lemay-Hébert, N. (2012). Coerced transitions in Timor-Leste and Kosovo: Managing competing objectives of institution-building and local empowerment. Democratization, 19(3), 465–448.
- Lemay-Hébert, N. (2013). Everyday legitimacy and international administration: Global governance and local legitimacy in Kosovo. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 7(1), 87–104.
- Lutmar, C., & Miller, B. (2016). Regional peacemaking and conflict management: A comparative approach. London: Routledge.
- Maass, A.-S. (2020). The actorness of the EU's statebuilding in Ukraine – before and after Crimea. Geopolitics, 25(2), 387–406.
- McCloskey, S. (2000). Introduction: East Timor. In P. Hainsworth & S. McCloskey (Eds.), The East Timor question: The struggle for Independence from Indonesia. London: I.B.Tauris.
- Oishi, M. (Ed.). (2019). Managing conflicts in a globalizing ASEAN: Incompatibility management through good governance. Singapore: Springer.
- OSCE. (2014). Mediation and dialogue facilitation in the OSCE. Available at <https://www.osce.org/secretariat/126646>. Accessed 20 Mar 2020.
- Ramsbotham, O., Woodhouse, T., & Miall, H. (2016). Contemporary conflict resolution. Cambridge: Polity.
- Relitz, S. (2019). The stabilisation dilemma: Conceptualising international responses to secession and de facto states. East European Politics, 35(3), 311–331.
- Rivas, A. M., & Browne, B. C. (2018). Experiences with violent research and researching violence. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Sandole, D. J. D. (2007). Peace and security in the post-modern world: The OSCE and conflict resolution. London: Routledge.
- Scheiner, C. (2000). The United States: From complicity to ambiguity. In P. Hainsworth & S. McCloskey (Eds.), The East Timor question: The struggle for Independence from Indonesia. London: I.B.Tauris.
- Seymour, M. (2011). Internal self-determination and secession. In P. Radan & A. Pavkovic (Eds.), The Ashgate research companion to secession. London: Routledge.
- Šimunović, P. (1999). A framework for success: Contextual factors in the UNTAES operation in eastern Slavonia. International Peacekeeping, 6(1), 126–142.
- Smith, G. (1987). Ethiopia and the politics of famine relief. MERIP Middle East Report, 145, 31–37.
- Thakur, R. (2016). The United Nations, peace and security: From collective security to the responsibility to protect. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Turner, M. (2011). Creating 'Partners for peace': The Palestinian authority and the international statebuilding agenda. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 5(1), 1–21.
- United Nations. (2006). Chair of organisation for security and cooperation in Europe briefs security council on institutional reform, conflict resolution, 5346th meeting* (AM). Available at <https://www.un.org/press/en/2006/sc8608.doc.htm>. Accessed 5 Mar 2020.
- Wallensteen, P. (2015). Understanding conflict resolution: War, peace and the global system. London: Sage.
- Walter, B. F. (2002). Committing to peace: The successful settlement of civil wars. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Welhengama, G., & Pillay, N. (2014). The rise of Tamil separatism in Sri Lanka: From communalism to secession. London: Routledge.
- Whitman, R., & Wolff, S. (2012). The European Union as a global conflict manager. London: Routledge.
- Wydra, D. (2020). Between normative visions and pragmatic possibilities: The European politics of state recognition. Geopolitics, 25(2), 315–345.
- Zartman, I. W. (2015). Preventing deadly conflict. Cambridge: Polity.
- Zaum, D. (2007). The sovereignty paradox. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

International Peace Architecture

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace
- ▶ Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester, Department of Politics,
Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Balance of power; Critical approaches;
Decolonisation; Global justice; Liberal peace;
Statebuilding

Introduction

During the last century, the construction and evolution of an “international peace architecture” has spanned the local, state, and global scales of international relations. This architecture is far more extensive than the UN Peacebuilding Architecture this term is usually used to refer to. It spans a wide range of international, state, and nongovernmental actors, civil society, and social movements and has gathered pace since at least the seventeenth century (though it predates this period in theoretical and practical terms, of course).

Every political system requires complex systems to maintain itself, consciously or subconsciously, against threats, risks, and paradoxes. Systems require knowledge, power, innovation, intergenerational maintenance, and very significant investment in long-term institutions that reflect everyday political claims for order and sustainability (Tainter 1988, p. 37). In the case of the international peace architecture, this is represented by a wide, political formulation, spanning at least the last 300 years. It formed through twin processes to combat war and violence: frameworks that are historically linear (Whiggish state, legal, and institutional development)

(Mazower 2009, 2012) and rhizomatic (the critical development of rights according to the expanding subaltern claims) (Deleuze and Guattari 1987).

This has occurred in the context of a world order subject to multiple forms of civil, state, and international violence and war (Rosenau 1997). The architecture represents an attempt to respond to the aftermath of different types of war, to support the construction of a social state and international framework capable of overcoming war’s causal roots, and to support a dynamic peace from a subaltern perspective that transcends old injustices, losses, boundaries, and hierarchies (Foucault and Miskowicz [1984] 1986; see also United Nations, General Assembly 2016).

The most successful international and state level peace architecture in modernity was the liberal peace framework, which depended upon on a long-standing geopolitical balance of power or hegemonic support. Yet, soon after its post-Cold War apogee, the liberal peace system was reshaped from above and below by international and local actors engaged in peacebuilding and a range of other peace-related activities; Roland Paris (see, e.g., Paris 2004), among others, outlined the course of this argument early on in the post-Cold War debates, based on a critique of liberal peace because of its unsuitable political and economic dimensions. This was essentially an argument for a more trusteeship-oriented approach to liberal peacebuilding (see also Richmond 2005, for an early critique of liberal peace and the subsequent stages; Richmond 2011, on the postcolonial development of the everyday and hybrid peace). Subsequent discussions of everyday and hybrid peace took a very descriptive ethnographic or prescriptive policy turn in numerous scholarly and policy publications, but the author’s own work turned to the impact of local peace formation processes on state formation (see Richmond 2014, 2016; Richmond and Pogodda 2016). The post-Cold War peace-related activities incorporated military intervention and liberal democratic and capitalist state reform of conflict-affected states, in many countries as diverse as Cambodia, Timor Leste, Sierra Leone, Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Liberia, El

This entry is based upon a forthcoming book, The Grand Design, OUP, 2021.

Salvador, Bosnia, and Kosovo (see for more Richmond and Franks 2008; Chandler 2017). However, mounting dysfunctionality and resistance drove the subsequent “local turn,” which investigated everyday and hybrid forms of peace from a postcolonial perspective. This approach has been divided between descriptive, prescriptive, and emancipatory approaches.

Much evidence was then found for the development of hybrid peace processes driven by local agency, determined to reclaim some version of an emancipatory peace in the subsequent marriage of institutional and ethnographic research as an emancipatory response to more dominant problem-solving approaches or more banal descriptive approaches. This process in turn has led to a discussion in the academic and policy literatures of postcolonial and intersectional questions of everyday and critical agency, micropolitics, justice, power, and the encounter of everyday peace formation with international peacebuilding actors, along with the mediating role of local and global civil society. The “local turn” has once again turned attention to the deficiencies of the international system, power relations and related injustices, and the need for substantial reform in the light of the recent “Sustaining Peace” agenda of the UN.

These debates illustrate how a much grander edifice has emerged, from local to global scales, which, though fragile and unstable, offers some prospects for further development. It raises a range of long-standing questions about the evolution and integrity of what might be called an international peace architecture. This is a term that has begun to appear in the context of peacebuilding in the UN (e.g., the UN Peacebuilding Commission) (see Cavalcante 2019, p. 222) with the African Union’s strategy related to peacebuilding across the sub-Saharan region (Zondi 2017, p. 110)—as well as a term referring to the broader constellation or alphabet soup of international actors, from transitional civil society to the UN system, the EU, OSCE, NATO, other regional actors, the international legal system, and the IFIs.

The emergence of an international peace architecture is partly a consequence of a historical evolution to combat war and associated forms of political violence in its evolving forms, through which there have been six main stages or layers, often overlapping. The development of each stage is also a response to the failures of the previous stage as well as representing attempts to engage with global structural change and new forms of conflict and violence that are constantly emerging. Most importantly, each stage is a vehicle for the expansion of subaltern and human rights claims across the international system, which has influenced the development of the social contract, the nature of the state, and international order itself. This entry uses the concept of rights claims to span political claims for basic human rights and their expansion through several further generations of rights, including the right to have rights (Cohen 2012). Each stage carries its own ontologies, epistemological framing, and empirical examples and methods. This entry first offers an overview of the international peace architecture in theoretical and practical terms, before examining each stage in its development. It outlines some of the challenges and “blockages” this system has faced, especially with the development of stage five in the context of the war on terror and state-building. It then outlines the implications for a new stage which has to deal with new modes of violence in IR. It concludes with an evaluation of the architecture’s functionality and stability and discusses what it means for how contemporary peace has developed as a concept.

An Overview of the International Peace Architecture

Though very opaque, it is possible to see in the debates about peace in international relations over the last century, an approximation of a systematic approach, even if it is only the sum of a range of micro-tools such as diplomacy, peacekeeping, mediation, law, peacebuilding, state-building, and global governance. During the last 100 years, the liberal peace model has been by far the most dominant concept of and institutional framework for peace. However, a much broader international architecture has emerged in various stages, of which the liberal peace is just one component.

Overall, it comprises a range of concepts, methods, and theories that are ontologically framed by Western assumptions inherent in thinking about war and peace in several stages. They effectively represent sedimental layers, such as a palimpsest (in which a previous text is visible under a newer, overwritten text), built up over time over broadening forms of intervention created to maintain an ever more complex international peace architecture. The use of the term “architecture,” though mentioned in academic circles previously, appeared to enter common UN parlance, albeit in a more limited way by 2016. It is mainly focused on prescriptive policy frameworks emanating from agencies such as the Peacebuilding Commission (see United Nations, General Assembly 2016). Each layer redresses a previous set of conflict igniters and coexist with (or contradict) the new layers that emerge for later forms of conflict, such as feudalism, imperialism and colonialism, capitalism and industrialism, the national state, cold war, ethnic and religious conflict, and “new wars” (Kaldor 1999). Underlying this essentially unplanned evolution is both a linear process and also fluid and rhizomatic dynamics (Deleuze and Guattari 1987; Hurrell 2008, p. 69).

There has always been a long-standing local and international political dream of a positive peace, one that transcends coexistence and builds a new ethical framework for cooperation and equalization of widely divergent human populations. As Kant wrote, in a universal community, wrongs committed in one place are felt everywhere (Kant 1795; see also Archibugi 1992). Much of the body of thinking and practice has come into view in order to deal with different types of conflict: civil wars; revolutionary wars; colonial and imperial conflicts; wars over territory, power, and resources; industrialized conflicts over ideology as in the twentieth century; and wars over ethnic identity and self-determination as seen regularly since the 1960s or after the end of the Cold War. The sheer variety and scale of such violence indicates points to the existence of a much more sophisticated peace architecture than generally thought. A much broader and multidisciplinary view illustrates this epistemological and methodological weakness.

Different critical understandings of this architecture emerge from different positionalities: the subaltern points to basic needs, identity, sustainability, and mobility; the state to its interests and communitarian ethics; and the international to global norms, duties, and responsibilities in the light of global problems. Norms, institutions, and law, across the international, state, and civil society, reflect both the need to respond to wrongs as well as reflecting power. Inequalities of many (but not all) sorts have increasingly been seen as “wrongs,” meaning the nature of political legitimacy at the global level has now irrevocably changed. Similarly, matters of social, environmental, and intergenerational legitimacy have now made their appearance on the international scene. In this sense, legitimacy needs to be understood in broader, social and global, intergenerational terms, not just in terms of law, process, and efficiency. Legitimacy is related to the social provision of consent through consensual systems of political decision-making on a wider scale than ever before (see for more Brassat and Tsingou 2011). It connects with the broader questions of sustainability raised by the problem of global justice.

Six overlapping stages of historical and theoretical development in the international peace architecture can be identified as follows:

- (i) A geopolitical balance of power designed to deal with the clash of interest in elite-led industrialized states and empires
- (ii) A “pluralist” Westphalian system of discrete sovereign states designed to deal with nationalism caused by stage (i) through the liberal democratic peace and a liberal cosmopolitan postwar architecture, run mainly by the USA, UK, and latterly the donor system and EU, designed to deal with the slow decolonization of the imperial world and its systemic clashes, as well as nationalism and ethnonationalism

- (iii) A Marxist-derived critique of both realist and liberal versions of peace designed to produce international equality and solidarity
- (iv) Liberal peacebuilding in its later iterations, informed by a postcolonial and hybrid, multilayered framework of international relations designed to expand rights while maintaining the previous layers of the international architecture (Brasset and Tsingou 2011, p. 2; see also Bull 1977)
- (v) Neoliberal state-building, a reversion to securitization, and a focus on state security, complemented by global capital
- (vi) The newer “digital” dynamics of international relations (as opposed to the analogue system of industrial modernity and the states-system represented by i–iv), which offers the potential of extending the agency of global civil society and further expanding rights, or constraining political claims through a form of digital governmentality

Stages One to Four: From the Balance of Power to Agenda for Peace

The sensitivity of the international peace architecture to the vagaries of political hegemony and subaltern claims can be seen in its uncertain evolution. Stage one, relating to the balancing system of nineteenth-century geopolitics, allowed progress to be made on the basis of a fragile, imperial balance of power but one that was devoid of rights-based thinking being focus on the diplomatic balancing of interests:

...the want of an habitual confidential and free intercourse between the Ministers of the Great Powers as a body; and that many pretensions might be modified, asperities removed, and the causes of irritation anticipated and met by bringing the respective parties into unrestricted communications common to them all, and embracing in confidential and united discussions all the great points in which they were severally interested. (Webster [1925] 1931, p. 56)

The Congress and Concert systems aimed at maintaining the European balance of power through elite diplomacy began to betray a concern with the broader stability and sustainability of an international order susceptible to constant wars, following the thought of Kant:

For these reasons there must be a league of a particular kind, which can be called a league of peace (foedus pacificum), and which would be distinguished from a treaty of peace (pactum pacis) by the fact that the latter terminates only one war, while the former seeks to make an end of all wars forever. (Kant [1795] 2003, p. 14)

Yet, such thinking, perhaps obvious, now was controversial as Palmerston famously noted in the House of Commons in 1848 (also reflecting contemporary cynicism about international cooperation and multilateralism):

We have no eternal allies, and we have no perpetual enemies. Our interests are eternal and perpetual, and those interests it is our duty to follow. When we find other countries marching in the same course, and pursuing the same objects as ourselves, we consider them as our friends, and we think for the moment that we are on the most cordial footing; when we find other countries that take a different view, and thwart us in the object we pursue, it is our duty to make allowance for the different manner in which they may follow out the same objects. (Treaty of Adrianople—Charges Against Viscount Palmerston 1848)

This rather confused understanding of the pros and cons of international cooperation laid the basis for stage two (Jervis 1986, pp. 60–61; Taylor 1954) including the International Court of Justice’s initiation at the 1899 Hague Conference and its implications for a wide acceptance of international law and new institutions to support order and progress in “international society.” This also drew on the emergence of an interest in humanitarianism, with the foundation of the ICRC in the 1860s, as well as the problem of disarmament. Further steps were taken after WWI with the liberal internationalist system that was built with the emergence of the League of Nations, following US President Wilson’s argument in his speech in Omaha, Nebraska, 8 September 1919 (as cited in Baker and Dodds 1927, p. 36) that, “I can predict with absolute certainty that within another generation there will be another world war if the nations of the world do not concert the method by which to prevent it.”

Indicative of the difficulties in consolidating the second stage or layer of the international peace architecture, the League of Nations was more or less immediately curtailed in 1919, given that the USA did not join. Yet, the Locarno agreements of 1925 appeared to confirm the progress that was being made, normalizing relations in Europe (including the UK) with the Weimar Republic and also reviving elements of the Concert system according to Georges-Henri Soutou:

As early as 1921 the Europeans began to react against the far too abstract Wilsonian vision, realised that the League of Nations would not be very effective, and thought of reinstating, without acknowledging it, the Concert of Europe. This was achieved with the Locarno agreements, which reintroduced Germany into the Concert of Europe and which basically and beyond their actual content bestowed on France, Germany, Great Britain and Italy a leading role in the European system, as well as establishing among them a permanent forum for concerted meetings and action. It was actually a return to the former concert of the major powers, though one which of course took into account the new circumstances, at least as far as the implementation of ‘collective security’ was concerned. For some, for instance Aristide Briand, the Locarno system had to go beyond the return to the Concert of Europe and should promote the real political and economic organisation of the Continent, in order to balance both the United States and the Soviet Union. (Baker and Dodds 1927, p. 337)

The Permanent Court of International Justice in 1920, the Kellogg-Briand Pact to abolish war in 1928, as well as the attempt to codify international law at the Hague Codification Conference in 1930 were important steps, but they all faced significant opposition (Nardin 2019, p. 157).

Yet, never before in history had there been so much progress in building an international peace architecture than during the 1920s (this being perhaps faint and damning praise), culminating in slightly futile attempts to outlaw war:

The real struggle today, just as in the second quarter of the nineteenth century, is between a view of the world termed liberalism or radicalism, for which the primary object of government and of foreign policy is peace, freedom of trade and intercourse, and economic wealth and that other view, militarist or rather diplomatic, which thinks in terms of power, prestige, national or personal glory, the imposition of a culture and hereditary or racial prejudice. (Keynes [1978] 2012, p. 370)

The growth of international law, the emergence of new forms of diplomacy, and growing multilateralism were seen as markers consolidating peace architecture in the early twentieth century (Morgenthau 1940; Nicolson 1954). They were to be brought together under an expanding institutional framework throughout the twentieth century, according to an American-driven conglomeration of the development of liberal global order, vision for the state and the international system, to cement the peace, especially after decolonization and again after the end of the Cold War. This “liberal hegemony” was based to a large degree on popular acceptance of American exceptionalism after 1945, implying a mixture of realist and liberal approaches. It provided the basis for more significant activity after the end of WWII when the UN system, the Bretton Woods Institutions, the International Court of Justice, and, much later, the International Criminal Court emerged (Nardin, The international legal order 1919–2019, Nardin 2019, p. 158). The UN Declaration of Human Rights in 1948 also gave rise to an expansionary dynamic, leading to the Helsinki Accords in 1975 as a challenge to existing power relations (Reus-Smit 2013, p. 38). Of course, the 1945 postwar settlement represented perhaps one quarter of the world’s population, depending on how one counts the proportion of signatory states (numbering 51) versus the world’s population. It represented an elite and victor-based, fairly centralized consensus, such as was epistemologically and politically possible in its era, perhaps opening the way for a globally collaborative, social and relational, consensus (Desmond 2014). Thus, the international architecture, as well as the state, by stage two of the international peace architecture had been formed through war, the exercise of hegemony (as well as capital) (particularly American), as well as social forces looking for recognition, emancipation, and rights over the longue duree (Reus-Smit 2013, p. 2).

Part of this phase of the international architecture was based upon the moral purpose of the state being to augment individual potential, organized around liberal versions of sovereignty, legislative justice, and contractual international law, all within a multilateral umbrella supposed to support property rights within and of states (Reus-Smit 2013, p. 7) (Ruggie 1993).

Stage three in the development of the modern international peace architecture challenged liberal internationalism by underlining the very limited rights it propagated after 1919 and 1945. Stage three spanned the Marxist challenge to imperialism, capitalism, and liberalism, drawing on the revolutionary philosophies of the French and American Revolutions, as well as the growing demands made by newly colonial states by the 1960s (including the Non-Aligned Movement this spurred). As Marx and Engels ([1848] 2018, chapter 1) wrote:

The bourgeoisie has through its exploitation of the world market given a cosmopolitan character to production and consumption in every country... In place of the old wants, satisfied by the production of the country, we find new wants, requiring for their satisfaction the products of distant lands and climes. In place of the old local and national seclusion and self-sufficiency, we have intercourse in every direction, universal inter-dependence of nations. And as in material, so also in intellectual production. The intellectual creations of individual nations become common property. National one-sidedness and narrow-mindedness become more and more impossible, and from the numerous national and local literatures, there arises a world literature.

The very tense dialogue between stage two and stage three during the Cold War was also connected to decolonization by Kwame Nkrumah (1963):

Never before in history has such a sweeping fervour for freedom expressed itself in great mass movements which are driving down the bastions of empire. This wind of change blowing through Africa, as I have said before, is no ordinary wind. It is a raging hurricane against which the old order cannot stand [...]. The great millions of Africa, and of Asia, have grown impatient of being hewers of wood and drawers of water, and are rebelling against the false belief that providence created some to be menials of others. Hence the twentieth century has become the century of colonial emancipation, the century of continuing revolution which must finally witness the total liberation of Africa from colonial rule and imperialist exploitation.

In 1964 the first UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) was supposed to provide a response, repeated over the coming decade (see also Pearson 1969). The New International Economic Order proposals of 1973 were the heavily contested result (United Nations, General Assembly 1974). It:

[s]olemnly proclaim[ed] our[its] united determination to work urgently for the Establishment of a New International Economic Order based on equity, sovereign equality, interdependence, common interest and cooperation among all States, irrespective of their economic and social systems which shall correct inequalities and redress existing injustices, make it possible to eliminate the widening gap between the developed and the developing countries and ensure steadily accelerating economic and social development and peace and justice for present and future generations. (United Nations, General Assembly 1974, preamble)

US hegemony after 1945 helped make global relations and networks even denser than multilateralism suggested might be possible, expanding into civil society, science and technology, trade, law, conventions, and treaties. This was partly as a consequence of a transfer of American “New Deal” thinking into the international sphere to create a stable institution national and international symmetry during the postwar era, according to Burley (1993), plus the emergence of global civil society, much of it drawing on the stage three critique of stage two liberal internationalism. This dialogue provoked a substantial response that forced liberal internationalism to expand the peace framework that it offered for a transition toward a stage four framework, to redress the challenges raised by stage three, particularly relating to the continuation of colonialism, the circumscription of rights, and inequality. The beginnings of this process could be seen in the Helsinki Accords of 1975, which connected foreign policy, human rights, and the reemergence of a European and potentially global order, which capitalized on the evolving international peace architecture (see for more Soutou 2000).

The Helsinki Accords, signed by the USA, the Soviet Union, and most European states, linked state sovereignty, international and regional organization, law, and economic and social development with human rights to Western foreign policy (Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe Final Act 1975). In this way, it provided a platform to bring the previous stages of the international architecture together and to resolve some of its inconsistencies in the emerging stage four:

Recognizing the close link between peace and security in Europe and in the world as a whole and conscious of the need for each of them to make its contribution to the strengthening of world peace and security and to the promotion of fundamental rights, economic and social progress and well-being for all peoples. (Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe Final Act 1975, preamble, see also Chapters I-IX, emphasis in the original)

Thus, stage four in the evolution of the international peace architecture, drawing on a long tradition of the expansion of rights in the West, stabilized the existing layers of the architecture while enormously expanding its overall scope. It required a much higher set of standards than there might have been post-World War II or in the early Cold War period (United Nations, General Assembly 1948, 1966; United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2018; DeGooyer et al. 2018; Arendt 1951; Bailliet and Larsen 2015, p. 9; Sassen 2006). “Agenda for Peace,” published by the UN Secretary General in 1992, later captured some of the developments, in that it linked “. . . social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom” with prevention, peacekeeping, and peacebuilding as well as disarmament, drawing stages one to four together:

The sources of conflict and war are pervasive and deep. To reach them will require our utmost effort to enhance respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, to promote sustainable economic and social development for wider prosperity, to alleviate distress and to curtail the existence and use of massively destructive weapons. (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 1992, para.3,5)

Responsibility to Protect (R2P) in 2005 was to become a logical outcome of this path (Bellamy 2015), but it was not until 2018 that the UN issued a document that captured the full implications of these debates, including prevention, root causes, expanded rights and a reconceptualized understanding of the state, inclusion and gender issues, and questions of social, economic, and global justice. There was a dawning realization of the fuller dimensions of the international peace architecture (UN documents were also beginning to use the term “peacebuilding architecture”) required to deal with such a broad form of peace:

The scale and nature of the challenge of sustaining peace calls for closer strategic and operational partnerships among the United Nations, national Governments and other key stakeholders, including international, regional and subregional organizations, international financial institutions, civil society organizations, women’s groups, youth organizations and the private sector, taking into account national priorities and policies. In today’s complex world, those partnerships need to harness the energies of all sectors of society. The United Nations is one partner among others, and all partners need to come together in support of the efforts of Governments. (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2018, para.6)

The consequence was the creation of a relatively fairer, more stable, and prosperous state and international environment than so far ever seen in history, even when seen from the perspective of the subaltern. Indeed, the latter “subaltern perspective” was to become even more significant as a result. Many of the ideas now widely accepted in stages two to four about the qualities of contemporary peace and order had first emerged in long series of anti-war and humanitarian, developmental, or standard-setting conferences, workshops, and conventions, often driven by civil society actors spanning the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Debate and pressure coalesced in the fourth layer of the international peace architecture, including institutions such as the UN and its agencies, NATO, the EU, AU, other regional organizations, the international financial institutions, the various international courts and law, the donor systems, and a range of NGOs. Even so, with the emergence of this layer, progress was slow and heavily biased toward the global north and to the remnants of imperial, sovereign, and authoritarian power (Nicolson 1946; Kissinger 1957; Little 1989; Jervis 1986; Mearsheimer 2019; Nardin 2019; Doyle 1997).

One can see, nonetheless, in this historical evolution the social construction of the international and the states-system, partially aligned with social claims for security, rights, welfare, and justice. This process positioned a layer of liberal internationalism, democratization, and human rights, upon the nineteenth-century balance-of-power system, smoothing the way for the mitigation of imperial and state-centric war, as well as civil war. Through this process subaltern claims were represented in several waves (Reaul-Smit 2011) through stages three and four to the degree allowed by existing knowledge-power structures. Public goods developed to maintain peace and order through institutions, law, development, and legitimacy across local to global scales. Overall, stage four hybridized liberal and social welfarist versions of peace (such as the New Deal and Marshall Plan), as well as everyday and post-colonial versions (see, e.g., United Nations, General Assembly 1960, 1966) (such as from the Non-Aligned Movement of the 1960s). Practical association was to follow function and form, eventually giving rise to a hybrid international society, much of which can now be historically observed (Nardin 1983; Buzan 1993). It provided the framework for a substantial, postwar international peace architecture, realized in mix of geopolitics and liberal architecture, captured in the alignment and density of the international peace architecture by stage four. It was more resilient in terms of its institutional and legal architecture and perhaps more responsive to subaltern claims.

Thus, the UN and Bretton Woods system, postwar, has overseen enormous, though unequal, gains in security and human welfare, supported by NATO, regional organizations such as the EU, and an expanding list of donors, IFIs, INGOs, and NGOs, as well as many other related organizations. Yet this architecture is paradoxical and unstable, as any system of checks and balances tends to be. The state was seen as both the nexus for peace at the elite, diplomatic, and international level and a key blockage for the kind of transformation necessary from the subject, individual, or subaltern perspective (Wallerstein 2002). There was a similar pattern in relation to security and capital. Hence, the emergence of global institutions and international law, as well as democracy and human rights, as practical and normative elements of stage four. Transnational and local civil society saw itself as separate to the state and the international and vital to the codependent development of both (Pyykkönen 2015, p. 11; Keck and Sikkink 1998). The system is deeply rooted in the evolution of Western hegemony, just as in general institutions and power relations are deeply rooted in any society's past (Acemoglu and Robinson 2012, p. 44). Yet, it is also supposed to offer a Parsonian natural equilibrium (Reed and Harvey 2007, p. 365), under global governance and Western hegemony. Often a "far from equilibrium" situation was therefore put down to localized cultural, social, and historical deficiencies, meriting interventionary practices for peace and development (Reed and Harvey 2007, p. 366).

Internal Contradictions, Blockages, and Counter-Peace

The internal tensions in the different elements of the international peace architecture, its state-centric nature (drawing on nineteenth-century geopolitics), and elite political, economic, and social power also mean that the architecture has become more entrenched and difficult to reform as it expands. This is partly because it simultaneously provokes revanchist and counterrevolutionary forces associated with systems of geopolitics, nationalism, race, class, gender, and capital. Indeed, at every step along the way, the development of peace and its related architecture has involved confronting and challenging existing vested power structures, residing in society, in empires and the state, the economy, the military, oligarchy, and ideology, among other locations of power.

The architecture's capacity is very much reactive—peace is formed after the event of war and conflict due to a mix of social and elite forces, and it is not able to anticipate the nature of future wars because of its limited capacities and the fact that new wars tend to shift character. This is made worse by the opposition between social and elite approaches to peace, security, and order. The early "hybrid peace" of empire and sovereignty has given way to other forms of hybrid peace, increasingly associated with a state-mediated version of local and international politics (mediated by custom, identity, liberalism, neoliberalism, and the influences of global networks). However, this path has not been smooth, because of Western suspicion about the counter-discourses of the development world, especially after the Bandung Conference after 1955 (Devetak et al. 2016). The West saw claims for decolonial demands for liberty and global justice as producing revolutionary resistance to its dominance at a risky moment in the Cold War, rather than developing a more appropriate response to ever-expanding rights claims as everyday subaltern political claims became clearer in international politics. Elite power and social actors have both been instrumental in such mediation over history, indicating how the evolution of the international peace architecture has been inevitably entangled with its nemesis: a counter-peace architecture.

The international peace architecture has thus suffered something of a “death of a thousand cuts,” on critical and conservative “counterrevolutionary” fronts (Posen 2014, p. 175). This has partly been because of the challenge of inconsistency in maintaining a common, normative order (see the cases of Syria since 2011 and Rwanda in 1994 versus say Kosovo and Bosnia in the late 1990s) and partly because of what Michael Mann (1984) called the challenge of the autonomous power of the state: the way in which it uses infrastructural power to divide and penetrate civil society, supporting the territorial centralization of state power rather than the expansion of human rights. This has in turn been altered by neoliberalism and the current digital shift and their influence on the overall architecture. The relationship between postcolonial sovereignty and human rights, as well as the requirement of a state to enforce human rights, has been uneasy, to say the least. Indeed, as Huntington (1968) argued in the 1960s, political systems decay and break down when they are no longer able to meet evolving or emerging challenges. The authoritarian impulse is never far away under such circumstances, especially in view of the fact that emancipation, justice, and rights claims are an inevitable challenge to entrenched and failing power structures, which will resist them (Pugh 2005). Even now the numbers of democratic states appear to be declining or shifting toward authoritarian capitalism. Thus, the international peace architecture is evolving precisely because it is entangled with the very forces of war and violence it was supposed to tame. A counter-peace framework is also emerging which opposes its influence in international relations.

The example of peacebuilding in Bosnia-Herzegovina is illustrative of stage four and its limitations. The dominant process over the period since the 1995 Dayton Peace Accords has not merely been UN, OSCE, and EU supported peacebuilding and the peace process (Caplan 2000; Chandler 2000; Woodward 1996) although some progress has been made (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). Dominant power structures have revived. These have blocked reforms, stopped the expansion of civil society, and pushed back the rule of law. They have also limited the scope for action of the Office of the High Representative, making it very difficult to move beyond the Dayton Agreement (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). Neither the EU or the USA has been able to build their version of peace, and the UN has been similarly ineffective in the face of local and regional politics (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). Bosnia’s progress toward EU accession has stalled, as has civil society’s localization (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). The offending power structures were based upon the rents they receive from ethnic conflict and tension, ethnonationalism, territorialism and boundaries, secessionism, militarism, as well as the gains made from unregulated capital (Belloni 2020, p. 81). The peacebuilding elements of the Dayton Peace Accords were merely contained in an Annex, after all (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 1995).

The UN, EU, and other organizations appeared to be trying to build a more sophisticated peace but, in the end, have supported stabilization-type policies (Belloni 2020, p. 235). The peacebuilding process enabled continuity in public office, institutions, and clientelistic elites, who subverted democracy, rights, development, and civil society in their interests in a complex double moment (Belloni 2020, p. 81). This made international actors think they had control while devolving power on a growing basis to local actors and civil society. This produced dependence and a negative peace based upon ethnonationalism, power-sharing, and neoliberalism (Belloni, pp. 82, 204). By 2017, senior international actors thought “local ownership” strategies had failed (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). Civil society began to develop a familiar critique based on class, human rights, and social democracy, one which was not audible to the international community, thus replaying important elements of Yugoslavian history but without the resolution Tito once achieved or the more recent focus on democracy of human rights. These dynamics offer an insight into the counter-peace framework:

Peacebuilding become increasingly hijacked by local gate-keepers bent on continuing the exploitation of economic and political opportunities afforded to them by permissive neo-liberal economic policies. . . they achieved mostly superficial changes that did not impact [upon] either the deeper societal structures or the domestic elites’ power base. (Belloni 2020, p. 231)

In addition, the state’s resources were being plundered within the same framework, as well as its labor being appropriated by multinational interests, leading to social unrest and the formation of attempts to govern from below with limited results (Belloni and Ramović 2020; Ramović 2018). Yet, it is still common to hear from international actors that more privatization is required, even though this has tended to hand power to various oligarchs (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). These counter-peace dynamics challenged and neutralized the liberal peacebuilding framework of the 1990s. They undermined its social, political, economic, and legal frameworks, as well as attempts at regional and international governance through the EU, OSCE, UN, and donor system.

International actors themselves were also very divided, both within and outside the Western alliance framework, by interests and normative and practical approaches to maintain a coherent position (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). The EU has been suffering from “accession fatigue” in the region, and Republika Srpska would prefer a regional alliance with Serbia and Russia. Thus, geopolitics is rearing its head along with ethnonationalism once again (Confidential Source, personal communication, August 9, 2017). Space has been created for both by the deadlock within political community over state reform and international support. Thus, taking a counter-peace perspective underlines how stage one of the international peace architecture has not solved geopolitics in the region and stage two is deadlocked because democracy is in stalemate, partly because of geopolitics but also because of the failure of development policies. The expansion of rights has been uncertain (as the civil protests in BiH of 2014 illustrated) and cannot work without the other layers operating too, especially through external support. This has meant that reconciliation has been replaced by entrenchment on a mass scale.

The Emergence of Stage Five

The more the complexity of the international peace architecture, the more it risked failure as it challenged the geopolitical power structures of stage one in the international peace architecture and raised expectations of expanded rights and intervention to promote political order in stages two to four. The commensurate and receding gradations of sovereignty and agency from north to south have long been noted (Hobson 2012, p. 19). This undermined the complex processes of security, institutionalization, rights, and development, effectively undermining common projects and misallocating “surpluses” in the evolving architecture (Tainter 1988, pp. 37, 190). This meant that by stage four the international peace architecture ran on a very low margin of reserve capacity under the conditions of global capitalism and the neoliberal state model. Its surpluses were run down, blocking reform (as discussions of UN reform have long illustrated) (Tainter 1988, pp. 60, 122; Chesterman 2011). Intervention (in the form of peacekeeping, mediation, peacebuilding, and development), the reform of the state, and civil peace formation processes were reactive rather than proactive processes. They operated within the framework of preserving states and only the most basic of rights (Cohen 2012, pp. 159–222).

Since the neoliberal shifts from the 1970s, the global north's hegemonic states along with authoritarian states in the south slowly retreated from the expansion of rights and equality as a political solution for war and violence. To some degree progress already made has helped mitigate the historical cycle of war, occupation, colonization, tribute, and trusteeship. Yet, systems of war and violence became increasingly complex and opaque (even despite their growing academic exploration). They were no longer analytically legible through the state or a liberal international states-system. In parallel, the growth of complex systems of governance designed to prevent local, state, and international conflict by redressing social, economic, and territorial grievances was now consuming vast amounts of energy, resources, and political will. Much of the peace work of the last two decades has been status quo oriented, as "stabilization" approaches appeared to replace peacekeeping and peacebuilding (as in Syria since 2011) (Brown 2018). A loss of energy and political will due to a decline in marginal returns for the liberal peace and neoliberal state-building pointed to a loss of legitimacy and a concurrent growth of complexity (Tainter 1988, p. 116).

The 2000s saw the rise of an authoritarian and neoliberal peace in stage five of the international peace architecture. It was focused on state-building and regional security, supported by global capital, in the hope that this would buttress the development of legitimate authority in conflict-affected environments such as Afghanistan and Iraq:

The long-term vision for international engagement in fragile states is to help national reformers to build effective, legitimate, and resilient state institutions, capable of engaging productively with their people to promote sustained development. (Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development 2007)

It was often supported implicitly by the West for reasons of security and a lack of political will or by the newer powers, such as China, for reasons of trade and regional influence. This process has been careless with both the local and global legitimacy of the existing international peace architecture, as Toby Dodge (2006, pp. 188–189) states:

To quote Condoleezza Rice, then US National Security Advisor and Bush confidante: 'The concept was that we would defeat the army, but the institutions would hold, everything from ministries to police forces.' . . . The unpredicted collapse of the state in the immediate aftermath of the seizure of Baghdad dramatically changed the nature and extent of the USA's involvement in Iraq. . . Attempts at rebuilding the state in Iraq, not the original plan for limited reform, have proved to be far more complex, requiring much greater expertise and resources than anyone in the US government had anticipated or planned for.

What emerged with stage five was an unstable version of the victor's peace, mirrored by the case in Sri Lanka after the collapse of the Norwegian-backed peace process in 2002 and the rise of President Rajapaksa's nationalist and militarist regime as well as his ongoing incursions into the state while in political opposition (Perera, personal communication, 17 November 2015; Perera, Seminar, Manchester University, 13 December 2018) and at the far end of the scale the tragic case of the Syrian war since 2011.

Growing Instabilities in the Overall International Peace Architecture

The contradictions of the global north's stage four and stage five frameworks in the international peace architecture soon emerged between territoriality, borders, rights, and capitalism, as well as its paternalistic and ideological overtones, which have undermined its global legitimacy and progressive goals. Its capacity to build legitimacy and oversee the handover of power peacefully through elections was not in doubt, but the political agenda that dominated reform templates in conflict-affected societies have been powerfully challenged. To quote Habermas (2015, pp. 47–49) "One size fits all fits no one." Rather than an alignment of power through multilateralism in stage four, global governance in stage five turned to neoliberal, technological, and military hegemony rather than human rights or social justice (see, e.g., Pegram 2015, p. 585) (not to mention global justice), undermining the entire architecture as well as the micro-processes within it (e.g., peacekeeping, peacebuilding, and mediation). Indeed, global governance diffuses and fragments the power needed to achieve rights and social justice from a subaltern perspective.

Immanuel Wallerstein, through his core-periphery perspective, argued that the world faced a structural crisis as a consequence of such tensions (Wallerstein 2002, pp. 3, 5). War is now experienced as a piecemeal, disaggregated, multiple phenomena: from the complex, regional, and civil war in Syria, guerrilla warfare as recently ended in Colombia, to urban violence as in Latin America, in particular, and the environmental and structural violence that global capital enables in its “misallocation of resources” toward multinational, oligarchical, and authoritarian actors as in the MENA region or sub-Saharan Africa (say in the DRC) or South East Asia (as perhaps in Cambodia). This echoes the old problem that transformative movements and processes often end up close to the stance they were trying to redress (often because power is persuasive and seductive, with an obvious advantage), as well as the old issue of whether transformation, reform, and emancipation are possible from within the status quo, or outside (i.e., a revolutionary or radical social movement aimed at broader forms of global justice). Empirically, as Wallerstein pointed out, there were periods in the twentieth century when radical movements were in the ascendancy, but they did not manage to directly transform the world (Wallerstein 2002, p. 5). Furthermore, more recent discursive theories discourage deep analysis of contemporary structural problems, focusing attention on communicative dynamics instead, which identify but do not redress injustice. Structural analyses, on the other hand, have since Marx suggested that power was needed to mitigate threats to social peace and order.

For example, mediation, peacekeeping, and peace processes were reserved from the 1950s for the most egregious threats to the Cold War balance, but with the arrival of peacebuilding doctrine in the 1990s, broader strategies were expected to deal with deeper instabilities and injustices by expanding the liberal international order. However, the international peace architecture by the 1990s was under great pressure to expand further to accommodate not just post-colonial conflicts but also post-Soviet and developmental conflicts. This meant that substantial elements of the international peace architecture (e.g., stage one to five preserved the northern-dominated hierarchy) were increasingly opposed to the structural changes required to stabilize the international order and in tension with other elements such as the expansion of rights and concerns with justice (in stages three and four). This shift toward more decentralized forms of globalism, pluralism, and localism has had the unintended consequence of fragmenting the power and agency needed to make peace. It is dependent upon ever broader tools and programs of intervention (Buzan and Lawson 2015, p. 273). Many of these interventions govern consequences rather than causes, and this can be seen in numerous Research Council calls in the UK, as well as in a more general appeal for more applied research to be carried out using large data sets or new technologies, while disguising the relationship between peace, power, and knowledge and narrowing emancipatory practices to a minimalist level. As Chandler (2015) has argued, the focus of intervention has moved from the causes of conflict to managing its effects.

Potential for the Architecture: Stage Six

“We cannot continue to work with twentieth-century tools in the twenty-first century”

Herve Ladsous, Head of UN Peacekeeping (UN peacekeeping chief wants more drones 2014)

Holsti offered an early notion of the need for multiple elements necessary for a viable peace system, including legitimate authority and governance and the capacity for peaceful change and conflict resolution (Holsti 1991). This has been increasingly reflected over time in the development of the UN; donor, regional, and INGO system; international law; and expanded notions of rights. These have been crucial in the reconstitution of sustainable political order as it developed across layers of the international peace architecture (Schwartz 2010, p. 8). Stage six of the architecture inevitably requires constant intellectual innovation and material and geopolitical investment, as well as support for its rights expansion and transversal dynamics. As a global framework its global legitimacy is paramount: yet the "... undermining of the landmarks of modernization" is well underway (Cerny and Prichard 2017, p. 380). As Beck (2013, p. 26) argued so cogently, the international peace "project" (or in his case the European peace project) needs to address the problem of how the architecture might be improved. Perfecting the state now means expanding rights into temporal, environmental, and thus material areas to reflect subaltern claims. Democratizing the international adds a concern with global inequalities and long-term sustainability, as raised by global civil society networks, as well as emancipatory global governance linked to global justice. Such a trajectory challenges geopolitics and geo-economics, excavates socio- and anthropocentric versions of politics, and points to deep relationality across societies and the deep structures of the environment or commons (Connolly 2017, p. 121).

The social content of security, peace, rights, development, and order is foregrounded under these new structural conditions, rather than the empirical nature of the state, security, or economy, these now being components of a twenty-first-century peace rather than its main priority. This reaffirms the local, social, and micro "turns," which have recently gained ground (Solomon and Steele 2017) and are actually extensions of a long process of "rights seeking" across cultural, political, social, and economic terrains by populations around the world since the nineteenth century. This process, associated with the emergence and expansion of human rights, has led to historical structural change which in the recent "decolonial epoch" has been associated with pushing beyond a core-periphery colonial or economic system (Dhawan 2014, p. 70; Wallerstein 2002).

Thus, it would be expected that a version of peacebuilding in the new stage six framework would deal with underlying power structures, represent social practices and build transversal, trans-scalar, and transnational political, institutional, legal, bureaucratic frameworks. This would advance the previous state-centric, multilateral, international law and trade networks, as well as deepening global civil society.

Firstly, it requires a viable international political architecture with the capacity to manage and resolve the conflicts of the day. It would be made up over the long term of multiple, sedimental layers of actors, dynamics, laws, institutions, and networks, which firstly neutralize each era's war and conflict dynamics. Secondly, these layers should maintain themselves in relation to the other layers of the architecture, providing stability in the long term. Thirdly, taken all together they must be sufficiently stable to offer a platform for the expansion of future layers of the architecture as new conflict types emerge.

This social construction rests from local to global scale to some degree on an Aristotelian realization that political community from the local to the global is an association or many relational entanglements. It is made up of cooperative relationships aimed at justice, security, and rights, as well as emancipation and equality. It does not merely represent a Hobbesian contracting out of self-preservation through a social contract to a Leviathan state (and international system) or a Lockean conversion of natural rights into civil rights under the paternalistic state (or international hegemony). This perspective brings together realist, liberal, constructivist, and critical views of the history of IR, following Gilpin's (as cited in Ikenberry 2013, p. 3) observations about the connection between governance and hegemony, order formation, and the foundations of international order. It indicates that the international architecture has been formed through two processes: first, a linear process of liberal institution and constitution building, perhaps leading to some sort of global federation, and second, partly by the micro-powers that actualize subaltern political claims, which is a far more networked, transversal process, leading to more decentralized systems of governance.

If such a path were to come to fruition, this would point to peace with reconciliation, equality, justice, and sustainability, across issue areas, networks, and scales. This new layer is also shaped by practices, emotions, and everyday spatial, historical understandings of complex agency, which is mobile and networked (Lefebvre [1947] 1991). It is transversal, trans-scalar, post-nationalist, and concerned with long-term sustainability, foreshadowing complex frameworks of global justice. This means the further expansion and enhancement of rights in the light of new structural global conditions, subjectivity, and political claims and a new and broader understanding of legitimacy, which has emerged especially at the social level, if not at the international or state levels (from Arendt 1951; DeGooyer et al. 2018, p. 4). Mobility, relationality, and networks (assemblages which cannot be defined solely as local or global) (Sassen 2006) underpin this shift through which critical agency at the social level engages with power structures at the state or global levels while doing their utmost to avoid domination (see, e.g., Foucault 1980). The former aims to provide a relational and pluralist ontology for international relations (IR) that is far more stable and sustainable than the older notions of the territorial sovereignty or cosmopolitan/Eurocentric norms, state encompassment, and vertical hierarchy (Ferguson and Gupta 2002, p. 988).

An Alternative Path: Stage Six as Digital Governmentality

More negative alternatives are also on the horizon, such as the possibilities of a Pax Technica (see Howard 2015), a hybrid of neoliberalism and new technologies of power, extending many of the older, predatory patterns of elite political power, which might be termed “digital governmentality.” “Pax Technica” is a new empire drawing on a technical rationality that emerges from networked devices, networked power, and networked society. It undermines the states-system and democracy, as well as the concept of the state as a self-determining unit, as such concepts are transcended by a range of networks [Howard (2015), pp. xx, 1, 33, 35; see also Marcuse (1968) as cited in (Duffield 2018, p. 41)]. This highlights recent tendencies for de-liberalization following authoritarian instincts, reinforcing the hierarchical international architecture of relatively exclusive territorial states, as incidentally illustrated by UNDP’s Human Development Index. This rejects Polyani’s (Polyani et al. 1957) argument that redistribution is the basic function of political order and instead deploys new tools to maintain political and economic inequality and injustice to buttress public reason and existing power relations through the search for “. . . an experimental tool in a terrestrial struggle to covert history and politics in to information and data” (Duffield 2018, pp. 153–154).

There is a “counterrevolutionary” tendency inherent in this new layer, pushing back at expanded rights and scientific claims about sustainability and global justice. Older concerns with land and territory, as well as material resources, still represent the base of modern direct, structural, and governmental power. This means that the development of the stage six toward justice and sustainability would be almost immediately blocked by digital governmentality, which deflects stage six and allows stage one to reemerge, drawing on the blockages and the counter-peace that began to reemerge in stages four and five.

Summary

The international peace architecture offers different and often contradictory sediments or layers of contemporary IR—between geopolitics, capitalism, law, rights and norms, cooperative institutional development, and the search for a deeper justice and sustainability. Firstly, the history of global power relations and hegemony has produced an informal and public political and economic architecture, which might be equated with the evolution of negative peace in international relations. Secondly, the victor’s peace, the liberal peace, and the neoliberal peace have been the recent historical forms under European and US trusteeship and tutelage, brought together in a second layer, the liberal peace. Thirdly, this provided a platform for the “rights of the governed” to expand, as the subject was valorized and protected, both supported and restrained by the state and international law as in stage four. Each new step opened up further possibilities in view of the broad goals of emancipatory peace thinking (Goulder 2015, pp. 16, 20). Finally, there are also emerging neoliberal retrenchments and digital and technological forms of conflict, which shape stages five and six. They need a “peace” response and a new layer of the international peace architecture to respond to them.

The direction of the development of the concept of peace in broad terms suggests a journey from the victor’s peace (imperialism), a social peace (based upon political, social, and economic rights), the liberal peace (liberal democratic states, rights, trade, and international law and organization), a neoliberal peace (state security and global trade), to peace with global justice. The latter, as reflected in the recent UN SDGs and Sustaining Peace agenda, connects peace with environmental sustainability, gender, and distributive and historical justice, suggesting an agonistic yet consensus-based form. This could be described as new framing of peace related to global justice, beyond state-centric and liberal public reason and in a postcolonial framework.

This architecture, spanning from “Plato to NATO” (or the warfare state to the internationalized welfare state, the liberal peace and onward to the globally governed neoliberal state), needs stabilizing and augmenting by global justice dimensions, raising the question of how to overcome blockages to peace and a subsequent counter-peace system, a general loss of legitimacy, and the growing confusion over ad hoc sovereign responses to global problems (see for example BRICS Information Centre 2014). The theoretical-historical architecture this exploration of the international peace architecture denotes is unstable, torn by its internal contradictions and a changing global environment. It represents a complex and exceptionally fragile interlocking framework of norms, tools, institutions, laws, rights, and balances, related to the evolution of international order, often developing retrospectively after its many breakdowns. Stage six is bifurcated between conceptions of global justice, which connect peace processes, peacekeeping, peacebuilding, and conflict transformation, with historical and distributive forms of justice, and digital governmentality. The scene is set for further developments to stabilize the existing layers of the architecture and produce new layers designed to deal with the changing dimensions of war and conflict.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peace and Political Unsettling
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace

References

- Acemoglu, D., & Robinson, J. A. (2012). Why nations fail: The origins of power, prosperity, and poverty. London: Profile.
- Archibugi, D. (1992). Models of international organization in perpetual peace projects. Review of International Studies, 18(4), 295–317.
- Arendt, H. (1951). The origins of totalitarianism. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Bailliet, C. M., & Larsen, K. M. (2015). Introduction. In C. M. Bailliet & K. M. Larsen (Eds.), Promoting peace through international law (pp. 1–18). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Baker, R. S., & Dodds, W. E. (Eds.). (1927). The public papers of Woodrow Wilson: War and peace: Presidential messages, addresses, and public papers (1917–1924) (Vol. II). New York/London: Harper.
- Beck, U. (2013). German Europe. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Bellamy, A. (2015). The responsibility to protect turns ten. Ethics & International Affairs, 29(2), 161–185.
- Belloni, R. (2020). The rise and fall of peacebuilding in the Balkans. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Belloni, R., & Ramović, J. (2020). Elite and everyday social contracts in Bosnia and Herzegovina: Pathways to forging a national social contract? Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(1), 42–63.
- Brasset, J., & Tsingou, E. (2011). The politics of legitimate global governance. Review of International Political Economy, 18(1), 1–16.
- BRICS Information Centre. (2014, July 15). The 6th BRICS summit: Fortaleza declaration. Retrieved October 2020, from <http://www.brics.utoronto.ca/docs/140715-leaders.html>
- Brown, F. Z. (2018, October 26). Dilemmas of stabilization assistance: The case of Syria. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Retrieved 2020 October, from <https://carnegieendowment.org/2018/10/26/dilemmas-of-stabilization-assistance-case-of-syria-pub-77574>
- Bull, H. (1977). The anarchical society: A study of order in world politics. London: Macmillan.

- Burley, A. M. (1993). Regulating the world: Multilateralism, international law and the projection of the new Deal regulatory state. In J. Ruggie (Ed.), Multilateralism matters (pp. 125–156). New York: Columbia University Press.
- Buzan, B. (1993). From international system to international society: Structural realism and regime theory meet the English school. International Organization, 47(3), 327–352.
- Buzan, B., & Lawson, G. (2015). The global transformation: History, modernity and the making of international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Caplan, R. (2000). Assessing the Dayton accord: The structural weaknesses of the general framework agreement for peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Diplomacy & Statecraft, 11(2), 213–232.
- Cavalcante, F. (2019). Peacebuilding in the United Nations: Coming into life. London: Palgrave.
- Cemy, P. G., & Prichard, A. (2017). The new anarchy: Globalisation and fragmentation in world politics. Journal of International Political Theory, 13(3), 378–394.
- Chandler, D. (2000). Bosnia: Faking democracy after Dayton. London: Pluro Press.
- Chandler, D. (2015). Reconceptualizing international intervention: Statebuilding, ‘organic processes’ and the limits of causal knowledge. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 9(1), 70–88.
- Chandler, D. (2017). Peacebuilding: The twenty years’ crisis, 1997–2017. London: Palgrave.
- Chesterman, S. (2011, July 12). The outlook for UN reform. NYU School of Law, Public Law Research Paper(11–55). Retrieved from <https://ssrn.com/abstract=1885229> or <https://doi.org/10.2139/ssrn.1885229>.
- Cohen, J. L. (2012). Globalization and sovereignty: Rethinking legality, legitimacy, and constitutionalism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe Final Act. (1975, August 1). Retrieved from OSCE: <https://www.osce.org/files/f/documents/5/c/39501.pdf>
- Confidential Source. (2017, August 9). Personal communication, Office of the High Representative. Sarajevo, BiH
- Connolly, W. E. (2017). Facing the planetary: Entangled humanism and the politics of swarming. Durham: Duke University Press.
- DeGooyer, S., Hunt, A., Maxwell, L., Moyn, S., & Taylor, A. (2018). The right to have rights. London: Verso.
- Deleuze, G., & Guattari, F. (1987). A thousand plateaus. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Desmond, M. (2014). Relational ethnography. Theory and Society, 43(5), 547–579.
- Devetak, R., Dunne, T., & Nurhayati, R. T. (2016). Bandung 60 years on: Revolt and resilience in international society. Australian Journal of International Affairs, 70(4), 358–373.
- Dhawan, N. (2014). Decolonizing enlightenment: Transnational justice, human rights and democracy in a postcolonial world. Berlin/Toronto: Opladen/Verlag Barbara Budrich.
- Dodge, T. (2006). Iraq: The contradictions of exogenous state-building in historical perspective. Third World Quarterly, 27(1), 187–200.
- Doyle, M. (1997). Ways of war and peace: Realism, liberalism, and socialism. New York: Norton.
- Duffield, M. (2018). Post-humanitarianism: Governing precarity in the digital world. Cambridge: Polity.
- Ferguson, J., & Gupta, A. (2002). Spatializing states: Towards and ethnography of neoliberal governmentality. American Ethnologist, 29(4), 981–1002.
- Foucault, M. (1980). Power/knowledge: Selected interviews and other writings, 1972–1977. (Colin G.; Leo M.; John M., Ed. K. Soper, Trans.) New York: Pantheon Books.
- Foucault, M., & Miskowic, J. ([1984] 1986). Of other spaces. Diacritics, 16(1), 22–27.
- Goulder, B. (2015). Foucault and the politics of rights. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Habermas, J. (2015). The lure of technocracy. Cambridge: Polity.
- Hobson, J. (2012). The eurocentric conception of world politics: Western international theory, 1760–2010. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Holsti, K. J. (1991). Peace and war: Armed conflicts and international order, 1648–1989. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Howard, P. N. (2015). Pax technica. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Huntington, S. P. (1968). Political order in changing societies. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.
- Hurrell, A. (2008). On global order. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ikenberry, G. J. (2013). Power, order, and change in world politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jervis, R. (1986). From balance to concert: A study of international security cooperation. In K. A. Oye (Ed.), Cooperation under anarchy (pp. 58–79). Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Kaldor, M. (1999). New and old wars: Organized violence in a global era. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Kant, I. ([1795] 2003). To perpetual peace: A philosophical sketch. In Perpetual peace and other essays (trans: Humphrey, T.) Indianapolis: Hackett Publishing Company.
- Keck, M. E., & Sikkink, K. (1998). Activists beyond borders: Advocacy networks in international politics. New York: Cornell University Press.
- Keynes, J. M. ([1978] 2012). The collected writings of John Maynard Keynes (Vols. volume 17: Activities 1920–1922: Treaty revision and reconstruction). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kissinger, H. (1957). A world restored: Metternich, Castlereagh and the problems of peace 1812–1822. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

- Lefebvre, H. ([1947] 1991). The critique of everyday life (Vol. 1). (trans: J. Moore) London: Verso.
- Little, R. (1989). Deconstructing the balance of power: Two traditions of thought. Review of International Studies, 15(2), 87–100.
- Mann, M. (1984). The autonomous power of the state : Its origins, mechanisms and results. European Journal of Sociology, 25(2), 185–213.
- Marcuse, H. (1968). One dimensional man. London: Sphere Books.
- Marx, K., & Engels, F. ([1848] 2018). The communist manifesto: Penguin classics. London: Penguin.
- Mazower, M. (2009). No enchanted palace: The end of empire and the ideological origins of the United Nations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Mazower, M. (2012). Governing the world: The history of an idea. London: Penguin.
- Mearsheimer, J. J. (2019). Bound to fail: The rise and fall of the liberal international order. International Security, 43(4), 7–50.
- Morgenthau, H. J. (1940). Positivism, functionalism, and international law. The American Journal of International Law, 34(2), 260–284.
- Nardin, T. (1983). Law, morality and relations of states. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Nardin, T. (2019). The international legal order 1919–2019. International Relations, 33(2), 157–171.
- Nicolson, H. (1946). The congress of Vienna: A study in allied Unity, 1812–1822. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company.
- Nicolson, H. (1954). The evolution of diplomatic method. London: Constable.
- Nkrumah, K. (1963). Africa must unite. London: Heinemann.
- Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. (2007, April). Principles for good international engagement in fragile states and situations. Retrieved 2020 October, from <https://www.oecd.org/dac/conflict-fragility-resilience/docs/38368714.pdf>
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Pearson, L. B. (1969). Partners in development: Report of the commission on international development. New York: Praeger Publishers.
- Pegram, T. M. (2015). Introduction: Global governance in the interregnum. Millennium, 43(2), 584–597.
- Perera, J. (2015, November 17). Personal communication, Director, National Peace Council.
- Perera, J. (2018, December 13). Seminar, Colombo, Sri Lanka: Manchester University.
- Polanyi, K., Arensberg, C. M., & Pearson, H. W. (Eds.). (1957). Trade and market in the early empires: Economies in history and theory. New York: Free press.
- Posen, B. R. (2014). Restrain. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Pugh, M. (2005). The political economy of peacebuilding: A critical theory perspective. International Journal of Peace Studies, 10(2), 23–42.
- Pyykkönen, M. (2015). Liberalism, governmentality and counter-conduct; an introduction to Foucauldian analytics of Liberal civil society notions. Foucault Studies, 20, 8–35.
- Ramović, J. (2018). Looking into the past to see the future? Lessons learned from self-management for economies in post-conflict societies of the former Yugoslavia. Civil Wars, 20(2), 171–192.
- Reaul-Smit, C. (2011). Struggles for individual rights and the expansion of the international system. International Organization, 65(2), 207–242.
- Reed, M., & Harvey, D. L. (2007). The new science and the old: Complexity and realism in the social sciences. Journal for the Theory of Social Behaviour, 22(4), 353–380.
- Reus-Smit, C. (2013). Individual rights and the making of the international system. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2014). Failed statebuilding: Intervention, the state, and the dynamics of peace formation. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2016). Peace formation and political order in conflict affected societies. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (forthcoming). Peace in the 21st century. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. P., & Franks, J. (2008). Liberal peace transitions: Between statebuilding and peacebuilding. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Richmond, O. P., & Pogodda, S. (Eds.). (2016). Post-liberal peace transitions: Between peace formation and state formation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Rosenau, J. N. (1997). Along the domestic-foreign frontier: Exploring governance in a turbulent world. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Ruggie, J. G. (1993). In J. G. Ruggie (Ed.), Multilateralism matters: The theory and praxis of an institutional form (pp. 3–48). New York: Columbia University Press.
- Sassen, S. (2006). Territory, authority, rights: From medieval to global assemblages. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Schwartz, G. M. (2010). From collapse to generation. In G. M. Schwartz & J. J. Nichols (Eds.), After collapse: The regeneration of complex societies (pp. 1–17). Tucson: University of Arizona Press.
- Solomon, T., & Steele, B. J. (2017). Micro-moves in international relations theory. European Journal of International Relations, 23(2), 267–291.
- Soutou, G.-H. (2000). Was there a European order in the twentieth century? From the concert of Europe to the end of the cold war. Contemporary European History, 9(3), 329–353.
- Tainter, J. A. (1988). The collapse of complex societies. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Taylor, A. J. (1954). The struggle for mastery in Europe: 1848–1918. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Treaty of Adrianople—Charges Against Viscount Palmerston. (1848, March 1). Retrieved 2020 September, from Hansard 1803–2005, vol 97, cc66–123 : <https://api.parliament.uk/historic-hansard/commons/1848/mar/01/treaty-of-adrianople-charges-against>

UN peacekeeping chief wants more drones. (2014, May 30). Al Jazeera. Retrieved October 2020, from <https://www.aljazeera.com/news/2014/05/30/un-peacekeeping-chief-wants-more-drones/?gb=true>

United Nations, General Assembly. (1948, December 11). Right of peoples to peace. A/RES/39/11. United Nations.

United Nations, General Assembly. (1960, December 14). Declaration on the granting of Independence to colonial countries and peoples. A/RES/1514(XV). New York: United Nations.

United Nations, General Assembly. (1966, December 16). International covenant on economic, social and cultural rights (ECOSOC). New York: United Nations

United Nations, General Assembly. (1974, May 1). Declaration on the establishment of a new international economic order. A/Res/S/–6/3201. New York: United Nations.

United Nations, General Assembly. (2016, April 12). Review of the United Nations peacebuilding architecture. A/RES/70/262. New York: United Nations.

United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council. (1992, June). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping: Report of the secretary-general. A/47/277, S/24111. New York: United Nations.

United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council. (1995, November 30). General framework agreement for peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Dayton agreement). A/50/790, S/1995/999. New York

United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council. (2018, January 18). Peacebuilding and sustaining peace: Report of the secretary-general. New York: United Nations.

Wallerstein, I. (2002). New revolts against the system. Retrieved October 2020, from New Left Review: <https://newleftreview.org/issues/III18/articles/immanuel-wallerstein-new-revolts-against-the-system>

Webster, C. ([1925] 1931). The foreign policy of Castlereagh 1812–1815. London: Bell and Sons.

Woodward, S. L. (1996). Implementing peace in Bosnia and Herzegovina: A post-Dayton primer and memorandum of warning front cover. Foreign Policy Studies Program. Washington DC: Brookings Institution.

Zondi, S. (2017). African union approaches to peacebuilding: Efforts at shifting the continent towards decolonial peace. African Journal of Conflict Resolution, 17(1), 105–131.

Interpersonal

- Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Intersectional

- Feminist Peace Research

Intersectional Approach

- Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Intersectionality and Peace

Elena B. Stavrevska and Sarah Smith
Centre for Women, Peace and Security, London
School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK

Keywords

Intersectionality · Gender · Race · Class ·
Peace research · Peacebuilding

Synonyms

Inclusion; Interconnection

Definition

Intersectionality refers to how multiple factors or systems of power and oppression – such as gender, race, class, age, and sexuality – intersect in defining the societal structures and people’s lived experiences. In conflict-affected societies, intersectionality helps in understanding not only the kinds of violence people might suffer but also the varied interests, needs, agencies, and views toward what constitutes inclusive and sustainable peace. This approach, however, has so far largely been absent in both peace research and peacebuilding practice.

Introduction

Originally coined by Kimberlé W. Crenshaw (1989), a US critical legal race scholar, intersectionality was deployed to bring to the fore the experiences of oppression of women of color and how these experiences were based on multiple intersecting axes of social division, in particular race, gender, and class. In her work, Crenshaw (1989, 1991) showed how women of color were often unable to access the protections of race and sex discrimination legislation as their experiences were seen to not fully conform to either. In this way, Crenshaw (1989, p. 140) argued that “any analysis that does not take intersectionality into account cannot sufficiently address the particular manner in which Black women are subordinated” as their experiences were not wholly dictated by either racism or sexism. Since then, intersectionality has generated a wealth of literature across disciplines and has been understood as a theory, a method, and a heuristic device.

These ideas at the core of intersectionality are not, though, confined to North America or the Global North more broadly, nor have they been unexplored before Crenshaw’s articulation of intersectionality and its subsequent gaining prominence. Indeed, people in the Global South have long conceptualized intersectionality and used it as an analytical tool, even if they did not use the specific term. (The Global South–Global North distinction is used in reference to the political and economic divide between countries in the world, whereby the two terms do not depict geographic locations per se, but rather uneven global hierarchies of power rooted in colonial histories of exploitation and appropriation. Definitions vary, but the Global South generally includes Africa, developing Eurasia, Latin America and the Caribbean, the Middle East/North Africa, the Pacific, and South and Southeast Asia.) For instance, in Borderlands/La Frontera: The New Mestiza, Anzaldúa (1987), and then, in This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color, Moraga and Anzaldúa (1981) center the Chicano and Latino experiences, as well as the experiences of women of color, whose subjectivities and identities have been shaped through gender, race, colonialism, and sexuality, among others. There is also a significant body of literature that attests to prior delineation of how interlocking and intersecting factors shape human experience, most notably, but not only, by Black activists and feminists and post-colonial, Indigenous, Latina, and queer scholars (Collins 1990; Combahee River Collective 1977; hooks 1981; Valdes 1997).

Since the emergence of intersectionality as a specific term in women’s studies and beyond, there have been a number of debates on its definition (Crenshaw 1991; Staunæs 2003; Yuval-Davis 2006). It is unsurprising that people understand intersectionality in many different ways. Some view it as a theory, others as a method, still others as a reading strategy for (feminist) analysis (Davis 2008, p. 68). The most common use, nevertheless, is as a concept, a heuristic device or an analytical tool (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 17). To that end, Davis (2008, p. 78) convincingly argues that it is precisely the concept’s “lack of precision and its myriad missing pieces that have made it such a useful heuristic device.” She further argues that it is intersectionality’s encouragement of complexity and creativity that motivates scholars to raise new questions, explore uncharted territories, and engage critically with their own assumptions (Collins and Bilge 2016, pp. 78–79). For the purposes of this piece however, we find Collins and Bilge’s (2016, p. 14) definition useful, as it discourages an understanding of inequalities as bound by a single axis of social, political, economic, or other division. Instead, an understanding of power as mediated through multiple lines of power and identity is necessary:

Intersectionality is a way of understanding and analysing the complexity in the world, in people, and in human experiences. The events and conditions of social and political life and the self can seldom be understood as shaped by one factor.

They are generally shaped by many factors in diverse and mutually influencing ways. When it comes to social inequality, people's lives and the organisation of power in a given society are better understood as being shaped not by a single axis of social division, be it race or gender or class, but by many axes that work together and influence each other. Intersectionality as an analytic tool gives people better access to the complexity of the world and of themselves.

Despite the ambiguities and the diversity of understandings and approaches, Collins and Bilge (2016) identify six core themes and ideas that (re)appear across the different uses of intersectionality. While these ideas are not always present in all research, nor do they appear in the same manner, they do provide useful guideposts for thinking through intersectionality (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 40). The first one is social inequality, which within intersectional frameworks is recognized as based on interactions among different factors, thus moving analysis beyond a class-only or race-only approach, for example (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 40). The second one is power, in the case of which intersectional analyses focus on the interlocking, mutually constructing, or intersecting systems of power, such as race, class, gender, ethnicity, age, religion, sexuality, and others, that shape people's lives and identities (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 41). Another common idea is relationality, which "rejects either/or binary thinking and embraces a both/and frame instead," therefore allowing for the analytical gaze to be directed at the interconnections, rather than the distinctions between entities and systems (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 42). The fourth theme that Collins and Bilge highlight is social context, the attention to which grounds any intersectional analysis (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 43). The fifth and the sixth core ideas are complexity and social justice. The former points to intersectionality aiming to grasp and analyze the complexity of the world (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 43). The latter, on the other hand, is perhaps the most contentious of the six ideas, since it is not a requirement, but intersectionality has been used as an analytical tool for social justice as well (Collins and Bilge 2016, p. 45).

Intersectionality in Peace Research

The use of intersectional analysis in understanding peace is necessary for many reasons, not least of which is that the individuals and institutions engaged in both peace research and peacebuilding are constituted by intersectional identities and experiences. Moreover, as Phoenix and Pattynama (2006, p. 187) rightly note, intersectionality acknowledges and approaches social positions as relational, and it sheds light on the complex power relations that shape everyday life. It pushes against "hegemonic disciplinary, epistemological, theoretical, and conceptual boundaries" (Dhamoon 2011, p. 230) and thus challenges assumptions that can be problematically (re)produced within peace research.

In contrast, both peacebuilding practice and mainstream peace studies literature have predominantly approached the examination of post-war societies in a static and unidimensional manner, portraying events, practices, and actors as fixed in space, time, and identity. Namely, scholars and practitioners have often used a "snapshot" approach (Kappler 2015) in analyzing conflict-affected societies, where experiences, contexts, and identities are flattened, and a high degree of homogeneity is assumed. This has sometimes resulted in communities not being analyzed within their specific historical, social, and political context, as well as interests, needs, and experiences of certain groups being assumed as homogenous.

In that snapshot approach, peace and reconciliation have often been understood as a mirror image of the preceding war. For example, when a conflict is characterized as a clash between different ethnicities, peace is viewed as a state of those ethnicities reconciling or at the very least tolerating each other, which is then reflected in the decision- and policy-making processes. This understanding, using the prism of groupism (Brubaker 2002, p. 164) whereby (ethnic) groups are analyzed as the primary societal actors, ascribed with particular characteristics and agency, presupposes homogeneity of the groups in question. In so doing, it disregards the various intra-group struggles and the fluidity of social identities beyond ethnicity. Furthermore, it also cements ethnicity or another single category as the most, if not the only, important political cleavage to reconcile after war.

This tendency contributes to particular dynamics, social practices, and intersubjectivities remaining unrecognized as important to understanding peace, especially gendered and intersectional peace – what constitutes it and how it might be achieved. The tendency is often present in peace agreements and various forms of conflict settlements. For instance, the Dayton Peace Agreement which marked the end of the war in Bosnia and Herzegovina recognizes ethnicity as the single most important system of organizing the post-war society, with the three dominant ethnic groups (Bosniaks, Serbs, and Croats) being explicitly recognized and given governing power (Stavrevska 2016). This approach not only renders other ethnic groups invisible, but it also fails to acknowledge the differences within ethnic groups, be they along class, gender, sexuality, age, geographical, war experiences, political views, or any other lines. The implicit assumption, therefore, is that the interests, needs, and preferences for peace within the ethnic groups align. Using an intersectional approach, on the other hand, helps us understand what peace, in the positive sense, can mean, acknowledging the plurality of subjectivities, systems of oppression, and agencies that are created and enacted as a result.

The issue of intersectionality is, therefore, at the very core of understanding peace, who gets to define it, how that definition or vision is implemented and studied, and, ultimately, whose voices, experiences, and agencies are marginalized and silenced in these processes. In other words, intersectionality offers us the possibility to reflect not only on the peace knowledge that is produced but also on the systems within which that knowledge is produced. For instance, as Azarmandi (2018, p. 69) notes, while in much of peace studies literature violence and conflict are emphasized as problems of the existing world system, the analyses of power therein “continue to use notions of sovereign power, which is exercised by a particular subject(s) or systems, and understood as repressive and monolithic to unpack questions of violence.” The understanding of peace and violence, therefore, must engage in an analysis of the violence and conflict that exist within and are (re)produced by power structures, be those economic, racial, or gendered (Azarmandi 2018, p. 69). In that vein, he reminds us that true peace will remain an impossibility if coloniality is not addressed (Azarmandi 2018, p. 69).

With this in mind, intersectional and decolonial critiques of peace studies bring to the fore Frantz Fanon’s (1963) theorization of peace as “peaceful violence” – that is, violence and peace intersect and co-exist, rather than stand as distinct or opposed conditions of being. A good example of this is the violence enacted by colonial states in subjugating populations under colonial rule, indeed often done in the name of “peace.” Using the formulation of “peaceful violence,” Fanon suggests that peace “can be understood as the regulation and normalisation of violence” rather than as its absence (Shroff 2018, p. 148). Similarly, more recent critiques have called for feminist and queer lenses in peace studies to challenge the erasure of experiences and interests that fall outside singular or monolithic assumptions about both peace (who benefits and how) and societies (Confortini 2006; Mizzi and Byrne 2015; Moolakkattu 2006). They too highlight the problematic use of homogenizing categories, such as “women,” and particularly in peace studies the collapsed portrayal of “third world women” (see Mohanty 1991) as either passive victims or “agents of change” in conflict-affected places (Shepherd 2016). This means that women’s complex roles, contributions, and experiences in conflict – especially those that fall outside these assumptions – are overlooked in peace process (see “► Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)” and “► Female Combatants and Peacebuilding”).

Feminist and intersectional peace theories challenge the binary epistemology of liberal and post-liberal peace theorizing (Smith 2019, pp. 138–157). A good example here is that of the international-local and the way each dimension of this binary is understood. Even the concept of hybridity (see “► Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”), introduced as a beyond-binary analytical device in building and understanding peace, with emancipatory claims and numerous caveats otherwise, reproduces a binary between constructed categories of local and non-local (Hameiri and Jones 2018). This binary reproduces and relies on Orientalist narratives that deploy a particular conception of “the local”; that is, the “local” as an intelligible category is deployed and positioned as distinct to the liberal/international. (Orientalism (Said 1978) refers to a system of thought that perpetuates a view of “the absolute and systematic difference between the West, which is rational, developed, humane, superior, and the Orient [Said highlighted the Orient as primarily the Middle East and Islam], which is aberrant, undeveloped, inferior” (Said 1978, p. 300). Through such essentialist framings, Orientalism presents “the Orient” as something “either to be feared . . . or to be controlled (by pacification, research and development, outright occupation whenever possible)” (Said 1978, p. 301).) Theorizing a “hybrid peace,” for example, and seeking means to institute one produces and relies on an understanding of “local” actors that is homogenized through being inherently non-liberal/international. This is evident in the descriptions of what constitutes the local and how hybridity is seen to come about in peace interventions:

[because] liberal peacemaking was forced to deal with its own positionality and biases, as well as recalcitrant nationalists, religious conservatives, kleptomaniac governing elites, stubborn locals and peoples whose worldviews was not organized along a left-right secular political continuum. . . The result has been hybrid political orders (and disorders) in which Western ideas of how a society, polity and economy ‘should’ be run reach a sometimes uneasy accommodation with local mores and practices. (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2016, p. 222)

The latter part of this quote explicitly delineates “hybrid” peace in binary terms which occurs when a non-west/non-liberal other finds balance or accommodation with “western ideas of how a society should be run.” Taking intersectionality as an analytical framework would challenge these assumptions though, highlighting instead the complex axes of power that shape identities, ideas, experiences, and ultimately outcomes.

What intersectional critiques highlight then is the necessity for peace studies to dismantle not only the “groupism” blinders noted above but also the false binaries, such as peace/violence, perpetrator/victim, non-liberal local/liberal international, and so on. An intersectional analysis allows us to recognize the multiplicity of violences that occur and power structures that exist; remove the blinders on the role that gender, class (Iñiguez de Heredia 2018), race (Azarmandi 2018), coloniality (Berlowitz 2002), and other systems of power play; and, relatedly, also acknowledge the possibility for (a) plural peace(s).

Intersectionality and Peacebuilding Practice

An intersectional lens is also imperative in peacebuilding practice, whether it be conducted by institutions, governments, civil society organizations, or individuals. While many have emphasized intersectionality’s contribution in terms of recognizing multiple dimensions of identity that mediate individual experience, intersectionality also crucially exposes how institutional structures are implicated in the marginalization of some groups and individuals.

It is not that some individuals or groups have more or less “categories” of identity/experience but rather that some experiences are more readily acknowledged and then in turn generalized. In Crenshaw’s (1989, 1991) initial formulation, for example, anti-sexism discrimination legislation in the USA that was formulated based on the experience of White women was unable to extend the same protections to Black women as it did not reflect their experiences of sexism, which often mingled with experiences of racism. These experiences then were taken to not be wholly sexist and thus not legitimately within the realms of protection the legislation was supposed to offer (Crenshaw 1989, 1991). The assumptions that institutions make then are important for who may or may not be able to access the stated benefits of their work, and this is true in peacebuilding processes as well.

One area that has garnered significant attention from a critical intersectional lens is the adoption and implementation of gender mainstreaming in United Nations (and other) peacebuilding practice. With the adoption of Resolution 1325 in 2000, the UN Security Council committed to incorporating a Women, Peace and Security Agenda into its peace and security activities and assessments, primarily through a framework of “gender mainstreaming” (Cohn 2008; see “► Gender Justice and Peacebuilding”). These policy frameworks were significant gains for activists and advocates who had been lobbying the UN, particularly the Security Council, to recognize women’s experiences of armed conflict and their marginalization from formal peacebuilding processes (Cohn 2008).

In implementation however, gender mainstreaming and Women, Peace and Security has often fallen short (Smith 2019; Martin de Almagro 2017; Basu et al. 2020, p. 6). One criticism of the WPS agenda and its implementation of gender policy (such as through Gender Units in peacekeeping missions, the institution of Gender Advisors, and so on) is that it has rested on a limited understanding of gender which relates to biological sex; that is, “gender” is used synonymously with “women” and even then only a select cohort of women (Martin de Almagro 2017; Haastrup and Hagen 2020; see “► Masculinity and Conflict”). WPS has done poorly to take account of class, race, religion, age, ethnicity, sexuality, and coloniality and how these might also be “gendered concerns” or, even if understood narrowly, how they also mediate women’s experiences in conflict, post-conflict, and peacebuilding situations.

Gender policy can only have limited and circumscribed impacts where it fails to take account of intersectional experiences and hierarchies of power. While gender mainstreaming in peacebuilding has been effective at bringing light to some experiences and issues, it has largely eschewed an intersectional framing and positioned gender as a “single-axis” issue – a problem that feminist theorists have long demonstrated is more likely to obscure and perpetuate discrimination and oppression rather than overcome it (Cho et al. 2013; Crenshaw 1991). Applying an intersectional lens to gender policy in peacebuilding exposes how “gender” in policy frameworks often seeks to rectify only “unidimensional notions of discrimination” (Cho et al. 2013; Crenshaw 1991) and thus marginalizes women’s (and men’s) experiences that fall outside these frames.

There have been, nevertheless, some exceptions. For instance, the Gender Sub-Commission during the peace negotiations between the Government of Colombia and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) advocated that the Peace Accord includes a so-called differential approach to building peace (Bouvier 2016). This approach recognizes that gender, race, class, age, sexuality, ability, geographic location, and other factors play a role during conflict and in its aftermath. To that end, the differential approach acknowledges that different societal groups, such as women and girls, Indigenous peoples, children and adolescents, communities of African descent, small-scale and family farmers (campesinxs), displaced people, LGTBI persons, people with disabilities, and so on, have faced different forms of violence and have suffered differently during the conflict (Stavrevska 2020). The differential approach, in that sense, lays the foundation for multiple experiences and agencies to be recognized. At the same time, however, there have been critiques that despite the differential approach, Colombia’s Peace Accord does not assume an intersectional perspective, as it recognizes experiences of, for instance, women and Indigenous peoples, but not explicitly those at the intersection of the two, Indigenous women (Acosta et al. 2018).

With that in mind, taking insights from intersectional feminist work further, it is not simply an issue of multiple experiences and oppressions (and thus a practice of inclusion or acknowledgment), but also requires critical reflection on the structures within which oppressions are produced. This view “reveals how the intersectional lens looked beyond the more narrowly circumscribed demands for inclusion within the logics of sameness and difference. Instead, it addressed the larger ideological structures in which subjects, problems, and solutions were framed” (Cho et al. 2013, p. 791). This is to say that intersectionality should not be understood by policy- and decision-makers merely as a demand for adding diversity to the group around the table, but rather as a lens that helps examine the structures on which the table rests.

Summary

Intersectionality, as an understanding that people’s identities, experiences, and agencies are affected by multiple, intersecting systems of power and oppression, has gained prominence in both academic and activist discussions in the last couple of decades. However, this critical concept and the perspective it provides, with notable exceptions, has largely been absent from peace research and peacebuilding practice. As the case studies discussed here demonstrate, peacebuilding, conflict resolution, and peace research need to account for a multiplicity of experiences – as well as how power operates across and within assumed social divisions – in order to understand and build a more meaningful and sustainable peace. In looking at institutional operations as well, the chapter has shown that intersectionality is not merely, or only, a reference to identity categories but that structural and institutional approaches that rest on homogenized and generalized assumptions can compound rather than alleviate oppression, even where the goals may be social justice. That is, intersectional analytic frameworks argue the need to see power as mediated through the terms of racism, sexism, classism, and so on in combination, not as distinct lines that operate separately or in parallel. In peace research specifically, the chapter argues that a “static” (non-intersectional) understanding of conflict and conflict-affected societies collapses important inequalities that shape and are shaped by conflict and indeed can erase recognition of conditions of structural violence that prevent “peace.”

Cross-References

- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

References

- Acosta, M., Castañeda, A., García, D., Hernández, F., Muelas, D., & Santamaria, A. (2018). The Colombian transitional process: Comparative perspectives on violence against Indigenous women. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 12(1), 108–125.
- Anzaldúa, G. E. (1987). Borderlands/La Frontera: The new mestiza. San Francisco: Aunt Lute Books.
- Azarmandi, M. (2018). The racial silence within peace studies. Peace Review, 30(1), 69–77.
- Basu, S., Kirby, P., & Shepherd, L. (2020). Women, peace & security: A critical cartography. In S. Basu, P. Kirby, & L. Shepherd (Eds.), New directions in women, peace and security (pp. 1–25). Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Berlowitz, M. J. (2002). Eurocentric contradictions in peace studies. Peace Review, 14(1), 61–65.
- Bouvier, V. M. (2016). Gender and the role of women in Colombia’s peace process. New York: UN Women.
- Brubaker, R. (2002). Ethnicity without croups. Archives Européennes de Sociologie, 43(2), 163–189.
- Cho, S., Crenshaw, K., & McCall, L. (2013). Toward a field of intersectionality studies: Theory, application, and praxis. Signs, 38(4), 785–810.
- Cohn, S. (2008). Mainstreaming gender in UN security policy: A path to political transformation? In S. Rai & G. Waylen (Eds.), Global governance: Feminist perspectives (pp. 185–206). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Collins, P. H. (1990). Black feminist thought: Knowledge, consciousness, and the politics of empowerment. New York: Routledge.
- Collins, P. H., & Bilge, S. (2016). Intersectionality. Cambridge: Polity.
- Combahee River Collective. (1977). The Combahee River collective statement. <https://combaheerivercollective.weebly.com/the-combahee-river-collective-statement.html>
- Confortini, C. C. (2006). Galtung, violence, and gender: The case for a peace studies/feminism alliance. Peace and Change, 31(3), 333–367.
- Crenshaw, K. W. (1989). Demarginalizing the intersection of race and sex: A Black feminist critique of anti-discrimination doctrine, feminist theory and antiracist

- politics. University of Chicago Legal Forum, 1(8), 138–167.
- Crenshaw, K. W. (1991). Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women. Stanford Law Review, 43(6), 1241–1299.
- Davis, K. (2008). Intersectionality as buzzword: A sociology of science perspective on what makes a feminist theory successful. Feminist Theory, 9(1), 67–85.
- Dhamoon, R. K. (2011). Considerations on mainstreaming intersectionality. Political Research Quarterly, 64(1), 230–243.
- Fanon, F. (1963). The wretched of the Earth. New York: Grove Press.
- Haastруп, T., & Hagen, J. (2020). Global racial hierarchies and the limits of localization via National Action Plans. In S. Basu, P. Kirby, & L. Shepherd (Eds.), New directions in women, peace and security (pp. 133–151). Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Hameiri, S., & Jones, L. (2018). Against hybridity in the study of peacebuilding and statebuilding. In J. Wallis, L. Kent, M. Forsyth, S. Dinnen, & S. Bose (Eds.), Hybridity on the ground in peacebuilding and development: Critical conversations (pp. 99–112). Acton: Australian National University Press.
- hooks, b. (1981). Ain't I a woman: Black women and feminism. Boston: South End Press.
- Iñiguez de Heredia, M. (2018). The conspicuous absence of class and privilege in the study of resistance in peacebuilding contexts. International Peacekeeping, 25(3), 325–348.
- Kappler, S. (2015). The dynamic local: Delocalisation and (re-)localisation in the search for peacebuilding identity. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 875–889.
- Mac Ginty, R. & Richmond, O.P. (2016). The fallacy of constructing hybrid political orders: a reappraisal of the hybrid turn in peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 23(2), 219–239.
- Martin de Almagro, M. (2017). Producing participants: Gender, race, class, and women, peace and security. Global Society, 32(4), 395–414.
- Mizzi, R. C., & Byrne, S. (2015). Queer theory and peace and conflict studies: Some critical reflections. In M. Flaherty, S. Byrne, H. Tusó, & T. Matyok (Eds.), Gender and peacebuilding: All hands required (pp. 357–374). New York: Lexington Books.
- Mohanty, C. (1991). Under western eyes: Feminist scholarship and colonial discourses. In C. Mohanty, A. Russo, & L. Torres (Eds.), Third world women and the politics of feminism (pp. 51–80). Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Moolakkattu, J. (2006). Feminism and peace studies: Taking stock of a quarter century of efforts. Indian Journal of Gender Studies, 13(2), 137–162.
- Moraga, C., & Anzaldúa, G. E. (Eds.). (1981). This bridge called my back: Writings by radical women of color. Watertown: Persephone Press.
- Phoenix, A., & Pattynama, P. (2006). Editorial. European Journal of Women's Studies, 13(3), 187–192.
- Said, E. W. (1978). Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.
- Shepherd, L. (2016). Victims of violence or agents of change: Representations of women in UN peacebuilding discourse. Peacebuilding, 4(2), 121–135.
- Shroff, S. (2018). The peace professor: Decolonial, feminist, and queer futurities. In M. Groarke & E. Welty (Eds.), Peace and justice studies: Critical pedagogy (pp. 146–162). London: Routledge.
- Smith, S. (2019). Gendering peace: UN peacebuilding in Timor-Leste. London: Routledge.
- Staunæs, D. (2003). Where have all the subjects gone? Bringing together the concepts of intersectionality and subjectification. Nora, 11(2), 101–110.
- Stavrevska, E. B. (2016). Space, class and peace: Spatial governmentality in postwar Bosnia and Herzegovina. In A. Björkdahl & S. Buckley-Zistel (Eds.), Spatializing peace and conflict: Mapping the production of places, sites and scales of violence (pp. 141–158). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Stavrevska, E. B. (2020). The impact of Colombia's COVID-19 response on Indigenous inclusion in peace processes. Centre for Women, Peace and Security, London School of Economics and Political Science. <https://blogs.lse.ac.uk/wps/2020/05/20/the-impact-of-colombias-covid-19-response-on-indigenous-inclusion-in-peace-processes/>
- Valdes, F. (1997). Poised at the cusp: LatCrit theory, outsider jurisprudence, and Latina/o self-empowerment. Harvard Latino Law Review, 2(1), 1–59.
- Yuval-Davis, N. (2006). Intersectionality and feminist politics. European Journal of Women's Studies, 13(3), 193–210.

Intervention

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Intractable Conflict

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Ireland

- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Islam and Peace

Farid Mirbagheri
University of Nicosia, Nicosia, Cyprus

Keywords

Jurisprudence · Justice · Mysticism · In-out approach

Synonyms

Instrumentalization of religion; Islamic fundamentalism; Jihad; Mysticism; Peace within to peace without; Political Islam

Introduction

The advent of Islamist fundamentalism and the terrorist attacks of the 2010 decade have highlighted the need for a better understanding of the concept of peace in Islamic teachings. The traditional training of scholars and practitioners in the West appears somewhat obtuse and thus prejudicial to a multifaceted assessment and appreciation of the more intransigent outlooks in the Islamic faith. In the light of the cultural clashes propounded in the last years of the last millennium (Huntington 2011), it is important to have a more comprehensive outlay of discursive peace in Islam, where the radical interpretation of the faith can be understood and thus critiqued and countered.

Definition

Both Islam and peace are interpreted differently by various religious and political groupings, schools of thought as well as independent scholars. Various paradigms in International Relations also consider peace differently thereby broadening the spectrum beyond the mere silence of the guns.

The etymology of Islam refers to the word salm meaning peace. Salm and its derivatives have been used in the Quran around 140 times. The word also denotes the concept of surrender, which indicates that in Islamic context peace is achieved through submitting to the will of the Almighty. A Muslim is thus someone who is elevated to a state of peace through surrendering to God. Numerous citations in the Quran, the holy book of Muslims, can be understood to refer to the same, e.g., “O believers, come to full submission to God [peace]. Do not follow in the footsteps of Satan your acknowledged foe” (Quran, 2:62).

Another term used in the Quran to denote peace is solh. There are some 180 occasions, where either solh or one of its derivatives have been used. They have always been utilized in a praiseworthy fashion, e.g., “And when it is said to them: Make not mischief on the earth, they say: We are only peacemakers” (Quran 2:11) and “For their Lord displeasure is the opposite of peace and tranquillity” (Quran: 70:28). In this connection, it is also notable that the term faith in Arabic (iman) shares the same roots with the expression for safety (aman), the very cause that renders peace desirable in the first place.

In the more jurisprudential narratives in Islam, war and peace are usually understood in their classical combative/noncombative framework. Accordingly, only external peace and its confrontational/nonconfrontational aspects are focused on. The terms dar-ol solh [abode of peace] and dar-ol harb [abode of war] reflect such an outlook, which is incognizant of structural violence, harming the individual and/or violating social security (Galtung 1996). Breach of security-based peace and tranquility is therefore not in the remit of jurisprudence. Appearances and external manifestation of the faith as defined by the jurist comprise the foundational stone upon which peace or war can be decided. One of the most noted jurists in this respect was Ibn Taymiyyah (1263–1328 CE), whose teachings have turned out to be the bedrock of the conservative as well as radical interpretations of Sunni Islam. He asserted that Muslims should be ruled only by strict adherence to shari'a, the legal code of Islam.

Ibn Taymiyya was perhaps one of the very few scholars/jurists who took up arms to fight for what he preached, i.e., he took part in battles against the invading Mongolian army. His ultra conservative and at times radical views were also infused with a dose of expediency (maslaha). Hence his views that the Mongolian liking for wine should not be derided as consumption of alcohol lessen the chances of Mongolians killing and pillaging Muslims (Polka 2018, note 64). He remains one of the main jurisprudential authority for many radical Muslims, who believe in violence to achieve their goals (Holtmann 2013).

Harmony and tranquility within, however, are the foundation of peace discourse in Islamic mysticism. Shams, the sage of the Iranian Muslim mystic Rumi, states the conformity of the faith with peace in his book when he narrates, “He claims he has faith but he does not. He says he is ‘peace’ but he is not.” (Shams 2007, 242). The approach of mysticism in Islam differs sharply from that of jurists. Muslim Sufis, such as Rumi, believe in peace starting from within the minds and hearts of people before it can be extended onto the external environment. Conversely, individuals ridden with frustration, anger, and disharmony can only project conflict and turmoil in their environment. “Wheat grows from wheat, barley from barley.”

*Contemplate the same grievous war in thyself
Why, then, art thou engaged in warring with others?* (Rumi 1990, VI:64)

The general approach of Muslim mystics to life and humanity including peace is, unlike the conventional paradigms in International Relations, nonsystemic. The core elements of contentment and tranquility in life are located inside the hearts and minds of the individual and do not fall exclusively within the domain of the sociopolitical structures. The individual has the ability to deconstruct and then create a new social and political reality by a conscious and ideational outlook that constructs the external “objective” world (Gibran 2019).

It is thus a more inside-out view of serenity that characterizes peace in mysticism and distinguishes it from the outside-in outlook on peace promoted by jurisprudential scholarship and radical Islamists.

Historical Background

Muhammad, the messenger of Islam, experienced some 100 battles less than a third of which he participated in personally. Though many of them were defensive in character, there were those that are believed by some scholars to have been initiated by Muslims out of necessity. Distinction between offensive and defensive wars is made in the Quran by using different terminology. The word jihad (literally meaning struggle or striving for) is used axiologically to denote all Godly acts including combat in defense, “They swear by Allah their most solemn oaths that if you O Prophet were to command them, they would certainly strive for [jihad] in Allah’s cause. Say You do not have to swear; your obedience is well known! Surely Allah is All-Aware of what you do” (Quran, 24:53). Also we note, “Strive for [jihad] the cause of Allah in the way He deserves, for it is He Who has chosen you, and laid upon you no hardship in the religion—the way of your forefather Abraham!...” (Quran, 22:78).

Two other terms, harb and ghital, are adopted only to describe war per se without necessarily referring to the context, e.g., “If you do not, then beware of a war [harb] with Allah and His Messenger! But if you repent, you may retain your principal—neither inflicting nor suffering harm” (Quran 2:279). In another verse, it is observed, “They ask you O Prophet about fighting [ghital] in the sacred months. Say, fighting [ghital] during these months is a great sin. But hindering others from the Path of Allah, rejecting Him, and expelling the worshippers from the Sacred Mosque is a greater sin in the sight of Allah...” (Yusuf Ali 2006, 2:217).

Nowadays, however, jihad has come to mean violence in all shapes and forms initiated by religious vigor and ruling. The instrumentalization of this precept by religious and political leaders has chiefly been responsible for that. The last significant edict exhorting Muslims to Jihad was issued by the Ottoman religious leader sheykh ol-Islam in WW I in alliance with Germany and against the Allies.

Peace and Justice

The significance of justice in peace accords is attested to by thinkers in the East and the West. "Peace without justice is tyranny, no matter how you sugar-coat it with expediency," said the English scientist and philanthropist, William Allen (2021). Peace based on flagrant violations of human rights can only be termed as an "unjust order." The following verse refers to this principle. "And if two groups of believers fight [ghital] each other, then make peace between them. But if one of them transgresses against the other, then fight [ghital] against the transgressing group until they are willing to submit to the rule of Allah. If they do so, then make peace between both groups in all fairness and act justly. Surely Allah loves those who uphold justice" (Quran, 49:9).

In the Islamic belief system justice and balance are quintessential aspects of creation and should be maintained in social and political lives of communities. "As for the sky, He raised it high, and set the balance of justice" (Quran, 55:7). "O my people! Give full measure and weigh with justice. Do not defraud people of their property, nor go about spreading corruption in the land" (Quran, 11:85).

Differences in the very definition of justice, however, can stir conflict within and between communities. This is observed in history on numerous occasions including the cases of "just war" and "jihad," where opposing parties believed they were fighting on the side of justice. In Islamic literature, Imam Ali's interpretation (Imam Ali 2005), the fourth successor to Muhammad and also his cousin and son-in-law, locates justice in the placement of all things in their proper order (Motahhari 1982, 59–67). Absent a proportionate arrangement of affairs and a fair settlement of disputes, the ensuing order cannot be justified as peaceful for it embodies structural violence that inhibits the realization of human potential. Therefore, an inseparable trait that goes hand in hand with peace is the precept of justice.

In mystic discourse, peace starts within and then permeates without. Tranquility inside the mind and the heart will radiate the very same in the surrounding environment.

*Everything beckons its like in the world
Warmth attracts warmth and cold draws cold
(Rumi, II:81)*

Upon the fall of Adam and Eve from paradise, the Quran narrates, the fundamental trait of earthly life would be enmity between humans. "We said: Get ye down, all (ye people), with enmity between yourselves. On earth will be your dwelling-place and your means of livelihood – for a time." (Quran, 2:36). A return to the Divine condition of life in paradise therefore requires overcoming the inimical character of earthly living by establishing peace and fraternity among humans. Satan, the principal character responsible for the expulsion of humans from paradise, is depicted as a figure who aims to stir hatred in human community, i.e., keep mankind remote from the Godly condition of peace. "Indeed, Satan spurs (discord) between them; indeed, Satan has always been, to man, an evident enemy" (Quran, 17:53).

Summary

The Preamble to UNESCO Charter reads, "Since wars begin in the minds of men, it is in the minds of men that the defences of peace must be constructed." Quintessentially, that is the approach of Islamic mysticism. By contrast in Islamic jurisprudence, and in common with classical realism, peace is depicted more as an external and tangible quality that is detached from the state of mind and hearts of its stakeholders. The latter axiomatically disregards the significant input of the individual in the external environment and ties the plight of the people in a hierarchical structure predicated on the views of an unaccountable class claiming to represent the Deity. The people are therefore disenfranchised, and the dictates of the religious jurist decide the final outcome: peace or war. In this realist process of instrumentalizing Islam for political gain, the vice regent of God on earth – human being – is reduced to an agent of the Satanic scheme to stir hatred in the human community (Mirbagheri 2012).

The words of Rumi ring true throughout history as they do in many wars fought in the name of Islam:

*The wars of the people, like children's fights
All meaningless, empty and vile
The battles fought with wooden swords
All their purposes vain and futile* (Rumi, I:3435–3436)

*From a whim springs their war and peace
On a caprice is based their honour and shame.* (Rumi, I:71)

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace
- ▶ Human Security
- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture
- ▶ Peace in International Relations Theory

References

- Galtung, J. (1996). Peaceful world by peaceful means. London: Sage.
- Gibran, K. (2019). The Prophet. Independently published.
- Holtmann, F. (2013). Virtual leadership: A study of communicative guidance patterns in online jihad. Ph.D. thesis, University of Vienna. http://othes.univie.ac.at/30631/1/2013-07-02_1063622.pdf. 3/10/2021.
- Huntington, S. (2011). The clash of civilisations and the remaking of the world order. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Imam Ali. (2005). Nahjol-balagha [Peak of eloquence]. Translated by Sayyid Ali Riza.
- Mirbagheri, F. (2012). War and peace in Islam. London: Palgrave.
- Motahhari, M. (1982). Adl e Elahi [Divine justice]. Tehran: Sadr Publications.
- Polka, S. (2018). Centrists vs Salafists on the Islamic concept of peace. Global Journal of Archaeology & Anthropology, 5(1), 555653. <https://doi.org/10.19080/GJAA.2018.05.555653>.
- Preamble to UNESCO Charter. https://en.unesco.org/70years/building_peace#:~:text=The%20Preamble%20to%20the%20Constitution,a%20generation%20that%20political%20and. Accessed 13 Mar 2021.
- Rumi, J. (1990). In R. Nicholson (Ed.), Mathnavi (Gibb memorial series) (Vol. I–VI). Cambridge: E.J.W. (Translation here, however, is mine).
- Shams. (2007). Maghalat [articles]. Tehran: Nashre Markaz.
- Yusuf Ali, A. (tra.) (2006). The Meaning of the Holy Quran (11th ed.) Beltsville, MD: Amana Publications.
- William Allen's Quote. (2021). <https://welikequotes.com/author/william-allen-white-1868/peace-without-justice-is-tyranny>. Accessed 13 Mar 2021.

Islamic Fundamentalism

- ▶ Islam and Peace

Israeli Occupation

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

ius ad bellum

- ▶ Cyber Conflict

ius in bello

- ▶ Cyber Conflict

J

Jihad

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Islam and Peace

Judgement

- ▶ Measuring the Implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda

Jus ad bello

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Jus ad bellum

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Jus in bello

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Jus post bellum

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Just War Theory

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Aristotle; Augustine; Carl von Clausewitz; Cicero; Fetial code; Hugo Grotius; Jus ad bello; Jus ad bellum; Jus in bello; Jus post bellum; Just war theory; Muhammad; Thomas Aquinas

Definition

The question of when war is “just,” meaning morally acceptable however undesirable, has similarities and differences among nine cultural traditions.

Introduction (Baumann 2010; Brunsletter and O’Driscoll 2017; Churchman 2013; Lee 2011, 2015, Melton and Baumann 2010; Nardin 1996; Walzer 1997)

Discussion of Just War Theory tends to be dominated by and limited to the extensive tradition originated by Catholics (and largely followed in Western Europe and in the Americas so here called Western), but it hardly is the only tradition. Greek Orthodox, Jewish, Muslim, Hindu, Jain, Buddhist, Chinese, and Japanese cultures developed distinct traditions summarized below that deserve attention if for no other reason than to more fully understand how wars are interpreted and judged in cultures that often are in conflict. Even before them, a few individuals in ancient Sumer (Kramer 1956) and Egypt (Cox 2017) and a few individual thinkers in Classical Greece and Rome raised related issues, the latter having some influence on the earliest developers of the Christian tradition.

Forerunners: Major Classical Thinkers

While Greek thinkers such as Herodotus, Plato, Socrates, and Thucydides and Roman ones such as Cato the Younger, Julius Caesar, Livy and Polybius, and others wrote about the wars common in their day, Aristotle and Cicero are the most influential precursors of Just War Theory.

In Politics (Aristotle and Jowett 2000) and Nicomachean Ethics (Aristotle and Irwin 1999), Aristotle (384–322 BC) introduced to the frequently warring Greek world the concept of war as a last resort that included prohibited conduct that would make restoration of a peace difficult or impossible. Generally, he understood it as necessary to avoid enslavement – in other words, defensive war. Despite this, he permitted warfare to enslave non-Greeks for whom it was “natural” and which if abolished would undermine civic freedom.

In De Officiis (Cicero and Walsh 2008) Cicero (106–43 BC) foreshadows several defining issues further developed in Western Just War Theory. In Rome, war and treaty-making fell under the ius gentium, the “law of nations,” innate moral obligations recognized and followed by all but a few such as pirates and illegal combatants who neither fought nor were protected by it. Laws for initiating, conducting, and ending a war were prescribed in the Fetial Code, which was overseen by priests. The man not legally a soldier had no right to fight. Resort to war required a just cause such as repelling invasion or retaliation for pillaging, and even if ultimately fought for supremacy, the initial motivation must have been defensive. Only a properly constituted government could wage war and no war was just unless discussion had failed and it was preceded by a warning and a formal declaration made. Furthermore, postwar, consideration must be showed those conquered, those who surrender must be protected, and any punishment should be limited, sufficient only to prevent repetition of the initial offence and to deter others from doing so as well (Polybius, Walbank and Scott-Kilvert 1979).

The Western Tradition (De La Casas 1992; de Montesquieu 2002; Elshtain 1992; Kant 1983; de Vattel 2009; Walzer 1997)

Western Just War Theory evolved from these classical thinkers along with Old and New Testament influence beginning with Saints Ambrose (c. 340–397) and Augustine (354–430). Subsequent thinkers developed it into a highly influential theory. St. Thomas Aquinas’s (c. 1225–1274) Summa Theologica divided the question of morality with respect to war into three main issues.

The first, Jus ad bellum, concerns when war is just. St. Augustine specified six requirements that have changed little in 17 centuries. First, a government must explore all other options before choosing war, the last option. But, as Michael Quinlan has written, “To place military action at the very end of the line may mean invoking it only when matters have reached a desperate pass, and when its scale is larger than its robust use earlier might have entailed. The passage of time is not neutral” (Elshtain 1992). Furthermore, the “last resort” is difficult, perhaps impossible, to identify objectively and unambiguously and often subject to interpretation long after the fact. Ultimately, it is a matter of judgment reinforced by the evolution of international law, which had its precursor in the Roman concept of ius gentium (see above) but in its modern form traditionally is dated from the 1625 publication of Hugo Grotius’s (2010) Rights of War and Peace.

St. Augustine’s second requirement was that the only just war defends against actual or eminent aggression against one’s own nation or that of an ally. Eminence often is difficult to distinguish conclusively and has been used as an excuse to attack.

Third, only a properly constituted government can wage war and then only if it is openly declared in advance of hostilities. One difficulty here is that it prohibits citizen revolt against a tyrannical government. Another is that it is not always clear what constitutes a nation.

Fourth, right intention requires that a war restores justice rather than advance national interests. Wars of aggrandizement, conquest, conversion, or plunder are unjust. One difficulty is that some wars can both restore justice and advance national interests, and ruling out a war that does both may leave the injustice in place.

Fifth, there must be a reasonable prospect of victory. Wasting lives and resources is wrong if defeat is likely. However, war involves so many unexpected events and intangible factors that even careful, reasonable estimates sometimes have proved wrong.

Sixth, the force employed must be proportionate and reasonable. The concept, which has its parallel in limits on the force an individual can use to defend against an assailant, allows the state to use more force in defense than the aggressor uses in attack, but not excessively so. The actual line between reasonable and excessive has proven impossible to define clearly in advance in every circumstance, so it too is a matter of judgment and debate in specific cases, most prominently the continuing argument over the use of atomic bombs to end WWII.

Following from this sixth requirement, the second main issue, jus in bello, fighting justly, has changed with society, time, and technology and is likely to continue to do so. It has two important components. Proportionality repeats concern with how much force is appropriate. Discrimination requires targeting only enemy combatants. In feudal Europe, war was at least hypothetically fought chivalrously – although the code often was ignored when fighting heretics or non-Christians. Intentionally attacking noncombatants except those who make war matériel was prohibited.

Collateral damage as an unintended result of a legitimate military operation is not just but is justifiable, although understandable seems a better word. The distinction effectively disappeared with indiscriminate aerial bombing during the Spanish Civil War and World War II, partly to rationalize area bombing but more fundamentally because nations mobilized every resource for war, making the distinction between combatants and noncombatants ambiguous. Capture in enemy uniform, or fighting or spying while dressed as a civilian, traditionally legitimates the death penalty.

The third and final main element of Just War Theory, jus post bellum, ending wars justly, has received relatively little attention until recently beyond the principle that the victorious can punish but must not humiliate the vanquished. Both the purpose and the target of punishment remain unsettled. Possible purposes include deterrence, reform, restraint, and retribution. It is unclear whether to punish particular individuals or the aggressor state itself, and if the latter, if it might have unintended consequences. Many put much of the blame for the outbreak of World War II on the humiliating punishment imposed on the Germans at Versailles. Of course, aggressors cannot be punished until they are captured or defeated. Victory does not prove righteousness, nor does the righteous nation win every war.

The immensely influential On War (von Clausewitz, Howard and Paret 1976) anticipates the concept of individual responsibility for war crimes and provides guidance on conduct, raising the issue of the responsibility of the individual soldier. After World War II, individual Germans and Japanese were found guilty and executed for issuing or failing to resist illegal orders, but charges against Admiral Doenitz were dismissed when Admiral Nimitz pointed out that US submarines had used the same tactics. Questions remain as to how terms are defined, the level at which responsibility is fixed, which orders which ranks should know to be illegal, and what individuals must do to resist illegal orders. Resistance risks immediate punishment by one's own government; failing to do so risks punishment by some international tribunal long after the fact.

Recently, theorists such as Brian Orend (2006) have focused on jus post bellum. He has proposed seven principles that provide a starting point for discussion:

- A state may terminate a war if there has been a reasonable vindication of the rights violated and if the aggressor is willing to negotiate terms of surrender that can include formal apology, compensations, war crimes trials, and rehabilitation.
- A state may end a war if just goals are unreachable at all or without using excessive force.
- A victorious state must apply the same level of objectivity, and investigation into any war crimes its own armed forces may have committed.
- Only legitimate authorities can make and accept the peace terms.
- Punishment must be limited to those individuals directly responsible for the conflict.
- Truth and reconciliation may be more important than punishment.
- Terms of surrender must be proportional to the rights initially

The Greek Orthodox Tradition (Harakas 1981; Norwich 1990; Ostrogorsky 1957)

Cooperation between state and church inaugurated by Constantine (ruled 306–337), the first Byzantine emperor, brought mutual benefits and unintended consequences. The church unified the state and supported imperial absolutism. In return, the state provided generous endowments and supported missionary activities. However, political controversies often became intractable theological disputes and vice versa, most famously over icons in the eighth century, worshipped by some and considered “graven images” forbidden in the Bible by others. Some disputes led to repeated schisms climaxing with that of 1054 that permanently divided Roman Catholic from Greek Orthodox Christians.

In the Orthodox view, war is considered a sin and can never be just. The Orthodox canon contains none of the thinking about entrance into or behavior during war found in the Western tradition. However, this assessment is coupled with an acknowledgment that war might be necessary and that military service is a legitimate requirement of citizenship. Because any act of violence contradicts the ethics and principles of the Kingdom of God, clergies are to be pacifists and are not to be involved in any military activity or even to enter military camps.

St. Basil (c. 330–379), Archbishop of Caesarea, established the doctrine that although killing in war was not murder, veterans were to abstain from communion for 3 years in penance. Six hundred years later, the church refused Emperor Nicephorus II Phocas's request to grant martyrdom to soldiers killed in battle as inconsistent with this requirement.

Orthodoxy requires pursuit of peaceful resolution of conflicts without limit. However, the church recognizes that pacifism makes for easy victims and increases the likelihood of attack. Government with its duty to protect cannot always meet the requirements of the gospels. For Orthodox Christians, “just war” is an oxymoron.

The Jewish Tradition (Nelson and Sons 1952; Ravitzky 1996; Solomon 2009; Walzer 1996)

Jewish thought about war originates with the Old Testament and largely from Deuteronomy (especially 20:10–15 and 19–20). Whereas Catholic thought originated in a period of collapse and chaos, Jewish thought originated at a time when tribal leaders suddenly found themselves governing a new state. The result was a very different theory as to what is just.

Deuteronomy distinguishes types of war and regulates conduct in each. Wars of conversion are to be fought only with the approval of the Great Sanhedrin, the combined judicial and legislative body of ancient Israel. Enlarging national borders, protection of reputation, or pursuit of greatness were legitimate goals. Deuteronomy was concerned with practical issues such as who should serve, be exempt, or be prohibited from service in Jewish armies (Deut 20:1–10) and with how wars should be fought. “When thou draw near to a city to fight against it, offer terms of peace to it” (Deut. 20:10). Acceptance of the terms leads to enslavement and adherence to Jewish law (Deut. 20:11), while refusal leads after a Hebrew victory to killing all the males (Deut. 20:13) and taking all else as spoils of war, with some limits on the treatment of women (Deut. 21:10–14).

Divinely commanded wars are fought in self-defense on the authority of the king alone or against six specified nations (Deut. 20:16–17). These are wars of extermination against “the cities of these peoples that the Lord your God gives you for an inheritance. Save alive nothing that breathes, but you shall utterly destroy them. . . as the Lord your God has commanded; that they may not teach you to do according to all their abominable practices” (Deut. 20:16–18). In both types of war, food trees can be harvested but not destroyed, while nonfood trees can be cut down in support of a siege (Deut. 20:19–20). The Bible is not shy about guiding the Jewish people into war, even wars of extermination, although it does have moderating moments. At the same time, it condemns martial excess. David was prohibited from building the temple because he had shed so much blood. Isaiah suggests beating swords into plowshares and is a key figure in the evolution of modern concepts of morality (Isaiah 1:12–17).

The prophets sometimes identify other nations, particularly Assyrians and Babylonians, as God’s instrument to punish religious failings of the Jews. Much of the book of Amos condemns Judah and Israel for what we would call war crimes. Quite different from Deuteronomy, these seem based on an implied code to moderate the incessant fighting. Don’t violate treaties, don’t seek territorial expansion, don’t kill civilians, and don’t exile entire populations.

Medieval European Jewish scholars stressed ethical and universal issues. Maimonides (1135–1204) mirrored the classical distinction between wars of self-defense and wars of conquest. The sole aim of a Jewish king “should be to uplift the true religion, to fill the world with righteousness, to break the arm of the wicked, and to fight the battles of the Lord.” Nahmanides (1194–1270) identified 613 commandments regarding war in the Torah. Some medieval Jewish scholars suggested that killing civilians was immoral, and tried to mitigate, since they could not repeal, biblical commandments. For example, some argued that the commandment requiring slaughtering the enemy had lapsed as it only applied to the “idol worshippers of Canaan,” who no longer existed.

Contemporary rabbis continue to reinterpret such passages, for example, prohibiting wars of extermination on the basis that the six nations targeted no longer exist and limiting environmental damage by extrapolating from the prohibition on destroying fruit trees. Some even reinterpreted “conquest of the land” to mean farming it. That there no longer is a divinely ordained Jewish king permits bringing traditional Jewish philosophy into line with current thinking about imperialism.

There now seems general recognition among Jews of the following principles for jus ad bellum:

- Competent authority must decide if preemptive war is justified.
- Defending allies that have been attacked is just but not mandatory.
- Defending the nation against attack is mandatory.
- International law is independent of religious authority.
- It is unacceptable to impose religion by force.
- Nations are entitled to self-rule, but what defines a nation is ambiguous.
- Negotiation free of duress is preferred for settling international disputes.
- One cannot always distinguish combatants from noncombatants.
- The only just wars defend national territorial or citizen safety.

- Wars to deter or prevent attack are less justifiable but not prohibited.

As to jus ad bello:

- Casualties should be minimized in attaining objectives.
- Destruction of the environment should be avoided if possible.
- Hostages should not be taken.
- Minimizing casualties may mean maximizing force, as short wars cause fewer casualties.
- Noncombatants should be spared, but not at the price of defeat.
- Prisoners' have rights that should be respected.

The Muslim Tradition (Arberry 1955; Gibb and Kramers 1961; Hashimi 1996; Hitti 2002; Kelsay 2009; Lewis 1995, 2002)

Muhammad is the only founder of a major religion who led troops in battle. Like the Hebrew Bible, parts of the Qur'an justify, even advocate, war. But, as in the Bible, there also is a theme of peace and tolerance. As did Judaism and Christianity, Islam proliferated into numerous sects, each with its own doctrine.

Eighty percent or more of the world's approximately 1.5 billion Muslims are Sunni, their beliefs resting on the Qur'an and hadith (the reported words and actions of Muhammad, although there are differing collections). There is no central authority and no empowered clerical class, although there are ulama (see below). Sufis, most but not all regarded as Sunni, seek direct personal experience of God through asceticism and mysticism, trends also found in Christianity. Salafis (including Wahhabis) are ultraconservative Sunni Muslims roughly similar to "fundamentalist" Christians in their reliance on holy texts.

Shia Muslims believe in the leadership of infallible imams descended from Ali (the fourth caliph) who rule by divine appointment and hold absolute civil and spiritual authority. Shia divide into three sects (then into sub-sects) based primarily on which line of imams they accept. First and most numerous are the Twelvers, dominant in Iran. Second are the Ismailis (occasionally called Seveners) whose most prominent sub-sect follows the Aga Khan. Third are the Zaidis (occasionally called Fivers), who are a plurality in Yemen.

Beyond these major divisions, Islam includes additional sects such as pacifist Ahmadiyyas concentrated in India, Ibadis concentrated in Oman, and Yazidis who combine Sufism with traditional Kurdish beliefs. A substantial number of additional sects rose up and died out, such as the Barghwata in Morocco who synthesized Islam, Judaism, astrology, and paganism. The Kharijites raised jihad to a sixth pillar of the faith beyond the traditional five of almsgiving, fasting, pilgrimage, prayer, and profession of faith acknowledging Allah and Muhammad as his prophet. They became the first Islamic heretics in 657 AD when Ali submitted a dispute to arbitration rather than make a decision. They became increasingly fanatical, branding all who disagreed with them as worthy of execution. Over time, "Kharijite" came to mean those who justify killing innocent people in the name of religion. The generalizations about just war that follow do not hold for every subdivision of Islam.

Before that discussion, one must have some understanding of two Muslim ideas. First, over the centuries the ulama – recognized theological scholars who often served as a curb on excessive government power – elaborated the concept of a world divided. In the dar al-Islam [house of Islam], a caliph [successor to Muhammad] was supreme in religious and political matters. The rest of the world was the dar al-harb [house of war] until its inevitable incorporation into the dar al-Islam. One duty of the caliph was to call all humans to Islam. Refusal of the invitation was a just cause for war, although it had to be preceded by a declaration of war in the path of god by the caliph. Thus, Islam has an equivalent of the ad bellum criteria of just cause, righteous intention, last resort, and legitimate authority – but, it justifies offensive war. The impact is similar to Jewish teaching about the difference between obligatory wars of defense and optional wars of empire.

The second idea is that of jihad [struggle]. Without getting into the subtle differences within each sub-sect of Islam, you may hear of four main types:

- Jihad bil lisan [of the tongue] is concerned with speaking truth and proselytizing the faith.
- Jihad bil qalb [of the heart], sometimes termed the “greater jihad,” is concerned with maintaining one’s own faith.
- Jihad bil yad [of the hand] is concerned with doing right and combating injustice.
- Jihad bis saif [of the sword], sometimes termed the “lesser jihad,” is concerned with war in the way of Allah.

Bernard Lewis (2002) argues that the military meaning is by far the most common in the Qur’an (e.g., Surah 2: 186–90; Surah 9: 5, 29, 39, 122; Surah 47: 35), the hadith, and the classic manuals of Islamic law. Where verses in the Qur’an appear to be contradictory, most scholars argued that latter verses abrogate earlier ones. Thus, the “Verse of the Sword (Surah 9: 5)” abrogates those advocating peacefully settling conflicts with non-Muslims and apostates:

Then, when the sacred months are drawn away, slay the idolaters wherever you find them, and take them, and confine them, and lie in wait for them at every place of ambush. But, if they repent, and perform the prayer, and pay the alms, then let them go their way.

David Cook (2005) notes that the supposed primacy of the “greater” jihad of the tongue, heart, and hand comes primarily from Western scholars who study Sufism, work in interfaith dialogue, or are Muslim apologists trying to present Islam in the most innocuous manner possible. Whether the Qur’an sanctions defensive warfare only or commands war against non-Muslims depends on the interpretation of the relevant passages in the Qur’an, which do not explicitly state obligatory aims of war.

Muhammad and the classical manuals of Islamic law prohibited attacking children, slaves, women, the elderly, lame, blind, and insane who did not fight. Injury to them was regrettable but justifiable so long as it was unintended. Treachery, mutilation, and damaging cultivated or residential areas were prohibited. All this is very similar to the restrictions in the Hebrew and Western traditions. However, Muhammad did not identify weapons that may or may not be used, the focus of proportionality in the Western tradition.

Defensive jihad appeared with the First Crusade (1095–1102), the first invasion of dar al-Islam. Al-Sulami (d. 1106) wrote that every able-bodied man must help defend against the invaders. Citing his contemporary, al-Ghazali (d. 1111), this meant that if a town under attack could not defend itself, neighboring Muslims were to help under their own leaders and on their own authority.

Radicalization of defensive jihad stems from six key individuals, all outside the mainstream of Islamic scholarship (Habeck 2006). Ibn Taymiya (1263–1328) maintained the distinction between combatants who may be the direct target of military action and forbade targeting noncombatants. However, similarly to Western tradition, he defines spies, those who transport munitions, or those who fight with words as combatants. Furthermore, he taught that Islam required absolute hatred for all that God proscribes, which includes all non-Muslims including apostates and hypocrites and any Muslim who did not participate in fighting them.

Muhammad ibn Abd al-Wahhab (1703–1792) emphasized God as Absolute Will and sole law-giver. He had little impact until his twentieth century followers allied with the House of Saud.

Abul A’la Maududi (1903–1979) believed that the decline of Muslim world power was a consequence of tolerating infidels. In 1941, he founded the Jamaat-e-Islami party in Lahore that incorporated communist ideas of revolution, justified suicide bombing and attacks on civilians, and was a factor in the bloody partition of India and Pakistan.

Hassan al-Banna (1906–1949) urged a struggle against a West that he saw as destroying the spirit and soul of Muslims. His Muslim Brotherhood would cleanse the dar al-Islam of infidels, beginning with his native Egypt.

Sayyid Qutb (2006) (1903–1966), also Egyptian, taught that Muslims who did not live “authentic” Islamic lives were as bad as Jews, Christians, and unbelievers, all of whom deserved killing. Qutb applied Maududi’s example to Egypt, joined the Muslim Brotherhood, and wrote books drawing on sections of the Quran to call for violent overthrow of all secular government everywhere. In Milestones (2006), he wrote, “We must return to that pure source from which those people derived their guidance which is free from any mixing or pollution. We must return to it to derive from it our concepts of the nature of the universe, the nature of human existence, and the relationship of these two with the Perfect and Real Being, God Most High. From it we must also derive our concepts of life, our principles of government, politics, economics, and all other aspects of life.”

Ayman Zawahiri (1951–), also Egyptian, extended these ideas based on five principles. First, any territory whose population is (or in some versions ever was) Muslim is part of the dar al-Islam. Second, eliminate any non-Islamic presence within the dar al-Islam, regardless of how or why it is there. Third, all Muslims have an individual duty to take part in this struggle so need not wait for commands from leaders. Fourth, any method is acceptable, including attacks on noncombatants. Fifth, any country that supports non-Muslims in the dar al-Islam is an aggressor, making their citizens legitimate targets. These assumptions lie behind much of what we heard from Bin Laden, who claimed his attacks were defensive and that the USA was the aggressor.

Mainstream Islamic tradition, much like the Western tradition, limits the use of armed force to legitimate governments, requires just cause, recognizes limits as to whom may be targeted, and limits the means that may be used. The radical doctrine of jihad advanced as the justification for terrorism violates these traditions. Any war against unbelievers is morally justified. When Muslims wage war for the defense or dissemination of Islam, it is a just war. When non-Muslims attack Muslims, it is unjust (Tibi 2012).

The Hindu Tradition (Brekke 2009; Dalal 2010; Dikshitar 1948; Jones and Ryan 2007; Rosen 2002)

There are two major traditions about war among Hindus. The first rooted primarily in the epics Ramayana and Mahabharata (DK 2017) which contains the often separately published Bhagavad Gita (Lombardo and Davis 2019) and, containing approximately 1.8 million words in over 200,000 lines, is by far the longest epic poem known. The Mahabharata, usually attributed to Vyasa, is thought to date from the eighth to ninth centuries BC although the oldest texts are about 400 years later. Reminiscent of the European chivalric code, five royal brothers discuss individual heroes fighting according to dharma, a code for conduct in peace and war, which is to say the equivalent of ius in bello. Fighting at night or during the monsoon is forbidden. Cavalry may only fight cavalry and infantry only infantry, barbed or poisoned arrows are prohibited, captives and the wounded must be given fair treatment, and third parties must not intervene in a battle between equal opponents. A king must not use deceit, magic, or trickery in war. These are rules for individuals fighting duels to save kidnapped maidens (the Ramayana) and the like, rather than wars fought for purposes of state. The primary concern is with heroism, individual behavior, and proper conduct according to dharma.

The second Hindu perspective on war is focused on statecraft and is found in Kautilya’s (350–275 BC) Arthashastra. In India, the four traditional life goals were enjoyment (kama), justice and righteousness (dharma), liberation from the cycle of rebirth (nirvana), and worldly gain (artha). Kautilya believed artha the most important of the four in managing a kingdom. Kings exist to insure the security and prosperity of their kingdoms, which sometimes required war. However, Kautilya advises caution rather than heroism (useful only to the extent it makes winning likely) and, because of the risks, advises the king to avoid war if possible, making it close to a last resort. Kautilya believed in alliances and, touching on ius post bellum, in benevolence toward and preservation of the way of life of the conquered. He speaks little about how to fight but if it comes to that advocates any tactics needed to win. Killing an enemy through deceit or trickery is acceptable.

The two Hindu traditions are diametrically opposed. The first, rooted in epic literature, sees dharma as fundamental; the second, rooted in experience, sees artha as the goal of statecraft. The first sees war as an end to itself, kingship as divine, extols courage and fighting for its own sake, and trickery as reprehensible. The second sees kingship as responsibility calling for prudence, praises doing whatever is necessary to win, and advises prudence and action based on raison d'état. In a word, the first ignores jus ad bellum; the second ignores jus in bello.

The Jain Tradition (Brekke 2009; Dundas 2002; Fohr 2015; Long 2013; Lorenzen 1978; Wikipedia 2019)

Jainism is a nontheistic religion with an estimated 5 million followers consolidated by Mahavira about the fifth century BC. It has four main premises, the most fundamental of which and the one that most concerns us here is ahimsa, non-violence. However, violence is not defined by actual harm in the ancient texts, but by intent. Jain texts emphasize that one must not intentionally kill another living being, nor cause another to do so, nor consent to any killing, and emphasize non-violence in actions, speech, and thought. Hinsa [violence] occurs in four categories:

Aarambhi [unavoidable]: resulting from household work

Sankalpi [deliberate]: deliberately killing a living-being Udyogi [occupational]: resulting from one's work in agriculture, trade, manufacture, etc.

Virodhi [defensive]: safeguarding the country or fight injustice

Of the four, Sankalpi Hinsa, deliberately killing even an insect, is totally forbidden. The other three are permissible under specific conditions. To most Jains, ahimsa does not merely prohibit doing harm, but also means doing good, by promoting charity, compassion, forgiveness, freedom, justice, kindness, and tolerance. Finally, while Jainism forbids deliberate killing of even a tiny creature, Jainism, believing that a strong army is a deterrent to invasion and the resultant violence, allows war for self-defense and for justice. Thus, Jainism allows adherents to join the military and fight in defense of their country and religion or for justice; it should be avoided if possible and opposes all wars of aggression, hatred, or revenge.

The Buddhist Tradition (Bartholomeusz 2006; Brekke 2009; Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai 1989; Dhamasiri 1989; Nhat Hanh 1999; Stroble 1991)

Siddhartha Gautama (c. 563–483 BC), the founder of Buddhism, turned unambiguously against war based on direct experience of it. The first principle of Buddhism is ahimsa (do no harm). Buddhism is unmistakably pacifist in its teaching. Nowhere is there support for war. Buddhism teaches that dependence on war for any reason leads to more violence, a sign of societal collapse that will fail in the long run. Only refusing to respond in kind will break the cycle.

Faced with the undeniable existence of kings and armies, Buddhism defined the ideal king as one who rules and triumphs by righteousness rather than force, and does not turn to violence to attain lawful order. The noble duties are to provide for and protect all. Buddha, like Marx later, looked forward to states becoming irrelevant and disappearing.

Much as when Rome later turned to Christianity, problems emerged when rulers who never gave up the right to make war converted to Buddhism, bringing with it responsibility for the protection of the faith by the state. Buddhism, somewhat like Greek Orthodoxy, attempted to resolve the difficulty by holding priests and monks to a higher standard than laymen while recognizing that the duties of the latter sometimes require violence but restricting it to defense limited to the minimum force necessary. In some forms, Buddhism asserts that aggression is, but self-defense is not, violence. Despite the restrictions, this led in turn to monks such as the Shaolin, famous and widely admired for their effective and rather spectacular acrobatic fighting style.

The Chinese Tradition (Brekke 2009; Lewis 2000, 2009; Sun Tzu 1963; van de Ven 2000)

Chinese thought focuses primarily on jus ad bellum. The “Mandate of Heaven” that originated with the Zhou Dynasty (1046–256 BC) became the basis for frequent violent overthrow of dynasties throughout Chinese history. In effect, this led to the Chinese focus on jus ad bellum and the idea that primary responsibility of the ruler to this day was as lawgiver, judge, and protector of social order. Having justified violence, war against barbarians and rebels was conducted without moral constraint, unless commanders found it tactically useful in specific situations.

Sun Tzu is both the presumed author and the title (usually translated as The Art of War) of the famed early classic of military theory and political realism. Dated to the early Warring States period (481–221 BC), it assumes that security and power rather than ideals or ethics motivate states. It is a comprehensive manual for commanding armies taking up tactics, strategy, and related matters such as logistics and espionage. It asserts that “all warfare is based on deception,” and, where it does speak of “moral influence” as one of five fundamental factors in war, it really means morale “that which causes the people to be in harmony with their leaders, so that they will accompany them in life and unto death without fear of mortal peril.” There is little in Sun Tzu that is concerned with just or unjust war.

In contrast, Mozi (also Mo Tsu, Mo Di, or latinized as Micius, 470–391 BC), founder of Mohism, permitted defensive but not offensive war, challenged the inevitability and nobility of war, forbade offensive, and reluctantly accepted only defensive war if it could not be eliminated.

Rejecting the Mohist doctrine that only defensive warfare is permissible; the Lu Shi Chun Qiu [roughly, Mr. Lu’s Annals] (Qin Dynasty, 221–207 BC) argued that punitive war to ensure order required offensive campaigns. They were only proper to punish wrongdoing, defend small states from aggressors, or preserve order if declared by a legitimate ruler. Wars to annex territory or for material gain were improper. Furthermore, “righteous troops” should only attack the enemy ruler and soldiers and avoid pillage and harm to civilians to win them over and prevent their active intervention. To the same end, the campaign should employ propaganda, punish malefactors, and reward joining the rightful ruler.

The Japanese Tradition (Brekke 2009; Cleary 1999, 2005; Friday 2009; Nitobe 1969; Skya 2009; Walker 2018)

In Japan, the equivalent to a just war tradition is Bushido, the way of the warrior, concerned only with jus in bello. It is a moral code requiring the enumerated virtues of courage, frugality, honesty, honor, loyalty, mastery of martial arts, rectitude, and respect. Originating in the ninth century with precursors that refer to the ideal of a warrior-poet, and formalized under the Tokugawa dynasty (1603–1867), it draws on Confucianism, Shinto, and Zen Buddhism. Nitobe (1969) saw in Bushido the sources of the personal qualities most admired by the Japanese, adding calm in the face of danger, compassion for non-enemies of lower status, justice, politeness, propriety, self-control, and sincerity to the growing list of requirements. Bushido became a government propaganda tool emphasizing obedience, duty, and self-sacrifice in the name of the state. It was militarized in the twentieth century to inspire soldiers to fight to the end rather than surrender. Japanese treatment of POWs was notorious and led to convictions in postwar criminal trials. However, the first proposals for suicide attacks for which Japan became infamous during WWII were resisted because Bushido calls for the warrior to be aware of but not to view death as the purpose of war.

Summary (Bryant 2015; Crowe 2014; De La Casas 1992; de Montesquieu 2002; Fisher and Wicker 2010; Elshtain 1992, 2003; Kant 1983; Stassen 2008; Temes 2003; de Vattel 2009; Walzer 1997)

There are both similarities and differences across time and culture as to what constitutes just grounds for or conduct of war. They address with varying emphasis legitimate war-making authority, just cause, right intention, right conduct, the treatment of civilians, and the manner in which wars should be resolved. Beginning in the mid-sixteenth-century Europe, the premises began to shift from religion to international law. Francisco de Victoria's mid-sixteenth-century essays On the Law of War and On the Indians foreshadowed the trend toward secularization. Bartolomé de Las Casas's Brief Account of the Devastation of the Indies (1542) initiated anti-colonialism, noting that the Spanish colonization of the New World brought more suffering than salvation to the Indians. He argued that exploiting natives and slaves was wrong although denunciation then and for years to come had no effect. The elimination of slavery had to wait for the Industrial Revolution, which made it uneconomic (except in a few places where it still exists, ironically to include parts of Africa). The seminal book was Hugo Grotius's On the Law of War and Peace (1625). Secularization continued with de Montesquieu's Spirit of the Laws (1748), Emmerich de Vattel's Law of Nations (1758), and Immanuel Kant's Perpetual Peace (1795).

Just War Theory encourages choosing alternatives to war and limiting violence if it does occur. There is general if not quite universal agreement that aggression is unjust, although this may not prevent so much as lead to camouflaging it. Aggression can take the form of an attack against one's own or an allies territory, embassies and consulates, ships at sea, airplanes in flight, satellites in space, overseas citizens, or even "national interests," at best a slippery concept.

Unless the aggressor loses a war, punishment may not be possible, but if it does lose, Just War Theory argues that it can be punished but must not be humiliated, if only for the practical reason that the latter is likely to lead to a subsequent war. Furthermore, it is unclear as to whether to punish one or both responsible officials and the state itself, and if the latter, how. Possible purposes for punishment are deterrence, reform, restraint, and retribution.

Self-defense is just and preemptive defense can be. Article 51 of the United Nations Charter provides that "nothing...shall impair the inherent" right of self-defense. Aggressors trying to appear just in their actions sometimes claim to be acting defensively, provoke others into attacking them, or even as Germany did in attacking Poland in 1939 fake an enemy attack to justify their aggression.

War should be the "last resort," but there is no objective means of determining if that point has been reached, leaving it to the judgment and experience of national leaders.

The UN derived a right of rebellion against colonial powers from the requirement for just war that denies sovereignty to a tyrannical government, adding to its Charter that "Nothing...can prejudice the right to self-determination, freedom, and independence, as derived from the charter...particularly of peoples under colonial and racist regimes or other forms of alien domination; nor the right of these peoples to struggle to that end and to seek and receive support." The right to "seek and receive support" effectively allows other nations to intervene wherever their strategic interests dictate and to ignore cases where the right of rebellion is exercised against a power too dangerous to confront or too distant from resources and trade routes to be a national interest. That a nation has the right but not the obligation to go to the aid of a nation under attack creates a third type of war. That is, just wars should be fought, unjust wars should never be fought, but some wars are optional – wars that one could rightfully fight but might be imprudent to do so.

With respect to how wars are fought, the Geneva Protocol of 1925 and subsequent conventions (e.g., 1972, 1997) banned biological, chemical, then nuclear weapons, although the first two have been used subsequently by terrorists and rogue states.

The anti-colonial period following World War II, the more-or-less simultaneous Cold War period, and more recently the emergence of terrorism and attacks from non-state actors provide the complex context in which the just war tradition continues to evolve.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Perpetrator Research

References

General

- Brekke, T. (Ed.). (2009). The ethics of war in Asian civilizations. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Brunslatter, D., & O'Driscoll, D. (2017). Just war thinkers from Cicero to the 21st century. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Churchman, D. (2013). Just war in eight cultures. Why we fight: Origins, nature, and management of human conflict. Lanham: University Press of America.
- Cox, R. (2017). Expanding the history of the just war: The ethics of war in ancient Egypt. International Studies Quarterly, 61, 2.
- Elshtain, J. (1992). Just war theory. New York: NYU.
- Kramer, S. (1956). From the tablets of Sumer. Indian Hills: Falcon's Wing Press.
- Lee, W. (2011). Warfare and culture in world history. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Lee, W. (2015). Waging war: Conflict, culture and innovation in world history. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Melton, J., & Baumann, M. (Eds.). (2010). Religions of the world: A comprehensive encyclopedia of beliefs and practices (pp. 1–4). Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO.
- Nardin, T. (Ed.). (1996). The ethics of war and peace. Princeton: Princeton.
- Walzer, M. (1997). Just and unjust wars. New York: Basic Books.

Classical Forerunners

- Aristotle, & Irwin, T. (Trans.). (1999). Nicomachean ethics. Indianapolis: Hackett.
- Aristotle, & Jowett, B. (Trans.). (2000). Politics. Mineola: Dover Thrift Editions.
- Cicero, Q. T., & Walsh, P. (Trans.). (2008). On Obligations [De Officiis]. Oxford: Oxford World's Classics.
- Plato & Emlyn-Jones, C., & Preddy, W. (Trans.). (2013). The republic, vol I & II. Cambridge: Harvard.
- Polybius & Walbank & Scott-Kilvert. (Trans.). (1979). The rise of the Roman empire. London: Penguin.

The Western Tradition

- de Las Casas, B. (1992). Brief account of the devastation of the indies. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins.
- de Montesquieu, B. (2002). Spirit of the laws. Amherst: Prometheus Books.
- de Vattel, E. (2009). Law of nations or the principles of natural law applied to the conduct and to the affairs of nations and of sovereigns. Indianapolis: Liberty Fund.
- Grotius, H. (2010). On the law of war and peace. Whitefish Montana: Kessinger.
- Kant, I. (1983). Perpetual peace. Indianapolis: Hackett Classics.
- von Clausewitz, C. Howard, M., & Paret, P. (Trans.). (1976). On war. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

The Greek Orthodox Tradition

- Harakas, S. (1981). The morality of war: Orthodox synthesis. Yonkers: St. Vladimir's Seminary Press.

- Norwich, J. (1990). Byzantium, vols I–III. London: Penguin.
- Ostrogorsky, G. (1957). History of the byzantine state. New Brunswick: Rutgers.

The Jewish Tradition

- Solomon, N. (2009). The ethics of war in Judaism. In T. Brekke (Ed.), The ethics of war in Asian civilizations. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Thomas Nelson & Sons. (1952). Holy bible revised standard version. Edinburgh: Author.
- Ravitzky, A. (1996). Prohibited wars in Jewish tradition. In T. Nardin (Ed.), The ethics of war and peace. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Walzer, M. (1996). War and peace in Jewish tradition. In T. Nardin (Ed.), The ethics of war and peace. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

The Muslim Tradition

- Arberry, A. (1955). The Koran interpreted. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Cook, D. (2005). Understanding Jihad. Berkeley: University of California.
- Gibb, H., & Kramers, J. (1961). Shorter encyclopaedia of Islam. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Habeck, M. (2006). Knowing the enemy: Jihadist ideology and the war on terror. New Haven: Yale.
- Hashimi, S. (1996). Interpreting Islamic ethics of war and peace. In T. Nardin (Ed.), The ethics of war and peace. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Hitti, P. (2002). History of the Arabs. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kelsay, J. (2009). Arguing the just war in Islam. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Lewis, B. (1995). The Middle East: A brief history of the last 2000 years. New York: Scribner.
- Lewis, B. (2002). What went wrong: Western impact and middle eastern response. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Qutb, S. (2006). Milestones. New Delhi: Islamic Book Service.
- Tibi, B. (2012). Islamism and Islam. New Haven: Yale.

The Hindu Tradition

- Dalal, R. (2010). The religions of India: A concise guide to nine major faiths. London: Penguin.
- Dikshitar, V. (1948). War in ancient India. New York: Macmillan.
- DK. (2017). The Illustrated Mahabharata. New York: Author.
- Jones, C., & Ryan, J. (2007). Encyclopedia of Hinduism. New York: Infobase.
- Lombardo, S., & Davis, R. (2019). S. [tr]. Bhagavad Gita. Indianapolis: Hackett.
- Rosen, S. (Ed.). (2002). Holy war: Violence and the Bhagavad Gita. Hampton: Deepak.

The Jain Tradition

- Dundas, P. (2002). The Jains. Milton Park: Routledge.

- Fohr, S. (2015). Jainism: A guide for the perplexed. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Long, J. (2013). Jainism: An introduction. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Lorenzen, D. N. (1978). Warrior ascetics in Indian history. Journal of the American Oriental Society, 98(1), 61–75.
- Wikipedia. Accessed 2019. En.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jainism. San Francisco: Author.

The Buddhist Tradition

- Bartholomeusz, T. (2006). In defense of dharma: Just war ideology in Buddhist Sri Lanka. In T. Brekke (Ed.), The Ethics of War in Asian Civilizations. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Bukkyo Dendo Kyokai [Buddhist Promoting Foundation]. (1989). The Teaching of Buddha. Moraga: Author.
- Dhamasiri, G. (1989). Fundamentals of Buddhist ethics. New York: Golden Leaves.
- Nhat Hanh, T. (1999). The heart of the Buddha's teaching: Transforming suffering into peace, joy, and liberation. New York: Broadway Books.
- Stroble, J. (1991). Buddhism and war: A study of the status of violence in early Buddhism. Honolulu: University of Hawaii.

The Chinese Tradition

- Lewis, M. (2000). Sanctioned violence in early China. New York: State University of New York.
- Lewis, M. (2009). The just war in early China. In T. Brekke (Ed.), The ethics of war in Asian civilizations. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Tzu, S. (1963). The art of war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- van de Ven, H. (2000). Warfare in Chinese history. Leiden: Brill.

The Japanese Tradition

- Cleary, T. (1999). Code of the samurai. North Clarendon: Tuttle Publishing.
- Cleary, T. (2005). The Japanese art of war. Boulder: Shambhala.
- Friday, K. (2009). Might makes right: just war and just warfare in early medieval Japan. In T. Brekke (Ed.),

- The ethics of war in Asian civilization*. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Nitobe, I. (1969). Bushido: The soul of Japan. North Clarendon: Tuttle.
- Skya, W. (2009). Japan's holy war: The ideology of radical Shinto ultra-nationalism. Durham: Duke.
- Walker, J. (2018). Bushido: The samurai code of honour. Seattle: Amazon Digital Services.

Contemporary Thought

- Bryant, M. (2015). A world history of war crimes from antiquity to the present. London: Bloomsbury Academic.
- Crowe, D. (2014). War crimes, genocide, and justice. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Elshtain, J. (2003). Just war against terror. New York: Basic.
- Fisher, D., & Wicker, B. (2010). Just war on terror? A Christian and Muslim response. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Orend, B. (2006). The morality of war. Nanaimo: Broadview.
- Stassen, G. (2008). Just peacemaking: The new paradigm for the ethics of peace and war. Cleveland: Pilgrim Press.
- Temes, P. (2003). The just war: An American's reflections on the morality of war in our time. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee.

Justice

- ▶ Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Justpeace

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

K

Kantian Peace

- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations

Kashmir

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Kashmir Conflict, The

Mohd Tahir Ganie

Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction, School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Identity and conflict; Secession and self-determination; Statehood conflict

Description

The Kashmir conflict has two intertwined aspects: firstly, it involves the struggle of the people of Jammu and Kashmir (J&K) for their right to self-determination (see ▶ “Secession and Self-Determination”). Secondly, it involves an interstate militarized contestation and sovereignty claims between India and Pakistan over the disputed Himalayan region and the erstwhile princely state of J&K, covering 85,000 sq. miles (Snedden 2013, pp. 240–43). Hence, there is the conflict in Kashmir (involving people of J&K and the Indian state) and the interstate conflict between India and Pakistan over Kashmir.

In terms of the interstate contestation, India and Pakistan have fought three wars on J&K – the 1947–1949, the 1965, and the 1999 war – but that did not change the status quo. Since the mid-1950s, Kashmiris ran a nonviolent political movement (see ▶ “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”) under the banner of the Plebiscite Front to press for the implementation of the UN-mandated referendum in the region. Indian government, however, suppressed the movement and jailed its leaders and co-opted others. Delaying the referendum favored India’s interest, as it was “already in the possession of the most desirable portion of Kashmir” (McMahon 1996, p. 34), and allowed it to buy time to extend its laws and annex the disputed region through “occupational constitutionalism” (Duschinski and Ghosh 2017). After the Kashmiri self-determination movement took a militant turn in the late 1980s, New Delhi deployed thousands of troops to quell the popular armed uprising in J&K. Relations between New Delhi and Islamabad further deteriorated, as Pakistan continued to provide financial, material, and diplomatic support to the anti-India armed groups fighting in Kashmir and Indian forces engaged in brutal counterinsurgency operations, leading to severe human rights abuses.

According to some estimates, approximately 500,000 India security personnel remain deployed in J&K, making it one of the most militarized zones in the world (Structures of Violence 2015, pp. 10–17; OHCHR 2018, p. 10), though exact figures of its total troop strength in Kashmir have never been publically disclosed by the Indian government. In the last 30 years of violence by state and non-state actors, estimated 50,000 people have been killed and countless others injured in J&K (Bose 2013, p. 278). Human rights organizations, like the Association of Parents of Disappeared Persons (APDP), have reported around 8000 cases of enforced disappearances and nearly as many cases of sexual violence against Kashmiri women by Indian security personnel, who enjoy legal impunity under the Armed Forces Special Powers Act or AFSPA (OHCHR 2018, p. 11). In 2009, human rights group International People's Tribunal on Human Rights (IPTHR) also reported unmarked mass graves across J&K, containing around 3000 bodies (South Asia Human Rights Documentation Center 2012).

As India and Pakistan engaged in a dialogue process in the early 2000s, a number of conflict-related incidents in J&K gradually decreased, from 3401 in 2003 to 708 in 2008 (Datasheet Jammu and Kashmir – SATP). Yet, the lack of any political breakthrough on the Kashmir issue led to the resurgence of the armed movement, particularly after the state forces violently crushed the post-2008 youth-led anti-India uprisings by killing, maiming, and torturing the Kashmiri protestors. By 2015, a full-blown “new age militancy,” where social media played a prominent role in recruitment and propaganda, had come to being. The new political generation of Kashmiris also widely employed social media as a tool to contest the state. To wean the Kashmiri youth away from the resurgent self-determination movement, Indian state, parallel to its policy of harsh policing, also adopted the policy of “engagement” that involved training and job placements for the Kashmiri youths outside the state in private companies, sports activities, and educational scholarships (Ganie 2019). This policy had only marginal outcome. Kashmiri youth continued to support and join the armed movement.

Through the military campaign of “Operation All-Out” (launched in 2017), the Modi government attempted to stem the rising tide of the new age militancy that had received further boost after the killing of iconic young militant commander Burhan Muzaffar Wani on July 8, 2016. However, despite killing hundreds of rebels every year (around 640 between 2017 and 2019), local recruitment to the armed groups continued. In February 2019, hostilities broke out between India and Pakistan after a Kashmiri militant affiliated with a Pakistan-based armed group attacked Indian paramilitary convoy in the Pulwama district, killing 40 Indian troopers. India launched a cross-border air strike, targeting a militant camp inside Pakistan, thus setting off a major military crisis. Timely intervention by major powers (China, EU, Russia, Saudi Arabia, and the USA) defused the escalating situation and averted the imminent war between the two nuclear powers of South Asia.

On August 5, 2019, the Kashmir conflict once again took a dramatic turn. After imposing an unprecedented military siege, the Hindu-nationalist government led by Narendra Modi unilaterally revoked Article 370 of the Indian constitution, which retained a semblance of Muslim-majority J&K's semi-autonomous status. The Modi government also dismembered and relegated the disputed region into two federally controlled “Union Territories” – Jammu and Kashmir, and Ladakh. Wider geopolitical ramifications followed this move. Indian government not only faced international criticism for its harsh measures in Kashmir, but neighboring China also reacted sharply against what its spokesperson Hua Chunying described as India undermining “China's territorial sovereignty by unilaterally changing its domestic law” (Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People's Republic of China, August 6, 2019). A year later, in May 2020, Chinese and Indian armed forces were locked in a deadly brawl in the Ladakh region that borders China. The situation still remains tense even after several rounds of talks at the highest level.

After the Modi government amended the domicile law of J&K in late March 2020, the local Muslim population of the disputed region of J&K fear demographic flooding through settler colonialism. With political and civil liberties severely restricted under the hardline policy of the BJP government, their political responses to the threat remain limited. Pro-India Kashmiri politicians, who opposed the revocation of Article 370, have been silenced, while the dissident organizations have either been banned or their members jailed or kept under strict surveillance. Local media is also facing unprecedented pressures from the state, with journalists being intimidated and harassed and threatened with draconian laws, such as the Unlawful Activities Prevention Act (Reporters sans Frontieres, August 5, 2020). For severely curtailed civil and political liberties, J&K's status has, consequently, declined from "Partly Free to Not Free," according to the Freedom House Report 2020.

Introduction

J&K had been under the monarchical rule of Dogra Hindus of the Jammu province since 1846. The people of J&K militated against the British installed ruler in a struggle that ran parallel to Indian struggle for independence. When Britain departed from its South Asian colony in August 1947, the people of J&K faced the unexpected turn in events and the choice of acceding to either Hindu-majority India or Muslim-majority Pakistan. Between 1947 and 1949, these newly independent dominions engaged in a war over the strategically important Himalayan region. Ultimately, the war resulted in the division of J&K after the UN-brokered cease-fire came into effect on January 1, 1949. Since then, India controls nearly two-thirds and Pakistan one-third of the disputed region.

According to the 2011 Census of India, the total population of Indian-controlled J&K was 12,541,302, (12.5 million) with 68% Muslims, 28% Hindus, 1.8% Sikhs, 0.9% Buddhists, and other religious groups. Muslims form the overall majority in 17 out of 22 districts of J&K (Census of India, 2011). While most Muslims of J&K favor either independence or accession with Pakistan, most Hindus wish to remain with India (Dawn 2007; Bradnock 2010; Nair and Sambanis 2019; Misgar 2020). Ethnically and religiously heterogeneous, Indian-controlled J&K is divided into three areas: The most populous region, the Kashmir Valley, has ten districts with nearly 6.9 million inhabitants (97% of whom are Muslims). The Jammu province has 5.3 million inhabitants, but out of its 10 districts, 4 (Jammu, Kathua, Samba and Udhampur) are Hindu-majority, while the rest (Doda, Poonch, Kishtwar, Rajouri, Ramban, and Reasi) are Muslim-majority. Larger in area size but sparsely populated, Ladakh has two districts: Buddhist-majority Leh (133,487) and Muslim-majority Kargil (160,514). Overall, Muslims constitute 46%, Buddhist 39%, and Hindus 12% of Ladakh's population (Census of India, 2011). This complex demographic composition of the state is one of the factors that makes the Kashmir conflict complicated and had, arguably, also impeded an independent J&K state in 1947. Although Dogras ruled J&K for nearly a century, they did not attempt to unify the different ethnic and religious groups of the state under an overarching national identity. Like most other rulers and princes of South Asia, the last Dogra ruler of J&K Hari Singh too "had not moved with the times by converting themselves into popular administrators running robust economies, empowering their subjects, and able to withstand losing the unequivocal, often uncritical, British support that had nurtured and protected their regimes" (Snedden 2013, p. 153).

India's claim over the erstwhile independent kingdom of J&K rests on the contentious Instrument of Accession, signed by the last Dogra monarch, Hari Singh, with the Indian Union on October 26, 1947. However, citing the Muslim-majority character of the state (which at the time comprised of 77% Muslims out of the total population of 4 million), Pakistan challenged this claim and argued that since the 1947 Partition was accepted on the principle of "religious-based two-nation theory," J&K must become part of Pakistan. The Pakistan state, thus, stressed on the principle of popular referendum as a mechanism to ratify the accession of J&K to either dominion.

The UN Security Council Resolution 47 (of April 21, 1948) on the “India-Pakistan Question” recognized the right of self-determination of the people of J&K and established a commission for conducting a free and impartial plebiscite to let them decide whether they wanted to join India or Pakistan. Delay, and later denial, of this promised plebiscite by India led to popular discontent within J&K, where people consistently demanded implementation of the UNSC Resolutions. Fearing of losing their previous influence in the new setup, Hindu landlords of the Jammu province wished to integrate with India and started an agitation under the banner of Praja Parishad soon after the UN-mandated cease-fire. The Praja Parishad were aided by paramilitary Hindu-nationalist group Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). Although the leading political party of J&K, National Conference (NC), and its popular leader Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah sided with India on the question of Accession, by the early 1950s there was a fallout between Abdullah and the Indian establishment, resulting in the ouster of Abdullah as the first Prime Minister of J&K. In 1955, Abdullah’s supporters formed a nonviolent political organization, Plebiscite Front, that sought to fight for the implementation of the UNSC Resolutions on J&K. The Plebiscite Front became the central platform for ideologically varied dissident groups and emerged as the most important organization that mobilized Kashmiri public against Indian rule. Indian government, however, suppressed the movement by jailing and exiling its members. In 1971, the Indian state outlawed the organization.

Scholars cite Indian state’s centralizing tendencies, interference, and manipulation of Kashmir’s politics and institutions and systematic erosion of its autonomy as some of the main factors that pushed the Muslim-majority population of the state to intensify their political resistance against India (Bose 2003; Ganguly 1996; Noorani 2011), though the fundamental cause of the conflict between Kashmir and India can be attributed to the “structural paralysis” that characterizes the relationship between the two entities (Cockell 2000). This structural paralysis is borne out of the incompatibility between how Kashmiris perceive their political identity and sense of group security (see ► “Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security”) and how the Indian state views the demand for Kashmiri self-determination. The state-institutional approach of the Indian state refuses to recognize the Kashmiri self-determination demand outside the framework of the Indian constitution, while Kashmiris wish to determine their political future under the auspices of UN-mandated referendum.

After the 1971 India-Pakistan war (that led to the creation of Bangladesh), both countries signed the 1972 Simla Agreement to resolve the Kashmir dispute bilaterally or “by any other peaceful means mutually agreed upon between them” (Simla Agreement July 2, 1972). In 1975, the Plebiscite Front was dissolved following the Accord, infamously known as the Indira-Sheikh Accord, between the Government of India and Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah. In 1953, Abdullah had been unceremoniously deposed by the Nehru administration and kept in prison for 11 years. The 1975 Accord allowed Abdullah to return to power at the demoted position of “chief minister” of J&K, though his decision was not well-received by the public and some of his close comrades, who left his party in protest. However, soon after Abdullah’s death, Kashmiri nationalist organization Jammu Kashmir Liberation Front (JKLF) launched an armed struggle against Indian rule in the late 1980s. This militant turn in the Kashmiri resistance movement was long in the making, but the immediate trigger for it was the rigging of the 1987 elections, which was fought between the unionist National Conference and the Muslim United Front (MUF), a newly formed alliance of the dissident groups, who questioned and opposed the 1947 Accession. New Delhi responded to the armed militancy through a violent campaign of wide-scale security crackdown, which resulted in severe human rights violations against civilians and thus pushed many more Kashmiris to join the guerrilla movement. Pakistan-backed insurgent groups, prominently Hizb-ul-Mujahideen (HM), started dominating the insurgency by the mid-1990s. In bitter internecine feuds, the JKLF suffered a major blow. In 1994, the group ultimately declared a unilateral cease-fire, which was brokered by the USA, United Kingdom, and a few Indian civil society members. In 1993, All Parties Hurriyat Conference (APHC), a coalition of over 20 socioreligious and political groups, came into existence as a political front of the Kashmiri self-determination movement. The APHC mainly comprised of the former MUF members. And, in turn, the MUF was mainly comprised of the former Plebiscite Front members.

In 1999, India and Pakistan fought a limited and inconclusive war in the Kargil area of J&K, which brought international spotlight and concern. Both the countries had just a year ago successfully conducted their nuclear tests. In March 2000, US President Bill Clinton visited India to defuse the tensions. Four months later, major insurgent group Hizb-ul-Mujahideen (HM) also dramatically announced a 3-month cease-fire and entered into unconditional negotiations with New Delhi. Internal disagreements in the armed movement, however, made the talks a short-lived affair. In July 2001, the leaders of India and Pakistan met at a summit-level meeting but that did not result in any political breakthrough on Kashmir. Yet, in the aftermath of the militant attack of the Indian parliament in December 2001, India mobilized its troops and weapons to the border, resulting in a tense military standoff with Pakistan for nearly 6 months. After international mediation, the situation deescalated, and by the autumn of 2002 both the countries withdrew their troops from the forward positions. India lost over 1800 soldiers during this military operation, mainly due to land mine and vehicle accidents (Pandit 2003). Considering the risk of hostilities turning into a potential nuclear war, India and Pakistan ultimately resumed the composite dialogue process in 2004 to resolve “all outstanding issues, including Jammu and Kashmir” (India-Pakistan Joint Statement, September 8, 2004).

In January and March 2004, Indian Prime Minister and Home Minister held direct talks with the APHC. Although both sides agreed to a step-by-step approach to the conflict resolution, the stalemate continued on the framework of the resolution. New Delhi insisted on the solution within the ambit of the Indian constitution. APHC found such proposition unacceptable. Departing from its traditional stance, Pakistan under President Pervez Musharraf dropped the references to the UN Resolutions and instead proposed his “four-point formula” (involving substantial autonomy and phased demilitarization of both sides of J&K). An influential segment of the APHC refused to accept the Musharraf plan and insisted on the sanctity of the UN Resolutions. Ultimately, neither New Delhi-APHC nor New Delhi-Islamabad talks made any headway in resolving the Kashmir conflict.

By the mid-2000s, India had largely subdued the Kashmiri armed movement in the urban centers and also initiated electoral process through which the newly launched Peoples Democratic Party (PDP) came to power in 2002 that proposed the self-rule framework (of shared sovereignty) as a basis for resolving the Kashmir conflict. In the meantime, killings continued and so did low-level armed militancy. Between 2000 and 2005, around 16,000 people were killed in J&K, including 8600 civilians (Datasheet Jammu & Kashmir, SATP). In the same period, Pakistan-based armed group Jaish-e-Muhammad (JeM) introduced deadly suicide bombings against Indian targets in J&K. However, after 9/11, as the USA stance toward armed groups turned adverse and Pakistan became the frontline US partner in “war on terror,” President Pervez Musharraf banned JeM along with another armed group, Lashkar-e-Tayyaba. Both were actively involved in the Kashmir insurgency.

Nonetheless, the 2008 mass anti-India uprising changed the nature of the conflict, as the Kashmiri resistance shifted from the armed insurrection to an unarmed struggle. The 2008 anti-India mass uprising was followed by youth-led street protests of 2009 and 2010. These episodes of contention were violently crushed by Indian security forces by killing, maiming, jailing, and torturing the young demonstrators (Kak 2011). Continued state repression instigated a new insurgent movement that gained momentum, through surging recruitment of the local youth, and evolved into a full-blown insurgency by 2015. Iconic rebel leader Burhan Muzaffar Wani became the face of this “new age militancy.” His death in July 2016 triggered the third anti-India uprising in Kashmir and inspired hundreds of young Kashmiris to join the armed militant organizations. According to the 2017 data shared by the then Chief Minister of J&K Mehbooba Mufti in the J&K Legislative Assembly, 223 civilians were killed in the three uprisings in 2008, 2010, and 2016 (Outlook, 30 January 2017), while the civil society groups estimated that more than 250 people were killed during these uprisings (PUCL 2016).

Although, because of less than 1000 deaths per year, the Kashmir conflict is sometimes categorized as “a low-intensity” armed conflict, there are wider socioeconomic implications of the conflict that such categorization fails to capture. For example, continuation of the conflict has not only hit the local economy but also discouraged prospective investors from investing in Kashmir for its image of being a “conflict zone.” As a result, not many jobs have been generated for the expanding pool of educated youth. According to the 2016 Economic Survey Report of J&K, unemployment rate in the state (among the age group 18–29 years old) was 24%, which was higher than the national average of India, 13%. Likewise, militarization of civilian spaces, frequent violence, and persisting volatile situation have badly affected the mental health of the local population, with nearly 1.4 million adults in the Kashmir Valley suffering from significant mental distress, according to a 2015 survey conducted by Doctors Without Borders (Kashmir Mental Health Survey Report 2015).

After coming to power in 2014, the Modi government adopted a relatively more hardline policy on Kashmir. This hardline policy, primarily emanating from Hindu-nationalist BJP’s ideological stance on Muslim-majority Kashmir, manifested itself first in 2016 when the Indian state forces indiscriminately fired pump action shotguns (also called “pellet guns”) on Kashmiri protestors and blinded scores of them (Zia 2019b). To counter the youth-led street protests and new age militancy, the Modi government tasked the security establishment with pacifying the restive population of the disputed region. Consequently, in 2017, after 15 years’ hiatus, Indian army reintroduced cordon and search operations (CASOs) that involve intrusive house-to-house searches and frisking of civilians. Between 2017 and 2019, more than 1000 CASOs were launched by the Indian state forces across Kashmir (JKCCS Annual Human Rights Report, 2017, 2018, 2019). These CASOs generated fear and resentment among Kashmiris. In different villages, particularly in southern Kashmir, residents accused the Indian state forces of harassment and vandalizing their properties during CASOs. Moreover, to deter the local population from giving shelter to militants, the Indian state forces also started blasting the houses where militants were holed up. Continuing with this hardline approach, the BJP government stripped Kashmir of its autonomy immediately after Modi’s reelection in 2019 and, through a wide-scale security crackdown, rounded up political leaders, members, and civil society activists. In the altered political condition, Kashmiri parties were denied avenues to mobilize the public and organize protests against the arbitrary move of the federal government. Kashmiri diaspora and Pakistan sought to highlight the human rights crisis in Kashmir and corner India at international forums, but India’s economic clout and strategic partnership with important international players, such as the USA and France, made it immune to any serious diplomatic crisis or external pressure. Pakistan’s weak economic situation along with relatively unfavorable international image because of its patronage of armed groups did not furnish enough diplomatic heft to it to enlist international support on Kashmir.

In the current scenario, it is unlikely that India and Pakistan will resume talks on Kashmir anytime soon, and the absence of any dialogue process on the main cause of friction between the two countries is going to keep the situation in the region on the boil. China has its interests in the Ladakh region, which it will seek to secure. That will implicate China in the larger Kashmir conflict, where it will balance (or even enhance) the position of Pakistan against India.

Historical Background: 1586–1947

Historical Himalayan region of Kashmir lost its sovereignty after the Mughal Emperor Jalal Uddin Akbar deposed its last independent monarch, Yusuf Shah Chak, and annexed the region in 1586 (Khan 1953, p. 194). Mughal satraps ruled Kashmir for nearly three centuries but ultimately lost the famed province in 1752 to the powerful Afghan army of the Durrani Empire, who annexed some important Mughal territories in a series of attacks between 1749 and 1757. By the early nineteenth century, the Mughal Empire had weakened considerably, and the Durrani were also in disarray due to the internecine strife. Encouraged by this state of affairs in its neighborhood, the Sikh Kingdom of Punjab seized the Afghan territory of Kashmir in 1819. However, in the First Anglo-Sikh War of 1846, the Sikhs were defeated by the powerful British East India Company, who by then had consolidated its control over much of the Indian subcontinent and were just awaiting to annex the rich and fertile land of Punjab. Sikh Empire's defeat in the war resulted in the Treaty of Lahore (March 9, 1846), under which the British East India Company forced the Sikh ruler to cede some of its territories, including the "provinces of Kashmir and Hazara," in lieu of the war indemnity of one and half crore (15 million) Nanakshahi rupees (Sikh currency). In a separate imperial arrangement called the Treaty of Amritsar (March 16, 1846), the British East India Company transferred the sovereign rights to Maharaja Gulab Singh and "male heirs of his body" the "hilly and mountainous country" of Kashmir (Treaty of Amritsar). An ethnic Dogra Hindu, Gulab Singh was the most important army general of the Sikh Kingdom, but he had helped the company to win the 1846 war after entering a secret deal with them (Huttenback 1968, p. 80–82). The company appropriated Kashmir province to Singh (for 7.5 million Nanakshahi rupees) and recognized him as an independent ruler, a decision that was apparently taken out of political expediency, as the British did not have military resources to occupy the distant mountainous country of Kashmir. The then Governor-General of India Lord Hardinge reasoned that rewarding Singh would signal to "other Chiefs of Asia the benefits which accrue from an adherence to British interests" (as cited in Huttenback 1968, p. 82). Moreover, through the sale of the territory, the company could recover the costs incurred during the expensive back-to-back wars – the First Anglo-Afghan War (1839–1842) and the First Anglo-Sikh War (1845–1846).

Clubbing together his other territorial possessions, Gulab Singh created a sovereign principality "Jammu and Kashmir," which accepted the British suzerainty. Singh and his successors would rule Kashmir for almost 100 years (1846–1947). They imposed heavy taxation system on the indigenous populations to recover the payments made to purchase Kashmir. Such a taxation system badly affected the urban artisan community and the rural peasantry and forced many of them to migrate out of Kashmir and settle in the neighboring British Indian province of Punjab. A large number of Kashmiris had already settled in Punjab from the previous waves of migration caused by the great famine of 1832 and the miserable conditions under the Sikh rule (Jalal 2000, p. 352). By 1881, nearly 50,000 inhabitants in Punjab spoke Kashmiri language. The 1911 British India census recorded 177,549 Kashmiri Muslims in Punjab, of these less than 10,000 spoke Kashmiri. Ten years later, in 1921, Kashmiri Muslims in Punjab numbered 169,761, but only 4690 persons spoke Kashmiri, indicating that the majority of the Kashmiri community settled in the province had adopted the local Punjabi language (Census of India, 1921, p. 309).

By and large, the Dogra state was a de facto Hindu state, where non-Muslims fared better in comparison to Muslims, who, despite being in the majority, remained in a marginalized position (Rai 2004). However, as a paramount power, the British made some interventions in Kashmir and forced reforms in the local administrative system (these actions, though, were necessitated largely due to the growing political importance of Kashmir for the British in the context of their imperial rivalry with Russia, which bordered the frontiers of Kashmir). For example, in 1899, the British government nominated a Punjabi Muslim to the Maharaja's Council of advisors, the first Muslim appointed to such a sinecure post in a Muslim-majority state (Lone 2019, p. 308). Apart from the British interventions, the petition campaigns of the local landed elite were also instrumental in creating marginal improvements in the socioeconomic conditions of the majority Muslim community of Kashmir at the turn of the twentieth century (Rai 2004: 254–56). By the early 1920s, “an embryonic Muslim political class” had emerged that fought for social, economic and political rights of Kashmiri Muslims (Copland 1981: 235). Encompassing newly educated young men, middle-class professionals, vast impoverished peasantry, and underprivileged urban artisans, the fledgling political formation presented a major challenge to the autocratic Dogra monarchy in the 1930s and 1940s. Using the argument of relative deprivation and employing religiously informed idioms, the new middle-class professionals-driven Kashmiri leadership embarked on a process of political mobilization to demand for a “responsible government.” They held meetings in mosques and, during congregational Friday prayers, denounced the sectarian nature of the Dogra Monarchy, which while governing a predominantly Muslim polity had employed mostly Punjabi and Kashmiri Hindus in the administration, and institutionalized discriminatory policies. This new leadership received support from influential voices from the diasporic Kashmiri community (including the renowned poet-philosopher of the Indian subcontinent Muhammad Iqbal) and a sympathetic Lahore press that ran campaigns to highlight the underprivileged position of Kashmiri Muslims in the Dogra state and asked for reforms in the system of governance in Kashmir. Historian Chitralakha Zutshi (2004, p. 191–92) notes, “Kashmiri Muslim expatriates in the Punjab had retained emotional and familial ties to their soil and felt compelled to raise the banner of freedom for Kashmir and their brethren in the Valley, thus launching bitter critiques of the Dogra administration.”

Although a major political unrest happened in 1924 in the form of a labor strike organized by the workers of the state-owned Silk Factory, it was the civilian uprising of July 13, 1931, that challenged the monarchical authority to a considerable degree. With the help of the British, this Muslim revolt was immediately quelled by the Dogra state by carrying out a series of massacres and jailing the demonstrators (Ahmad 2017). The 1931 uprising and the consequent political unrest, however, was a watershed moment. It had political repercussions both internally and externally. The lobby groups in the neighboring British Indian provinces mobilized in support of Kashmiris and pressurized the British and Dogra governments. Under pressure that the unaddressed grievances of Kashmiri Muslims may have repercussions in its provinces where there were substantial Muslim population, the British forced the Dogra ruler to initiate reforms to allow fair representation of Muslims in the educational sector and state jobs. The disaffected Muslim population organized itself under a new political organization Jammu and Kashmir Muslim Conference (JKMC).

In November 1931, the Dogra monarchy set up a commission of enquiry (headed by Justice J.B. Glancy), which in its report in May 1932, among other things, recommended that the Dogra ruler allows formation of associations and political parties and press freedom and also recommended the establishment of a legislative assembly. Acceptance of these recommendations by the Dogra ruler opened political opportunities for Kashmiris, who went on to form a representative body, the All Jammu and Kashmir Muslim Conference (JKMC) in October 1932. Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah was appointed as its first president and Choudhry Ghulam Abbas as the secretary general. To include people of other faiths and build a broad-based movement, Abdullah changed the name of JKMC into Jammu and Kashmir National Conference (JKNC) in 1939, a decision that caused a split within the party. Some leaders saw this move as detrimental to the Muslim interests. Abdullah’s growing affinity with Indian National Congress (INC), particularly his growing friendship with Jawaharlal Nehru, made Abbas wary. He wished that Muslims of J&K affiliate themselves with the Muslim League headed by Muhammad Ali Jinnah, the founder of Pakistan.

In 1944, in a 44-page manifesto “Naya Kashmir” (new Kashmir), the JKNC outlined an ambitious program for a future secular and democratic state of J&K, modeled on the socialist system of governance and planned economy. Two years later, borrowing from India's anti-colonial struggle, the JKNC, under the leadership of Abdullah, also launched the anti-monarchical "Quit Kashmir movement" in 1946. Abdullah forcefully denounced the 1846 Treaty of Amritsar, under which the despotic rule of the Dogra monarchy was imposed on Kashmiris, and sought a government that enjoyed the will of the people. In his April 1946 telegram to the British Cabinet Mission that was visiting Kashmir, he said that "We wish to declare that no sale deed, however sacrosanct, can condemn more than four million men and women to servitude of an autocrat when will to live under this rule is no longer there" (Dhar 1951, p. 149). He offered to pay 7.5 million rupees to the Dogra ruler to vacate, the amount for which the British had sold Kashmir to the ruler's great grandfather, Gulab Singh. Abdullah's movement faced major hurdles and fizzled out soon. Most non-Muslims of J&K venerated the Dogra Maharaja, because he was their benefactor and the reason for their relative affluence and social, economic, and religious privileges. As a result, they did not support the Quit Kashmir movement. The Muslim Conference also remained indifferent to the movement for a different set of reasons (Lone 2019, pp. 408–09). On May 20, 1946, Abdullah and other leaders of the JKNC were arrested and tried for sedition. Abdullah was sentenced to 9 years of prison (Bazaz 1954, pp. 258–59). Abdullah supporters protested and observed strikes against the arrest. The Dogra police, however, killed 20 demonstrators and jailed hundreds of others and ultimately quelled the Quit Kashmir movement (Para 2019, p. 113).

In early 1947, the last Dogra ruler, Maharaja Hari Singh, faced an internal armed rebellion from the Poonch province over newly introduced exorbitant tax rules (Snedden 2013). Between August and September 1947, the Dogra state had unleashed a "systematic [...] persecution of Muslims in areas of Poonch, Mirpur and Jammu." and by the third week of September, nearly 18,000 Muslims from different villages were killed (Rashid 2020, p. 6). By mid-October, further 20,000 Muslims had been killed by the Dogra forces and the members of the extreme Hindu-nationalist Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS). More than 200,000 Muslims were also displaced in this ethnic cleansing, which changed the demographic composition of the Jammu province (Snedden 2013, pp. 55–56), with the Muslim population constituting around 40% of the Jammu district in 1941, dropping significantly to fewer than 7% as per the last census (in 2011). In the meantime, large-scale sectarian violence (involving Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs) had ensued after the partition of British India, which pitted communities in Punjab and Delhi against each other. As Iffat Rashid (2020) argues, news and rumors about the Muslim massacres in the Jammu province and sectarian bloodletting in East Punjab and Delhi in September had politicized the tribal population from the North-West Frontier (NWFP). Consequently, in the third week of October, they launched an armed raid and entered J&K, where they were joined by the rebels of Poonch (Rashid 2020, pp. 5–6). At the time, the chief minister of NWFP was ethnic Kashmiri Abdul Qayyum Khan, who organized the militia for the Kashmir operation (Effendi 2007: 149). Forming a sizable military force, the rebels defeated the Dogra state forces, captured a few important districts, and proclaimed a provisional "Azad [free] Jammu and Kashmir government." Faced with this extraordinary situation, the Dogra ruler sought military assistance from India, who offered to help on the condition that he first signs the Instrument of Accession. Maharaja wished to keep his sovereign rule but eventually signed the document in October 1947 with a proviso that India may make laws for J&K only on three matters: defense, external affairs, and communications. This Instrument of Accession (IoA) later became the basis for Article 370 of the Indian constitution that guaranteed the autonomous status of J&K, even though according to the principles of India's Independence Act, where the ruler and the ruled happened to be from different religious denominations, the Instrument of Accession was to be ratified in accordance to the popular referendum, as was the case with Junagadh. The denial of the right to exercise the vote became the source of contention and the main reason of the Kashmir conflict.

What made the autonomous status of J&K possible was the unique historical circumstances, under which the IoA was signed by the last Dogra ruler. Being a Muslim-majority state, J&K was expected to either become part of Pakistan or remain independent as its Dogra ruler wished. As the rebels aided by the tribal militias advanced toward Srinagar, the Maharaja fled from Srinagar, the summer capital of the state. It was against the backdrop of these events Hari Singh signed the Instrument of Accession as India offered military help only on the condition that the ruler of the state sign the accession deed.

On October 27, 1947, India airlifted its troops to Kashmir and soon after the first India-Pakistan war broke out. In January 1948, India took the matter to the UN complaining against Pakistani's aggression. The UNSC, however, passed resolutions and asked for a free and impartial plebiscite to ascertain the wishes of the population of J&K. Indian government under Prime Minister Jawaharlal Nehru pledged to hold the referendum but continued to delay it until Indian laws under Article 370 of the Indian constitution were gradually extended to J&K, thus consolidating New Delhi's grip over the region, where it cultivated a political elite and proxies through which Kashmir was controlled and managed. New Delhi frequently intervened in Kashmiri politics, allowing (or facilitating) the local client regime to rig elections in their own favor, and jail and exile the dissidents who demanded the plebiscite (Bose 2003). After Nehru's death in 1964, India extended many more Union laws to Kashmir than negotiated under the terms of Article 370 and the 1952 Delhi Agreement. This created further discontent among Kashmiris who wished to retain their state's autonomy and exercise their right to self-determination under the UN-mandated plebiscite.

Post-Colonial India and the Kashmir Question

On account of his party National Conference's support to the 1947 Accession, Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah was able to negotiate substantial autonomy for J&K, which, unlike other states that acceded to India, was allowed to have a constitutional assembly to ratify the terms of the agreement with India. Under Article 370, the provisions of the Instrument of Accession were formalized, limiting the powers of the Indian parliament over J&K and exempting the full applicability of the Indian constitution to the state. J&K retained a separate constitution and a national flag, with its chief executive being called prime minister and the nominal head Sadr-e-Riyasat (president), who was to be elected by the J&K Legislative Assembly. According to Duschinski and Ghosh (2017, p. 317), "Article 370 was designed to temporarily manage the constitutional relationship between J&K and India until the political will of the people could be established and a final settlement reached through the state's own constitutional drafting process." This constitutional arrangement came in the context of the India-Pakistan contestation over the disputed region and the Security Council resolutions that instituted a commission to hold a plebiscite to settle the issue. The UNSC Resolution 80 (March 14, 1950) had asked: "that steps should be taken forthwith for the demilitarization of the State [of J&K] and for the expeditious determination of its future in accordance with the freely expressed will of the inhabitants" (Resolution 80, 1950, p. 2). Despite being a non-permanent member at the time, India had abstained during the voting on Resolution 80 along with Yugoslavia, while Soviet Union had remained absent and 8 voted in favor.

In the early 1950s, the NC passed the Abolition of Big Landed Estates Act and the Distressed Debtors Relief Act that benefited a large segment of the rural population (mostly Muslims and Dalits) and thus gained a sizable constituency for the party that dominated the politics of J&K. In 1953, however, Abdullah was deposed by the Nehru government on the charges of conspiring for J&K's independence. In his place, Nehru installed Ghulam Muhammad Bakshi, whose regime (1953–1964) acted with impunity in suppressing the dissident voices. But, the idea of Rai shumari (plebiscite) did not vanish and continued to define the political discourses of the struggle for Kashmiri self-determination led by the Plebiscite Front and other dissident organizations.

With Abdullah in jail, the president of India, in 1954, proclaimed the Constitution (Application to Jammu and Kashmir) Order and added Article 35A to the Indian constitution that empowered the Jammu and Kashmir State Constituent Assembly (convened in October 1951) to define the permanent residents, who were given the special rights and privileges. The 1954 Presidential Order, though, also extended more Indian laws to J&K than originally agreed under the terms of the 1947 Accession, Article 370, and 1952 Delhi Agreement. Once the J&K Constituent Assembly dissolved in November 1956, no authority could have made further amendments to Article 370, yet newer powers were extended to the Union government viz-a-viz J&K, a process defined by A.G. Noorani (2011, p. 8) as “unconstitutional.” In 1965, the local client regime also replaced the nomenclature of J&K’s prime minister with “chief minister” and unconstitutionally changed the position of Sadar-i-Riyasat to a governor, who would now be appointed by New Delhi. This gradual erosion of J&K autonomous status, along with the autocratic nature of the client regimes that restricted political rights and other freedoms, became one of the reasons why increasing discontentment was caused among Kashmiris, many of whom continued to support the dissident organizations, such as the Plebiscite Front, which demanded the right to self-determination through a free and impartial plebiscite conducted under the auspices of the international community and the withdrawal of the armed forces and the restoration of civil liberties and free elections.

A number of factors coalesced to create conditions for widespread political unrest and protests throughout the 1960s, often spearheaded by students and youth, who desired to change the status quo (David Lockwood 1969). Firstly, as the client regimes in J&K used colonial-era laws, such as the Preventive Detention Act 1954, to stifle democratic dissent (Duschinski and Ghosh 2017, p. 319), resentment against the state prevailed among a large section of the population, and that resentment was often pricked whenever Indian leaders denied the possibility of holding the UN-sanctioned plebiscite in J&K. Secondly, mysterious disappearance of the holy relic or moi-e-muqaddas (hair strand of Prophet Muhammad) housed in the Hazratbal Shrine in Srinagar triggered massive protests in the winter of 1963. This event, while heightening anti-India sentiments in the region and unifying the otherwise internally divided Muslim community of J&K, “also became an instrument for people to articulate their sentiments related to the political future of Kashmir more pronouncedly” (Kanth 2018, p. 62). And, thirdly, negotiations and mediation efforts on the Kashmir issue consistently failed. In 1963, India and Pakistan engaged in direct negotiations on Kashmir and solutions “other than the plebiscite were seriously considered by Pakistan,” and India too, reportedly, was willing to cede parts of Kashmir to “straighten out the border” (Lamb 1966, p. 102). But, these negotiations failed, ultimately. The 1965 war over J&K did not change the status quo, either. Yet, after the war, representatives of the major world powers visited South Asia to renew their efforts to get the Kashmir issue resolved. In December 1968, British foreign minister visited New Delhi and offered mediation on the Kashmir issue, but New Delhi rejected the offer. In January 1969, Shah of Iran tried to mediate on Kashmir, but he too failed. In May 1969, Russian Prime Minister Kosygin visited Pakistan and presented a new formula of softening the borders to Pakistani leaders, but they did not accept it. In July 1969, American President Nixon visited New Delhi with a proposal, but Indian leaders rejected it. Sensing that negotiations and international mediation on Kashmir were failing and the 1965 war also did not change anything, the Plebiscite Front leadership went further ahead to amend their relationship with New Delhi and finally decided to contest elections in 1970.

Between the 1950s and 1970s, the state-led modernization process, coupled with wide-ranging land reforms, had ushered in mass education and improved the socioeconomic conditions of the majority Muslim population. A critical mass of politically aware population had come of age that became assertive about their civil liberties and political rights as they confronted the system that disregarded the democratic norms and used violence and coercion to rule (Ganguly 1996; Bose 2003). New Delhi's tampering with the provisions underpinning J&K's autonomy and its continuous interferences in its institutions and internal politics was widely perceived as an attempt to forcibly integrate the state with India and hence vigorously resisted by the people of J&K, especially in the Kashmir region, where the self-determination movement was widely supported. Although the vast majority opposed the status quo, the Kashmiri self-determination movement itself was composed of a variety of "parties and protest networks [with] different identities and structures. Some were full-fledged political parties, others were collections of angry young men, and others mixed political and social activism" (Staniland 2014, p. 65).

In 1975, the Plebiscite Front was ultimately dissolved after its patron Sheikh Muhammad Abdullah signed an accord with the Indira Gandhi administration, whereby Abdullah accepted India's sovereignty over J&K in lieu of returning to power as the chief minister, but the smaller dissident groups, including those that branched out from the PF, continued their resistance against Indian rule. Inspired by the political struggles in Vietnam, Algeria, Palestine, and the Latin America, some Kashmiri youth formed subversive groups. Along with the former Plebiscite Front members who opposed the 1975 Accord, different dissident groupings (including religious, student, and trade union organizations) created an alliance Muslim United Front in September 1986 to contest the 1987 elections for the J&K Assembly. The MUF mobilized thousands of people for its rallies in Srinagar's Iqbal Park in November 1986 and March 1987. When the elections were held on March 23, 1987, an unprecedented voter turnout (80%) was witnessed. Due to the MUF, many first-time voters participated in the polls. The MUF, however, was targeted by the state (Widmalm 1997, pp. 1020–21). Elections were heavily rigged in favor of the pro-India NC and Congress, while the MUF members were detained in large numbers and tortured in jails. By the autumn of 1989, the MUF collapsed, and with it a nonviolent movement for Kashmiri self-determination.

Armed Uprising, Deep Militarization, and Human Rights Abuses

Many young Kashmiris who participated in the 1987 elections crossed the Line of Control (LoC) and received arms training and weapons from Pakistan. Members of the Kashmiri nationalist organization Jammu and Kashmir Liberation Front launched the armed movement and started targeting the state symbols and armed forces. On August 1, 1988, they blasted the telegraph office in Srinagar and two other government buildings and carried out a series of assassinations of selected individuals, including political workers and suspected informers. By late 1989, situation in Kashmir had turned explosive. On the call of the dissident groups, and due to the general mistrust in democratic institutions, majority of the people in Kashmir Valley boycotted the elections for the Indian parliament due in November 1989. The poll percentage in the three constituencies was as follows: Baramulla (5.48%), Srinagar (0%), and Anantnag 5.07%), while for the entire J&K it was 25.60% (Election Commission of India, 1989, p. 42). In December 1989, JKLF abducted the daughter of newly appointed Home Minister of India Mufti Muhammad Sayed and got their five jailed colleagues released in ransom. The JKLF rebels paraded through the old city among the jubilant crowd, an event that is said to have bolstered the morale of the insurgents and their sympathizers. Many young men joined the ranks of the militant outfits after the Gaw Kadal massacre of January 21, 1990, in which Indian paramilitary forces killed over 50 civilian demonstrators, who were protesting after the news about the raids on civilian homes and molestation of women during the previous night's military crackdown reached the city. Between April and May, most of the estimated 150,000–170,000 Kashmiri Hindus of Kashmir Valley fled "due to a combination of militant activity, selective assassinations, the breakdown of law and order, and the implementation of a policy of violent counter insurgency” (Datta 2017, p. 8).

Starting as a vanguard insurgent group, JKLF soon fragmented, paving the way for pro-Pakistan Hizbul Mujahideen (HM), who came to dominate the insurgency since the early 2000s. JKLF’s core political objective was to regain sovereignty of Kashmir through popular armed mobilization against Indian rule. JKLF, however, did not have a clear road map, so it was largely fighting “an ad hoc war” (Staniland 2014, p. 74). JKLF’s core leadership was Valley-centric, composed of “a group of urban lower-middle-class teenagers and young men who knew each other from Srinagar before the war,” and it lacked preexisting social base and networks to develop a robust institutional structure (Staniland 2014, p. 74). The organization allowed a range of recruits to train in its camps and with its weapons; some of these recruits belonged to the parties that advocated a different ideology than JKLF. As Staniland (2014) argues, this “provided opportunities for the JKLF’s future rivals to gain training, weaponry, and access to Pakistani patronage and sanctuary. The emerging cadres of the JKLF were highly heterogeneous, both socially and ideologically” (p. 75). HM, on the other hand, was able to build strong institutional structure by mobilizing its ties with the Jamaat-e-Islami, whose cadres and sympathizers sustained the outfit, even after the brutal counterinsurgency phase killed thousands of its members. Although initially hesitant to support the nascent insurgency, pro-Pakistan Jamaat eventually backed the HM (and internally captured its leadership) to counterbalance the JKLF. By 1995, HM had 2500 cadres (Schofield 2003, p. 175). Initially concentrated in the urban centers, the armed insurgency gradually moved to the rural parts of Kashmir and also spread to the Muslim-majority districts of Jammu, such as Doda, Poonch Rajouri, and Kishtwar. Most of the persons involved in the initial phase of the armed movement belonged to what Staniland (2014, p. 65) calls “nonviolent politicized opposition blocs,” the ones who had branched out of the PF and MUF and other dissident and social activism groupings.

By February 1990, over 100,000 paramilitary, army, and police personnel were deployed to Kashmir to crush the armed rebellion (Schofield 2003: 150). In July 1990, under the Armed Forces (Jammu and Kashmir) Special Ordinance, Indian military received wide-ranging powers, and then with the introduction of the Armed Forces (Jammu and Kashmir) Special Powers Act in September, they were provided legal impunity from prosecution and given extraordinary powers to search, arrest, and kill. Consequently, Indian troops often resorted to “arson, burning of shops and houses in retaliation for a recent ambush by the militants” (Schofield 2003: 156). Human rights groups have reported 8000–10,000 cases of enforced disappearance (Zia 2019a) and as many cases of sexual violence against Kashmiri women (Asia Watch 1993), including the Kunan Poshpora mass rape of February 23, 1991, wherein Indian troops of four Rajputana Rifles regiment were accused of raping at least 31 Kashmiri women in the twin villages of Kunan and Poshpora in north Kashmir’s Kupwara district (Batool et al. 2016). Some insurgents have also been involved in ransom, rape, and killings of noncombatants, though “it does not compare with the scale and depth of abuse by Indian State forces” (Seema Kazi).

Eventually, through relentless counterinsurgency operations, Indian forces killed a significant number of insurgents. Other rebels were either arrested or made to surrender, thus considerably weakening the Kashmiri armed opposition during the first phase (1988–2003). In this period, 18,000 rebels, 5000 Indian security forces personnel, and 13,000 civilians were killed in the conflict-related violence. Also, the “collapse of most of the Kashmiri armed groups [during this period] occurred when internal feuds exploded into fratricide and the Indian state exploited these organizational divisions” (Staniland 2014, p. 60).

In 1993, over 20 dissident groups formed a nonviolent organization All Parties Hurriyat Conference (APHC or Hurriyat) to politically represent the Kashmiri self-determination movement. Hurriyat’s tactics mainly included calling for hartal (general strikes), boycotting elections, and observing Indian army's landing in Kashmir (October 27), India's Republic (January 26), and Independence Day (August 15) as "black day." To encourage political groups in Kashmir to become part of the election process, New Delhi indicated that it may be willing to consider some degree of autonomy for J&K but will not allow return to the pre-1953 status. Such a proposal, while somehow acceptable to the NC, did not find the audiences with the Hurriyat, which rejected a solution within the framework of the Indian constitution and asked for the implementation of the UNSC Resolutions. Refusal to take part in the electoral politics limited the options for the APHC, though through election boycott and civil disobedience campaigns, the APHC tried to pressurize the Indian government to resolve the Kashmir conflict. In 1999, India and Pakistan fought third ("limited") war on Kashmir, but that did not change the boundaries. Both sides suffered between 700 and 1400 fatalities, though figures are disputed.

After the 2003 cease-fire on LoC and initiation of the composite dialogue process between India and Pakistan, the conflict-related incidents gradually decreased in J&K. While over 3,000 people were killed in 2003, the yearly fatalities came down to 700 by 2008. However, in the summer of 2008, a massive anti-India uprising took place in Kashmir after the controversy over the transfer of 100-acres of forest land to a Hindu shrine. Muslims of J&K feared that on the demarcated land for the shrine, India was planning to create Hindu settlements within an intention to alter the demography of the region and turn Kashmir into another Palestine. Under pressure from the public demonstrations, the J&K government rescinded the land transfer order, which triggered counter-protests in the Hindu-majority districts of Jammu where the rioters attacked the supply trucks passing through Jammu from mainland India to Kashmir (and vice versa). In response to the continued economic blockade, people in Kashmir Valley on the call of trade bodies and apple growers mobilized and marched toward the historical trade route that passes via Muzaffarabad, the capital of Pakistan-administered Kashmir. The marchers demanded the opening of the Muzaffarabad road. Indian security forces, however, intercepted them and shot down the protestors, including a senior Hurriyat leader, Sheikh Aziz, whose death became the cause of another big anti-India rally in the Pampore town. Between August 11 to August 22, four back-to-back anti-India rallies were taken out by the Hurriyat, galvanizing tens of thousands of people across Kashmir. The scheduled Lal Chowk rally for August 24, however, was violently crushed by the state by imposing stringent curfew, detaining Hurriyat leaders, and killing four persons and injuring 200 others, "as the CRPF and the Army opened fire on protesters, who defied curfew and staged demonstrations, at several places in Kashmir" (Bukhari 2008). Later protests often took violent turn, with young men clashing with the Indian paramilitary and police by throwing stones at them. Rape of two women – Asiya and Neelofar – in south Kashmir's Shopian town in May 2009, sparked another episode of protests that turned into Valley-wide anti-India demonstrations. Yet, in the summer of 2010, mass anti-India street protests broke out in Kashmir after J&K police on June 11 killed the 17-year-old Tufail Mattoo in Downtown Srinagar, where youth had gathered to protest against the killing of three Kashmiri porters by Indian troops in a staged gunfight in Machil area of Kupwara district and pass them off as foreign militants.

Post-2008 Youth-Led Political Mobilizations

According to the 2011 census, over 30% of people in the Kashmir region with 6.9 million inhabitants were between 15 and 30 years old. This youth bulge was a major factor in the political mobilizations of the post-2008 period. Social media also played a role. While 25% youth in Kashmir had access to social media in 2010, it rose to 30% by 2014 and then to 70% within a year (Jaleel 2018). Among the 220 people killed in the last three anti-India uprisings (2008, 2010, and 2016) in Kashmir, majority were teenagers and young men. J&K Police arrested nearly 11,000 protesters between 2016 and 2019, of which 8750 were detained in 2016 alone (Geelani 2018). Many of these detainees were young men.

At the forefront of the post-2008 anti-India uprisings, Kashmiri youth often used stone pelting as the tool of political protest. Approximately 13,000 stone-throwing incidents occurred in Kashmir between 2009 and 2019, with nearly 2800 such incidents happening during the 2016 uprising triggered by the killing of iconic militant commander Burhan Wani (Ganie 2021, p. 116). In 2016, Indian armed forces frequently violently came down upon the peaceful rallies that also provoked violent protests by the youth (Raiot, 6 September 2016). To crush the growing wave of youth-led rebellion against the state, India introduced pump-action shotguns in 2010 as “non-lethal” crowd control measure. Described by a UN report (2018, p. 4) as “one of the most dangerous weapons used against protestors,” the pellet guns have had devastating consequences, as they fire metal pellets that can inflict severe internal organ damage on their targets. Since 2010, thousands of Kashmiri civilians have suffered pellet injuries and at least 24 have also died, including eight children (Jammu Kashmir Coalition of Civil Society 2018: 10). During the 2016 uprising, 6221 civilians suffered pellet wounds, including 782 eye injuries. With nearly 1500 persons suffering eye injuries and 139 getting blinded between 2016 and 2019, the state forces have carried out the (probable) first mass blinding in the world to quell civilian protests (Parvaiz 2019b).

As the post-9/11 political environment changed the attitude of the USA toward armed insurgencies, the Kashmiri armed movement also began weakening after Pakistan gradually started withdrawing its support. In the meantime, India and Pakistan also started the composite dialogue process, which also caused the decline in the conflict-related incidents. Nonetheless, failure of the India-Pakistan Composite Dialogue Process (2004–2008) to achieve any political breakthrough on the Kashmir issue and India’s violent suppression of the youth-led street protests led to the revival of militancy in Kashmir that emerged in 2013 and fully formed by 2015. Recruits were mostly local young men, some of whom had faced police torture and harassment for participating in post-2008 anti-India street protests. A police survey suggested that active rebels influenced new recruits who resided in the same or adjoining villages, particularly if they were Jamaat-e-Islami strongholds (Jaleel 2018). Funerals of fallen rebels while mobilizing anti-India protests also acted as sites of recruitment. A few Kashmiri policemen after fleeing with their service rifles have also joined militant outfits.

The new age militants, however, were poorly equipped and lacked training, though they were tech-savvy and successfully utilized social media to catapult the new phase of the armed movement into public prominence. In July 2016, when Indian army killed the iconic young HM commander Burhan Muzaffar Wani in a gunfight, it triggered spontaneous anti-India protests. Wani inspired many young men to join the new armed movement. Unlike the first phase of armed militancy – when recruits could cross the LoC for training – the new age militants had only rudimentary arms training. Most of them were killed in army raids in their hideouts; some were killed within a span of a few days to a few months in intensive military operations backed by highly sophisticated electronic surveillance and a wide network of human intelligence. Between 2010 and 2019, insurgents suffered approximately 1440 fatalities, while about 950 Indian security forces personnel also died during this period (JKCCS 2019). High fatalities among the insurgents have not stopped local recruitments into the armed groups, and infiltration from across the LOC too has not ceased. Between 2015 and 2018, more than 100 houses were razed by Indian armed forces during the gunfights with the militants (Parvaiz 2018). The last decade, therefore, has been marked by increased violence in Kashmir that has had devastating consequences on economy, trade, education, and mental health, particularly in southern Kashmir, where much of the violence has taken place. Yet, in comparison with the decade of 1990s, 2000s has witnessed lesser number of conflict-related deaths, with 2012 and 2013 being relatively calmer with reported 143 and 203 yearly deaths, respectively (JKCCS Annual Human Rights Review 2019).

Fear of Settler Colonialism in the Post-Article 370 Kashmir

On August 5, 2019, after shutting down the communication lines (phone, landline, internet) and imposing a military siege on J&K's 12 million residents by deploying thousands of troops to seal roads and public squares, New Delhi arbitrarily revoked Article 370 of the Indian constitution. Unprecedented military siege and comprehensive communication blockade along with the mass detainment of over 3,500 Kashmiris, including former chief ministers, legislators, Hurriyat leaders, political activists, and minors, prevented the indigenous population from organizing and opposing the forcible imposition. Narendra Modi government's far-reaching move on disputed J&K was, however, widely criticized internationally. Kashmiri diaspora mobilized to highlight the human rights crisis in the besieged region and, with their efforts, got two US congressional hearings on Kashmir crisis convened, first on October 22 (under House Subcommittee on Asia, chaired by Congressman Brad Sherman) and second on November 15, 2019 (under Tom Lantos Human Rights Commission, chaired by Congressman James P. McGovern). Some important US legislators, (including Bernie Sanders, Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez, and Ilhan Omar) also tweeted and raised their concerns on the suspension of civil and political liberties in J&K, while 65 legislators endorsed the bipartisan Resolution 745 of Congresswomen Pramila Jayapal that urged the Government of India to lift restrictions on communication and end mass detention in J&K and rejected "arbitrary detention, use of excessive force against civilians, and suppression of peaceful expression of dissent as proportional responses to security challenges." The Resolution also asked for giving access to international human rights observers and journalists to the region (H.Res.745 2020). However, despite Jayapal agreeing to edit the language of the Resolution after intense Indian lobbying in Washington (through the lobbying firm Cornerstone Government Affairs), chair of House Foreign Affairs Committee, Eliot Engel, did not mark it up for a debate (Kumar and Lacy 2020). In the meantime, Pakistan dispatched its diplomats to major capitals to apprise the world community about what its Prime Minister Imran Khan described in his New York Times article as "a violation of the United Nations Security Council resolutions on Kashmir and the Shimla Agreement between India and Pakistan" (Khan 2019).

New Delhi's official narrative was that removing Article 370 was necessary to pave the way for region's socioeconomic development and end "separatism and terrorism" in J&K and dynastic politics of NC and PDP, the two major parties of Kashmir. Economists such as Jean Dreze contested the government's claim that J&K had lagged in development as compared to the states in the mainland India, saying that due to the land reforms of 1950s, the region had "a relatively prosperous and egalitarian rural economy, with very low poverty rates by Indian standards" (Vincent 2019), although, over the years, 370 had been emptied out of its substantive contents in a process that Duschinski and Ghosh (2017) define as "occupational constitutionalism" (through presidential orders, illegal amendments, and supreme court judgments) but retained a semblance of autonomy for the people J&K, particularly Article 35A that enshrined their hereditary domicile status and reserved public sector jobs and government scholarships for them within the state. Besides, only "permanent residents" (who possessed state-subject certificate) of J&K could purchase local land, thus allowing the indigenous populations to preserve their distinct ethno-cultural identity and demographic composition. For the Hindu-nationalist BJP, a political arm of the RSS, abrogation of Article 370 had been one of the core ideological pillars of the party (that seeks to turn India into a "Hindu Rashtra" or Hindu nation) and the first step toward fulfilling the objective of Akhand Bharat or United India, as BJP's National General Secretary, Ram Madhav, said on February 22, 2020, to a young audience at the Indian Student Parliament in New Delhi. Madhav echoed other BJP leaders in reiterating that India intends to annex the Pakistan-administered Kashmir next, as part of the Akhand Bharat project (Outlook 2020).

On March 31, 2020, in the midst of the Covid-19 pandemic when people were observing the lockdown, the Government of India introduced a new law under the Jammu and Kashmir Reorganization Act (2019), redefining the “domicile” with regard to government employment in the region. Anyone who has resided in J&K for 15 years, who has studied in the region for 7 years and appeared in class 10 and 12 examinations, and who has served in the public sector for 10 years (and their children) has now become eligible for residency rights. This paves the way for demographic flooding, with thousands of Indians (including military personnel deployed in the region and involved in human rights abuses) getting, retrospectively and prospectively, rights to purchase land in the disputed J&K, where the local population has long been engaged in a struggle for independence and resisted the militarized occupation (Junaid 2020). The J&K administration, now fully controlled by New Delhi through its appointed lieutenant governor and nonlocal bureaucrats (Ganie 2020, p. 188), has passed a slew of orders to transfer land to different India entities, including industrialists (Zia 2020; Parvaiz 2019a). Decisions and policies implemented by the nonelected bureaucratic administration of J&K have created anxieties among the residents, particularly among the Muslim-majority, because through these new policies New Delhi appears to be aiming at permanently finishing the Kashmiri self-determination movement and the larger Kashmir conflict by changing the facts on the ground in the disputed region. Once demographic composition of J&K is altered (from Muslim-majority to Hindu-majority), any future referendum in the region will potentially go in favor of India. Due to the tight control imposed by New Delhi along with the Covid-19 pandemic, political parties in Kashmir have not been able to operate freely to resist these moves. The APHC has been completely pushed underground, their pro-referendum and pro-freedom politics, of all shades, criminalized.

On August 22, 2020, pro-India parties in Kashmir issued a statement that read: “We all reiterate our commitment to collectively fight to restore the Special Status of J&K as guaranteed under the Constitution and the commitments made from time to time” (Zargar 2020). Although through such a unanimous declaration these parties appear to signal their intent to put up a collective fight for restoring Article 370, their current position makes them too weak to operationalize any plan to get to their declared goal. The Indian state has already created a new set of players, through newly flouted Apni Party and Jammu Kashmir Workers Party, that can potentially supplant the ones who will persist with their opposition to Modi’s policies on Kashmir. No political party in Kashmir can survive without the support of New Delhi; this hard truth is known to every politician in Kashmir. So, accordingly, Kashmiri parties who take part in electoral politics will tread cautiously while dealing with the current regime in New Delhi. Well aware that those in direct confrontation with the establishment have even lesser chances of survival in the volatile political landscape of Kashmir, PDP and NC will seek to maintain a balance by raising the issue of Kashmir’s autonomy to the extent that restores their relevance among the local population and not to the extent that upsets New Delhi.

Summary

Kashmir has remained one of the intractable conflicts in the world because of a number of factors. Firstly, there is a “structural paralysis,” which arises out of incompatibility between Kashmiri autonomous political agency informed by identity consciousness and sense of group security and India’s state-institutional approach, which does not recognize Kashmiri self-determination as legitimate, because it is not bound by the framework of the Indian constitution. This situation of structural paralysis has created a vacuum “in which coercion and oppression appear to be the only options open to the state ruling elite” (Cockell 2000, p. 323). While the Indian state has tried to wean away Kashmiri youth, a major political actor in the Kashmir conflict, from the anti-India resistance movement through military and nonmilitary measures, these attempts have failed, as “the psychological distance that is created by active conflict in Kashmir cannot be overcome by the perceived benefits of India's growing economic power or by efforts to integrate Kashmiri youth in state institutions" (Nair and Sambanis 2019, p. 332). Overall, the Kashmiri struggle for freedom has persevered despite brutal counterinsurgency campaigns in the last 30 years. That means the military solution has not succeeded. Yet, presently, more than 500,000 Indian security forces remain deployed in J&K, including 250,000 army soldiers and paramilitary personnel of the Central Reserve Police Force (CRPF), Border Security Force (BSF), Indo-Tibetan Border Police, Jammu and Kashmir Armed Police (JKAP), Special Police Officers, and auxiliaries and intelligence wings. Civilian areas remain deeply militarized, with multiple camps of armed units woven around civilian populations to impose area domination strategy for counterinsurgency and quelling anti-India protests. Such militarized occupation has led to human rights abuses of civilians and created conditions for the continuance of armed militancy through popular support.

Secondly, India and Pakistan have remained locked in a territorial contestation over J&K since 1947, though they have been able to resolve the water dispute between them through a water-distribution arrangement of the 1960 Indus Water Treaty. The "Composite Dialogue Process" between 2004 and 2008 also yielded some confidence building measures, such as reopening of the trade route between the divided parts of J&K and the 2003 cease-fire. Yet, despite these positive developments, military skirmishes and exchange of artillery across the LOC have not ceased, resulting in dozens of fatalities every year, both civilian and military, as well as damage to residential properties near the volatile de facto border. After their nuclear tests in 1998, India and Pakistan have acquired advanced weaponry and enhanced their military capabilities to augment their deterrence doctrines, which reduced chances of a full-scale war, as witnessed during the February 2019 hostilities, which broke out after a Kashmiri militant, Adil Ahmad Dar, killed 40 Indian paramilitary troopers in a suicide bombing in District Pulwama of J&K. In retaliation, Indian fighter planes struck inside Pakistani territory of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa on February 26, and Pakistan responded the next day by downing an Indian fighter jet and capturing its pilot, who was eventually released on March 1 to deescalate the crisis. Nevertheless, given Narendra Modi's bolder and risk-prone approach to security issues, it is likely, if not inevitable, that India and Pakistan will clash again as long as Kashmir remains unresolved. Moreover, BJP's hardline approach on Kashmir and agenda to alter the demography of the Muslim-majority region will create conditions for intensified armed militancy. Strengthened by increased local recruitments and aided by Pakistan-backed armed groups, the conflict will thus veer toward a bloodier end.

Already, the newly flouted armed outfit "the Resistance Front" (TRF) has warned through its letter of May 1, 2020, that it will attack "with full ferociousness" the settlements that are being established in Kashmir "by giving them civilian sounding names." The TRF issued this letter immediately after the J&K administration transferred over 12-acre land to two Kendriya Vidyalaya (central government schools) on April 8 and 30 in Kupwara and Pulwama districts, respectively. Rebel groups also carried out the assassination of a top BJP leader from Kashmir, Waseem Bari, on July 8, 2020, setting off resignations from some lower wrung BJP cadres who had been groomed by the party in recent years. Armed groups are likely to attempt more such assassinations to instill fear among those Kashmiris who work for BJP or pro-India parties.

Although the Modi government claimed that removing Article 370 and taking direct control of the region would end violence in J&K, the evidence so far indicates otherwise, compelling the state to continue restrictions on political activities, civil liberties, as well as communication services. Despite the advocacy by many international organizations, particularly in the backdrop of the Covid-19 pandemic, high-speed 4G Internet remained banned in Kashmir for almost 18 months "in the interest of the sovereignty and integrity of India" (Home Department, Government of Jammu and Kashmir, 16 August 2020). In the backdrop of the worsening political situation in Kashmir since August 2019, the Freedom House report of 2020 has declined the status of Indian-administered Kashmir from being “Partly Free to Not Free” (Freedom House Report 2020). In terms of conflict-related fatalities, 229 people have been killed in the first 6 months of 2020, including 32 civilians, 143 militants, and 54 Indian armed forces personnel (JKCCS 2020). Overall, with two nuclear-armed states locked in an undeclared war and Kashmiris increasingly despaired under the hardline policy of New Delhi, it seems the disputed Himalayan region is fast turning into what the former US President Bill Clinton called “the most dangerous place on Earth” that could potentially breach international peace and security, if the Kashmir conflict is left unaddressed. The situation has become all the more alarming after the hostilities broke out between India and China in the Ladakh region in May 2020. Both the sides have mobilized their troops and weaponry to the frontline. A slight miscalculation threatens to turn the border crisis into a full-blown war, in which Pakistan is likely to dive into seize the opportunity of taking Kashmir from its arch enemy India.

In the meantime, grappling with a sluggish economy along with an unprecedented repressive political environment, Kashmiris are faced with a distressing situation. Resentment against New Delhi is simmering among the populace. Through expanding developmental and civilian activities (such as sports and cultural events), New Delhi seems to have gradually shifted to the “policy of engagement” in the post-Article 370 Kashmir. Such measures might address the developmental aspirations of Kashmiris and aid in the conflict management. But, if past is any indication, such policies have hardly been able to prevent anti-India uprisings in Kashmir. Therefore, to assuage the growing resentment among Kashmiris and for the situation to stabilize in the region, demilitarization along with the resumption of the dialogue process between India, Pakistan, and Kashmiris is a prerequisite. Such a measure will address, to a certain extent, the political aspiration of the people, particularly in the Kashmir Valley, the epicenter of the Kashmiri self-determination movement. Substantively, this will require, at the minimum, restoration of Article 370 in its original form, i.e., as it existed prior to 1953. For ideological reasons, the Modi government will be averse to accept such a political framework for the Kashmir peace process. Hence, Kashmiris are most likely to stuck at the dead end in the foreseeable future. In case the current China-India border standoff develops into a war, parts of the erstwhile state of J&K may once again change hands.

Cross-References

- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

References

- Ahmad, K. B. (2017). Kashmir: Exposing the myth behind the narrative. New Delhi: Sage.
- Asia Watch (A Division of Human Rights Watch), and Physicians for Human Rights. (1993). Rape in Kashmir: A crime of war. New York: Human Rights Watch. 5, no. 9.
- Batool et al. (2016). Do You Remember Kunan Poshpora. New Delhi: Zubaan.
- Bazaz, P. N. (1954). The history of struggle for freedom in Kashmir: Cultural and political, from the earliest times to the present day. New Delhi: Kashmir Publishing Company.
- Bose, S. (2003). Kashmir: Roots of conflict, paths to peace. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Bose, S. (2013). Transforming India: Challenges to the world's largest democracy. Harvard University Press.
- Bukhari, S. (2008). Four killed in Kashmir police firings. The Hindu. <http://www.thehindu.com/todays-paper/Four-killed-in-Kashmir-police-firings/article15289572.ece>.
- Bradnock, R. W. (2010). Kashmir: Paths to peace. Chatham House. https://www.chathamhouse.org/sites/default/files/public/Research/Asia/0510pp_kashmir.pdf.
- Cockell, J. G. (2000). Ethnic nationalism and subaltern political process: Exploring autonomous democratic action in Kashmir. Nations and Nationalism, 6(30), 319–345.
- Copland, I. (1981). Islam and political mobilization in Kashmir, 1931–34. Pacific Affairs, 54(2), 228–259.
- Datasheet – Jammu & Kashmir. South Asia terrorism portal. <https://www.satp.org/datasheet-terrorist-attack/fatalities/india-jammukashmir>. Accessed 5 May 2020.
- Datta, A. (2017). Uncertain journeys: Return migration, home, and uncertainty for a displaced Kashmiri community. Modern Asian Studies, 51(4), 1099–1125.

- Dawn. (2007, August 14). 60 years on, Kashmir core issue Srinagar, Jammu poles apart. <https://www.dawn.com/news/261183/60-years-on-kashmir-core-issue-srinagar-jammu-poles-apart?s=08>
- Dhar, P. N. (1951). The Kashmir problem: Political and economic background. India Quarterly, 7(2), 142–162.
- Duschinski, H., & Ghosh, S. N. (2017). Constituting the occupation: Preventive detention and permanent emergency in Kashmir. The Journal of Legal Pluralism and Unofficial Law, 49(3), 314–337.
- Effendi, M. Y. (2007). Punjab Cavalry: Evolution, role, organisation and tactical doctrine 11 Cavalry (frontier force), 1849–1971. Karachi: Oxford University Press.
- Freedom House. (2020). Indian Kashmir. Freedom House report 2020. <https://freedomhouse.org/country/indian-kashmir/freedom-world/2020>.
- Ganguly, S. (1996). Explaining the Kashmir insurgency: Political mobilization and institutional decay. International Security, 21(2), 76–107.
- Ganie, M. T. (2019). Kashmir: Youth, state and the clash of narratives. LSE Blogs. <https://blogs.lse.ac.uk/southasia/2019/07/11/long-read-kashmir-youth-state-and-the-clash-of-narratives/>.
- Ganie, M. T. (2020). Siege, resistance, and politics in ‘New Kashmir’. Journal of Governance, Security & Development, 1(1), 175–205.
- Ganie, M. T. (2021). ‘All I got is stones in my hand’: Youth-led stone pelting protests in Indian-administered Kashmir. Social Movement Studies, 20(1), 115–123. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14742837.2020.1770076>
- Geelani, S. R. (2018). 11,290 persons arrested in past 2 years: Govt. Greater Kashmir. <https://www.greaterkashmir.com/news/front-page/11-290-persons-arrested-in-past-2-years-govt/272675.html>.
- H.Res.745 – Urging the Republic of India to end the restrictions on communications and mass detentions in Jammu and Kashmir as swiftly as possible and preserve religious freedom for all residents. H.Res.745 – 116th Congress (2019–2020). <https://www.congress.gov/bill/116th-congress/house-resolution/745>.
- Home Department, Government of Jammu and Kashmir, Order number 91 (TSTS) of home. (2020, August 16). http://jkhome.nic.in/91\(TSTS\)of2020.pdfof2020.pdf).
- Huttenback, R. A. (1968). Kashmir as an Imperial factor during the reign of Gulab Singh (1846–1857). Journal of Asian History, 2(2), 77–108.
- India-Pakistan Joint Statement, Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India. September 8, 2004. <https://mea.gov.in/bilateral-documents.htm?dtl/7456/India++Pakistan+Joint+Statement>.
- Jalal, A. (2000). Self and sovereignty: Individual and community in South Asian Islam since 1850. London and New York: Routledge.
- Jaleel, M. (2018, June 9). New militant recruits not driven by ideology, most attended Govt school: JK Police. Indian Express. <https://indianexpress.com/article/india/new-militant-recruits-not-driven-by-ideology-most-attended-govt-schools-jk-police-5207368/>.
- Junaid, M. (2020). The expelled and the excluded: Kashmiris under India’s new citizenship law. The Funambulist 29, pp. 32–37. <https://thefunambulist.net/articles/70261>.
- Kak, S. (2011). Until my freedom has come: The new Intifada in Kashmir. New Delhi: Penguin Books India.
- Kanth, I. (2018). The social and political life of a relic: The episode of the Moi-e-Muqaddas theft in Kashmir, 1963–1964. Himalaya, 38(2), 61–75.
- Kashmir Mental Health survey: Report 2015. Medecines Sans Frontieres/Doctor Without Borders. https://www.msfindia.in/sites/default/files/2016-10/kashmir_mental_health_survey_report_2015_for_web.pdf
- Khan, M. H. (1953). Some aspects of Kashmir history under the Shah Mirs and the Chaks. Proceedings of the Indian History Congress, 16, 194–200.
- Khan, I. (2019, August 30). The World cannot ignore Kashmir. We are all in danger. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2019/08/30/opinion/imran-khan-kashmir-pakistan.html>.
- Kumar, R., & Lacy, A. (2020, March 16). Indian lobbies to stifle criticism, control messaging in US Congress amid rising Anti-Muslim violence. The Intercept. <https://theintercept.com/2020/03/16/india-lobbying-us-congress/>.
- Lamb, A. (1966). Crisis in Kashmir: 1947 to 1966. London: Routledge and Keegan Paul.
- Lone, S. (2019). Agrarian System of Kashmir (1846–1950 A.D.). Unpublished doctoral dissertation, Aligarh Muslim University, India.
- McMahon, R. J. (1996). The cold war on the periphery: The United States, India, and Pakistan. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India. Simla agreement July 2, 1972, Ministry of External Affairs, Government of India. <https://mea.gov.in/in-focus-article.htm?19005/Simla+Agreement+July+2+1972>.
- Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China. (2019, August 6). Foreign Ministry Spokesperson Hua Chunying’s remarks on the Indian Government’s announcement of the establishment of the Ladakh Union Territory which involves Chinese Territory”, Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the People’s Republic of China. https://www.fmprc.gov.cn/mfa_eng/xwfw_665399/s2510_665401/2535_665405/t1686549.shtml.
- Misgar, U. L. (2020, March 12). Young Kashmiris want Indian forces to leave: Survey. Aljazeera. <https://www.aljazeera.com/news/2020/03/young-kashmiris-indian-forces-leave-survey-200310083352101.html>.
- Nair, G., & Sambanis, N. (2019). Violence exposure and ethnic identification: Evidence from Kashmir. International Organization, 73(2), 329–363.
- Noorani, A. G. (2011). Article 370: A constitutional history of Jammu and Kashmir. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- OHCHR. (2018, June 14). Report on the situation of human rights in Kashmir: Developments in the Indian State of Jammu and Kashmir from June 2016 to April 2018, and

- General Human Rights concerns in Azad Jammu and Kashmir and Gilgit-Baltistan. Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights. <https://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Countries/IN/DevelopmentsInKashmirJune2016ToApril2018.pdf>.
- Outlook. (2017, January 30). 223 people killed in 3 unrests in Kashmir: J K govt. Outlook. <https://www.outlookindia.com/newscroll/223-people-killed-in-3-unrests-in-kashmir-j-k-govt/977579>.
- Outlook. (2020, February 22). Taking back PoK is next step towards achieving Akhand Bharat objective: Ram Madhav. Outlook. <https://www.outlookindia.com/newscroll/taking-back-pok-is-next-step-towards-achieving-akhand-bharat-objective-ram-madhav/1741471>.
- Pandit, R. (2003, May 1). India suffered 1874 casualties without fighting a war. Times of India. <https://timesofindia.indiatimes.com/india/India-suffered-1874-casualties-without-fighting-a-war/articleshow/45016284.cms?referral=PM>.
- Para, A. H. (2019). The making of modern Kashmir: Sheikh Abdullah and the politics of the state. Abingdon/Oxon: Routledge.
- Parvaiz, A. (2018, May 18). Kashmir Ceasefire comes after 50% rise in armed encounters, killings during 2015–2017 over 2012–2014. IndiaSpend. <https://www.indiaspend.com/kashmir-ceasefire-comes-after-50-rise-in-armed-encounters-killings-during-2015-2017-over-2012-2014/>.
- Parvaiz, A. (2019a, December 20). Indian government looks to acquire land in Kashmir. The Third Pole. <https://www.thethirdpole.net/2019/12/20/indian-government-looks-to-acquire-land-in-kashmir/>.
- Parvaiz, A. (2019b, August 2). ‘Non-lethal’ crowd-control methods have killed 24, blinded 139 in Kashmir. IndiaSpend. <https://www.indiaspend.com/non-lethal-crowd-control-methods-have-killed-24-blinded-139-in-kashmir/>.
- PUCL. (2016, December). Press statement on PUCL national team’s visit to Kashmir valley. PUCL Bulletin, 36(12), 10–13. <http://www.pucl.org/sites/default/files/PUCLdec2016.pdf>.
- Rai, M. (2004). Hindu rulers, Muslim subjects: Islam, rights, and the history of Kashmir. London: C Hurst & Co..
- Rashid, I. (2020). Theatrics of a ‘violent state’ or ‘state of violence’: Mapping histories and memories of partition in Jammu and Kashmir. South Asia: Journal of South Asian Studies, 43(2), 215–231.
- Reporters sans Frontières (RSF). 2020, August 5). India: A year of throttling journalism in Kashmir. Reporters sans Frontières (RSF). <https://rsf.org/en/news/india-year-throttling-journalism-kashmir-0>.
- Schofield, V. (2003). Kashmir in conflict: India, Pakistan and the unending war. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Snedden, C. (2013). Kashmir: The unwritten history. Noida: Harper Collins Publishers.
- South Asia Human Rights Documentation Center. (2012). Ignoring the disappeared of Kashmir with impunity. Economic and Political Weekly, 47(45), 20.
- Staniland, P. (2014). Networks of rebellion: Explaining insurgent cohesion and collapse. Ithaca: Cornell University Press. muse.jhu.edu/book/57650.
- Structures of Violence: The Indian State in Jammu and Kashmir. (2015). International people’s tribunal on human rights in Indian-administered Kashmir [IPTK]/ Association of Parents of Disappeared Persons [APDP, 2015].
- The India-Pakistan Question, 80 (1950). Resolution of 14 March 1950 [S/1469], <https://digitallibrary.un.org/record/632555?ln=en>.
- Vincent, P. L. (2019, August 9). Jean Dreze contest Amit Shah with Gujrat data. The Telegraph. <https://www.telegraphindia.com/india/jean-dreze-contests-amit-shah-with-gujarat-data/cid/1696457>.
- Widmalm, S. (1997). The rise and fall of democracy in Jammu and Kashmir. Asian Survey, 37(11), 1005–1030.
- Zargar, S. (2020, September 22). Why the Gupkar declarations, promising a struggle for special status, have few takers in Kashmir. Scroll. <https://scroll.in/article/973598/why-the-gupkar-declarations-promising-a-struggle-for-special-status-have-few-takers-in-kashmir>.
- Zia, A. (2019a). Resisting disappearance: Military occupation and Women’s activism in Kashmir. Washington, DC: University of Washington Press.
- Zia, A. (2019b). Blinding Kashmiris: The right to maim and the Indian military occupation in Kashmir. Interventions, 21(6), 773–786.
- Zia, A. (2020). The haunting specter of Hindu ethnonationalist-neocolonial development in the Indian occupied Kashmir. Development, 63, 60–66.

Kenya

► Kenya’s War on Terror

Kenya’s War on Terror

Miraji H. Mohamed
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

al-Shabaab; Counterterrorism; Extremism;
Kenya; War on Terror; Terrorism

Description

In the aftermath of 9/11 attacks, Kenya has increasingly become an anchor-state and ally in the global “war on terror.” While there is no universally agreed-upon framework on counterterrorism, in Kenya counterterrorism has centered on three key areas: enacting legislation, building/enhancing security institutions, and devising programs to reduce the risk of terrorism. In particular, Kenya’s contemporary counterterrorism practice has been equated to its historical responses (e.g., extrajudicial assassinations, profiling) to conflict and violence characterized as “old paradigms,” not only due to their reliance on collective punishment but also based on how such forms of punishment have been used to establish a particular social order.

With that in mind, this entry explores the logic behind Kenya’s “war on terror.” Using Fairclough’s understanding of recontextualization, the entry argues that Kenya has appropriated the “war on terror” signifier from the global context and given it local meaning. This entry is divided into four sections: the first is an overview of the so-called “war on terror” and a summary of acts of terrorism in Kenya. The second section provides some socio-historical and political context necessary to understand the contemporary “war on terror” in Kenya. The third section explores how the “war on terror” has been recontextualized by specifically looking at the elite’s definition of the nature and scope of the threat, vulnerabilities, drivers, and the solutions they propose. The fourth section concludes by emphasizing that the ensuing counterterrorism responses while fulfilling (inter)national agendas they have reinforced marginalization of minority groups and engendered new forms of insecurities.

Introduction

The “war on terror” is a phrase that was used by the then President of the United States of America (USA), George W. Bush in the aftermath of the 9/11 attacks, to mobilize a US-led international military campaign aiming to destroy al-Qaeda, the Taliban, and “rogue states.” While initially the military assault was launched in Afghanistan in October 2001, the Iraq war was launched approximately 2 years later as part of the same “war on terror” campaign. Accordingly, this war metaphor reproduced claims and assumptions about the nature of the 9/11 attacks, the identities of the terrorist “other,” the nature and scope of the threat, the vulnerabilities and the responses deemed necessary (see Croft 2006; Jackson 2005; Jarvis 2008). This construction while containing imperialist undertones is also laced with cultural and racial tropes.

In Kenya, terrorism is not a new phenomenon. The concept of terrorism was used to define the violent actions of both state and non-state actors as early as 1975. On state terrorism, like the British empire, the two post-independent administrations, Jomo Kenyatta’s (1963–1978) and Daniel Arap Moi’s (1978–2001), also engaged in terrorism to suppress dissidence (Citizens for Justice 2003; Elkins 2005). Similarly, non-state actors such as the Maskini Liberation Front (MLF), February Eighteen Movement (FEM), the Sabaat Land Defence Forces (SLDF), and Mungiki also engaged in terrorism against civilians and government administrations (Mogire and Mkutu 2011). More attacks were witnessed in the 1998 and 2002 bombing of the US embassy in Nairobi and hotels in Mombasa, respectively, which were perpetrated by al-Qaeda.

Since 2012, Kenya has increasingly witnessed small- and large-scale attacks perpetrated by al-Shabaab, a Somalia-based militant group (see chapter War and Peace in Somalia). Major attacks include the 2013 Westgate shopping mall siege, the April 2015 Garissa University siege, the June and July 2015 attacks on villages in Mpeketoni and Tana River, and the 2019 DusitD2 attack. In response, Kenya has pursued different responses to address the rising threat of terrorism. Specifically, George W. Bush’s rhetoric that framed 9/11 as an “act of war” (see further Hodges 2011) is important in understanding the threat of terrorism and the naturalized military responses globally. In this framing, the conflict was seen as a “war between good and evil” (Erjavec and Volcic 2007, p. 125) where good symbolically stands for the West/Christians/liberal democracies while the evil “other” encompasses the non-Western/Muslims/non-Christian. In this framing, the identities of the former are built through metaphors representing them as civilized, freedom-loving, and progressive whereas, the latter are represented as backward, savage, and freedom-hating. Such a framing not only controlled the kind of representations that emanate thereof (e.g., a focus on “Islamic extremists” qua Muslims as terrorists), but it made “war” appear as the only legitimate response of pre-empting the risk of terrorism.

Although George W. Bush's administration left office, their discourse continues to influence how countries make sense of terrorism and the ensuing counterterrorism responses. However, before analyzing Kenya's recontextualization of the “war on terror,” the section that follows first unpacks Kenya's sociohistorical, cultural, and political context necessary for understanding terrorism.

Socio-historical and Political Context

Kenya's history is socially, culturally, and politically complex. As of 2019, Kenya has over 45 ethnic groups, with a total population of approximately 47.6 million of which 75% are younger than 35 years. Religiously, Christians make up 85.5% of the population followed by Muslims who comprise of 11% (Kenya National Bureau of Statistics 2019). Hence, for a long time, Kenya's state-society relations have been rooted in ethnic and sectarian tensions. During the colonial era, the development of an ideal Kenyan identity was an important element in ensuring the survival of the empire. The British self-represented as superior by belonging to both a modern, civilized and upper racial group while constructing Kenyans as culturally, racially and economically inferior (Elkins 2005). This is not to say that such constructions ceased after independence (12 December 1963) but rather to reiterate that contemporary politics in Kenya warrant an understanding of history. Hence, collaborators and other Kenyan elites adopted British discourses (Discourse is used to refer to the assumptions, claims, and explanations about a certain phenomenon that are shared by cultural groups within and beyond national boundaries) of progress and civilization, and heavily promoted these within their communities.

As for those communities that resisted the British Empire, they were targeted with military and other forms of isolation policies. This socioeconomically and politically segregated them from the rest of Kenya, and constructed them as “hostile tribes” or “savages” acting against the British and consequently other Kenyan communities. This construction legitimized unconventional villagization which is a strategy aimed at forcing social and economic changes (Whittaker 2012). These strategies ranged from moderate policies such as grazing control schemes (Schlee 1989) and small-shop ownership schemes (Whittaker 2008) in the Northern Frontier District (NFD) (a predominantly Somali-inhabited region currently constituting the North Eastern province). To extreme measures (especially during the upsurge of anti-colonial resistance between, i.e., 1952 and 1960) such as the forceful programs that confined native Kikuyus in fortified settlements to cut off Mau Mau supplies (Karari 2018); and military methods such as flogging, incarceration, torture, and execution to deter nonconformists (Anderson 2005).

Such counterinsurgency policies continued into post-independent Kenya and culminated in the 1963–1968 Shifita (A term from the Ge'ez script that literally translates to rebel or bandit) War an insurgency calling for the secession of NFD, which was covertly supported by Somalia's regime (Anderson 2014). To facilitate control of the Somali people, the Kenyatta regime also used villagization policies that mirrored the colonial ones (Whittaker 2012). Not only did these policies disrupt the socioeconomic and cultural livelihoods of NFD, but also they were laced with narratives linking Somali people with criminality and illegality to the extent that the word shifita metaphorically continues to connote criminality and “otherness.” Instead of quelling the rebellion, villagization policies counter-productively increased resentment towards the regime. As a result, Kenyatta's successor Moi responded through military campaigns that meted out collective punishment in the NFD region.

Between 1980 and 1984, state forces counterinsurgency security operations raped, looted, burned properties, rounded-up and executed thousands of Somali men in what has come to be referred to as the 1980 Bulla Karatasi massacre, 1982 Malka Mari massacre, and 1984 Wagalla massacres (Lochery 2012). Witnesses to these massacres were intimidated, tortured, and others deported while the administration actively launched a misinformation and denial campaign that banned any form of memorializing and silenced any calls for investigations to the massacre (Sheikh 2007). Moreover, in 1989, Moi's administration introduced a screening exercise and while it was claimed that the exercise was meant to verify citizenship, Whittaker (2012) adds that it also aimed to assess loyalties. This exercise continued into the 1990s and fostered the image of "Somalis as a problem." The screening practices differentiated Somalia-Somalis (i.e., refugees also referred to as "aliens") from Kenyan-Somalis and made differences within the latter category "more visible and manageable" (Lochery 2012, p. 624). The consequences are still present in policies such as the processing of identity documents that require certain Muslim communities and Somalis to provide extra documents as proof of citizenship (Mazrui 1993).

Similarly, "othering" is not unique to Somalis but has also affected some native communities of the Coastal region of Kenya. Kenya's tense relationship with its Coast region can be understood in three phases: the pre-colonial, colonial and the post-independence period. As early as the second century A.D Arab traders had started sailing to the East African Coast but Islam was not well established until the fifteenth century. This saw the growth of Muslim cities and a booming economy from the slave trade that was run by Muslim coastal elites, hinterland leaders and Arab merchants (Oded 2000). Most of those enslaved were Kenyans from traditional religious groups that inhabited the interiors of the Coastal region. This participation of Muslims in the enslavement of other Kenyans was constantly brought up by Moi (Lonsdale 2009) to suppress criticisms of his regime and activism of Muslim groups. However, in the same way that the Arabs favored Muslim converts, once the Portuguese captured the Coastal cities from the Arabs, they employed similar tactics. They educated Christian converts with clerical skills which later secured their employment in the British colonial administration once the administrative capital moved to Nairobi (Thordsen 2009). Lack of clerical skills and the administrative capital's relocation negatively affected the employment and livelihoods of Muslims.

After independence, the exclusion of Muslims continued in two ways. First, both Kenyatta and Moi's regimes implemented policies that continued to favor secular-educated Christians over Muslims with Arabic education (Kresse 2010). This resulted in absolute underdevelopment of predominantly Muslim inhabited regions, with the inhabitants feeling like second-class citizens in their own country (Mohamed 2015). Second, post-independent regimes made little effort to adopt policies that would develop these areas. Coupled with land grabbing by the regimes and their administrative officers, the Coastal region has been subject to generational poverty (Mohamed 2015). Not surprisingly, this marginalization engendered the first secession (see chapter Secession and Self-determination) attempts by the Coastal region on the night of Kenya's independence (Oded 2000). Such calls for self-autonomy have continued throughout the post-independence period. While the lead organizations and tactics differ within each timeline, the narrative for secession remains the same (Willis and Gona 2012). In response, successive regimes have employed several tactics to break this resolve. From Moi and Uhuru Kenyatta who labelled the Islamic Party of Kenya and the Mombasa Republican Council as "Islamic extremist groups" to delegitimize their political activism and dehumanize Muslims as "troublemakers" (Ndzovu 2012) to the collective punishment and profiling witnessed after the 1997 regime-instigated clashes. While up-country communities (i.e., ethnic groups originating from interior Kenya) were killed by locally organized militia groups, Moi's administration responded by implementing a security operation that indiscriminately tortured, sexually abused, and detained locals (Human Rights Watch 2002).

This historical overview and successive government actions reveal complex relations between ethnic and religious communities, and between the center and periphery. Most recently, the 1998 US embassy bombings, the 2002 Paradise Hotel bombings, the rise of al-Shabaab, its ensuing attacks, radicalization activities, and counterterrorism in Kenya should be read against this backdrop. The section that follows further analyzes the dominant claims by focusing on two mutually constitutive areas: a) how Kenya's elites defines the nature and scope of the threat of terrorism, and b) what solutions are derived from this conceptualization.

Recontextualizing the "War on Terror" in Kenya

Recontextualization, as developed by Bernstein (2003, pp. 52–53), refers to the "relocation of discourse from its primary context of discursive production to the secondary context of discursive production." In the process of moving discourse from its context it undergoes particular transformations in the "new context" (Fairclough 2003, p. 52). Thus, Fairclough (2003) adds that recontextualization functions by foregrounding/backgrounding information, generalizing, ordering and adding information on events. Thus, in this case, it is argued that the discourse(s) of the global "war on terror" are appropriated from the global context (following 9/11) and given a local meaning in the Kenyan context (experience with al-Shabaab and ensuing counterterrorism practices since 2011).

With Kenya's allyship in the "war on terror" in the aftermath of 9/11, the term terrorism has acquired a particular set of meanings that not only dictate what we know about terrorism, how we know about terrorism, but also how we respond towards incidences of terrorism. The nature and scope of threats in Kenya are understood as emanating from external and internal stresses. Externally, terrorism represents a specific form of violence emanating from Somalia. In this argument, risk of terrorism is assumed to stem from the lawlessness in Somalia, shared porous borders with Kenya, poaching, illegal trade in arms, and the rising refugee population from al-Shabaab's controlled areas in southern Somalia (Lind et al. 2015). The argument of terrorism as originating from outside the nation-state is also common in mainstream global discourses on terrorism (see Croft 2006). In these discourse(s), Kenya, like most other countries in the global North and South, views itself as a victim of international terror networks, specifically those located in Somalia (Mwangi 2017). Even Uhuru Kenyatta (president of Kenya since 2013), in 2015 during an India-African summit in New Delhi remarked that "there is no country that is too far, safe or free from terrorism. . . Africa and India have both been afflicted by terrorism – an evil that knows no boundary" (Ministry of External Affairs India 2015). His statement is an example of the understanding of international terrorism as a looming threat. Uhuru draws a comparison between the several 2006 train blasts of Mumbai, and various large-scale al-Shabaab attacks in Kenya to demonstrate this danger. In his rhetoric, just like the USA, India and many other countries, Kenya is also an innocent "victim" of terrorism, specifically from Somalia-based al-Shabaab.

This victimhood status is reinforced by metaphors of war that predominate the political and media rhetoric. Specifically, attacks are regularly referred to as "al-Shabaab's war" (Wanga and Hajir 2015), "religious war" (Vidija 2015), and spaces like refugee camps labelled "war frontiers" (PSCU 2015). To complement this, counterterrorism is framed as "defending freedom and democracy . . . from the extremists who employ terrorism to undermine our way of life" (Chatham House 2018). This characterization elicits empathy and sympathy for Kenya as a victim thus absolving it of any responsibility in the ensuing counterviolence by shifting the blame to the attackers (Jackson 2005) instead of Kenya's foreign policies and internal dynamics. Within this view of Kenya as a "victim" of terrorism, Kenya's military counterviolence has been justified as a necessary act of self-defense.

However, studies demonstrate that Kenya has benefitted tremendously from supporting the "war on terror." Militarily, while US military-assistance to Kenya had been suspended in 1991 on grounds of human rights violations and suppression of democracy under Moi's administration (Mogire and Mkutu 2011). For Prestholdt (2011), Kenya's support for the global "war on terror" not only resulted in the USA resuming and increasing its military assistance but the global "war on terror" has also become Kenya's instrument for improving diplomatic relations. Rémy (2011) adds that foreign counterterrorism operations (e.g., the 2011 Kenya Defence Forces (KDF) invasion of Somalia) served to further Kenya's economic agenda including paving way for the building of an oil terminal, a railway, and road network in Lamu that would facilitate trade with Ethiopia and Sudan. Also, in this operation, the Kenya military and some security officials are alleged to be overseeing the illegal trade of charcoal and sugar through KDF control of the port of Kismayo in Somalia since its recapture in September 2012 (Lind et al. 2015). As a result, this trade is estimated to accrue an annual income of over US$251 million (UN Monitoring Group 2013, 2014). Besides, Uhuru's rhetoric and KDF's activities in Somalia have enabled Kenya to assert itself as a legitimate actor in the global arena and regional politics (Anderson and McKnight 2014). Thus, Kenya's attempts to externalize terrorism should be understood in relation to the benefits (economic, political, and military control) the country stands to gain, and Kenya-Somalia relations which have historically been riddled with tension and suspicion (Lind et al. 2015).

Notably, while appropriating the mainstream discourse(s) in terrorism, Kenya has also adopted language that views "terrorism" as violence and activism by Muslims. In this narrative, terrorism in Kenya is equated with the "Somali problem" and global discourses of "Islamic extremism" (see chapter Violent extremism, critical approaches to). For instance, in a televised remark the then president Moi in describing the 1998 attacks remarked that the "bombers would not have done what they did if they had been Christian" (as cited in Mwakimako 2007, p. 289). Later, during the launch of Operation Linda Nchi (Swahili for protecting the country) in 2011 the then assistant minister of Internal Security Orwa Ojode in a parliament session also said that terrorism "is a big animal with its head in Eastleigh, Nairobi and its tail in Somalia" (Opiyo and Githinji 2011), as did Mathiu's (2014) Nation Media Group managing editors comment "that every little, two-bit Somali has a big dream – to blow us up, knock down our buildings and slaughter our children. They declared war on us... let's get down to work then... We are at war. Let's start shooting".

These accounts generate two main claims. First, given that, Kenya's two major religions are Christianity and Islam, by overtly exonerating Christianity of any involvement even before investigations are complete, the president covertly attributes the blame to Muslims. According to Omanga (2013), this position even became popular in both news reports and editorial cartoons. Indeed, this premise resonates with Kenya's government interpretation where terrorism is viewed as inherent to Muslims (Prestholdt 2011), an assumption well-articulated in Islamophobic slogans such as "not all Muslims are terrorists, but all terrorists are Muslims" (Mwakimako 2007, p. 289). Second, through the figurative phrase, the minister collocates terrorism with Eastleigh (a predominantly Somali inhabited suburban area in Nairobi) and Somalia. Positioning these words in close proximity underlines their connection to each other. Further, both the ministers and Mathiu's claim emphasize the dual nature of the threat as one with a face of a Somali Muslim individual from Eastleigh affiliated to a foreign "terrorist" organization, i.e., al-Shabaab. In creating the identity of the "dangerous other," and the "self" both actors "emphasizes or downplays sameness and differences" (Hodges 2011, p. 65). The "us" or ingroup in this case comprises non-Somali, non-Muslim Kenyans who by default are the victims of terrorism, whereas the "them" or outgroup comprises of ethnic Kenyan-Somali, Somalia-Somalis, Somali refugees, and Muslims living in Eastleigh. Here, by default, Moi's, Ojode's and Mathiu's claims connect Somalis, and Muslims to al-Shabaab and other similar groups because of shared identity markers such as religion, ethnicity, race, and geography. This process of differentiation is ideological and involves making choices on the vocabularies, grammar, and metaphors accessible in Kenya to make sense of the threat of terrorism. Thus, based on the socio-historical context, both Somalis and Coastal Muslims have historically been portrayed with narratives of illegality, illegitimacy, violence, danger, and consequently a problem to Kenya.

These pre-existing narratives have enabled Kenya to summon its old internal enemies using the post-9/11 discourses which are hinged on the idea of “Islamic terrorism” as the most important threat to global peace and liberal ideals. In these discourses, the primary image of Muslims and Islam is one of barbarism, violence, and backwardness (Jackson 2005). Thus, not only are Muslims cast as a homogenous group but also their identity is portrayed in opposition to democratic ideals. Locally, such stereotypes have always informed the politics of Kenya not least because of the participation of Coastal Muslims in the eighteenth and nineteenth century slave trade but also because of the attempts of predominantly Muslim regions (NFD and Coastal region) to secede from Kenya. Muslims are considered to have betrayed Kenya in the past and to be unpatriotic in the present, thus needing close surveillance and policing because if left freely they may wreak havoc. A conceptualization that narrowly focuses on cultural factors dehumanizes Muslims and Somalis, and simply reduces their motivations to “Islamic extremism” (Oded 1996) and “Muslim rage” (Mwakimako 2007). The understanding of terrorism as a “Muslim problem” has enhanced the fear of the “other” deemed dangerous (Mogire and Mkuu 2011). This climate of fear has in turn been used by Uhuru’s administration to push for a counterterrorism agenda that prioritizes increased power and mandate for security institutions and the executive instead of redressing historical injustices and inequalities.

As such, based on the perceptions of terrorism as an external and internal threat, Kenya’s counterterrorism efforts have targeted several fronts. With terrorism being a criminal offence, Kenya has pushed for a range of security legislation, including the Prevention of Terrorism Act 2012, Prevention of Organized Crime Act 2010, and Security Laws Amendment Act 2014 (SLAA) to criminalize, and prosecute terror suspects (see Mwangi 2017). Also, in 2013 Kenya signed the Tripartite Agreement to facilitate the repatriation of Somali refugees living in Kenya. This came in the aftermath of the 2013 Westgate shopping mall attack that was followed by a rising perception of Somali refugees as a national security threat (Mwangi 2018). Financially, Kenya has adopted the Proceeds of Crime and Anti-Money Laundering (Amendment) Act of 2017, and the Anti-Money Laundering (AML) bill, 2006 as deregulation legislation meant to disrupt the financing of “terrorist” organizations.

Militarily, through state security forces Kenya has conducted several local and foreign military operations to pre-empt the risk of terrorism. Locally, well-known operations include 2014 Operation Sanitization Eastleigh also publicly known as operation Usalama Watch (Swahili for security) which targeted Eastleigh and South-C areas of Nairobi; Operation Linda Boni (beginning in 2015 and lasting more than 5 years) meant to remove al-Shabaab operatives from the Boni forest; a 2015 presidential Amnesty pardon allowing the reintegration of Kenyan youth who renounce al-Shabaab activities. Other small-scale operations include curfews, stop-search operations, arbitrary arrests, and extrajudicial assassinations and disappearances of terror suspects. All these operations are marred by profiling, collective punishment, and violations of human rights and international conventions (see further Human Rights Watch 2016). Also, as part of enhancing its security architecture in 2004 Kenya developed the National Counter Terrorism Centre and tasked it with the responsibility of developing the country’s counterterrorism strategy, Preventing/Countering Violent Extremism (P/CVE) policies, and coordinating regional and local counterterrorism and CVE initiatives. Additionally, in 2014 Kenya also established a specialized police unit; Anti-Terrorism Police Unit in charge of planning and implementing counterterrorism operations.

In terms of foreign operations, in October 2011, together with the Somalia forces, Kenya launched the KDF Operation Linda Nchi in Somalia meant to push back al-Shabaab into southern hinterlands and create a buffer zone (Jubaland initiative) that would enable the Transitional Federal Government of Somalia to effectively control and govern. The operation ended in March 2012 but KDF remained in Somalia and were integrated into the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM). Additionally, on September 28, 2012, together with the Somali National Army and AMISON forces, KDF launched operation Sledgehammer in Kismayo that led to the capture of the port city in southern Somalia. Kenya has also pursued soft-security counterterrorism measures including the adoption of the National Strategy for CVE in 2016 and its ensuing County Action Plans. This strategy coordinates government, civil society, private sector and community stakeholders in the designing and implementation of CVE initiatives.

Summary

In conclusion, while Kenya has improved institutional capacity, strengthened its counterterrorism legislative framework, and earned a legitimate position in the global arena, its “war on terror” has also exposed its internal politics of national identity and belonging. By appropriating the problematic rhetoric that connects Muslims and Somalis to terrorism, counterterrorism has securitized large populations, spaces and locations associated with these groups. As a result, Kenya’s “war on terror” has been characterized by ethnic and religious profiling, violation of human rights and circumventing judicial procedures (Human Rights Watch 2016). Thus, in its pursuit of internal and external threats Kenya has endangered the very liberal gains it embarks to protect. Thus, for effective counterterrorism, it is paramount that Kenya starts to reflect on its “war on terror”; in terms of the material social, economic, political, and human insecurities it has produced in regions deemed “hot-spots.” While earlier in 2011 there were speculations about the ongoing radicalization of Kenya’s youth cohort, an interview with N. Songora (personal communication, June 22, 2019) revealed that in 2019 there were over one hundred violent gangs mostly originating and operating in the securitized areas of the Coast region.

Cross-References

- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

References

- Anderson, D. M. (2005). Histories of the hanged: The dirty war in Kenya and the end of empire. New York/London: W. W. Norton & Company. <https://doi.org/10.1177/002234330604300608>.
- Anderson, D. M. (2014). Remembering Wagalla: State violence in northern Kenya, 1962–1991. Journal of Eastern Africa Studies, 8(4), 658–676. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17531055.2014.946237>.
- Anderson, D. M., & McKnight, J. (2014). Kenya at war: Al-Shabaab and its enemies in eastern Africa. African Affairs, 114(454), 1–27. <https://doi.org/10.1093/afraf/adu082>.
- Bernstein, B. (2003). The structuring of pedagogic discourse: Class, codes and control (Vol. IV). London/New York: Routledge Taylor and Francis Group.
- Chatham House. (2018). Kenya's priorities for inclusive growth: Towards domestic development and regional peace. Retrieved June 20, 2020, from <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=vGD102-a1X8>
- Citizens for Justice. (2003). We lived to tell: The Nyayo House story. Nairobi: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung (FES).
- Croft, S. (2006). Culture, crisis and America's war on terror. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Elkins, C. (2005). Imperial reckoning: The untold story of Britain's gulag in Kenya. New York: Henry Holt and Company.
- Erjavec, K., & Volcic, Z. (2007). ‘War on terrorism’ as a discursive battleground: Serbian recontextualization of G.W. Bush’s discourse. Discourse & Society, 18(2), 123–137.
- Fairclough, N. (2003). Analysing discourse: Textual analysis for social research. London/New York: Routledge/Taylor and Francis Group.
- Hodges, A. (2011). The “war on terror” narrative: Discourse and intertextuality in the construction and contestation of sociopolitical reality. New York: Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/acprof:oso/9780199759590.001.0001>.
- Human Rights Watch. (2002). Playing with fire: Weapons Proliferation, Political Violence, and Human Rights in Kenya. New York: Human Rights.
- Human Rights Watch. (2016). Deaths and disappearances: Abuses in counterterrorism operations in Nairobi and in northeastern Kenya. New York: Human Rights Watch.
- Jackson, R. (2005). Writing the war on terrorism: Language, politics and counter-terrorism. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Jarvis, L. (2008). Times of terror: Writing temporality into the war on terror. Critical Studies on Terrorism, 1(2), 245–262. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17539150802184637>.

- Karari, P. (2018). Modus operandi of oppressing the “savages”: The Kenyan British colonial experience. Peace and Conflict Studies, 25(1), 1–20.
- Kenya National Bureau of Statistics. (2019). 2019 Kenya population and housing census: Volume IV distribution of population by socio-economic characteristics. Nairobi.
- Kresse, K. (2010). Muslim politics in postcolonial Kenya: Negotiating knowledge on the double-periphery. In Islam, politics, anthropology (Vol. 15, pp. 72–90). Oxford: Wiley-Blackwell. <https://doi.org/10.1002/9781444324402.ch5>.
- Lind, J., Mutahi, P., & Oosterom, M. (2015). Tangled ties: Al-Shabaab and political volatility in Kenya. Brighton: Institute of Development Studies.
- Lochery, E. (2012). Rendering difference visible: The Kenyan state and its Somali citizens. African Affairs, 111(445), 615–639. <https://doi.org/10.1093/afraf/ads059>.
- Lonsdale, J. (2009). Compromised critics: Religion in Kenya's politics I. In B. Knighton (Ed.), Religion and politics in Kenya: Essays in honor of a meddlesome priest (pp. 57–94). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mathiu, M. (2014, March 20). Are we just going to sit around and wait to be blown to bits by terrorists? Nairobi: Nation Media Group.
- Mazrui, A. (1993). Ethnicity and pluralism: The politicization of religion in Kenya. Institute of Muslim Minority Affairs. Journal, 14(1–2), 191–201. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13602009308716291>.
- Ministry of External Affairs India. (2015). Opening statement by H. E. Mr. Uhuru Kenyatta C. G. H., president of the Republic of Kenya. Retrieved April 4, 2020, from <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ETqeEIH4JFU&list=UU-wtYGDvP8Roy8mh8VbzKw&index=783>
- Mogire, E., & Mkutu, A. K. (2011). Counter-terrorism in Kenya. Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 29(4), 473–491. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02589001.2011.600849>.
- Mohamed, M. H. (2015). The underlying dynamics of Al-Shabaab's recruitment of Muslim youth: A case of Mombasa County in Kenya. Rotterdam: Erasmus University Rotterdam.
- Mwakimako, H. (2007). Christian-Muslim relations in Kenya: A catalogue of events and meanings. Islam and Christian-Muslim Relations, 18(2), 287–307. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09596410701214266>.
- Mwangi, O. G. (2017). The dilemma of Kenya's new counterterrorism and Assymetric warfare. Peace Review, 29(3), 307–314. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10402659.2017.1344530>.
- Mwangi, O. G. (2018). Securitisation, non-refoulement and the rule of law in Kenya: The case of Somali refugees. The International Journal of Human Rights, 22(10), 1–17. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13642987.2018.1482045>.
- Ndzovu, H. J. (2012). The politicization of Muslim organizations and the future of Islamic-oriented politics in Kenya. Islamic Africa, 3(1), 25–53.
- Oded, A. (1996). Islamic extremism in Kenya: The rise and fall of Sheikh Khalid Balala. Journal of Religion in Africa, 26(4), 406–415.
- Oded, A. (2000). Islam & politics in Kenya. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Omanga, D. M. (2013). The media and terrorism: Editorial cartoons, framing and legitimacy in the Kenyan press, 1998–2008. Münster: Lit Verlag GmbH & Co.
- Opiyo, P., & Githinji, P. (2011, October 20). Minister says Eastleigh the next target in hunt for Al Shabaab militants. The Standard. Retrieved from <https://www.standardmedia.co.ke/article/2000045206/minister-says-eastleigh-the-next-target-in-hunt-for-al-shabaab-militants>
- Prestholdt, J. (2011). Kenya, the United States, and counterterrorism. Africa Today, 57(4), 2–27. <https://doi.org/10.2979/africatoday.57.4.3>.
- PSCU. (2015, April 18). Uhuru leaves for Ethiopia, Jordan to discuss radicalisation. Daily Nation.
- Rémy, J.-P. (2011, November 8). Kenya develops plan for satellite region of Jubaland on Somali border. The Guardian.
- Schlee, G. (1989). The historical frame. In Identities on the move: Clanship and pastoralism in northern Kenya (pp. 30–53). Manchester/New York: Manchester University Press. <https://doi.org/10.2307/1160212>.
- Sheikh, S. A. (2007). Blood on the runway: The Wagalla massacre of 1984. Nairobi: Northern Publishing House.
- Thorsden, S. N. (2009). New Muslim activism in Kenya. Arhus: Institut for Statskundskab.
- UN Monitoring Group. (2013). Report of the monitoring group on Somalia and Eritrea pursuant to Security Council resolution 2060 (2012): Somalia (No. 413).
- UN Monitoring Group. (2014). Report of the monitoring group on Somalia and Eritrea pursuant to Security Council resolution 2111 (2013): Somalia (No. 726). International Organization. <https://doi.org/10.1017/s0020818300024346>.
- Vidija, P. (2015, April 9). Njue warns of religious war. The Star.
- Wanga, J., & Hajir, A. (2015, June 27). Mistrust between chiefs and police mars Shabaab war. Daily Nation.
- Whittaker, H. (2008). Pursuing pastoralists: The stigma of. Eras, 10(November).
- Whittaker, H. (2012). Forced Villagization during the Shifta conflict in Kenya, ca. 1963–1968. The International Journal of African Historical Studies, 45(3), 343–364.
- Willis, J., & Gona, G. (2012). Pwani c Kenya? Memory, documents and secessionist politics in coastal Kenya. African Affairs, 112(446), 48–71. <https://doi.org/10.1093/afraf/ads064>.

Land Conflict

► Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Land Politics and Conflict

Katarina Kušić

The Center for Advanced Studies of Southeastern Europe, University of Rijeka, Rijeka, Croatia

Synonyms

Environmental peacebuilding; Land rights; Land tenure; Land use

Definitions and Issues

A successful transition to peace necessarily involves establishing tenure security, where tenure refers to a set of social relations that govern the access, use, and claims to land. Tenure security is the predictability of property rights that allows people to rebuild their personal, economic, social, and political lives. Conflicts reorder social relations dramatically: population patterns change; state power is less effective; identities shift as people move locations and their relations to land; and legitimacy and authority that are used to claim land, property, and territory are challenged (Unruh 2003). This entry examines land as a cause of conflict, a dimension of violence, and a key aspect of post-conflict reconstruction.

Ways of using, accessing, and owning land pose particular issues, within and outside conflict. The particularities emerge from the fact that land is, in Tania Li's (2014b) words, a "strange object." First, its "substance" is dependent on particular relations. For some, it is a source of food, for others a basis of tax revenue, and elsewhere it might be shelter or a foundation of ethnic identity. Second, it is peculiarly material in that it is not movable as other "possessions" are, and its use depends on exclusion of others from it. And third, it depends on "inscription devices": whether crops, ploughs, ancestral graves, or cadasters, a whole variety of devices are employed to give land meaning and assemble it as a resource. All these dimensions of land are challenged in times of conflict: a forest that was a source of food can become a battle ground; revenues from crops and mines can be (re)directed into weapons; radically different orders of exclusion are enacted as territorial lines shift; and instead of through titling deeds and ploughs, plots might be known through landmines.

Tenure often exists in the form of legal pluralism: the existence of "different sets of rights and obligations concerning land and property" that "reside within multiple social fields or normative orders" (Unruh 2003, p. 355). Multiple governing orders can coexist at the same time: traditional (historical arrangements that may or may not be still in effect), indigenous (attached to specific groups, often related to traditional or customary rights), and customary (provisions that are still in effect and are non-statutory) (Unruh and Williams 2013a, p. 2). In these discussions, land rights and property rights are sometimes used interchangeably, even though land rights for owners are particularly circumscribed (by planning, environmental, and other laws), and are often abbreviated to HLP: housing, land, and property right. Establishing tenure security means reconciling these competing orders in a way that ensures trust in its long-term sustainability.

Land politics in and after conflicts are also shaped by the raising value of land and food, especially in the last two decades. After the food price crises of 2007–2008, land emerged as an important capital investment: industrial agriculture, biofuel production, mining, and conservation increasingly rely on so-called large-scale land acquisitions, or land grabs (Borras et al. 2011; Edelman et al. 2013; Hall et al. 2015; Margulis et al. 2013; Margulis and Porter 2013; Millar 2015). Many of the land deals reported by INGOs that monitor large-scale land acquisitions, such as GRAIN and the International Land Coalition, take place in countries emerging from conflict. Recent examples include the investment by the Canadian company Feronia Inc, in Tshopo Province, in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (GRAIN 2019) and the sales of land on which refugees had previously settled in Uganda (AFSA et al. 2020) and Tanzania (Mittal 2012). In these contexts, land is both an opportunity for development, and thus long-lasting peace, and a source of conflict.

The particularity of land ownership and use has been getting increasing attention in peacebuilding. In 2009, the Peacebuilding Commission at the UN, along with the United Nations Environment Program, published From Conflict to Peacebuilding: The Role of Natural Resources and the Environment. The report argued for more attention to natural resources as implicated in all phases of conflicts, “from contributing to the outbreak and perpetuation of violence to undermining prospects for peace.” At the same time, the natural environment and resources in question need to be protected as they can become “victims” of conflict themselves, through physical destruction and the breakdown of governance structures (United Nations Environment Programme 2009).

These issues are explicitly addressed in the emerging subfield of environmental peacebuilding that looks to natural resources and ways of managing them as crucial for transitions to peace. Land plays a part in most of these discussions – mining, logging, agriculture, and waterways involve specific spatial coordinates. Yet the specificity of land as a resource also requires a more detailed approach. In the last decade, several volumes and special issues have addressed the nexus between land and conflict explicitly (Cramer and Richards 2011; Leckie 2009; Pantuliano 2009; Takeuchi 2014; Unruh and Williams 2013b), as a part of wider discussions on natural resources (Bruch et al. 2016; Schilling et al. 2018), or within a political theory understanding of territory and territorial disputes (Kolers 2009). These edited volumes provide an exceptional level of conceptual discussion and in-depth case studies from around the world.

This entry will highlight the most important issues that this literature is built around to help researchers and practitioners approach land politics in conflict and post-conflict contexts. The following sections review the different ways that land and conflict come together in different phases of war: before, during, and after conflict. While such temporal separation inevitably glosses over the ways these processes overlap, it is a useful heuristic device for observing land politics. The conclusion points to emerging areas of investigation and highlights the political character of land that can help researchers connect disparate temporalities and scales on which political authority is made and transformed.

Land as a Cause of Conflict

Land is habitually associated with causes of war and violence, yet the specific relationship between the two can be understood quite differently. In a useful review, Van Leeuwen and Van der Haar (2016) speak about three distinct theoretical approaches. First, there are those who see causes of conflicts in land as a resource itself (see Homer-Dixon 1999). These approaches revolve around scarcity and treat land as a finite resource around which competition emerges and ultimately turns into violence. Second, there is the literature that understands conflicts as products of particular historical and political developments. These scholars, often coming from the political ecology tradition, are less interested in scarcity itself, and pay more attention to “the political production of scarcity and exclusion” (Leeuwen and Van der Haar 2016, p. 96; see Le Billon 2001; Peluso and Watts 2001). Third, there are perspectives coming from legal anthropologist studies that focus on land governance structures, rather than land, as the causes and drivers of conflict – whether these are institutional failures (see Ostrom 1990; Turner 2004) or broader regulatory and political contexts (see Lund and Boone 2013; Peters 2004; Sikor and Lund 2009; Unruh 2003).

Van Leeuwen and Van der Haar (2016), however, emphasize that all existing approaches require better theorization of the connection between conflict and violence, on both local and global scales. They suggest that, instead of researching “ways in which land may cause violent conflict,” researchers should turn to exploring “how land becomes part of larger patterns of violent contestation” in the process of “the social production of violent conflict” (Leeuwen and Van der Haar 2016, p. 95). This approach is especially useful because (even when land is not the “primary” cause of war) land issues affect the direction and intensity of violence as different groups use the conflict as an opportunity to address other disputes (André and Platteau 1998; Chauveau and Richards 2008).

In pursuing such an approach, two issues emerge. First, understanding the historical roots of a conflict, and the land issues that are a part of it, requires a long historical perspective that takes into account histories of colonialism, slavery, rebellion, and food production in contexts as varied as Kenya, Central America, Angola, or the Philippines (Cramer and Richards 2011). Such analysis is often difficult to achieve when dealing with conflicts that require urgent responses. In post-conflict Rwanda, for example, policies which forced multiple claimants to share land were implemented to accommodate the various groups of refugees returning even though they violated constitutional protections (Bruce 2013). And secondly, these larger patterns of violence and the micro- and macro-contexts in which they participate do not unfold in separate phases – land grievances, aspirations, and needs do not recognize temporal designations that separate war and peace too easily.

Land in and after Conflict

Land shapes the development of conflicts as much as conflicts can remake the physical landscapes in which they take place. Land is key when searching for resources that fund wars and crucial for ensuring food security during and after conflict. Agricultural products, timber, charcoal, diamonds, and many other resources found on the land become “conflict resources” that both directly and indirectly finance conflict (Le Billon 2013). This is the case with the so-called “diamond wars” in sub-Saharan Africa (Billon 2008) or teak, gems and minerals, and wildlife in Myanmar (Talbot et al. 2016). Curtailing access to revenues from those resources has been a key concern of the UN (Le Billon 2011).

Food security is both severely impacted by violence and can directly shape the developments of conflicts, even more so in countries where a high percentage of the population is related to agricultural labor, as is the case with most conflicts today. Internally displaced people (IDPs) and refugees leave rural areas to, often temporarily, settle into urban centers that frequently cannot provide for the increase in population. Landscapes change profoundly, but so does their use. After wars, we often see an emergence of “postconflict livelihoods” that, on the one hand, depend on “extractive, low-investments, opportunistic, short-term and often dead end (resource-exhausted) activities” that can meet immediate needs for food, water, and shelter. At the same time, they are marked by attempts to “reacquire or rebuild the landscape assets that allow for the (re)construction of a more durable livelihood strategy” (Unruh 2017, p. 3). Managing immediate needs and future aspirations often involve dramatically different practices.

These dynamics profoundly shape both peace negotiations and peace settlements. A post-conflict land settlement is concerned with “livelihoods, macroeconomic recovery, governance, and reintegration of former combatants” (Unruh and Williams 2013a, p. 3). It can be understood through three main dimensions of post-conflict land laws reform: i) addressing grievances coming out of both pre-conflict and conflict land administration; ii) helping and instituting social change; and iii) using land reform as a tool for post-conflict recovery and reconstruction (Unruh and Williams 2013a, p. 11).

One of the main drivers of land use change is the dislocation of both refugees and internally displaced persons. These movements change the landscapes from which people depart, those in which they arrive and stay during the war, and others to which they return (Unruh 2017, p. 2). While restitution processes often address effects of colonialism and socialism (see Fay and James 2009), they are also an important part of post-conflict land settlements and aim to enable former landholders to reclaim their rights.

Restitution was enshrined in the UN’s 2005 Principles on Housing and Property Restitution for Refugees and Displaced Persons, often referred to as the Pinheiro Principles, after the rapporteur Paulo Sérgio Pinheiro (see McCallin 2013). Despite its importance, it is always a contested process as it connects prewar grievances and postwar aspirations. These aspirations do not see only civilians returning to formerly owned properties, but former combatants often choose agricultural labor as a way of reintegration. Post-conflict land systems therefore include not only restitution, but wider land reforms that could accommodate such, frequently competing, claims. This was the case with the ambitious land reform in Mozambique that was designed to accommodate community property rights, provide opportunity for large investments, and work toward restitution alongside both of these ambitious projects (Unruh 2005).

Besides working toward ameliorating the consequences of the conflict, postwar reform and restitution processes can also serve a wide range of state- and nation-building projects. For example, restitution through narrow definitions of “return” that emphasize property in lieu of relational importance of networks, citizenship, labor, and education was used to promote ethno-national engineering in Croatia (Leutloff-Grandits 2016). In other contexts, postwar conditions were used for ambitious land reforms meant not only to democratize land use, but also to give legitimacy to postwar regimes. This was the case with land reform in Colombia, where the Integral Rural Reform based on formalization, restitution, and equitable distribution of land remains a key aspect of the peace process on both state and community levels (McKay 2016; Velásquez et al. 2020).

Post-conflict land reforms are frequently conducted under the guidance of International Financial Institutions or directly under post-conflict international administrations (Grajales 2020b; Grasten and Tzouvala 2018). They involve formalization processes that use registration and titling to ensure tenure security as in the case, for example, in Angola (Cain 2013), Afghanistan (Murtazashvili 2016), Colombia (Rettberg 2020), and Sierra Leone (Millar 2016a). While the aim of such projects is providing a basis for the protection of land and property rights, it is well recognized that they can be dangerous to the weakest claimants. Youth, women, or migrants are often marginalized in contexts where multiple claims on land exist (for example, grazing rights of one group and tree planting rights of another). Moreover, implementing such reforms in systems that are not based on an individual title deed, as most systems in the Global North are, brings into sharp relief the difficulty of bringing together diverse practices and knowledges (Grajales 2020a; Nyamu Musembi 2007).

The politics of formalization processes and the development narratives that legitimize them are especially relevant in large-scale land acquisitions that are by now common in post-conflict contexts. These land deals are seen as opportunities for recovery and export-oriented growth and can be interpreted as “a direct embodiment of the liberal peace paradigm” (Millar 2016b, p. 569). While such projects are presented through the lens of market-led development that come naturally to the liberal peace paradigm, such understandings stand awkwardly in relation to land which is almost never traded under free market conditions.

Land grabs themselves depend on heavy state and elite involvement (Wolford et al. 2013) and land grabbing often happens “legally” as the state and local elites are involved as actors able to guarantee tenure security to investors. Dispossession can thus happen through legal means, through “white collar crimes” or more explicitly through violent military-state structures engaging in “ceasefire capitalism” (Le Billon 2018; Woods 2011). While there exists a wide literature that considers the nuances and the often-disastrous effects of land grabs (see the contributions in Hall et al. 2015), there is also a move to consider these deals more explicitly as a part of peace and conflict processes. Large-scale land deals are documented as promoting conflict at multiple levels in settings like Papua New Guinea (Hennings 2016), Cambodia (Kuhn 2018), and Sierra Leone (Millar 2016b). They create sites of contestation where various local coalitions resist them, as is the case in Côte d’Ivoire (Grajales 2020a), Serbia (Kušić 2018), and Uganda (Martiniello 2015). Land grabs can also become a source of resistance to peacebuilding more generally like in Cambodia in the 1990s (Lee 2015), and they often bring together militaries, conservation agencies, narcotics production, and industrial agriculture in unexpected ways, as they did in Guatemala (Grandia 2013; Ybarra 2012) and Sierra Leone (Millar 2018).

Summary and Future Work

Land is a key issue in understanding causes, forms, and ends of conflicts. It can play a major role in the emergence of wars as a resource, an identity, or territory. Landscapes are reshaped by violence and the movement of people, while land itself can provide resources for further fighting. And after violence, tenure security underlines any quest for sustainable peace. It is no wonder that issues of land use and land distribution are approached by practitioners with urgency and determination.

However, seeing land as an important resource that needs to be managed effectively to prevent, end, and rebuild after conflict can lead researchers into a “problem-solving” vision. While such approaches provide the knowledge needed for solving urgent problems, they can also be constrained by their “normative objectives” (Grajales 2020b) that tend to see land as an “economic subject” of governance, rather than a “political problem” (Grajales 2020b, p. 16). While the last decade has seen a particular move toward seeing land as political, how to study and theorize these political processes is an ongoing question. Some argue for focusing on structures, institutions, agencies, and narratives that bring together local and global dynamics in land conflicts (Dietz and Engels 2020). Others point to post-conflict transformations as instances of restructuring of agrarian capitalism in which peacebuilding, corporations, and strategies of accumulation come together (Grajales 2020b). Whatever a particular approach might be, it is always concerned with the political problem of “land control”: “practices that fix or consolidate forms of access, claiming, and exclusion for some time” (Peluso and Lund 2011, p. 668). Efforts to control land – including those described in this entry – are then not just an outcome of decisions made elsewhere. They “do not only reflect existing political authority, but produce it in the first place” (Hirblinger 2015, p. 705; see also Lund and Boone 2013). This production of political authority and power makes land a crucial site of both conflict and post-conflict politics – this is especially so when thinking about temporalities and scales involved.

Land challenges the temporalities of war and peace. Conflict shapes land dynamics for decades to come, even when the conflict has ended so long ago that most people do not see the spaces as “post-conflict” anymore (Baird and Le Billon 2012; Ybarra 2011). Thinking about land relations here highlights that “post-conflict” is not a temporal designation, but a “set of political circumstances created by the fears and expectations of social actors, the implementation of a certain array of public policies and the reconfiguration of economic relations” (Grajales 2020a, p. 13). Examining how “land control” is transformed can help researchers challenge the pre-/post-/in-conflict designations and offer a more nuanced understandings of the political, social, and economic transformations.

More than providing temporal connections between conflict and post-conflict contexts, land politics also point to the need to see land tenure as an outcome of local and global processes coming together. While active conflicts present both specific problems and an unparalleled urgency to resolve them, the land conflicts that shape and reflect them should not be considered as separate from the global land politics in which they are embedded: this is as much the case with African American land ownership in the USA (Agyeman and Boone 2020; Presser 2019), the entanglement of settler colonialism with racial regimes of property (Bhandar 2018), indigenous frontiers (Li 2014a), decolonial claims to territories (Tuck and Yang 2012), the sell-off of public lands in the UK (Christophers 2019), or post-socialist transformations in Eastern Europe (Dorondel 2016; Verdery 2003). Understanding land issues in these contexts requires thinking about conflict and politics together with the social, economic, and ecological relations that make them.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict and Hunger
- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

References

- AFSA, GRAIN, & Witness Radio. (2020, August 25). Land grabs at gunpoint: Thousands of families are being violently evicted from their farms to make way for foreign-owned plantations in Kiryandongo, Uganda. <https://grain.org/en/article/6518-land-grabs-at-gunpoint-thousands-of-families-are-being-violently-evicted-from-their-farms-to-make-way-for-foreign-owned-plantations-in-kiryandongo-uganda>
- Agyeman, J., & Boone, K. (2020). Land loss has plagued black America since emancipation – Is it time to look again at ‘black commons’ and collective ownership? The Conversation. <https://theconversation.com/land-loss-has-plagued-black-america-since-emancipation-is-it-time-to-look-again-at-black-commons-and-collective-ownership-140514>
- André, C., & Platteau, J.-P. (1998). Land relations under unbearable stress: Rwanda caught in the Malthusian trap. Journal of Economic Behavior & Organization, 34(1), 1–47. https://doi.org/10.1016/S0167-2681\(97\)00045-000045-0).
- Baird, I. G., & Le Billon, P. (2012). Landscapes of political memories: War legacies and land negotiations in Laos. Political Geography, 31(5), 290–300. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.polgeo.2012.04.005>.
- Bhandar, B. (2018). Colonial lives of property: Law, land, and racial regimes of ownership. Duke University Press.
- Billon, P. L. (2008). Diamond wars? Conflict diamonds and geographies of resource wars. Aag20 Annals of the Association of American Geographers, 98(2), 345–372. <https://doi.org/10.1080/00045600801922422>.
- Borras, S. M., Hall, R., Scoones, I., White, B., & Wolford, W. (2011). Towards a better understanding of global land grabbing: An editorial introduction. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 38(2), 209–216. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2011.559005>.
- Bruce, J. W. (2013). Return of land in post-conflict Rwanda: International standards, improvisation, and the role of international humanitarian organizations. In J. D. Unruh & R. C. Williams (Eds.), Land and post-conflict peacebuilding (pp. 121–144). Earthscan.
- Bruch, C., Muffet, C., & Nichols, S. S. (Eds.). (2016). Governance, natural resources, and post-conflict peacebuilding (1st ed.). Routledge. <https://doi.org/10.4324/9780203109793>.
- Cain, A. (2013). Angola: Land resources and conflict. In J. D. Unruh & R. C. Williams (Eds.), Land and post-conflict peacebuilding (pp. 177–204). Earthscan.
- Chauveau, J.-P., & Richards, P. (2008). West African insurgencies in agrarian perspective: Côte d’Ivoire and Sierra Leone compared. Journal of Agrarian Change, 8(4), 515–552. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1471-0366.2008.00179.x>.
- Christophers, B. (2019). The new enclosure: The appropriation of public land in neoliberal Britain. Verso. <http://rbdigital.rbdigital.com>
- Cramer, C., & Richards, P. (2011). Violence and war in agrarian perspective: Violence and war in agrarian perspective. Journal of Agrarian Change, 11(3), 277–297. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1471-0366.2011.00312.x>.
- Dietz, K., & Engels, B. (2020). Analysing land conflicts in times of global crises. Geoforum, 111, 208–217. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.geoforum.2020.02.019>.

- Dorondel, S. (2016). Disrupted landscapes: State, peasants and the politics of land in postsocialist Romania. Berghahn Books.
- Edelman, M., Oya, C., & Borras, S. M. (2013). Global land grabs: Historical processes, theoretical and methodological implications and current trajectories. Third World Quarterly, 34(9), 1517–1531. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.850190>.
- Fay, D., & James, D. (Eds.). (2009). The rights and wrongs of land restitution: 'Restoring what was ours'. Routledge-Cavendish.
- GRAIN. (2019, March 21). Violent tensions at Feronia's oil palm plantations in the DR Congo [GRAIN]. <https://grain.org/en/article/6182-violent-tensions-at-feronia-s-oil-palm-plantations-in-the-dr-congo>
- Grajales, J. (2020a). From war to wealth? Land policies and the peace economy in Côte d'Ivoire. Review of African Political Economy, Online first.
- Grajales, J. (2020b). Losing land in times of peace: Post-war agrarian capitalism in Colombia and Côte d'Ivoire. The Journal of Peasant Studies, Online first. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2019.1691535>.
- Grandia, L. (2013). Road mapping: Megaprojects and land grabs in the Northern Guatemalan lowlands: Road mapping and land grabs in Northern Guatemala. Development and Change, 44(2), 233–259. <https://doi.org/10.1111/dech.12020>.
- Grasten, M., & Tzouvala, N. (2018). The political economy of international transitional administration: Regulating food and farming in Kosovo and Iraq. Contemporary Politics, 24(5), 588–606. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13569775.2018.1452663>.
- Hall, R., Edelman, M., Borras, S. M., Scoones, I., White, B., & Wolford, W. (2015). Resistance, acquiescence or incorporation? An introduction to land grabbing and political reactions 'from below'. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 42(3–4), 467–488. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2015.1036746>.
- Hennings, A. (2016). Assembling resistance against large-scale land deals: Challenges for conflict transformation in Bougainville, Papua New Guinea. Austrian Journal of South-East Asian Studies, 33–52. <https://doi.org/10.14764/10.ASEAS-2016.1-3>.
- Hirblinger, A. T. (2015). Land, political subjectivity and conflict in post-CPA Southern Sudan. Journal of Eastern African Studies, 9(4), 704–722. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17531055.2015.1105443>.
- Homer-Dixon, T. (1999). Environment, scarcity, and violence. Princeton University Press.
- Kolers, A. (2009). Land, conflict, and justice: A political theory of territory. Cambridge University Press. <http://site.ebrary.com/id/10289281>
- Kuhn, A. (2018). Large-scale land acquisitions and violence in post-war societies. Third World Thematics: A TWQ Journal, 3(1), 98–115. <https://doi.org/10.1080/23802014.2018.1454847>.
- Kušić, K. (2018). Locating subjects, disrupting intervention: Youth empowerment and agricultural modernisation in Serbia [PhD thesis]. Aberystwyth University.
- Le Billon, P. (2001). The political ecology of war: Natural resources and armed conflicts. Political Geography, 20, 561–584.
- Le Billon, P. (2011). Bankrupting peace spoilers: What role for UN peacekeepers? Sustainable Development Law & Policy, 12(1), 13–17, 54–55.
- Le Billon, P. (2013). Wars of plunder: Conflicts, profits and the politics of resources. Oxford University Press.
- Le Billon, P. (2018). Peacebuilding and white-collar crime in post-war natural resource sectors. Third World Thematics: A TWQ Journal, 3(1), 90–97.
- Leckie, S. (Ed.). (2009). Housing, land, and property rights in post-conflict United Nations and other peace operations. Cambridge University Press.
- Lee, S. Y. (2015). Motivations for local resistance in international peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(8), 1437–1452.
- Leeuwen, M. V., & Van der Haar, G. (2016). Theorizing the land–violent conflict nexus. World Development, 78, 94–104.
- Leutloff-Grandits, C. (2016). Post-Dayton ethnic engineering in Croatia through the lenses of property issues and social transformations. Journal of Genocide Research, 18(4), 485–502. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14623528.2016.1230299>.
- Li, T. M. (2014a). Land's end: Capitalist relations on an indigenous frontier. Duke University Press.
- Li, T. M. (2014b). What is land? Assembling a resource for global investment. Transactions of the Institute of British Geographers, 39(4), 589–602. <https://doi.org/10.1111/tran.12065>.
- Lund, C., & Boone, C. (2013). Introduction: Land politics in Africa – constituting authority over territory, property and persons. Africa, 83(1), 1–13. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S000197201200068X>.
- Margulis, M. E., & Porter, T. (2013). Governing the global land grab: Multipolarity, ideas, and complexity in transnational governance. Globalizations, 10(1), 65–86. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14747731.2013.760930>.
- Margulis, M. E., McKeon, N., & Borras, S. M. (2013). Land grabbing and global governance: Critical perspectives. Globalizations, 10(1), 1–23. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14747731.2013.764151>.
- Martiniello, G. (2015). Social struggles in Uganda's Acholiland: Understanding responses and resistance to Amuru sugar works. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 42(3–4), 653–669. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2015.1032269>.
- McCallin, B. (2013). The role of restitution in post-conflict situations. In J. D. Unruh & R. C. Williams (Eds.), Land and post-conflict peacebuilding (pp. 99–114). Earthscan.
- McKay, B. M. (2016). Democratising land control: Towards rights, reform and restitution in post-conflict Colombia. Canadian Journal of Development Studies, 39(2), 163–181. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02255189.2017.1364621>.
- Millar, G. (2015). “We have no voice for that”: Land rights, power, and gender in rural Sierra Leone. Journal of - Human Rights*, 14(4), 445–462. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14754835.2015.1032219>.

- Millar, G. (2016a). Knowledge and control in the contemporary land rush: Making local land legible and corporate power applicable in rural Sierra Leone. Journal of Agrarian Change, 16(2), 206–224. <https://doi.org/10.1111/joac.12102>.
- Millar, G. (2016b). Local experiences of liberal peace: Marketization and emergent conflict dynamics in Sierra Leone. Journal of Peace Research, 53(4), 569–581. <https://doi.org/10.1177/00223433166632580>.
- Millar, G. (2018). Co-opting authority and privatizing force in rural Africa: Ensuring corporate power over land and people. Rural Sociology, 83(4), 749–771. <https://doi.org/10.1111/ruso.12203>.
- Mittal, A. (2012). Lives on hold: The impact of AgriSol's land deal in Tanzania. The Oakland Institute. https://www.oaklandinstitute.org/sites/oaklandinstitute.org/files/OI_land_deal_brief_lives_on_hold.pdf
- Murtazashvili, I. (2016). Does the sequence of land reform and political reform matter? Evidence from state-building in Afghan. Conflict, Security & Development, 16(2), 145–172. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2016.1153314>.
- Nyamu Musembi, C. (2007). De Soto and land relations in rural Africa: Breathing life into dead theories about property rights. Third World Quarterly, 28(8), 1457–1478.
- Ostrom, E. (1990). Governing the commons: The evolution of institutions for collective action. Cambridge University Press.
- Pantuliano, S. (Ed.). (2009). Uncharted territory: Land, conflict and humanitarian action. Practical Action Publishing.
- Peluso, N. L., & Lund, C. (2011). New frontiers of land control: Introduction. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 38(4), 667–681.
- Peluso, N. L., & Watts, M. (Eds.). (2001). Violent environments. Cornell University Press.
- Peters, P. E. (2004). Inequality and social conflict over land in Africa. Journal of Agrarian Change, 4(3), 269–314. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1471-0366.2004.00080.x>.
- Presser, L. (2019, July 15). Kicked off the land: Why so many black families are losing their property. The New Yorker. <https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2019/07/22/kicked-off-the-land>
- Rettberg, A. (2020). Peace-making amidst an unfinished social contract: The case of Colombia. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(1), 84–100. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2019.1619655>.
- Schilling, J., Saulich, C., & Engwicht, N. (2018). A local to global perspective on resource governance and conflict. Conflict, Security & Development, 18(6), 433–461. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2018.1532641>.
- Sikor, T., & Lund, C. (2009). Access and property: A question of power and authority. Development and Change, 40(1), 1–22. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1467-7660.2009.01503.x>.
- Takeuchi, S. (Ed.). (2014). Confronting land and property problems for peace. Routledge, Taylor & Francis Group.
- Talbott, K., Akimoto, Y., & Cuskelly, K. (2016). Myanmar's ceasefire regime: Two decades of unaccountable natural resource exploitation. In C. Bruch, C. Muffet, & S. S. Nichols (Eds.), Governance, natural resources, and post-conflict peacebuilding (1st ed., pp. 327–361). Routledge. <https://doi.org/10.4324/9780203109793>.
- Tuck, E., & Yang, K. W. (2012). Decolonization is not a metaphor. Decolonization: Indigeneity, Education & Society, 1(1), 1–40.
- Turner, M. D. (2004). Political ecology and the moral dimensions of “resource conflicts”: The case of farmer–herder conflicts in the Sahel. Political Geography, 23, 863–889.
- United Nations Environment Programme (Ed.). (2009). From conflict to peacebuilding: The role of natural resources and the environment. United Nations Environment Programme.
- Unruh, J. D. (2003). Land tenure and legal pluralism in the peace process. Peace & Change, 28(3), 352–377. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1468-0130.00267>.
- Unruh, J. D. (2005). Property restitution laws in a post-war context: The case of Mozambique. African Journal of Legal Studies, 1(3), 147–165.
- Unruh, J. D. (2017). Postconflict geographies. In D. Richardson, N. Castree, M. F. Goodchild, A. Kobayashi, W. Liu, & R. A. Marston (Eds.), International encyclopedia of geography: People, the Earth, environment and technology (pp. 1–4). Wiley. <https://doi.org/10.1002/9781118786352.wbieg0908>.
- Unruh, J. D., & Williams, R. C. (2013a). Land: A foundation for peacebuilding. In J. D. Unruh & R. C. Williams (Eds.), Land and post-conflict peacebuilding. Earthscan.
- Unruh, J. D., & Williams, R. C. (Eds.). (2013b). Land and post-conflict peacebuilding. Earthscan.
- Velásquez, M., Ávila, N., Villota, M., Quintero, F., & Arbeláez, S. (2020). Largely on their own: Dealing with the rural legacies of conflict through local participatory peacebuilding. Journal of Agrarian Change. <https://doi.org/10.1111/joac.12395>.
- Verdery, K. (2003). The vanishing hectare: Property and value in postsocialist Transylvania. Cornell University Press.
- Wolford, W., Borras, S. M., Hall, R., Scoones, I., & White, B. (Eds.). (2013). Governing global land deals: The role of the state in the rush for land. Wiley Blackwell.
- Woods, K. (2011). Ceasefire capitalism: Military–private partnerships, resource concessions and military–state building in the Burma–China borderlands. Journal of Peasant Studies, 38(4), 747–770. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2011.607699>.
- Ybarra, M. (2011). Privatizing the Tzuultaq'a? Private property and spiritual reproduction in post-war Guatemala. Journal of Peasant Studies, 38(4), 793–810. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2011.607702>.
- Ybarra, M. (2012). Taming the jungle, saving the Maya Forest: Sedimented counterinsurgency practices in contemporary Guatemalan conservation. Journal of Peasant Studies, 39(2), 479–502. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2012.666974>.

Land Rights

- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict
- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Land Tenure

- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict

Land Use

- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict

Left Wing-Extremism

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding

Jamie J. Hagen
Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Synonyms

Civil Society Organizations \(CSOs\); Feminist; Gender; Human rights; Masculinity; Peacebuilding; Post-conflict; Queer; Sexual and gender-based violence; Sexuality; UNSCR 1325; Violence

Introduction

Feminist scholars have long touted the necessity of employing a gender lens to better understand power and violence in global politics. Sexuality is an important dimension of these gendered power dynamics. LGBTQ (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender, and queer) perspectives in peacebuilding unsettle the assumptions about what is the “correct” or “normal” sexual orientation, gender identity, or family structure. Drawing on a multiplicity of LGBTQ voices to inform post-conflict responses allows for a more expansive approach to understanding what gendered insecurities look like and how best to respond to them. Centering LGBTQ communities in responses to conflict-related violence is also important when working to develop peacebuilding processes that move beyond the heteronormative patriarchal power dynamics that have historically resulted in violent conflict. LGBTQ perspectives in peacebuilding introduce voices generally marginalized or left out entirely.

Definition

Everyone has a sexuality, though Western society privileges heterosexual identities as “normal.” As such, states marginalize LGBTQ identities or even criminalize non-normative relationships and the behaviors of those with diverse sexual orientations or gender identities. Queer theorists also argue that sexuality influences global norms regarding how certain states or populations are “othered” in world politics resulting in racist violence against those deemed foreign to the nation (Puar 2007; Weber 2016). Sexuality is an important aspect of security in international relations, reaffirmed through nationalist claims to a “straight” state (Canada 2009; Picq and Thiel 2015; Peterson 1999). Those marginalized because of being a part of the LGBTQ community may experience economic, political, and social insecurities. Some states treat queer identities or those that are not heterosexual as perverse or a threat to society. Queer organizations work to overcome this by supporting LGBTQ individuals through art and activism, often filling gaps in support services where governments fail to care for those marginalized due to their sexual orientations or gender identities.

Efforts to bring a gender perspective to peace and security work often neglect how members of LGBTQ communities experience conflict, seek security, and work for peace. Those initiatives that address this shortcoming allow opportunities for intersectional feminist collaborations across movements to confront violence (Evans and Lépinard 2019). Although LGBTQ organizations are not often invited to peace negotiations, when given the opportunity, they can offer new ways of understanding peace and building a post-conflict society informed by the day-to-day needs of the queer community. To this end, “While conflict can exacerbate vulnerability and violence, many SGM [sexual and gender minority] individuals already experience high levels of physical and sexual violence in day-to-day life, be it from security forces, ideologically motivated groups, other citizens or even from their own families and communities” (Myrntinen and Daigle 2017 p. 17). This is especially true for those human rights activists who bring the needs of LGBTQ individuals to the national and international agenda.

Sexuality and Conflict Studies

Sexuality is one dimension of identity that is policed more aggressively during times of conflict (Amar 2014). Periods of post-conflict transition may result in backlash against minoritized sexual orientations or gender identities along with increased homophobia (Serrano-Amaya 2018). Homophobia is also a means of shoring up “traditional” patriarchal masculine norms (Slootmaeckers 2019). Vulnerability to sexual and gender-based violence is exacerbated for LGBTQ individuals in times of conflict. This was the case in Iraq following the US-led 2003 invasion (Human Rights Watch 2009). As Out-Right Action International reports, “Compared to the hundreds of thousands of other Iraqis facing persecution and threats to their lives and livelihoods today, LGBT Iraqis are at heightened risk both because of greater threats to them and because their ability to reach safety is reduced” (2014, p. 12).

Scholars who research sexuality have also examined how homophobia within society changes shape prior to and after conflict in cases such as The Troubles in Northern Ireland (Duggan 2012; Ashe 2018). Though this changing attitude can be challenging to measure, one method of doing so is looking at reporting on hate crimes over time. In her research about homophobia during and after The Troubles, Marian Duggan writes about how sexual minorities may be especially vulnerable to victimization due to the way they are constructed in society as “acceptable” targets of this violence. Duggan looks at hate crime statistics to measure this victimization (2012, p. 20). The post-conflict period may provide a time to shift these norms, rethink how sexual and gender minorities may be targets of hate crime, to then respond with the appropriate social supports and necessary legal regulations to confront this social discrimination. Peacebuilding work that takes these vulnerabilities seriously may be able to address insecurities more successfully. It is also important to consider the experiences of LGBTQ combatants in peacebuilding work (Thylin 2018). Including the full complexity of SGM experiences requires engaging with LGBT perpetrators as well as survivors of violence.

The Colombian peace process offers a valuable insight into the inclusion of LGBTQ perspectives in post-conflict peacebuilding work (Hagen 2017). LGBTQ organizations participated in conversations about the gendered dimension of the conflict during the peace process. This includes attention to how people are targeted violently because of their non-normative sexual orientation or gender identity as well as those targeted because of their assumed non-normative identities based on attributes like clothing, affect, or engagement with human rights advocacy. As a result, in some communities it is not safe for LGBTQ individuals to openly identify or be visible for fear of public backlash or targeted violence from the state.

LGBTQ Perspectives on (In)Security

Heterosexual assumptions about gender can lead to the erasure of queer experiences by scholars and policymakers. There is risk of invisibility especially for lesbian and bisexual relationships which in some contexts are seen as less serious because they do not involve men. This highlights the increased vulnerabilities certain women face because of their intersectional identities including sexuality, race, class, and disability. For example, trans women are at risk of compounded violence as a result of the intersection of homophobia, economic insecurity, and sexual harassment they are likely to face as documented in research with trans women in Lebanon (HRW 2019).

Following the passage of UN Security Council Resolution 1325 in 2000, there has been increasing attention to how gender matters to understanding peace and conflict. The resolution, which was the first of what is now 10 Women, Peace and Security resolutions (WPS), calls for a gender perspective in peace and security work by highlighting how this is important for building peace and responding to violence in conflict-related environments. In some cases, the move to implement a gender perspective has amounted to simply pushing for the need to include women in peace and security efforts. Given the poor representation of women in peace talks, peacebuilding in general, and peacekeeping initiatives, it is understandable that this has been a focus of WPS work. However, including women is not the same thing as ensuring peacebuilding initiatives promote an intersectional gender perspective. Furthermore, given the prevailing heteronormative framing of international politics, the default assumption is that women are heterosexual (Hagen 2016). There is little attention to LGBTQ individuals in WPS initiatives. In recent years, there have been some efforts to bring together LGBTQ organizing and WPS organizing by organizations like OutRight Action International (Davis and Stern 2018). Women's rights in Colombia have also provided shadow reports through CEDAW to help draw connections between women's rights organizing and supporting LGBTQ individuals (Shadow Report 2013). New visions for transitional justice are also emerging amid the push for LGBTQ rights in Latin America (Bueno-Hansen 2017; Fobear and Baines 2020). Nevertheless, there is the risk of cooptation of LGBTQ rights in post-conflict (Nagle and Fakhoury 2018).

Another important dimension of documenting LGBTQ experiences is acknowledging the challenge of creating universal categories for members of a diverse queer community. Historically, research about LGBTQ populations has focused primarily on categories of sexuality as defined by the West. Narrow and colonial frameworks of sexuality uphold the West as a place where LGBTQ communities exist and the Global South as a space where LGBTQ people only experience homophobic, biphobic, and transphobic violence. Peacebuilding efforts that center organizing by local LGBTQ individuals is one way to resist this binary framing while refusing colonial legacies of violence. In some communities in Pakistan, India, and Afghanistan, there are "underground movements" of LGBT communities (Munhazim 2020). In South Asian communities like this, a definition of LGBTQ visibility defined by a Western framework of coming out neglects these spaces and histories of diverse sexualities.

Summary and Future Directions

LGBTQ perspectives offer a lens for understanding power dynamics in global politics, especially for communities emerging from conflict. It is important to think about sexuality as a separate but interlinked, context-specific dimension of lived experiences along with gender, race, class, and ability. It is valuable for international actors such as funders, policymakers, and researchers to be intentional about supporting LGBTQ individuals by terms as defined by LGBTQ communities rather than setting top-down priorities from the international to the local. Security responses should be aware that LGBTQ communities will not look the same in all places, and therefore the approach to peacebuilding should be informed by feminist and queer organizing locally and regionally. Relatedly, in July of 2020 Independent Expert on protection against violence and discrimination reported based on SOGI (sexual orientation and gender identity), Victor Madrigal-Borloz, reported to the UN General Assembly the impacts of the COVID-19 pandemic on the human rights of LGBT and gender-diverse people. Madrigal-Borloz's reporting highlights how the pandemic can exacerbate social exclusion and violence along with the interaction with institutional drivers of stigma and discrimination against these communities furthering existing insecurities (A/75/258 2020).

Future directions for research in LGBTQ perspectives in peacebuilding should emerge from an intersectional understanding of gender in peace and security work. By focusing on LGBTQ experiences, future research about gender in peacebuilding can avoid the pitfalls of reproducing stereotypes about men and women as distinct sex categories with fixed behaviors attached to a binary framing of masculinity/male and femininity/female. Instead the complexity of LGBTQ experiences opens up the possibility to not only bring a more complete gender analysis to peacebuilding but also appreciate a diversity of sexual orientations and gender identities around the world.

Cross-References

- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

References

- Ashe, F. (2018). Reimagining inclusive security in peace processes: LGB&T perspectives (PSRP Report). Global Justice Academy, University of Edinburgh
- Amar, P. (2014). The security archipelago: Human security states, sexuality politics, and the end of neoliberalism. Durham/London: Duke University Press.
- Bueno-Hansen, P. (2017). The emerging LGBTQ rights challenge to transitional justice in Latin America. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 12(1), 126–145.
- Canaday, M. (2009). The straight state: Sexuality and citizenship in twentieth-century America. Princeton/Oxford: Princeton University Press.
- Davis, L., & Stern, J. (2018). WPS and LGBTQ rights. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace and security (pp. 657–668). London: Oxford University Press.
- Duggan, M. (2012). Queering conflict: Examining lesbian and gay experiences of homophobia in Northern Ireland. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Evans, E., & Lépinard, E. (Eds.). (2019). Intersectionality in feminist and queer movements: Confronting privileges. New York: Routledge.
- Fobear, K., & Baines, E. (2020). Pushing the conversation forward: The intersections of sexuality and gender identity in transitional justice. The International Journal of Human Rights, 24(4), 307–312. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13642987.2019.1673980>.
- Hagen, J. J. (2016). Queering women, peace and security. International Affairs, 92(2), 313–332.
- Hagen, J. J. (2017). Queering women, peace and security in Colombia. Critical Studies On Security, 5(1), 125–129.
- Human Rights Watch. (2009). “They want us exterminated”: Murder, torture, sexual orientation and gender in Iraq. New York: Human Rights Watch. <https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/iraq0809web.pdf>.
- Human Rights Watch. (2019). “Don’t punish me for who I am”: Systemic discrimination against transgender women in Lebanon. New York: Human Rights Watch. https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/report_pdf/lebanon0910_pdf.pdf.
- Munhazim, A. Q. (2020). LGBT politics in South Asia: Ground rules, underground movements. In M. Bosia, S. M. McEvoy, & M. Rahman (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of global LGBT and sexual diversity politics. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Myrntinen, H., & Daigle, M. (2017). When merely existing is a risk: Sexual and gender minorities in conflict, displacement and peacebuilding. London: International Alert.
- Nagle, J., & Fakhoury, T. (2018). Between co-option and radical opposition: A comparative analysis of power-sharing on gender equality and LGBTQ rights in Northern Ireland and Lebanon. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(1), 82–99.
- OutRight Action. (2014). When coming out is a death sentence: Persecution of LGBT Iraqis. New York: OutRight Action.
- Peterson, V. S. (1999). Sexing political identities/nationalism as heterosexism. International Journal of Feminist Politics, 1, 34–65.
- Picq, M. L., & Thiel, M. (2015). Introduction: Sexualities in world politics. In Sexualities in world politics: How LGBTQ claims shape international relations (pp. 1–22). London: Routledge.
- Puar, J. K. (2007). Terrorist assemblages: Homonationalism in queer times. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Serrano-Amaya, J. F. (2018). Homophobic violence in armed conflict and political transition. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Shadow Report To CEDAW Committee. (2013). A look at Women’s rights in Colombia: Executive report. Accessible at: https://www.wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2013/10/Report_CEDAW56_Colombia.pdf

- Slootmaeckers, K. (2019). Nationalism as competing masculinities: Homophobia as a technology of othering for hetero- and homonationalism. Theory and Society, 48(2), 239–265.
- Thylin, T. (2018). Leaving war and the closet? Exploring the varied experiences of LGBT ex-combatants in Colombia. Women, Gender & Research, 27(2–3), 97–109.
- Violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity during the coronavirus disease (COVID-19) pandemic, A/75/258 (28 July 2020), Available from undocs.org/A/75/258
- Weber, C. (2016). Queer international relations: Sovereignty, sexuality and the will to knowledge. New York: Oxford University Press.

Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka

Oliver Walton¹ and Waradas Thiagaraja²

¹University of Bath, Bath, UK

²University of Colombo, Colombo, Sri Lanka

Synonyms

Conflict in Sri Lanka; Ethnic conflict; Post-conflict reconstruction; Reconciliation; Sri Lankan peace process

Definition

Sri Lanka's long-running separatist war, which began in 1983 and lasted for 26 years, ended with a military victory for the government armed forces in 2009. Although the likelihood of a return to organized armed conflict remains slim and the country has seen its economy expand significantly, grievances from minority groups remain, and new societal conflicts have emerged. The Tamil separatist conflict was not the first instance of armed conflict in the post-colonial period: in 1971 and between 1988 and 1989, a youth-based movement in the south of the country, the Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP, lit. People's Liberation Front), staged two insurrections against the state. This entry analyzes a variety of international, regional, and local efforts to address these conflicts, using a detailed historical analysis of the varied waves of peacebuilding interventions to explore some of the limitations of global categories such as liberal and illiberal peacebuilding in the Sri Lankan context. In doing so, it highlights some important analytical biases that inform existing scholarship on peacebuilding in Sri Lanka.

Introduction

Sri Lanka's experience of conflict has provided scholars with a useful case study with which to explore shifting global conditions and approaches for peacebuilding. International peacebuilding in Sri Lanka intensified in the early to mid-2000s, at around the same time as academic interest in liberal peacebuilding was reaching its peak. As a result, the country became a prominent case study for exploring this model and highlighting its deficiencies. After the breakdown of an internationally backed peace process in 2006, and particularly since the end of the war in 2009, the Sri Lankan case has more recently become a “paradigmatic case of victor's peace” (Smith et al. 2020, p. 5) and has contributed to discussions around emerging concept of illiberal peacebuilding.

For the purposes of this entry, liberal peacebuilding will be used to refer to the mainstream approach to international peacebuilding which involves combining democratization, economic reform, and conflict resolution. Smith et al. (2020) have argued that illiberal peacebuilding can be contrasted with the liberal peacebuilding approach on the grounds that it is led by local actors, is economically oriented not toward neoliberalism but cronyism and corruption, and emphasizes inequality and order not liberty and equality. While acknowledging the benefits of using general concepts such as liberal and illiberal peacebuilding to explain and critique broad global policy trends, this entry will demonstrate how the experience of countries like Sri Lanka can also be used to reflect on the limitations of such categories. As Selby (2013) has argued, the liberal peacebuilding concept overstates the liberal content of these policies and (sometimes deliberately) underplays the geostrategic drivers of many liberal peacebuilding policies. Similarly, while pointing to very substantive changes in the underlying global realities for peacebuilding and challenges to liberal norms, the practical content of “illiberal peacebuilding” may exhibit many continuities with liberal approaches.

This entry uses Sri Lanka’s experience of conflict and peacebuilding over the five decades to caution against oversimplified renderings of a transition from liberal to illiberal peacebuilding. In doing so, it highlights several analytical biases that tend to inform and reinforce the liberal and illiberal categorizations. Ideas about a global shift from liberal and illiberal peacebuilding categories are at least partly sustained by a mismatch in analytical focus between academic studies of liberal peacebuilding (which tends to focus on international (Western) policymaking) and illiberal approaches (which are more focused on domestic actors). Furthermore, studies of liberal peacebuilding often ignore peacebuilding efforts that pre-date the upsurge of interest in international peacebuilding that occurred after the mid-1990s. In the case of Sri Lanka, this has led to a neglect of efforts to address earlier instances of conflict (notably the JVP insurgencies of the 1970s and 1980s). A fuller historical account can complicate linear narratives about a progression from liberal to illiberal peacebuilding. Revisiting cases like Sri Lanka can also highlight the ambiguities in the agendas and motivations underpinning international peacebuilding and demonstrate how the application of concepts like liberal and illiberal peacebuilding risks overplaying the importance of rhetorical commitment and intentionality to peacebuilding processes, neglecting the unintended consequences of these interventions.

The entry will proceed as follows. After providing a brief overview of conflict and peacebuilding efforts in the Sri Lankan context, the entry will examine four key periods – the first JVP insurgency and its aftermath (1971–1986), the aftermath second JVP uprising and responses (1987–1994), the civil war between the Government of Sri Lanka (GoSL) and the LTTE (1983–2009), and the post-war period after 2009 – before concluding with analysis and discussion.

Overview of Conflict and Peacebuilding Efforts

The legitimacy of the post-colonial state in Sri Lanka has been challenged by two major youth groups. The most prominent conflict was between the majority Sinhalese-led government and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE), the leading Tamil separatist group who were fighting for self-determination for the Tamil minority, concentrated in the Northern and Eastern Province. As Uyangoda (2005) has argued, the war between the Tamil insurgents and the GoSL can be viewed as a manifestation of mutually reinforcing ethnonationalist projects over the state – Sinhala Buddhist Nationalism and Tamil Nationalism (Uyangoda 2005). Estimates of the total number of people killed in the LTTE conflict vary considerably. The Uppsala Conflict Data Program estimates 60,000 deaths based on official data, while other studies argue that the real number of deaths is much higher than official figures (UCDP n.d.). Obermeyer et al. (2008), for example, argue that there had been 215,000 conflict-related deaths in the period before 2002.

The legitimacy of the state was also challenged by the JVP, representing the educated rural Sinhalese youth in the South, who felt systematically marginalized from access to resources and state power. The JVP staged two insurrections against the GoSL in 1971 and between 1988 and 1989, the latter of which came to an end when its leader was killed. The group re-entered party politics in democratic elections in the early 1990s. The conflicts both resulted in around 100,000 deaths and paved the way for continuous decay of democratic space for civil society. The actual numbers killed directly in both conflicts are disputed in the literature [see Moore 1993 and UCDP (n.d.)].

A Period of Failed Self-reintegration of JVP and Relapse into Violence (1971–1986)

Analysis of the conflict between the GoSL and JVP is rarely framed in terms of peacebuilding interventions. The conflict spanned two decades and prompted a range of “home-grown” comprehensive conflict response measures, the most successful of which were not intentionally designed to promote peacebuilding. The first JVP rebellion in April 1971 was immediately suppressed with thousands of its cadres killed or jailed (Venugopal 2010). Later in 1971, the government investigated the causes of the uprising, identifying education and employment as key drivers. The economic reforms introduced by the government were intended to address some of the causes of the conflict but in practice did very little to expand economic opportunities for young people. Targeted actions including rehabilitation classes and the decision to debar suspended sentences to ex-JVP members allowed some to gain public sector jobs but failed to provide widespread opportunities. In the name of reconciliation, following the 1977 parliamentary elections, the new UNP government granted an amnesty to JVP members, viewing them as “misguided youngsters.” The JVP soon returned to democratic politics, and the ban on the party was lifted the same year, allowing the party to contest the 1983 presidential elections before being banned again. The government’s peacebuilding measures ultimately failed in preventing the relapse of violence. The self-reintegration process initiated by the JVP itself was a more effective measure, which, combined with the expansion of the NGO sector around this time, enabled most of the JVP members and ex-members to become more engaged with the democratic process (Hill 2013). However, a lack of access to economic gains and political power remained major grievances and acted as central drivers of the second rebellion. Those conditions were aggravated by political instability, economic issues, and the government’s decision to exclude JVP from politics in 1983 due to their gaining popularity and the emerging Tamil separatist violence.

Successful Self-reintegration of the JVP (1987–1994)

The second insurrection between 1987 and 1989 was again crushed by the GoSL forces, killing between 20,000 and 60,000 people including the JVP’s key leaders (Hill 2013, p. 371). The new president, Ranasinghe Premadasa, opened negotiations with the JVP in 1989 and subsequently lifted the ban on the organization, which had been imposed in 1983. Although de-proscription was intended as a temporary measure to allow talks, this decision was never reversed. Hill (2013) argues that this unintended measure constituted the biggest and most positive step toward resolving the JVP conflict, by promoting the long-term reintegration of the group. Several other peacebuilding measures that were explicitly designed by the government to address conflict grievances proved less successful. One such measure includes the government’s effort to provide jobs for rural Sinhalese youth in the 1990s by establishing garment factories in the rural areas in the South. In practice, this intervention largely failed to address the grievances of the youth involved in the struggle since most garment factory workers were women while the JVP cadre was mostly men (Hill 2013, p. 362). Another failed measure was the establishment of the Rehabilitations of Persons, Properties and Industries Authority, which provided limited compensation for those who can prove with the death certificate that their relatives died during the conflict.

As Hill (2013) has argued, it was the successful reintegration process, caused in part by the de-proscription of the government, but also driven by other contextual factors including the JVP’s own success at organizing and growing public dissent against successive ruling governments, which can best explain the successful resolution of the JVP conflict. In an ironic twist, the JVP’s rehabilitation and later electoral success in the early 2000s led to them playing a central role in the disintegration of the 2002–2004 peace process between the government and LTTE (see Venugopal 2018).

Peacebuilding and the Tamil Insurgency

The Tamil conflict can be traced to a lack of safeguards to protect the rights of the minority Tamil community. Sri Lanka’s post-independence history has been read as a failure of the state to reconcile the interests of minorities with those of the Sinhalese majority. Bastian (1999) argues that this failure occurred at three levels: in terms of the failure of the state's institutions to generate a means of power-sharing between ethnic groups, in terms of the state's identity, and finally in the implementation of public policies.

From Local to "Regionalized" Peacebuilding: Indian Involvement

Even before the emergence of the fully blown military conflict between the LTTE and the GoSL in 1983, several government-led measures had been taken to address political marginalization of minorities (see Table 1 below). The Bandaranaike-Chelvanagam and the Senanayake-Chelvanagam Pacts, signed in 1958 and 1965, respectively, attempted to provide some form of regional autonomy for Tamils, but both were rejected by opposition parties. In 1966, the UNP attempted to reverse the Sinhala Only Act through the Tamil Language (Special Provisions) Act, but these changes were later thrown out by Prime Minister Sirimavo Bandaranaike in 1972. On coming into power in 1977, President Jayawardene called for an All Party Representative Conference (APRC), which finally generated talks in 1984 but had limited success due to growing violence and internal opposition inside and outside the government. An important feature of these efforts is none of these attempts were facilitated by external parties except the APRC in 1984 which saw the first Indian involvement, with the Indian Prime Minister Indira Gandhi making her good offices available to the parties (Robert 1985; Rao 1988).

The Tamil separatist struggle that had seen the birth of several paramilitary groups in the 1970s was transformed into a full-scale military conflict when Tamil militants ambushed and killed 13 Sri Lankan soldiers in July 1983 (Manor 1983, p. 450). This incident sparked a nationwide pogrom, involving widespread attacks by Sinhalese mobs on Tamil families and their properties and businesses. A series of failed peacemaking efforts followed the start of the civil war between the LTTE and the government. Peace talks were held in Thimphu in 1985 (the first time negotiations were held outside of the country) but quickly broke down due to a lack of trust on both sides and internal divisions on both sides (between the TULF and LTTE and as a result of nationalist pressure from the SLFP on the UNP government). The Sri Lankan government revived an earlier proposal for granting greater autonomy to the North and East through district councils, while the LTTE set out four principles for agreement: recognition of Tamils as a nation, recognition of the existence of the Northern and Eastern Provinces as Tamil homeland, recognition of the right of self-determination, and recognition of the right of Sri Lankan citizenship and fundamental rights of all Tamils in the country (Rothenberg 1998).

Indian engagement escalated after Thimpu and culminated in 1987 with the Indo-Lanka Accord signed between the GoSL and the Indian government, which attempted to resolve the conflict through an agreement to devolve power to the provinces (Venugopal 2003, p. 19). Crucially, however, the Accord did not involve representatives from the Sri Lankan Tamil community, and while it succeeded in disarming several Tamil militant groups, it failed to neutralize the LTTE, cementing their pre-eminence in the Tamil political and military arena.

An Indian Peace Keeping Force (IPKF) was sent to enforce the ceasefire, but this soon became embroiled in a protracted guerrilla war with the LTTE, who refused to accept the conditions of the Accord. India had effectively transformed from a facilitator of talks to a party to the conflict. The IPKF left in 1990 not only having failed to stabilize the North but also having succeeded in destabilizing the South by contributing significantly to fears about external intervention. These anxieties contributed to the second JVP uprising in 1989 (Bullion 1995; Bose 2002). The Indo-Lanka Accord also established the Provincial Council System, which, while promising to devolve power to the provinces, was stifled in practice. Arguably, the councils' biggest contribution to conflict has been to serve as a lightning rod for new conflicts and adding to nationalist insecurities about a potential threat to the unitary state (Goodhand, Klem and Walton 2016). This was the last major peacebuilding role played by India.

Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka, Table 1 Peace initiatives in Sri Lanka’s Tamil separatist conflict (1958–2009)

| Peace initiative | Type | Parties | Third party? | Key outcomes |
|---|---|---|------------------------|--|
| 1958 Banadaranaike-Chelvanagam Pact | Internal negotiations | Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP) from the government and the Federal Party of Sri Lanka | No | Opposition rejected and GoSL nullified the agreement due to the pressure from the Sinhalese hardliners |
| 1965 Senanayake-Chelvanagam Pact | Internal negotiations | United National Party (UNP)-led government and the Federal Party of Sri Lanka | No | Weaker agreement was rejected by the opposition and subsequently radicalization of Tamil youth |
| 1984 APC | Third party-facilitated negotiations (regional) | All Party Conference (SLFP, United National Party, Tamil United Liberation Front) | India as a facilitator | SLFP and TULF withdrawn support citing too much and too little, respectively |
| 1985 Thimpu Talks | Third party-mediated negotiations (regional) | Government of Sri Lanka, Eelam National Liberation Front (TELO, EROS, TELA, LTTE, EPRLF, TULF, PLOTE) | India as a mediator | Tamil groups walked away from the talks as Thimpu principles by Tamil militants and the proposals by government did not overlap |
| 1987 Indo-Lanka Accord | Third party agreement | India, GoSL | Indian intervention | Indo-Lanka Accord was signed, 13th Amendment to the constitution was introduced. Hostilities resumed as LTTE violated the ceasefire |
| 1989 LTTE-Premadasa Talks | Internal negotiations | GoSL and LTTE | No | IPKF was sent back and LTTE walked away from the talks, ceasefire violated, and hostilities resumed |
| 1995 LTTE-Kumaratunga Talks | Internal negotiations | GoSL and LTTE | No | LTTE violated the ceasefire and hostilities resumed |
| 2002 Ceasefire Agreement (CFA) and 2002–2003 peace talks | Third party-facilitated negotiations | GoSL and LTTE | Norwegian facilitation | CFA signed and SLMM was set up. Both parties violate CFA and peace remained fragile. Talks did not make significant progress on substantive political issues |
| 2006 Geneva Talks | Third party-facilitated negotiations | GoSL and LTTE | Norwegian facilitation | CFA reassurance talks, both parties violated CFA and full hostilities resumed |
| 2007 APRC Conference | Internal negotiations | All Party Representative Conference (Sri Lanka Freedom Party, United National Party, Tamil National Alliance) | No | APRC submitted proposals but these were never implemented |

Return to Local Initiatives: War for Peace and the Emerging Liberal Agenda

After the failure of Indian-led efforts, Sri Lanka returned to a locally led approach. In 1989 a brief round of talks was conducted between the Premadasa government and the LTTE. The IPKF were sent back to India as a concession for talks with the LTTE. The short-lived ceasefire quickly broke down, and war resumed. President Premadasa was assassinated in 1993. There was a brief cessation of hostilities after the election of the People's Alliance (PA) government in 1994, led by President Chandrika Bandaranaike Kumaratunga, who had won parliamentary and then a presidential election on a peace ticket. Negotiations were conducted between the LTTE and the government in 1995, but the government's proposals were rejected both by the LTTE and the UNP – the opposition party to the government. Rothenberg (1998) has argued that as with previous rounds of talks, the process was undermined by mistrust and internal rivalries. Furthermore, the talks were hampered by a lack of attention to procedural issues including a lack of preparatory talks, a failure of the government to send high-ranking officials in their delegations, and a lack of a clear agenda. Following the talks, the government began to pursue a military solution to the conflict, through its “war for peace” strategy, which the government returned to full offensive method war for peace which promised long-lasting peace by militarily weakening the LTTE.

The Kumaratunga government's peacebuilding efforts represented an early formulation of the liberal peacebuilding approach, by combining policies of state shrinkage, outward-oriented growth, and devolution of state power. While President Kumaratunga pursued a liberal peace agenda to the extent that she believed peace could be encouraged by pursuing policies of economic liberalization and promoting greater engagement with the global economy, she did so at the same time as limiting the role of international actors in the peace process (Rampton & Welikala 2009). Kumaratunga's attempts to liberalize the economy were not simply a product of her belief in the key tenets of the liberal peace but also an outcome of the withdrawal of foreign aid committed during her predecessor Premadasa's presidency (Shastri 2004, 76 cited in Rampton & Welikala 2009).

The Limits of Liberal Peacebuilding

A more internationalized mode of liberal peacebuilding emerged following the victory of the UNP in the parliamentary elections of 2001.

By February 2002, the government and the LTTE had signed a ceasefire agreement. Peace talks brokered by Norway followed in September of that year. The government de-proscribed the LTTE, and six rounds of peace talks were conducted between September 2002 and April 2003. During this time, Sri Lanka was viewed as a key site for the emerging liberal peacebuilding model. As a result, it saw an influx of interest from international donors and NGOs (Walton 2008) while also becoming regularly profiled as a case study through which to examine the liberal peacebuilding model in the academic literature (see Goodhand & Walton 2009; Stokke 2011; Goodhand et al. 2010; Newman et al. 2009).

The peace process was multi-faceted and involved security guarantees, efforts to support peace negotiations, mechanisms for monitoring the ceasefire, as well as the provision of development assistance. Total aid to Sri Lanka increased significantly after the ceasefire. In 2003, donors pledged $4.5 billion to help development and reconstruction in Sri Lanka, and delivery of these funds was contingent upon progress in peace negotiations. There was considerable variation in the motivations and approaches of aid provision from different donors. Many of the largest donors such as Japan, ADB, and the World Bank tended to channel funds through the GoSL and continued to work “around” conflict (Burke and Mulakala 2005). A smaller group of Western donors sought to work “on” conflict by focusing on reconstruction and rehabilitation in the North and East and pursuing measures aimed at improving governance, building civil society, and protecting human rights. The internal contradictions in donors' peacebuilding strategies were accentuated by Western governments' more hard-line response to international terrorism after the events of September 11, 2001. The peacebuilding strategies of a variety of Western donors including the USA, the UK, the EU, and Canada were undermined by moves to proscribe the LTTE (Goodhand and Walton 2009). There was often a large gap between the expressed aims of liberal peacebuilders and the actual outcomes of their interventions. The heavy internationalization of the peace process invigorated nationalist forces by heightening the perceived threat to Sri Lankan sovereignty. The cautious step-by-step approach embodied in the peace process also led to limited humanitarian and human rights gains for vulnerable populations in the North and East. In this sense, the 2002–2004 peace process has been described by some as a “virtual peace,” wherein there was a deferral of some of the fruits of the liberal peace project such as enhanced security via greater respect for human rights.

The newness of these approaches has arguably been overstated in the existing literature on liberal peacebuilding. While the 2002–2004 process was more formalized and generated more sustained commitment from the conflict parties, many of the core components (including the focus on a return to normalcy and improving the socioeconomic conditions of the North and East while exploring options for granting greater regional autonomy) replicated strategies pursued in previous rounds of talks. Another criticism of existing accounts of liberal peacebuilding has been a tendency to understate the importance of domestic actors and processes in shaping outcomes. As Goodhand and Walton (2009) have shown, the approach was not simply imposed upon the government from the outside; the role of domestic “importers” of the liberal peacebuilding model, including the Prime Minister Ranil Wickremesinghe and certain sections of civil society, was important.

During the third round of talks in Oslo, the LTTE expressed its willingness to explore a political solution based on a federal structure within a united Sri Lanka, representing a significant departure from the principles outlined in the Thimpu talks. These positive steps, however, were quickly reversed when the LTTE withdrew from the peace process in April 2003, in response to a decision to hold a donors’ seminar in Washington D.C. Since the LTTE had been banned in the USA, they were not permitted to send representatives. Anton Balasingham, the LTTE chief spokesman, argued that this represented a deliberate snub to the organization and was indicative of a broader strategic ploy by the government to corner the LTTE into an internationally backed “peace trap” (Balasingham 2004).

The peace process unraveled further after President Kumaratunga called a snap election in April 2004, which resulted in the defeat of the incumbent United National Front (UNF) government. The new People’s Alliance (PA) coalition relied on support from the JVP and was more critical of the peace process and the LTTE. The LTTE’s support for the process was also diminished both by the defection of its Eastern Command led by Vinayagamoorthy Muralitharan (known as “Karuna”) in early 2004 and the new government’s rejection of its Interim Self-Governing Authority (ISGA) proposals later that year. A “shadow war” between the LTTE with the Karuna faction began in the East, involving regular tit-for-tat killings between the two factions and an escalating number of political killings in the East.

The PA candidate, Mahinda Rajapaksa, won the presidential election in November 2005. Rajapaksa’s coalition, which relied on support from nationalist political parties, was less receptive to international engagement and more cautious about making concessions to the LTTE. Although three more rounds of peace talks were held during 2006, there was little progress, and the government increasingly began to act upon the strategic opportunity offered by internecine fighting in the East to weaken the LTTE through its illicit support of the Karuna faction (ICG 2008). Rajapaksa reversed the decision to merge the Northern and Eastern Provinces, focusing instead on the discredited Provincial Council System as his primary tool of devolution.

The Norwegian-facilitated peace process has been critiqued on several grounds. First, the heavy internationalization of the process undermined the domestic legitimacy of Ranil Wickremesinghe and helped to create conditions for the nationalist backlash that followed. Second, the strong emphasis on development and creating a “peace dividend” misread the incentives of the main conflict parties and failed to generate widespread economic benefits (particularly among more marginalized Sinhalese populations living in rural areas who were negatively affected by some economic reforms pushed through by the UNF government at the same time as the peace process) (Goodhand and Walton 2009). Third, the bipolar approach taken to peace talks excluded other groups such as the JVP and the Jathika Hela Urumaya (JHU) who then mobilized in opposition to the process. Fourth, the incremental approach, which deferred addressing core political issues while bringing about a return to normalcy and generating economic benefits, failed due to internal tensions among international actors and within the Sri Lankan government. The lack of a clear roadmap toward an agreement created uncertainty in which parties that opposed to the process could exploit and ultimately undermined public trust in the process. Fifth, as noted above, the process exposed internal divisions with the negotiating parties, both within the Sri Lankan government (between president and prime minister) and within the LTTE (with the breakaway of the Karuna faction). As the peace process broke down, Western donors became increasingly disillusioned with supporting peacebuilding in Sri Lanka, and many withdrew or reduced support after 2005. Cuts in Western aid have been offset by a growth in export credit loans and new funding from China and other regional donors such as Iran and Malaysia.

Return to War and Emergence of Illiberal Approach

A return to open hostilities began in 2006. By mid-July 2007, the GoSL had largely cleared the East of LTTE cadres, and military operations moved northward. By May 2009, GoSL forces had regained control of all LTTE-controlled areas in the north. Civilian casualties rose sharply as fighting pushed the LTTE back toward an ever-shrinking strip of the Mullaitivu coast. The LTTE's key leaders, including their chief Velupillai Prabhakaran, were killed in the final stages of the battle.

Rajapaksa's pursuit of a ruthless counterinsurgency strategy against the LTTE was dependent upon wider geopolitical shifts. Although Rajapaksa was heavily criticized by Western countries for abandoning the peace process, he was largely able to avoid any major political or economic costs by re-balancing Sri Lanka's external relations and cultivating new sources of support from countries such as China, Russia, India, Pakistan, and Iran, who were less committed to liberal goals. The Rajapaksa government continued to rely on the support of these players in the post-war period.

Following the end of the war in 2009, Sri Lanka quickly became viewed as an archetype for a new reason: "a paradigmatic case of victor's peace that contributed to early theorizing on illiberal peace-building" (Smith et al. 2020, p. 5). In the post-war period, Rajapaksa privileged national security, economic development, and regime consolidation over addressing the political grievances of minority communities. Lewis (2020) has examined the ideational roots of this illiberal turn in Sri Lanka and elsewhere, highlighting a number of key features – a rhetorical commitment to distinguishing friend and enemy (rather than seeking to resolve differences), an emphasis on centralized sovereign power (rather than devolved power), and an anti-liberal understanding of space. Responding to international pressure, Rajapaksa made some steps to address issues of accountability and reconciliation by appointing a Lessons Learnt and Reconciliation Commission in 2010. This body consulted widely and produced recommendations, but very few were implemented. The process was seen by many as a cosmetic exercise to deflect international criticism.

Military spending continued to rise sharply during this period, and former LTTE-held areas remained heavily militarized. Rajapaksa sought to reframe the problems facing the North and East in economic terms and committed his government to an ambitious program of large-scale infrastructure, funded largely by commercial borrowing. Some of these projects, including the new port in Hambantota, were of questionable strategic value and were largely backed by Chinese loans. Spending on infrastructure drove high growth rates after 2009, but the fruits of this growth generally failed to improve the condition of the poor, particularly those living in the former conflict zones. Household survey data from 2016 showed that the conflict-affected regions of the North and East remained the poorest, while another study showed limited job creation or private sector growth in the North and East (Sarvananthan 2016). The large-scale infrastructure development, while providing some benefits to the South and Western Provinces, also fueled corruption and led to growing indebtedness. Rajapaksa sought to strengthen his position as president by amending the constitution to remove democratic checks and balances and abolish the two-term limit.

After taking a nearly decade-long authoritarian turn, a democratic revival appeared on the cards after Mahinda Rajapaksa lost the 2015 presidential elections to a former ally and unity candidate Maithripala Sirisena who had joined forces with the UNP led by Ranil Wickremesinghe. This “good governance” coalition also successfully defeated Rajapaksa in the later parliamentary election in August 2015 and promised to introduce a new constitution that abolished the executive presidency, addressed minority grievances, and reformed the electoral system while restoring democratic governance and law and order. Although some limited progress was made on some aspects of this ambitious agenda, the new coalition struggled to hold together in the face of growing opposition from the “Joint Opposition” led by Rajapaksa. The process of returning land and forming a consensus around the need for political reform was slow, and the prospects for state reform and a referendum on a new constitution were undermined further after local elections held in February 2018, which saw a new party established by Mahinda Rajapaksa – the Podujana Peramuna (SLPP) – winning 239 out of 340 contests (Goodhand and Walton 2017). This result precipitated a political crisis and intensified infighting between the president and prime minister, leading to an attempt by the president to unilaterally replace the sitting Prime Minister Ranil Wickremesinghe with the former president, Mahinda Rajapaksa. Although this “constitutional coup” was eventually blocked by the Supreme Court, Rajapaksa’s return to power seemed assured after Mahinda Rajapaksa’s brother, the former defense minister, Gotabaya Rajapaksa, won the presidential election in November 2019.

Summary

The application of the liberal and illiberal peacebuilding concepts to Sri Lanka has underplayed the importance of locally and regionally led peacebuilding efforts implemented in Sri Lanka and the agency of local actors. As a result, earlier local efforts have either been ignored by the peacebuilding literature or simply elided with liberal approaches adopted in the latter part of the conflict. The Sri Lankan case highlights clear differences between the liberal and illiberal approaches, which are most apparent at an ideological and rhetorical level. Liberal peacebuilders espoused a commitment to a negotiated settlement and maintained a much greater commitment to democratic plurality, media, and civic freedoms. In contrast, since the end of the war in 2009 in particular, the Rajapaksa-led government has remained committed to the centralization of sovereign power and a re-casting of the “ethnic conflict” as a terrorist problem, by drawing a sharp dividing line between “friend” and “enemy” in official discourse.

Despite these differences, these liberal and illiberal categories are normative frameworks that obscure strong continuities in practice between the liberal and illiberal approaches to peacebuilding and conflict management. First, although the Rajapaksa government has clearly diverged from the liberal approach by denying the ethnic drivers of conflict, in both approaches, development has been presented as a core strategy for overcoming tensions between social groups or addressing challenges facing marginalized populations. Both the liberal peacebuilding approaches in the 2000s and the government’s response to the JVP uprising in the 1970s and 1980s identified youth unemployment and education among socially marginalized groups as key causal drivers of conflict. Second, within both the liberal and illiberal frameworks, peacebuilding responses have focused primarily on containing organized armed violence, neglecting less visible forms of violence including gender-based or sexual violence, or violence against sexual minorities has been neglected. Third, although the emerging illiberal model has been presented as a domestically driven alternative to the internationally driven peace process of the early 2000s, in practice, both approaches are the result of complex interactions between “importers” and “exporters”: just as Western countries promoted and facilitated liberal peacebuilding measures, the Rajapaksa government drew inspiration and support from foreign powers committed to the protection of state sovereignty including China, Russia, and India.

As well as highlighting some of the limits of the dominant peacebuilding concepts and categories, Sri Lanka’s experience also highlights the tendency for existing analysis to exhibit a strong analytical bias within discussion of liberal peacebuilding toward the exploration of Western-backed or Western-led initiatives, which is then contrasted with an analysis of illiberal efforts, which focuses primarily on locally driven initiatives. The pre-2002 antecedents of liberal peacebuilding (which pursued similar strategies but were driven by local actors) are generally underplayed in existing accounts. Furthermore, existing accounts often underplay the illiberal aspects of these internationalized interventions. These include the decision taken by many Western countries to proscribe the LTTE in the early 2000s, the provision of covert military support to the GoSL, and the failure to launch an effective collective response to human rights abuses and war crimes committed after the war resumed in 2006.

The Sri Lanka case highlights the tendency for peacebuilding narratives to neglect certain key episodes of violence at exclusion of others. As discussed in our analysis of interventions to address the JVP conflict, some of the most effective measures were not intentionally designed to address conflict. Conversely, other intentional peacebuilding efforts such as the IPKF intervention of the late 1980s or the internationalized peace process of the early 2000s had unintended negative consequences, acting as a spur to a nationalist backlash which led to renewed conflict between the state and JVP in the late 1980s, and facilitated the rise of Rajapaksa after 2005. These examples highlight how approaches to understanding peace and conflict could benefit from widening their gaze to examine the intended and unintended consequences of a wider range of interventions, including both interventions designed to promote peace and those with other goals.

Cross-References

- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Mediation
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

References

- Balasingham, A. (2004). War and Peace: Armed Struggle and Peace Efforts of the Liberation Tigers, Fairmax Publishing Ltd., London.
- Bastian, S. (1999). The Failure of State Formation, Identity Conflict and Civil Society Responses – The Case of Sri Lanka, Centre for Conflict Resolution Studies, Department of Peace Studies, University of Bradford Working Paper Series, No. 2.
- Bose, S. (2002). Flawed Mediation, Chaotic Implementation: The 1987 Indo-Sri Lanka Peace Agreement. In Stedman, S, Rothchild, D and Cousens, E. Ending Civil Wars. The Implementation of Peace Agreements, International Peace Academy/Lynne Rienner, Boulder, Colorado, pp.631–659.
- Bullion, A. (1995). India, Sri Lanka and the Tamil Crisis, 1976 – 1994. Pinter, London.
- Burke, A., & Mulakala, A. (2005). Donors and peacebuilding in Sri Lanka, 2002–2005. In Goodhand, J., Klem, B., Fonseka, D., Keethaponcalan, S.I. and Sardesai, S., 2005. Aid, Conflict, & Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka, 2000–2005 (Vol. 1). Colombo: Asia Foundation
- Goodhand, J., & Walton, O. (2009). The limits of liberal peacebuilding? International engagement in the Sri Lankan peace process. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 3(3), 303–323.
- Goodhand, J., & Walton, O. (2017). The tangled politics of postwar justice in Sri Lanka. Current History, 116(789), 130–135.
- Goodhand, J., Korf, B., & Spencer, J. e. (2010). Conflict and peacebuilding in Sri Lanka. London: Routledge.
- Goodhand, J., Klem, B. & Walton, O. (2016). Mediating the margins: the role of brokers and the Eastern Provincial Council in Sri Lanka’s post-war transition. Third World Thematics: A TWQ Journal, 1(6), 817–836.

- Hill, T. H. J. (2013). The deception of victory: The JVP in Sri Lanka and the long-term dynamics of Rebel reintegration. International Peacekeeping, 20(3), 357–374. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2013.830024>.
- ICG (2008). Sri Lanka's Eastern Province: Land, Development and Conflict. Asia Report N° 159 – 15 October 2008.
- Kearney, R. N. (1985). Sri Lanka in 1984: The politics of communal violence. Asian Survey, 25(2), 257–263.
- Lewis, D. G. (2020). Sri Lanka's Schmittian peace: Sovereignty, enmity and illiberal order. Conflict, Security and Development, 20(1), 15–37.
- Manor, J. (1983). Sri Lanka: Explaining the disaster. The World Today, 39(11), 450–459.
- Moore, M. (1993). Thoroughly modern revolutionaries: The JVP in Sri Lanka. Modern Asian Studies, 27(3), 593–642. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0026749X00010908>.
- Newman, E., Paris, R., & Richmond, O. P. (Eds.). (2009). New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Obermeyer, Z., Murray, C., & Gakidou, E. (2008). Fifty years of violent war deaths from Vietnam to Bosnia: analysis of data from the World Health Survey Programme. British Medical Journal, 336, 1482–1486 (28 June).
- Rampton, D., & Welikala, A. (2009). Colliding Worlds: Sinhala Nationalism and Populist Resistance to the Liberal Peace in the Southern Polity. In J. Goodhand, B. Korf & J. Spencer (eds.) Conflict and peacebuilding in Sri Lanka: caught in the peace trap?, Routledge, London.
- Rao, P. V. (1988). Ethnic conflict in Sri Lanka: India's role and perception. Asian Survey, 28(4), 419–436. <https://doi.org/10.2307/2644736>.
- Rothenberg, D. M. (1998). Negotiation and dispute resolution in the Sri Lankan context: Lessons from the 1994–1995 peace talks. Fordham International Law Journal, 22, 505.
- Sarvananthan, M. (2016). Elusive economic peace dividend in Sri Lanka: all that glitters is not gold. Geo Journal, 81(4), 571–596.
- Selby, J. (2013). The myth of liberal peace-building. Conflict, Security & Development, 13(1), 57–86.
- Shastri, A. (2004). An Open Economy in a Time of Intense Civil War: Sri Lanka 1994–2000. In Winslow, D. & M. Woost (eds.) (2004) Economy, culture, and civil war in Sri Lanka, Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Smith, C. Q., Waldorf, L., Venugopal, R., & McCarthy, G. (2020). Illiberal peace-building in Asia: A comparative overview. Conflict, Security and Development, 20(1), 1–14.
- Stokke, K. (2011). Liberal peace in question: The Sri Lankan case. Liberal Peace in question: Politics of state and market reform in Sri Lanka. London: Anthem.
- UCDP. (n.d.). Uppsala conflict data programme dataset. <https://ucdp.uu.se/conflict/352>. Accessed 27 Apr 2020.
- Uyangoda, J. (Ed.). (2005). Conflict, conflict resolution and peace building: An introduction to theories and practices. Development Cooperation in the Context of Crisis and Conflict, study no. 03. Colombo: GTZ Sri Lanka in collaboration with Improving Capacities for Poverty/Social Policy Research (IMCAP) and Department of Political Science and Public Policy, University of Colombo.
- Venugopal, R. (2003). The Global Dimensions of Conflict in Sri Lanka. Working Paper Number 99, QEH Working Paper Series – QEHWPS99. Available from <http://www3.qeh.ox.ac.uk/pdf/qehwp/qehwps99.pdf>.
- Venugopal, R. (2010). Sectarian socialism: The politics of Sri Lanka's Janatha Vimukthi Peramuna (JVP). Modern Asian Studies, 44(3), 567–602. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0026749X09004028>.
- Venugopal, R. (2018). Nationalism, Development and Ethnic Conflict in Sri Lanka. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Walton, O. (2008). Conflict, Peacebuilding and NGO Legitimacy: National NGOs in Sri Lanka: Analysis. Conflict, Security & Development, 8(1), 133–167.

Liberal Interventionism

- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions

Liberal Peace

- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences

Liberal Peace and Its Critiques

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester, Department of Politics,
Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Everyday peace; Hybridity; Liberal peace; Liberal peacebuilding; Peace formation; Post-liberal peace; Statebuilding

Definition

The ethical underpinnings of liberal peace have driven its critical development into new areas of peacemaking and peacebuilding.

Introduction

There has been a widespread, local dissatisfaction with what the liberal peace represents for its subjects in conflict-affected environments. This became very evident in local and qualitative, social, economic, and political terms, as much as contemporary, methodologically and theoretically sophisticated, and locally grounded research now illustrates (see Chandler 2006a; Pugh 2005, 2008; Pugh et al. 2008b; Cooper 2007; Jahn 2007; Duffield 2007; Mac Ginty 2008; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2007). It contradicts the orthodox, institutional and elite level, state-based approaches often deployed and reflects the events that have unfolded in situations as diverse as East Timor, Bosnia, Kosovo, or Cambodia.

In many post-violence environments, local perceptions of the liberal peace project and its state-building focus indicate it to be ethically bankrupt, subject to double standards, coercive and conditional, acultural, unconcerned with social welfare, and unfeeling and insensitive towards its subjects. Indeed, it may even have incited resistance, reflecting the common emergence of a local postcolonial narrative about liberal peacebuilding's endorsement of an international-local relationship, configured as managers and subjects. This entry explores the everyday nature of sustainable peace – focused on a culturally appropriate form of individual or community life and care. This points to the need for either a form of liberal peace with a broader social contract or, more ambitiously, one that transcends liberal and neoliberal, Western biases, deploying postcolonial and ethnographic tools (Richmond, 2011). It might aim at producing an emancipatory, empathetic, everyday politics embodied in governance frameworks spanning local to global scales, reflecting hybridity and power relations, but also foreground local political claims for emancipation from violence, whether political, economic, social, or cultural (MacGinty and Richmond, 2013; UN 2018).

The Ethics of the Liberal Peace

The liberal peace framework rests upon conceptions of liberal-internationalist thought, on liberal-institutionalism, on the democratic peace hypothesis and free trade, on international law, and on the balance between individual freedoms and regulations. These are embedded in liberal thinking and in the state, via a liberal social contract. It draws heavily on the Western philosophical and political debates that emerged from the writings of Hobbes, Machiavelli, Abbe St Pierre, Kant, Rousseau, Locke, Paine, Penn, Cobden, Mill, Bentham, and Grotius, amongst others, in the context of cycles of war, diplomacy, state-building, imperialism, and colonialism (see Brown 2002; Howard 2002; Ceadal 1987). In academic and policy writings related to peacebuilding and state-building, it is normally taken to signify, in Wilsonian terms (Link 1983a, p. 525; Link 1983b, pp. 536, 537), the processes, actors, and 'technologies' associated with humanitarian intervention, with security sector reform (and DDR), and with institution building, good governance, democratisation, rule of law programming, human rights, reconstruction, development, and free market reform (Boutros-Ghali 1992, 1996; United Nations, General Assembly 1994, 1995, 2004).

There are four main strands of thought contained within the liberal peace framework from which these components are derived. These include the 'victor's peace', the 'institutional peace', the 'constitutional peace', and the 'civil peace' (see for more from supporters and critics of liberal peace: Richmond 2005; Doyle 1983; Doyle and Sambanis 2006; Call and Cousens 2008; Krasner 2004; Paris 2002, 2004, Snyder 2000; Rieff 2002; Mandelbaum 2002; Pugh 2005; Chandler 1999; Duffield 2001; Mac Ginty 2008; Jahn 2007; Cooper 2007). These combine to form the liberal peace model, each contributing to a different area of governance. The liberal peace is differentiated from the liberal democratic peace in that it offers a broader focus, not just on domestic political institutions and their international implications but on the character of peace in civil and societal, political, economic, and international spheres. This has been the model and loose ‘consensus’ that internationals have attempted to apply in UN peace operations – from Cambodia in the early 1990s to East Timor and Afghanistan more recently – and also via other international and regional organisations since the end of the Cold War, with very limited outcomes (see Richmond and Franks 2009; see also Brown 2002; Howard 2002; Ceadal 1987; Boutros-Ghali 1992, 1996; United Nations, General Assembly 1994, 1995, 2004; see Richmond 2004 on the peacebuilding consensus). In practice, the first three strands of the liberal peace framework dominate peacebuilding, with a focus on security, institutional, and constitutional reform. These dictate the significance of international regimes, organisations, and law, and democracy, the rule of law, human rights, and the free market. Liberalism is understood to be aspirational, and the liberal peace is always framed by the state and the market.

The civil peace is, however, a key part of this agenda as it supports the liberal peace’s emancipatory claims and legitimacy, being derived from local agency as well as international liberal norms. The civil peace is derived from the phenomena of direct action, citizen advocacy, and mobilisation and from the attainment or defence of basic human rights and values. Within the liberal peace context, it indicates individual agency within an international organisation, agency, or NGO context or within the market, rather than community agency, which it itself is deemed to carry problematic cultural baggage. It also represents and underlines the old contractual dilemmas between the state and the citizen and of self-government, self-determination, and pluralism.

These intellectual strands offer different levels of engagement with the ‘everyday’ and with ‘care’. They indicate conservative, orthodox, and emancipatory graduations of the liberal peace. The conservative graduation offers basic security, while the emancipatory graduation offers social transformation. The conservative graduation of the liberal peace is associated with top-down and heavily externalised approaches to peacebuilding. These have been widely accepted as a transitional necessity in most post-war environments. Illiberal transitions towards liberal institution building are key to this approach (Paris 2004, p. 188) (as have been seen in Somalia, the Balkans, Afghanistan, and Iraq). Conservative graduations of the liberal peace offer basic everyday security but little care.

The orthodox graduation of the liberal peace focuses on top-down institution building. Bottom-up approaches engaging with civil society are relatively widespread, but international actors focus on the development of the liberal state, its institutions, and a neoliberal economy. This is rights based and developed through conditionality. It tends to be justified by the argument that security, order, and institutions always come first. These are derived from the praxis of internationals not locals, for whom ownership of the liberal peace is eventually envisaged (see Hutchings 2000 on the ethics of care). This model is exemplified by the UN family’s practices of peacebuilding and governance reform, which started at the end of the Cold War and in particular culminated in the Kosovo mission and UN sovereignty for a time over East Timor. The orthodox graduation offers significantly more engagement with its subjects over a broader range of issues, denoting potential for an everyday peace. Assuming security matters have been assuaged by this point, this establishes institutions that provide care, relating to governance and public services but within the confines dictated by neoliberal marketisation.

The next graduation represents a more critical form of the liberal peace. This emancipatory model is concerned with needs as well as rights (and a blurring of the line between these categories) and a much closer relationship of custodians with local ownership. This is a bottom-up approach with a strong concern for social welfare and justice. It equates to the civil peace and generally is not state led but shaped by NGOs, trade unions, advocacy, and social movements. Here the everyday and care become the major concerns of peacebuilding, though this treads a fine line between providing what external actors believe to be suitable versions of care, according to their external understandings of the everyday, and what recipients may want. However, this comes closest to engaging with the notion of an everyday ethic of peace.

The liberal peace framework and its graduations converge on a notion of peace as governance. This is both biopolitical and governmentalising in the Foucaultian sense of these terms, reordering state and society via the alphabet soup of agencies, organisations, and institutions. The framework relies on the concepts of territorial statehood and sovereignty and on dominant states in the international community. These assume that the epistemology, ontology, and methods associated with the liberal peace are on ethically firm ground. Its parameters suggest an end to violence and, through the liberal state formulation, an everyday form of peace, which engages with the local, its cultural dynamics, welfare needs, and environment. Thus, it leads to the social contract inherent in a liberal state. This has been extended into a claimed automatically ethical blueprint for its transferral to non-Western, non-liberal polities. Yet, it is also a disciplinary framework that often rests on coercion, a lack of consent, conditionality, and the prioritisation of elites over the interests of the many. As such criticisms emerged in the 1990s, the more recent ‘light footprint’ approach in Afghanistan has been interpreted as a scaling back of the governmental claims of the liberal peace, but similar values remain in the internationals’ approach even there (see Tadjbakhsh and Schoistwohl 2008; Suhrke and Borchgrevink 2009; see as example Statement of H.E. Dr. Han Seung-soo, President of the 56th Session of the General Assembly, at the 55th Annual DPI/NGO Conference ‘Rebuilding Societies Emerging from Conflict: A Shared Responsibility’ 2002).

The ethics of liberalism suggests the ‘good life’ in which individual privileges denote freedom to act politically, economically, and socially, within a liberal governance framework, which constitutionally guarantees human rights. Yet, the governmental and institutional imbalance in the very highly specialised context of post-conflict states undermines this ethic of freedom and often stifles local voices and their concerns about peace. Many of the subjects of recent state-building experiments regard the liberal peace as an ideology that degrades into violence because its universal aspirations are not mirrored on the ground (Richmond and Franks 2009). This results in the re-securitisation of the post-conflict liberal state, whereby politics is deemed to start from security and institutions, rather than from social justice, community, and everyday life. Thus, the politics of the liberal peace are perceived to represent the maintenance of existing normative and political hierarchies at the local, national, and global levels. This makes its subjects complicit in anti-democratic and anti-self-determination processes. They are tied to the state and to institutions that do not represent the local as either a civil society or as an everyday context (see for more Caroline Hughes 2009).

This is particularly exaggerated in the liberal peace’s most conservative, militarised forms – as praxis in Afghanistan or Iraq illustrated. It is also the case to some degree even in its orthodox, more institutionalised forms as in Kosovo, East Timor, or Bosnia (Tadjbakhsh and Schoistwohl 2008). In extreme cases it is associated with ‘liberal war’ (Williams 2006). Its post-Cold War moral capital, based upon its emancipatory claims, has been squandered as a result, and its basic goal of a liberal social contract undermined. Since 9/11 attention has been diverted into other areas, and many, perhaps promising peace processes, have regressed. This also diverted attention away from a search for alternatives, for forms of peace, and for empathetic strategies, through which the liberal blueprint for peace that has loosely emerged might coexist with alternatives. This might also be seen to be in line with policy objectives, as in the example of the United Nations Security Council (2001) report of the then Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, which pointed to the need for ‘comprehensive peacebuilding’ that goes far beyond security and state-building but also leads to social transformation.

Developing an Ethical Account Through Eirenism

Such a search, via critical research agendas for peace termed here eirenist [from the Greek word for peace eirene/Ειρήνη], indicates the need for an ethical re-evaluation of the liberal peace. ‘Eirenism’ was used by Erasmus as a call against religious chauvinism after the Reformation (see Kende 1989). Erasmus believed that rulers were often responsible for war and that a political system was required to prevent them from opposing the wishes of their subjects. He believed that rulers should not treat their territories as private property and should be concerned with the welfare of others. He believed speaking and praising peace and condemning war should be normal social practice as well as state practice. In a modern context, eirenism provides a lens through which one can evaluate the claims, apparent or hidden, of a particular epistemology, concept, theory, method, or ideology. Subaltern voices, political claims, and positionality are essential in order to identify the root causes of conflict, to describe their impact, and to determine the reconstruction of legitimate authority as well as the provision for public, material, and justice requirements. The failure to apply such a tool has led liberal peacebuilding approaches into a paradoxical situation. They have reinstated social and economic class systems, undermined democracy, and caused downward social mobility (as explained in the examples of East Timor and Afghanistan below). Yet, liberal peace’s Renaissance and Enlightenment underpinnings make clear that the state system of territorial sovereignty, the approximation of democracy, human rights, and free trade, also carries a humanist concern with social justice and wide-ranging pluralism (often to be guaranteed by an international organisation) (Kende 1989, p. 236).

An eirenist perspective offers a different view of recent peacebuilding experiences and data. For example, a range of UN and UNDP thematic or country-focused reports has shown liberal peacebuilding had less impact on everyday life than is often claimed by its institutional proponents, the donor and development communities, and particularly the international financial institutions. In East Timor after the crisis of 2006, a UN report conceded that, despite a lengthy and costly UN involvement, there since 1999:

poverty and its associated deprivations including high urban unemployment and the absence of any prospect of meaningful involvement and employment opportunities in the foreseeable future, especially for young people have also contributed to the crisis. (United Nations, Security Council 2006, p. 9)

A report from the same period on Afghanistan by the UN Secretary General ignored any direct engagement with such issues in favour of traditional political and security concerns, with the exception of one telling reference:

The failure of development actors to ensure that quieter provinces in the north and west receive a tangible peace dividend has played into the latent north-south fault line within Afghanistan. (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2007, p. 6)

This report’s later sections on development, human rights, and humanitarian issues or human security focus on orthodox issues relating to institution building or emergency problems (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2007, parts V, VI, VII). Accordingly, the transition in Afghanistan was under ‘...increasing strain owing to insurgency, weak governance and the narco-economy’ and the government needs to ‘...restore confidence to the population in tangible ways’, but this is conceptualised as being derived from:

stronger leadership from the Government, greater donor coherence — including improved coordination between the military and civilian international engagement in Afghanistan — and a strong commitment from neighbouring countries, [without which] many of the security, institution-building and development gains made since the Bonn Conference may yet stall or even be reversed. (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2007, p. 17)

This list of priorities, focusing on security, terrorism, narcotics, and then the orthodoxy of the liberal peace as a subsequent priority (governance, development, reconciliation, and human rights abuses in this order), effectively places a local peace dividend for communities and individuals as a distant and lesser priority and disconnects its importance from the conduct of democratic politics and the legitimacy of the state (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2007, para. 74–84). This is because the liberal peace's primary goal in its intervention into the local or domestic is actually an international order between sovereign states. This is to be achieved ideally through the construction of a liberal social contract to produce domestic and international order. In practice, what has been achieved in post-conflict environments are the shells of liberal states, reproducing international order but achieving a virtual peace in a domestic context – at least in the short to medium term, as the examples above and of Cambodia and Bosnia aptly illustrate.

An irenist perspective also sheds lights on the ethical and policy metanarratives about liberal peace, derived from the founding myths of Westphalia, its state-centric elitism, its focus on territorial boundaries and sovereignty, and its disciplinary nature. R.B.J. Walker (personal communication, 2008) has described this as a 'moment of exclusion'. The concept of peace has generally been subject to utopian or dystopian assumptions, and the notion of the liberal peace has emerged as an 'auto-ambivalent' compromise (Williams 2006, p. 215). It has been imbued with a specific set of interests, partly through the decontextualisation of classical political theory to support inherency arguments about conflict, or confirm liberal norms of market-democracy, and a propensity to reshape rather than engage with non-liberal others. This also validates territorial state sovereignty and a social contract skewed in favour of the state, free markets, and the eradication of the indigenous or locally more authentic traits (often through property rights) (Boucher 2006, p. 157), amongst other tendencies (see Jahn 2006a). This has been used to promote a culture of governmental and securitised institutionalism rather than promoting a broad peace (often by rejecting Kant's peace federation or by confirming territorial sovereignty) (Franceschet 2006, p. 92) or an everyday peace (MacMillan 2006, p. 71). It has supported the classical liberal view that liberal states and peoples are effectively superior in rights and status to others and extended these arguments to allow for the justification of direct or subtle forms of colonialism, interventionism, and local depoliticisation to occur (Jahn 2006b, p. 203; see also Chandler 2006b, p. 36). A civil and emancipatory peace might arise through liberalism, as Foucault (1976) argued, but more often it leads to violence of a structural or direct nature in non-liberal contexts. In practice it also may have negative effects on self-determination and agency (Duffield 2007, p. 27).

This is as opposed to the potential of peace being empathetic, emancipatory, and resting upon an ontological agreement and hybridity (meaning the development of an ontology that is not exclusive but is open to difference) (see, e.g. Connolly 1991, p. 64). These latter qualities imply that the agents and recipients of the liberal peace are able to relate to each other on an everyday, human level, rather merely through problem-solving institutional frameworks that dictate or negate lived experience.

What has emerged from the more critical literatures is a suggestion that an ethical reading of peacebuilding requires a willingness to recognise local ownership, human rights, culture, and social and grassroots resources for self-government as significant even in relation to the priorities of military or institutional capacities and international order. This infers an engagement with the everyday, to provide care, to empathise, and to enable emancipation across scales (Sylvester 1994, pp. 315–334). These objectives are integral to the liberal peace in theory, but in practice asymmetries inherent in its top-down nature, elite governance and complicity with local elites, are more visible. The position that emerges from the above argument enables an investigation of modifications to the liberal peace without necessarily calling for its abandonment (though post-structural work indicates continuing dissatisfaction with the inherent biases of even a moderated liberal form of peacebuilding).

However, other serious issues also arise with any attempt to retain while modifying the core of liberal peacebuilding. The neoliberal co-option of the liberal peace, its lack of social welfare frameworks, failure to mediate cultural difference, and tendency towards assimilation rather than local cultural engagement, means that it is often exceptionally abrasive when transplanted, as recent experience in Afghanistan and Iraq illustrates. In addition, there is a serious issue with its incapacity for environmentally sensitive engagement. It might be said that the conservative end of the liberal peace spectrum, as with liberal imperialism, has become an exercise in hubris for the internationals, Western states, donors, agencies, and NGOs that propagate it, mainly because it lacks these sensitivities. Ethically, moving beyond these limitations, this would amount to an ontological commitment to care for others in their everyday contexts, based upon empathy, respect, and the recognition of difference. This commitment to care has instead been displaced by a parsimonious orthodoxy that offers its participants the unproblematic right of interpreting and making policy for unknowable others, normally defined as states rather than people or communities. This is why the liberal peace is mainly focused on an international or regional peace, rather than an everyday form of peace.

What needs to be considered in terms of attempts to reform liberal peace is how to identify the rights, resources, identity, welfare, cultural disposition, and ontological hybridity that would make liberal states, institutionalism, and governance viable in everyday liberal and non-liberal contexts. This requires an engagement with not just the currently fashionable and controversial issues of local ownership or local participation but the far deeper 'local-local' (i.e. not merely a veneer of internationally sponsored local actors and NGOs constituting a 'civil' as opposed to 'uncivil' society), which allows for genuine self-government, self-determination, democracy, and human rights.

As Walker has argued, IR theory fails when it attempts to present a truth as anything other than a 'historically specific spatial ontology' (Walker 1992, p. ix). The paradox of thinking about peace in contemporary conflict is that governance and state-building require an instrumentalist need for theory and practice to offer progress from a war system to peace system in advance of its engagement with a specific conflict context. This means that great care must be taken to separate this intention with a historical or ideological blueprint approach to peace that is then transplanted into conflict zones. Of course, most policymakers would deny that any such blueprint exists. This raises the broader question of how developing an account of peace can engage with the other without falling into an Orientalist and coercive syndrome or disregarding local context. Thus, 'peace' as a concept offers a contradiction: it requires a method, ontology, and epistemology, which are negotiated locally but prompted externally by agents who must engage with the other but cannot know one another (at least in a short time and at the depth of detail required for such ambitious relationships).

This does not mean that the elements of the liberal peace may not be broadly applicable but that the assumption that they are should not be made a priori. The negotiation of a single and universal concept of peace may be a worthy goal, but it also may be as much a chimera as Einstein's 'unified field theory'. A Hobbesian permanent modernity of the post-Civil War environment that Hobbes was familiar with would not be an acceptable peace to many today, and neither would a hegemonic peace that was predetermined, equally permanent, and not reflective of the myriad of groups, interests, cultures, and dimensions of the local or of international relations. Yet, the liberal peace has become an intervention in local discussions about peace, often replacing them entirely with the views of a transnational peacebuilding class and the institutions they are part of. This is indicative of a deeper contest over interpreting and governing the other. As Bleiker (2005, pp. 77–78) points out, this does not mean completely abandoning the realist, security-focused mode of thinking, but it does involve contextualising it and seeing it as only one of the many components of peace. The liberal peace is predicated upon the disciplinary enterprise of constructing rights for its epistemic communities of policymakers, analysts, academics, officials, and other personnel, to interpret and make policy on their behalf. Much of this move has been predicated upon the desire of this community to emancipate the other from war, violence, and unstable political, social, and economic structures, to set an example, as well as to govern (Dillon 2005). The orthodoxy has been to accept mainly rationalist approaches, and certainly not to question this privilege (Appadurai 2001, p. 6). Opening up this question – as has already occurred in some disciplines such as anthropology (see Geertz 2001) – illustrates how ethical evaluations indicate and underline the problem of IR as a potentially ‘Orientalist’ discipline and its main methodological problems in dealing with others, difference, and the everyday. A growing body of literature points to the problems of liberalism and its version of peace in this context (see Jahn 1998; Bishai 2004; Geuss 2002).

If the liberal peace is to be salvaged, it would have to offer a more pluralist debate on its own alternatives, a via media between itself and them, and would also have to offer a technology of governance that is broadly representative of all actors at multiple levels, public and private, gendered and aged, and of multiple identities. This would mean it would adopt a potentially hybrid localised identity to counterbalance its global or governmental metanarrative of cosmopolitanism, with commensurate implications for its claimed boundaries, rules, rights, freedoms, and norms. This might mean it would accrue more everyday legitimacy, which might be then formalised in governmental, institutional, or constitutional structures and legal frameworks, which would rest primarily upon a ‘new’ social contract. This legitimacy would rest upon its provision of social, cultural, economic, and political resources sufficient to meet the demands made upon it by its local, everyday, constituencies and an international community of which they should be a stakeholder. It would also rest upon an international social contract, while not displacing indigenous legitimacy with preponderant institutions that are inflexible and actually obscure the local and the everyday. But such a framework should not then be set in stone but instead must be seen as an evolving form, focusing on an everyday peace, and the necessary emancipatory and empathetic structures and institutions this may require.

The difficulty with this ethical repositioning of the liberal peace from an eirenist perspective is that it no longer represents the ‘really existing’ liberal peace in contemporary post-conflict environments, which have come to rest upon ‘biopolitics’, the ‘administration of life’, and ‘governmentality’ (Foucault 1991). This points to the problems inherent in universal frameworks for peace, engaging with others while avoiding orientalism, neocolonialism, or an over-reliance on predatory institutional frameworks at the expense of everyday life. Thus, liberal peacebuilding and international security elevate elites and institutions over societies and everyday life. This failure is often equated by its recipients with colonialism or hegemony and identified as representative of dominant Western culture and ideology. A broader social justice is perceived to be absent, and it fails to achieve any form of care (Allan and Keller 2006a, p. 196). It is unable to communicate across cultures, rests upon a legalistic framework, disassociates law from local norms, attempts to preserve the pre-existing Western liberal order, and claims a problematic universality (Allan and Keller 2006b, p. 212). As a result it fails often to provide even ‘thin recognition’, let alone mutual consent. What is missing is dialogue and communication – indeed a discourse ethic of empathetic self-emancipation in an everyday context. The liberal concept of ‘toleration’ over difference, as the word implies, is too limited to produce pluralism or hybridity, and liberalism’s link with sovereignty and the state and its homogenising tendencies provide other constraints. Issues such as welfare and culture are ignored as a result, meaning that the liberal peace is not an everyday peace.

Because of its ethical ambitions of enabling emancipation after achieving security and building institutions, the liberal peace is increasingly seen as caught up in an organisation and governmental praxis, being ideological, and deploying a metanarrative, which provokes resistance amongst what it portrays as powerless local agents (see Gowan 2008). This postcolonial critique doubts the claims of the emancipatory graduation of liberal peace but rather sees its use as legitimating its conservative and orthodox graduations.

This challenges the liberal peace's implied claim that progress from a conservative version, based upon military and diplomatic processes (equated with a negative peace), to an orthodox liberal state-building process and then to an emancipatory version of the liberal peace (positive peace) will occur. The liberal social contract endeavours to accrue legitimacy for the regulatory institutions of governance required by offering mainly political rights to individuals as sufficient enticement for them to acquiesce to the liberal state project. This works on the assumption that the freedoms derived from political rights are more significant than need or material gain for individuals in post-conflict situations. The emancipatory graduation of liberal peace does offer the potential for reflection on the ethical implications of this, but it is in this top-down, institutional format that liberal peacebuilding fails to adequately consider the requirements for a social contract beyond political rights for grassroots actors in their everyday context. As a result their consent is often lacking, and the legitimacy of the liberal peacebuilding project is undermined. This eirenist reading points to a need to return the everyday to the praxis of emancipation.

A Post-Liberal Peace: The Everyday and Hybridity

As the liberal peace is on uncertain ground what is needed is the addition of an eirenist and ethical repositioning of this project. An eirenist perspective is aimed at opening up a discussion of what form of peace is inferred by its peacebuilding praxis. The following section offers some thoughts on a post-liberal peace, which are perhaps a more suitable response to the sorts of critiques outlined above.

A more radical post-liberal peace lies 'beyond Westphalia' (see Lyons and Mastunduno 1995). This argument was made in the early post-Cold War context but has recently faded in the light of the many problems that have emerged with the liberal project and in a new moment of inclusion and its related ethical practices. This reflects and extends the historical expansion of the concept of peace that has occurred, from the medieval 'Christian peace', the Renaissance humanist, and 'non-infidel' peace, to the utilitarian peace, the peace based on reason, and then later concerns with disarmament, international organisation, civil society, labour movements, and social transformation (see for more Kende 1989). The interdisciplinary agenda dictated by an ethical critique of the liberal peace probably cannot develop while clinging to notions of a territorially bounded, sovereign, and state-centric international space. The everyday, society, and community are distant to such discussions.

This is not to foreground a search for a new metanarrative of peace. Plant (1992, pp. 157–158) warns that most critical and 'revolutionary' thinking displays a concern with new metanarratives based upon a '...nostalgia for truth, meaning, immediacy, and liberation'. These are often depoliticising, as with the contemporary praxis of the liberal peace. Instead, this approach highlights the importance of local voices and narratives (not just local elites) and enables self-government, self-determination, empathy, care, an understanding of cultural dynamics, and the everyday. In these senses, developing a more sophisticated understanding of peace connected to the liberal universal project, or with multiples and hybrid forms of peace, can be connected to an excavation of the model self and the states of exception that might impact upon it, rather than merely a focus on the state as its organising principle. This is not to say that the regulation of boundaries, the construction of viable states, and the modern state system's location of the self are not significant but to offer another significant location of forms of peace. Of course, it should be acknowledged that the everyday and the local are 'fuzzy' concepts, requiring more research in order to open up more critical understandings of peace.

There are a range of dynamics stemming from this attempt to respond to the ethical issues that the praxis of the contemporary liberal peace has given rise to and to begin imagining the modifications that this may involve. More radically, it raises the question of where alternatives to the liberal peace agenda may be derived from, and what they may entail. In this respect, areas such as gender can be read as requiring a radical restructuring of representation across political, social, professional, and economic spheres and within the public-private/agency-structure and care debates. Similarly, environmental debates generally point to the unsustainability of many political, economic, and social practices that lead to the consumption of non-renewable resources, irreversible environmental harm, and reflect an unequal demography of consumption. Focusing on marginalised actors such as children raises the question of their agency within the broader adult-dominated structures of IR, and whether and how they can be represented. The problem of poverty has of course long been linked to a tendency for violence, relative deprivation, and frustration-aggression. It also refreshes the debates about whether relative economic equality is a component of peace, whether welfare should be centrally organised, or whether it should be left to markets and individual capacity to remedy. Behind all of this is the lurking question of whether liberal paradigms are able to engage with and represent equitably postcolonial or non-liberal others – those for which it infers a lesser status.

The incorporation and study of intersubjective issues has necessitated methodologies that facilitate research that examines how individuals, societies, and communities operate within this context. For example, the adoption of discourse analysis and ethnography allows for greater, and culturally appropriate, access to everyday life and to facilitate a clearer understanding of how institutions and their creation or development affect the individual, communities, and society. Yet, ethnographic methodologies in IR are generally taken to have achieved little more than providing an overview of civil society actors, or how war, conflict, and violence affect individuals and groups, and often research is heavily oriented towards official statistics and reports, which themselves tend to be compiled via mainstream statistical approaches (often based on very limited local data). However, there are notable exceptions, particularly amongst PhD students at institutions such as at the various centres at University of Bradford, University of Queensland, or University of Uppsala, PRIO (to name but a few), who increasingly appear to favour in-depth local studies as part of their research, along with a group of scholars working in development and peace and conflict studies, who increasingly are moving away from, or had little association with, the formal discipline of IR (see in particular Nordstrom 2004). Where ethnography is applied, it is often marginal, though the sort of ‘institutional ethnography’ that Escobar (1995, p. 113) has called for is now slightly more common. Such research may open up a clearer understanding of what motivates individuals and social groups to enter into conflict, criminality, and grey/black markets or to develop a more harmonious existence with their neighbours. Does this mean the end of liberal institutional governance? This is a provocative question, which indicates a need for peacebuilding actors, and developed world academics can gain a clearer understanding of the everyday and its dynamics. This requires that local academics and policymakers beyond the already liberal international community are enabled to develop theoretical approaches to understanding their own predicaments and situations, without these being tainted by Western, liberal, and developed world orthodoxies and interests. In other words, to gain an understanding of the indigenous and everyday factors for the overall project of building peace, liberal or otherwise, a via media needs to be developed between emergent local knowledge and the orthodoxy of international prescriptions and assumptions about peace.

Using the notion of the everyday might enable a response to the constraints of the liberal peace but also represents an alternative site of knowledge for peacebuilding. One contribution can be found in the work of de Certeau. He argues that the practices of everyday life are distinctive, repetitive, and unconscious. He focuses on productive and consumptive activities, rather than culture or resistance – two other interpretations of everyday life. For de Certeau (1984, p. xi) the everyday is about how individuals navigate their way around and try to create space for their own activities while taking into consideration institutions of power. People are able to adapt and take ownership over structures and institutions so that they begin to reflect their own everyday lives rather than reflecting structural attempts at assimilation. This reappropriation through the everyday then becomes a site of politics and represents a move from subjects to active citizens, from depoliticisation to self-government and self-determination. He outlines strategic and tactical forms of behaviour vis-à-vis the everyday. Institutions operate in a strategic manner to which people adopt tactical responses. A strategy offers a relatively inflexible dominant order which is physically manifest and controls significant material resources. It is thus embedded in a dominant order. However, because the goal of a strategy is to maintain itself, this creates the need for individuals to find ways of 'domesticating' them, while it causes the strategic actor to need individuals to become predictable, homogenous, and malleable. De Certeau also points out that strategy and tactic (i.e. institution and individual) only have very indirect contact with each other. Effectively, they become distant and engaged in assimilation or resistance. This binary represents politics in this subsequently fragmented terrain. For him, tactics representing the everyday are hindered by hegemonic institutions but are unencumbered by their material weight. Thus, the everyday tactic is more flexible and able to adapt more quickly than centralised strategies and methodologies. They are more personal and invisible to eyes that are attuned to orthodoxies of state and power. The tactical in the everyday is a diffuse form of politics, not institutionalised but able to shape, resist, and choose institutions and strategies (de Certeau 1984, Chapter II).

A post-liberal agenda entails a praxis that would enable political, social, and economic organisations and institutions to represent and respect the communities they are effectively in a contractual relationship. At the same time this would seek to enable the tactical flexibility de Certeau outlines. As a consequence, international forms of peacebuilding would be more likely to be participatory, empathetic, locally owned, and self-sustaining, socially, politically, economically, and environmentally speaking. They would be enabled to provide a via media between different identities and interests. They would also be adaptable to changing circumstances and needs. As far as possible, these interlocking and interrelated versions of peace would also provide justice and equity and avoid violence both direct and structural. This would either counterbalance or supplant the liberal peace's obsession with hard security, territorial sovereignty and statehood, and institution building over the everyday. This might, in liberal terms, lead to a modification of current global state-building agendas and a refocusing on the needs at the civil level, rather than mainly on rights. More likely it would entail an everyday tactic of engagement between liberal states and non-liberal alternatives, or locally imagined polities that provided for political, economic, and social requirements in their immediate context – whereby the strategy approximates the tactic, the institution responds to the characteristics of the local via an ethic of care. It is difficult, from a liberal and critical position, to image this being achieved without some conception of democracy, law, human rights, and development or welfare support. A deeper contextualisation of peace may allow for a hybridised localised and internationalised praxis of peacebuilding to emerge that are more locally sustainable, resilient, and legitimate than what has been the result of the recently evolved liberal peacebuilding/state-building praxis. There are indications of these opportunities in the evolving systems of peace – some of which are modifications to, or alternatives to, the liberal peace. This is not to supplant the already existing research agendas dealing with everyday issues, such as neo-patrimonialism, rent seeking, spoilers, criminality, militias, or corruption, but to provide a balance to the general tendency to essentialise mainly contractual or institutionalised rights-based responses to these, which then spill over into the core everyday life in its 'civil' rather than 'uncivil' senses.

The hybridity outlined above necessitates the development of a system that protects difference and allows for exchange and cooperation in a way in which all its participants believe is beneficial for their needs, to define themselves and cooperate with others (see, e.g. Connolly 1991, p. 10). This is a difficult a problem as it involves mediating relations between differently bounded and comprised units subscribing to different forms of peace. It signifies that it is unlikely that a universal form of peace will persuade everyone.

It also connects to the more common research agenda on a just peace (Allan and Keller 2006b, pp. 16–17). Such research generally argues that justice through peace is preferable to justice through war and the most marginalised provide guidance to the powerful in understanding what peace means. A just peace is normally taken to require respect for free speech and human rights, and individuals have primacy over states in terms of their rights, freedoms, and participation. It acknowledges that recognition is a central part of peace, as are the way in which categorisations are made to include or exclude others (Keller 2006, p. 49). Of course, recognition implies reconciliation, but the latter cannot occur before the former (Keller 2006, p. 51). The language of Western liberal institutionalism, or of sovereignty, alone is a doubtful basis for a just peace, because these offer obstacles to the recognition of certain others, favour liberals, and continue the process of marginalisation. Reconciliation cannot stem from this (hence, the inability of states to recognise even their own native peoples). Again, this points to a need to engage with the everyday. Allan also adds a requirement for a global concern with care to the concept of the just peace (Allan 2006, p. 91). This care ethic supersedes a positive peace in liberal terms, drawing on the eponymous feminist concept (see Gilligan [1982] 1993). This, he argues, can be seen in the liberal discourses relating to the needs for recognition, a culture of non-violence and respect for life, solidarity, economic justice, tolerance and equality, and common empathy between human beings (Allan 2006, p. 126). Tolerance and solidarity coalesce within care, according to Allan (2006, p. 127), in that difference and uniqueness are accepted, and sympathy for the difficulties of others and a willingness to assist are present. This also connects with pre-existing debates on human security, particularly its emancipatory aspects (Tadjabksh 2005, p. 10). This reflects the agenda in international documents such as the Responsibility to Protect (International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty 2001). The questions are who will provide this care and who will define its reach, terms, and definition. International institutions, policymakers, states, NGOs, agencies, and scholars are currently part of an embryonic version of this process, though with differing approaches. Focusing on what this means in everyday life might prevent this from becoming another ‘hegemonic’ agenda.

The notion of care has a number of facets, invoking both a moral association and solidarity. The Hegelian notion of a struggle for recognition is certainly significant, in that it leads to equality and mutual understanding and respect (see for more Taylor 1992). As Dallmayr (2004, pp. 100–101) argues, it is possible to draw out an intellectual connection between the Stoic notion of ‘self-care’ in relation to freedom. As Foucault ([1984] 1986) argued in his last works, freedom can be taken to be the ontological condition of humanity in everyday terms relating to self-care and care for others. He argued that this was an Enlightenment replacement for the cultivation of the soul (lost in modernity) and is analogous in particular with self-government (see also Connolly 1991, pp. 10, 57). This is not to imply that Foucault’s concept of the ‘care of the self’ is an alternative conception of ethics but a position from which to engage in a constant critique of any attempt to establish order – even the author’s own attempts to develop an everyday notion of peace. A post-liberal peace would therefore contain a feedback process and engage in constant adaptation. Indeed, Szokolczai (1994, p. 9) has argued that Foucault’s entire project was to show how, from Socrates onwards, European thinking has been aimed at ‘...wak[ing] others up from the slumber in which they conduct their everyday existence...’. This is aimed at the transformation of the self, echoing Walker’s (personal communication, 2008) comments about a post-liberal peace’s connection with the excavation of the modern self. This reproduces self-government rather than regulation (though, more problematically, it might also be equated with neoliberal approaches to economic self-help). This may be taken as a critique of political liberalism and of its grand interventionary strategies on behalf of others, or less radically it may be taken as an attempt to replace the liberal technology of regulatory governance (biopower), which results in restriction and cold institutionalism, with a more emancipatory version of liberalism. Either way, these goals are connected through the everyday and require empathy.

Both would require radical methodological change. They indicate, as Bauman (1993, p. 34) has argued, that ‘...the moral is what resists codification, formalisation, socialisation, and universalisation’. Translated into peace, this has far-reaching ethical consequences. The ethics of peace are therefore not found in exporting institutional governance as technology, or ‘branding’ exercises (for democracy, neoliberalism, human rights, and rule of law). They reside instead in the empathy and care of human relations, in ‘unscripted conversations’ (Duffield 2007, p. 234) about self-government and reflected in the informal relations of individuals and communities in the official framework of the polity and its own relations with other polities. This fluidity resists formal institutions and boundaries unless mutual care and empathy provides their everyday ethic. Thus, rather than merely being a contest over rights and rules, an ethical version of peace would be heavily influenced by specific contexts in balance with responsive international institutions and norms (Gilligan [1982] 1993, p. 2). This would, of course, need a constant process of negotiation and would have to include a broad range in voices from the local to the global. This would perhaps involve global elites, officials, and states taking responsibility for the reframing of their interests and activity by the poor, powerless, and marginalised and their everyday concerns (Dallmayr 2004, p. 110).

What the everyday, a just peace, and the care of the self exposes in the context of the juxtaposed liberal peace project is its general tendency to harvest power and resources for politicians, officials, experts, and institutions. This forms a liberal discourse that removes individual and societal agency at the expense of empathy and care and, therefore, of a sustainable peace. This is a side effect rather than the goal of liberal governance in the specialised circumstances of its export to post-conflict environments, but the net effect is the displacing of community, culture, identity, and welfare in favour of external discourses of expert knowledge. These are tinged by their own ideology, culture, and interests. The everyday, empathy, and care therefore unsettle liberal institutions, rather than merely confirming them, but add additional dimensions and sensitivities and the ontological dimension that they imply. It is important to remember that Foucault saw care in the context of self-governance as a way of escaping, or moderating, the hegemonic tendencies of liberal social and political governance. Power and resistance are entangled within liberal polities, but empathy and an aspiration towards self-government, especially within a ‘deep civil society’ (the local-local) derived from a more empathetic engagement, offers a conceptual way forward without delving into a new grand narrative of ethics and with an eye on the everyday as a contested site of identities, care, empathy, as well as interests.

One common criticism of arguments concerned with prioritising the local and the everyday is that such inclusivity and openness in peacebuilding environments may be relatively inefficient compared to the sort of progress that can be made via more limited and reductionist prioritisations of needs and issues (such as those encouraged by the orthodoxy of liberal peacebuilding). Slow progress or constant political infighting is taken to undermine progress towards a centralised unity, as can be seen in the context of the tribal networks and the deliberations of the loya jirga in Afghanistan (see for more Freeman 2011) or in Iraq, where tribal leaders have also had some involvement after early criticism that government, whether by the coalition or by ‘local’ actors, was extremely limited in its representation of the range of Iraqi groupings (see Chandler 2006b; Conetta 2004). Stalemate rather than progress is the result according to this view of the dangers of the local, undermining reform and institution building, and the development of liberal governmentalism. The examples of Bosnia, Kosovo, and East Timor show that both a deferment to the local and a retention of powers amongst the internationals can be very problematic (see Richmond and Franks 2009, chapter 1–4). In these cases local tensions retarded or blocked reform or co-opted the state project for ethnonationalist agendas. International direction of peacebuilding did little better, however: either empty institutions were built, which were not then taken up at the local level, or resources were deployed in ways that often depoliticised the local [as Chandler (2006b, p. 36) has shown in the context of Bosnia] or had little impact on the local. In all of these cases, attempts have been made to involve the local, while simultaneously depoliticising it by failing to deal with everyday issues. Local actors in these cases have, while acknowledging the benefits of peacebuilding and state-building in some areas, tended also to see this as undermining the legitimacy of their peace process; as depoliticising, undermining their right of self-determination and human rights; as portraying a lack of respect for their cultural norms; or as examples of either hegemonic or ideological Western conditionalities. These indicate serious dilemmas, which the post-liberal peace might avoid in its concern for the everyday. The evidence points to the need to better understand the local and its contextual everyday before internationals begin directing reform, institution building, or providing services, which may not meet local everyday needs. Blaming the local – whether directed at elites or at civil society – for lack of a progress towards a liberal peace is to miss the point of local politics and the contours of everyday life.

A research agenda is needed, which engages with an understanding of the dynamics of the relationship between the liberal and the local and of the interface between the two in terms of everyday life for local communities and actors, as well as for more abstract institutional frameworks. This ‘liberal-local interface’, and the nature of peace that it suggests, requires extensive and ongoing consultation and research in order to develop these ideas so that they are ready to be negotiated, accepted, rejected, and constructed when and where it becomes necessary. When internationals engage in conflict zones, they might ask disputants how many different levels of the polity might be included, what type of peace could be envisaged, what and how care might be provided, and what is needed to understand, engage, and support everyday life. Security, institution building, democratisation, the rule of law, human rights, marketisation, and development might be constructed from these informed perspectives. This would have to occur in the explicit context of responses to the root causes of the conflict [even within an indeterminate world, as Plant (1992, p. 186) points out], meaning that peacebuilding occurs at two starting points. Rather than mainly stopping overt violence from threatening regional stability, it would concurrently establish an understanding of a local and everyday peace. This would require a conversation between disputants and internationals, avoiding any exclusionary practices, to undercover a consensual discourse ethic and praxis by which a post-liberal peace might be achieved. This appropriateness would be negotiated from the perspective of the internationals, custodians, and other interventionary actors and, most importantly, local actors, and not necessarily to pre-existing models, agendas, or scripts.

Rather than producing bare life (see amongst others Sylvester 2006, p. 67; Agamben 1998), critical research agendas for peace [or see Critical Peace Research (CPR) by Jutila et al. (2008)] offer an eirenist reading of the connected areas required for the consideration of the possibilities inherent in post-liberal forms of peace, as in the liberal-local hybrid and its interface suggested above. These aim to reflect and become embedded within everyday life and the societies it affects. This may seem naïve to many working within a more orthodox tradition, but to others who are working around these traditions, resistance to these ambitions seems naïve – destined to repeat the traumas of realist or liberal ‘history’. As Jabri (2007, p. 268) has shown, this version of peace engenders a capacity to resist violence and to struggle for a just social order that goes far beyond the endeavours of a liberal ‘international civil service’. It represents the everyday issues and solidarity of individuals, communities, and social movements. For Jabri (2007), it is this solidarity that produces a more sophisticated form of peace. Indeed, this indicates that individuals and communities have primacy over states in terms of their rights, freedoms, and participation (Allan and Keller 2006b, pp. 16–17). Thus, recognition is a central part of the way in which categorisations are made to include or exclude others (Keller 2006, p. 49) (think of the way non-state groups such as the Turkish Cypriots, the Kurds, the Palestinians, and many others have often been excluded from peace processes on such grounds). Recognition implies empathy, care, and, thus, reconciliation, but the latter cannot occur before the former, and little can be achieved without a contextual understanding of the everyday (Keller 2006, p. 51). The limitations of liberal and neoliberal versions of peace mean that the state is empowered to interrupt this ethic of care, solidarity, and empathy at its borders and tends to focus on risks rather than opportunities. In building an empathetic, emancipatory peace, utilising an eirenist lens, considering the everyday provides some guidance around the pitfalls and biases reflected in the liberal peace and its borders. A good example of this can be found in documentation such as the Responsibility to Protect (International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty 2001) report, which operates to extend liberal norms and governance to non-liberal others, on the assumption that represents a universal process of conflict resolution (see for more Connolly 1991, p. 218 on ‘non-territorial democracy’ as a possible way of overcoming the ‘bordering’ that occurs in the liberal peace). This would surpass the current focus on the state, territoriality, and institutions and reconnect with the local—a hybrid and post-liberal peace.

Conclusion

Effectively, what this implies is a ‘local ethic of peace’, resting on the legitimacy of a wide array of interconnected local and non-local practices and the mediation of any tensions that obviously exist between them. From this insight there emerges a recognition of the ongoing development of local-liberal/international hybrid forms of peace, which have significant implications for peacebuilding and state-building.

With this in mind, critical policies for a post-liberal peace might engage with the following:

1. A detailed understanding (rather than co-option or ‘tolerance’) of local culture, traditions, and ontology; and acceptance of peacebuilding as an empathetic, emancipatory process, focused on everyday care, human security, and a social contract between society and the polity, which acts as a provider of care rather than merely security.
2. In addition a peacebuilding contract between internationals and local actors, which reflects the social contract within the polity.
3. Thinking about peace beyond the liberal state mechanism (rather than using peace to propagate liberal states).
4. Local-local ownership of a local, regional, and global process of peacemaking or of an agreement.
5. Local decision-making processes to determine the basic political, economic, and social processes and norms to be institutionalised.
6. International support for these processes and guidance on technical aspects of governance and institution building without introducing hegemony, inequality, conditionality, or dependency.
7. An economic framework, focusing on welfare and empowerment of the most marginalised, should be determined locally. Internationals may assist in free market reform and marketisation/privatisation not on the basis of external expert knowledge but on local consensus, but they should also introduce a socioeconomic safety net immediately to bind citizens and labour to a peaceful polity (rather than to warmaking, a grey/black economy, or transnational criminal activities). Otherwise, neoliberalism clearly undermines any social contract and leads to a counterproductive class system.
8. Any peacebuilding process must cumulatively engage with everyday life, care and empathy, as well as institutions.
9. Items from 1 to 8 should result in a process whereby a localised peace is installed that includes a version of human rights, rule of law, a representative political process that reflects the local groupings and their ability to create consensus, as well as broader international expectations for peace (but not alien 'national' interests).

10. Overall, these points imply the development of a liberal-local hybrid and a commensurate interface in each context.

To some extent, these points reflect the potential of the liberal peace, but they also emphasise the need to construct local consensus before blueprint thinking or policies are developed or applied. This causes one of the key paradoxes of peacebuilding: the institutions needed for it pre-exist most peace processes, and therefore, they carry their own blueprint of norms and assumptions about what constitutes peace processes (even if peacebuilders may try to avoid this). This means that it may be difficult to achieve the points above with existing peacebuilding actors, but of course it is also implausible that they should be created anew for each case. What this means is that peacebuilding actors themselves must also be subject to a set of requirements to prevent them from treating every case as the same and to actualise or at least simulate a social contract between internationals and local populations of post-conflict areas. The above agenda requires the following from peacebuilding actors:

1. That care, empathy, welfare, and a consideration of everyday life are the basis of a social contract required between societies, emerging post-conflict polities, and internationals.
2. Peacebuilding actors must not work from blueprints but should develop strategies based upon multilevel consultation in each case. They should develop relations with local partners, which would reach as far as possible into a local society, enabling grassroots representation. They should endeavour to see themselves as mediatory agents, whereby their role is to mediate the global norm or institution with the local norm (academics and peacebuilding policymakers should avoid overstating the applicability of blueprint-type models but instead engage more with local knowledge in an empathetic manner).

3. Peacebuilding actors also operate on the basis of the norms and systems they are trying to instil, such as democracy, equality, social justice, etc. Theorists and policymakers cannot ever be beyond methodological ethics and must acknowledge peacebuilding's reflexive qualities.
4. Theorists and peacebuilding actors need to move from an institutional peace-as-governance agenda to an alternative or at least additional everyday agenda. Putting communities first entails a rethink of the priorities of peace. In terms of peacebuilding, this would place human needs, particularly economic and security needs, before free market reform and in parallel to democracy, second-generation human rights, and a rule of law that protects the citizen and not just wealth. This would probably require the creation of social welfare-oriented peacebuilding institutions, funded by donors and other international actors whose interests are ultimately a self-sustaining peace.
5. Finally, peacebuilding should not be used as a covert mechanism to export ideologies of peace but instead should seek open and free communication between post-conflict individuals and peacebuilders about the nature of peace in each context.

The consideration of such issues requires the opening up what Duffield (2007, p. 234) and others have referred to as 'unscripted conversations' untainted by hierarchy, hegemony, and problem-solving. This is crucial if empathy is to be carried through communication, policy, and institutions, via critical policies for peacebuilding towards an everyday peace. Pugh et al. (2008a) have argued that this requires 'permanent critique' (Plant 1992, p. 87) and a broader wariness of grand narratives, even in the guise of responses to crises (Plant 1992, p. 114).

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peace and Political Unsettling
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality

References

- Agamben, G. (1998). Homo Sacer: Sovereign power and bare life. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Allan, P. (2006). Measuring international ethics: A moral scale of war, peace, justice, and global care. In P. Allan & A. Keller (Eds.), What is a just peace? (pp. 90–129). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Allan, P., & Keller, A. (2006a). The concept of a just peace, or achieving peace through recognition, renouncement and rule. In P. Allan & A. Keller (Eds.), What is a just peace? (pp. 195–215). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Allan, P., & Keller, A. (2006b). What is just peace? Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Appadurai, A. (2001). Grassroots globalisation and research imagination. In A. Appadurai (Ed.), Globalisation. Durham/London: Duke University Press.
- Bauman, Z. (1993). Postmodern ethics. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Bishai, L. S. (2004). Liberal empire. Journal of International Relations and Development, 7, 48–72.
- Bleiker, R. (2005). Divided Korea: Towards a culture of reconciliation. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota.
- Boucher, D. (2006). Property and propriety. In B. Jahn (Ed.), Classical theory in international relations (pp. 156–177). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping. New York: United Nations.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1996). An agenda for democratization. New York: United Nations.
- Brown, C. (2002). Sovereignty, rights and justice: International political theory today. Cambridge: Polity.
- Call, C. T., & Cousens, E. M. (2008). Ending wars and building peace: International responses to war-torn societies. International Studies Perspectives, 9(1), 1–21.
- Ceadal, M. (1987). Thinking about peace and war. Oxford: OUP.
- Chandler, D. (1999). Bosnia: Faking democracy after Dayton. London: Pluto Press.
- Chandler, D. (2006a). Empire in Denial: The politics of Statebuilding. London: Pluto Press.
- Chandler, D. (2006b). Imposing the ‘rule of law’: The lessons of BiH for peacebuilding in Iraq. International Peacekeeping, 11(2), 312–333.
- Conetta, C. (2004, July 7). Radical departure: Toward a practical peace in Iraq. Retrieved September 2020 from project on Defense alternatives report #16: <http://www.comw.org/pda/0407br16.html>
- Connolly, W. E. (1991). Identity/ difference. Minneapolis: Minnesota University Press.
- Cooper, N. (2007a). Review article: On the crisis of the liberal peace. Conflict, Security and Development, 7(4), 605–616.
- Cooper, N. (2007b). Review article: On the crisis of the liberal peace. Conflict, Security and Development, 7(4), 605–616.
- Dallmayr, F. (2004). Peace talks: Who will listen? Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press.
- de Certeau, M. (1984). The practice of everyday life. Berkeley: California University Press.
- Dillon, M. (2005). A passion for the [Im]possible: Jacques Ranciere, equality, pedagogy and the messianic. European Journal of Political Theory, 4(4), 429–452.
- Doyle, M. W. (1983). Kant, liberal legacies, and foreign affairs. Philosophy & Public Affairs, 12(3), 205–235.
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Duffield, M. (2001). Global governance and the new wars. London: Zed Books.
- Duffield, M. (2007). Development, security and unending war. London: Polity.
- Escobar, A. (1995). Encountering development. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Foucault, M. ([1976] 1978). History of sexuality volume 1: An introduction. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Foucault, M. ([1984] 1986). History of sexuality, vol. 3, the care of the self. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Foucault, M. (1991). Governmentality. In G. Burchell, C. Gordon, & P. Miller (Eds.), The Foucault effect: Studies in Governmentality (pp. 87–104). Hemel Hempstead: Harvester Wheatsheaf.
- Franceschet, A. (2006). ‘One powerful and enlightened nation’: Kant and the quest for a global rule of law. In B. Jahn (Ed.), Classical theory in international relations (pp. 74–95). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Freeman, C. (2011). Introduction: Security, governance and statebuilding in Afghanistan. International Peacekeeping, 4(1), 1–7.
- Geertz, C. (2001). Available light. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Geuss, R. (2002). Liberalism and its discontents. Political Theory, 30(3), 320–338.
- Gilligan, C. ([1982] 1993). In a different voice. Cambridge/London: Harvard University Press.
- Gowan, R. (2008). Strategic context: Peacekeeping in crisis 2006–08. International Peacekeeping, 15(4), 453–469.
- Howard, M. (2002). The invention of peace and the re-invention of war. London: Profile.
- Hughes, C. (2009). Dependent communities: Aid and politics in Cambodia and Timor-Leste. Ithaca: Southeast Asia Program Publications.
- Hutchings, K. (2000). Towards a feminist international ethics. Review of International Studies, 26(5), 111–130.
- International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty. (2001). The responsibility to protect. Ottawa: International Development Research Centre.

- Jabri, V. (2007). War and the transformation of global politics. London: Palgrave.
- Jahn, B. (1998). One step forward, two steps back: Critical theory as the latest edition of liberal idealism. Millenium, 27(3), 613–641.
- Jahn, B. (Ed.). (2006a). Classical theory in international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jahn, B. (2006b). Classical smoke, classical mirror: Kant and Mill in liberal international relations theory. In B. Jahn (Ed.), Classical theory in international relations (pp. 178–204). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Jahn, B. (2007). The tragedy of liberal diplomacy: Democratization, intervention, statebuilding (part II). Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 1(2), 211–229.
- Jutila, M., Pehkonen, S., & Väyrynen, T. (2008). Resuscitating a discipline: An agenda for critical peace research. Millenium, 36(3), 623–640.
- Keller, A. (2006). Justice, peace, and history: A reappraisal. In P. K. Allan (Ed.), What is a just peace? (pp. 16–51). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kende, I. (1989). The history of peace: Concept and organizations from the late middle ages to the 1870s. Journal of Peace Research, 26(3), 233–247.
- Krasner, S. D. (2004). Sharing sovereignty. New institutions for collapsed and failing states. International Security, 29(2), 85–120.
- Link, A. S. (Ed.). (1983a). The papers of Woodrow Wilson, volume 41: January 24–April 6, 1917. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Link, A. S. (Ed.). (1983b). The papers of Woodrow Wilson, volume 40: November 20, 1916–January 23, 1917. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Lyons, G. M., & Mastunduno, M. (1995). Beyond Westphalia?: National sovereignty and international intervention. Baltimore: The Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Indigenous peace-making versus the Liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2007). In Myth or reality: The Liberal peace and post-war reconstruction. R. M. Ginty & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), Global Society (Vol. 21(4), pp. 491–497).
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013) The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace, Third world quarterly 34 (5), 763–783.
- MacMillan, J. (2006). Immanuel Kant and the democratic peace. In B. Jahn (Ed.), Classical theory in international relations (pp. 52–73). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mandelbaum, M. (2002). The ideas that conquered the world. New York: Public Affairs.
- Nordstrom, C. (2004). Shadows of war. Berkley: University of California Press.
- Paris, R. (2002). International peacebuilding and the ‘mission civilisatrice’. Review of International Studies, 28 (4), 637–656.
- Paris, R. (2004). At War's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Plant, S. (1992). The Most radical gesture. London: Routledge.
- Pugh, M. (2005). The political economy of peacebuilding: A critical theory perspective. International Journal of Peace Studies, 10(2), 23–42.
- Pugh, M. (2008). Corruption and the political economy of liberal peace. In International studies association annual convention. San Francisco: International Studies Association.
- Pugh, M., Cooper, N., & Turner, M. (2008a). The political economy of peacebuilding. London: Palgrave.
- Pugh, M., Cooper, N., & Turner, M. (2008b). Whose peace? London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2004). UN peace operations and the dilemmas of the peacebuilding consensus. International Peacekeeping, 10(4), 83–101.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). Transformation of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Richmond, O. P., & Franks, J. (2009). Liberal peace transitions: Between statebuilding and peacebuilding. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011) A Post-Liberal Peace, London: Routledge.
- Rieff, D. (2002). A bed for the night. London: Vintage.
- Snyder, J. L. (2000). From voting to violence: Democratization and nationalist conflict. London: W. W. Norton & Company.
- Statement of H.E. Dr. Han Seung-soo, President of the 56th Session of the General Assembly, at the 55th Annual DPI/NGO Conference "Rebuilding Societies Emerging from Conflict: A Shared Responsibility. (2002, September 9). Retrieved from United Nations: <https://www.un.org/en/ga/president/56/pdf/statements/20020909-dpingo.pdf>
- Suhrke, A., & Borchgrevink, K. (2009). Afghanistan: Justice sector reform. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on Liberal peacebuilding (pp. 178–200). Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Sylvester, C. (1994). Empathic cooperation: A feminist method for IR. Millenium, 23(2), 315–334.
- Sylvester, C. (2006). Bare life as a development/post-colonial problematic. The Geographical Journal, 172 (1), 66–77.
- Szakolczai, A. (1994). Thinking beyond the east-west divide: Patocka, Foucault, Hamvas, Elias, and the care of the self. Florence: European University Institute.
- Tadjbakhsh, S. (2005, September). Human security: Concepts and implications. Les Etudes du CERI (No. 117–118).
- Tadjbakhsh, S., & Schoistwohl, M. (2008). Playing with fire? The international Community's democratization experiment in Afghanistan. International Peacekeeping, 15(2), 252–267.
- Taylor, C. (1992). The politics of recognition. In A. Gutmann (Ed.), Multiculturalism and the politics of - recognition (pp. 25–73). Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- United Nations, General Assembly. (1994). An agenda for development: Report of the secretary-general, A/48/935. United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly. (1995, January 25). Supplement to an agenda for peace: Position paper of the secretary-general on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the united nations, A/50/60, S/1995/1. United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly. (2004, December 2). The Secretary-General's high-level panel report on threats, challenges and change, a more secure world: our shared responsibility, A/59/565. United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council. (2007, September 21). Report of the secretary-general on the situation in Afghanistan and its implications for international peace and security, A/62/345-S/2007/555. United Nations.
- United Nations, Security Council. (2001, April 20). No exit without strategy: Security council decision-making and the closure or transition of United Nations peacekeeping operations, S/2001/394. United Nations.
- United Nations, Security Council. (2006, August 8). Report of the secretary-general on Timor-Leste pursuant to security council resolution 1690 (2006), S/2006/628. United Nations.
- United Nations (UN). (2018, January 18). Report of the Secretary-General, "Peacebuilding and sustaining peace", A/72/707–S/2018/43. United Nations.
- Walker, R. B. (1992). Inside/outside: International relations as political theory. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Walker, R. B. (2008, July 14). Personal communication. Victoria, Canada.
- Williams, A. J. (2006). Liberalism and war: The victors and the vanquished. London: Routledge.

Liberal Peace in Peace Operations

Francine Rossone de Paula School of History, Anthropology, Philosophy and Politics, Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Synonyms

Capitalist peace; Democratic peace; Kantian peace

The understanding that liberal democracies do not fight each other has become one of the most disseminated ideas among scholars and policymakers on the conditions for international peace and security since the initial statistical findings about the correlation between democracy and peace in the 1970s. Broadly defined as a paradigm that calls upon the active construction of lasting peace within the international system through the transformation of societies, “liberal peace” connects the maintenance of international stability to the dissemination of liberal values and institutions, and to agendas geared towards socioeconomic and political restructuring of non-liberal sovereign States. This chapter explores some articulations of the notion of liberal peace over the past decades, tracing the debate that has culminated in moral and political justifications for liberal interventionism in non-liberal States after the Cold War. It investigates the influence of liberal ideas in conceptual and practical transformations of United Nations Peace Operations, which along with other historical developments and experiences in the field, shaped the emergence of more robust and intrusive generations of peace operations authorized to intervene in the domestic affairs of States and to actively participate in post-conflict reconstruction. As the deployment of peace missions shaped by liberal values and expectations has been widely contested and criticized as a contemporary form of colonialism, the recent years have brought up questions about resistance and the emergence of a post-liberal order, but also about the capacities of international institutions such as the United Nations to deliver the ambitious promises of previous decades.

Definition

Liberalism is not a consistent or coherent current of thought, and the understanding of what entails to be liberal varies according to the geographical and historical context in which these liberal ideas have been developed and/or interpreted. Nonetheless, four fundamental elements of liberalisms that have been widely accepted over the centuries are: individualism (moral primacy of the individual above any claims to collectivity), egalitarianism (notion that all men have the same moral status), universalism (the moral unity of the human species regardless of historical associations or cultural forms), and progressivism (correctability and expectation of improvement of social institutions and political arrangements) (Gray 2003).

Introduction

The association of liberal values with international peace and stability is not automatic or natural, but the result of historical developments and particular interpretations of liberalism and democracy that led to the conceptualization of the term liberal peace and its employment in contemporary political agendas and practices. Data measuring the correlation between specific political regimes and variables such as freedom and peace have been disseminated, for instance, since the 1940s by the independent watchdog organization Freedom House and since the 1960s by the Correlates of War (COW) project founded by J. David Singer in 1964. It was only in the 1980s that Kantian ideas became a philosophical and ideological ground for a great number of qualitative analyses on the matter.

Kantian's essay "Perpetual Peace: A Philosophical Sketch" (1795) became an important source of inspiration of many advocates of the liberal peace. International organizations, economic interdependence, and democracy (associated with the "federation of free states," "universal hospitality," and "republican constitution" in the three Definitive Articles for Perpetual Peace) have been melded to comprise what some scholars called the "Kantian Tripod" (Doyle 2005; Russett and Oneal 2001). Broadly defined as a paradigm that calls upon the gradual and active construction of lasting peace within the international system through the transformation of societies, "liberal peace" connects the maintenance of international stability to the dissemination of liberal values and institutions, and to agendas geared towards socioeconomic and political restructuring of non-liberal sovereign States.

Some conditions that have been highlighted as required for the construction and maintenance of "healthy" domestic environments, and thus of peaceful and stable international relations, have included: freedom from arbitrary authority, protection and promotion of freedom, and democratic participation (Doyle 1983). After the Cold War, where States have not been capable of meeting criteria for domestic stability, the rule of law, constitutional democracy, human rights, neoliberal development, and civil peace have been packaged and delivered by organizations involved in the liberal governance of societies (Campbell et al. 2011). As an intrusive and proactive force, liberal peace finds its most recent expression in practices of peacebuilding or statebuilding operations.

A Liberal and Democratic Peace

Even though "liberal peace" and "democratic peace" have been used interchangeably in many studies, and one could argue that they are strongly correlated, they are not necessarily the same idea. Both hypotheses draw inspiration from qualitative liberal political theory that can be traced back to the beginning of the nineteenth century. But while hypotheses associated with the "liberal peace" more specifically focus on economic development and interdependence as powerful inhibitors of wars (Keohane and Nye 1977; Russett and Oneal 2001; Schneider et al. 2003), hypotheses associated with the "democratic peace" have emphasized the relation between the structures of different political regimes and foreign policy behavior (Babst 1972; Rummel 1979; Small and Singer 1976).

Thomas Friedman, in his column at the New York Times, amended in 1996 the proposition that "two democracies do not fight each other" with the affirmation that "countries that both have McDonald's restaurants don't fight each other." But empirically, the hypothesis of the democratic peace is much less contested than the hypothesis of the liberal peace. Besides the fact that the two world wars have challenged the expectation that an economically interdependent world would be peaceful, the arrival of McDonald's or Starbucks (as in most recent formulations) in States that have been categorized as "non-liberal" weakens the assertion as well. As a result of the limitations and statistic uncertainty derived from the isolation of political or economic variables, many researchers have increasingly emphasized the relevance of a combination of political, ideological, and economic elements for the constitution of a liberal (democratic) peace (Danilovic and Clare 2007; Mousseau and Oneal 2003).

Doyle initiated a series of studies on the liberal peace that considered Kant's essay on the Perpetual Peace a "source of insight, policy and hope" (Doyle 2006, p. 202). Since the collapse of the Soviet Union and the subsequent end of the Cold War, the Kantian belief in the realization of perpetual peace through the promotion of democracy, economic interdependence, and international organizations became the word of order in decision-making in advanced industrialized democracies and major international organizations. As an example, the dissemination of liberal democratic values was a pillar of United States' foreign policy during the administration of Bill Clinton (1996), who stated that the promotion of democracy:

advances our interests because we know that the larger the pool of democracies, the better off we, and the entire community of nations, will be. Democracies create free markets that make for more reliable trading partners and are far less likely to wage war on one another. While democracy will not soon take hold everywhere, it is in our interest to do all that we can to enlarge the community of free and open societies.

There are disagreements as to whether Kant's text offers sufficient justification for interventionist practices. However, inspired by his own reading of the Kant's treaty on the Perpetual Peace, Doyle defended that liberal wars should be fought for liberal purposes, but only for liberal purposes. Doyle (2005, p. 465) sustains, for instance, that the incursions of the United States in the Third World since the Cold War with the goal of weakening the popular regimes of Mossadegh in Iran, Arbenz in Guatemala, Jagan in Guiana, Allende in Chile, and the Sandinistas in Nicaragua happened because these regimes represented a threat to property and to the state of law.

The great majority of interpretations of the Perpetual Peace written in the second half of 1990 emphasizes the First Definitive Article, and especially the notion of "citizens' consensus" (Easley 2004). A state-centric reading of the Second Definitive Article was also predominant because an independent liberal republic, and not some form of international government above the States, would be the main source of peace.

The First Definitive Article to the Perpetual Peace states that "The Civil Constitution of Every State shall Be Republican." According to Kant, a Republican Civil Constitution is the only one that derives from the idea of an original contract and upon which all the juridical legislation of a people is based on. The constitution of a republican is established according to the following principles: "firstly, by principles of the freedom of the members of a society (as men); secondly, by principles of dependence of all upon a single common legislation (as subjects); and, thirdly, by the law of their equality (as citizens)" (Kant 1991, p. 99). This pattern in more recent interpretations of the Perpetual Peace became the philosophical foundation for narratives and practices of contemporary liberal peace. The transformation of non-liberal States into liberal States is then treated as an ethical responsibility and a sine qua non condition for peace. In this context, interventions are not only justified but they become a moral duty of "free States."

United Nations, Peace Operations, and the Liberal Peace Project

In June of 1945, the United Nations Charter was signed in San Francisco, establishing an international organization to be known as the United Nations (UN), which was determined to "save successive generations of the scourge of war." Two central elements of the League of Nations were sustained in the newly created organization. The first was that the UN would be an organization of sovereign States without any supranational power, and the second was the affirmation that the institution would not have any authority to intervene in the domestic affairs of its member States. However, included in Article 1 of the Charter as a purpose of the UN is "to achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.” With that, the UN reconciles sovereignty and self-determination with an understanding of the universality of the aims and goals of different societies united as “We the Peoples of the United Nations.”

In the 1980s, with the weakening of the communist bloc and the economic crisis in the West, domestic popular pressure for justice, equality, human rights, and democratization started to gain momentum. The end of the Cold War was followed by increasing legitimation of the Western liberal ideology, with an emphasis on free market and democracy as values embedded in multilateral institutions agendas and practices. Susan Rice, U.S. Permanent Representative to the UN from 2009 to 2013, echoed the argument that there was no better alternative to the international organization, as she affirmed that doing nothing meant to allow conflicts to spill over and to “create an environment where criminals can operate and where terrorists can find a safe heaven” (DPKO and UNDP 2011).

The last decade of the twentieth century marked the emergence of more intrusive and multi-dimensional peace operations (see chapter “► Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations”). This reactivation of the UN Security Council (UNSC) was followed by the decline in the incidence of interstate conflicts and by a greater emphasis on intrastate conflicts. The UNSC started to actively promote the contention and the peaceful resolution of regional conflicts. The focus on intrastate conflicts (those happening within the limits of a national territory) translated into demands for the reform or reconstruction of political/economic/social structures of those States, and the association, as envisaged by the democratic or liberal peace theory, of the domestic order with foreign policy behavior, and subsequently, with international peace.

Civil wars (what usually occur within the limits of a single State and between combatants dwelling within that State) represented more than 90% of all armed conflicts documented in the 1990s (Paris 2004, p. 1). In this context, the UN brings to the center of its discourses and actions the issue of human rights and concerns around socioeconomic conditions that had been so far ignored in the practice of the institution. These issues started to be emphasized above other questions related to state sovereignty (in this case, territorial sovereignty) (Aksu 2003, p. 64). The previous emphasis given to the “protection” of sovereignty becomes the “promotion” of sovereignty (Aksu 2003, p. 68).

In the Agenda for Peace, published in 1992, the UN Secretary-General at the time, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, invokes the UN and its partners for “rebuilding the institutions and infrastructures of nations torn by civil war and strife; and building bonds of peaceful mutual benefit among nations formerly at war” (A/47/277 and S/24111 1992). In 1994, he defines the concept of post-conflict peacebuilding in a supplement to the Agenda for Peace as requiring “efforts to identify and support structures which will tend to consolidate peace and advance a sense of confidence and well-being among people” (Barnett et al. 2007, p. 35).

Peacebuilding also consists in mitigating or preventing forms of direct or indirect violence (structural) through the interaction of multiple constructive incentives. Barnett et al. (2007, p. 49) identifies three dimensions of post-conflict peacebuilding – creation of stability, restoration of state institutions, and redirection of the socioeconomic dimensions of the conflict. There has been some consensus that peacebuilding entails more than the promotion of stability; it is formulated to create positive peace, to deal with the roots of the conflicts, and to allow states and societies to develop stable expectations of a peaceful transition.

At the beginning of the year 2000, the Brahimi Report offered the following detailed definition:

Peace-building is a term of more recent origin that, as used in the present report, defines activities undertaken on the far side of conflict to reassemble the foundations of peace and provide the tools for building on those foundations something that is more than just the absence of war. Thus, peacebuilding includes but is not limited to reintegrating former combatants into civilian society, strengthening the rule of law (for example, through training and restructuring of local police, and judicial and penal reform); improving respect for human rights through the monitoring, education and investigation of past and existing abuses; providing technical assistance for democratic development (including electoral assistance and support for free media); and promoting conflict resolution and reconciliation techniques. (A/55/305 and S/2000/809 2000)

We can identify in these definitions of peacebuilding a direct relation with the issue of development, or with a narrative of development that prioritizes the distribution of resources and the satisfaction of the basic needs of societies (see chapter “► Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding”).

The consolidation of the peacebuilding agenda happened right after the World Summit in 2005, when UN member-states endorsed the proposal of the then UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan of creating a Peacebuilding Commission, a Peacebuilding Support Office, and a Peacebuilding Fund. The Peacebuilding Commission was established on 20 December 2005 by resolutions of the General Assembly (60/180) and the Security Council (1645 and 1646).

The United Nations still has a limited role in the realization of its ambitious goals. To enhance its capacity to deliver the tasks at hand, the security sector has partnered with international and regional organizations, such as NATO (see chapter “► NATO’s Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding”), and other programs. These missions became increasingly dependent on International Financial Institutions (IFIs), nongovernmental organizations, and UN civil agencies that offer support in the supply of humanitarian relief and infrastructure reconstruction. Nevertheless, the UN is still the biggest provider of peace forces to the international system, responsible for the majority of the operations deployed globally. The total number of personnel serving in the 13 peacekeeping operations as of January of 2020 is 95,423, including 69,638 troops, 8756 in the police force and 12,607 civilians.

In 2010, a document published by the UN Peacebuilding Support Office recognizes that “there is no simple, clear cut definition of peacebuilding that sets it apart from conflict prevention, peacekeeping, peacemaking, humanitarian and development assistance” (p. 8). However, peace operations such as the United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) (1995–2002), United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) (1999–Present), United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) (1999–2005), United Nations Mission in Liberia (UNMIL) (2003–2018), United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) (1999–2002), United Nations Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT) (2006–2012), United Nations Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) (2002–Present), and others have in common their reliance on partnerships with international financial institutions (e.g., IMF and World Bank), international development organizations, donor nations, and humanitarian relief agencies bringing together a clear integration of security with development, democratization, and human rights.

East Timor is an emblematic case of this type of multidimensional intervention. Due to the scope of the mission deployed in East Timor in 1999, scholars have called it a “test case” for the new model of operations following the premises of the liberal peace (Suhrke 2001, p. 1; Chesterman 2002, p. 45). Over a period of 13 years, the UN authorized five different missions in Timor-Leste: UNAMET (1999), UNTAET (1999–2002), UNMISSET (2002–2005), UNOTIL (2005–2006), and UNMIT (2006–2012). After the UN-sponsored referendum in which over 70% of East Timorese voted for independence from Indonesia, the resolution S/RES/1272 created the UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), responsible (1) to provide security and maintain the law and (2) to assist in the development of civil and social services. At midnight on 19 May 2002, East Timor became a democratic republic, representing an important marker in the liberal statebuilding process.

UNSC resolution 1410 in 2002 establishing the UN Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISSET) recognized that “the emerging institutions in East Timor remain[ed] fragile and that in the period immediately after independence assistance w[ould] be required to ensure sustained momentum in the development and strengthening of East Timor’s infrastructure, public administration, law enforcement and defense capacities.”

The series of prescriptions imposed to the newly formed state did not take into account the social and political complexities of the local environment. East Timorese police and army clashed in 2006 mainly because of deeply rooted rivalries that still influenced social relations in the newly independent State. In reaction to the wave of violence, the Security Council authorized with resolution S/2006/628 the establishment of the UN Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT). The mandate was even more ambitious than the former and aimed at (1) (re)constructing state institutions while enhancing their capacity; (2) assisting the government and the institutions to enhance their democratic-governance culture; (3) restoring and maintaining public security, attending to law enforcement, in the country; (4) reconstructing the national police and army; and (5) facilitating relief and recovery assistance; among many other tasks.

The constant pressure for the Timorization of these missions exposed the lack of initial engagement with the local population and the disconnection between a model of State envisioned by the West and the reality on the ground. The adoption of Portuguese as the national language, the centralization of the decision-making in Dili, and the fact that civilian administration staff was predominantly internationally recruited have all been highlighted as major flaws of the intervention (Suhrke 2001; Philpott 2006; Chopra 2002). Inflation, the new dollarized economy, the end of Indonesian-style subsidies on rice and kerosene, and unemployment, also put into question the effectiveness of the prescriptions offered by the World Bank and other international monetary organizations to improve the conditions of that society (Gunn 2007, p. 96). Richmond and Franks (2008, p. 189) highlights that despite its enormous revenue-generating potential in gas and petroleum reserves, little of the income has filtered back to the population. Moreover, the fact that during the UNTAET, for every “ten assessed dollars” spent on the mission itself and UN staff, only one voluntary dollar was spent on the administration of the country (Steele 2002, p. 83) affected the legitimacy and credibility of the actors involved.

More recently, the intervention in Afghanistan, due to its distinct scope and conditions, seemed to require a new model of operation fundamentally different from “peacebuilding” (Paris and Sisk 2009, p. 11). It was seen as at least a “fairly rare example of ‘post-conquest peace-building’” (Newman 2009, p. 33). However, others have shown that these operations could still be translated into the vocabulary of “Liberal Peacebuilding” (Dodge 2013, also see chapter “► Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity”).

In October 2003, UNSC resolution 1510 authorized the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) to expand its operations from Kabul to the rest of the country. As with other cases, the centralization of authority formalized by the Afghan constitution in 2003 combined with free-market prescriptions proved ineffective and disconnected from local political and economic realities, exacerbating the distance between ruling elite groups legitimized by the Western powers and the vast majority of the population. In 2012, Afghanistan was ranked the third most corrupt State according to Transparency International (Dodge 2013, p. 1207).

Afghanistan is a much larger country than East Timor and exposed even more dramatically the effects of a top-down approach combined with prescriptions for the State emulated from an ideal Western model. With disappointments and contradictions emerging from the so-called “liberal world” and never-ending conflicts that could not be stabilized by those old prescriptions, peace operations are now reevaluated in its scope and capacities to positively affect change in post-conflict situations in a context in which the war on terror largely redirected the agenda of international security. Expressed in Trump’s speech to the American troops in Afghanistan in November of 2019, his “principled realism” comes with a rejection of the idea of “building nations.”

A Post-liberal Peace?

“The World is changing, and UNPKOs must change with it if they are to remain an indispensable and effective tool in promoting international peace and security,” stated former UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon on 31 October 2014 when announcing the establishment of the High-level Independent Panel on Peace Operations. In December 2015, he issued his Plan of Action to Prevent Violent Extremism, which meant calling for a broader set of tools to deal with “new” threats. In Ban Ki-Moon’s report, it is noted that UNPKOs lack political support for mediating a solution or capabilities to protect the mission and the civilians under threat.

In 2017, UN Secretary-General Antonio Guterres launched the Action for Peacebuilding (A4P), which aims to “hold the Security Council, Troop Contributing Countries, Financial Contributors, Host Countries, and regional partners accountable to make UN Peacekeeping successful with the proper mandates, partnerships, and resources on the ground.”

One hundred and fifty countries committed to contribute for the strengthening of UN Peacekeeping, but in more recent discourses and practices, the assumptions and expectations of a liberal peace seems to no longer feature as a priority. The international interventions have scaled down in ambitions in the past few years, and it has been argued that there is a shift from the traditional liberal agenda emphasizing democracy and economic interdependence towards stabilization and counterterrorism (Karlsrud 2019). Liberal peacebuilding has been replaced since the beginning of the 2000s with the protection of civilians (PoC) as a main rationale in peace operations, as expressed in the mission statement for the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA) and others. For John Karlsrud (2019, p. 3), “the result has been less intrusive UN peacekeeping operations with more limited goals, a shorter-term outlook and more reactive approach to security incidents, all to the detriment of implementing a long-term people-centric strategy to address the root causes of security challenges.”

The USA and its Western allies have been key actors in the process of shaping the agenda of international organizations, and more specifically, of peace operations, around liberal values. President Donald Trump, among others, is open about not being dedicated to the promotion of liberal values such as democracy, civil rights, protection of civilians, and the rule of law as conditions for the achievement international peace. It has been noted that “US lawmakers are planning to devolve more authority to the field under the so-called ‘status-based targeting system’ for suspected terrorists, meaning troops will be able to use lethal force against a suspected member of a terrorist organization even if that person does not pose an immediate threat” (Karlsrud 2019, p. 8).

Some interpretations of the recent crisis of the liberal peace locates the problem “in th[is] disorderly global South, characterised by authoritarianism, civil war, identity conflict, underdevelopment, rights abuses and ‘ungoverned’ spaces” (Ramptom and Nadarajah 2017). Other interpretations of the crisis of the liberal peace acknowledge that these ideals and values are not static and that the liberal peace of three or four decades ago is not the same as the one that could be perceived, conceptualized and assessed today.

Peace Operations are in a constant process of reinvention, as the goals on paper are constantly challenged by limitations and unexpected developments in the field. As noted by critiques of the liberal peace, the territories and societies that become recipients of the operations have never been a blank page upon which one would be able to write its own rules and values (see chapter “► Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject”). To the same extent that the UN incorporates and appropriates notions of local participation and hybrid peace in its agenda (see chapter “► Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”), the recipes and prescriptions these institutions bring to the ground are transformed, distorted, and reimaged.

The considerations of a post-liberal peace make the question of assessment of peace operations (see chapter “► Assessment of Peace Operations”) even more complicated. How do we measure success and failure of a post-liberal peace? Does the current crisis in the liberal peace framework represent the failure of the international community to construct peace or an opportunity for alternative ways of operating in post-conflict societies?

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity

References

- Aksu, E. (2003). The United Nations, intra-state peacekeeping and normative change. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Babst, D. V. (1972). A force for peace. Industrial Research, 14, 55–58.
- Barnett, M., Kim, H., O'Donnel, M., & Sitea, L. (2007). Peacebuilding: What is in a name? Global Governance, 13, 35–58.
- Campbell, S., Chandler, D., & Sabaratnam, M. (2011). A liberal peace?: The problems and practices of peacebuilding. London/New York: Zed Books.
- Chesterman, S. (2002). East Timor in transition: Self-determination, state-building and the United Nations. International Peacekeeping, 9(1), 45–76.
- Chopra, J. (2002). Building state failure in East Timor. Development and Change, 33(5), 979–1000.
- Clinton, W. (1996). A national security strategy of engagement and enlargement. Washington, DC: U.S. Government Printing Office.
- Danilovic, V., & Clare, J. (2007). The Kantian liberal peace (revisited). American Journal of Political Science, 51(2), 397–414.
- Dodge, T. (2013). Intervention and dreams of exogenous statebuilding: The application of liberal peacebuilding in Afghanistan and Iraq. Review of International Studies, 39(5), 1189–1212.
- Doyle, M. W. (1983). Kant, liberal legacies, and foreign affairs: Part I. Philosophy and Public Affairs, 12(3), 205–235.
- Doyle, M. W. (2005). Three pillars of the liberal peace. American Political Science Review, 99(3), 463–466.
- Doyle, M. W. (2006) Kant and Liberal Internationalism. In Kant, I., Kleingeld, P., Waldron, J., Doyle, M. W., & Wood, A. W. Toward perpetual peace and other writings on politics, peace, and history. New Haven: Yale University Press, 201–242.
- Easley, E. S. (2004). War over perpetual peace: An exploration into the history of a foundational international relations text. Gordonsville: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Gray, J. (2003). Liberalism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Gunn, G. C. (2007). The state of East Timor studies after 1999. Journal of Contemporary Asia, 37(1), 95–114.
- Kant, I. (1991). Kant: Political Writings (Cambridge Texts in the History of Political Thought) (H. Reiss, Ed.; H. Nisbet, Trans.). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Karlsrud, J. (2019). From liberal peacebuilding to stabilization and counterterrorism. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 1–21.
- Keohane, R. O., & Nye, J. S. (1977). Power and interdependence: world politics in transition. Boston: Little, Brown.
- Mousseau, M., & Oneal, H. H. A. R. (2003). How the wealth of nations conditions the liberal peace. European Journal of International Relations, 9(2), 277–314.
- Newman, E. (2009). “Liberal” peacebuilding debates. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding. New York: United Nations University Press.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Paris, R., & Sisk, T. D. (2009). Understanding the contradictions of postwar statebuilding. In R. Paris & T. D. Sisk (Eds.), The dilemmas of statebuilding. London: Routledge.
- Philpott, S. (2006). East Timor's double life: Smells like Westphalian spirit. Third World Quarterly, 27(1), 135–159.
- Rampton, D., & Nadarajah, S. (2017). A long view of liberal peace and its crisis. European Journal of International Relations, 23(2), 441–465.
- Richmond, O. P., & Franks, J. (2008). Liberal peacebuilding in Timor Leste: The emperor's new clothes? International Peacekeeping, 15(2), 185–200.
- Rummel, R. J. (1979). Understanding conflict and war. Beverly Hills/New York: Sage.
- Russett, B., & Oneal, J. (2001). Triangulating peace: Democracy, interdependence, and international organizations. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Schneider, G., Barbieri, K., & Gleditsch, N. P. (2003). Globalization and armed conflict. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Small, M., & Singer, J. D. (1976). The war-proneness of democratic regimes. Jerusalem Journal of International Relations, 1, 50–69.
- Steele, J. (2002). Nation building in East Timor. World Policy Journal, 19(2), 76–87.
- Suhrke, A. (2001). Peacekeepers as nation-builders: Dilemmas of the UN in East Timor. International Peacekeeping, 8(4), 1–20.
- United Nations Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO), & United Nations Department of Public Information (UNDPI). (2011). UN peacekeeping background note (DPI/2429/Rev.11). http://www.europarl.europa.eu/meetdocs/2009_2014/documents/sede/dv/sede041011unbackgroundnote/_sede041011unbackgroundnote_en.pdf. Accessed 30 Sept 2019.
- United Nations General Assembly (A/47/277), & United Nations Security Council (S/24111). (1992). An agenda for peace, preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping. https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/files/A_47_277.pdf. Accessed 30 Sept 2019.

United Nations General Assembly (A/55/305), & United Nations Security Council (S/2000/809). (2000). Letter dated 17 August 2000 from the Chairman of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations to the Secretary-General (“The Brahimi Report”). <https://undocs.org/A/55/305>. Accessed 30 Sept 2019.

United Nations Peacebuilding Support Office. (2010). UN peacebuilding: An orientation. https://www.un.org/peacebuilding/sites/www.un.org.peacebuilding/files/documents/peacebuilding_orientation.pdf. Accessed 14 Nov 2019.

Liberal Peacebuilding

- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

Edward Newman¹ and Fujian Li²

¹University of Leeds, Leeds, UK

²China Foreign Affairs University, Beijing, China

Synonyms

BRICS; China; Critical perspectives; Liberal peacebuilding; Transitional international order

Definition

This chapter explores how peacebuilding is evolving in a changing international order in which key actors are rising and declining in relative authority and power. In this context the era of liberal peacebuilding is in transition – or perhaps in decline – as a result of a number of pressures. Internal contradictions in the liberal peacebuilding agenda, local resistance to international peacebuilding norms and practices, a decline in the willingness and capacity of Western sponsors to underwrite international peacebuilding, and the rise of non-liberal state involvement in peacebuilding have all changed the nature of peacebuilding. There has been a declining enthusiasm for liberal peacebuilding among traditional sponsors of peace operations and the marked increase in involvement in peacebuilding on the part of some non-Western states and in particular China. This raises a number of questions: How is the transitional international order shaping the evolving international politics of international peacebuilding? With the rise of non-Western (especially Chinese) participation in peacekeeping and peacebuilding, are the principles and values which underpin peacebuilding shifting away from the “liberal” vision? With the retreat of liberal internationalism, does this represent a “post-liberal” model of peacebuilding?

Introduction

Liberal peacebuilding emerged following the end of the Cold War in a unique political moment. The belief that international actors could promote peace and reinforce the international order by building or rebuilding state institutions, democracy, and free market economics in conflict-prone societies was the height of liberal internationalism. While peacekeeping during the Cold War was essentially aimed at underpinning stability and ceasefires between states in order to contain conflicts and promote conflict resolution, liberal peacebuilding represents a far more ambitious agenda aimed at transforming societies in line with “modern” norms of governance and economics. Almost all newly created peace operations since 1990 have been deployed within – rather than between – states, during or following intra-state armed conflict. All of the major peace operations have involved elements of the liberal peacebuilding agenda, including support for electoral democracy, governance, the rule of law, and economic development along broadly liberal lines.

However, the era of liberal peacebuilding is in transition – or perhaps in decline – as a result of a number of pressures. Internal contradictions in the peacebuilding agenda, local resistance to international peacebuilding norms and practices, a decline in the willingness and capacity of Western sponsors to underwrite international peacebuilding, and the rise of non-liberal state involvement in peacebuilding have all changed the narrative and practices of peacebuilding.

This chapter will consider this evolution in peacebuilding in the context of the changing international order in which key actors are rising and declining in relative authority and power, a process that is reshaping the institutions and norms that define international life. In the realm of international peacebuilding, this involves a declining enthusiasm for liberal peacebuilding among traditional sponsors of peace operations and the marked increase in involvement in peacebuilding on the part of some non-Western states, and in particular China, which is shifting the values which underpin peace operations. In considering the implications of these changes for peacebuilding, the chapter will consider a number of questions: How is the transitional international order – defined as the geopolitical, normative, and institutional changes which occur as key states rise and fall in relative power and influence – shaping the evolving international politics of international peacebuilding? With the rise of non-Western (especially Chinese) participation in peacekeeping and peacebuilding, are the principles and values which underpin peacebuilding moving away from the “liberal” vision? In the context of the retreat of liberal internationalism, does this represent a “post-liberal” model of peacebuilding? Is this likely to be a coherent, alternative vision?

The chapter will first present the vision of liberal peacebuilding and its evolution. It will then make the case that this approach to international conflict management has declined as a persuasive model, as a result of a number of pressures and challenges. The next section will give specific attention to China’s growing role in peacekeeping and peacebuilding as an illustration of the impact non-Western involvement in this area. The following section will consider if the growing non-liberal input into international peacebuilding reflects a new normative framework for peacebuilding, and the conclusion will consider the implications of this for future theorizing in peacebuilding research.

The Decline of the “Liberal Peace” Model in Theory and Practice

Most post-Cold War peacekeeping and peacebuilding operations have been deployed during or after intrastate armed conflict. These cases have involved building or strengthening security, development, humanitarian assistance, and strengthening governance and the rule of law (Newman 2013). Major peacebuilding operations – which extend far beyond the narrow remit of peacekeeping – also reflect the liberal peacebuilding model: the promotion of free market economic reforms, democracy, and other institutions associated with “modern” states as a driving force for building peace and stability. The liberal approach to peacebuilding in conflict-prone states is driven by the conviction that the primary “problem” with these societies is the absence of “effective” state institutions, with reference to Western standards and practices. With this rationale (re)building viable institutions becomes a priority, and this assumes that state institutions and the right market conditions will serve the economic goals of peacebuilding. According to this, certain institutions are universally viable – such as electoral democracy, free market economics, a centralized secular state, and civil and political human rights – and if these are in place, political and economic development will move forward and serve peace, in a mutually supportive process (Newman 2013).

Within this arena, the central challenge is thought to be how to make the liberal peacebuilding project work in practice: to build or rebuild state institutions and good governance, including democracy, develop a responsible civil society, and promote a liberal market. This involves finding the right fit at the local level for peacebuilding programs and the right sequence of activities. Major international peacebuilding operations – either under UN auspices or with significant UN involvement – have been conducted along these lines in locations such as Cambodia, Angola, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Côte d’Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo (DRC), Somalia, Kosovo, Afghanistan, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, East Timor, Kosovo, and Bosnia and Herzegovina. There is certainly evidence that peacebuilding operations have had a positive impact in terms of stabilizing conflict-affected societies, reducing the recurrence of armed conflict, and assisting state-building (Fortna 2008; Doyle and Sambanis 2006).

However, a number of changes and pressures have challenged the liberal peacebuilding model, in both theory and practice. Firstly, this approach has generated resistance within the epistemic community and also within the societies in which these operations have been deployed. International peacebuilding has prioritized the top-down building or rebuilding of institutions, the promotion of liberal democracy, and free market-led reform. According to some analysts (Mac Ginty 2011; Richmond 2009; Campbell et al. 2011; Jacoby 2007; Tadjbakhsh 2011), this has resulted in a lack of sensitivity toward local needs and aspirations, a failure to integrate indigenous institutions into peacebuilding, insufficient local ownership, and thus programs which are not regarded locally as effective or legitimate. In addition, the promotion of market reform within the liberal peacebuilding model has been controversial, since it can hamper the development of public services, welfare, and social inclusion at a time when they are most needed. This can result in growing inequalities and alienation, which threaten broader peacebuilding goals (Newman 2011).

The liberal economic model behind international peacebuilding tends to favour, as a long-term goal, constrained public expenditure, deregulation, and privatization, which creates a paradox. Peacebuilding implies the strengthening of the state and public goods – including welfare – yet liberal economic and social policies can be in tension with this. The promotion of electoral democracy in conflict-prone societies has also been problematic (Paris 2004). Consolidated democracies in stable states tend to be peaceful but democratizing societies – especially in conjunction with factors which make them fragile – can be highly volatile (Goldstone et al. 2010; Collier 2009). Electoral democracy in divided societies can worsen political conflict and sectarian divisions. There is also often a perceived gap between international and local stakeholders in large peacebuilding missions, giving the impression of an absence of local ownership and consultation. As a result, local resistance has emerged in many peacebuilding cases. Moreover, key parts of the liberal peacebuilding model – such as the promotion of liberal democracy, gender equality, and civil society – have arguably not achieved significant traction in key cases, such as Afghanistan, Iraq, South Sudan, and Kosovo.

Secondly, the liberal peacebuilding model has been challenged by a declining commitment to multilateralism and peacebuilding among traditionally important donor countries and a decline in their capacity to support such operations. The results of large-scale international peacebuilding projects have been disappointing in some respects – especially in relation to some of the more “liberal” aspects of the agenda – and this has led to a decline in support among donor countries for major interventions. Financial constraints within donor countries have also raised political opposition to supporting these major initiatives, after prolonged engagement in cases such as Afghanistan. The rise of nationalism and populism also threatens the integrity of the liberal international order broadly speaking, and within this, support for peacebuilding as a global “public good” is in decline.

Changing strategic priorities are relevant to this. In a post-9/11 world, where traditional security challenges have returned to the center of the policy radar, a renewed emphasis of military security has arguably displaced some policy interest in liberal peacebuilding. Sherriff et al. (2018) have suggested that in a period of “geopolitical flux” and changing strategic priorities for major powers, the nature of peacebuilding may shift. This shift may reflect a more “realist” orientation, in which stability and the containment of conflict, and more strategically important regions, are prioritized. Indeed, according to Karlsrud (2019: 1) “Liberal peacebuilding may be on its way to the scrapyard of history. After being a popular concept as well as practice in the international security agenda after the end of the Cold War, international interventions are scaled down in ambitions, with a shift towards stabilization and counterterrorism, both in discourse and in practice.”

This trend, if it continues, would be in line with a well-established critique of liberal peacebuilding, which has argued that the “liberal” narrative of international peacebuilding has always been something of a façade. According to this, the reality has long been that peacebuilding is primarily about containing the destabilizing spill-over effects of intrastate armed conflict, rather than facilitating conflict transformation or supporting positive peace. Thus, as the authority of liberal internationalism fades – as a result of changes in power globally and a declining willingness and capacity on the part of liberal “great” powers to uphold its norms and principles – then political and financial support for liberal peacebuilding also declines.

Thirdly, the rise of non-Western involvement in peacebuilding, and particular that of China, is underscoring a shift away from the promotion of liberalism as a part of these activities. This relates to a broader process of normative change associated with a transitional international order.

The relative rise in power of a number of non-Western states has heightened normative contestation in international relations, and the creation and institutionalization of norms are increasingly controversial (Newman and Zala 2018; Stuenkel 2016; Xiaoyu 2012). This has an impact upon a range of policy areas, including international peace and security mechanisms. According to Li (2014), non-Western powers are increasingly unwilling to be passive “norm takers,” and resistance can be seen in connection with a number of international issues, such as human rights and governance. This contestation reflects normative differences on core international norms relating to state sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the use of force. In this way the rising power narrative can be interpreted as a challenge to liberal norms and in particular the attachment of liberal norms to issues such as development and trade, and the promotion of liberal norms in the “domestic” sphere. Contestation also reflects a desire among rising powers for greater control of the political agenda and thus a desire for sovereign equality and status (Paul et al. 2014; Volgy et al.; Newman and Zala 2018). The creation of parallel international financial institutions under Chinese leadership – such as the New Development Bank – demonstrates the frustration of rising powers toward the existing multilateral apparatus, as well as a shift in focus in terms of values. These different types of contestation are potentially relevant to the shifting policies of peacebuilding: in line with the increasing involvement and financial contribution of rising powers – particularly China – there comes a greater desire to control the agenda, have a greater input into decisions, and a desire for the norms of peacebuilding to better reflect their own worldview.

These international power changes are therefore driving a shift in international peacebuilding away from the liberal model in line with the growing influence of non-Western countries in these activities. China is far less likely to promote – and much less impose – norms of electoral democracy or civil and political rights as a part of its peacebuilding agenda. Its own attachment to communitarian political culture and sensitivity regarding state sovereignty and territorial integrity therefore shapes its approach to peacebuilding. This does not so far suggest an alternative “vision” of peacebuilding, but it does raise the question of whether this contributes to a decline in liberal peacebuilding as a coherent or perhaps viable project. Abdenur (2019: 50) suggests that the shifting global balance of power allows rising states “to boost their normative influence as well as operational role in international security and governance. UN peacekeeping has thus become part of a broader ‘rising power strategy’ that combines intensifying engagement even as those states remain dissatisfied with the concentration of decision-making at the hands of Western states.” However, it remains to be seen if this will evolve into a coherent model of peacebuilding.

China's Peacebuilding Activities

As a result of China's increasing support for, and involvement in, peace operations, there has been growing interest in the impact that this may be having upon international peacebuilding practices, norms, and doctrines. Specifically, a key concern for the peacebuilding field is if – and how – China's growing assertiveness in international politics will be translated into new approaches to peacebuilding or even a new doctrine. This is a part of a broader debate about global governance in a changing international order. De Carvalho and de Coning (2013) link the activities of rising powers in peacekeeping and peacebuilding closely to the changing international order, arguing that this is one instrument used by these powers to reform the global order in line with a more equitable and stable vision. In line with this, peacebuilding would ideally no longer be associated with a Western model – something associated with liberal peacebuilding – and would be more sensitive to state sovereignty and national ownership. Others (Richmond and Tellidis 2014: 578) agree that rising powers are slowly transforming the norms and practices of international peacebuilding, which involves resisting some elements of the liberal agenda, but find that “No clear alternative model, ideology, model of state, or model of peace is on offer by the BRICS or other emerging powers.”

The involvement of China in evolving international peacekeeping and peacebuilding activities is at the heart of this debate because that country is driving the transitional international order and because its engagement in peace operations has increased very considerably in recent years. As a result, China has been a particular focus for scholars interested in the evolution of peacebuilding. Zhao (2011) has argued that China's contribution to peace operations have become central to its international strategy, aimed at building harmony based upon peace and common prosperity. Others (Hirono and Lanteigne 2011) have suggested that China's peace activities have also sought to improve China's international image, as a part of its desire to spread influence and economic ties. Yet China is aware of the suspicions of some countries regarding its motives, and this has resulted in it being quite reserved in terms of seeking to serve its direct interests through its activities. In the African context, Alden and Large (2013) found that China's peacebuilding has been characterized by an emphasis upon political stability (rather than democracy), indigenous African ownership, economic development, and the centrality of the state (see also Menegazzi 2012). This does, at least in theory, suggest a shift away from the liberal peacebuilding model.

The activities that China has been involved in are interesting from the point of view of these debates. Peacekeeping forces sent by China have tended to be engineering soldiers, medical personnel, and other logistic assets. Military observers and civilian police have also been dispatched to UN peacekeeping missions. China has still not had much involvement in political reconstruction, legal matters, or the building or rebuilding of institutions. More specifically, Chinese peacekeepers have been involved in mine clearance; eliminating unexploded ordinance; road, bridge, and airport construction; building water and power supply facilities; the transportation of personnel and materials; medical treatment and hygiene; and disease control (Zhao 2010). Thus, China tends to focus on its “hard” rather than “soft” contributions, and in line with this, it has participated in many more peacekeeping than peacebuilding missions (Li 2012). Moreover, other Chinese entities – such as civil society and private sector actors – rarely participate in international peace operations, which further reinforces the idea that China is more comfortable in traditional peace support roles. Nevertheless, in providing logistic services such as medical treatment, transportation, and communications, these activities are essential to building peace, as they create a sustainable and peaceful social environment for the areas that have experienced armed conflict.

Since the early 1990s, China has participated in 24 UN peace operations, sending a total of over 36,000 military peacekeeping personnel. China is already the second largest financial contributor to UN peace operations, with the number of Chinese personnel who join operations being larger than that of all the other members of the UN Security Council combined (see Tables 1 and 2).

According to the statistics from United Nations Peacekeeping Website in 2019, China sent a total of 2521 peacekeepers on missions, ranking as the 11th among all other national contributors (Table 3).

China has paid a particularly important role in some African cases. According to Yuan (2014), China’s activities have focused on supporting military capacity building, participation in UN peacekeeping and peacebuilding operations, and supporting African regional organizations in building their capacity for independently resolving conflicts. China has also played a role in the provision of good offices, mediating between protagonists in African conflicts, and supporting Africa in addressing non-traditional security issues.

A key illustrative case is that of Sudan. From the signing of the comprehensive peace agreement in 2005 to the independence of South Sudan, China’s participation in the post-war reconstruction has had four main themes. First, China has been involved in the UN operation in Sudan since 2005 and the AU/UN operation in Darfur since 2007, sending engineering service units to provide logistics support for both multilateral operations. Second, China has supported Sudan’s development assistance projects. In 2007, it agreed to cancel $80 million of Sudan’s debt and provided $13 million in interest-free loans for infrastructure projects. China also provided mobile boarding houses, vehicles, power stations, water pumps, and other facilities to local schools for the resumption of production and development. Third, China has more economic cooperation with Sudan outside the formal framework of multilateral post-war assistance. It supports development projects in Sudan to expand economic relations and has also built transportation and energy infrastructure following the comprehensive peace agreement. Fourth, China has participated in multilateral forums to explore solutions to the Darfur conflict and

Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order, Table 1 Peacekeeping budget share of permanent members of the Security Council 2001–2018 (%)

| Country | Year | | | | | |
|---------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------|-----------|
| | 2001–2003 | 2004–2006 | 2007–2009 | 2010–2012 | 2013–2015 | 2016–2018 |
| China | 1.9 | 2.4 | 3.2 | 3.9 | 6.6 | 10.2 |
| France | 8.0 | 7.3 | 7.5 | 7.5 | 7.2 | 6.2 |
| Russia | 1.4 | 1.3 | 0.8 | 1.9 | 3.1 | 3.9 |
| UK | 6.9 | 7.4 | 7.9 | 8.1 | 6.6 | 5.7 |
| USA | 27.3 | 26.6 | 26.2 | 27.1 | 28.3 | 28.40 |

Sources: A/C. 5/55/38, A/58/157/Add.1, A/61/139, A/67/224/Add.1, A/70/331 United Nations General Assembly Resolution (Li 2018)

Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order, Table 2 UN peacekeeping troops of permanent members of the Security Council (1990–2017)

| Country | Year | | | | | | |
|---------|------|------|------|------|------|------|------|
| | 1990 | 1992 | 1994 | 2000 | 2005 | 2010 | 2017 |
| China | 5 | 488 | 60 | 53 | 869 | 2008 | 2654 |
| France | 525 | 6502 | 5149 | 493 | 600 | 1609 | 825 |
| Russia | 35 | 1056 | 1550 | 292 | 331 | 356 | 91 |
| UK | 769 | 3719 | 3820 | 565 | 384 | 283 | 705 |
| USA | 33 | 436 | 963 | 845 | 344 | 87 | 67 |

Sources: <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/troop-and-police-contributors> Visit time: March 13, 2018. Note: Statistics in 1990 are from November. Statistics in 1992 and 1995 are from December. Statistics in 2000 to 2017 are from August each year (Li 2018)

Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order, Table 3 Personnel sent by Chinese government in UN peacekeeping

| Police | UNMEN | Troops | Staff officers | Total |
|--------|-------|--------|----------------|-------|
| 3 | 31 | 2437 | 50 | 2521 |

Sources: United Nations Peacekeeping Website: <https://peacekeeping.un.org/zh/data> leverage China’s influence in Sudan to support the goals of the comprehensive peace agreement (Wang 2012).

The presence of China – as a non-Western state – has occasionally been politically important in securing the support of local actors. In 2007, the UN sought to deploy peacekeepers in Darfur but met opposition from the Sudanese government. Western powers had little influence upon the government because of their sanctions, while China was the only major country that maintained effective political ties with Sudan, a relationship it used to persuade the government to agree to the establishment of the African Union-United Nations Mixed Operations in Darfur. China has also been substantively involved in the peace process in DRC, Afghanistan, South Sudan, and Syria, using its political and economic leverage in various ways. It has dispatched special envoys to these countries or regions, actively participated in mediation and negotiation, and sometimes engaged in constructive dialogue with the opposition and anti-government armed forces of relevant countries, inviting them to send representatives to Beijing to participate in peace dialogue activities (He 2017).

The Evolution of China’s Peace and Security Roles

For decades after joining the United Nations, China was reluctant to participate in UN peacekeeping missions and was often a conservative voice on the Security Council, largely because of its attachment to a strict doctrine of state sovereignty and territorial integrity, and an unwillingness to accept any intrusion against the principle of domestic jurisdiction. Yet since the 1990s China has increasingly supported peace operations – even becoming as “enthusiastic supporter” (Hirono and Lanteigne 2011: 243).

Thus, in 1988, China applied to join the United Nations Peacekeeping Operations Special Committee, and in 1989 it dispatched 20 civilian inspectors to the United Nations Transitional Assistance Group in Namibia (Zhao et al. 2018). Nevertheless, while other large countries freely deployed personnel to peacekeeping operations in the 1990s, China acted cautiously toward the UN’s expansion of its peace and security work, and its involvement was more of a symbolic nature. In the first decade of the twenty-first century, the scale of UN peacekeeping shrank, and the number of personnel sent by developed countries also dropped. In contrast, China’s participation and contribution increased during the same period.

China has long adhered to the principle of “non-interference” in participating in UN peace operations – together with respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty – and this has shaped its involvement in all such activities. Nevertheless, China has gradually changed its attitude toward national sovereignty and non-interference in participating in peacekeeping, agreeing that the UN Security Council should authorize measures to protect civilians on the case-by-case basis. However, China stresses that conflict-affected states should bear the primary responsibility for protecting their own people. Moreover, it firmly believes that the Security Council is the only body that can legitimately authorize the use of force, which must be the last resort and can only work with the support of political processes, dialogue, and diplomatic means (An 2018:58).

China’s peacekeeping operations in Africa are indicative in this regard, where China has formed a unique model of peacekeeping with distinctive characteristics. In particular, China integrates development concepts into peacekeeping operations and focuses on restoring and rebuilding people’s livelihoods. Yet China has become slowly more engaged with coercion. At the end of 2012, its personnel in Mali were authorized to use reasonable force, and in 2015, the first infantry battalion sent to South Sudan was equipped with light weapons for self-defense, mobile-armored personnel carriers, and protective equipment including body armor and helmets (Yao 2018: 133).

China's Peacebuilding Activities in Context

Participating in peace operations is regarded in China as being of importance to the building of China's national image: a platform for promoting China's diplomatic vision of building a "Community of Shared Future for all Humankind," but also an important vehicle for fulfilling China's international commitments as a "responsible major power." It thus provides an opportunity to demonstrate the peaceful yet powerful image of the Chinese armed forces, but also is helpful to cultivate the strategic confidence and enhance the patriotism of overseas Chinese (Hu 2017: 99). Similarly, Zhao (2011) suggests that China's support of peacebuilding benefits the promotion of "soft power" and thus contributes to changing the international community's perception of China.

According to Shi (2016), a number of factors explain China's increased engagement in peacebuilding since President Xi Jinping came into power. Firstly, China has pursued a more active foreign policy overall, and this is reflected in a number of multilateral issue areas. Since the 18th National Congress of the Communist Party of China in 2012, China has been more active in the international arena and adopted a further opening strategy. As a permanent member of the UNSC, it has also come to accept that it has a special responsibility. Secondly, this increased activity in peace operations arises out of a change in China's security outlook. Participation in UN's peacekeeping missions can bring stability to conflict-prone societies, promote regional peaceful development, and help to address terrorism, which benefits China's security in the long run. Thirdly, with an increase in China's engagement throughout the world, there is a need to protect overseas interests. Joining UN peacekeeping missions is an important way of dispatching security forces overseas in line with a broad goal of stabilizing regions where China has economic interests. Finally, military and civilian deployment in peace operations is seen as a means to enhance the capacity of China's military and police forces. For example, during the peacekeeping mission in DRC, the Chinese army realized long-distance transoceanic reach for the first time and thus elevated its mobility in long-distance operational efficiency.

However, He Yin (2016: 40) argues that, despite China's permanent membership of the Security Council, it still has a low voice in peacekeeping and peacebuilding affairs and is thus not prominent in shaping peacekeeping practices and norms. Yet participation in peace operations has arguably served to bolster China's relationship with the United States and other Western governments. Military transparency and political mutual trust can be strengthened by increasing military engagement in peace missions, which is regarded and valued as a significant form of confidence building (Zhao 2011).

China has often had a different attitude to that which underpins Western approaches to international intervention and peacebuilding – something illustrated by China's opposition to UN Security Council action on the Syrian crisis (Menegazzi, 2012), which was reminiscent of historical behaviour. China remains skeptical toward elements of Western-led peacebuilding from a communitarian perspective, often citing principles of sovereignty, territorial integrity, and the right of each society to find its own solutions to its challenges in line with its own culture, level of development, and needs (Wang and Zhang 2018). There remain reservations within the Chinese foreign policy establishment regarding elements of the liberal peacebuilding model – for example, in building national institutions and promoting particular types of governance – and clear differences in terms of what is believed to be feasible and legitimate (see Table 4). This is very much reflected in China's National Defense in 2000 strategy. China's own experience of realizing domestic stability and peace has shaped its Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order, Table 4 The different cognition on “peacebuilding” of China and Western countries (Zhao 2010)

| | “Western” approach | Approach of China and other developing countries |
|------------------------------------|---|---|
| Purpose of peacebuilding | Liberal democracy, market economy priority | Prioritize developing economy |
| Focus of peacebuilding | Good governance | Governance with virtue |
| Principles of peacebuilding | Democracy promotion, external assistance | Principle of assistance Principle of non-interference |
| Strategic culture in peacebuilding | Preemptive | Passive reaction |
| Main ways of peacebuilding | Amend the constitution; hold general elections; set up multiparty system; build the civil society | Top-down instruction; improve the administrative function of government; improve the country’s own capacity | approach to international peace: upholding sovereignty and independence, improving peace and stability through development, and conducting gradual democratic reforms (Information Office of the State Council of the People’s Republic of China 2000).

Above all, China’s antipathy toward anything which resembles interference is a defining characteristic of the country’s approach to peace operations, in addition to a greater emphasis upon development (Zhu 2000). It is therefore instructive that Premier Wen Jiabao suggested that the Security Council “must adhere to the Hammarskjöld principles of impartiality, consent of the parties and non-use of force except in self-defence. It should consult closely with the parties concerned, step up cooperation with regional organizations, make overall arrangements for entry and exit strategies, coordinate military and political efforts and authorize the deployment of peacekeeping missions at an appropriate time on the basis of thorough analysis of all factors” (Wen 2010).

Summary

China’s approach to peacebuilding reflects clear differences from the liberal model promoted as the international “mainstream” by Western countries since the 1990s. Given the global context – the decline of liberal internationalism and the relative rise of non-Western states – and China’s growing interest in the promotion of peace, this does suggest an evolution away from liberal peacebuilding. China’s approach – in line with other rising powers which contribute to peacebuilding – rests far more upon principles of national autonomy and unity, a sense of culture and history, and social and economic development as a foundation for peace (Wang and Zhang 2018). China has spread the norm of “developmental peace” through aid, investment, and other international practices, and this is also in tension with some aspects of the liberal peace (He 2014: 121). Above all, the promotion of democracy, free market reform, and (re)building state institutions are certainly not at the heart of its approach to peacebuilding.

There is also a strong element of pragmatism and self-interest behind China’s engagement with international peacebuilding – connected to China’s overseas investment, security and trading ties, and its desire to elevate its own reputation as a responsible global power – which has meant that its approach is less ideological than the liberal approach. This results in less coherence and raises doubts as to whether a post-liberal approach to peacebuilding will gain traction. Yet given the limitations and controversies associated with liberal peacebuilding, the decline of a universalizing model of peacebuilding may be welcomed by many.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Abdenur, A. E. (2019). UN peacekeeping in a multipolar world order: Norms, role expectations, and leadership. In C. de Coning & M. Peter (Eds.), United Nations peace operations in a changing global order. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Alden, C., & Large, D. (2013). China's evolving policy towards peace and security in Africa: Constructing a new paradigm for peace building? In M. G. Berhe & L. Hongwue (Eds.), China Africa relations: Governance, peace, and security. Ethiopia: Institute for Peace and Security Studies (Addis Ababa University) and Institute of African Studies (Zhejiang Normal University).
- Campbell, S., David, C., & Meera, S. (2011). A liberal peace?: the problems and practices of peacebuilding. Zed Books Ltd.
- Collier, P. (2009). Wars, guns & votes: democracy in dangerous places. Oxford: The Bodley Head.
- De Carvalho, B., & de Coning, C. (2013). Rising powers and the future of peacekeeping and peacebuilding (Norwegian Centre for Conflict Resolution (NOREF) report). Oslo: Norwegian Peacebuilding Resource Centre.
- Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Fortna, V. P. (2008). Does Peacekeeping Work? Shaping Belligerents' Choices after Civil War. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Goldstone, J. A., Bates, R. H., Epstein, D. L., Gurr, T. R., Lustik, M. B., Marshall, M., Ulfelder, J., & Woodward, M. (2010). A global model for forecasting political instability. American Journal of Political Science, 54(1), 190–208.
- Hirono, M., & Lanteigne, M. (2011). Introduction: China and UN peacekeeping. International Peacekeeping, 18(3), 243–256.
- Jacoby, T. (2007). Hegemony, modernisation and post-war reconstruction. Global Society, 21(4), 521–37.
- Karlsrud, J. (2019). From liberal peacebuilding to stabilization and counterterrorism. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 1–21.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: hybrid forms of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Menegazzi, S. (2012). China reinterprets the liberal peace (IAI working papers no.1230). Roma: Istituto affari internazionali.
- Newman, E. (2011). A human security peace-building agenda. Third World Quarterly, 32(10), 1737–1756.
- Newman, E. (2013). The international architecture of peacebuilding. In R. M. Ginty (Ed.), Handbook on peacebuilding. London: Routledge.
- Newman, E., & Zala, B. (2018). Rising powers and order contestation: Disaggregating the normative from the representational. Third World Quarterly, 39(5), 871–888.
- Newman, E., Paris, R., & Richmond, O. P. (eds) (2009). New Perspectives on Liberal Peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Paul, T. V., Larson, D. W., & Wohlforth, W. C. (eds.) (2014). Status in world politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). A post-liberal peace: eirenism and the everyday. Review of International Studies, 35, pp. 557–580.
- Richmond, O. P., & Tellidis, I. (2014). Emerging actors in international peacebuilding and statebuilding: Status quo or critical states? Global Governance, 20, 563–584.
- Sherriff, A., Veron, P., Deneckere, M., & Hauck, V. (2018). Supporting peacebuilding in times of change: A synthesis of 4 case studies. Maastricht: ECDPM September.
- Stuenkel, O. (2016). Post-Western World: how emerging powers are remaking global order. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Tadjbakhsh S. ed., (2011). Rethinking the liberal peace external models and local alternatives. London, Routledge.
- Xiaoyu, P. (2012). Socialisation as a two-way process: emerging powers and the diffusion of international norms. The Chinese Journal of International Politics 5(4), 341–367.
- Zhao, L. (2011). Two pillars of China's global peace engagement strategy: UN peacekeeping and international peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 18(3), 344–362.

Chinese Language Sources

- An, D. (2018). China's peacekeeping operations under the 2030 agenda for sustainable development. Journal of Strategy and Decision-Making, 5, 47–73.
- He, Y. (2014). Norms of non-conflict and complementarity – A case study of peacebuilding. World Economics and Politics, 4, 105–121.
- He, Y. (2016). United Nations peacekeeping affairs and China's discursive power. World Economics and Politics, 11, 40–61.
- He, Y. (2017). Developmental peace: Chinese approach to U.N. peacekeeping and peacebuilding. The Journal of International Studies, 38(4), 10–32.

- Hu, E. (2017). UN peacekeeping operations and China's National Image Building. Public Diplomacy Quarterly, 3, 92–99.
- Information Office of the State Council of the People's Republic of China. (2000). China's National Defense in 2000. http://www.gov.cn/english/official/2005-07/27/content_17524.htm
- Li, D. (2012). The prospect of China's role in UN peacekeeping. Foreign Affairs Review, 3, 1–14.
- Li, D. (2018). International peacekeeping operations: Chinese concept and framework. World Economics and Politics, 4, 90–105.
- Shi, H. (2016). Analysis on the motivations of China's participation in peacekeeping operations. Industrial & Science Tribune, 15(22), 110–111.
- Wang, X. (2012). Review on China's role on African peacekeeping and peacebuilding. International Studies, 1, 29–42.
- Wang, X., & Zhang, J. (2018). China's role in the reformation of international peace framework: A case study of Africa. Area Studies and Global Development, 3, 35–45.
- Wen, J. (2010). Statement by Chinese Premier Wen Jiabao at the UN Security Council Summit. <http://www.china-un.org/eng/zt/wjb65ga/t757366.htm>
- Yao, L. (2018). The evolution of China's role in African security governance in a new era – A case study of peacekeeping operations. Journal of International Relations, 3, 119–138.
- Yuan, W. (2014). Peace and security in Africa: China's vision, role and challenges. West Asia and Africa, 4, 64–80.
- Zhao, L. (2010). China's strategies on upholding international peace. Journal of University of International Relations, 3, 47–54.
- Zhao, G., et al. (2018). Influence of UN reforms on China's participation in UN peacekeeping operations. Journal of the Armed Police Academy, 34(7), 55–59.
- Zhu, R. (2000). Report on the work of the government. http://www.gov.cn/english/official/2005-07/22/content_16669.htm

Liberalism

- ▶ Emancipatory Peace

Liberation Struggles

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

Local

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Local Civil Dialogue

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Local Peacebuilding

Maxwell Adjei¹ and Landon E. Hancock²

¹Department of Political Science, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

²School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Synonyms

Communitarian peacebuilding; Grassroots peacebuilding

Definition/Description

Local peacebuilding refers to peacebuilding activities that take place on the local or communal level. These activities tend to focus on local communities and issues of local governance, standing in contrast to statebuilding activities such as security sector reform, institutional reform, constitution writing, and the construction of national democratic structures. Local peacebuilding examines the microlevel impacts of statebuilding as well as peacebuilding activities that develop at the local level, either for local benefit or as attempts to influence national-level policies and debates.

Introduction

The end of the Cold War and its attendant political discord between the West and the Soviet Union ushered the world into a new era of liberal dominance which orchestrated, among other things, a comprehensive form of external intervention in post-conflict countries – commonly called “post-conflict peacebuilding.” Unlike the limited interventions that took place during the Cold War to enforce peace agreements and monitor compliance to ceasefire arrangements, peacebuilding interventions took on more expansive tasks ranging from the provision of financial and humanitarian assistance to the rebuilding of physical infrastructure and the temporary takeover of local administrations to ensure that countries emerging from civil wars do not slip back into conflict (Paris 1997, p. 55). As a concept, peacebuilding was originally conceived of in the mid-1970s by Johan Galtung as a way of creating sustainable peace by addressing the “root causes” of conflict rather than just simply ending direct violence (Hancock 2017). The term, however, became popular in the early 1990s after UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali used it to refer to the various “actions [taken] to identify and support structures which will tend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid relapse into conflict” (Boutros-Ghali 1992, para. 21). Since its inception, the field of peacebuilding has been guided – and dominated – by the liberal peace theory, which assumes that the introduction and application of liberal policies such as democratic elections, free market-economics, the rule of law, and tenets of good governance are enough to transform post-conflict societies into politically stable and economically viable communities.

The results of the liberal approach to peacebuilding have, however, been mixed. Whereas peacebuilding interventions in countries like El Salvador and Namibia achieved relative success in their efforts to promote sustainable peace, those in Somalia, Rwanda, Bosnia, among many others, woefully underperformed (Howard 2002; Leonardsson and Rudd 2015). Consequently, several scholars have noted the limitations of liberal peacebuilding and highlighted numerous reasons why the approach may not achieve its goal but, instead, complicate the peace sustainability process (Donais 2009; Lederach 1997; Mac Ginty 2011; Paris 2010; Richmond 2011). One such limitation that has been noted with liberal peacebuilding is its potential to overlook local contributions toward peace processes and the failure to recognize – and account for – the power differential between “local” and international actors, ultimately creating a version of peace that is disconnected from local realities and suffers in terms of sustainability and legitimacy. To address this limitation, an increasing number of scholars and practitioners have focused on the need to emphasize the role of local individuals and communities in the context of post-conflict peacebuilding – initiating a trend that has come to be known as the “local turn in peacebuilding” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013).

Despite the influx of literature on local peacebuilding over the last two decades, discussions on the local in the context of peacebuilding are not entirely new. Early works from the 1990s by John Paul Lederach (1995, 1997) and Adam Curle (1994), for example, emphasized the marginalization of local knowledge and needs in externally led peace interventions in Central America and the former Yugoslavia, respectively. Whereas Lederach (1997, p. 94) denounced external dominance in peacebuilding interventions as “deeply problematic” and argued that “greatest resource for sustaining peace in the long term lies in local people and their culture,” Curle called on the peacebuilding community to “reject the central role of ‘foreign experts’ and [embrace] local peacemakers as the [true] experts [in peacebuilding] because...it is they, rather than any outside experts or authorities, who have the knowledge and the acceptability to recreate a healthy society” (1994, p. 103). Following these pioneering works and others, the literature on local peacebuilding has solidified around two main approaches to address the failures of peacebuilding, the reformist and the revolutionary or emancipatory. The reformist approach sees liberal peace as flawed, but still “fixable” with the inclusion of more locals and the reorientation of interventions to specifically address local needs and concerns (Arandel et al. 2015; Autesserre 2010; Paris 1997; Selby 2013), while the revolutionary approach raises fundamental questions about the legitimacy of liberal peace interventions, calling attention to their hegemonic underpinnings as well as their entrenchment of power asymmetries between Western countries and the Global South where most of these interventions often take place (Chandler 2013; Donais 2009; Duffield 2010; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013).

Besides the differing views on the “fixability” and legitimacy of liberal peacebuilding between the reformist and the revolutionary approaches, a number of issues including the definition and conceptualization of “the local,” the determination of the roles local and external actors must play in peacebuilding interventions, the difficulty in overcoming institutional and financial barriers to effective implementation, among many others, continue to dominate discussions in the local peacebuilding literature. More recently, another strong reaction against the feasibility of local peacebuilding has emerged in the literature. Led by peacebuilding scholars and practitioners (cf. Scheye and Peake 2005; Wong 2013), they argue that the clamor for local peacebuilding – and local ownership in particular – is “much more a rhetorical device than an actual guide for implementers” (Scheye and Peake 2005, p. 240). Thus, instead of having any meaningful impact on the way peacebuilding interventions are carried out around the world, at best, discussions on the local and local peacebuilding may have a “psychological effect” on the way peacebuilding interventions are put together. This piece provides an overview of some of the recent debates on local peacebuilding and offers a few suggestions for future research on the topic. It particularly takes note of the useful contributions peacebuilding models (such as Local Peace Committees – LPCs, Local Zones of Peace – ZoPs) have made towards the push to localize peacebuilding and suggests new ways through which research can help develop more understanding about their operations. It begins with a discussion of the challenges involved in conceptualizing the local and the numerous ways it has been operationalized within the literature. This is followed by a review of the main debates that have ensued on local peacebuilding. In the final section, it provides a few pointers for the direction of future research on the local and local peacebuilding.

Unpacking the “Local” in Local Peacebuilding

Despite the long association between the terms “local” and “peacebuilding” and the common belief, among scholars and practitioners alike, that localizing peacebuilding interventions will promote more sustainable and legitimate outcomes, there is no coherent view of what the “local” in peacebuilding actually means – or looks like – in practice. Some conceptualize the local as anything other than the international, which includes national states, national NGOs, regional or local governments or local communities (cf. Piccolino 2019; Shinoda 2008). Scholars such as Debiel and Rinck (2016), McCann (2015), and Hancock (2020) take an opposite view, arguing that the local should be defined by the beneficiaries of peacebuilding programs and projects, and moreover, that in these cases, processes of empowerment, agency, and accountability are often more important than deliverables or the larger concerns of funders. Others, such as Lambek (2011, p. 216) view the local as a set of practices and relationships that are internal rather than external, while Wiuff Moe (2013, p. 45) sees the local as concerned with the intersection of relationships and relationality combined with a focus on the everyday. This approach seeks to sidestep the spatial component of the local, and while it is vital to acknowledge the power of relationships in building local agency, the fact remains that peacebuilding – like the conflicts themselves – takes place in locales and involves the exercise of power, authority, and legitimacy. Depending on an individual’s view of how the local should be conceptualized, they are likely to have different interpretations of the local turn in peacebuilding and project different expectations for what local peacebuilding success looks like. Whereas some would place the local in juxtaposition to the national or the global and emphasize the accessibility, particularity, and participatory nature of the local as the main reason why peacebuilding should be focused at the level, others stress the agency and knowledgeability of locals as the primary reason for peacebuilding to go local (Bräuchler and Naucke 2017; Hancock 2017, 2020; Lambek 2011; Öjendal et al. 2017; Sisk 2009). Ultimately, as Öjendal et al. (2017, p. 22) note, these conceptions draw attention to the importance of the local context and stand in contrast to “centralized, instrumental, structural and large-scale approaches” that normally tend to marginalize locals in peacebuilding processes.

As empirical research on local peacebuilding continues to build steam, a growing number of scholars have begun to critically assess the conceptualizations of the local, its practicality, successes, and limitations. For the most part, while agreeing that the local lacks conceptual certainty and can be used both as a means for effective peacebuilding and liberal emancipation, they caution against the tendency to romanticize the concept and view it as a panacea for legitimacy in international peacebuilding (Leonardsson and Rudd 2015, p. 826; Mac Ginty 2015; Paris 2010; Richmond 2009). Mac Ginty and Richmond (2013, p. 770) note, for example, that local actors and contexts, like other social units, can be “partisan, discriminatory, exclusive and violent, and contain power relations and hierarchies.” It is therefore important, they argue, to forgo idealized views of the local as a harmonious unit with innate capacity to address the structural dynamics of conflict and power. Besides the tendency to romanticize the local, scholars argue that discussions of the local in peacebuilding tend to conflate local with national, and fail to distinguish between the local realities held by informal groups at the grassroots level, and those that are held by formalized civil-society groups and elites at the national level (Bräuchler and Naucke 2017; Donais 2012; Lee and Özerdem 2015b; Öjendal et al. 2017). Scholars highlight the widespread acceptance of national ownership as the guiding principle in global peacebuilding policy, for example, and ask questions about the extent to which such nationally inclined local policy is indeed representative of – and attentive to – the needs of individuals and groups (especially informal ones) at sub-national levels (Hingorani 2015; Rosenthal et al. 2015; Simons and Zanker 2014).

Others also draw attention to the vagueness of the concept and argue that the emphasis on local peacebuilding could promote a false dichotomy between the local and international and perpetuate essentialist notions of the local as a docile, dysfunctional, and apolitical group that needs to be discovered, brought-in, and empowered by external actors (Paffenholz 2015; Scheye and Peake 2005; Van Leeuwen et al. 2019; Wong 2013, p. 48). While undertaking a review of peacebuilding interventions in Burundi and DR Congo, for example, van Leeuwen et al. (2019) observed that not only did understandings of the local legitimize certain stakeholders and practices over others, they also contributed to the erroneous assumption that local actors existed and operated outside the realm of external and national influence, leading to the introduction of policies that were not feasible and/or sustainable in the long run. Essentially, the boundaries between the local, national, and international can be more complex than often let on by some proponents of the local turn (Debiel and Rinck 2016; Piccolino 2019). “The local is not necessarily exclusive of the national and international. Indeed, it is often much less ‘local’ than imagined; and is the product of constant social negotiation between localized and non-localized ideas, norms, and practices” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013, p. 770). Moreover, as Simons and Zanker (2014) note, local actors are usually part of complex networks of relationships reaching far beyond their specific areas of influence, and that the various practices, conventions, norms, and values prevailing in particular areas of social life are never static and constantly undergo changes in their interaction with the outside world (Van Leeuwen et al. 2019). “[A] ‘local-local’ sphere entirely decoupled from national, regional or international agency simply does not exist” (Simons and Zanker 2014, p. 14), and peacebuilding processes that are isolated to the local level are even less likely to be successful. Local peacebuilding describes a focal point for action, namely at the local level, and one that is typically driven largely, if not wholly, by those residing in that locality. Peace formation, by contrast, appears to describe a set of localized practices that can be engaged in by locals, but also, by necessity, involve networking across multiple levels of focal action or place (Richmond 2014, 134). It is quite possible that some local peacebuilding efforts might involve processes of peace formation – such as the work of San Jose de Apartado in Colombia – but some might not – such as the original work of the Constituent Assembly of Mogotes – also in Colombia – which served as the inspiration for REDEPAZ’ “100 Municipalities of Peace” program (see Hancock and Iyer 2007; Mitchell and Rojas 2012). Thus, as Mitchell and Hancock (2012) argue, without sustained deliberate efforts to connect peacebuilding activities at the grassroots (local) level to those at the national level, they will remain fragile as they are always subject to the changes in the larger conflict at that (national) level.

Evidently, the local is a very flexible, relative, and highly contested concept that defies a simple explanation. However, regardless of the difficulties involved in conceptualizing and operationalizing the concept, there is close to unanimous agreement within the peacebuilding community that “the local turn” offers a critical and analytical usefulness to the study and praxis of peacebuilding. In the view of Hughes et al. (2015, p. 818), perhaps the most crucial opportunity offered by the local to observers and practitioners of peacebuilding is “to draw attention to the [problematic nature] of defining any particular population in terms of a predeterminable set of aspirations and needs.” Thus, by emphasizing the importance of including the agency and voices of those who are on the receiving end of externally driven peace interventions, the local serves as a reminder that “international peacebuilding is rooted neither in democracy nor in some kind of cultural doxa; it is not representative and its claims to universalism can therefore never be substantiated” (Belloni 2012, p. 34; Hughes et al. 2015, p. 818). Furthermore, discussions of the local in peacebuilding demonstrate a “new level of self-reflexibility on the part of intervenors” that brings into focus the fact that external peacebuilders make decisions for and about people whom they do not know and do not speak for, and should, therefore, refrain from certain acts and practices that seek to justify their decisions a priori (Chadwick et al. 2013; de Coning 2013). Essentially, since the political, economic, social, and cultural factors that influence people’s daily lives differ from place to place, peace cannot be the result of measures taken as part of the international community’s peacebuilding template; it has to be grounded in the “everyday” realities and expectations of the people living in those “local” communities where the interventions take place (Belloni 2012, p. 34; Hancock and Mitchell 2018; Mac Ginty 2015).

The prolonged discussion on the local and the increasing attention to its importance in peacebuilding interventions has resulted in a lively debate putting forward several ideas on how the peacebuilding community can support localized peacebuilding processes and enhance the practice of peacebuilding in general.

Main Debates

The discourse on “the local turn in peacebuilding” has broadly coalesced around two approaches, the reformist and the revolutionary. On the one hand, reformists seek to improve the effectiveness of peacebuilding interventions by emphasizing the need for broader participation by locals in the peacebuilding process; demanding more transparency and accountability from foreign “experts”; and stressing on the need for intervenors to build local capacity and strengthen local institutions (Autesserre 2014; Bellamy 2004; Odendaal 2013). From this perspective, even though international peacebuilding with its liberal underpinnings has some flaws and limitations, it can be “fixed” with the right changes and some more attention to context-specific details. Roland Paris (1997, p. 58) argues that instead of abandoning liberal peacebuilding for its tendency to instigate violence by introducing politically charged processes like democracy and capitalism at the early stages in post-conflict countries, peacebuilders should pursue “strategic liberalization” by taking a gradual approach to introduce the elements of liberalism. Thus, he calls for an “Institutionalization Before Liberalization” approach that emphasizes the building and strengthening of local institutions before potentially contentious policies of political and economic liberalization (like elections) are fully rolled out. By contrast, revolutionaries are more concerned about the overall structure of peacebuilding as currently practiced. They argue that its Western-centric approach does not, and often cannot, promote local ownership or agency and does little to encourage the valuing of diverse perspectives and voices, especially at the local level (Donais 2009; Hancock 2017; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Väyrynen 2013). Moreover, with its heavy reliance on pre-determined liberal principles often alien to the receiving countries, revolutionaries argue that international peacebuilding upholds global hegemonic/imperialistic structures and fails to confront the injustices that occur in global power politics (Duffield 2001, 2010; Jabri 2013). To improve the current practice of peacebuilding, this group therefore suggests the creation of an alternative emancipatory approach that builds peace from below, through local initiatives and everyday interactions that are legitimate and have a concrete impact on the life of citizens and communities (Eriksen 2009; Hancock 2018, 2020; Piccolino 2019; Richmond 2012).

While the discourse between reformists and revolutionaries continues to inform the theory and praxis on local peacebuilding, a good deal of literature has also discussed the role local and external actors play in peacebuilding, and the kinds of relationships and interactions that take place between the two (Boege et al. 2009; Chandler 2013; Donais 2009, 2012; Lilja and Höglund 2018; Mac Ginty 2010; Mac Ginty and Sanghera 2012). Lilja and Höglund (2018), reviewing the activities of five international organizations engaged in peacebuilding processes in Africa and the Middle East, observed that external actors perform two important functions in support of local peacebuilding: as risk absorbers and as accompanying actors. They argue that as risk absorbers, external peacebuilders with their relatively vast resources can offer financial support to local peacebuilders while building their capacity to address some of the personal and political risks they face in their operations. Similarly, external actors may also help to absorb some of the political risks associated with donors' direct engagement with local peacebuilders in opposition parties and/or non-state armed groups. By providing accompaniment, external actors can engage in activities that preserve local-external partnerships in the long run and strengthen local agency in a more sustained manner once peacebuilding interventions have been concluded (Lilja and Höglund 2018, pp. 454–425). Van Brabant (2010, p. 6) argues that external actors significantly contribute to peacebuilding by “lobbying, advocating, and raising awareness internationally on the local and international causes of the conflict and on peace initiatives by [locals].” These actors also provide comparative experiences and techniques from other settings in ways that can inform locals of the broader dynamics of the conflict, while creating a “safe space” where all sides of the conflict can come together for dialogue, training, and negotiations, if necessary (Anderson et al. 2003; Van Brabant 2010). For critical scholars such as Chandler (2013) and Jabri (2013), too much emphasis on what external actors can do to promote peace in post-conflict countries and an over-reliance on external resources for peacebuilding can undermine local agency and constrain local autonomy as well as the capacity for self-governance at the local level. Hence, there is a need to strike a careful balance between external involvement and responsible self-governance in a way that promotes accountability on the part of local and external actors, while also ensuring the legitimacy of their peacebuilding contributions and outcomes (Bojicic-Dzelilovic and Martin 2016; Hancock 2018; Narten 2009). Moreover, contrary to the idealistic representations of local “buy-in”/ acceptance of external involvement in peacebuilding, several scholars have found that the relationship between local and external actors is often contentious with locals either refusing to take ownership of external peacebuilding programs or bending them to their own goals – a result that has been referred to as hybrid peacebuilding (Belloni 2012; Boege et al. 2009; Kraushaar and Lambach 2009; Mac Ginty 2010).

The role locals play in peacebuilding and the extent to which it impacts on their decision to take ownership of the outcomes of peacebuilding programs has consequently become the subject of numerous studies on local peacebuilding. As Richmond (2012) puts it, with the increasing attention to its importance for the sustainability and legitimacy of peacebuilding programs, “local ownership” has become the latest buzzword in international peacebuilding. With local ownership, peacebuilding activities are expected to encounter minimal resistance from the local actors and be more sustainable in the long term since their outcomes are widely seen as legitimate by the locals and not dependent on the presence of external actors or the availability of their financial resources (Poulligny 2009; Van Brabant 2010; von Billerbeck 2015; Wong 2013). Despite its increasing prominence and salience to peacebuilding, local ownership remains a loosely defined concept with vague, ambiguous, and sometimes contradictory interpretations, representing everything from a turn-key operation to full control over the design and implementation of peacebuilding programs (Hancock 2017; Lee and Özerdem 2015a; Reich 2006). As Reich (2006) observes, there is no concrete definition of local ownership, even in the policy papers or conceptual frameworks that discuss its implications and emphasize its importance. There is no clarity about which locals must be included in peacebuilding processes to enhance local ownership – (should they be state officials, civil society organizations, or indigenous groups and individuals at the community level?) – and, more importantly, the extent to which such locals must be involved for local ownership to emerge organically (Jarstad and Olsson 2012; Sending 2010; Shinoda 2008).

In the view of Donais (2012), there are two main perspectives on how local ownership can be attained in peacebuilding: the maximalist and the minimalist. From the maximalist perspective, external actors are relegated to being little more than check-writers for local peacebuilders. Thus, the best way to ensure local ownership, according to this perspective, is for international peacebuilders to support and finance peacebuilding projects that are primarily designed and implemented by locals. The minimalist perspective expects external actors to be in the driving seat of peacebuilding processes but to engage locals in a way that causes them to “buy-in” and take ownership of the outcomes of those processes. Hence, external actors may “convince and cajole” locals and build their capacities in a way that prods them to voluntarily takeover the management of externally driven peacebuilding initiatives once their interventions have come to an end (Donais 2012, p. 4). While the maximalist perspective has been criticized for not taking the potential problems of a “hands-off” doctrine such as corruption, weak local capacity, or the hijack of external resources by local elites seriously enough (Lee and Özerdem 2015a; Reich 2006; Shinoda 2008), the minimalist view has been criticized for merely using local ownership as a rhetorical device to legitimize external interventions while denying locals of their true power and agency in peacebuilding programs (de Coning 2013; Hancock 2017; Richmond 2012). Regardless of these criticisms, Donais (2012) maintains that, if properly conceived and anchored in the principles of shared ownership, or partnership, and built upon processes of consensus-building taking place at all levels of peacebuilding activity (through vertical integration), local ownership can address some of the major limitations of liberal peacebuilding and inspire an improved version of peacebuilding that is communitarian in nature. Hancock (2017) argues that while calls for shared ownership and vertical integration are a step in the right direction, they cannot improve the practice of peacebuilding by themselves if unaccompanied by local agency, which he defines as a basic human need that must be satisfied in order to meet the psychosocial needs of human beings and their communities. Hence, instead of pursuing peacebuilding programs that exclusively satisfy the needs of local communities or those of the international community, peacebuilders can design models (such as local zones of peace, ZoPs) that “could both meet local needs for agency and also produce the deliverable results sought by international peacebuilders and funders” (Hancock 2017, p. 260). In places like Colombia, the Philippines, and El Salvador, for example, these ZoPs have through their deliberative governance structures (of public participation, procedural justice, and accountability) enhanced local agency and the legitimacy of peacebuilding programs while addressing international concerns regarding corruption and inefficient practices (Hancock 2018, p. 26).

Future Trajectories and Recommendations

It is now widely acknowledged within the peacebuilding community that the discourse on local peacebuilding has inspired new and innovative ways of thinking about how peace interventions must be carried out in post-conflict settings.

The idea that locals must be actively involved in peacebuilding processes – if not leading them – is migrating to the mainstream and has become largely uncontested in peacebuilding circles. When reviewing some of the more recent works on local peacebuilding, one can see how peacebuilding scholars and practitioners struggle to conceptualize and define the local in peacebuilding contexts, and how these struggles translate into operational difficulties for the implementation of “local peacebuilding” and other related concepts such as “local ownership.” As Pouligny (2009) notes, the practical application of “local ownership” to peacebuilding and humanitarian action processes has been more difficult and slower than what many scholars and practitioners had expected. However, because the international community continues to play a critical role in providing funds and organizing peacebuilding interventions for communities and groups of people whom they do not know and do not speak for, there is every reason to believe that discussions on the local and “local peacebuilding” will remain active and increasingly important within the peacebuilding community. As the research and praxis of local peacebuilding progresses, there are a few issues and areas that will require some more attention and focus. First, in reviewing the literature, it is obvious that discussions on the ways in which international peacebuilders constrain local peacebuilding is far more limited than it should be. Often, the focus is on how the international peacebuilder’s failure to recognize and include locals in peacebuilding processes will compromise the outcomes of their peacebuilding efforts and make it more difficult to attain local ownership. There is, however, very little talk and discussion of the fact that international peacebuilders have the sole power of recognition and inclusion of locals in such peacebuilding processes. With most peacebuilding organizations relying on donations and funding from advanced, Western countries to pursue their interventions in less developed, “third world” countries, the peacebuilding process is inherently tied to the global power structure and its hegemonic underpinnings. International peacebuilders, due to their less restricted access to resources in the global capitalist system, will always wield more power and control over local actors even in arrangements that are considered to be equal partnerships or shared ownerships (Dillon and Reid 2009). It is therefore crucial for scholars of local peacebuilding to discuss whether and how external peacebuilders are addressing the grave power differentials between themselves and their recipient communities. Thus, instead of approaching local peacebuilding and the lack of “local ownership” from the perspective of external actors not including locals in their peacebuilding activities, more focus should be on how they (external peacebuilders) are in a privileged position of power to have the sole authority in determining which locals must be empowered (or disempowered) in peacebuilding processes, and more importantly how that power can be transformed to ensure more balance and equality between external and local actors.

A few scholars have begun to take on this issue and have proposed peacebuilding models that consciously transfer power to local peacebuilders and valorize the contributions of locals to peacebuilding processes. These models which include local peace committees – LPCs (Lederach 1997; Odendaal 2010; van Tongeren 2011), local zones of peace – ZoPs (Garcia 1997; Hancock and Mitchell 2007; Mitchell and Nan 1997), infrastructures for peace – I4Ps (Hopp-Nishanka 2013; Reychler 2002), and local conflict management institutions – LCMIIs (Millar 2016) emphasize the presence and effectiveness of locally derived peacebuilding initiatives while highlighting the numerous ways in which locals take charge of their peacebuilding processes even without the assistance and/or direction of external peacebuilders. Unlike liberal peacebuilding frameworks, which tend to focus peacebuilding activities at the national or state level in the hope that peace achieved at the level will automatically trickle down to the local spheres, these peacebuilding models emphasize the need for agency at the local level, as Richmond (2012) would say, and provide sustained linkages between different societal levels (top-level, middle-range, and grassroots) when used to address conflicts (Giessmann 2016; Kumar 2012; Lederach 1997). Moreover, there is evidence to suggest that these peacebuilding models (LPCs, ZoPs, I4Ps, LCMIIs, etc.) are usually inclusive and often create space for the involvement of a diverse group of people – including women who tend to be marginalized (Adjei 2019; Donahoe 2017) – in peacebuilding processes at the local level (Hancock 2017; Hopp-Nishanka 2016; Odendaal 2012; van Tongeren 2011). Some preliminary research on the internal processes of these local peace initiatives has provided several findings. These include from Idler et al. (2015) showing that when leadership is diffuse and communication between leaders and the community is widespread, then ZoPs in an active conflict zone are better able to withstand pressures brought upon them by both armed insurgents and government forces. Likewise, earlier work by Mitchell and Hancock (2007, p. 212) notes that successful peace zones have been characterized by high levels of communal cohesion and “the existence of effective and accepted collective leadership.” Collective leadership has also been present in peace zones in West Africa (Allouche and Jackson 2019), in South Africa’s Local and Regional Peace Committees (Odendaal 2012), and Nicaragua’s Peace Commissions (Mouly 2013). Hancock’s (2017, 2018, 2020) work on agency and legitimacy tackles the issue of relationships between local peacebuilders, funding organs and the local communities that they serve. This work outlines the problems that local peacebuilders have when trying to negotiate the need for external funding, which leads to reporting requirements and accountability to funders, often limiting the peacebuilder’s ability to introduce and implement locally rooted initiatives that may depart from funder guidelines. The issues of accountability and agency remain at the center of difficulties between local communities, peacebuilders, and funders, and despite the work done by many scholars on issues of accountability upwards, downwards, and across (cf. Caplan 2005; Galtung and Tisné 2009; Pinnington 2014; Richmond 2011), little work has been done in the field to bridge the gap between donor requirements for accountability upwards and community needs for ownership and agency. As the research on local peacebuilding moves into the next phase, more attention should be given to these locally centered peacebuilding models and especially how they can help to overcome the implementation barriers that are often associated with local peacebuilding.

Summary

In closing, it is worth noting that the local lacks a clear definition and is often marked by several complexities that go beyond the local-(inter)national dichotomy. While a few scholars including Paffenholz (2015), Simons and Zanker (2014), Mac Ginty and Richmond (2013), among others have begun to critically assess the heterogeneity of the local and discuss the problematic tendency for peacebuilders to oversimplify and romanticize the local, more research on the differences and lack of coherence within the local sphere is necessary. There should be a more conscious effort to unravel the complexity of the “local,” while paying attention to the multiple points of contestation and competition for power, resources, and legitimacy, that plays out simultaneously and differently at various levels within the local context (Van Leeuwen et al. 2019). Essentially, with the increasing awareness to the importance of locals in peacebuilding processes, it is imperative for researchers to emphasize that local actors and spaces are diverse and unique in their makeup; they are not homogenous units waiting to be discovered and empowered by (inter)national peacebuilding agents; and, for the most part, the locals themselves can disagree on what truly counts as local and on the legitimacy of the groups and individuals who seek to represent them in political processes like peacebuilding. As Simons and Zanker (2014, p. 11) note, a one-size-fits-all model of peacebuilding should not be criticized (and ultimately replaced) on the basis of a one-size-fits-all conception of the local.

Cross-References

- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures

References

- Adjei, M. (2019). Women's participation in peace processes: A review of literature [Article]. Journal of Peace Education, 16(2), 133–154. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17400201.2019.1576515>.
- Allouche, J., & Jackson, P. (2019). Zones of peace and local peace processes in Côte d'Ivoire and Sierra Leone. Peacebuilding, 7(1), 71–87. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2018.1491276>.
- Anderson, M. B., Olson, L., & Doughty, K. (2003). Confronting war: Critical lessons for peace practitioners. Collaborative for Development Action. <http://www.cdainc.com/rpp/publications/confrontingwar/ConfrontingWar.pdf>. Electronic original (PDF).
- Arandel, C., Brinkerhoff, D. W., & Bell, M. M. (2015). Reducing fragility through strengthening local governance in Guinea [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 985–1006. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1025741>.
- Autesserre, S. (2010). The trouble with the Congo: Local violence and the failure of international peacebuilding. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland: Conflict resolution and the everyday politics of international intervention. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bellamy, A. J. (2004). The 'next stage' in peace operations theory? In A. J. Bellamy & P. Williams (Eds.), Peace operations and global order (pp. 17–38). London: Franck Cass.
- Belloni, R. (2012). Hybrid peace governance: Its emergence and significance. Global Governance, 18(1), 21–38.
- Boege, V., Brown, A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2009). Building peace and political community in hybrid political orders. International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 599–615. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310903303248>.
- Bojicic-Dzelilovic, V., & Martin, M. (2016). Local ownership challenges in peacebuilding and conflict prevention. (Whole of society conflict prevention and peacebuilding project, issue. https://www.gppac.net/files/2018-12/D4.7_Best%20Practices%20Report%20Local%20Ownership_final_PU.pdf
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking, and peace-keeping: Report of the secretary-general pursuant to the statement adopted by the summit meeting of the security council on 31 January 1992. New York: United Nations.
- Bräuchler, B., & Naucke, P. (2017). Peacebuilding and conceptualisations of the local. Social Anthropology, 25(4), 422–436. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1469-8676.12454>.
- Caplan, R. (2005). International governance of war-torn territories: Rule and reconstruction. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Chadwick, W., Debiel, T., & Gadinger, F. (Eds.). (2013). Relational sensibility and the 'turn to the local': Prospects for the future of peacebuilding. Centre for Global Cooperation Research. <https://www.gcr21.org/publications/gcr/global-dialogues/relational-sensibility-and-the-turn-to-the-local-prospects-for-the-future-of-peacebuilding>
- Chandler, D. (2013). Peacebuilding and the politics of non-linearity: Rethinking 'hidden' agency and 'resistance'. Peacebuilding, 1(1), 17–32. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756256>.
- Curle, A. (1994). New challenges for citizen peacemaking. Medicine and War, 10(2), 96–105. <https://doi.org/10.1080/07488009408409148>.
- de Coning, C. (2013). Understanding peacebuilding as essentially local [Open Access Comment]. Stability: International Journal of Security & Development, 2(1), 1–6. <https://www.stabilityjournal.org/articles/10.5334/sta.as/>.
- Debiel, T., & Rinck, P. (2016). Rethinking the local in peacebuilding: Moving away from the liberal/post-liberal divide. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneekener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis: Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational (pp. 240–256). London: Routledge.
- Dillon, M., & Reid, J. (2009). The liberal way of war: Killing to make life live. London: Routledge.
- Donahoe, A. (2017). Peacebuilding through women's community development: Wee women's work in northern Ireland. Berlin/Heidelberg: Springer.
- Donais, T. (2009). Empowerment or imposition? Dilemmas of local ownership in post-conflict peacebuilding processes [Article]. Peace & Change, 34(1), 3–26. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1468-0130.2009.00531.x>.
- Donais, T. (2012). Peacebuilding and local ownership: Post-conflict and consensus-building. New York: Routledge.
- Duffield, M. (2001). Global governance and the new wars: The merging of development and security. London: Zed.
- Duffield, M. (2010). The liberal way of development and the development – Security impasse: Exploring the global life-chance divid. Security Dialogue, 41(1), 53–76. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010609357042>.
- Eriksen, S. S. (2009). The liberal peace is neither: Peacebuilding, state building and the reproduction of conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo. International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 652–666. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310903303289>.
- Galtung, F., & Tisné, M. (2009). A new approach to postwar reconstruction. Journal of Democracy, 20(4), 93–107.
- Garcia, E. (1997). Filipino zones of peace. Peace Review, 9(2), 221–224.
- Giessmann, H. J. (2016). Embedded peace. Infrastructures for peace: Approaches and lessons learned. UNDP. <https://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/librarypage/democratic-governance/conflict-prevention/infrastructures-for-peace%2D%2Dapproaches-and-lessons-learned.html>
- Hancock, L. E. (2017). Agency & peacebuilding: The promise of local zones of peace. Peacebuilding, 5(3), 255–269. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2016.1253604>.

- Hancock, L. E. (2018). Legitimate agents of peacebuilding: Deliberative governance in zones of peace. In L. E. Hancock & C. Mitchell (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and legitimacy: Interactions between national and local levels. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Hancock, L. E. (2020). Deliberative peacebuilding: Agency and development in post-conflict practice. Peacebuilding, 8(2), 139–158. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1591839>.
- Hancock, L. E., & Iyer, P. (2007). The nature, structure and variety of “peace zones”. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 29–50). Bloomfield: Kumarian Press.
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. R. (Eds.). (2007). Zones of peace. Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. R. (2018). Local peacebuilding and legitimacy: Interactions between national and local levels. New York: Routledge.
- Hingorani, Y. (2015). The new deal for engagement in fragile states: Where are we now? Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 10(2), 87–93. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2015.1054860>.
- Hopp-Nishanka, U. (2013). Giving peace an address? Reflections on the potential and challenges of creating peace infrastructure. In B. Unger, S. Lundström, K. Planta, & B. Austin (Eds.), Peace infrastructures: Assessing concept and practice (p. 20). Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- Hopp-Nishanka, U. (2016). Infrastructures for peace as a contribution towards state transformation? Contours of a critical-constructive research agenda [Article]. Peace & Conflict Review, 9(1), 8–21.
- Howard, L. M. (2002). UN peace implementation in Namibia: The causes of success. International Peacekeeping, 9(1), 99–132. <https://doi.org/10.1080/714002698>.
- Hughes, C., Öjendal, J., & Schierenbeck, I. (2015). The struggle versus the song – The local turn in peacebuilding: An introduction [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 817–824. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029907>.
- Idler, A., Belén Garrido, M., & Mouly, C. (2015). Peace territories in Colombia: Comparing civil resistance in two war-torn communities. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 10(3), 1–15. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2015.1082437>.
- Jabri, V. (2013). Peacebuilding, the local and the international: A colonial or a postcolonial rationality? Peacebuilding, 1(1), 3–16. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756253>.
- Jarstad, A. K., & Olsson, L. (2012). Hybrid peace ownership in Afghanistan: International perspectives of who owns what and when. Global Governance: A Review of Multilateralism and International Organizations, 18(1), 105–119. <https://doi.org/10.5555/1075-2846-18.1.105>.
- Kraushaar, M., & Lambach, D. (2009). Hybrid political order: The added value of a new concept. Australian Centre for Peace and Conflict Studies. <http://dev.issr.uq.edu.au/sites/default/files/14%20-%20Hybrid%20Political%20Orders%20The%20Added%20Value%20of%20a%20New%20Concept%2C%20Maren%20Kraushaar%20and%20Daniel%20Lambach.pdf>
- Kumar, C. (2012). Building national “infrastructures for peace”: UN assistance for internally negotiated solutions to violent conflict. In S. A. Nan, Z. C. Mampilly, & A. Bartoli (Eds.), Peacemaking: From practice to theory (pp. 384–399). Santa Barbara: Praeger.
- Lambek, M. (2011). Catching the local. Anthropological Theory, 11(2), 197–221. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1463499611407397>.
- Lederach, J. P. (1995). Preparing for peace: Conflict transformation across cultures. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute for Peace.
- Lee, S. Y., & Özerdem, A. (2015a). Conclusion. In S. Y. Lee & A. Özerdem (Eds.), Local ownership in international peacebuilding: Key theoretical and practical issues (pp. 195–208). London: Routledge.
- Lee, S. Y., & Özerdem, A. (Eds.). (2015b). Local ownership in international peacebuilding: Key theoretical and practical issues. London: Routledge.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding [Essay]. Third World Quarterly, 36, 825–839. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029905>.
- Lilja, J., & Höglund, K. (2018). The role of the external in local peacebuilding: Enabling action – Managing risk. Global Governance: A Review of Multilateralism and International Organizations, 24(3), 411–430. <https://doi.org/10.1163/19426720-02403007>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41(4), 391–412. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010610374312>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1045482>.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Sanghera, G. (2012). Hybridity in peacebuilding and development: An introduction. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(2), 3–8. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2012.742800>.
- McCann, J. (2015). Local ownership – An imperative for inclusive peacebuilding. Development Dialogue, 63, 17–27. http://www.daghammarskjold.se/wp-content/uploads/2015/12/DD63_DHF_final_web.pdf.
- Millar, G. (2016). For whom do local peace processes function? Maintaining control through conflict

- management. Cooperation and Conflict. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836716671757>.
- Mitchell, C. R., & Hancock, L. E. (2007). Local zones of peace and a theory of sanctuary. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 189–221). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Mitchell, C. R., & Hancock, L. E. (Eds.). (2012). Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes. London: Continuum.
- Mitchell, C., & Nan, S. A. (1997). Local peace zones as institutionalized conflict. Peace Review, 9(2), 159.
- Mitchell, C. R., & Rojas, C. (2012). Against the stream: Colombian zones of peace under democratic security. In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes (pp. 59–67). London/New York: Continuum.
- Mouly, C. (2013). The Nicaraguan peace commissions: A sustainable bottom-up peace infrastructure [Article]. International Peacekeeping, 20(1), 48–66. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2012.761833>.
- Narten, J. (2009). Dilemmas of promoting “local ownership”. In R. Paris & T. D. Sisk (Eds.), The dilemmas of statebuilding: Confronting the contradictions of post-war peace operations (pp. 252–283). London: Routledge.
- Odendaal, A. (2010). An architecture for building peace at the local level: A comparative study of local peace committees (A discussion paper: Commissioned by the Bureau for Crisis Prevention and Recovery of the United Nations Development Program, Issue. UNDP. https://www.un.org/en/land-natural-resources-conflict/pdfs/UNDP_Local%20Peace%20Committees_2011.pdf
- Odendaal, A. (2012). South Africa’s infrastructure for peace. In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes. London: Continuum.
- Odendaal, A. (2013). A crucial link: Local peace committees and national peacebuilding. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Öjendal, J., Leonardsson, H., & Lundqvist, M. (2017). Local peacebuilding – Challenges and opportunities. t. E. f. b. (EBA). <https://eba.se/wp-content/uploads/2017/04/Local-turn-of-peacebuilding-webbversion.pdf>
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029908>.
- Paris, R. (1997). Peacebuilding and the limits of liberal internationalism [Article]. International Security, 22(2), 54.
- Paris, R. (2010). Saving liberal peacebuilding. Review of International Studies, 36(02), 337–365. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0260210510000057>.
- Piccolino, G. (2019). Local peacebuilding in a Victor’s peace. Why local peace fails without national reconciliation. International Peacekeeping, 26(3), 354–379. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2019.1583559>.
- Pinnington, R. (2014). Local first in practice: Unlocking the power to get things done. <http://actlocalfirst.org/in-practice/>
- Poulin, B. (2009). Supporting local ownership in humanitarian action (Humanitarian policy paper series), Issue. http://www.disastergovernance.net/fileadmin/gppi/GPPiPPR_local_ownership_2009.pdf
- Reich, H. (2006). Local ownership. In Conflict transformation projects: Partnership, participation or patronage? Working paper (27). (Berghof occasional paper series No. 27, Issue). B. R. C. f. C. C. Management. www.berghof-center.org
- Reychler, L. (2002). Peace architecture. Peace and Conflict Studies, 9(1), 25–35. <https://nsuworks.nova.edu/pcs/vol9/iss1/2>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). The Romanticisation of the local: Welfare, culture and peacebuilding. The International Spectator, 44(1), 149–169. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03932720802693044>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2012). Beyond local ownership in the architecture of international peacebuilding [Article]. Ethnopolitics, 11(4), 354–375. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2012.697650>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2014). The dynamics of peace formation. Failed statebuilding. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Rosenthal, G., Bajwa, A., Menon, S., Olonisakin, F., Ould-Abdallah, A., Petrie, C., & Ssemपाल, E. G. (2015). Challenge of sustaining peace. Report of the Advisory Group of Experts on the review of the peacebuilding architecture (A/69/968–S/2015/490). United Nations. Retrieved from http://www.un.org/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=A/69/968.
- Scheye, E., & Peake, G. (2005). Unknotting local ownership. In A. Ebnöther & P. Fluri (Eds.), After intervention: Public security management in post-conflict societies – From intervention to sustainable local ownership (pp. 235–260). PIP Consortium Working Group. <https://www.dcaf.ch/sites/default/files/publications/documents/Compleat.pdf>.
- Selby, J. (2013). The myth of liberal peace-building. Conflict, Security & Development, 13(1), 57–86. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2013.770259>.
- Sending, O. J. (2010). Introduction. In O. J. Sending (Ed.), Learning to build a sustainable peace: Ownership and everyday peacebuilding. Crh. Michelsen Institute. <https://www.cmi.no/publications/3732-learning-to-build-a-sustainable-peace>
- Shinoda, H. (2008). The difficulty and importance of local ownership and capacity development in peacebuilding. Hiroshima Peace Science, 30, 95–115. <https://home.hiroshima-u.ac.jp/heiwa/JNL/30/5Shinoda.pdf>.
- Simons, C., & Zanker, F. (2014). Questioning the local in peacebuilding. Working paper (Adaptation and creativity in Africa: Technologies and significations in the making of order and disorder, Issue). U. o. Halle & U. o. Leipzig.
- Sisk, T. D. (2009). Pathways of the political. In R. Paris & T. D. Sisk (Eds.), The dilemmas of statebuilding:

Confronting the contradictions of postwar peace operations (pp. 196–223). London: Routledge.

- Van Brabant, K. (2010). “Insiders” – “Outsiders” and peacebuilding partnerships (Peacebuilding how?, Issue). Interpeace. http://www.interpeace.org/wp-content/uploads/2010/08/2010_IP_Peacebuilding_How_Insiders_Outsiders_And_Peacebuilding_Partnerships.pdf
- Van Leeuwen, M., Nindorera, J., Kambale Nzweve, J.-L., & Corbijn, C. (2019). The ‘local turn’ and notions of conflict and peacebuilding – Reflections on local peace committees in Burundi and eastern DR Congo. Peacebuilding, 8, 279–299. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1633760>.
- van Tongeren, P. (2011). Increasing interest in infrastructures for peace. Journal of Conflictology, 2(2), 45–55.
- Väyrynen, T. (2013). Re-thinking peacebuilding: From universal models to mundane peace [Article]. International Journal of Conflict Engagement & Resolution, 1(2), 147–162. https://www.elevenjournals.com/tijdschrift/ijcer/2013/2/IJcer_2211-9965_2013_001_002_004.
- von Billerbeck, S. B. K. (2015). Local ownership and UN peacebuilding: Discourse versus operationalization [Article]. Global Governance, 21(2), 299–315.
- Wiuff Moe, L. (2013). Relationality and pragmatism in peacebuilding: Reflections on Somaliland. In W. Chadwick, T. Debiel, & F. Gadinger (Eds.), Relational sensibility and the ‘Turn to the local’: Prospects for the future of peacebuilding (pp. 44–53). Centre for Global Cooperation Research. <https://www.gcr21.org/publications/gcr/global-dialogues/relational-sensibility-and-the-turn-to-the-local-prospects-for-the-future-of-peacebuilding>.
- Wong, P. (2013). ‘Local ownership’ in peacebuilding – A premature rhetoric. Peace and Progress: UNU Graduate Student Journal, 1(1), 47–57. https://postgraduate.ias.unu.edu/upp/wp-content/uploads/2013/03/upp_issue1-WONG.pdf.

Local Security

- ▶ Police Reform and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

Location Data

- ▶ Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence

Lomé Accord

- ▶ Sierra Leone

Lomé Peace Accord

- ▶ Sierra Leone

Lomé Peace Agreement

- ▶ Sierra Leone

M

Management of Sensitive Data

- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches

Maoism

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Maoist Conflict in India

Vidushi Kaushik¹ and Denise Ripamonti²

¹Ireland India Institute, School of Law and Government, Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

²Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), School of Law and Government, Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Adivasi/indigenous politics; Development; India; Intractable conflict; Land rights; Left Wing-Extremism; Maoism; Security

Description

After more than five decades of unrelenting activity, the Maoist conflict constitutes one of the most enduring insurgencies India has faced since independence. Originating from the Naxalite movement ignited by the peasant uprising sparked off in Naxalbari, West Bengal, in 1967, this low-intensity conflict has a long history of resilience despite being characterized by periodic phases of transformation, expansion, and retraction since its inception. While retaining firm ideological roots in Marxist-Leninist-Maoist thought, the Maoist conflict in India has evolved from a series of localized agrarian revolts erupted in the late 1960s and early 1970s into a widespread and heterogenous revolutionary movement. In its present form, the Maoist insurgency fights against the socio-economic inequalities generated by globalization and the dispossession of land and rights of historically marginalized groups which has been accelerated by the liberalization of the Indian economy started in 1991.

In order to reflect common parlance, both the terms Naxalite (or Naxal) and Maoist are interchangeably employed in this chapter to describe the rebels and the conflict in the current phase. However, the accuracy of this word usage is largely questioned, as the Maoist movement and its socio-economic and political context have deeply changed since the events of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Introduction

Today, India's Maoist movement does not constitute a unified force, but rather a fragmented cluster of diverse parliamentary and extraparliamentary political formations, which, though sharing a similar ideological terrain, pursue different strategies to advance a common political project aimed at building a socialist Indian state through people's democratic revolution (Banerjee 2009; Bhatia 2006; Mohanty 2006, 2015). Among these diverse groups which have been shaping the course of Maoist politics in India for decades, the Communist Party of India (Maoist) – CPI (Maoist) – is the most powerful extraparliamentary organization. Formed in 2004 through the merger of different Maoist factions and oriented to use revolutionary violence to achieve social change, the CPI (Maoist) is leading the current phase of the Maoist insurgency against the Indian government. Its activities are mainly located in the so-called central-eastern tribal belt, namely a vast territorial area which covers the states of Madhya Pradesh, Chhattisgarh, Odisha (earlier Orissa), Bihar, Jharkhand, and West Bengal, where there is a high concentration of indigenous communities and natural resources, but a long record of low human development indicators.

What is striking about the longevity of the Maoist movement is not only its ability to survive years of violent state repression, but also its lasting ideological relevance within India's political landscape. In particular, this revolutionary movement has managed to retain ideological traction by emerging as a socio-political force, which, over the years, has contributed to the growth of the debate on democracy, development, and social justice in the country notwithstanding its internal divisions and mutations (Gudavarthy 2014).

From Naxalbari to Left Wing Extremism: The Evolution of the Maoist Movement in India

One of the main transformations of the Maoist movement is certainly its recent characterization as Left Wing Extremism (LWE) and India's major internal security threat by the Indian state following the formation of the CPI (Maoist) and its armed wing, the People's Liberation Guerrilla Army (PLGA), in 2004 (GOI, Ministry of Home Affairs 2008, 2009; GOI, Press Information Bureau 2006). This change in the state's representation of the conflict has led to a significant reformulation of the central government's response to the insurgency, which, for long decades, had been dealt with as an agrarian crisis and as a law and order issue falling within the jurisdiction of each state of the Indian federal union. The transition of the Maoist movement to the domain of security politics notwithstanding the recognition of its deep socioeconomic roots (GOI, Planning Commission 2008) has been paralleled with a growing militarization of the conflict, now engulfed in an unending cycle of violence and counterviolence, which is making the prospects of peace appear as a far and distant horizon.

To understand the dynamics which have led to the contemporary configuration of the Maoist insurgency and its perceived intractability, it is important to recall the three main phases which have marked the long history of the conflict and the course of state responses. As detailed in the following sections, the evolution of the Indian Maoist movement remains closely intertwined with the trajectory of India's democratic politics as well as the direction of the country's political economy and socioeconomic development.

First Phase (1967–1972)

India's contemporary Maoist conflict originates from the Naxalite movement, which marked the first phase of violent revolutionary politics in post-independence India (1967–1972). It was triggered by the peasant armed struggle against exploitative agrarian relations which broke out in the rural area of Naxalbari, in the northern part of West Bengal, in 1967. Even though it occurred in a peripheral region of the Indian territory and it was suppressed by the state in a few months, the Naxalbari uprising still embodies a shared symbol of revolutionary struggle for radical left movements in India. It developed in the context of deep-seated forms of injustice and destitution prevailing among poor tenant farmers and landless laborers belonging to the communities of lower castes, Dalits,¹ and Adivasis² of northern West Bengal, who, for generations, had been demanding an equal distribution of land as well as a fairer system of crop-sharing to live a life of dignity and justice.

In the late 1960s, rural poverty, indebtedness, and exploitation were quite widespread in India. At that time, the country was mainly an agrarian society, where an inconsistent implementation of land reforms adopted in the postindependence period had failed to remove the socioeconomic privileges of a powerful rural elite (e.g., landlords and rich farmers), whose position had been consolidated by the land revenue systems introduced by the British during the colonial era (Chakravorty 2013; Frankel 2005). Moreover, social tensions in the countryside were further exacerbated by frequent food crises and by the programs of modernization of the agricultural sector (i.e., Green Revolution) implemented by the government in the mid-1960s, which generated an uneven pattern of rural development in the country (Frankel 2005). In such an agrarian milieu, rural unrest was a recurrent phenomenon, though limited to localized and unorganized forms of peasant resistance (see Desai 1986; Sen 1982; Milbert 2012).

The armed revolt of Naxalbari erupted in the spring of 1967 and marked a defining moment in the history of India's postindependence peasant struggles. In fact, it could channel the growing social discontent into a widespread and prolonged revolutionary armed movement against land alienation and land rights. Its roots can be traced back to the revolutionary path set by two pre-independence agitations for agrarian reforms led by the Communist Party of India (CPI) before its first split, which led to the formation of the Communist Party of India (Marxist) – CPI (M) in 1964. These were the Tebhaga movement (1946–1947) (see Majumdar 1993, 2011; Sen 1972) and the Telangana armed rebellion (1946–1951) (see Dhanagare 1974; Ram 1973; Sundarayya 1973a, b, c, d). The events of Naxalbari too originated from a long period of peasant mobilization under communist leadership, yet, in this case, they left a rather distinctive and deep-rooted legacy in Indian politics. In particular, the Naxalbari uprising and its ideological foundations continue to inspire one of India's most enduring internal conflicts. Moreover, by consolidating the conceptualization of the role played by violent agrarian revolution through area-wise seizure of power in the Indian society, it permanently shaped the course of India's left politics, especially the Indian communist movement, eventually divided on which strategy – violent/nonviolent – to adopt to bring transformative changes to the socioeconomic structures of the Indian state (Brass 1973).

It must be noted that the Naxalbari revolt occurred at the apex of a series of political actions (e.g., organization of peasant committees and armed groups, forced seizure and distribution of land, armed attacks on landlords and moneylenders, cancellation of debts and land records) coordinated by a local militant group within the CPI (M), which had been active in the administrative subdivision of Siliguri (Darjeeling district) (Banerjee 2009; Mohanty 2015). Inspired by Mao Tse Tung's theorization of protracted people's war ¹The term dalit means “oppressed” in Hindi. It was coined by those communities which have been historically excluded from the caste system and discriminated against as untouchables in the Indian society. Even though untouchability was abolished by the Indian constitution in 1950 (art. 17), its practice and other forms of caste-base discrimination still persist nowadays. The majority of Dalits – 16.6% of the total population (Census of India, 2011) – still lack access to key resources (e.g. land) and continue to record low socio-economic indicators, especially in rural areas. These communities are officially recognized as Scheduled Castes (SC) by the Indian government, but they usually prefer to refer to themselves as Dalits. In the rest of this chapter, the word is not italicized in order to reflect its integration into common usage and vocabulary.

²*Adivasi* is a term referred to the indigenous population residing in India. In Hindi, it means “the original inhabitants of the land”. The term adivasi is preferred by the representative civil society rather than the word ‘tribal’ and the administrative category of Scheduled Tribes (ST). Comprising approximately 8.6% of the total population of India (Census of India, 2011), Adivasis are spread across Central India and North Eastern India. The Maoists have their stronghold in these parts of India with maximum participation of Adivasis in their guerrilla army, liberated zones, and in their mid-level leadership. For the same reasons explained in relation to the use of the word dalit, the term adivasi and its variations are not italicized in this chapter.

in agrarian societies, Charu Mazumdar – the leader of the revolutionary communists in Siliguri – steered the peasant mobilization in northern West Bengal toward a radical ideological orientation, articulated in his famous series of articles known as Historic Eight Documents, written between 1965 and 1967.

The Naxalbari uprising broke out after a succession of clashes between the police and agricultural laborers (lower castes and Adivasis) led to the killing of a group of adivasi villagers in Prasadjote on May 25, 1967. This incident triggered a wave of rural unrest, which swept across the area of Naxalbari for 3 months, till the end of July 1967, when a massive police action launched by the United Front – the ruling coalition government in West Bengal composed of the CPI (M) and other left forces – crushed the insurrection and arrested some of its leaders. Those who escaped police repression went underground, as did Charu Mazumdar and Kanu Sanyal, the two leading members of the Siliguri CPI (M) group. This marked the epilogue of the revolutionary armed struggle in Naxalbari. However, the ideological drive of this short-lived peasant revolt reverberated rapidly across the country.

In 1967, a series of agrarian agitations influenced by the revolutionary experience of Naxalbari broke out in other districts of West Bengal and they later spread in the states of Bihar, Odisha, and Andhra Pradesh. It was from these regional and localized rural rebellions that the Naxalite movement developed as a wider revolutionary experiment aimed at capturing political power through armed struggle at the end of the 1960s. In this first phase of revolutionary violence against the Indian state (1967–1972), the district of Srikakulam in the southern-eastern state of Andhra Pradesh emerged as an important epicenter of the Naxalite movement along with the Naxal strongholds in West Bengal such as Debra-Gopiballavpur and Birbhum (Banerjee 2006).

In Srikakulam district, widespread social unrest evolved from a revolt led by the Girijan, a community of hill-dwellers living in the region called Agency Area. Organized by local communist teachers since the late 1950s, the Girijans, who were working as landless agricultural laborers on land lost to landowners and moneylenders, had mobilized for better wages, land distribution, and relief from debts through collectivizing as Girijan Sangham before the Naxalbari uprising (Dasgupta 1973). Eventually, the Srikakulam struggle adopted the revolutionary path defined by the communist leadership of Naxalbari (Venugopal 2013).

The integration of the Srikakulam struggle with the Naxalite movement was formalized in 1969, when the Srikakulam insurgents confirmed their support for the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist) – CPI (M-L). The CPI (M-L) was established on April 22, 1969, by the national revolutionary forum All India Coordination Committee of Communist Revolutionaries (AICCCR), which was led by the leaders of the Naxalbari uprising, namely Charu Mazumdar, Kanu Sanyal, and Saroj Dutta. By opposing reform-induced change and parliamentary democracy, the CPI (M-L) channeled the country's radical forces into a revolutionary party which could offer an alternative to the revisionist positions of the CPI (M). The leaders of the Srikakulam movement consolidated their revolutionary activities according to the revised strategy and tactics indicated by the CPI (M-L) general secretary Charu Mazumdar. Mazumdar stressed the need to recenter the actions of the Naxal movement on the systematic use of guerrilla warfare and the advancement of the “annihilation of class enemies” line (Banerjee 2009; Dasgupta 1973; D’Mello 2018). This was a divisive campaign of selective killing (e.g., landlords, moneylenders), which eventually led to the internal splintering of the movement (Dasgupta 1973).

Within 3 years (1968–1971), the militant activities of the Girijan revolutionaries and Naxalite ideology expanded considerably in other districts of undivided Andhra Pradesh. Through the formation of armed guerrilla squads and sustained people's war directed toward land elites, moneylenders, and the police, the Srikakulam movement managed to seize and redistribute crops, as well as occupy land and create “liberated zones” administered by revolutionary committees (Ryotanga Sangram Samiti) in almost 300 villages (D’Mello 2018). The rapid intensification of the Srikakulam movement and its transformation into a widespread armed struggle in 1969 were countered by the state and the central government with a heavy military response. After having declared large parts of the Srikakulam district disturbed areas under the Andhra Pradesh Suppression of Disturbances Act (1948), the Andhra Pradesh authorities launched a coordinated action against the communist revolutionaries by deploying state police forces in numbers in conjunction with thousands of paramilitary forces, namely the Central Reserve Police Forces – CRPF (Thakor 2018). By 1971, the Naxal insurgency in Srikakulam had suffered huge setbacks and losses (Dasgupta 1973; Kennedy and Purushotham 2012), especially after the killing of its main leaders by July 1970 (Mohanty 2015).

By and large, in the early 1970s, the Indian government, then led by the Prime Minister Indira Gandhi, managed to curb the Naxalite movement not only in the critical areas of West Bengal and Andhra Pradesh, but also in most states to a large extent. The scale-up of massive state-center military counteroffensives (e.g., Operation Steeplechase, July, 1 – August 15, 1971, and the deployment of the army in Birbhum in 1971, see Singh 2016), the imposition of special laws (e.g., the Maintenance of Internal Security Act – MISA), and the recourse to police encounters resulted in several arrests and killings of Naxal leaders and sympathizers in West Bengal, Bihar, Odisha, and Andhra Pradesh. At that time, counterinsurgency (COIN) activities were carried out both in rural areas and urban centers, mainly in Kolkata, where the insurgency had spread widely through the active involvement of intellectuals and students of elite colleges in Naxal politics (Banerjee 2009; Mukhopadhyay 2006).

The death of Charu Mazumdar in police custody in July 1972 marked the end of the first phase of the Maoist insurgency. With the demise of its main leader and a large number of party workers held in jail (Banerjee 2009), the CPI (M-L) entered a long period of underground activities and ideological factionalism. Intraparty differences, especially with regard to the issue of strategy and tactics (e.g., annihilation of class enemies vs. the consolidation of a popular base through mass organizations), led to the formation of several Naxal splinter groups, which eventually weakened the movement. In this period of fragmentation, the Indian government attempted to reduce the social base of the movement through the promotion of state-led development programs and the implementation of land reforms in West Bengal and Andhra Pradesh (Banerjee 2009; Mohanty 2015; Venugopal 2013). However, scanty implementation and lack of political will limited the impact of such initiatives on the substantial transformation of the socioeconomic conditions of adivasi communities and the rural poor (Benbabaali 2016; Mohanty 2015). Far from being completely eradicated in the 1970s, Maoist revolutionary politics survived state repression and retained its appeal in the Indian society in the years that followed.

Second Phase (1980–1990)

The imposition of a state of emergency in the country by Indira Gandhi in 1975–1977 further aggravated the setback encountered by the Naxal revolutionaries in the early 1970s. During the period of Emergency Rule, the heavy suppression of any forms of political activism and dissent against the ruling government decisively subdued the insurgents and any attempts at actively reorganizing the Naxal movement, which remained underground until the ban on political organizations was lifted in 1977. Those were years of deep political and ideological churning, which ultimately defined the evolution of Maoist politics when it entered its second phase of activities in the 1980s.

In particular, the resurgence of the Maoist movement in the aftermath of the Emergency Rule was characterized by a redefinition of the strategy and tactics of the revolutionary struggle on the basis of the shortcomings experienced in the first phase. The annihilation line followed during Charu Mazumdar's leadership came under heavy criticism, and more emphasis was given to increasing popular support, expanding mass organizations, and creating base areas, crucial for the advancement of people's struggle in the country. These developments notwithstanding, the Naxal movement remained splintered in various local groups, since differences persisted with regard to how these objectives could be achieved in practice. For example, among the diverse CPI (M-L) factions, the CPI (M-L) Liberation group led by Vinod Mishra in then undivided Bihar eventually embraced the path of parliamentary politics and mass agitations in the 1980s. After an initial commitment to armed struggle, CPI (M-L) Liberation later became an open party of the Indian Left, which is still active in the political scene of the country today. In particular, in 1982, the CPI (M-L) Liberation formed its mass organization called Indian People Front (IPF), and in 1989, it successfully contested parliamentary elections by securing a seat in the Indian parliament. In those years, the main opponent of this position – considered as a revisionist deviation from the revolutionary course set by the Naxalbari uprising – was the CPI (M-L) People War (PW) led by Kondapalli Seetharamaiah in Andhra Pradesh.

Formed in 1980 through the reorganization of a group of CPI (M-L) revolutionaries active in the region of North Telangana, PW established itself as a leading faction of the Maoist armed struggle by sizably expanding its influence beyond its original area of operation. Though endorsing the revolutionary path set by Charu Mazumdar, PW combined the activity of armed guerrilla squads with the political mobilization of adivasi and peasant communities. This was favored by the work of mass organizations and cultural groups, such as the Radical Students Union, the Radical Youth League, the Jana Natya Mandali – People's Theatre Group, the Viplava Rachayitala Sangham – and Revolutionary Writers' Association (Banerjee 2009; Haragopal 2017; Venugopal 2013). By working across various social groups and districts for a long period of time, these front organizations favored the strengthening of a wide popular base in support of PW and the Maoist movement in Andhra Pradesh. In particular, they played a crucial role in organizing the masses against exploitative agrarian relations and social oppression as well as disseminating revolutionary politics at the village level in the state (Balagopal 2006; Venugopal 2013). By the mid-1980s, the PW-led Naxal movement consolidated its historical base in Andhra Pradesh, and it started to expand its outreach in the forest region of Dandakaranya, which has developed into the main epicenter of the Maoist insurgency in recent years (Haragopal 2017; Kennedy and Purushotham 2012; Venugopal 2013).

In the 1980s, Bihar too (then undivided) emerged as a strong base of the Naxal armed struggle since the proparliamentary group CPI (M-L) Liberation could never make a breakthrough in the area and gain ground on more radical groups operating in the state. In Bihar, the armed remobilization of communist revolutionaries resumed actively in the aftermath of the Emergency through the activities of two main Maoist parties, the CPI (M-L) Party Unity (PU) and the Maoist Communist Centre (MCC), which, like PW, influenced the course of the Maoist movement in the following years. The former developed from the folds of the original CPI (M-L) in 1982, and it was mostly rooted in Jehanabad, Gaya, Patna, and Palamu. In these areas of Bihar, the armed struggle and mass mobilization activities of the PU cadres were mostly aimed at ending the socioeconomic exploitation and caste-based discrimination of poor agricultural laborers and landless peasants, who belonged to the dalit and lower-caste communities to a large extent. The political mobilization of the rural poor in PU's base areas was primarily carried out by the Mazdoor Kisan Sangram Samiti (MKSS), the main front organization of the PU group (Bhatia 2005; Kunnath 2009).

The MCC group, instead, did not derive its Naxal roots from the CPI (M-L), such as PU and the other main Maoist groups of the 1980s. In fact, it was formed in 1969 by two Naxal revolutionaries (Kanai Chatterjee and Amulya Sen) who had opposed Charu Mazumdar's line. Known with the name of Dakshin Desh until 1975, in the 1980s, the MCC developed its areas of operation first in West Bengal (Jangal Mahal area, Sunderbans, and Midnapore) and then in Bihar (Gaya, Aurangabad, and Muzzafarpur), where it established itself as an influential Maoist force. Committed to the advancement of protracted people's war through peasant armed struggle, the MCC organized the landless peasants and agricultural laborers against their exploitation by upper-caste landlords mainly through an underground body called Krantikari Kisan Committee (i.e., revolutionary peasant committee) (Bhatia 2005; South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP) n.d.-a).

By and large, the consolidation of Naxal base areas in Andhra Pradesh and in Bihar through the mobilization activities of PW, PU, and MCC in the 1980s marked an initial expansion of the Maoist movement in the country. However, it continued to be perceived as a law and order problem falling within the purview of each state government. As a result, responses to the second phase of the Maoist movement consisted in heterogeneous state-wise approaches, largely influenced by the socioeconomic and political dynamics prevailing in each Maoist base (Oetken 2009).

In particular, in Andhra Pradesh, the state-led response to the second phase of the Maoist movement was mainly shaped by the Congress – Telegu Desam Party (TDP) political rivalry for state power. As described above, PW could consolidate its base and expand its popular support until 1985. However, between 1985 and 1989, it faced a period of massive state repression unleashed by the TDP government, which came to power in 1984 by defeating a three-decade-long Congress rule in the state. In those years, the PW leaders and sympathizers were met with brutal police actions and indiscriminate arrests made under repressive laws (Venugopal 2013). Moreover, in 1987, Naxal activities were further curtailed through the imposition of a ban on PW and the Maoist front organizations operating in the state. However, with the Congress party's return to power in 1989, the ban was temporarily lifted and PW could reorganize its mass base in the region. Further bans on PW continued to be imposed and lifted in the years that followed depending on both the political climate and the intensity of rebel activities. This favored the expansion of the political and military influence of PW, which could benefit from a certain amount of maneuvering margin when bans and state offensives against the insurgents were relaxed (Oetken 2009; Venugopal 2013).

In Bihar, instead, counterinsurgency activities against PU and MCC rebels were carried out mostly through caste-based private militias (senā), whose operations reflected the caste polarization dynamics along which the Maoist movement developed in the state (Bhatia 2005; Kunnath 2009; South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP) n.d.-b). Mostly led by upper-caste landlords to preserve their land privileges, these armed private militias tried to crush the popular support for the Maoist movement by killing Dalits and members of lower-caste communities involved in agricultural activities. Over the years, the cycle of violence between the Naxal rebels and the private militias in Bihar led to extensive caste-based massacres – especially among Dalits and lower castes – and to a further consolidation of the support for the Maoist movement in Bihar (Oetken 2009; South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP) n.d.-b).

It is against the backdrop of such regional dynamics that the Naxal rebels could secure lasting political and territorial gains in the 1980s. This favored the strengthening of the Maoist movement and the intensification of the insurgency in the third phase, which coincided with a period of major economic transformations, accelerated by the liberalization of the Indian economy in the 1990s.

Third Phase (1990s–Ongoing)

The 1990s constitute a defining period of the current trajectory of the Maoist conflict in India, now marked by a growing militarization of state-society relations in insurgency-affected areas. In those years, the Maoist movement transitioned from a long course of internal splintering and local remobilization to a phase of significant consolidation and expansion in new territories of the Indian state, which have now become not only the epicenter of the insurgency, but also regions deemed crucial for the economic development of the country. This occurred as part of a substantial rethinking of the organizational strategy of diverse Naxal groups, but also in response to the neoliberal restructuring of the Indian economy started in 1991.

In particular, the 1990s witnessed the strengthening of Maoist activities in areas populated by adivasi communities in central-eastern India, especially in Dandakaranya, a densely forested region spread across today's states of Chhattisgarh, Telangana, Andhra Pradesh, and Odisha. Here, the Naxal rebels belonging to the PW group found refuge and established guerrilla zones since the 1980s, when the Andhra Pradesh government launched a heavy wave of repression against Maoist politics, intensified by the formation of a specialized COIN police force (i.e., Greyhounds) in 1989. The 1990s saw also the consolidation of Maoist presence in Bihar and Andhra Pradesh achieved through the strategic merger of PW and PU into the CPI (M-L) People's War Group (PWG) in 1998 (Oetken 2009). By this first successful attempt at joining forces, the Naxal rebels could not only improve territorial coordination among dominant armed Naxal factions and extend their influence to neighboring states, but also step up their military strength vis-à-vis security forces.

But strategic considerations aside, these developments had far greater significance for the redefinition of Maoist politics as a growing ideological challenge to the Indian state. In this regard, it is important to note that the consolidation of Maoist bases in forest areas coincided with a growing interest in these mineral-rich regions (e.g., coal, iron-ore, bauxite, and timber) by multinational corporations and the Indian state, which identified mining and resource-based industrialization as crucial sectors for economic growth. By mobilizing Dalits and Adivasis against displacement and dispossession due to state-led encroachment of their traditional lands for mining and industrial purposes, the Maoist rebels challenge the current paradigm of India's economic development.

As observed by Ghosh and Chandrashekar (2002) and, in a recent study, by Shah et al. (2018), the 30-year-long neoliberal reform program has failed to set the country on the path of sustainable and equitable growth. On the contrary, it has aggravated existing socioeconomic inequalities and discriminations among the poorest (Dalits and Adivasis) sections of the Indian society. This situation is particularly evident in the insurgency-affected states of central-eastern India, where dalit and adivasi communities have been living in conditions of abject multi-dimensional poverty (i.e., health, education, and standard of living) for decades (see Kannan in Shah 2018). The current attention cast on the mineral-rich adivasi territories in Chhattisgarh, Jharkhand, Odisha, and Andhra Pradesh by the Indian state for economic purposes has not improved the living conditions of these communities. They continue to remain excluded from India's economic growth and are entrapped in new forms of exploitation (Shah et al. 2018). The presence of Maoist rebels and guerrilla zones in these areas since the 1980s has strengthened Adivasis' struggles for land and forest rights.

The continuing relevance of Maoist politics in the current context of India's globalized economy has to be understood against the backdrop of the abovementioned dynamics of persisting conditions of oppression, deprivation, and resistance, in which – in continuity with the past – the question of land and social justice remains central (Mohanty 2015). Though remaining a highly fragmented force, whose claims and dynamics are shaped by the specific socio-political context of each region, the Maoist movement has evolved from a series of localized struggles against exploitative agrarian relations into a more consolidated and widespread political force, which is articulating an alternative to the ideological foundations of the neoliberal development policies of the Indian state. This trajectory has been accelerated after the Maoist rebels of the PWG and MCC groups merged into the CPI (Maoist) party on September 21, 2004, to form a more centralized political organization and secure Maoist presence in a compact revolutionary zone through protracted people's war. In recent years, the intensification of the Maoist conflict in central-eastern India is related to the activities of the CPI (Maoist) party, which, under the leadership of the PWG revolutionaries hailing from Andhra Pradesh, constitutes the leading political and military force of the contemporary phase of the Maoist movement.

The Indian government has been responding to the ideological challenge posed by the political struggle of the Maoist revolutionaries with strong military action and growing state repression. In the last years, this has limited the activities of the CPI (Maoist) insurgents to the hilly and forested areas of central India, especially in Dandakaranya, as shown by the two maps below. Since the late 1990s, the coordination of COIN operations of the states affected by the Maoist insurgency has been centralized under the union government through the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) for better management of state-led initiatives. The escalation of the Maoist conflict post-1991 has been paralleled by a substantial transformation of the Indian state’s discourse on the Maoist movement, now categorized as Left Wing Extremism (LWE), terrorism, and India’s major internal security threat. The transition of Maoist politics to the realm of state security has led to the strengthening of securitizing measures and to an increased militarization of the conflict in the current stage, notwithstanding the adoption of a series of development schemes to win “hearts and minds” in territories affected by the insurgency (Figs. 1 and 2).

Maoist Conflict in India, Fig. 1 Maoist insurgency: conflict map 2005. Note: Intensity and territorial diffusion of the Maoist conflict in India in 2005. Retrieved from

South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP) (<https://www.satp.org/conflict-maps/india-maoistinsurgency-2005>)

CPI (Maoist) Ideology and Revolutionary Violence

Theoretical Logic of the Maoist Movement

The previous section encapsulates the historical trajectory of left politics in India. The following section would focus on the specificities of the CPI (Maoist) vis-a-vis its ideological underpinnings and organizational structure. An understanding of this Maoist party is imperative to recognize the resilient nature of the revolutionary movement.

Maoist Conflict in India, Fig. 2 Maoist insurgency: conflict map 2019. Note: Intensity and territorial diffusion of the Maoist conflict in India in 2019. Retrieved from

South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP) (<https://www.satp.org/conflict-maps/india-maoistinsurgency-2019>)

The founding strategy document of the CPI (Maoist), which was adopted in 2004 during the merger of two radical left parties – PWG and MCC – characterizes the Indian state as a) semi-colonial and semifeudal, and b) rife with comprador bureaucratic bourgeois/capitalism. In order to overcome these contradictions and transform the state into a socialist and classless society, the Maoists suggest the Indian revolution to be carried out in two stages. The first would be the so-called new democratic stage, and the second and final stage would be the socialist stage. The Maoists contend the Indian state to be truly independent as it is still under imperialist forces enabled through the comprador bourgeois and capitalists.

Following the analysis of Marxism-Leninism-Maoism (MLM), the Indian Maoists advocate for a new democratic revolution which is truly the struggle for establishing peoples’ democracy through people’s protracted war. Protracted people’s war becomes the third ideological pillar of the movement. For a protracted people’s war, the party identifies the peasantry and the vast countryside of India and its geographical spread as ideal grounds for creation of revolutionary people’s army – which would eventually lead to seizure of power by armed force and political power. The strategy document lays out the task for the people's army:

...to wipe out the armed forces of the counter-revolutionary Indian state through war and... establish their own state - the People's Democratic State and establish their own political authority. The very act of establishment of the state machinery of the people by destroying through war, the present autocratic state machinery - the army, the police and the bureaucracy of the reactionary ruling classes- is the central task of the People's Democratic Revolution of India. [CPI (Maoist) 2004a, p. 36]

The fourth ideological pillar is of mass mobilization or a united mass front. In order to mobilize and create a revolutionary consciousness, the party identifies poor peasants and agricultural laborers as the backbone of their revolutionary guards. Maoists believe to strengthen the proletarian foundations of the party would require focus on students across the country who once consolidated would be sent to rural and backward areas, "...finest revolutionaries go to the villages" [CPI (Maoist) 2007, p. 11] to integrate with the peasantry and Adivasis and continue both a covert and an overt fight against the Indian state.

The fourth ideological pillar is primarily seeking mass mobilization for seizure of the Indian state through armed action or mass militant mobilization. With denouncement of traditional organizational and mass movements, these mass mobilizations take shape in the form of what are termed as frontal organizations of the CPI (Maoist), which work toward conscientization of rural population on issues pertaining to the oppressive structures of the Indian society and practices of the federal and central government on matters such as minor forest produce, and displacement due to development activities such as dams, mineral mining, and forest use. These mass frontal organizations dynamically collectivized local communities across diverse geographical areas across boundaries of the Indian state.

CPI (Maoist) Organizational Structure

The movement in congruence with its ideological aims and objectives has planned structures that are guided with secrecy, and workings involve remaining underground. The CPI (Maoist) party constitution's chapter 3, 4, and 7 specifically engage with the discipline of party members, principles, and structure of the party. Article 29, 30, and 31 of chapter 7 engage with the details of the organization of the movement. The party identifies two kinds of memberships – professionals and part-timers – and the organization would be embedded in local contextualities depending on the geographical divisions or spheres of production [CPI (Maoist) 2004a]. Following the principle of democratic centralism, the Maoists expect inner party democracy under centralized leadership. This in praxis translates to the idea that "the individual is subordinate to the organization, the lower level is subordinate to the higher level and the entire party is subordinate to the Central Committee" [CPI (Maoist) 2004a, chapter 5, art. 25 (a)].

Chapter 7 of the constitution lays out the broad organizational structure of the party, which includes the Central Committee (CC) – the highest body in the party. The CC is responsible for organizing the party congress, which is held once in 5 years. Followed by the CC will be Special Area Committees (SAC)/Special Zonal Committee (SZC)/State Committee (SC). The SAC/SZC/SC are the highest authority at state or zonal level. Under SC comes the Regional Committee (RC), under which are Zonal Committee (ZC)/District Committee (DC) /Divisional Committee. These committees are further devolved as Subzonal Committee/Subdivisional Committee, under which fall Area Committee (AC) and local level committees at a village level or in a factory or university.

Looking at the geographical spread of the conflict across ten states in India, the following state/zonal level committees have been formed over the years: Dandakaranya Special Zonal Committee (DKSZC), Andhra Orissa Border Special Zonal Committee (AOBSZC), North Telangana Special Zonal Committee (NTSZC), Bihar Jharkhand North Chhattisgarh Special Area Committee (BJNCSAC), West Bengal State Committee (WBSC), Punjab State Committee (PSC), and Maharashtra State Committee (MSC). These state zonal committees show the spread of the movement and various operations that continue in the 53rd year of the movement, and new reports inform of a new formation in the Western Ghats Special Zonal Committee (WGSZC). This indicates the expansion of the movement in newer territories, which are geographically suited for their operations. Along with zonal committees, the party has regional bureaus that coordinate activities across the country. These bureaus are: North Regional Bureau, South-Western Regional Bureau, East Regional Bureau, Central Regional Bureau, and Odisha-Chhattisgarh Regional Bureau. Each of these bureaus has two CC members, and they are responsible for formulating and then disseminating the strategies and plans of the CPI (Maoist) to their zonal committees and downward.

Along with the political structure, the CC and its various bureaus and committees, is the Central Military Commission (CMC). The CMC is responsible for the maintenance and directions for the military strategies and the Peoples' Liberation Guerrilla Army (PLGA). The PLGA is formed of platoons and militia members. The membership of the PLGA is estimated to be a cadre of 8,500 men and women approximately. It is believed that the support base of the guerrilla outfit is larger than this number (Rijiju 2014) (see chapter ► “Female Combatants and Peacebuilding”). The PLGA is a precursor to the People's Liberation Army, which would continue the protracted people's war. The CPI (Maoist) calls both the PLGA and the PLA as different from “mercenary armies of the exploiting classes; it is a political army. It must be subordinate to the ideological leadership of the proletariat and serving the struggles of the people and the building of revolutionary base areas” [CPI (Maoist) 2004b, p. 100].

The PLGA has three main forces. First is the main force which comprises of platoons, companies, and special action teams, which move between guerrilla bases and areas which have a marked presence of the CPI (Maoist) and its political structures, especially the liberated zones of “Jantana Sarkar” (JS).³ The second force includes local guerrilla squads, special squads and platoons, and divisional action teams. The last force, known as the base force, is the people's militia that is designed for self-defense or Gram Raksha Dals (GRDs- village defense squads). People's militia as the base is extensive numerically and is also the backbone for recruitment into secondary and main forces. In the Dandakaranya Special Zonal Committee (DKSZC) – which has the liberated zones of the CPI (Maoist), it is estimated that approximately 30,000 (Ramana 2011) men and women are members of people's militia. The PLGA serves as a counterforce to carry out an offensive against COIN operations by state and the paramilitary forces, which are deployed in the states of Chhattisgarh, Jharkhand, Maharashtra, Odisha, Andhra Pradesh, and Telangana.

The Bastar region in the central Indian state of Chhattisgarh is considered as the theatre of conflict between the CPI (Maoist) and the Indian state. The dense forests and the topography of the region are conducive for the sustained guerrilla tactics of the Maoists. The insurgents have created liberated zones in these areas among the adivasi communities residing in these forests. Falling mostly under the DKSZC, these liberated zones have established RPCs or Jantana Sarkar as early as 2001.

The program and policy document of the JS consistently lays stress on the need for a strong base area and people's militia which would help in maintaining and running the JS along with military consolidation for the PLGA. The JS is present at both village level and area committee level. JS is formed on the basis of population and geographical position. The population can vary between 500 and 5,000 (Bagchi 2012, p. 402). The JS at a village level has nine units: finance, judiciary, defense, agriculture, education/culture, forest, small industry, public relations, and health. Each of these consists of three or four members with a chief. The unit chief reports to the JS president who heads the council. The council consists of a vice-president, treasurer along with ³Jantana Sarkar is the Gondi (the local language spoken by the Adivasis in Bastar) word for Revolutionary People's Committee-RPC. In other parts of India, it is referred to as RPC; however, in DKZSC, the Maoist party decided to give it a local name. Every village council has its own RPC, and each RPC has its own constitution.

members. The JS members are elected through voting by the Gram Sabha (traditional village councils). The JS is usually involved in consolidating land and redistribution of land in villages and is also actively involved in agriculture, education, and other local-level development activities. Located in the deep and dense forests of central India, the JS primarily consists of adivasi communities residing in these forests, lower caste and landless peasantry. The maximum recruitment for local guerrilla squads to military platoons and companies is from the adivasi communities residing in Bastar (for more see Bagchi 2012).

The next section would look at this issue of recruitment, the involvement of the Adivasis in the Maoist movement, and the academic and policy discussions that concern aligned themes of land alienation, social justice, and adivasi politics.

Maoist Politics, Adivasi Communities, and Assertion for Development

Scholars and activists, based on participant observations and long-term engagement in civil and political issues in central and eastern India, have attributed the spread of the conflict to structural inequalities prevalent in the Indian society. The large population of Dalits, lower castes, and Adivasis, who also are the most marginalized in the country, form a large support base and cadres of the PLGA. However, to subsume that adivasi politics is in congruence with Maoist politics would be an erroneous simplification. What is observed is a mix of adivasi assertions for their rights on resources and land alongside the Maoist assertion against dispossession and accumulation. The section would expand on the Maoists and their relationship with the communities they live in and share their everyday experiences.

Spread across central and eastern India, the Maoist movement, since 2000, found its base amid the adivasi population in these parts. The guerrillas from PW, which were active in fighting against the landholding upper caste communities in rural Andhra Pradesh and present-day

Telangana, took refuge from state security forces in these dense forests in the mid-1980s. The forest area bordering the states of Andhra Pradesh, Maharashtra, Chhattisgarh, and Odisha became a home for many members of the PW. This also marked the entry of Maoist politics in what is now considered as the seat of Maoist politics – the region of Bastar in Chhattisgarh.

The setting up of Dandakaranya marked a phase in the Maoist movement for stronger base and class conscientization among the adivasi communities. The adivasi communities in these parts have a history of resistance that predates the entry of Maoists and dates back to colonial India. Colonial policies of commanding forests and forest resources and increased taxation lead to revolts among indigenous groups (Hasnain 1983; Sundar 2007; Verghese 2016). These colonial practices, specifically in relation to the management of forest and forest resources, led to further alienation of Adivasis in independent India. In independent India, adivasi areas were governed with constitutional arrangements of cultural protection and economic welfare with the aim of assimilating them into “mainstream” society. While development efforts following through the constitutional arrangements of adivasi autonomy/self-governance were implemented through focus on education and increasing access to healthcare in adivasi areas, the state-led project of industrialization led to the exploitation of forest and forest resources for mining. This exacerbated exploitation and land alienation of Adivasis along with the dominant perception of primitivism is attached to the adivasi identity (Mohanty 2015).

The adivasi assertion took the shape of movements against displacement due to development projects such as mining, etc. The period of 1980s onward marked many people’s movements for development-induced displacement fundamentally questioning the colonial laws of acquisition of land and rehabilitation. In states such as Chhattisgarh, these movements were led by local Gandhian activists, socialists, and political leaders represented by the Communist Party of India (CPI). The entry of CPI (Maoist) cadres in these regions came at a time when left-politics did occupy a significant role in electoral politics.

This provided for a fertile ground for the Maoist leadership to engage with big mass movements on issues of land, forests, and civil liberties. The Adivasis' call for "Jal Jungle Jameen" (Water, Forest, and Land) came in congruence with the Maoist ideology of struggle of peasants and Adivasis against state-guided corporate globalization (Mohanty 2015).

The Adivasis of Dandarkanya through these engagements on land and forest rights are a stronghold for the Maoist movement. These dense forests also serve as ideal grounds to carry on guerrilla and mobile warfare against the Indian state specifically against the security architecture engaged in COIN operations. The PLGA finds its maximum recruitment and participation from the Adivasi communities. Scholars and observers of the Maoist movement, Ismail and Shah (2015) recently raised questions on whether the CPI (Maoist) requires an ideological introspection to incorporate a more indigenous conception of politics that is rooted in the adivasi constellation and their communitarian way of life. Often, the involvement of Adivasis in the movement has delegitimized democratic and people's movements on displacement, forest rights, and development – where these social organizations and activists are suspected as overground Maoists cadres and informers. Ironically, nonviolent forms of dissent in these areas are delegitimized because of the participation of Adivasis in the Maoist movement. These issues of state response are dealt with in the following section.

One of the key questions raised within Indian public intellectuals and academia engages with the resilient nature of the conflict (Tyagi 2016). Crossing five decades since Naxalbari, there is significant literature that attempts to link India's development story and the consequent social movements on resources, displacement, and dispossession cumulatively contributed to participation in seeking violent recourse for issues of social justice (Guha 2007; Gupta 2006; Haragopal 2017; Kennedy 2015; Miklian 2012; Navlakha 2017; Shah 2013). India's development story from the time of independence through the 1990s confronted challenges of land use and revival of agriculture. The modernizing project, following a Nehruvian model of industrialization and socialism, laid stress on land as a state asset when used for "greater common good" (development). However, large social movements against displacement and dispossession, such as the National Alliance of People's Movement (NAPM), were seeking justice for communities impacted by the development model that was shaping modern India. Adivasis and Dalits were the main constituency who were affected by these projects. Fernandes (2007) observed that approximately 40% of displacement between 1947 and 2000 impacted indigenous groups, and 20% impacted Dalits and other backward castes.

Development-led displacement compounded with historical social discrimination and violence in everyday lives of Adivasis is understood as a factor in advancing and recruiting in lower cadres of the PLGA. In many instances, the Maoists with their involvement in mass people's movements on antidisplacement, demand for rights on forest and forest produce, and anti-mining movements, gained support and trust of communities who were considered "primitive" and "uncivilised" and were viewed with condescension by policy planners across the Indian bureaucracy. The huge development deficit and backwardness that coincided with the spread of the "red corridor"⁴ were acknowledged in a report submitted by the expert group on violent extremism (GOI, Planning Commission 2008). The report stressed on the need for constitutional remedy through the Panchayats (Extension to Scheduled Areas) Act, 1996 – which provides decentralized autonomy to traditional village councils for development of the area. The report suggested "...that the problem of violence and terrorism should be understood in the proper development perspective and handled politically and administratively rather than by using brute police force" (Subramanian 2010, p. 25).

⁴Red Corridor is a term that refers to the geographical spread of the Maoist movement across various states in India. The Red Corridor primarily looks at the spread and movement of Maoist party members (both combatants and other overground workers) across these districts and the dominance of the Maoist guerrillas.

State Responses

The official statement of the Indian state maintains the CPI (Maoist) and its aligned organization as an unlawful entity under the recently amended Unlawful Activities (Prevention) Act (UAPA), 2019. The CPI (Maoist) and its frontal organizations were banned and declared as a terrorist organization (under an older version of UAPA, 1967) in the year 2009. The banning of the organization came in the backdrop of the statement of the then Prime Minister of India, Dr. Manmohan Singh in 2006, claiming Left Wing Extremism to be the “single biggest internal security threat” (GOI, Press Information Bureau 2006).

The Indian state’s response to the Maoist movement, from the time of its first articulation, considered it as a law and order issue. This lens has significantly focused on implementing a robust policing response. The armed character of the movement restricts analysis for many to seeking security response which primarily engages with assertion of territory through setting up of police camps followed by setting up of administrative offices. For most, the conflict between the India state and the Maoists is understood through the rubric of sovereignty and a fight for territory within its own national boundaries. The state acknowledges the huge development deficit and structural injustices; the response can be analyzed on a dual axis of securitized development (see chapter ▶ “Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding”).

Policing and intelligence gathering with the aim of “neutralising” the armed youth during Naxalbari and the subsequent attack on radical left voices in 1960s and 1970s are documented not only in academia (Mukhopadhyay 2006) and civil liberties groups, but also the avant-garde film industry of Kolkata shows representation of the time in movies directed by prominent filmmakers such as Satyajit Ray’s Pratidwandi (1970) and Mrinal Sen’s quadrilogy Padatik, Calcutta 71, Patalik, and Chorus (Viswanathan 2016).

A similar approach of increasing security apparatus and permitting extrajudicial attacks at local leaders is observed in Srikakulam in 1968, where an uprising sparked when two adivasi activists were found murdered in the village of Levidi in Srikakulam district, in rural Andhra Pradesh. Increased policing as a form of antiterror activities became an integral part of the counterinsurgency programs by the various federal (state) governments. Andhra Pradesh, to counter the urban and rural networks of informers, ground workers, and militias, set up the infamous Greyhounds (since 1989), an elite force dedicated to conducting attacks and raids that considerably impacted the organizational leadership of the CPI (Maoist) and gaining cadres in “next generation of the most oppressed” (Balagopal 2006, p. 3183). With the estimates made, about 40,000 personnel from paramilitary are deployed in Bastar region in Chhattisgarh alone (IANS 2020).

The neighboring state of Chhattisgarh in Bastar, considered as a Maoist stronghold, witnessed the formation of Salwa Judum in 2005. Translated as a “purification hunt” in Gondi, Salwa Judum was presented as a citizen-led spontaneous people’s uprising against the Maoists. The Indian state through the help of local political leaders, Mahendra Karma, armed civilian villagers as Special Police Officers (SPOs) to counter the Maoist militias. The campaign recorded gross human rights violations of burning of entire villages which did not support or join the Judum forces, sexual violence against women, and pillaging of village grains and poultry. The campaign was questioned on its spontaneity, and it was later understood that the Judum forces in conjunction with the local police and paramilitary threatened entire villagers to either join the Judum or their homes and villages would be burnt down. The violence caused large-scale displacement. Many villagers left their home and hid in the forests or left their homes for neighboring states. Members of the Salwa Judum were involved in spreading violence, and the ramifications led to counterviolence from the Maoists as well. The eventual result of Salwa Judum on the ground led to fissures and fights among civilians who were related either by birth or through kinship (Balagopal 2008; Guha et al. 2006; Miklian 2009; Sundar 2006, 2016).

Although official numbers are underreported, between 2005 and 2008 (3 years), about 40,000 villagers were displaced and living in camps set for internally displaced people (IDP). It was alluded that the primary motivation was not to counter the Maoist movement, but that the Judum was used to clear up forests for mining purposes (Balagopal 2008; Miklian 2009; Sundar 2006). The Supreme Court of India in response to the Public Interest Litigation filed by a group of citizens (comprising academics, civil liberties activists, and ex-bureaucrats) in 2011 declared the Salwa Judum/SPOs as unconstitutional and directed the Chhattisgarh state to dissolve the SPOs. However, soon after, with passing of a federal legislation, Chhattisgarh Auxiliary Armed Forces Act, 2011, legitimized the presence of SPOs in the state by providing them with a new name and a new identity as District Reserve Guards (DRG). The DRGs are a federal police force, which also includes surrendered Maoists (the Center has issued guidelines of surrender and rehabilitation policy since early 2011) who are used for their local knowledge of the terrain and language (Poyam 2020; Ramana 2013).

In the new millennia, with the spread of the movement in central and eastern states of India, increased policing was complemented with the introduction of new development schemes such as Integrated Action Plans (IAP), Road Requirement Plans, Security Related Expenditure, Village Electrification Programs, Skill Development Programs, and Fortifying Police Stations and Modernizing the Police Force. The setting up of a “Left Wing Extremism” division in the Ministry of Home Affairs in 2006 charted this new course in responding to left wing extremism. Alongside these security-related responses, the central government along with federal states, introduced funds such as IAP and Special Central Assistance Scheme through which the districts (county/province) identified as “LWE affected” are provided extra assistance in bridging development deficits. However, poor implementation of these schemes is attributed to the presence of Maoist cadres. The trend for implementation of development initiatives usually follows a strategy involving paramilitary setting up fortified police camps followed by the local civil administration moving into these inaccessible areas to implement development activities. Mohanty (2017, p. 68) observes that former Home Minister, P. Chidambaram’s “clear, hold, develop” formulation shaped the policies. In everyday lives of people living in these regions, there is often talk about lack of accountability about the development funds released and whether they are for the benefit of village communities.

Peace Talks

In the history of the conflict, there have been three instances where peace talks were initiated. These peace talks were initiated through rigorous engagement of activists, academics, and members of the civil liberty organizations with both the state and the nonstate actors. The first peace talks that took light in 2004 were initiated by a citizen collective – Committee of Concerned Citizens (CCC) formed in the city of Hyderabad, the capital of Andhra Pradesh (AP). The CCC was firm in their belief of breaking the “cycle of violence-counter violence, so that a broader process of democratic restructuring of the society could be given a chance, and the aspirations of the people who inhabited the violence torn territory could be centre staged” (Maringanti 2010, p. 45). The engagement was limited to the local state of Andhra Pradesh’s political leadership with the CPI (Marxist-Leninist) People’s War who was active in organizing the state and its neighboring borders. During the negotiations, which were brokered with spokespersons from both sides and with representatives of the CCC, reached a roadblock with demands on PW activists to move unarmed. Another weak point through the talks emerged when the People’s War demanded for the federal government to redistribute land to the Adivasis and Dalits in their area of influence. The AP government spokesperson could not comply with the demand for land reforms claiming that they did not have land records. While the representatives of the CCC saw the talks reaching a positive point, as the talks concluded, within a week of the talks ending, both warring sides resumed with reports of violence and counterviolence. The Andhra peace talks set a precursor to the subsequent talks which both resulted in increased violence from both sides.

In 2008, in the adivasi-dominated area of Lalgarh in West Bengal, a mass movement emerged against police atrocities, sparked by a land-mine attack on the political leadership including then Chief Minister, who was a member of a coalition of parliamentary left parties in the state, and Union ministers. The response of the state security forces involved attacks on adivasi unarmed civilians including adolescent children and elderly (Bhaduri et al. 2009). Collectivized together against historical injustices and then present-day police atrocities, the people formed the People's Committee Against Police Atrocities (PCAPA). The backlash by the people led to a blockade of police and Harnad Vahini [the alleged frontal organization of the CPI (Maoist) who was responsible for the attack]. The PCAPA barricaded and blocked entry of any police, local administration, into Adivasi areas in Lalgarh. Between 2008 and 2011, Lalgarh, with the support of the CPI (Maoist), became what they described as a liberated zone. In 2011, after the election of a new Trinamool Congress government, the earlier indicated possibility of peace talks was explored. The West Bengal government, who set the agenda for the peace talks, promised an economic package, inquiry into state excesses, and forest rights for Adivasis and called for a suspension of operations for both parties to the conflict (Bhadra 2012). As a response, the Maoists had declared a cease-fire; however, the talks fell through since both parties to the conflict had not withdrawn from violent tactics. The talks ended with the killing of Mallojula Koteswara Rao-Kishenji – a polit bureau member and main negotiator on behalf of the Maoists.

The third round of peace talks came in the light of the initiative of the CCC and took place in 2010. Set in the backdrop of – “Operation Green Hunt” – a combat operation by the paramilitary and Chhattisgarh state police against the PLGA cadres, the then Minister of Home Affairs, P. Chidambaram, had appealed for a cease-fire.

Operation Green Hunt became notorious for grave human rights violations vis-à-vis the Adivasis living across Bastar and for the massive force used in dense forests as an offense against the Maoists (Bhaumik 2010; Sethi 2010). The then central government Minister of Home Affairs, P. Chidambaram, made a public call for Maoists to abjure violence for 72 h and indicated a possible call for peace talks. The call was responded by the Maoist spokesperson and the chief negotiator for the peace talks, Cherukuri Rajkumar-Azad, who extended the offer to 72 days (Varadarajan 2010), provided the government was willing to lift the ban on the organization, release key leaders, and withdraw paramilitary forces deployed across central and eastern India. The peace talks were withdrawn when the security forces allegedly picked up Azad at a railway station in the state of Maharashtra, where he was waiting to board the train to neighboring state of Chhattisgarh with a letter from Swami Agnivesh who was the chief negotiator on behalf of the Indian state (Rediff News Bureau 2010). Azad's body was found in the forests of Adilabad in the state of Telangana, and he was allegedly shot in an encounter with the state forces. Azad and Kishenjis' death served as a big blow to the peace talks paralyzing conditions for trust between the Indian state, its political leadership, and the Maoists. While the efforts of interlocutors were met with sincere engagement from the side of the Maoists, the Indian political leadership indicates a tactical use of peace talks as a part of their counterinsurgency operations (Fazal 2015). The cessation of violence is seen as a way of unravelling faces of the underground leadership of the CPI (Maoist) leading to their subsequent deaths.

Conclusions

The long course of the Maoist movement and the resilience of the Maoist rebels' insurgency in large swathes of the Indian territory notwithstanding unrelenting state repression remain a challenge for India's democracy. In particular, the longevity of the Maoist conflict calls for a deeper understanding of the interactions among issues of social change, political protest, and democracy in contemporary societies. Currently located in the mineral-rich forest areas of central-eastern India largely populated by adivasi communities, the Maoist insurgency is questioning the legitimacy of the Indian state and the ideological foundations of the economic paradigm of the country. Since the 1980s, the Maoist presence in these territories has contributed in providing an alternative space for presenting adivasi political assertions for land rights and participation, in a way making them allies of class-focused MLM movements against displacement and dispossession in the context of a global economy. In continuity with the legacy of the Naxalbari uprising, the issues of land and social injustice prevailing among the marginalized sections of the Indian society have remained core questions in the contemporary phase of the Maoist movement. By addressing persistent structural conditions of oppression and deprivation, Maoist politics has retained its relevance in the political landscape of the country over the years.

The Indian state's response to the Maoist conflict has mainly focused on policing, judicial action, and military repression. The current categorization of Maoist politics as LWE and terrorism has delegitimized the larger structural and political questions it tries to address. In particular, the transition of the Maoist movement to the realm of security politics in the early 2000s has favored the adoption of growing securitizing measures, the militarization of state-society relations in insurgency-affected areas, and the criminalization of dissent emerging from sections of the society critical of state actions, as exemplified by the recent arrest of intellectuals on the charges of being urban Naxals (Thapar 2019). Besides limiting the possibilities of effectively addressing the socioeconomic conditions of inequality and injustice in which the Maoist insurgency is deeply rooted, this indicates a shrinking space for peace talks and conflict transformation. The recognition of adivasi assertion for rights and development could represent an important step toward a path of conflict resolution and reconciliation.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR)
- ▶ Ethnographic Peace Research
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Intractable Conflict
- ▶ Kashmir Conflict, The
- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Protection of Civilians
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Bagchi, S. (2012). Maoist: Gudsa Usendi alias Sukhdev talks to Suvojit Bagchi. In R. Jeffery, R. Sen, & P. Singh (Eds.), More than Maoism: Politics, policies and insurgencies in South Asia (pp. 401–406). New Delhi: Manohar Publishers.
- Balagopal, K. (2006). Maoist movement in Andhra Pradesh. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3183–3187.
- Balagopal, K. (2008). The NHRC on Salwa Judum: A most friendly inquiry. Economic and Political Weekly, 43(51), 10–14.
- Banerjee, S. (2006). Beyond Naxalbari. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3159–3162.
- Banerjee, S. (2009). In the wake of Naxalbari: Four decades of a simmering revolution (3rd ed.). Kolkata: Sahita Samsad.
- Benbabaali, D. (2016). From the peasant armed struggle to the Telangana state: Changes and continuities in a south Indian region's uprisings. Contemporary South Asia, 24(2), 184–196.
- Bhadra, S. (2012). Peace-talk process in Junglemahal: A brief overview. In B. Roy (Ed.), War and peace in Junglemahal: People state and Maoists (pp. 60–67). Kolkata: Setu Prakashani.
- Bhaduri, A., et al. (2009). Fact finding on Lalgarh. Economic and Political Weekly, 44(16) 4 & 110.
- Bhatia, B. (2005). The Naxalite movement in Central Bihar. Economic and Political Weekly, 40(15), 1536–1549.
- Bhatia, B. (2006). On armed resistance. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3179–3183.
- Bhaumik, S. (2010, March 1). Code Red. The Caravan. Retrieved 1 June 2020 from <https://caravanmagazine.in/perspectives/code-red>

- Brass, P. R. (1973). Political parties of the radical left in South Asian politics. In M. F. Franda & P. R. Brass (Eds.), Radical politics in South Asia (pp. 3–116). Cambridge: The MIT Press.
- Census of India. (2011). 2011 census data. Retrieved 20 Sept 2020 from <https://censusindia.gov.in/2011-Com mon/CensusData2011.html>
- Chakravorty, S. (2013). The price of land: Acquisition, conflict, consequence. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- CPI (Maoist). (2004a). Party constitution, Central Committee, CPI (Maoist). Retrieved 10 Sept 2020 from <https://www.satp.org/satporgtp/countries/india/maoist/documents/papers/partyconstitution.htm>
- CPI (Maoist). (2004b). Strategy and tactics of the Indian revolution. Retrieved 10 Sept 2020 from <http://bannedthought.net/India/CPI-Maoist-Docs/Founding/StrategyTactics-pamphlet.pdf>
- CPI (Maoist). (2007). Political and organisational review. Retrieved 10 Sept 2020 from <http://bannedthought.net/India/CPI-Maoist-Docs/NinthCongress/PoliticalAndOrganizationalReview-2007-Feb-Eng-View-OCR.pdf>
- D'Mello, B. (2018). India after Naxalbari: Unfinished history. New York: Monthly Review Press.
- Dasgupta, B. (1973). Naxalite armed struggles and the annihilation campaign in rural areas. Economic and Political Weekly, 8(4/6), 173–188.
- Desai, A. R. (Ed.). (1986). Agrarian struggles in India after Independence. New Delhi/New York: Oxford University Press.
- Dhanagare, D. N. (1974). Social origins of the peasant insurrection in Telangana (1946–51). Contributions to Indian Sociology, 8(1), 109–134.
- Fazal, T. (2015). 'Peace talks' as strategic deployment: The state, Maoists and political violence in India. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 26, 39–51. <https://doi.org/10.3318/isia.2015.26.8>.
- Fernandes, W. (2007). Singur and the displacement scenario. Economic and Political Weekly, 42(3), 203–206.
- Frankel, F. R. (2005). India's political economy 1947–2004: The gradual revolution (2nd ed.). New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Ghosh, J., & Chandrashekar, C. P. (2002). The market that failed: Neoliberal economic reforms in India. New Delhi: LeftWord Books.
- GOI, Ministry of Home Affairs. (2008). Annual report 2008–2009. Retrieved 15 July 2020 from <https://www.mha.gov.in/sites/default/files/AR%28E%290809.pdf>
- GOI, Ministry of Home Affairs. (2009). Annual report 2009–2010. Retrieved 15 July 2020 from <https://www.mha.gov.in/sites/default/files/AR%28E%290910.pdf>
- GOI, Planning Commission. (2008). Development challenges in extremist affected areas: Report of an expert group to Planning Commission. Retrieved 3 June 2020 from http://planningcommission.gov.in/reports/publications/rep_dce.pdf
- GOI, Press Information Bureau. (2006, 13 April). 'Focus on good governance, reducing deprivation and alienation': Prime Minister. Concluding remarks at the 2nd meeting of the Standing Committee of Chief Ministers on naxalism. Retrieved 15 July 2020 from <http://www.pib.nic.in/newsite/erecontent.aspx?relid=17128>
- Gudavarthy, A. (2014). Maoism, democracy and globalisation: Cross-currents in Indian politics. New Delhi: SAGE Publications India.
- Guha, R. (2007). Adivasis, Naxalites and Indian democracy. Economic and Political Weekly, 42(32), 3305–3312.
- Guha, R., et al. (2006). Salwa Judum: War in the heart of India: Excerpts from the report by the independent citizens initiative. Social Scientist, 34(7/8), 47–61.
- Gupta, T. D. (2006). Maoism in India: Ideology, programme and armed struggle. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3172–3176.
- Haragopal, G. (2017). Maoist movement: context and concerns. Economic and Political Weekly, 52(21), 71–76.
- Hasnain, N. (1983). Tribal India today. New Delhi: Harnam Publications.
- IANS. (2020, May 5). Anti-Maoist Ops: 8 ITBP bns to be permanently based in Chhattisgarh. Outlook Magazine. Retrieved 5 May 2020 from <https://www.outlookindia.com/newsscroll/antimaoist-ops-8-itbp-bns-to-be-permanently-based-in-chhattigarh-ians-exclusive/1822517>
- Ismail, F., & Shah, A. (2015). Class struggle, the Maoists, and the indigenous question in Nepal and India. Economic and Political Weekly, 50(35), 112–123.
- Kennedy, J. (2015). The socioeconomic determinants of natural resource conflict: Minerals and Maoist insurgency in India. Society and Natural Resources: An International Journal, 28(2), 149–164. <https://doi.org/10.1080/08941920.2014.941447>
- Kennedy, J., & Purushotham, S. (2012). Beyond Naxalbari: A comparative analysis of Maoist insurgency and counterinsurgency in independent India. Comparative Studies in Society and History, 54(4), 832–862.
- Kunnath, G. J. (2009). Smouldering Dalit fires in Bihar, India. Dialectical Anthropology, 33(3–4), 309–325.
- Majumdar, A. (1993). Peasant protest in Indian politics: Tebhaga movement in Bengal. New Delhi: NIB Publishers.
- Maringanti, A. (2010). Talks between the Maoists and the state: Learning from the Andhra experience. Economic and Political Weekly, 45(34), 39–43.
- Miklian, J. (2009). The purification hunt: The Salwa Judum counterinsurgency in Chhattisgarh, India. Dialectical Anthropology, 33, 441–459. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s10624-009-9138-1>.
- Miklian, J. (2012). The political ecology of war in Maoist India. Politics, Religion and Ideology, 13(4), 561–576. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21567689.2012.732017>
- Milbert, I. (2012). Building the economy: 1947–1980. In C. Jaffrelot (Ed.), India since 1950: Society, politics, economy and culture (pp. 84–104). New Delhi: Yatra Books.
- Mohanty, M. (2006). Challenges of revolutionary violence: The Naxalite movement in perspective. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3163–3168.

- Mohanty, M. (2015). Red and green: Five decades of Indian Maoist movement. Kolkata: Setu Prakashani.
- Mohanty, M. (2017). Adivasi Swaraj is the answer to violence. Economic and Political Weekly, 52(21), 66–70.
- Mukhopadhyay, A. K. (2006). Through the eyes of the police. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3227–3233.
- Navlakha, G. (2017). A savage war for “development”. Economic and Political Weekly, 52(21), 61–65.
- Oetken, J. L. (2009). Counterinsurgency against Naxalites in India. In S. Ganguly & D. P. Fidler (Eds.), India and counterinsurgency: Lessons learned (pp. 127–151). Abingdon/Oxon: Routledge.
- Poyam, A. (2020, February 14). Stepsons of the soil. The Caravan. Retrieved 9 May 2020 from <https://caravanmagazine.in/conflict/in-battles-between-paramilitary-insurgents-victims-from-same-marginalised-group>
- Ram, M. (1973). The Telengana peasant armed struggle, 1946–51. Economic and Political Weekly, 8(23), 1025–1032.
- Ramana, P. V. (2011, December). Maoist people’s liberation Guerrilla Army. IDS Comments. Retrieved 1 June 2020 from https://idsa.in/idsacomments/MaoistPeopleSLiberationGuerrillaArmy_pvramana_121211
- Ramana, P. V. (2013). Taming India’s Maoists: Surrender and rehabilitation. Strategic Analysis, 37(6), 716–728. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09700161.2013.847042>.
- Rediff News Bureau. (2010, August 10). Azad’s killing: Some unanswered questions. news.rediff.com. Retrieved 21 July 2020 from <https://news.rediff.com/special/2010/aug/10/special-azads-death-some-unanswered-questions.htm>
- Rijju, K. (2014, July 30). Naxals having links with other outfits. Ministry of Home Affairs. India. Parliament, Rajya Sabha. Unstarred Question No. 226. Retrieved 8 Nov 2020 from <https://www.mha.gov.in/MHA1/Par2017/pdfs/par2014-pdfs/rs-300714/2206.pdf>
- Sen, S. (1982). Peasant movements in India: Mid-nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Kolkata: K. P. Bagchi.
- Sethi, A. (2010, February 6). Green Hunt: The anatomy of an operation. The Hindu. Retrieved 21 July 2020 from <https://www.thehindu.com/opinion/op-ed/Green-Hunt-the-anatomy-of-an-operation/article16812797.ece>
- Shah, A. (2013). The intimacy of insurgency: Beyond coercion, greed or grievance in Maoist India. Economy and Society, 42(3), 480–506. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03085147.2013.783662>.
- Shah, A., Lerche, J., Axelby, R., Benbabaali, D., Donegan, B., Raj, J., & Thakur, V. (2018). Ground down by growth: Tribe, caste, class and inequality in 21st century India. London: Pluto Press.
- Singh, P. (2016). Naxalite movement in India. New Delhi: Rupa Publications India.
- South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP). (n.d.-a). Left wing extremist group: Maoist Communist Centre (MCC). South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP). Retrieved 5 Sept 2020 from <https://www.satp.org/satporgtp/countries/india/terroristoutfits/MCC.htm>
- South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP). (n.d.-b). Private caste armies in Bihar. South Asia Terrorism Portal (SATP). Retrieved 5 Sept 2020 from https://www.satp.org/satporgtp/countries/india/terroristoutfits/Private_armies.htm
- Subramanian, K. S. (2010). State response to Maoist violence in India: A critical assessment. Economic and Political Weekly, 45(32), 23–26.
- Sundar, N. (2006). Bastar, Maoism and Salwa Judum. Economic and Political Weekly, 41(29), 3187–3192.
- Sundar, N. (2007). Subalterns and sovereigns: An anthropological history of Bastar (1854–2006). New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Sundar, N. (2016). The burning forest: India’s war in Bastar. New Delhi: Juggernaut.
- Sundarayya, P. (1973a). Telangana People’s armed struggle, 1946–51: Part four: Background to a momentous decision. Social Scientist, 1(10), 22–52.
- Sundarayya, P. (1973b). Telangana People’s armed struggle, 1946–51. Part three: Pitted against the Indian army. Social Scientist, 1(9), 23–46.
- Sundarayya, P. (1973c). Telangana people’s armed struggle, 1946–1951. Part one: Historical setting. Social Scientist, 1(7), 3–19.
- Sundarayya, P. (1973d). Telangana people’s armed struggle, 1946–1951. Part two: First phase and its lessons. Social Scientist, 1(8), 18–42.
- Thakor, H. (2018, December 8). Srikakulam movement – 50th anniversary. Frontier Weekly. Retrieved 7 Aug 2020 from <https://frontierweekly.com/views/dec-18/8-12-18-Srikakulam%20Movement.html>
- Thapar, R. (2019, January 29). ‘Urban Naxals’: It’s essential that right to dissent is not discarded in India, says Romila Thapar. Scroll.in. Retrieved 2 Sept 2020 from <https://scroll.in/article/911133/full-text-romila-thapar-says-it-is-essential-that-the-right-to-dissent-in-india-is-not-discarded>
- Tyagi, J. (2016). Organizational structure and class: Examining resilience in the Maoist movement in India (Doctoral dissertation). Retrieved 7 Aug 2020 from DSpace – Digital Repository Unimib. <https://ir.stonybrook.edu/xmlui/handle/11401/76812>
- Varadarajan, S. (2010, April 14). A ceasefire will create conducive atmosphere for talks: Azad. The Hindu. Retrieved 2 Oct 2020 from <https://www.thehindu.com/opinion/op-ed/A-ceasefire-will-create-conducive-atmosphere-for-talks-Azad/article15519652.ece>
- Venugopal, N. (2013). Understanding Maoists: Notes of a participant observer from Andhra Pradesh. Kolkata: Setu Prakashani.
- Verghese, A. (2016). British rule and tribal revolts in India: The curious case of Bastar. Modern Asian Studies, 50(5), 1619–1644. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0026749X14000687>.
- Viswanathan, A. (2016, July 3). Filming the revolution. The Week. Retrieved 8 June 2020 from <https://www.theweek.in/theweek/cover/naxalism-cinema.html>

Further Readings

- Acharya, B. (2012). Charu Mazumdar: Collective works. Kolkata: Radical Impression.

- Banerjee, S. (1984). India's simmering revolution: The Naxalite uprising. London: Zed Books.
- Bharadwaj, A. (2020). The death script: Dreams and delusions in naxal country. New Delhi: Fourth Estate.
- Bhukya, B. (2017). The roots of the periphery. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Bose, P. (Ed.). (2010). Maoism: A critique from the Left. New Delhi: LeftWord Books
- Chitralekha. (2012). Ordinary people, extraordinary violence: Naxalites and Hindu extremists in India. New Delhi: Routledge.
- Gandhy, A. (2012). Scripting the change: Selected writings of Anuradha Gandhi. New Delhi: Daanish Books.
- Kerketta, J. (2018). Land of the roots. New Delhi: Bhartiya Jnanpith.
- Majumdar, A. (2011). The Tebhaga movement: Politics of peasant protest in Bengal 1946-1950. New Delhi: Aakar Books.
- Mukherjee, N. (2014). The lives of others. Gurgaon: Vintage Books. Random House India.
- Narendra. (2018). Bastar dispatches: A passage through the wild. Noida: HarperCollins.
- Paul, B. (2014). The first Naxal: An authorised biography of Kanu Sanyal. New Delhi: SAGE Publications India.
- Rao, G. K. (2010). Untouchable spring (trans: Uma, A., Sridhar, M.). Hyderabad: Orient BlackSwan.
- Ray, R. (2012). The Maoists and their ideology. New Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Savyasaachi. (2018). Intractable conflicts in contemporary India: Narratives and social movements. Abingdon/Oxon: Routledge.
- Shah, A. (2018). Nightmarch: A journey into India's naxal heartlands. London: Hurst & Co..
- Shah, A., & Jain, D. (2017). Naxalbari at its golden jubilee: Fifty recent books on the Maoist movement in India. Modern South Asian Studies, 51(4), 1165–1219. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0026749X16000792>.
- Singh, R. (2018). 13 years: A Naxalite's prison diary. New Delhi: Navayana Publishing.
- Sen, S. (1972). Agrarian struggle in Bengal: 1946-47. New Delhi. People's Publishing House.

Mapping

- ▶ Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence

Marginalization

- ▶ Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis

Margins

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Masculinity

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict

Masculinity and Conflict

Heidi Riley

School of Politics and International Relations, University College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Conflict; Gender; Insurgency; Masculinity; Militarism; Peacekeeping; UNSCR 1325; Violence

Definition

The concept of masculinity does not sit alone but is understood in relation to notions of femininity within the broader concept of “gender” or the structure of gender relations. This is the way in which the social environment constructs men and women’s social positioning with reference to assumptions around embedded gender defined roles and traits and attaches specific values and ideas to frequently unquestioned, societal gender hierarchies, or socially accepted gendered norms (Connell 2005; Kimmel 2000). Masculinity, although affiliated to the male body, is therefore interlinked with idealized beliefs and discourses around what “men should be like” or what men naturally are like (Duriesmith 2016, p. 27; Flood 2002). Relationally, this is supported by theories of what women naturally are and should be and typically built around gender binaries such as men as active, public, and strong and women as passive, private, and weak (Cohn 2013). These beliefs and assumptions about the natural condition of men and masculinity impact upon the male sense of identity, which is then reproduced in gendered social action.

The association of masculinity with conflict is complex. Cultural and social understandings of masculinity typically place men as more violent and with a greater affiliation to war-making institutions such as the military. Although it is recognized that there is not one type of masculinity and that masculinities are changeable and contested, assumption around what it means to be a man have very real consequences for the practices of conflict. Taking masculinity seriously helps us understand better why conflict takes place, how conflict is fought, who is impacted, and in what way. This entry covers areas of subtopics in the masculinity and conflict literature such as hegemonic masculinity, military masculinities, and the role of masculinity in wartime violence and sexual violence. Also covered are some areas of newer research that examines alternative masculinities in non-state armed groups, peacebuilder masculinities and the notion of the “new man” masculinity.

Introduction

Early ideas around masculinity took biology as a starting point, claiming that the male body was the fundamental determinant of masculine traits and personality (Fukuyama 1998). This was challenged in the 1980s and 1990s as sex-role theorists exposed how masculinity, or masculine behavior, is influenced by social structure (Brod 1987). However, while this was a welcome shift in positioning, it failed to take account of the influence of other identity factors such as class and race that may also intersect with notions of masculinity. It was not until the introduction of the pioneering work of R.W. Connell (1995) in the 1990s that a more comprehensive understanding of masculinity was developed, one that took into account the diversity of masculinities and recognized that masculinity is changeable in response to shifting structures of gender. From this position Connell (2005, p. 71) defines masculinity as the simultaneous workings of: the constructed positioning of “masculine identity in gender relations,” the “practice through which men and women engage their place in gender,” and the “effects of these practices in bodily experience, personality and culture.” This work has influenced many later masculinity scholars, leading to a proliferation and broadening of literature on the topic. Scholarship on masculinity and violence has sought to explain why the majority of violence is carried out by men and which men (or women) are targeted for violence (Kirby and Henry 2012). Moreover, scholarship on masculinity and conflict has now become an important dimension of the gender literature on peace and conflict. From these works has developed further concepts such as “toxic masculinities” aimed at capturing the impact that certain harmful masculinities may have on society and institutions by perpetuating discriminatory gender norms or even lead to masculine extremism (Pearson 2019). To challenge the dominant focus in the conflict literature on masculinity and violence, there is also an expanding body of works on alternative masculinities in conflict that also takes into account queer perspectives and profeminist masculinities (Myrttinen et al. 2017; Ortega 2012; McKeown and Sharoni 2002). These other areas of scholarship on masculinity and conflict are particularly important in more nuanced analysis of the field.

Hegemonic Masculinity

Despite the existence of multiple masculinities within societies, there tends to be an ideal type – or hegemonic – masculinity that influences the way men, both consciously and unconsciously, construct their own masculinity (Connell and Messerschmidt 2005). This is the notion that “in a context of multiple masculinities, one form always dominates the hierarchy” and is a measure through which men can reference their own notions of masculinity (Duncanson 2013, p. 13). Typically, hegemonic masculinity has been associated with idealized notions of masculinity and as a phenomenon that maintains masculine power and strength. Notions of hegemonic masculinity that valorize warriorhood, strength, and power may influence masculine identity and behaviors and thus play a role in promoting violence and contribute to fueling conflict. However, given masculinity's cultural construction, hegemonic masculinity does not necessarily have to be in opposition to gender equality but may take other forms in response to the social structure (Connell 2002). In masculinity research, scholars have traditionally found the concept of "hegemonic masculinities" useful as an analytical tool (Duncanson 2013).

Masculinity and Conflict

Constructed peacetime understandings of masculine power, and expectations around what men should be, have direct implications for war and militarism. For example, through masculinity's association with warriorhood, violence, and strength, war maybe framed as an ultimate expression of manhood (Mackenzie 2015). Moreover, notions of masculinity can shape perceptions of reasonable responses to potential conflict and thus justify war and armed violence as a natural response to contentious politics.

A further masculine assumption that has implications for conflict is that of being the "protector." This is the idea that the man, as the traditional head of the house, should be the protector of the family, or at the national level, the masculine state is understood as the protector of the citizens. In conflict, the notion of "masculine protection" associated with the idealized understanding of "men as protectors" may intersect with racial assumptions that become justifications for conflict. For example, the US intervention in Afghanistan has been argued to have been legitimized in the media as an intervention carried out on behalf of saving Afghani women from Afghani men (Shepherd 2006). From this perspective it was portrayed from a hegemonic western perspective to be an act of "masculine protection" – to save Afghani women from Afghani men – without taking into account the legacy of US influence on the rise of the Taliban. Notions of masculine protection in the justification of war are often built on assumptions around men and violence and perpetuate the idea that women are in need of protection – typically by some men – from other men (Razack 2004).

Wartime Violence in Conflict

Critical feminist scholars have highlighted how gender can be understood as a meaning system. Traits such as "active," "public," "violence," and "protection" are frequently aligned with masculinity, whereas the binary opposites such as "passive," "private," "peace," and "victim" tend to be associated with femininity (Cohn 2013, p. 12). Even where dominant conceptions of masculinity do not idealize violence, research has shown that violence can be seen as an "acceptable means of attaining other symbols of manhood, such as wealth or access to women" (Wright 2014, p. 5). Furthermore, constructed understandings of the ideal man render men who are unable to achieve societal masculine expectations more susceptible to participation in armed groups or more likely to carry out domestic violence (Duriesmith 2016; Wright 2014). Problematically, constructed notions of masculinity that associate violence and dominance with valorized understandings of what it means to be a man play a role in fueling conflict and insecurity (Zarkov 2012).

In times of war, valorized masculine expectations may be manipulated and called upon, resulting in high levels of masculine violence, and thus influence how wars are fought (Myrntinen 2015; Duriesmith 2016). Where masculine violence, or the ability to be violent, is expected among men under certain peacetime conditions, this may become exacerbated during conflict and thus restructure the boundaries of acceptable forms of violence and take on different meanings in conflict (Duriesmith 2018). Recent research into the conflicts in Sierra Leone and South Sudan highlights that in such "New Wars," preexisting notions of masculinity influenced the types of violence carried out and thus explained the "widespread use of sexual violence, abduction, pillage and torture" (Duriesmith, 2016, p. 123). This understanding of masculinity also contributes to the transformation of armed groups into warrior groups (Ibid., p. 4).

Unfortunately, essentialist assumptions around masculinity do not recognize the realities and diversity of men and women's lives but instead serve to perpetuate gender inequalities and violence, both structural and physical (Connell 2005; Enloe 1993). Such gendered assumptions also have implications for men in conflict, for example, the association of masculinity with aggression presumes men as more violent within armed groups, or it may affect the way former male fighters are perceived in post-conflict. In addition, by promoting masculine expectations, men who do not fit such expectations may encounter discrimination or be targeted with violence.

Masculinity and Wartime Sexual Violence

Where peacetime gendered assumptions and cultural norms maintain widespread gender inequality and perceive women as passive homemakers or symbols of the community, this may also contribute to the perpetration of sexual violence during war (Baaz and Stern 2009; Duriesmith 2016; Marks 2013). Similarly, peacetime masculine norms that condone gendered violence and masculine sexual entitlement also play a role in heightened sexual violence during conflict. This was very much the case in the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) in Sierra Leone where, despite being prohibited, rape and sexual violence was widespread. The RUF promoted marriage within the institution. These were often forced, and wives were subject to high levels of sexual violence and rape. However, this was not viewed as problematic as masculine sexual entitlement in marriage is acceptable in broader society, particularly due to notions of the ownership of wives (Marks 2013). This is not to say that women are merely passive victims in armed rebel groups, instead it tells us more about how masculinity may be understood during war, as an exaggeration of peacetime gender norms.

In a similar vein, sexual violence against men in conflict can also be understood to stem from exaggerated notions of masculinity and power. Although less recognized, male rape by men is widespread in conflict as has been documented during the wars in the former Yugoslavia and currently in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Male rape in conflict, maybe understood as an act of masculine power and aggression with an aim to feminize, dehumanize, or weaken the victim. Where masculinity intersects with nationalism or ethnicity, male rape may be targeted at men from the opposing ethnicity in order to feminize the "other." Hague (1997) has argued that this explains the high levels of male rape by Serb forces against Muslim men during the Bosnian war.

It should be noted that although this position builds a picture of how peacetime notions of masculinity impact on wartime violence, this does not assume that all men engage in violence. There are many men that do not commit violence and even those that participate in or support an armed group may not commit violence. Some scholars have highlighted how masculinity scholarship on peace and conflict that focuses primarily on violent forms of hegemonic masculinity, renders other masculinities, in particular, nonheterosexual masculinities as "invisible" (Myrttinen et al. 2017). It is important, therefore, to recognize that despite the link between masculinity and violence, there are multiple masculinities in both peacetime and war.

Military Masculinities

Scholars have argued that the ideology of militarism is built on hegemonic notions of masculinity that associates men with heteronormativity and valorized warriorhood associated with aggressiveness, bravery, and toughness (Higate 2012; Whitworth 2004; Richter-Montpetit 2007; Hearn 2012). Military training is identified as a method of indoctrination of such idealized military masculinities, which, in turn, has ramifications for how masculinity is understood and performed within the military.

Whitworth's research into the Canadian military has shown how idealized masculinities are drilled into recruits through “violent, misogynistic, racist and homophobic messages,” as well as a sense of entitlement during training (Whitworth 2004, p. 154). Military training regimes are also known to use misogynistic epithets as a tool in hazing in the military socialization processes. This leads to a shared respect and admiration for the “ideal masculine model” which is confirmed and exacerbated by “rivalries between different groups of men and their efforts to prove their masculinity” (Enloe 1993, p. 98). These power struggles are frequently expressed in gendered terms, with the threat of being feminized used to humiliate or ensure adherence to the rules of group of men in military drills (Whitworth 2004). This has been observed in army training with the archetypal use of “woman,” “girl,” “queer,” and “faggot” to put down those who are failing to complete the various physical challenges associated with manliness (Duncanson 2015; Higate 2012). Importantly, these strategies of feminization, although directed at men, have an impact on women by reinforcing “feminized” qualities of inferiority and constructing forms of hypermasculinity (Duncanson 2015, p. 235).

The critical feminist stance on military masculinity identifies the “heteronormative” culture of military institutions as celebrating heterosexuality and in doing so encourages recruits to pursue it. This is the idea that “real men and real soldiers chase women at any available moment” (Duncanson 2013, p. 19). This notion has very real implications for women who are part of the military institution or those who are in close proximity. For example, a study of the US military in 2008 found that 30% of military women were raped while serving, 71% were sexually assaulted, and 90% had suffered instances of sexual harassment, many of which were not reported (Benedict 2009). Moreover, evidence of the impact of military masculinities on women can be inferred via the high levels of wartime sexual violence carried out by state armies, such as the Serb military in the former Yugoslavia (Alison 2007; Hague 1997) or in Sri Lanka against Tamil women (Sooka 2014). Evidence of legitimized aggressive heteronormativity is also found in the scholarship on the rise in prostitution around military bases (Enloe 1988), or the history of “comfort women” in the Japanese military (Soh 1996). In addition, recent concerns have been raised around sexual abuse carried out by peacekeepers and how military masculinities associated with sexual power and racial dominance have contributed to this, for example, among the UN peacekeepers in Bosnia (Reese 2002) or French peacekeepers in the Central African Republic.

The Peacebuilding Masculinity

There is much agreement among scholars that masculinities are multiple and have the potential for change. Hence recent scholarship has highlighted that shifts in institutional norms and training practices within militaries may provide alternative ways in which masculinity is understood and performed in military institutions (Duncanson and Woodward 2015). This work often examines the shift toward a greater focus on peacekeeping in contemporary militaries. For example, Haaland’s (2012) work on the Norwegian Armed Forces found that changes toward a greater focus on peacekeeping missions in the 2000s led to shifts in masculine norms that did not display the same level of valorization of aggression and violence as demonstrated earlier work on military masculinities. Instead, the study identifies that qualities valued as representative of being a good soldier were “endurance, a good sense of humour and personal initiative” (Ibid., p. 73). Although the study maintained that women military personnel still had to prove themselves to become “one of the boys,” women were unconcerned about sexual harassment and violence (Ibid., p. 73).

The introduction of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1325 on Women, Peace and Security that promoted the increase of women’s participation in the military and other security institutions advocates for a greater recognition and response to wartime harms against women. This resolution has, arguably, led to changes in gender policy in many militaries and subsequently led to shifts in acceptable notions of military masculinity (Duncanson and Woodward 2015, p. 8).

In the British military, research has shown that changes in military practice have led to the construction of a type of “peacebuilder masculinity” that is more focused on “skills and practices of communication, negotiation, humanitarianism, sensitivity, compassion and empathy” (Duncanson 2015, p. 241). However, Duncanson (2013) also notes that some military men felt that peacekeeping activities were a weak form of military action and that experience of proper conflict was what they signed up for. In the Irish Defence Forces, the recent Gender Action Plan associated with UNSCR 1325, which promotes the equal opportunities of men and women in all roles, ensures a zero tolerance of gender-based violence, and includes rigorous gender training and briefings in all military career paths, has been described by its members to have contributed to shifting masculine norms in the institution.

However, feminist skeptics have argued that despite its progressive orientation, the “peacebuilding masculinity” may lead to the revering of a type of “new man,” which then has the potential for reconstructing gender hierarchies but in a different form (Khalili 2011). In a military context, this has been referred to as a softer version of masculinity based on being “tough but tender – intelligent, sophisticated, humane and companionate, discriminate in the use of force but also being convincing warriors when required” (Duncanson 2013, p. 61; Higate and Henry 2004). Inadvertently, this has the effect of reinforcing the “women as victims” narrative which maintains masculinity’s position as the protector, further perpetuating masculine power. Moreover, other scholarship has shown that in contexts where men are part of advocating for greater gender equality, the “new man” identity becomes part of the new patriarchy, which monopolizes the drive for gender equality and thus overshadows women’s work in this area.

Alternative Masculinities in Non-state Armed Groups

Much of the literature on masculinity and non-state armed groups identifies how conflict exacerbates harmful masculinities. However, there is another set of literature that examines the role of ideology and wartime indoctrination in regulating masculine behaviors. Such literature is often focused on men’s responses to women’s participation in armed groups that espouse a more gender-equal ideology than in exist in society. For example, Ortega (2012) notes that in three non-state Marxist groups in the Latin American context (The Shining Path in Peru, M-19 in Colombia, and the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front (FMNL) in El Salvador), the revolutionary ideology and the way that gender was organized in the group produced “alternative masculinities.” The intense indoctrination process, coupled with more gender-equal institutional structures, produced expressions of masculinity not based on the “devaluation of women” but based on an equality of respect (Ibid., p. 491). These alternative expressions of masculinity accommodated “tenderness” between male comrades and the acceptability of public displays of emotion (Ibid., p. 491). She notes that there existed important “mechanisms of self-control and peer pressure,” which, through the intense ideological education programs, were instrumental in mitigating stark dichotomies between concepts of masculinity and femininity (Ibid., p. 503).

This was also the case in Nepal, where the Maoist ideology of the People’s Liberation Army (PLA) promoted women’s inclusion resulting in roughly 40% women’s participation by the end of the conflict. Men recall increasing their respect for their female counterparts after experiencing women’s capabilities in warfare. Thus, PLA masculinities, although maintaining a valorization of typically masculine traits such as warriorism, self-sacrifice, and being capable on the battlefield, shifted to be more supportive of gender equality and women’s empowerment (Riley 2019). This contributed to deconstructing embedded gender discriminations both within the armed group and within greater society.

Work on the role of ideology in influencing masculine performance also provides some insight into why some armed groups do not engage in sexual violence (Wood 2009; Hoover Green 2016). For example, the lack of sexual violence carried out by the LTTE in Sri Lanka and the FMLN in El Salvador or the EZNL in Mexico is argued to be as a result of ideological indoctrination and party policy that maintained tight control over notions of masculine sexual entitlement (Wood 2009). This is in contrast to fundamentalist conservative ideologies that are based on the devaluation of women and masculine sexual entitlement such as in the context of ISIS against Yazidi women, where practices of women's sexual slavery were sanctioned by the ideology and group practices.

However, revolutionary forms of conflict masculinity that claim to advocate for greater gender equality may also lead to the construction of other forms of masculinity which exude other forms of masculine power. Revolutionary leaders that claim to be enlightening the masses in the fight for a new society may perform displays of higher intellect and strength, resulting in a type of machoism that perpetuates patriarchy in a different form. For example, Abimael Guzman, the notorious leader of Sendero Luminoso, was frequently portrayed with thick glasses with a book under his arm, highlighting his superior intelligence. Yet while promoting the empowerment of women in his speeches, the conflict he was responsible for, led to extreme levels of gender-based violence, particularly against indigenous women. Similarly, some other forms of revolutionary masculinity may promote greater equality but are not sympathetic to men that don't fit the typical image of the heterosexual revolutionary. For example, in the Cuban context, the masculinity exuded by the revolutionary leaders was not sympathetic to homosexuality or men that did not portray stereotypical masculine attributes. As a result, part of the revolutionary "hygiene program," included the forcing of homosexuals into military camps to cleanse them of their nonrevolutionary masculinity (Butler 2012, p. 72).

Pro-feminist Masculinity and Future Directions

Despite the skeptical position on "new man" masculinities, the role of male gender champions remains vital in peace and conflict work. There are, of course, many men who advocate for a more feminist agenda, and recent scholarship has highlighted the need to recognize male participation in promoting gender equality (Ashe 2007; Connell 2014; Kaufman and Kimmel 2011). There is also evidence of gender champions in a military context who have been at the forefront of advocacy around the harmonization of gender policies across militaries. Thus the excellent work of many other men working to promote peace and greater gender equality should not be overshadowed by only focusing on toxic masculinities and their association with violence. This is an area of scholarship still underdeveloped and therefore provides an avenue for future scholarship.

Future scholarship in the context of masculinity and conflict would also do well to place a greater emphasis on more nuanced and comparative work on military masculinities that goes beyond single studies on militaries in from the global North. Given the dominance of militaries from the global South within peacekeeping missions, a lack of emphasis on military masculinities in the African and Asian context remains an oversight. A greater understanding of masculinity and its intersections with class, race, and ethnicity continues to be crucial to understanding the dynamics of conflict and conflict transition, as well as remaining vital in identifying areas of intervention in the transformation of harmful gender hierarchies.

Summary

This brief examination of the field of masculinity in conflict has firstly provided a definition that locates masculinity within the structure of gender relations. It has highlighted the ways in which stereotypical gender norms that align masculinity with militarism, warriorhood, and ideals of masculine protection have implications for the way conflict is fought and how masculinity is performed during conflict. The discussion also introduced the concept of hegemonic masculinity as a useful way of understanding dominant forms of masculinity, both at the societal level and within militarized institutions. Where hegemonic peacetime notions of masculinity associate men with violence and sexual entitlement, this may become exacerbated during conflict and have devastating implications for women and other men, particularly where they intersect with ethnicity or nationalism. However, it is important to avoid essentialism that only associates masculinity with violence in conflict. As reiterated throughout the discussion, there are multiple forms of masculinity, and it is important to also take account of the numerous men who work to promote peace. Moreover, masculinity is changeable in response to shifts in the social structure. This has been demonstrated through the examination of shifts toward “peacebuilder masculinity” within peacekeeping forces or the notion of “alternative” or “revolutionary masculinities” in armed groups that espouse greater gender equality. However, feminist scholars caution the celebration of the “tough but tender” peacebuilder masculinity or the pro-equality revolutionary masculinity as one through which gender hierarchies can be deconstructed. Instead this “new man” masculinity, as it is often termed, may contribute to reconstructing gender hierarchies in different forms. Despite an already burgeoning literature in this field, continued scholarship on masculinity remains vital in further deepening knowledge on the dynamics of conflict and conflict resolution.

Cross-References

- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India
- ▶ Perpetrator Research
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Violent Conflicts in South America
- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict
- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

References

- Alison, M. (2007). Wartime sexual violence: Women’s human rights and questions of masculinity. Review of International Studies, 33(1), 75–90.
- Ashe, F. (2007). The new politics of masculinity: men power and resistance. New York: Routledge.
- Baaz, M., & Stern, M. (2009). Why do soldiers rape? Masculinity, violence, and sexuality in the armed forces in the Congo (DRC). International Studies Quarterly, 53(2), 495–518.
- Benedict, H. (2009). The lonely soldier: The private war of women. Boston: Beacon Press. <http://www.beacon.org/The-Lonely-Soldier-P686.aspx>. Accessed 20 Mar 2017.
- Brod, H. (1987). The making of masculinities: The new men’s studies. New York: Routledge.
- Butler, K. (2012). Deconstructing an icon: Fidel Castro and revolutionary masculinity. Hispanic Studies: University of Kentucky.
- Cohn, C. (2013). Women and war. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Connell, R. W. (1995). Gender. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Connell, R. W. (2002). Masculinities, the reduction of violence and the pursuit of peace. In C. Cockburn & D. Zarkov (Eds.), The postwar moment, militaries, masculinities and international peacekeeping. London: Lawrence and Wishart Limited.
- Connell, R. W. (2005). Masculinities. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Connell, R. W. (2014). A Study of Masculinities. Qualitative Research Journal, 14(1), 5–15.
- Connell, R. W., & Messerschmidt, J. (2005). Hegemonic masculinity: Rethinking the concept. Gender and Society, 19(6), 829–859.
- Duncanson, C. (2013). Forces for good?: Military masculinities and peacebuilding in Afghanistan and Iraq. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Duncanson, C. (2015). Hegemonic masculinity and the possibility of change in gender relations. Men and Masculinities, 18(2), 231–248.
- Duncanson, C., & Woodward, R. (2015). Regendering the military: Theorizing women’s military participation. Security Dialogue, 47(1), 3–21.
- Duriesmith, D. (2016). Masculinity and New War: The gendered dynamics of contemporary armed conflict. New York: Routledge.
- Duriesmith, D. (2018). Masculinities. In L. Sjoberg (Ed.), Handbook on gender and violence. Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- Enloe, C. H. (1988). Does khaki become you?: the militarization of women’s lives. London: Pandora.
- Enloe, C. (1993). The morning after: Sexual politics at the end of the Cold War. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Flood, M. (2002). Between men and masculinities: An assessment of the term ‘masculinity’. In S. Peace & V. Muller (Eds.), Manning the next millenium: Studies in masculinities (pp. 203–213). Bentley: Black Swan Press.

- Fukuyama, F. (1998). Women and the evolution of world politics. Foreign Affairs, 77(5), 17–22.
- Haaland, T. L. (2012). Friendly war-fighters and invisible women: Perceptions of gender and masculinities in the Norwegian Armed Forces on missions abroad. In A. Kronsell & E. Svedberg (Eds.), Making gender, making war: Violence, military and peacekeeping practices (pp. 63–75). New York: Routledge.
- Hague, E. (1997). Rape, power and masculinity: The construction of gender and national identities in the war in Bosnia-Herzegovina. In R. Lentin (Ed.), Gender and catastrophe (pp. 75–83). London: Zed Books.
- Hearn, J. (2012). War/militarism – Searching for obvious connections? In A. Kronsell & E. Svedberg (Eds.), Making gender, making war: Violence, military and peacekeeping practices (pp. 47–64). Routledge: New York.
- Higate, P. (2012). Drinking Vodka from the ‘Butt Crack’: Men and masculinity and fraternity in the private militarized company. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 14(1), 450–469.
- Higate, P., & Henry, M. (2004). Engendering (In)security in peace support operations. Security Dialogue, 35(4), 481–498.
- Hoover Green, A. (2016). The commander’s dilemma. Journal of Peace Research, 53(5), 619–632.
- Kaufman, M., & Kimmel, M. S. (2011). The guy’s guide to feminism. Seattle: Seal Press.
- Khalili, L. (2011). Gendered practices of counterinsurgency. Review of International Studies, 37(4), 1471–1491.
- Kimmel, M. S. (2000). The gendered society. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kirby, P., & Henry, M. (2012). Rethinking masculinity and practices of violence in conflict settings. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 14(4), 445–449.
- Mackenzie, M. (2015). Beyond the band of brothers: The us military and the myth that women can’t fight. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Marks, Z. (2013). Sexual violence in Sierra Leone’s civil war: ‘Virginisation’, rape, and marriage. African Affairs, 113(450), 67–87.
- McKeown, L., & Sharoni, S. (2002). Formations and transformations of masculinity in the North of Ireland and in Israel-Palestine.
- Myrntinen, H. (2015). Sketching the militias: Constructions of violent masculinities in the East Timor conflict. In D. Zarkov (Ed.), Gender, violent conflict and development (pp. 180–240). New Delhi: Zubaan.
- Myrntinen, H., Khattab, L., & Naujoks, J. (2017). Rethinking hegemonic masculinities in conflict-affected contexts. Critical Military Studies, 3(2), 103–119.
- Ortega, L. M. (2012). Looking beyond violent militarized masculinities. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 14(4), 489–507.
- Pearson, E. (2019). Extremism and toxic masculinity: The man question re-posed. International Affairs, 95(6), 1251–1270.
- Razack, S. (2004). Dark threats and white knights: The Somalia affair, peacekeeping and the new imperialism. Toronto: Toronto University Press.
- Reese, M. (2002). International intervention in Bosnia-Herzegovina: The cost of ignoring gender. In Z. Dubravka & C. Cockburn (Eds.), The postwar moment: Militaries, masculinities, and international peacekeeping (pp. 51–67). London: Lawrence and Wishart.
- Richter-Montpetit, M. (2007). Empire, desire and violence: A queer transnational feminist reading of the prisoner ‘abuse’ in Abu Ghraib and the question of ‘gender equality’. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 9(1), 38–59.
- Riley, H. (2019). Male collective identity in the people’s liberation army in Nepal. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 21(4), 544–565.
- Shepherd, L. (2006). Veiled references. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 8(1), 19–41.
- Soh, C. S. (1996). The Korean “comfort women”: Movement for redress. Asian Survey, 36(12), 1226–1240.
- Sooka, Y. (2014). An Unfinished War: Rape and Sexual Violence in Sri Lanka 2009–2014. The Bar Human Rights Committee of England and Wales. Sri Lanka: The International Truth and Justice Project.
- Whitworth, S. (2004). Men, militarism and UN peacekeeping: A gendered analysis. London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Wood, E. J. (2009). Armed groups and sexual violence: When is wartime rape rare? Politics and Society, 37(1), 131–161.
- Wright, H. (2014). Masculinities, conflict and peacebuilding: Perspectives on men through a gendered lens. Resource document. Saferworld. <https://www.saferworld.org.uk/resources/publications/862-masculinities-conflict-and-peacebuilding-perspectives-on-men-through-a-gender-lens>. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- Zarkov, D. (2012). Gender, violent conflict and development. New Delhi: Zubaan.

Mass Atrocity Crimes

► R2P and Prevention

Measuring Peace

Richard Caplan
University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Definition

Measuring peace refers to efforts to ascertain the nature and the extent of peace that prevails in a given state or territory. It serves to provide an indication of how robust or resilient is the peace in question. Peace can be measured on a local, national, or regional basis. At a minimum, efforts to measure peace are concerned with the risk and likelihood of conflict relapse; more ambitiously, efforts to measure peace may be concerned with assessing the broad quality of the peace.

There is no single or, for that matter, agreed procedure for measuring peace. Indeed, it is often the case that multilateral organizations and donor governments do not measure peace. With respect to peacekeeping and peacebuilding, for instance, there is a tendency to focus narrowly on operational performance and mandate implementation in particular. Mandates, however, are often the fruits of political compromise and do not always reflect the requirements for achieving a sustainable peace. Despite this tendency, innovations in operations assessment are attracting the interest of policy analysts and policy makers increasingly, with implications for measuring peace.

The Importance of Measuring Peace

The vulnerability of conflict-affected countries to conflict relapse is the principal reason for the importance of measuring peace. Using a Kaplan-Meier survival estimator, it is possible to chart how long peace has endured in all civil wars for which such data exists (Caplan and Hoeffler 2017). In the post-Cold War period from 1990 until 2013, there were 210 “peace spells,” that is, 210 periods of peace that lasted for at least 1 year following the termination of an armed conflict. (Note: these are not 210 separate civil wars; a single civil war can stop and restart and thus have multiple peace spells.) Figure 1 shows how many peace spells broke down in this period and when this happened. It shows how long peace survived as measured in days. In the beginning, it can be seen that almost all peace spells survive for a short period of time at least: after 2 years, 99.5% of all peace spells survived, i.e., only half of 1% of all peace spells failed, and armed conflict recurred. After 3 years, 82.8% of all peace spells survived. But after 12 years, only about half of all peace spells survived. That is a high rate of peace failure. Indeed, if one extends the timeline and focuses on conflict-affected countries rather than on conflict episodes, 105 countries suffered civil wars in the period between 1946 and 2013, and of these more than half (59 countries) experienced a relapse into violent conflict – in some cases more than once – after peace had been established (UCDP/PRIO 2014). To the extent that measuring peace can capture the vulnerability of the peace of a country emerging from violent conflict and inform policy appropriately, it may be able to limit or foreclose the possibility of conflict relapse.

Measuring Peace,
Fig. 1 Peace survival
1990–2013. (Source:
Caplan and Hoeffler 2017)

Another reason for the importance of measuring peace, closely associated with the foregoing, is the costs of peace maintenance. Approved expenditure for UN peacekeeping operations in the 2019–2020 financial year came to $6.5 billion – up from $464 million in 1990 – and this is the cost of UN peacekeeping only; it does not include the cost of other UN peace consolidation efforts, nor the costs associated with the efforts of other organizations (United Nations 2019). Indeed, regional peacekeeping, especially by European and African security organizations, has undergone a very substantial expansion since the end of the Cold War alongside the growth in UN peacekeeping, as seen in Fig. 2 (Williams 2016). To the extent that these external actors can take an accurate measure of peace, they will be better positioned to decide on whether and how to recalibrate their forces in support of building a self-sustaining peace and thus help to ensure that peace operation expenditure is money well spent.

The measure of peace is also important as it is one criterion by which peacebuilding success may be evaluated. However, assessing peacebuilding performance needs to be distinguished from measuring peace.

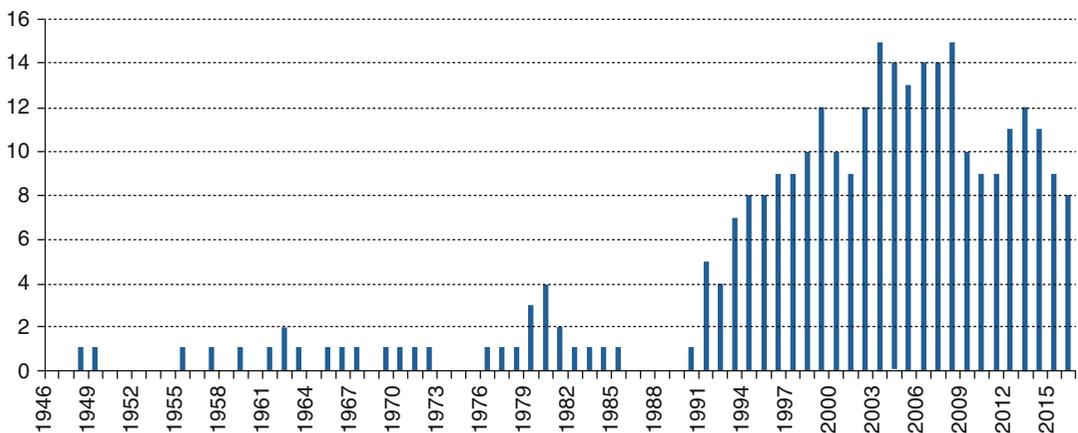

Ways of Measuring Peace

There are many different ways of measuring peace (Makoond 2019). In part these differences reflect the various ways of conceptualizing peace (Caplan 2019). The classic distinction between “negative peace” (the absence of armed conflict) and “positive peace” (harmonious relations within a society) is the basis of two fundamentally different approaches to measuring peace (Galtung 1974, 1985, 1990). The first lends itself to quantitative and comparative analysis and the second to more qualitative analysis, although mixed approaches are also possible and increasingly common.

Negative peace is a minimal conception of peace insofar as the absence of armed conflict is considered to be the minimum condition for any peace. A minimal conception of peace is reflected in the broad body of statistical analyses concerned with the study of peace. The two most widely utilized data sets in this regard are those developed by the Correlates of War Project (CoW) and the Uppsala Conflict Data Program/Peace Research Institute Oslo (UCDP/PRIO). Both data sets measure the presence or absence of armed conflict and thus indirectly the presence or absence of peace (Sarkees 2010; UCDP/PRIO 2014).

Both CoW and UCDP/PRIO employ thresholds of violence in terms of “battle-related deaths” to determine whether and when a war or an armed conflict has occurred (the two terms represent different magnitudes of violence). The advantage that such an approach affords is that it provides a standard that is used widely and thus allows for comparability of findings among researchers.

Measuring Peace, Fig. 2 Regional peace operations since 1946. (Source: Williams 2016)

These data sets have generated a rich body of scholarship as a consequence, most of it using quantitative research methods.

Scholars have also undertaken to measure peace employing positive conceptions. To cite one example, Klein, Goertz, and Diehl have devised a “peace scale” to describe the quality of relations between states, ranging from rivalry at one end to positive peace at the other, using a number of different indicators such as “diplomatic hostility” (emblematic of rivalry) versus “diplomatic coordination” (indicative of positive peace) to capture objective and subjective factors of appreciation across the spectrum (Klein et al. 2008). With appropriate modifications the scale could arguably be used to describe the quality of intrastate relations as well.

Indicators and indices are also common forms of measurement of both negative and positive peace (and cognate conditions such as stability and resilience). These include but are not limited to the Global Peace Index, the Positive Peace Index, the World Peace Index, and the Fragile States Index. In contrast to the CoW and UCDP/PRIO data sets, which focus narrowly on numbers of battle-related deaths, peace indicators are generated by combining heterogeneous sets of data. For instance, the Fragile States Index is constructed on the basis of millions of pieces of information derived from thousands of articles, reports, and data sets that are analyzed using software developed specifically for this purpose (Fund for Peace 2019). The information is used to generate scores for 12 social, economic, and political/military indicators for most of the world’s countries. Countries are then ranked on the basis of the scores that they receive.

A highly localized approach to measuring peace is the “Everyday Peace Indicators” (EPI) project, which uses focus groups with conflict-affected communities to identify indicators of peace that the individuals within these communities employ informally to measure peace. Such indicators might be the ability to sleep at home at night without fear of rebel or government attack, the ability to walk safely from a shop or a bus stop, and the ability to access public services without intimidation (Firchow 2018; Firchow and Mac Ginty 2017). The EPI project reflects the broader interest among scholars and practitioners in the “local turn” in the study and practice of peacebuilding (Leonardsson and Rudd 2015).

Key Issues

Measuring peace is beset with difficulties. The strength of the CoW and UCDP/PRIO data sets – the fact that the standard they employ is strictly defined – is also their weakness. If battle-related deaths fall just below the threshold – 999 or less in a given year in the case of war, 24 or less in the case of armed conflict – this qualifies as peace for the purposes of these data sets. Indeed, many violent conflicts worldwide persist below either threshold (e.g., Gaza), and yet it is difficult to conceive of these states or territories as peaceful. This difficulty reflects the shortcoming of the use of negative peace as an analytical tool: if relations between parties to a conflict are fraught, a state or territory will be considered to be at peace provided that the threshold in battle-related deaths has not been crossed. As Johan Galtung has observed “if [killing] were all violence is about, and peace is seen as its negation, then too little is rejected when peace is held up as an ideal. Highly unacceptable social orders would still be compatible with peace” (Galtung 1974).

There are other problems associated with reliance on a negative peace conception for the purpose of measuring peace. One is that the absence of violence, where it does occur, may merely reflect a period of preparation for the resumption of larger-scale fighting (“the calm before the storm”). There is also the issue of the distribution of violence (localized vs. generalized) in a country and the relative impact of conflict intensity (i.e., the number of battle deaths relative to the size of the population), neither of which is captured by these data sets, although advances in geo-spatial data collection are making the production of more finely differentiated data sets possible (Dittrich Hallberg 2012).

As indicated, scholars and practitioners have sought to redress these problems by focusing on positive conceptions of peace. However, unlike with the notion of negative peace reflected in the data sets above, there is no agreed understanding among analysts of what constitutes a positive peace. The lack of consensus gives rise to divergent assessments of peace. Compare, for instance, Roland Paris's positive assessment of peace and peacebuilding in Eastern Slavonia/Croatia under the UN transitional administration UNTAES with Peter Wallensteen's comparatively negative assessment of the same, which turns on the salience of "dignity" as a requisite factor (Paris 2004, 107–110; Wallensteen 2015, 39–41).

Indicators and indices are of questionable value for the purpose of measuring peace. While considerable amounts of data may underpin a single indicator, the numerical representation of such a highly complex phenomenon as peace (or stability or fragility) necessarily eliminates critical context from the phenomenon (Davis et al. 2012, 8). It does so necessarily because simplification (or reductionism) is precisely the objective: it is the basis of the appeal and the utility of these indicators, whose primary intended users are policy analysts and policymakers for whom the ranking or banding of countries can facilitate decision-making with respect to aid allocation, security assistance, and other aspects of foreign relations. With a few notable exceptions, indices have limited predictive value: they provide little information about the potential future trajectory of a country toward conflict relapse. What indices offer, rather, is a snapshot of a country at a given point in time.

Finally, many measures of peace are top-down and externally generated that fail to take local perspectives into consideration sufficiently. One exception, noted above, is the Everyday Peace Indicators project. Admittedly, however, it is not always easy to incorporate local perspectives if only because conflicted and conflict-affected states or territories are often heterogeneous and polarized. As a consequence, there may not be a single or shared view of the characteristics of, or requirements for, peace in such communities.

Future Directions

The difficulties identified above notwithstanding, there have been innovations in assessment practices that have salience for efforts to measure peace. In 2012–2013, for instance, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) developed internal guidelines for early warning, allowing for a more structured approach to the identification of potential conflicts and crisis situations, and rolled out a conflict analysis toolkit and a set of early warning indicators for use in the organization's field operations. The toolkit and indicators together provide a framework for the systematic analysis of conflict settings at the local, regional, national, and international levels, including but not limited to assessments of the robustness/fragility of the peace established in the aftermath of violent conflict. By the OSCE's own reckoning, in the first year since the introduction of the framework (to July 2013), the OSCE Secretary-General raised concerns about "worrying developments" that threatened the peace arising from this analysis on 11 occasions with respect to the OSCE region (Caplan 2019; Neukirch 2014).

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) also undertook to enhance its assessment capabilities with the adoption of a new assessment framework by its International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan in 2012. Among several noteworthy features of the new approach was its reliance on inputs from ISAF subordinate or supporting commands in the field, who were thought to offer valuable granular perspective on local conditions, notably with respect to security, governance, socioeconomic conditions, and regional relations. These inputs provided the essential foundation for a composite assessment of progress that produced a more holistic examination of available data relevant to peace consolidation (Caplan 2019; Schroden 2014).

Benchmarking represents another practice that has relevance for measuring peace. Benchmarking is a form of evaluation that uses specified standards (a value, process, or state of affairs), the attainment of which, it is thought, contributes to the realization of an operation's broad objectives. Recent years have seen the increased use of benchmarking as a mechanism within the UN system (Stave 2011). By mid-2014, 7 out of 17 UN peacekeeping operations and 2 out of 13 special political missions had introduced benchmarking. Although not all of the benchmarks have been concerned explicitly or exclusively with sustainable peace, benchmarking has the potential to bring greater rigor to measuring peace consolidation (Caplan 2019; United Nations 2010).

Efforts are under way to develop a comprehensive performance assessment system within the United Nations that would be grounded in a context analysis that identifies the key drivers of change and assesses how much effect a peace operation is having on influencing those dynamics. The system could conceivably be calibrated to reflect the requirements for a consolidated peace and thus make a further contribution toward efforts to measure peace (De Coning and Brusset 2018).

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches

References

- Caplan, R. (2019). Measuring peace: Principles, practices and politics. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Caplan, R., & Hoeffler, A. (2017). Why peace endures: An analysis of post-conflict stabilisation. European Journal of International Security, 2(2), 133–152. <https://doi.org/10.1017/eis.2017.2>.
- Davis, K. E., Kingsbury, B., & Engle Merry, S. (2012). Introduction: Governance by indicators. In K. E. Davis, A. Fisher, B. Kingsbury, & S. E. Merry (Eds.), Governance by indicators: Global power through quantification and rankings (pp. 3–28). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- De Coning, C., & Brusset, E. (2018). Towards a comprehensive results-based reporting and performance assessment framework for UN peacekeeping operations. NUPI Report 4/2018. Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs.
- Dittrich Hallberg, J. (2012). PRIO conflict site 1989–2008: A geo-referenced dataset on armed conflict. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 29(2), 219–232.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Firchow, P., & Mac Ginty, R. (2017). Measuring peace: Comparability, commensurability, and complementarity using bottom-up indicators. International Studies Review, 19, 6–27.
- Fund for Peace. (2019). Fragile states index 2019. Washington, DC: The Fund for Peace.
- Galtung, J. (1974). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Galtung, J. (1985). Twenty-five years of peace research: Ten challenges and some responses. Journal of Peace Research, 22(2), 141–158.
- Galtung, J. (1990). Cultural violence. Journal of Peace Research, 27(3), 291–305.
- Klein, J. P., Goertz, G., & Diehl, P. F. (2008). The peace scale: Conceptualizing and operationalizing non-rivalry and peace. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 25, 67–80.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The 'local turn' in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 825–839. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029905>.
- Makoond, A. (2019). How is peace measured? A qualitative systematic review of instruments used to assess the peacefulness of societies. MSc thesis, Department of Social Policy, University of Oxford.
- Neukirch, C. (2014). Early warning and early action: Current developments in OSCE conflict prevention activities. OSCE Yearbook 2013. Baden-Baden: Nomos, 2014, pp. 123–133.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sarkees, M. R. (2010). Codebook for the intra-state wars v.4.0: definitions and variables, 1–2. <http://www.correlatesofwar.org/data-sets/COW-war>.
- Schroden, J. (2014). Operations assessment at ISAF: Changing paradigms. In A. Williams et al. (Eds.), Innovations in operations assessment: Recent developments in measuring results in conflict environments (pp. 39–67). The Hague: NATO Communications and Information Agency.
- Stave, S. E. (2011). Measuring peacebuilding: Challenges, tools, actions. NOREF Policy Brief No. 2. Oslo: Norwegian Peacebuilding Resource Centre.
- United Nations. (2010). Monitoring peace consolidation: United Nations practitioners' guide to benchmarking. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2019). Peacekeeping operations factsheet. September 2019, https://peacekeeping.un.org/sites/default/files/pk_factsheet_09_2019_english_1.pdf.
- Uppsala Conflict Data Program/Peace Research Institute Oslo. (2014). UCDP/PRIO armed conflict dataset v.4-2014a, 1946–2013. <https://www.prio.org/Data/Armed-Conflict/UCDP-PRIO>.

- Wallensteen, P. (2015). Quality peace: Peacebuilding, victory and world order. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Williams, P. D. (2016). Global and regional peacekeepers. New York: Council on Foreign Relations.

Measuring the Implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda

Laura McLeod
University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Evaluation; Guidelines; Judgement; Quantification

Definition/Description

The women, peace, and security (WPS) agenda is a broad-ranging set of ambitions pushing for the inclusion of women and a gender perspective in global peace and security processes. How can we, and should we, measure the implementation of the agenda? To consider this question, this chapter focusses on the WPS indicators devised by the United Nations (UN) system during 2009–2010 to explore the changes that these indicators have prompted within international peacebuilding and peacekeeping processes. A perspective informed by feminist technoscience highlights how indicators are powerful ordering activities that produces gendered knowledge about peacebuilding, peacekeeping, and security practices. Through exploring this, the chapter unpacks feminist concerns alongside the positive feminist and gendered transformations bought about partially because

The research in this chapter was made possible by a British Academy Small Research Grant for the project “Do we know gender in peacebuilding?” All interviews were held during 2016 and 2017 with current or former UN staff, or with civil society organizations closely working with the UN agenda, in New York City, USA. Research participants have been granted anonymity of the institutional advocacy prompted and supported by the UN’s WPS indicators.

Introduction

Multiple attempts have been made to capture the effectiveness of peace interventions (see ► “Measuring Peace” and ► “Assessment of Peace Operations”). It is no surprise then, that the United Nations’ Women, Peace, and Security (WPS) agenda has also been subject to measurement both within the United Nations (UN) system and beyond. The WPS agenda encompasses ten resolutions initiated by UN Security Council Resolution 1325 (October 2000). Taken together, the resolutions recognize that women and a gender perspective matter in global peace and security processes, including, among other things, negotiating a peace agreement, to peacekeeping missions, to thinking about participation and protection of women in rebuilding post-conflict societies. The agenda is broad-sweeping, and so capturing, measuring, and tracking the implementation of its various goals is challenging.

The chapter discusses the UN’s own 26 WPS indicators, designed primarily to assess the performance of the UN System in achieving WPS goals. The meaning of “indicator” has a “certain vagueness” and there is no agreed definition (Green 2001, p. 1076; Davis et al. 2012, p. 73). However, it is useful to understand indicators in the following way: a means of allowing us to capture information about something in a simplified and processed format that allows us compare, contrast, and evaluate standards or performances. There are three core components to this definition: (1) the capture of information; (2) the simplification and processed format; and (3) the judgement of standards or performance. Thinking about indicators in this way draws attention to how indicators are part of the “technocratic turn” in international peacebuilding, where interveners seek out bureaucratic, standardized, apparently rational and efficient ways of explaining and organizing their activities (Mac Ginty 2013, p. 57). Put together, this helps us understand how indicators are a technology of knowledge creation that has gendered outcomes.

Measuring Women, Peace, and Security

Measuring the WPS agenda is not straightforward. The agenda is wide-ranging; developing a set of indicators is always a politically subjective process, and gender goals are particularly difficult to capture. There was a very real concern that with an agenda as broad as the WPS agenda, that measurements and reporting could turn “WPS into a depoliticized, technocratic process” (Olsson and Gizelis 2019, p. 129). That said, there was a strategic push by gender advocates within the UN System to develop indicators for the WPS agenda. Advocates felt that progress on achieving the ambitions of UNSCR 1325 had been limited even at the end of its first decade. Concerns were raised within the UN System that implementation had been constrained by “the absence of a single coherent and coordinated approach, guided by a clear framework with concrete and specific goals and targets” (Security Council 2010, p. 30).

In response to these concerns, in October 2009, the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) passed its fourth “Women, Peace and Security” resolution: UNSCR 1889. Within the resolution, there was a request for “a set of indicators for use at the global level to track implementation of its resolution 1325 (2000).” Gender advocates within the then United Nations Development Fund for Women (UNIFEM, now merged into UN Women) steered the development of these indicators under the slogan “Women Count for Peace” (Castillo-Diaz and Cueva-Beteta 2018, p. 1). The slogan was a “wordplay on women being perennially pushed aside and counted out during and after armed conflict, on the one hand, and the belief that stronger data on women, peace, and security issues would help change this reality, on the other” (Castillo-Diaz and Cueva-Beteta 2018, p. 2). The “1325 indicators,” alongside the Report of the Secretary-General on Women’s participation in peacebuilding (better known as the Seven-Point Action Plan), and the Strategic Results Framework on WPS formed a tripartite attempt made during 2010 to develop a more comprehensive and measurable approach to implementing UNSCR 1325.

To develop the indicators, stakeholders across a number of UN entities and civil society actors formed a working group. They discussed a longlist of 2500 indicators already within the UN System on gender and peacebuilding, selecting 26 indicators by April 2010 (Castillo-Diaz and Cueva-Beteta 2018). In September 2010, these indicators were approved and published within the Secretary-General report on women and peace and security (Security Council 2010, pp. 27–48). The hope was that the framework would consist of “an agreed set of goals, targets and indicators to guide the implementation of the resolution in the next decade” (Security Council 2010, p. 31).

The indicators established a wide-ranging set of ambitions linked to UNSCR 1325, including:

- Reporting on the prevalence and pattern of sexual violence in conflict and post-conflict situations
- The operational gender-responsive systems in place to monitor, report, and respond to violations of women and girls’ rights during ceasefires, peace negotiations, and after conflict
- Tracking of the number and type of actions taken by the Security Council in relation to UNSCR 1325 and how far Security Council missions address specific issues relating to women and girls
- The percentage of peace agreements with specific provisions for women and girls
- Women’s share of senior positions in UN field missions
- Percentage of senior gender experts in field missions
- Representation and participation of women in peace processes and national and local governance; the proportion of UN budgets related to indicators and targets to address strategic gender issues, or funding disbursed to relevant civil society organizations
- The extent to which Truth and Reconciliation Commissions include provisions to address the rights and participation of women and girls (Security Council 2010, pp. 33–48)

In the first decade of these indicators, reporting on all 26 indicators has become increasingly rigorous, with each being discussed in the Secretary-General reports on women, peace, and security published every autumn. An annual report may not sound like a transformative measure, but it is a significant shift in global governance with resourcing and staffing implications. While there has been an annual report every year since 2004 (Coomararaswamy 2015, p. 33), earlier reports did not have the same kind of structure and effect through the UN System that they did after 2010. (Interview 2016_21). The indicators served to ensure “a lot more progress both policy-wise and programmatically” as a result of the reporting requirements around them (Interview 2016_11). The remainder of this chapter identifies a number of institutional shifts as a result of these indicators.

Feminist Transformations

Understanding how indicators have potentially transformative effects draws on the idea that they are a “technology of knowledge creation” (Engle Merry 2016, p. 27). Critical and feminist technoscience perspectives allow us to recognize that indicators are an ordering activity which packages and presents knowledge in a way that can be easily consumed (Engle Merry 2016, pp. 29–31), and, crucially for our purposes, draws attention to the power of indicators in producing gendered knowledge that shapes the world we live in. Applying John Law and Vicky Singleton’s characterization of feminist technoscience (Law and Singleton 2000, pp. 766–767) to our thinking about the work of indicators allows us to conceptualize indicators as social and material practices recursively generating new social and material practices, knowledges, and versions of the world, with gendered ramifications. Indicators are a technological practice that can sustain – and yet hold the possibility of transforming – gendered agendas and practices in peace and security processes. The question is, how can we “transcend” from technocratic processes to meaningfully transformative peacebuilding processes (Podder 2021, p. 4) that have positive gendered outcomes?

Among feminist scholars, there is an apprehension that the use of indicators to measure progress towards the achievement of gender equality turns gender equality into a set of tick-box goals focused around a measurable activity rather than the actual achievement of gender equality. That is, the claim presented is that gender equality (the goal) can be achieved “once the activities (capacity-building, networking, advocacy, lobbying and research) are completed. The completed activities would further result in commitment and capacity” (the outcome), which would be monitored as a change in “attitudes, perceptions and beliefs (indicators of change)” (Jauhola 2013, p. 151). The focus on monitored outcomes places the emphasis on progress conceptualized within specific parameters. “Progress” is never easy: is it the imposition of white, Western feminist goals? Is it the emphasis placed on a particular vision of modernity? Is the proposed progress transformative enough? Here, we can see that there are political consequences to what is quantified and transformed into knowledge.

A related feminist concern about the use of indicators relates to the substance of what is being achieved. Madeline Rees, the Secretary-General of the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom, worried about ... the emphasis on counting the number of women in different fora, whether it be in parliament, whether it be in governance structures. We’re going to count them as warm bodies and not ask about substance. (Cited in Onyesoh et al. 2020, p. 23)

For Rees, the disquiet is that numerical representation produces knowledge that misses crucial things about what women do, alluding to a concern that women do not always act for women.

Similar concerns are also voiced with the WPS indicators, in particular if we hone in on the indicators aiming to capture women’s representation and participation in peace processes. One indicator seeks to assess the participation of women’s civil society representatives formally included in the peace process. As one research participant pointed out, these indicators say nothing about the quality of the consultation: we do not know if “the mediator drove by a group of women’s organisations, slowed his car down and shook a hand, or whether it was ongoing, systematic, systemised consultations on content-specific and strategic issues of the peace talks” (Interview 2016_24). An indicator seeking to quantify the representation of women among mediators, negotiators, and technical experts in formal peace negotiations also prompts feminist unease about focusing on descriptive over substantive representation.

However, those designing the initial indicators felt that they had to balance – and trade-off – a number of considerations around developing measurable and meaningful indicators that would achieve the political goals gender advocates wanted. One commentator noted that capturing the quality or value of engagement is challenging: for instance, in assessing the contribution of a female mediator during a peace negotiation. On the one hand, you could say that a female mediator is “very good, she’s very effective, she has an impact, [while on the other hand] civil society might totally disagree and feel that she doesn’t represent their views. . . so we would get into this whole tit-for-tat if we had qualitative indicators,” making it difficult to assess progress (Interview 2016_16). So, from this perspective, tracking the numbers of female mediators over time helps reveal trends and prompts the UN System to assess the gains made in this area (Interview 2016_16). Furthermore, if female mediators are not appointed, then it “allows us [within the UN System] to increase advocacy” in these particular contexts where peace negotiations are happening (Interview 2016_18). For feminists and gender-change advocates working within the UN System, some indicators serve as a means to achieving positive gender outcomes, even where they are fully aware of the limitations of these indicators.

The value of the indicators in supporting feminist and gendered advocacy within the UN System is evident upon investigation of the tenth indicator. This indicator measures the percentage of UN field missions with senior-level gender experts, appointed at P5 level or above. P5 is top of the professional scale, and is considered by the UN System as a mid-career professional, requiring at least 10 years of progressively responsible work experience (UN Careers 2021). The initial impetus behind the selection of this indicator came from a concern that “posts that are committed to gender equality work are at lower levels than comparable posts on other issues” (Yasmeen Hassan, Dir. of Programs at Equality Now, cited in Deen 2009). The context for developing a specific measurement of specifically senior gender advisors related to a concern with raising the overall profile of gender equality work within the UN System. Reading the Secretary-General reports between 2011 and 2020 reveals that there was a lot of work to promote, reinforce, and refine action to ensure that senior gender advisors were embedded within UN peacekeeping and special political missions.

Initial reporting on this indicator in 2011 was vague, noting that 100% of field missions managed by the (then) Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) had a gender component, and 60% are headed by a senior gender expert. It was also noted that 46% of field missions managed by the (then) Department of Political Affairs (DPA) have gender advisors, while the rest have designated gender focal points (Security Council 2011, p. 12). This reporting lacks detail on the number of senior gender experts at P5 level or above: instead, we are told about gender components, advisors, or focal points. We are given no indication of how many are holding a position that is graded P5 or above. Interviewees suggested that there was a tendency for DPKO to fill the P5 post intended for a senior gender expert with someone not doing gender work (Interview 2017_02). In short, there was limited reporting on the designated indicator, and reporting in this vein continued for a few years.

However, tracking the reporting on this indicator throughout the decade reveals that there are attempts to further institutionalize and entrench senior gender expertise within field missions. Alongside the indicator already described, it was also recommended in 2015 that a senior gender advisor should be embedded within the office of the Special Representative of the Secretary-

General – that is, the office of the field mission head (Coomararaswamy 2015, p. 284). Both actions served to reinforce more rigorous reporting: the 2017 Secretary-General report on the 1325 indicators includes a footnote elaborating that “of the 25 gender advisers across field-based missions led by the Department of Political Affairs (23) and offices of special envoys (2), three are at the D-1 or P-5 level and six are at the P-4 level” (Security Council 2017, p. 22). Interviewees noted that the indicator was useful in pushing some entities within the UN System to make their gender advisors more senior (Interview 2017_02).

While issues remain around the deployment of gender advisors within UN peace processes, the indicators have proved useful for feminist and gender advocacy within the UN System. An independent assessment noted that “between 2016 and 2018 there was a defunding and downgrading of gender advisor posts within peacekeeping missions, one of which was restored to its previous P5 grade as a result of advocacy” (Allen 2019, p. 8). The requirement for annual reporting and accountability has ensured that attention has been focused on this issue, and enabled a systematic (technocratic and bureaucratic?) way of generating gender-positive change, and more effective implementation of UNSCR 1325.

Summary

Scholarly analysis about the use of data in peacebuilding note that “technocracy can be seen as a political intervention and mechanism” (Mac Ginty 2017, p. 697). Indeed, we should pay attention to which indicators are being used to measure implementation of the WPS agenda because “the choice of indicators by policymakers explicitly defines – and potentially delimits – the WPS agenda” (Castillo-Diaz and Cueva-Beteta 2018, p. 191). There are a number of feminist concerns about the use of indicators, namely in that they limit the possibilities of transformation. However, as this chapter has suggested, there may be opportunities to utilize the enthusiasm for global measurement to achieve certain feminist goals that can be more effectively captured within the constraints of technocratic processes.

Beyond the UN’s own 26 WPS indicators, there are a number of other ways of measuring the implementation of UNSCR 1325. These include the WPS Index produced by Georgetown and Peace Research Institute of Oslo, intended to draw together international data sources to provide a measure of women’s well-being and empowerment, and the WPS National Action Plan database produced by the University of Sydney and LSE to present data about current and previous national action plans, among others. These both capture knowledge about WPS in different locations, namely member state/national-level implementation, and so have very different effects and may provoke different concerns or questions. How we measure the implementation of UNSCR 1325 is a point of contestation, and it remains important that the knowledge produced is used to achieve meaningful, gender-positive outcomes, ensuring the focus remains on implementation of the WPS agenda, as opposed to merely gathering information for the sake of having information.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

References

- Allen, L. (2019). Mapping of the gender recommendations in the three 2015 peace and security reviews. UN Women Policy Brief. <https://www.unwomen.org/-/media/headquarters/attachments/sections/what%20we%20do/peace-security/policy-brief-mapping-gender-recommendations-in-the-three-2015-peace-and-security-reviews-en.pdf?la=en&vs=1540>. Accessed 15 Feb 2021.
- Castillo-Diaz, P., & Cueva-Beteta, H. (2018). The promise and limits of indicators on women, peace and security. In F. Ní Aoláin, N. Cahn, D. F. Haynes, & N. Valji (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of gender and conflict (Oxford handbooks online). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199300983.013.15>.
- Coomararaswamy, R. (Ed.). (2015). Preventing conflict, transforming justice, securing the peace: A global

- study on the implementation of United Nations Security Council resolution 1325. New York: UN Women.
- Davis, K., Kingsbury, B., & Engle Merry, S. (2012). Indicators as a technology of global governance. Law and Society Review, 46(1), 71–104.
- Deen, T. 2009. Gender empowerment at UN still cloudy. Terraviva Europe via Global Policy Forum. <http://www.globalpolicy.org/home/218-injustice-andinequality/48570-gender-empowerment-at-un-still-cloudy.html>. Accessed 2 Apr 2020.
- Engle Merry, S. (2016). The seductions of quantification: Measuring human rights, gender violence, and sex trafficking. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Green, M. (2001). What we talk about when we talk about indicators: Current approaches to human rights measurement. Human Rights Quarterly, 23(4), 1062–1097.
- Jauhola, M. (2013). Post-tsunami reconstruction in Indonesia: Negotiating normativity through gender mainstreaming initiatives in Aceh. London: Routledge.
- Law, J., & Singleton, V. (2000). Performing technology's stories: On social constructivism, performance, and performativity. Technology and Culture, 41(4), 765–775.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2013). Indicators+: A proposal for everyday peace indicators. Evaluation and Program Planning, 36(1), 56–63.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2017). Peacekeeping and data. International Peacekeeping, 24(5), 695–705.
- Olsson, L., & Gizelis, T. I. (2019). The production of the 2015 global study. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security (Oxford handbooks online). Oxford, UK: Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordhb/9780190638276.013.8>.
- Onyesoh, J., Rees, M., & Confortini, C. C. (2020). Feminist challenges to the co-option of WPS: A conversation with Joy Onyesoh and Madeleine Rees. In S. Basu, P. Kirby, & L. J. Shepherd (Eds.), New directions in women, peace and security (pp. 223–246). Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Podder, S. (2021). The cat in the hat: Can technocratic peacebuilding lead to transformative peace? International Peacekeeping. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2020.1861942>.
- Security Council. (2010). s/2010/498 Women and Peace and Security: Report of the Secretary-General.
- Security Council. (2011). s/2011/598 Women and Peace and Security: Report of the Secretary-General.
- Security Council. (2017). s/2017/861 Women and Peace and Security: Report of the Secretary-General.
- UN Careers. (2021). Pay and benefits. <https://careers.un.org/lbw/home.aspx?viewtype=SAL&lang=en-US>. Accessed 15 Feb 2021.

Med-arb

- Alternative Dispute Resolution

Mediation

Sara Hellmüller

Centre on Conflict, Development and Peacebuilding, Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, Geneva, Switzerland

Keywords

Mediation · Peacemaking · Conflict resolution

Introduction

In 2017, United Nations (UN) Secretary-General António Guterres recognized mediation as “essential, flexible and effective tool which is utilized for conflict prevention, management and resolution by the United Nations and a wide range of other organizations and actors” (UN Secretary-General 2017, p. 6). Mediation is defined as “a process of conflict management, related to but distinct from the parties’ own negotiations, where those in conflict seek the assistance of, or accept an offer of help from, an outsider [...] without resorting to physical force or invoking the authority of law” (Bercovitch 2009, p. 343). Thus, mediation, at a minimum, denotes the assistance by a third party to a negotiation between two or more conflict parties to find a peaceful agreement (see also “Negotiation,” “Peace Agreements”). It has become a standard international response to armed conflicts since the end of the Cold War (Gowan and Stedman 2018; Greig and Diehl 2012). This is reflected in research, which has produced relevant knowledge on how to render mediation more effective. It has thereby strongly relied on positivist approaches with rationalist conceptual frameworks and quantitative methodologies. While producing important findings, it has left three main gaps, calling for more disaggregated findings, a stronger focus on ideational aspects, and awareness of changing macro-level factors in the broader world political context of mediation.

Development

While some mediation endeavors were conducted during the Cold War,¹ its use substantively increased in its aftermath. Indeed, more mediation attempts took place during the 1990s than in the 44 years from 1945 to 1989 (Greig and Diehl 2012)². This increase has been accompanied by three trends. First, a multiplication of actors involved in mediation (Iji 2005; Lanz and Gasser 2013). While most mediation endeavors were undertaken by powerful states or the UN during the Cold War (Crocker et al. 1999), they were joined by other actors in its aftermath, such as regional organizations (Gartner 2011; Mediation Support Network 2012) and non-governmental actors (NGOs) (Convergne 2016b). Second, the proliferation of mediation actors has led to an increased institutionalization and professionalization of mediation (Convergne 2016a) with different states, regional organizations, and the UN establishing specialized mediation support structures and publishing policy documents providing concrete guidelines for mediators on how to make their interventions more effective (African Union 2014; Council of the European Union 2009; OSCE 2014; United Nations 2012)³. Third, the objective of mediation has seen an important expansion. While during the Cold War, the main goal was to contain conflicts, the post-Cold War years saw a broadening of the mediators' mandates toward addressing the root causes of conflicts. This was in line with the broader liberal international environment dominant at the end of the Cold War. Thus, mediators were confronted with increasing demands to promote liberal norms, such as human rights, gender equality, and transitional justice. One norm that has become particularly prominent is inclusivity. Acknowledging the insufficiency of elite deals in achieving a liberal transformation of conflict contexts, the participation of women and civil society actors in peace negotiations has come to be considered an important element to increase the legitimacy of a mediation process and the probability of lasting peace (Hellmüller 2019; Hirblinger and Landau 2020; Paffenholz 2014) (see also ► “Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation”, ► “Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus”).

Existing Research on Mediation

Along with these developments, the research agenda on mediation has expanded. Thereby, the focus has mostly been on the conditions for effective mediation. As Wallensteen and Svensson (2014, p. 315) put it, mediation scholars ask “under what conditions international mediation may bring about peaceful change; in other words, when is mediation effective in transforming destructive conflicts into constructive pursuits.” Indeed, the majority of studies explores the relationship between mediation effectiveness as dependent variable and factors influencing the onset or process of mediation as independent variables (Beardsley and Danneman 2015, p. 2; see also Duursma 2014, p. 81; Kleiboer 1996, p. 361).

Dependent Variable: Effectiveness

The mediation literature does not provide an unanimous definition of success (Kleiboer 1996, p. 361; Vuković 2014)⁴. Some scholars consider the occurrence of mediation already as a success (Frei 1976, p. 69), while others define success as ending violent behavior (Regan 1996; Regan and Stam 2000) or as ¹ Examples include the United States, in the Middle East and Southern Africa, the Soviet Union in Tashkent and between India and Pakistan over Kashmir, and the UN between Iran and Iraq and in Cyprus (Crocker et al. 1999, p. 6).

² Lundgren and Svensson (2020) note a reverse trend with a declining number of armed conflicts receiving mediation in the last 15 years.

³ For instance, the UN Mediation Support Unit, the European Union (EU) Mediation Support Team, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Mediation Support Team, the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development (IGAD) Mediation Support Team, and specialized mediation teams in Switzerland, Germany, Sweden, and other countries.

⁴ I use the terms effectiveness and success of mediation interchangeably. Some authors distinguish success and effectiveness and take the latter to refer to instances in which the outcomes of a mediation process correspond to the objectives set by the mediator (Kleiboer 1996).

the signing of a peace agreement (Beardsley et al. 2006; Bercovitch et al. 1991; Rauchhaus 2006; Savun 2008, 2009). Some also define effectiveness as the fulfilment of the mediator's objectives (Smith 1985; Touval and Zartman 1985, p. 14).

Recent analyses of mediation effectiveness have tried to go beyond the abovementioned indicators to provide more nuanced assessments of success. They can be distinguished according to whether they focus on the durability or the quality of peace (Duursma 2014). One way of analyzing the effectiveness of mediation is by looking at the durability of peace after the signing of a peace agreement (Beardsley 2008, 2011; Werner and Yuen 2005). Beardsley et al. (2006) distinguish between short-term and long-term effects of mediation (see also Beardsley 2008, 2011). They argue that mediation creates incentives that favor short-term achievements, such as providing information, leveraging costs or increasing benefits, and monitoring and enforcing peace agreements. Yet, while conflict parties may agree to concessions in the short term, they may find them insupportable in the long term. This is because mediators cannot provide information regarding the future and will lose interest over time, and monitoring and enforcement missions are unable to endlessly maintain their security guarantees (see Duursma 2014). Another way of analyzing effectiveness is by looking at the quality of peace in terms of the provisions in the peace agreement or the post-agreement disposition, for instance, whether a country is democratically governed after the signing of a peace agreement (Nathan 1999; see Wallensteen and Svensson 2014). A study by Svensson (2009) provides an example of a success measurement based on the quality of peace. He argues that biased mediators are more likely to help parties find agreements with provisions assumed to lead to lasting peace, such as "political or territorial power sharing, international guarantees, repatriation, and provisions for amnesty" (Svensson 2009, p. 464). Thereby, he provides a differentiated way of measuring success in terms of the quality of the peace agreement.

Independent Variables: Onset and Process

Concerning the independent variables, they can be grouped in two parts. First, factors that influence the onset of mediation related to the timing of a mediation process and reasons for it. Second, factors that influence the process of mediation in terms of the styles and characteristics of mediators.

Mediation Onset

Studies on the onset of mediation are concerned with the question about when and how a mediation process starts. They assess three main aspects: the conflict context, the conflict parties' motives to engage in mediation, and the mediators' motives to accept to act as a third party. With regard to the context, Zartman's ripeness theory is relevant (Zartman 1985). He states that two main conditions determine whether a conflict is ripe for resolution or not. First, a mutually hurting stalemate defined as a situation in which the parties incur high costs (hurting) and from which they cannot unilaterally escalate the conflict to win it militarily (stalemate). Second, the conflict parties must consider mediation as a way out of the conflict, which means that it must provide them with a valuable alternative to fighting⁵. Zartman (2001, p. 9) specifies that these two subjective conditions are necessary but insufficient for the initiation of negotiations as ripe moments also need to be seized. This means that a ripe moment increases the chances of a negotiated settlement but does not predict it. In that sense, ripeness is not an either-or situation, but best thought of as "concatenation of conditions under which the prospects for successful negotiation grow more favourable" (Greig and Diehl 2012, p. 125)⁶. The ripeness theory has given rise to an important debate in the study of mediation with different scholars building on it ⁵He later added a third condition, which is that the conflict parties must have legitimate spokespersons to represent them in the mediation process, but he classifies it as being of secondary importance (Zartman 2001, pp. 10–11).

⁶The absence of a ripe moment for mediation does not mean that mediators cannot do anything. As Crocker (1992, p. 471) states, "the absence of 'ripeness' does not tell us to walk away and do nothing. Rather, it helps us to identify obstacles and suggests ways of handling them and managing the problem until resolution becomes possible." Mediators can use different strategies to "ripen" a conflict by helping conflict parties realize that a ripe moment is at hand or contribute to ripening it (Pruitt 2005, p. 7).

(Goodby 1996; Haass 1990; Kriesberg and Thorson 1991; Maundi et al. 2000; Stedman 1991). Greig (2001), for instance, has supported the theory of the mutually hurting stalemate with quantitative data, while Pruitt (2005) has developed the theory of “readiness” rather than “ripeness,” focusing on the parties’ individual perceptions, rather than on their joint assessment of a given context. He argues that mediation is more likely when the conflict parties realize that they cannot win a conflict and when they become aware of the high costs of the conflict and the perceived risks of continuing it.

This relates to the conflict parties’ motives, which is the second aspect. The parties decide whether to accept mediation and whose mediation to accept (Maundi et al. 2006; Zartman 2008). In general, parties will engage in mediation if they expect it to help them fulfill their preferred outcomes and will select the mediator with whom they are most confident to achieve their interests (Maundi et al. 2006). In other words, they need to expect the benefits from engaging in mediation to be higher than the ones from pursuing the conflict. Different considerations are at play. Working with a mediator, rather than engaging in direct negotiations with the adversary, may reduce reputational costs at home and the negative effects of making concessions (Zartman 2008). Moreover, rejecting an offer of mediation may incur harm, in terms of reputational costs or relational consequences with the mediator. At the same time, parties may not only engage in mediation for so-called genuine motives. Indeed, scholars have distinguished genuine from devious motives (Richmond 1998). Genuine motives mean that parties come to a mediation process with a real interest in finding a peaceful solution to the conflict. On the contrary, “devious disputants” are those actors “that undertake bargaining with their adversaries with no intention of striking a bargain” (Beardsley and Danneman 2015, p. 8; see also Richmond 1998). Motives of such devious disputants to engage in a mediation process can include to gain political support and recognition, or they can use it as a stalling tactic to get a breather from the war in order to regroup and rearm (Beardsley 2011).

Concerning mediators’ motives, mediation comes at a price for mediators as well, such as reputational or political costs that can come from unaccepted offers for mediation or failed mediation attempts (Greig and Regan 2008, p. 762). Therefore, actors must have sufficient interest in a given conflict in order to offer their mediation in the first place. Greig and Diehl (2013, pp. 78–93) distinguish between three factors. First, actors may offer their mediation for humanitarian motives in terms of their desire to prevent a conflict from escalating or to halt the violence (Crocker et al. 2004). Beardsley (2011) argues that intergovernmental organizations and NGOs are particularly likely to engage based on humanitarian motives. Second, mediation may be offered based on national interests as it constitutes a foreign policy tool to deal with challenges, such as conflict spillover or refugee flows, or advance national interests, such as expanding political influence or defending a given status quo (Beardsley 2011; Bercovitch 2002; Greig and Regan 2008; Zartman 2008). It can also be used to preserve existing trade relationships, alliance ties, or historical relationships with the conflict country in question (Greig and Regan 2008; Regan and Aydin 2006). Third, a mediator may get active due to organizational interests. Many international and regional organizations have the maintenance of international or regional peace and security as their main raison d’être, and they may get involved in mediation to uphold this mandate and confirm their role in international affairs (Bercovitch 2002).

Mediation Process

Scholars analyzing how aspects pertaining to the mediation process influence success mostly focus on two factors related to the mediators: their styles and their characteristics. Regarding mediation styles, the literature proposes different taxonomies to classify them (Silbey and Merry 1986; Touval and Zartman 1985; Wall and Rude 1985)⁷. Despite various terms used, all authors differentiate the styles based on the mediator's influence in the process. Thereby, they usually distinguish three broad styles ordered according to an increasing level of intrusion by the mediator. The first style is a communicative style where the role of the mediator is limited to channeling information or facilitating contact between the conflict parties. The second style is facilitation or formulation, which foresees a more active role of the mediator in terms of structuring the mediation process and even formulating specific solutions as a proposition to the parties. Finally, the third style is directive or manipulative in that the mediator influences the content of the negotiations by offering incentives to the parties to accept a specific outcome, threatening with disincentives, or setting ultimatums. One of the most prominent studies analyzing the link between mediation style and outcome is by Beardsley et al. (2006). The authors show that a manipulative mediation style is most likely to lead to a formal agreement and contribute to crisis abatement in the short term, while a facilitative style is most likely to increase the prospects for a lasting reduction of tensions in the long term.

⁷Touval and Zartman (1985) distinguish between communication, formulation, and manipulation; (Bercovitch 2009) between communication, procedural, and directive styles; Kressel and Pruitt (1985) between reflexive, substantive, and contextual mediation styles; and Curran et al. (2004) distinguish between forcing and fostering.

Regarding the characteristics of mediators, two aspects have attracted most attention, namely, mediator bias and mediator leverage. Concerning bias, policy-makers and practitioners conventionally portray mediators as impartial third parties (United Nations 2012). In the literature, however, there is an ongoing debate on whether biased or unbiased mediators are more effective. Some scholars argue that unbiased mediators are more successful and even consider impartiality as a key definitional element of mediators (Moore 1986; Rauchhaus 2006; Spencer and Yang 1993; Wehr 1979). They see the absence of bias as central to achieving effective outcomes because it installs trust with the parties in the mediation process. On the other hand, some scholars assert that bias toward one of the conflict parties increases the probability of a mediation process to be successful (Favretto 2009; Kydd 2003, 2006; Smith 1985; Svensson 2007; Touval 1975). They put forward three main reasons: First, because biased mediators have stakes in the conflict and are thus willing to incur sacrifice and are more likely to put substantive resources and efforts into finding and implementing an agreement (Beardsley and Danneman 2015; Favretto 2009). Second, because they can influence the party they are closer to. The party not aligned with the mediator accepts this because it hopes that the mediator will be able to convince the adversary party of a deal it would otherwise not have accepted (Kleiboer 1996, p. 370; Svensson 2009, pp. 448–449; Vuković 2015b, p. 419). Third, because they are more credible in relying information and guaranteeing settlements and can thus help the parties overcome credible commitment problems (Beardsley 2013; Beardsley and Danneman 2015; Svensson 2007).

A similar debate concerns mediators' leverage. Some authors say that leverage increases mediation effectiveness as mediators "with muscles" can use it to cajole conflict parties toward an agreement (Bercovitch and Gartner 2006; Crocker et al. 1999; Kydd 2003; Savun 2008; Sisk 2009; Touval 1992; Touval and Zartman 1985). They argue that mediators with power can increase the costs of war for the disputants, they can raise the benefits for signing an agreement, or they can provide compliance and monitoring mechanisms once an agreement is reached (Greig and Diehl 2012, p. 118). Other authors caution against mediation with power as it can create artificial incentives or deadlines eventually harming the peace process (Nathan 1999).

Gaps and Avenues for Further Research

The above-described inquiries into the link between the onset and process of mediation and its effectiveness have mostly been conducted based on positivist approaches. This has led to a clear theoretical and methodological trend in the mediation literature. Theoretically, it has drawn heavily on rational choice models and particularly bargaining theory (Beardsley et al. 2006). Scholars usually start with the assumption of rational actors pursuing their self-interest and view imperfect information as the reason for the onset of war (Fearon 1995; Wagner 2000; Werner and Yuen 2005). In that view, mediators become manipulators of the bargaining environment (Duursma 2020) as they can create material incentives to entice parties into agreement (Zartman 1985)⁸. Methodologically, quantitative approaches dominate the mediation literature. While some mediation scholars provide comparative case studies (Assefa 1987; Crocker et al. 1999, 2015b; Mandell and Tomlin 1991; Nathan 1999; Zartman 1985), large-N studies are more common. This led to the establishment of important datasets and groundbreaking quantitative insights based on them (DeRouen Jr et al. 2011; Harbom et al. 2006; Melander et al. 2009; Regan et al. 2009). Yet, they have arguably come to miss a qualitative complement to nuance and contextualize some of the findings (Beardsley and Danneman 2015; Wallensteen and Svensson 2014). This theoretical and methodological focus has led to gaps in the recent mediation literature. The following three are particularly noteworthy and constitute at the same time promising avenues for further research.

Disaggregated Analyses

Due to its quantitative focus, mediation research has produced results that often remain at a high level of aggregation. Disaggregation is needed to complement these analyses with regard to the actors, the process, and the conceptualization of success. Regarding actors, current mediation research does not always clearly distinguish between mediation by individuals, states, NGOs, regional organizations, or international organizations. Yet, depending on their mandating institution, mediators may have different resources, constraints, and normative frameworks that influence the way they approach a given peace process. More insights on each actor's specificities, comparative advantages, and challenges would be relevant. Concerning the process, current research often fails to distinguish between different phases and forms of a mediation process (e.g., pre-negotiation or negotiation, proximity or direct talks, inclusive or exclusive mediation, etc.). Scholars do not always specify the phase or form of a process for which their insights are valid.

Relatedly, specific dilemmas and difficult decisions that mediators face in their daily activities also remain underexplored, as the analytical grid of current mediation research is too wide-meshed⁹. Finally, mediation research should also further disaggregate how it analyzes mediation success. While efforts are underway to provide for more nuanced understandings of success, as mentioned above, the majority of authors still conceptualizes success in terms of the outcome of a mediation process. This overlooks incremental progress toward reducing violence or finding an agreement during a mediation process. For instance, examining the impact of an ongoing mediation process on the parties' propensity to use violence, their internal cohesion, or their relations with their constituencies or analyzing the procedural and substantive progress made toward an agreement would provide for more fine-grained success indicators.

Ideational Aspects

A second gap stems from the assumption in bargaining theory that actors are rational and driven by self-interest, which leaves ideational factors in mediation largely unexplored. Although some research has been conducted on the role of culture (Avruch 2004; Black and Avruch 1998; Inman et al. 2013) (see ► “Culture and Conflict Resolution”) and norms in mediation (Hellmüller et al. 2017, 2020; Kastner 2015; Mandell and Tomlin 1991; Vuković 2015a), they remain the exception rather than the rule. Yet, ideational factors affect both conflict parties and mediators. Conflict parties are not only driven by rational cost-benefit analyses, but values, norms, and ideas play important roles, especially when it comes to trust-building and finding mutually acceptable agreements (Burton 1990; Kaufman 2006; Kelman 2005). Moreover, studies on mediation outcomes often ignore the impact of mediation on the parties' long-term relationship (Duursma 2014, p. 94). At the same time, ideational factors influence the way mediators act. The institutional normative framework in which they are embedded, their own core values and ⁸For a critical view on this materialistic focus, see Duursma (2020) and Hellmüller et al. (2020).

⁹Kraus et al. (2019) provide a noteworthy exception.

convictions, and their normative socialization all play an important role in the way they approach a given mediation process (Hellmüller et al. 2017, 2020).

Changing World Political Context

By analyzing factors that contribute to mediation effectiveness, the mediation literature has mostly focused on the inner workings of mediation. While assessing contextual factors of mediation, the impact of the broader world political environment on mediation has rarely been taken into systematic consideration¹⁰. This may partly be because the unipolar liberal international order dominant at the end of the Cold War constituted a favorable environment for the spread, institutionalization, and professionalization of mediation. Yet, with the recent shift toward a more multipolar world order and the concomitant questioning of the liberal international order, reflections about the implications of these changes on the role of mediation as an international peacemaking tool become relevant. Of particular importance for mediation is the trend toward increased internationalization and regionalization of armed conflicts (Allansson et al. 2017; Melander et al. 2016; Petterson and Eck 2018; Petterson et al. 2019). Thereby, the US and Russia have become the main external warring parties since 2001 and 2014, respectively (Petterson and Eck 2018; Petterson et al. 2019; Wallensteen and Petterson 2015). The blockage of the UN Security Council on deciding on the actions to take in conflicts such as Syria, Libya, or Yemen points to the need to reflect on mediation in these changed circumstances. In the end, the relevance of mediation research will also depend on the way it is able to inform practice and policy on navigating an increasingly complex international world order.

Cross-References

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution
- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

References

- African Union. (2014). African Union mediation support handbook. Umhlanga Rocks: African Centre for the Constructive Resolution of Disputes (ACCORD).
- Allansson, M., Melander, E., & Themner, L. (2017). Organized violence, 1989–2016. Journal of Peace Research, 54(4), 574–587.
- Assefa, H. (1987). Mediation of civil wars: Approaches and strategies: The Sudan Conflict. London: Westview.
- Avruch, K. (2004). Culture and conflict resolution. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Beardsley, K. (2008). Agreement without Peace? International mediation and time inconsistency problems. American Journal of Political Science, 52(4), 723–740.
- Beardsley, K. (2011). The mediation dilemma. New York: Cornell University Press.
- Beardsley, K. (2013). Using the right tool for the job: Mediator leverage and conflict resolution. Penn State Journal of Law & International Affairs, 2(1), 57–65.
- Beardsley, K., & Danneman, N. (2015). Mediation in international conflicts. In R. A. S. Scott & M. C. Buchmann (Eds.), Emerging trends in the social and behavioral sciences: An interdisciplinary, searchable, and linkable resource (pp. 1–13). New York: Wiley.
- Beardsley, K., Quinn, D. M., Biswas, B., & Wilkenfeld, J. (2006). Mediation style and crisis outcomes. The Journal of Conflict Resolution, 50(1), 58–86.
- Bercovitch, J. (2002). Introduction: Putting mediation into context. In J. Bercovitch (Ed.), Studies in international mediation (pp. 15–34). New York: Palgrave.
- Bercovitch, J. (2009). Mediation and conflict resolution. In J. Bercovitch, V. Kremenyuk, & I. W. Zartman (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of conflict resolution (pp. 340–354). London: SAGE.
- Bercovitch, J., & Gartner, S. S. (2006). Is there method in the madness of mediation? Some lessons for mediators from quantitative studies of mediation. International Interactions, 32(4), 329–354.
- Bercovitch, J., Anagnoson, J. T., & Wille, D. (1991). Some conceptual issues and empirical trends in the study of successful mediation in international relations. Journal of Peace Research, 28(1), 7–17.
- Black, P. W., & Avruch, K. (1998). Culture, power and international negotiations: Understanding Palau-US status negotiations. In D. Jacquin-Berdal, A. Oros, & M. Verweij (Eds.), Culture in world politics (pp. 34–60). Houndmills: Macmillan.
- Burton, J. W. (1990). Conflict: Resolution and prevention. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Convergne, E. (2016a). Learning to mediate? The mediation support unit and the production of expertise by the ¹⁰Crocker et al. (2015a) and Zartman (2020) are exceptions.

- UN. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(2), 181–199.
- Convergne, E. (2016b). UN mediators' collaboration with scholars and expert NGOs: Explaining the need for knowledge-based communities in today's conflicts. International Negotiation, 21(1), 135–164.
- Council of the European Union. (2009). Concept on strengthening EU mediation and dialogue capacities (Vol. 15779/09). Brussels.
- Crocker, C. A. (1992). High Noon in Southern Africa: making peace in a rough neighbourhood. New York/London: W. W. Norton and Company.
- Crocker, C. A., Hampson, F. O., & Aall, P. (1999). Introduction. In C. A. Crocker, F. O. Hampson, & P. Aal (Eds.), Herding cats: Multiparty mediation in a complex world (pp. 3–18). Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Crocker, C., Osler Hampson, F., & Aall, P. (2004). Taming intractable conflicts: Mediation in the hardest cases. Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace Press.
- Crocker, C. A., Hampson, F. O., & Aall, P. (2015a). The shifting sands of peacemaking: Challenges of multiparty mediation. International Negotiation, 20(3), 363–388.
- Crocker, C. A., Hampson, F. O., Aall, P., & Palamar, S. (2015b). Why is mediation so hard? The case of Syria. In M. Galluccio (Ed.), Handbook of international negotiation: Interpersonal, intercultural, and diplomatic perspectives (pp. 139–156). Cham: Springer.
- Curran, D., Sebenius, J. K., & Watkins, M. (2004). Two paths to peace: Contrasting George Mitchell in Northern Ireland with Richard Holbrooke in Bosnia–Herzegovina. Negotiation Journal, 20(4), 513–537.
- DeRouen, K., Jr., Bercovitch, J., & Pospieszna, P. (2011). Introducing the Civil Wars Mediation (CWM) dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 48(5), 663–672.
- Duursma, A. (2014). A current literature review of international mediation. International Journal of Conflict Management, 25(1), 81–98.
- Duursma, A. (2020). African solutions to African challenges: The role of legitimacy in mediating Civil Wars in Africa. International Organization, 74(2), 295–330.
- Favretto, K. (2009). Should peacemakers take Sides? major power mediation, coercion, and bias. American Political Science Review, 103(2), 248–263.
- Fearon, J. D. (1995). Rationalist explanations for War. International Organization, 49(3), 379–414.
- Frei, D. (1976). Conditions affecting the effectiveness of international mediation. Peace Science Society (International), 26(1), 67–84.
- Gartner, S. S. (2011). Signs of trouble: Regional organization mediation and Civil War agreement durability. The Journal of Politics, 73(2), 380–390.
- Goodby, J. (1996). When war won out: Bosnian peace plans before Dayton. International Negotiation, 1(3), 501–523.
- Greig, M. (2001). Moments of opportunity: Recognizing conditions of ripeness for international mediation between enduring rivals. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 45(6), 691–718.
- Greig, M. J., & Diehl, P. F. (2012). International mediation. Cambridge: Polity.
- Greig, J. M., & Regan, P. M. (2008). When do they say yes? An analysis of the willingness to offer and accept mediation in Civil Wars. International Studies Quarterly, 52(4), 759–781.
- Haass, R. N. (1990). Conflicts unending: The United States and regional disputes. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Harbom, L., Höglbladh, S., & Wallensteen, P. (2006). Armed conflict and peace agreements. Journal of Peace Research, 43(5), 617–631.
- Hellmüller, S. (2019). Beyond buzzwords: Civil Society inclusion in mediation. In H.-W. Jeong (Ed.), Conflict intervention and transformation: Theory and practice (pp. 47–63). Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Hellmüller, S., Palmiano Federer, J., & Pring, J. (2017). Are mediators norm entrepreneurs? Bern: Swisspeace.
- Hellmüller, S., Pring, J., & Richmond, O. (2020). Norms in International Peace Mediation. Swiss Political Science Review, (forthcoming).
- Hirblinger, A. T., & Landau, D. M. (2020). Daring to differ: Strategies of inclusion in peacemaking. Security Dialogue, 51(4), 305–322.
- Iji, T. (2005). Cooperation, coordination and complementarity in international peacemaking: The Tajikistan experience. International Peacekeeping, 12(2), 189–204.
- Inman, M., Kishi, R., Wilkenfeld, J., Gelfand, M., & Salmon, E. (2013). Cultural Influences on Mediation in International Crises. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 58(4), 685–712.
- Kastner, P. (2015). Legal normativity in the resolution of internal armed conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Kaufman, S. J. (2006). Escaping the symbolic politics trap: Reconciliation initiatives and conflict resolution in ethnic wars. Journal of Peace Research, 43(2), 201–218.
- Kelman, H. C. (2005). Building trust among enemies: The central challenge for international conflict resolution. International Journal of Intercultural Relations, 29(6), 639–650.
- Kleiboer, M. (1996). Understanding success and failure of international mediation. The Journal of Conflict Resolution, 40(2), 360–389.
- Kraus, A. I., Frazer, O., Kirchhoff, L., Kyselova, T., Mason, S. J. A., & Palmiano Federer, J. (2019). Dilemmas and trade-offs in peacemaking: A framework for navigating difficult decisions. Politics and Governance, 7(4), 331–342.
- Kressel, K., & Pruitt, D. G. (1985). Themes in the mediation of social conflict. Journal of Social Issues, 41(2), 179–198.
- Kriesberg, L., & Thorson, S. (Eds.). (1991). Timing the de-escalation of international conflicts. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.

- Kydd, A. H. (2003). Which side are you on? Bias, credibility and mediation. American Journal of Political Science, 47(4), 597–611.
- Kydd, A. H. (2006). When can mediators build trust? American Political Science Review, 100(3), 449–462.
- Lanz, D., & Gasser, R. (2013). A crowded field: Competition and coordination in international peace mediation. Pretoria: Centre for Mediation in Africa / University of Pretoria.
- Lundgren, M., & Svensson, I. (2020). The surprising decline of international mediation in armed conflicts. Research and Politics, 7(2), 1–7.
- Mandell, B. S., & Tomlin, B. W. (1991). Mediation in the development of norms to manage conflict: Kissinger in the Middle East. Journal of Peace Research, 28(1), 43–55.
- Maudi, M., Khadiagala, G., Nuamah, K., Touval, S., & Zartman, I. W. (2000). Entry and access in mediation. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Maudi, M. O., Zartman, I. W., Khadiagala, G. M., & Nuamah, K. (2006). Getting in: Mediators' entry into the settlement of African conflicts. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Mediation Support Network. (2012). Regional Intergovernmental Organizations in mediation efforts: Lessons from West Africa. Discussion Points of the MSN, 3.
- Melander, E., Möller, F., & Öberg, M. (2009). Managing intrastate low-intensity armed conflict 1993–2004: A new dataset. International Interactions, 35(1), 58–85.
- Melander, E., Pettersson, T., & Themnér, L. (2016). Organized violence, 1989–2015. Journal of Peace Research, 53(5), 727–742.
- Moore, C. (1986). The mediation process: Practical strategies for resolving conflict. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass Publishers.
- Nathan, L. (1999). When push comes to shove: The failure of international mediation in African civil wars. Track Two, 8(2), 1–23.
- OSCE. (2014). Mediation and dialogue facilitation in the OSCE: Reference guide. Vienna: Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe.
- Paffenholz, T. (2014). Civil society and peace negotiations: Beyond the inclusion–exclusion dichotomy. Negotiation Journal, 30(1), 69–91.
- Pettersson, T., & Eck, K. (2018). Organized violence, 1989–2017. Journal of Peace Research, 55(4), 535–547.
- Pettersson, T., Höglbladh, S., & Öberg, M. (2019). Organized violence, 1989–2018 and peace agreements. Journal of Peace Research, 56(4), 589–603.
- Pruitt, D. G. (2005). Whither ripeness theory? Washington, DC: George Mason University.
- Rauchhaus, R. W. (2006). Asymmetric information, mediation and conflict management. World Politics, 58(2), 207–241.
- Regan, P. M. (1996). Conditions of successful third-party intervention in intrastate conflicts. The Journal of Conflict Resolution, 40(2), 336–359.
- Regan, P., & Aydin, A. (2006). Diplomacy and other forms of intervention in Civil War. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 50(5), 736–756.
- Regan, P. M., & Stam, A. C. (2000). In the nick of time: Conflict management, mediation timing, and the duration of interstate disputes. International Studies Quarterly, 44(2), 239–260.
- Regan, P. M., Frank, R. W., & Aydi, A. (2009). Diplomatic interventions and Civil War: A new dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 46(1), 135–146.
- Richmond, O. (1998). Devious objectives and the disputants' view of international mediation: A theoretical framework. Journal of Peace Research, 35(6), 707–722.
- Savun, B. (2008). Information, bias, and mediation success. International Studies Quarterly, 52(1), 25–47.
- Savun, B. (2009). Mediator types and the effectiveness of information provision strategies in the resolution of international conflict. In J. Bercovitch & S. Gartner (Eds.), New approaches to mediation (pp. 96–114). London: Routledge.
- Silbey, S. S., & Merry, S. E. (1986). Mediator settlement strategies. Law & Policy, 8(1), 7–32.
- Sisk, T. (2009). International mediation in Civil Wars: Bargaining with bullets. New York: Routledge.
- Smith, W. P. (1985). Effectiveness of the biased mediator. Negotiation Journal, 1(4), 363–372.
- Spencer, D. E., & Yang, H. (1993). Lessons from the field of intra-national conflict resolution. Notre Dame Law Review, 67(5), 1495–1512.
- Stedman, S. J. (1991). Peacemaking in Civil War: International Mediation in Zimbabwe, 1974–1980. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Svensson, I. (2007). Bargaining, bias and peace brokers: How rebels commit to peace. Journal of Peace Research, 44(2), 177–194.
- Svensson, I. (2009). Who brings which peace? Biased versus neutral mediation and institutional peace arrangements in civil wars. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 53(3), 446–469.
- Touval, S. (1975). Biased intermediaries: Theoretical and historical considerations. Jerusalem Journal of International Relations, 1, 51–69.
- Touval, S. (1992). The Superpowers as Mediators. In J. Bercovitch & J. Z. Rubin (Eds.), Mediation in international relations (Vol. 41, pp. 232–248). London: Palgrave Macmillan UK.
- Touval, S., & Zartman, I. W. (1985). International mediation in theory and practice. Boulder: Westview Press.
- United Nations. (2012). UN guidance for effective mediation. New York: United Nations.
- Vuković, S. (2014). Three degrees of success in international mediation. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 42(3), 966–976.
- Vuković, S. (2015a). International multiparty mediation and conflict management – Challenges of cooperation and coordination. London: Routledge.
- Vuković, S. (2015b). Soft power, bias and manipulation of international organizations in international mediation. International Negotiation, 20(3), 414–443.
- Wagner, R. H. (2000). Bargaining and war. American Journal of Political Science, 44(3), 469–484.

- Wall, J. A., & Rude, D. E. (1985). Judicial mediation: Techniques, strategies, and situational effects. Journal of Social Issues, 41(4), 47–64.
- Wallensteen, P., & Pettersson, T. (2015). Armed conflicts, 1946-2014. Journal of Peace Research, 52(4), 536–550.
- Wallensteen, P., & Svensson, I. (2014). Talking peace: International mediation in armed conflicts. Journal of Peace Research, 51(2), 315–327.
- Wehr, P. (1979). Conflict regulation. Boulder: Westview.
- Werner, S., & Yuen, A. (2005). Making and keeping peace. International Organization, 59(2), 261–292.
- Zartman, I. W. (1985). Ripe for resolution: Conflict and intervention in Africa. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Zartman, I. W. (2001). The timing of peace initiatives: Hurting stalemates and ripe moments. The Global Review of Ethnopolitics, 1(1), 8–18.
- Zartman, I. W. (2008). Negotiation and conflict management. New York: Routledge.
- Zartman, I. W. (2020). Structuring in a vacuum: Negotiating in the current world disorder. International Negotiation, 25, 1–13.

Definition

Memorials are objects, structures, or (real or virtual) places that serve to focus the memory of conflict related violence. By pinning memory to a location, they fix it in place. Memorials serve as vessels for information in a metaphorical but also in a highly material way, for they are archives of facts and artifacts, storage spaces for documents, images, and sometimes also human remains. Memorials, in addition, are sites to learn about past atrocities, both cognitively and emotionally, and educate visitors through images, metaphors, and symbols as well as, in many cases, texts, videos, and guided tours. In transitional justice processes, memorialization serves as a means of symbolic reparation, thus expanding the scope of dealing with the legacy of violent conflicts and repression from tribunals, truth commissions, and monetary reparations to memorials and commemorations.

Mediation-Arbitration

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Melanesia

- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Memorials and Transitional Justice

Susanne Buckley-Zistel
Center for Conflict Studies, Philipps University
Marburg, Marburg, Germany

Synonyms

Commemoration; Dealing with the past; Memory politics; Symbolic reparations

Introduction

In 2019, Rwanda commemorated the 25th anniversary of the genocide against the Tutsi which left about 800,000 people dead and the society deeply divided. Today, there are about 27 memorials in the country to serve as places of commemoration and remembrance (Genocide Archive Rwanda n.d.). Similarly, other countries that have experienced violent conflict have erected memorials, transformed sites where the violence took place or opened memorial museums to draw attention to the atrocities. This global rush to commemorate atrocities (Williams 2007) is a rather new phenomenon, though, and it is firmly situated in wider practices of peacebuilding. In recent years, this has manifested itself in the field of transitional justice, where memorialization serves as a means of symbolic reparation. The scope of dealing with the legacy of violent conflicts and repression has thus been expanded from tribunals, truth commissions, and monetary reparations to memorials and commemorations (Buckley-Zistel and Björkdahl 2017; Buckley-Zistel and Schäfer 2014). Such efforts are based on the assumption that dealing with the past always requires revisiting the past as well as considering the future in order to prevent new violence.

In contrast to other mechanisms of dealing with the past, such as trials or truth commissions, memorials are seen as less costly and potentially more spontaneous, so that they have turned into attractive forms of engagement in a postviolence society, again contributing to their present popularity. A number of different actors may initiate memorial sites, ranging from civil society groups to national governments or international organizations. Outside actors play an increasingly important role in the memorialization processes of countries that emerge from violence. They do so by offering targeted advice or by setting up working groups on memorialization to engage practitioners in reflecting on the memorialization process in their country (Barsalou 2014; Mannergren Selimovic 2013). This may include study tours to the memorial sites of other countries in order to learn how these deal with their pasts.

Constructing memorials to violence and transitional justice, however, have not always been thought of together but emerged as separate practices. It is only recently that they have been linked due to a range of similar perspectives and objectives as discussed in this chapter. Earlier (war) memorials gave testimony to a nation's invincibility and the heroic acts of fallen soldiers yet have turned more towards commemorating victims and civilian casualties. There is thus a shift in terms of the subject of commemoration. This parallels more recent developments in the field of transitional justice where there is a turn from initially strongly focusing on perpetrators (for instance in trials) to victims and their concerns. Today many transitional justice initiatives see victims as one of the main target groups and have expanded the "tool-kit" from truth commissions, tribunals, lustration processes, and so on to memorials and commemorations, which are usually presented as symbolic reparations to victims of injustices.

Defining Memorials

Memorials are material objects, structures, or (real or virtual) places that serve to center the memory of something, in our case conflict related violence. In the most banal sense, memorials keep a particular memory alive: they are constructed to commemorate an event in the present so that today, yet also in the future, visitors will be reminded of the atrocity. This is based on an understanding of memory as having a preventive function in deterring individuals and groups from repeating an atrocity. "Never again" is thus a frequently used phrase, in particular with reference to the Holocaust, and often displayed at memorial sites. For instance, the Dachau Concentration Camp Memorial Site contains a monument on which these words are written in Yiddish, French, English, German, and Russian.

Memorials also serve to fix information in place. They pin memory to a location, such as illustrated by the often cited ancient Greek anecdote of Simonides of Ceos, the sole survivor of a collapsed house who was able to identify all persons who had been in the house with him despite them being severely disfigured by the accident. Simonides identified the dead by recalling where they had been sitting when the roof fell in. By pinning information to a particular site, he was able to remember. This anecdote suggests that having a physical and material reminder such as a memorial serves to prompt particular memories about a past. For instance, the two square water features at the National September 11 Memorial in New York, where the two towers of the World Trade Center once stood, pin the memory of the terrorist attack to this particular location (Fig. 1).

Memorials, moreover, contain information. They serve as vessels for information in a metaphorical but also in a highly material way. In the latter sense, they are archives of facts and artifacts, storage spaces for documents, images, and sometimes also human remains. By keeping these objects, they prevent them from being forgotten. For instance, memorials from Tuol Sleng in Cambodia and the Kigali Genocide Memorial in Rwanda to Yad Vashem in Israel display images of the dead, while walls of names are central to the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C., and the Srebrenica-Potočari Memorial Center in Bosnia (Fig. 2) Memorial museums such as the German Democratic Republic (GDR) remand prison Berlin-Hohenschönhausen contain (and maintain) furniture, security equipment, and other relics of the past as part of their collection (including smell by using GDR cleaner). In Murambi in Rwanda and the Killing Fields in Cambodia, actual human remains such as skulls, bodies, and hair form part of the memorial aesthetics.

Memorials and Transitional Justice,

Fig. 1 National September 11 Memorial in New York, USA

M

Memorials, in addition, are sites at which to learn about past atrocities. They educate visitors through images, metaphors, and symbols as well as in many cases texts, videos, and guided tours. Yet memorials are also impulses for emotions related to the past atrocity; they employ a specific aesthetic style that does not inform visitors cognitively but affectively so that they learn differently.

Their material, style, and form may provoke sentiments such as sadness, intimidation, despair, or claustrophobia. They are thus places where heritage hurts (Sather-Wagstaff 2016; see also Mannergren Selimovic 2018). For instance, the Srebrenica–Potočari Memorial and Cemetery for the Victims of the 1995 Genocide combines photographs, film, and the exhibition of individual victims' stories as well as pieces of clothing found in mass graves into a powerful emotional experience.

Disaggregating Memorials

Importantly, there is not just one form of memorial but many. To begin with a focus on their location, they may be material objects at the actual places where the atrocities occurred or at any other location that is considered to be appropriate. For instance, as stated by way of introduction, there are many memorials in Rwanda at the sites of the crimes to commemorate the genocide, but there is also a memorial to the Rwandan genocide in Brussels entitled Under the Same Sky. The objects may take different forms such as statues, crosses, abstract figures, walls of names, and the like. Some memorials are more like memorial museums in confined spaces that can be entered and that house objects, texts, videos, and/or other displays to educate visitors on the past. The Robben Island Museum in the former prison in which Nelson Mandela was held during Apartheid in South Africa is one such example. Increasingly, virtual and web-based memorials are gaining traction, since they are easy and inexpensive to set up and reach a wide audience, as exemplified by the countless websites to commemorate the terrorist attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001. Impromptu memorials are makeshift memorials, often at the place of violence, where people spontaneously paint graffiti or leave cards, flowers, or letters to commemorate an event. After the terrorist attacks in Barcelona in 2017, the street La Rambla was plastered with small items; Tahrir Square in Cairo is decorated with many murals to commemorate the victims of the Arab Spring.

Memorials and Transitional Justice,

Fig. 2 Srebrenica-Potočari Memorial Center in Srebrenica, Bosnia

Yet it is not only the location that has an effect on the type of memorial, the scope, and form of violence to be remembered do, too. In cases where violence was mainly top-down, such as during dictatorships, and where a culture of impunity prevails, memorials tend to be strongly advocatory by exposing crimes that often occurred clandestinely and/or remain unacknowledged by society at large. Turning former torture centers into memorials, such as in the memorial Londres 38 in Santiago de Chile, depicting the plight of the disappeared or opening the doors of former prisons are ways of showing (and in a sense proving to) the public what happened. Civil wars during which violence occurred vertically between two or more parties to the conflict tend to either produce memorials with the aim of reconciliation by presenting the views of all parties to the conflict or conversely to reinforce the division between them. In the latter case, the aim is not to make amends but to highlight the victim status of one's own group and to maintain the division of society. This is, for instance, apparent in the Black Friday Memorial in Northern Ireland to commemorate members of the Irish Republican Army (IRA) who died in confrontations with the Royal Ulster Constabulary and British troops. In cases of one-sided mass violence and genocide, many memorials depict shock and horror by displaying human remains, graphic images, or abstract sculptures. The rationale behind this is to point to the enormity of the crime and the innocence of the victims. The Tuol Sleng Genocide Museum in Phnom Penh, for instance, displays picture walls of the persons killed, paintings show torture scenes and blood stains are still visible on the floor of the former detention center (Fig. 3).

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 3 Tuol Sleng Genocide Museum in Phnom Penh, Cambodia

M

Moreover, memorials are deeply embedded in societies and are thus also effected by prevailing social and cultural norms – sometimes with the intention to perpetuate these norms, sometimes with the intention to challenge them. Let's take gender as a social category that informs memorial aesthetics. One often recurring theme in memorials is the pietà (the word for pity in Italian): a depiction of the Virgin Mary holding the dead body of her son Jesus on her lap. For instance, the New Wache in Berlin, which serves as the “Central Memorial of the Federal Republic of Germany for the Victims of War and Dictatorship,” houses a sculpture by Käthe Kollwitz entitled Mother with her Dead Son which follows this form. Similarly, the Vietnam Women Memorial in Washington depicts female nurses, one of which cradles the body of a seriously injured or dead soldier on her lap (Fig. 4).

The examples are based on a very traditional understanding of the roles of men and women during violent conflicts. Men fight and die, women are civilians or supporting staff who care for yet also mourn men, their husbands and sons. In contrast, Kurdish women who survived the Iraqi army's Anfal operations against the Kurdish areas, killing mainly men, refuse to be portrayed as passive victims and opted for a form which depicts them as agents (Mlodoch 2012). A photo exhibition shows them as strong, confident women covered all in black and holding an image of the person they lost in front of their upright chest.

The Changing Scope of Memorials

Even though memorials have been around for much of human history, there has been a more recent trend towards a memory imperative (Levy and Sznajder 2002), i.e., a duty to remember, and an increase in the construction of monuments and museums to commemorate atrocities. In the literature, this is often dated back to the 1970s and 1980s, when – with reference to the Second World War and the Holocaust – commemoration gained

Memorials and Transitional Justice,
Fig. 4 Vietnam Women Memorial in Washington, USA

significance (Winter 2006). This included a change in focus regarding what, and who, should be remembered. At the same time, while until recently memory work and the construction of memorials developed predominantly within the confines of nation-states, global conditions – or conditions of globalization – have had a strong influence on remembrance and the construction of memorials (Assmann and Conrad 2010; Levy and Sznajder 2006). Due to the media, the Internet as well as the activities of norm entrepreneurs, memory, and memorialization are increasingly turning transnational.

Linked to this transnationalization is the fact that memorials are becoming increasingly multidirectional. In the past (and in many cases still in the present) there has frequently been rivalry amongst various victims' communities regarding the enormity and singularity of a particular crime, leading to a form of competition between victims' groups. More recently, though, a number of memorials have explicitly referenced other crimes and situated themselves in a longue durée of mass violence, often with the Holocaust as a central reference point. This multidirectional memory, to use Rothberg's term (Rothberg 2011), indicates that, instead of competing with each other, different memory projects benefit from each other by mutually affirming each other. The emergence of Holocaust memory, he suggests, has contributed to the possibility of other victims of mass violence articulating their demands, even highlighting and enhancing their memory, and memory itself. This has led to a more intensely shared memory – and a sharing of memory – which disentangles memory from collective memory, links victims' groups, and cuts across spatial, temporal, and cultural sites. As illustrated below, the Kigali Memorial Center, where one room is dedicated to other genocides such as Srebrenica, Armenia, and the Holocaust, serves to illustrate this point.

Despite this transnational tendency, however, memory remains profoundly local. For importantly, the atrocities to be remembered took place in a particular locality. They directly affect people who live in physical proximity to the events, who have to deal with the consequences of the rupture and to whom remembrance serves an important political function. Aesthetically, the globalized style of memorials contrasts with the specific location. Sites of atrocities which turn into memorials or memorial museums in particular are composed of local, tangled relics and material cultural heritage (Mannergren Selimovic 2018; Viebach 2014) that deeply root the site in place as exemplified by the Choeung Ek memorial in Cambodia where a Buddhist stupa holds the skulls of people killed in the Cambodian genocide. They give each site an idiosyncrasy that is unique and exceptional. There are thus both local aspects of memory culture and locally vernacularized aspects of a global memory culture (Fig. 5).

The Changing Aesthetics of Memorials

Given that memorials work through their form and shape – i.e., their aesthetics – it is important to consider this aspect in more detail. As stated above, they do not simply communicate information on a cognitive basis, but also work with emotions that are evoked in visitors to the site. In the following, I broadly categorize memorial aesthetics according to the terms imposing, counter- and affirmative memorials. This categorization serves primarily analytical purposes and thus, as it necessarily constitutes a simplified depiction, does not apply to all memorials.

Imposing memorials send a clear message to the visitors and leave no room for interpretation. They often use durable and strong materials such as marble or granite and depict symbols and shapes that are easy to interpret, such as religious insignias, nationalist symbols, or heroic figures. Although they are still around today as illustrated by the Soviet War Memorial in Berlin, they were particularly prominent prior to the First World War, when they often glorified wars, war heroes, and nationalism (Fig. 6). Rather than reflecting on the causes and consequences of violence, they sought to introduce historical closure. After the experience of extreme violence during the First World War, the strength of the nation and the virtue of fighting were increasingly challenged, a development which was also reflected in memorial design, leading to a shift away from monumental memorials to victories towards unambiguous memorials to death (Koselleck 2002: 320). This led, inter alia, to an increase in the establishment of memorials and tombs to the Unknown Soldier and to a stronger focus on ordinary soldiers who lost their lives for their country (Kattago 2015: 185), rather than war heroes. Even though still imposing, they became more humble and displayed the pain of violence through dead bodies, pietas, or lists of names of fallen soldiers.

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 5 Choeung Ek memorial, Cambodia

A further change occurred after the horrors of the Second World War and the Holocaust, leading to the establishment of counter-monuments (a term coined by Young (1992)). Counter-monuments critically engage with the object of remembrance as well as with the practice of remembrance itself. This derives from an understanding that it is impossible to adequately represent atrocities. Some artists turn to abstract art to combine the wish to remember with the impossibility of finding an adequate material representation. Importantly, they portray an unwillingness to introduce closure through a memorial, thus standing in stark contrast to the fixedness and certainties of imposing memorials. An important aspect of counter-monument is hence that instead of introducing a sense of closure, comfort, and certainty, their objective is to keep visitors engaged and thinking (Young 1992: 270).

Affirmative memorials, lastly, assert that it is imperative to remember. They pick up the aesthetics of abstraction of counter-monument, but instead of questioning the possibility of remembrance they contend that commemoration is an obligation. Affirmative memorials hold that there is a duty to remember. Aesthetically, instead of figuratively expressing a particular idea, as imposing memorials do, they often draw on minimalism and conception art, and work with pictures, moving images, sound or objects. Many contemporary memorials, such as the Memorial for the Victims of National Socialist Euthanasia Killings in Berlin, seek to involve visitors by making them walk through and engage with the site, engrossing them in a multilayered, ambivalent sensual experience, rather than imposing meaning on them (Fig. 7). Some memorials look like works in progress or seem unfinished; they do not come equipped with a plaque that explains their form or even the past atrocity.

Memorials and Transitional Justice,
Fig. 6 Soviet War Memorial in Berlin, Germany

Affirmative memorials are highly relevant for transitional justice processes. The wish to commemorate and to provide symbolic reparations to victims of the conflict is central to both, so that they feature strongly in transitional justice processes. But let us look at the link between memorials and transitional justice in more detail.

Memorials as Transitional Justice

In transitional justice processes, memorials serve as symbolic reparations to the victims of violence and as an acknowledgement of past pain. This is based on the assumption that the particular attention victims receive through a memorial gives them back some of the dignity they lost during the violence. The UN Resolution on Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law (2005) stipulates this clearly when referring to commemoration as an important means of symbolic reparation. If violence was perpetrated against a group on the basis of a particular aspect of their collective identity (e.g., faith, origin, sexual orientation, ethnic belonging, or race), public recognition of the injustice bears the potential to strengthen this aspect of their collective identity and turn it into something to be valued and appreciated. More recently, constructing a memorial has even become part of the sentences passed by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights in order to “dignify the memory of the victims” (Inter-American Court of Human Rights 2009: 113).

Memorials and Transitional Justice,
Fig. 7 Memorial for the Victims of National Socialist Euthanasia
Killings in Berlin, Germany

Memorials are frequently established in order to stimulate open debates during and beyond transitional justice processes, so that visitors think critically about the causes and consequences of violence. This may include past violence but also future discrimination, oppression, and hatred in one's own society and beyond (Brett et al. 2007). As sites of conscience, they promote the idea of “never again” and call upon visitors to be active in preventing future violence. This goes hand in hand with a strong educational focus expressed in workshops, lectures, film, interactive displays, and tours. To illustrate, the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D. C., a very well visited site, offers many explanatory features, including clips, information on digital devices, and texts in its main exhibition. In its shop it sells thermos flasks (and in doing so commodifies remembrance) with the words “never again starts with you” and shirts with the print “think about what you saw” and “what you do matters” (Fig. 8). On a global level – and in line with the transnationalization of memory – memorials may serve to create a sentiment of shared global responsibility to prevent future violence (Stone 2009).

Furthermore, it is often hoped that involving various parties to the conflict in the process of conceptualizing and building a memorial encourages an atmosphere of mutual respect as well as an understanding of the suffering of the other parties, and that this contributes to an improvement of relations between them. This requires memorials to be designed in a way that narrates the past so that all parties can identify with it and thus contributes to the transformation of the conflict. This is closely connected to the last aspect: memorials may serve as vehicles to (re-)build a violence-torn society or nation. On the national level, this involves practices that enhance national identification in order to bind citizens into a collective national identity (Ashplant et al. 2000: 7).

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 8 United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, USA

In cases where transitional justice is primarily sought by a group whose suffering has not been widely acknowledged, memorials may be erected in order to obtain some recognition and to draw attention to past atrocities. For victims, they become moments of assertion of their rights – of which they were deprived in the past – giving them back at least some form of agency. For many, having their voices heard may be an important element of justice in the phase of transition.

So far, the positive link between transitional justice and memorials has been stressed. And yet, memorials are a mixed blessing. The past they seek to refer to, the meaning they seek to establish, and the social change they seek to introduce are not beyond contestation and frequently give rise to struggles over the right interpretation of the past. Memorials are therefore often sites of contestation. In particular, memorials that mainly portray the view of one party to the conflict may cause resentment and antagonism and have a negative effect on the transition from violence to peaceful coexistence by producing and re-producing enmity among the parties to the conflict.

These links between memorials and transitional justice illustrate that they may reinforce each other – but also conflict. As with transitional justice mechanisms more generally, if and how they increase antagonisms and to what extent very much depends on the position of the individual onlooker or the party to the conflict. In societies in transition, there are many views and interpretations that change over time. It is thus important not to read too much importance into the contribution of memorials in transitional justice processes, there is little conclusive evidence that all the hope put into memorials to advance the transition of postviolence societies to sustainable peace are indeed borne out (Bickford and Sodaro 2010; Björkdahl et al. 2017).

The Kigali Genocide Memorial

In order to commemorate the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, the Kigali Genocide Memorial was established in 2004. According to its website, it serves as a place of remembrance and learning about the genocide against the Tutsi as well as the final resting place of 250,000 victims (Kigali Genocide Memorial n.d.-a). The memorial is a large complex consisting of a building with three permanent exhibitions, a wall of names (yet to be finished), the Genocide Archive of Rwanda, a library, several Gardens of Reflection, an amphitheater to host commemoration events, and three mass graves. It is placed near Rwanda's capital Kigali (i.e., not in an authentic place where atrocities occurred) and functions as the country's official commemoration site where major events take place, state visitors as well as tourists may pay their respects to the victims, and relatives may mourn the loss of their loved ones.

One central objective of the memorial is to educate visitors on the genocide. This rationale is expressed in the statement that “[i]t is through education that we can prevent mass atrocities from occurring in our communities” (Kigali Genocide Memorial n.d.-b), thus invoking the notion of “never again.” Tours are guided – either by a person or an audio guide – and cover the three permanent exhibitions. The largest exhibition entitled The 1994 Genocide Against the Tutsi is dedicated to explaining the history, development, and scope of the genocide by using show cases, displays, objects, film, pictures, and a catalogue. It also outlines the development of Rwandan society from the time before colonialization to the atrocities of 1994 based on a narrative of unification as generally promoted by the Rwandan government. The second exhibition called Wasted Lives is dedicated to other occurrences of genocide and mass violence, some of which have not been labeled genocide in International Criminal Law. In line with Rothberg's argument about multidirectional memory, as introduced above, the memorial hence situates itself in a longue durée of extreme violence by referring to Armenia, Namibia, the Balkans, Cambodia, and the Holocaust. The Children's Room, lastly, is dedicated to the memory of the many babies and children which perished during the genocide.

Aesthetically, due to its many different buildings, exhibitions, and features, the memorial works with a large variety of styles and forms that are adapted from transnational and local memory culture. The gardens are densely filled with plants and flowers and provide spaces for withdrawal and personal reflection. Both the Wall of Names and a Wall of Pictures of victims in the exhibition space remind the visitors that it was not a large anonymous group of people who were killed but individuals with a name, a face, a life. The Wall of Pictures, for instance, is composed of personal photos of victims which depicts them in everyday situations or private events such as birthdays or weddings, emphasizing their humanness against the backdrop of the dehumanizing aspect of the genocidal violence. This effort to individualize victims is also repeated in the catalogue of the exhibition by showing their identity cards (Fig. 9). Emotionally, the Children's Room, in particular, seeks to provoke strong sentiments of sadness and grief among the visitors. In addition, the genocide exhibition section During the Genocide works with darkness, audio testimonies of individual survivors, graphic descriptions, and shocking images of violence and authentic objects such as machetes in order to communicate a multi-sensual message of terror and horror. The memorial also works with human remains in the form of the skulls and bones of victims, which are exhibited behind glass, as well as personal belongings found at massacre sites, such as clothes, rosaries, and books. Regarding the function of the memorial as a burial place, it is necessary to have mass graves since the excavation of bodies continues, yet these bodies also provide the memorial with a sense of authenticity, because they link the physical consequences of the genocide – dead bodies – to the site. They make visitors aware that the dead are always around them, contributing to a solemn atmosphere as in a cemetery. Overall, the site itself strongly affirms the necessity to remember, both explicitly and implicitly, and can thus be categorized as an affirmative memorial.

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 9 Kigali Genocide Memorial/Aegis Trust catalogue page 47

The Kigali Genocide Memorial is one of many memorials to commemorate the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, but due to the fact that it serves as the national memorial and that it houses a comprehensive exhibition to explain the events, it has a special status and thus relevance (Friedrich et al. 2018). Most other memorials are located at authentic sites and display the context of violence and atrocity without much analysis, apart from the tours offered by guides. The memorial in Kigali, however, represents the current state of the art in memorial design and didactics and bears strong similarities to other memorial museums, such as the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., in terms of combining commemoration with education and personal reflection. Initially, the site served as a burial place for unidentified victims of the genocide. From 2000 the UK-based nongovernmental organization Aegis Trust transformed it into a memorial, which was inaugurated on the 10th anniversary of the genocide in 2004. This international involvement, as well as the support of various international donors over the years, testifies to the transnational character of the place. Today, the Kigali Genocide Memorial is a popular tourist destination in a country that does not attract large numbers of visitors and can thus be considered a site of dark tourism (Lennon and Foley 2000).

As explored above, memorials to violence are often contested. Regarding the Kigali Genocide Memorial, one of the most contentious issues is its dominant – and imposing – narrative about the history of the genocide, its depictions of Rwandan society, and its exclusive reference to Tutsi as the sole fatalities of the genocide and the civil war in the context of which the genocide occurred (Jessee 2017). In essence, the permanent exhibition The 1994 Genocide against the Tutsi portrays Rwanda as a country of unity and harmony prior to the arrival of first German and then Belgian colonial rules. It was the colonial administration, so the argument, that turned socio-economic identity groups into racial identities, polarized and politicized them, and thus paved the way for the deep-seated hatred which provided the ground for the massacres of 1994. This is also reiterated in the catalogue of the exhibition which concludes “[w]e had lived in peace for many centuries, but now the divide between us had begun . . .” (Kigali Memorial Center/Aegis Trust 2004: 9) (Fig. 10). Without reiterating the contestation of various narratives on the history of Rwanda in great detail in this chapter, it is important to point out that this account is highly contested within as well as outside of Rwanda (Buckley-Zistel 2009; Eltringham 2004; Mannergren Selimovic 2017; Sodaro 2011). In addition, out of the three ethnic groups in Rwanda, only victims of Tutsi ethnic belonging are represented in national remembrance. There were also fatalities among the Hutu (the group out of which the genocide perpetrators emerged) as well as among the Batwa, yet they do not find representation in the memorial. There is, however, a more recent trend in commemoration politics to point out heroic acts by Hutu individuals who saved Tutsi.

As a consequence, the Kigali Genocide Memorial serves as a memorial, i.e., as a site for visitors to Rwanda to pay their respects and to be educated on the events, yet also as a place for the Rwandan government to articulate its particular version of the past. In this sense, the idea is for the memorial to serve as a vehicle for nation-building. In the vocabulary of the Rwandan government, it should promote “unity and reconciliation.” Given that the government has a very strict policy of sanctioning people who question this narrative (in the worst case with reference to a law against divisionism that prohibits engaging critically with the different views on Tutsi, Hutu, and Batwa), memorialization in Rwanda is highly political and conflictual. In this sense, the Kigali Genocide Memorial is an affirmative memorial that imposes a particular view on the past, present, and future. It does not leave any room for interpretation of or reflection on the causes and consequences of violence but sends out a clear message, making further personal interpretation superfluous.

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 10 Kigali Genocide Memorial/Aegis Trust catalogue page 8–9

Conclusions

Memorials fulfill an important social and political function in countries that have experienced violent conflict. They serve as reminders of past atrocities, educate people on the causes and consequences of violence, and store information about the atrocities in a particular locality. Using memorials in transitional justice processes is a rather new phenomenon which has gained much traction in recent years. This is based on the hope that memorials provide some form of justice and symbolic reparations for the victims and contribute to a culture of “never again” and thus peacebuilding. And yet, as the example of the Kigali Genocide Memorial illustrates, memorials may also be contested if they seek to determine a particular interpretation of the past and impose their narrative on visitors by designing an exhibition that tells a clear story about the events. In deeply divided societies, memorials may thus contribute to continuous resentment and antagonism between the parties to a conflict if they are used as a political tool.

And yet, as the discussion on the different aesthetic forms of memorials indicates, memorials can also be designed in a way that does not communicate a clear and imposing message but leaves scope for interpretation. One of the most striking memorials in this regard is the Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe in Berlin. It consists of 2711 concrete steles in parallel rows yet at slightly different heights through which visitors can walk to become immersed in the site (Fig. 11). The memorial works purely with the personal, physical experience – i.e., with emotions. There are no signs to explain or interpret the structure, although there is a detached underground information center, which educates visitors on the Holocaust more generally. The Holocaust Memorial has been criticized for the absence of information about the atrocity, yet – truly in the spirit of the counter-monument discussed above – it does not want to impose a particular view about the past but instead open the minds and horizons of the visitors to think for themselves. In this sense, it democratizes memorialization because everybody can – and should – reflect on the past.

Memorials and Transitional Justice, Fig. 11 Memorial to the Murdered Jews of Europe in Berlin, Germany

What does this mean for memorials in deeply divided societies that emerge from violence, though? How can memorialization be kept open and alive, as well as still the wish of survivors for some form of justice? How can it prevent new governments from imposing their version of events? These and many more questions need to be considered when constructing memorials as measures in transitional justice processes, so that memorials may contribute to building peace.

Summary

In transitional justice processes, memorialization serves as a means of symbolic reparation, thus expanding the scope of dealing with the legacy of violent conflicts and repression from tribunals, truth commissions, and monetary reparations to memorials and commemorations. This is based on the assumption that dealing with the past always requires revisiting the past as well as considering the future in order to prevent new violence. And yet, memorials are a mixed blessing. The past they seek to refer to, the meaning they seek to establish, and the social change they seek to introduce are not beyond contestation and frequently give rise to struggles over the right interpretation of this past. In particular, memorials which mainly portray the view of one party to the conflict may cause resentment and have a negative effect on the transition from violence to peaceful coexistence.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

References

- Ashplant, T. G., Dawson, G., & Roper, M. (2000). The politics of war memory and commemoration: Context, structures and dynamics. In T. G. Ashplant, G. Dawson, & M. Roper (Eds.), The politics of war memory and commemoration (pp. 3–86). London: Routledge.
- Assmann, A., & Conrad, S. (2010). Memory in a global age: Discourses, practices and trajectories. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Barsalou, J. (2014). Reflecting on the fractured past: Memorials, transitional justice and the role of outsiders. In S. Buckley-Zistel & S. Schäfer (Eds.), Memorials in times of transition (pp. 47–68). Antwerp: Intersentia.
- Basic Principles and Guidelines on the Right to a Remedy and Reparation for Victims of Gross Violations of International Human Rights Law and Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law. (2005). UN Resolution 60/147, adopted 16 December 2005. Retrieved 20 Sept 2019 from <https://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/RemedyAndReparation.aspx>
- Bickford, L., & Sodaro, A. (2010). Remembering yesterday to protect tomorrow: The internationalization of a new commemorative paradigm. In A. Brown, Y. Gutman, & A. Sodaro (Eds.), Memory and the future: Transnational politics, ethics and society (pp. 66–88). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Björkdahl, A., Buckley-Zistel, S., Kappler, S., Mannergren Selimovic, J., & Williams, T. (2017). Memory politics, cultural heritage and peace: Introducing an analytical framework to study mnemonic formations. Working Paper 1. Retrieved 20 Sept 2019 from <http://peaceandmemory.net/working-papers/>
- Brett, S., Bickford, L., Ševčenko, L., & Rios, M. (2007). Memorialization and democracy: State policy and civic action. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice.
- Buckley-Zistel, S. (2009). Nation, narration, unification? The politics of history teaching after the Rwandan genocide. Journal of Genocide Research, 11(1), 31–53.
- Buckley-Zistel, S., & Björkdahl, A. (2017). Memorials and transitional justice. In O. Simic (Ed.), Understanding transitional justice (pp. 249–268). Abington: Routledge.
- Buckley-Zistel, S., & Schäfer, S. (Eds.). (2014). Memorials in times of transition. Antwerp: Intersentia.
- Eltringham, N. (2004). Accounting for horror: Post-genocide debates in Rwanda. London: Pluto Press.
- Friedrich, M., Stone, P. R., & Rukesh, P. (2018). Dark tourism, difficult heritage, and memorialisation: A case of the Rwandan genocide. In P. R. Stone, R. Hartmann, T. Seaton, R. Sharpley, & L. White (Eds.), The Palgrave handbook of dark tourism studies (pp. 261–289). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Genocide Archive Rwanda. (n.d.). Memorials. Retrieved 10 July 2019 from <https://genocidearchiverwanda.org.rw/index.php/Category:Memorials>
- Inter-American Court of Human Rights. (2009). Case of González et al. (“Cotton Field”) v. Mexico: Judgment of November 16, 2009 (Preliminary Objection, Merits, Reparations, and Costs). Retrieved 8 Sept 2019 from http://www.corteidh.or.cr/docs/casos/articulos/seriec_205_ing.pdf
- Jessee, E. (2017). An official history: Commemorating “the 1994 genocide of the Tutsi”. In E. Jessee, negotiating genocide in Rwanda: The politics of history (pp. 45–80). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kattago, S. (2015). Written in Stone: Monuments and representation. In S. Kattago (Ed.), The Ashgate research companion to memory studies (pp. 179–195). Farnham: Ashgate.
- Kigali Genocide Memorial. (n.d.-a). A place of remembrance and learning. Retrieved 20 Sept 2019 from <https://www.kgm.rw/>
- Kigali Genocide Memorial. (n.d.-b). Education. Retrieved 20 Sept 2019 from <https://www.kgm.rw/education/>
- Kigali Genocide Memorial/Aegis Trust. (2004). Jenocide. Kigali: Kigali Genocide Memorial/Aegis Trust.
- Koselleck, R. (2002). War memorials: Identity formations of the survivors. In R. Koselleck (Ed.), The practice of conceptual history: Timing history, spacing concepts (pp. 285–326). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Lennon, J. J., & Foley, M. (2000). Dark tourism: The attraction of death and disaster. London: Thomson Learning.
- Levy, D., & Sznajder, N. (2002). Memory unbound: The holocaust and the formation of cosmopolitan memory. European Journal of Social Theory, 5(1), 87–106.
- Levy, D., & Sznajder, N. (2006). The holocaust and memory in the global age. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2013). Making peace, making memory: Peacebuilding and politics of remembrance at memorials of mass atrocities in Bosnia and Rwanda. Peacebuilding, 1(3), 334–348.
- Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2017). Gender, narrative and affect: Top-down politics of commemoration in post-genocide Rwanda. Memory Studies. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1750698017730869>.
- Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2018). Stuff from the Siege: Materiality and remembering the everyday of war. In 12th Pan-European conference on international relations, Prague, 12–15 Sept 2018.
- Mlodoch, K. (2012). “We want to be remembered as strong women, not as shepherds” women Anfal survivors in Kurdistan-Iraq struggling for agency and acknowledgment. Journal of Middle East Women’s Studies, 8(1), 63–91.
- Rothberg, M. (2011). From Gaza to Warsaw: Mapping multidirectional memory. Criticism, 53(4), 523–548.

- Sather-Wagstaff, J. (2016). Heritage that hurts: Tourists in the memoryscapes of September 11. New York: Routledge.
- Sodaro, A. (2011). Politics of the past: Remembering the Rwandan Genocide at the Kigali Memorial Centre. In E. Lehrer, C. E. Milton, & M. E. Patterson (Eds.), Curating difficult knowledge: Violent pasts in public places (pp. 72–88). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Stone, P. R. (2009). Dark tourism: Morality and new moral spaces. In R. Sharpley & P. R. Stone (Eds.), The darker side of travel: The theory and practice of dark tourism (pp. 56–72). Bristol: Channel View Publications.
- Viebach, J. (2014). Alétheia and the making of the world: Inner and outer dimensions of memorials in Rwanda. In S. Buckley-Zistel & S. Schäfer (Eds.), Memorials in times of transition (pp. 69–96). Antwerp: Intersentia.
- Williams, P. (2007). Memorial museums: The global rush to commemorate atrocities. Oxford: Berg Publishers.
- Winter, J. (2006). Notes on the memory boom: War, remembrance and uses of the past. In D. Bell (Ed.), Memory, trauma and world politics: Reflections on the relationship between past and present (pp. 54–73). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Young, J. E. (1992). The counter-monument: Memory against itself in Germany today. Critical Inquiry, 18 (2), 267–296.

Memory

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

Memory Activism

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Textiles Making Peace

Memory Politics

- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice

Migration

- ▶ Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Militarism

- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Military

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/ Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Military Coalitions

- ▶ Yemen Conflict

Military Dictatorships

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America

M

Military Intervention

- ▶ Politics of Passportization and Territorial Conflicts
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions

Military Interventions

- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions

Military Occupation

- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste

Mini-trials

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Minorities

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict

Minority Rights

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

MINUJUSTH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

MINUSTAH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

MIPONUH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

Mock Trials

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Moldova-Transnistria Conflict

Donnacha Ó Beacháin
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

De Facto State; Disintegration; Division; Secession; Soviet; Unrecognised State

Definition

The internationally recognized territory of Moldova is divided between the area controlled by the Moldovan capital, Chişinău, and the de facto independent state of Transnistria. For the most part, the two regimes are divided by the Dniester River, and, consequently, Transnistria and Chişinău-controlled territories are sometimes referred to respectively as “left-bank” and “right-bank” Moldova. The conflict between Moldova and Transnistria originally flared up as Soviet power ebbed during the late 1980s and early 1990s. Transnistrian fears for the fate of the Russian language and of the possibility of Moldova uniting with Romania were at the root of the conflict. The clashes began in December 1991, intensified the following May, and culminated on June 19, 1992 when a large-scale military battle took place to determine which side would control the city of Bender. The battle for Bender ended as Russian forces intervened and Moldovan forces were driven out of the town. The conflict claimed approximately 1000 lives. The ceasefire negotiated in July 1992 has held ever since. Today, Transnistria (officially the Pridnestrovian Moldavian Republic, or PMR) is a post-Soviet unrecognized state with Russia being its primary source of external support. While renewed military hostilities are considered very unlikely, a transformative conflict settlement has also proved elusive.

Background

Between the First World War and the Second World War, much of what is now Moldova, then called Bessarabia, formed part of Romania. Transnistria has had a different historical trajectory. Between 1924 and 1940 the Moldavian Autonomous Soviet Socialist Republic (ASSR) was an autonomous republic of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic (SSR) encompassing modern-day Transnistria – with the exception of the strategically important town of Bender (Tighina in Romanian) – along with territories that are part of contemporary Ukraine. Following the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact, and a decision of the USSR’s Supreme Soviet, a new Soviet Socialist Republic of Moldova, with a territory of 33,846 km², was created on August 2, 1940, from a part of the Moldavian ASSR roughly equivalent to the present-day Transnistria and a part of Bessarabia (annexed by Soviet forces from Romania on June 28, 1940).

During the Soviet-era, Moldovans of Bessarabian origin were not trusted with the same degree of political power as Transnistrians, and until 1989 the latter always supplied the first secretaries of the Republic's communist party (King 1999, p. 134). The traditional Latin alphabet of the Romanian language, used by the majority of right-bank residents of the Moldovan SSR, was replaced with the Cyrillic alphabet to encourage the perception that Moldovan constituted a separate nationality from Romanian. Within Transnistria, the Russian language predominated as a means of communication (Comai and Venturi 2015, pp. 890, 900). When the USSR collapsed, the international community recognized the 15 Soviet Socialist Republics – the highest status of a region within the Soviet Union – as independent states and facilitated their speedy entry into the United Nations. Consequently, international law stipulates that Transnistria is part of Moldova, although successive Moldovan governments have been unable to impose their authority on the region. The unrecognized Pridnestrovian Moldavian Republic (PMR) is sandwiched between Moldova and Ukraine with a territory of 4163 km². It has its own security forces and currency (the Transnistrian Rouble). Home to approximately 130,000 people, the Transnistrian capital of Tiraspol is where the PMR parliament, president, and government agencies are located.

The populations of Moldova and Transnistria have been substantially reduced as a result of natural loss and migration. The last Soviet census of 1989 recorded 4,337,600 living in Moldova, of whom approximately 700,000 lived in what is now Transnistria. In 2019, the population of Moldova was estimated to be 2,681,735 while a census held in the PMR 4 years earlier put the population residing there as 475,665 (Fomenko 2017, p. 7). Whereas Romanian-speaking Moldovans constitute the majority of the population of Chişinău-controlled Moldova, Transnistria's population is more diverse with no ethnicity enjoying a majority. Rather, Russians, Ukrainians, and Moldovans live there in almost equal numbers, together making up around 93% of the population (Transnistrian Ministry of Economic Development 2017) with Russian being the lingua franca. Over the years, the authorities in Tiraspol have tried to transcend these ethnic differences by encouraging a common Transnistrian identity. While a common Soviet experience has resulted in very large sections of the population being indifferent in practice to religious adherence, Moldovans and Transnistrians share a common Eastern Orthodox Christianity.

Origins of the Conflict

In 1988, the Moldavian Supreme Soviet returned the Moldovan language to the Latin alphabet and on August 31 of the following year made Romanian the sole official state language. The new legislation permitted the removal of officials who did not meet the required proficiency by January 1994 and led to strikes in Transnistria. In April 1990, the Moldavian Supreme Soviet adopted a tricolor resembling that of Romania as the state flag. Local authorities throughout Transnistria refused to recognize the flag and continued to fly the flag of the Moldovan SSR. The following month, the Moldovan Supreme Soviet dropped all Soviet references in the state's name, which was now changed to the Republic of Moldova. In September 1990, the Moldovan legislature declared its sovereignty and nullified the transfer of Bessarabia from Romania to the USSR by the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. As Transnistria had not been part of Bessarabian Romania but, rather, had been part of the Soviet Union prior to the 1939 pact; annulling the Nazi-Soviet pact also invalidated Transnistria's status as part of Moldova. Transnistrians responded by establishing the Pridnestrovian Moldavian Soviet Socialist Republic. Furthermore, they announced their intention to secede from Moldova and urged Gorbachev to admit Transnistria into the USSR and for continued Soviet control. The Moldovan parliament elected Mircea Snegur as president with broad executive powers and mobilized thousands of Interior Ministry troops for service not only in Transnistria but also in the region of Gagauzia, which also entertained secessionist ambitions (Kosienkowski 2017). Influential elements within the Soviet military and security services sometimes supported the Transnistrians as part of their efforts to keep the union together.

On April 1, 1991, the Transnistrian parliament announced the establishment of its own state bank and declared that enterprises under its control would not contribute to the Moldovan state budget, a significant decision given that the overwhelming bulk of Moldovan industry was located in Transnistria. Just over 3 weeks later, on August 27, 1991, the legislature in Chişinău declared Moldova's independence. Following the failed coup against Mikhail Gorbachev, Transnistrians repeated their intention of seceding from Moldova. Igor Smirnov was elected Transnistria's first president on December 1, 1991, a position he would hold for two decades (Igor Smirnov, interview with the author, Tiraspol, 2016). One week later Moldovan presidential elections returned Mircea Snegur, who had been the only candidate. Separatists in Transnistria and Gagauzia boycotted the election (King 1999, pp. 183–196).

A brief but intense war between Moldova and Transnistria resulted in the deaths of approximately 1000 people (almost 400 died in May 1992 alone) (Roper 2004, pp. 108–110). The peace agreement that concluded on July 21, 1992, established a three-party (Moldova, Russia, and Transnistria) Joint Control Commission to supervise the cease-fire regime, implement agreements on withdrawal of armed forces and other groups, including weapons and ammunition, and provide a security regime in the Security Zone as well as contribute to the peaceful settlement of the conflict by political means. Current conflict management initiatives include a trilateral peacekeeping operation, three-level negotiations within the “5+2” format combined with confidence building measures including “Bavaria conferences,” and externally funded joint projects involving Moldovan and Transnistrian authorities, civil society representatives, and the wider population.

Russia

With its 14th Army ensconced in Transnistria for almost three decades, the Kremlin is a decisive player. In 2004, the European Court of Human Rights concluded that Transnistria “remained under the effective authority, or at the very least under the decisive influence of Russia, and in any event it survived by virtue of the military, economic, financial and political support that Russia gave it” (ECHR 2004, para. 392). Russia provides huge energy subsidies to the PMR. It was estimated that in 2019 Transnistria owed over USD 7 billion in unpaid energy bills. These gas subsidies constitute about 48% of Transnistrian GDP during the previous decade. In other words, almost half of Transnistria's economy exists thanks to this gas subsidy. In addition, revenue from gas sales to enterprises and private consumers in Transnistria constitutes 35% of the region's budget (Newsmaker 2019). Russia also provides pension top-ups to senior citizens in Transnistria that have acquired Russian citizenship.

Burned by its experiences during the 1990s when many post-communist states in Central and Eastern Europe joined NATO, the Kremlin has sought a guarantee that a united Moldova which includes Transnistria would never join the western military alliance. Moldovan leaders have occasionally claimed that Russia's offers to cooperate on the Transnistrian issue have been framed in terms of Moldova's geopolitical orientation. In 2006, the then Minister for Reintegration and Moldova's Chief Negotiator for the Transnistrian conflict, Vasili Sova, described relations with Russia as follows:

... our Russian partners make us understand that the position of Russia is connected with the internal policy of Moldova and they make us understand that if Moldova refuses to integrate with the EU, if its vector of movement won't be directed towards Europe, then they could talk with Chişinău in a different way ... They let us know that Russia is willing to use every way to keep its influence in the region and in the whole of Moldova. (Vasili Sova, interview with the author, Chişinău, 2006)

The geopolitical sentiments of Moldovans have since become more complex. In 2019, only 19% of the population was recorded as having a positive attitude to their country joining NATO (International Republican Institute 2019, pp. 61–62). Russia and the EU are considered to be equally important political and economic partners. The desire of Moldovans to become a member of the EU is only slightly greater (47% vs. 37%) than becoming a member of the Kremlin-sponsored Customs Union, with enthusiasm for the EU far more pronounced among the young (International Republican Institute 2019, pp. 58–60).

External Trade and International Engagements

The Transnistrian economy is particularly dependent on external trade. Its industry heavily relies on natural gas that is imported from Russia without payment and sold in Transnistria below market rates, an arrangement that allows the Transnistrian economy to remain competitive (Ó Beacháin et al. 2016: p. 433). The EU, right-bank Moldova, and Ukraine are the core markets for Transnistrian producers. Transnistrian companies obtain registrations on the right bank of Moldova to benefit from facilities offered by the Moldova-EU Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Agreement (DCFTA). Unlike other Transnistrian businesses that can register in right-bank Moldova and trade internationally, Transnistrian banks are denied such options and are isolated due to their inability to access licenses in Moldova. Remittances sent to Transnistria by labor migrants, most of whom work in Russia, prop up internal consumption. About half of the officially employed workforce is engaged in the public sector. The economic plight of Transnistrian residents is alleviated by relatively generous social security benefits and subsidized utility rates. Large public sector and pension expenditure result in the Transnistrian public budget's chronic deficit of up to 40%. The deficit is partially covered with proceeds obtained through the sale of imported Russian natural gas (Comai 2018: pp. 105–109).

Many within the Moldovan, Transnistrian, and, indeed, the Ukrainian economic and political elites have benefited from the anomalous character of Transnistria's economy (Oazu Nantoi, interview with the author, Chişinău, 2006). Much of the Transnistrian economy is concentrated in the hands of a small number of powerful individuals, many of whom cooperate with counterparts on the right-bank of the Dniester, which has created vested interests opposed to integration with Moldova. Energy and metals are the main Transnistrian imports and exports, entering Transnistria as prime material and leaving as ready-made products for sale. According to Transnistrian data, foreign trade turnover in goods in 2018, including trade with right-bank Moldova, amounted to USD 1913 million (Transnistrian Customs Agency 2019). The trade balance was negative and stood at minus USD 519 million (–43% of total).

Similar to the right-bank Moldova and Ukraine, Transnistria is affected by labor emigration. About a quarter of working age Transnistrians work abroad and remittances sent by labor migrants are an important driver of consumption in Transnistria. This source of income has decreased in recent years due to currency depreciation in Russia, where three-quarters of Transnistrian labor migrants (about 70,000 people) head in search of work (Fomenko 2017, pp. 16, 21). According to the International Organisation for Migration, workforce emigration is causing “critical depopulation” (Fomenko 2017, p. 35). Up to half of Transnistrian households rely to some extent on remittances (Fomenko 2017, p. 45) and these are normally used for private consumption rather than for investment (Ostavnaia 2017, p. 135). Over two-thirds of all remittances in 2018 came from Russia (Transnistria Republican Bank 2018). Furthermore, most Transnistrians hold multiple passports and will apply for as many as possible with a view to maximizing their rights and privileges. Russian, Moldovan, and Ukrainian citizenship are the most widely distributed in Transnistria. In parallel to this process, many Moldovans have Romanian passports, and this has facilitated mass migration to the European Union (Ganohariti 2019; Tabachnik 2019, pp. 99–104).

The OSCE

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) has primary responsibility for negotiations to achieve a settlement of the Transnistrian conflict. It remains a convenient substitute for the involvement of great powers and absolves them from acting in their own name. The OSCE is less an organization than a forum (the original name referred to it being a conference), has a rotating leadership, and the Secretary General is a civil servant. Moreover, the OSCE participating states have no hierarchy, it works by consensus, and an institutionalized veto is given to each member. For three decades a number of mechanisms have been employed for conflict management purposes. These include a trilateral peacekeeping operation composed of Russian, Moldovan, and Transnistrian military that is entrusted with the responsibility of monitoring a security zone separating the territories controlled from the Moldovan capital of Chişinău and the Transnistrian capital, Tiraspol. This in turn is directed by a Joint Control Commission (JCC) composed of Moldovan, Transnistrian, and Russian representatives, with Ukraine and the OSCE acting as observers. Parallel to these activities are those of “The Permanent Conference on Political Issues in the Framework of the Negotiating Process for Transdnistriean Settlement” or, as it is more commonly known, “the 5+2 political process.” These negotiations involve the two conflicting parties along with Russia, Ukraine, and the OSCE as mediators. Since 2005 the talks format has been expanded to include the EU and the United States as observers (thus “5+2”). The negotiations within the format are now conducted at three levels: the annual high-profile “5+2” conference; the “1+1” meetings, in which the two sides directly negotiate with each other through their political representatives; and the expert working groups (currently 13), established by the sides in different fields which bring together specialists from relevant structures in Moldova and Transnistria.

The closest the Moldovan and Transnistrian leaderships came to agree a new dispensation was in 2003 with the Russian-brokered “Kozak memorandum” (officially titled the Russian Draft Memorandum on the Basic Principles of the State Structure of a United State in Moldova). This proposed a united asymmetric federal state of Moldova under which Transnistrian senators would be able to block changes to the constitution (Wolff 2011). Negotiations for this agreement were conducted in complete secrecy and without consulting the OSCE, EU, the United States, Ukraine, or other interested parties. When western powers learned of the deal, they persuaded Chişinău to withdraw at the last minute. President Putin was reported to be on the verge of flying to Moldova to oversee the agreement’s signing (Popescu 2010, p. 46). The EU and United States believed a settlement based on the Kozak memorandum would paralyze the united Moldovan state and make it dependent in perpetuity on external (i.e., Russian) mediation to achieve the consensus necessary to devise and implement government policies. The Kozak memorandum reflected a consistent theme in Russian foreign policy toward the Moldovan-Transnistrian conflict. Rather than endorsing Transnistria’s independent statehood, Russia preferred the region to be part of a federal or confederal Moldova, and to enjoy such wide-ranging powers that it could block any attempt to integrate Moldova into Euro-Atlantic institutions.

Moldova’s rejection of the Kozak memorandum triggered a breakdown in settlement talks. In 2012, official “5+2” negotiations resumed following a nearly six-year hiatus. These OSCE-brokered talks have provided a regular forum for discussion between the conflicting sides for mutually beneficial cooperation and defusing potential crises. In 2017–2018, the settlement process witnessed remarkable progress, with Chişinău and Tiraspol signing and implementing a number of agreements on long-standing issues. In addition to the opening of the Gura Bicului-Bychok Bridge in November 2017, the sides implemented agreements in 2018 related to the participation of vehicles from Transnistria in international road traffic, the access of Moldovan farmers to their lands in the Dubăsari area, the functioning of Latin-script schools on the left bank, and the apostilization of Transdnistriean university diplomas by the Moldovan Ministry of Justice to facilitate their use abroad. The negotiations have still failed to produce a comprehensive agreement that would transform the conflict.

The European Union

During the 1990s, the European Union left the issue of the Transnistrian conflict to the OSCE. This policy of inertia was reversed in 2002 due to the inauguration of the European Neighbourhood Policy (ENP) and the impending EU enlargements, which brought its membership to Moldova's borders (Popescu 2010). Moldova negotiated an ENP Action Plan that involved integrating parts of the acquis communautaire into national legislation. The EU played a key role in scuppering the Kozak plan as High Representative for Common Foreign and Security Policy, Javier Solana, phoned Moldovan President Voronin to warn of the consequences of signing up to the deal (Popescu 2010, pp. 46–47). President Voronin shifted the emphasis of his foreign policy orientation toward the EU and away from Russia, not least because of the fallout from the Kozak memorandum debacle and the breakdown of the five-party settlement talks. Consequently, the Moldovan government increasingly requested that the EU take a more active role in the settlement process.

Viktor Yushchenko's inauguration as president of Ukraine in 2005 following the much-publicized Orange Revolution enhanced Moldova's position vis-à-vis Transnistria (Kennedy 2010). During the subsequent 5 years (2005–2010) the EU became more involved in efforts to ameliorate the Moldova-Transnistria conflict though its energies were largely confined to those areas of potential improvement that did not rely on Russian support. Foremost among these was the policy of combating corruption and the shadow economy in Transnistria. The EU's most ambitious initiative during this period was the European Union Border Assistance Mission to Moldova and Ukraine (EUBAM) established in 2005 at the invitation of Presidents Yushchenko and Voronin. Its brief was to monitor smuggling and trafficking along the 472 km border shared by Transnistria and Ukraine over which Chişinău exercised no control (Vasili Sova, interview with the author, Chişinău, 2006). EUBAM enjoyed a double advantage in that its operation did not depend on the Kremlin's goodwill and its mandate was not overtly political but rather a technical endeavor to assist in the fight against "weapons trafficking, smuggling, organised crime and corruption" (Council of the European Union 2005). It recognized that such endeavors might "contribute to wider efforts to find a viable and sustainable solution to the Transnistria conflict" (Council of the European Union 2005).

Complementary to EUBAM was the European Union's policy of helping Moldova to overcome some of its domestic economic and political problems with a view to the state becoming more attractive to residents in Transnistria. On March 23, 2005, Adriaan Jacobovits de Szeged was appointed the first EU Special Representative (EUSR) to Moldova (in 2003 he had held the position of special envoy to Moldova of the Dutch chairmanship of the OSCE) and he was succeeded by Kalman Mizsei who served as EUSR from March 2007 to February 2011, after which the position was discontinued. Neither of the EUSRs was based in Moldova, but they played a valuable role in gathering information and playing a diplomatic role for the EU not least because the EUSR compensated for the paucity of EU member state embassies in the country (only three in 2004). Although the EU (along with the United States) joined the five-party settlement talks in 2005 as an observer, in practice its level of participation does not differ from the others.

The EU slowly increased its efforts to encourage Transnistria to have closer ties with Chişinău. A number of measures – the granting by the EU of the Generalized System of Preferences Plus trade regime to Moldova in 2006, the introduction of a new customs regime the same year, and the extension to Moldova of the Autonomous Trade Preferences – had the combined effect of shepherding Transnistrian companies to Chişinău to register with the authorities there in order to access EU markets. Moreover, Moldova's trade has switched from being focused on the former Soviet Union, as was the case during the 1990s and reoriented its trade and political engagement toward the EU. Since 2008, the majority of Moldova's exports are destined for the EU market and EU assistance to Moldova doubled to €250 million between 2007 and 2010 (Popescu 2010, p. 57). However, a scandal in 2014 involving elements within the political elite stealing approximately one billion USD from three Moldovan banks (equivalent to 15% of Moldova's GDP) resulted in the EU, along with the IMF and World Bank, freezing financial assistance to Moldova (Calus 2016, pp. 27, 68, 80).

When the Deep and Comprehensive Free Trade Area between the EU and Moldova entered into force in July 2016 it provided an additional stimulus for Transnistrian business to cooperate with the Moldovan authorities in order to access EU markets. However, the EU has been much less successful in promoting more politicized conflict resolution endeavors that require Russian approval. A good example was the rejection in 2006 of EUSR Jacobovits's proposal to change the peacekeeping format in Transnistria so that it was transformed from a Russian-dominated force to one jointly administered by Russia and the EU. This echoed Jacobovits 2003 proposal when, as special envoy to Moldova during the Dutch OSCE chairmanship, he proposed a widening of the peacekeeping format. The plan was stymied by opposition or skepticism within key EU states, which feared that the European Union would unduly antagonize Russia and was an open-ended commitment without a guarantee of success.

The obstacles facing the EU in promoting conflict-resolution efforts remain substantial. As one senior EU official put it:

We have an entire new generation in Transnistria which hasn't known what Moldova means. They do not consider Moldova as a motherland and when you read the history textbooks in Transnistria you understand why they don't want to be with Moldova. [Moreover] . . . you have a growing disinterest for [the] Transnistrian issue amongst the population [of Moldova]. Studies . . . show that in Moldova you have more than 50% of the population predict that their future is within the EU whereas in Transnistria it is not really this. If you ask them, they want to be with Russia. [interview with the author, Brussels, 2011]

Summary

As the Soviet Union began to dissolve, fears of Moldovan/Romanian unionism and discrimination against non-Romanian speakers triggered secessionist opposition among the majority Slavic population of Transnistria. Because the Soviet collapse rendered continued membership of the USSR untenable, Transnistrians switched their stated goal to independence but have kept the door ajar to unity with Russia. Utilizing the 1992 ceasefire and peacekeeping operations within Transnistria, Russia froze the conflict in an unresolved state, which has enabled it to exert leverage on all parties to the conflict. The Moldovan government stresses the inviolability of borders and territorial integrity of the country. It claims that the Transnistrian problem has inhibited economic development and influenced negative social, economic, and political trends. While Russia has participated as a nominally neutral mediator in international efforts to resolve the conflict, Moldovan governments have emphasized Russia's role in prolonging the conflict citing, for example, the large subsidies that Russia gives to Transnistria and the presence of Russian troops in the region. Opinion polls and focus groups suggest that Transnistria is not an issue of high priority for the electorate (International Republican Institute 2018: p. 33) and, thus, the Moldovan political elite have more room for maneuver than, say, their counterparts in the South Caucasus. The OSCE is the principal forum for mediating the conflict but as an organization composed of civil servants, the vast majority of whom work there temporarily, it can only provide a platform. Any responsibility for deadlock rests with member states and not with the OSCE. Despite the oft-proclaimed relative ease with which a solution should be found, a final settlement has proved elusive.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

References

- Ó Beacháin, D., Comai, G., & Tsurtsunia-Zurabashvili, A. (2016). The secret lives of unrecognised states: Internal dynamics, external relations, and counter-recognition strategies. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 27(3), 440–466.
- Caňus, K. (2016). The unfinished state. 25 years of independent Moldova. Warsaw: Ośrodek Studiów Wschodnich im. Marka Karpia.

- Comai, G. (2018). What is the effect of non-recognition? The external relations of de facto states in the post-Soviet space. Doctoral dissertation, Dublin City University.
- Comai, G., & Venturi, B. (2015). Language and education laws in multi-ethnic de facto states: The cases of Abkhazia and Transnistria. Nationalities Papers, 43(6), 886–905.
- Council of the European Union. (2005). European Union's Border Mission to Moldova and Ukraine – Declaration by the Presidency of the European Union – Odessa, Ukraine, 30 November 2005. Available at https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/en/PRES_05_334. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- European Court of Human Rights. (2004). Pașcau and others v. Moldova and the Russian Federation. Available at <http://hudoc.echr.coe.int/eng?i=001-61886>. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- Fomenko, V. (2017). Extended migration profile of Transnistria. Chișinău: International Organisation for Migration, Moldova.
- Ganohariti, R. (2019). Dual citizenship in De facto states: Comparative case study of Abkhazia and Transnistria. Nationalities Papers, 1–18.
- International Republican Institute. (2018). Public opinion survey: Residents of Moldova February–March, 2018. Available at http://www.iri.org/sites/default/files/2018-3-29_moldova_poll_presentation.pdf
- International Republican Institute. (2019). Public opinion survey: Residents of Moldova May 8, 2019 – June 10, 2019. Available at www.iri.org/sites/default/files/iri_moldova_may-june_2019_poll_final.pdf
- Kennedy, R. (2010). Moldova. In D. Ó. Beacháin & A. Polese (Eds.), The colour revolutions in the former Soviet Union: Successes and failures (pp. 52–71). Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- King, C. (1999). The Moldovans: Romania, Russia, and the politics of culture. Washington, DC: Hoover Press.
- Kosienkowski, M. (2017). The Gagauz Republic: An Autonomism-Driven De Facto State. The Soviet and Post-Soviet Review, 44(3), 292–313.
- Newsmaker. (2019). Газовый долг заводит в тупик. Почему Молдова с 2020 года может остаться без газа (Gas debt leads to a dead end. Why Moldova may be left without gas from 2020). Available at <https://newsmaker.md/rus/novosti/gazovyy-dolg-zavodit-v-tupik-pochemu-moldova-s-2020-goda-mozhet-ostat-sya-bez-gaza-43968/>. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- Ostavnaia, A. (2017). Mapping migration from Transnistria. Chișinău: International Organisation for Migration, Moldova.
- Popescu, N. (2010). EU foreign policy and post-soviet conflicts: Stealth intervention. Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- Roper, S. D. (2004). From frozen conflict to frozen agreement: The unrecognized state of Transnistria. In T. Bahcheli, B. Bartmann, & H. Srebrnik (Eds.), De facto states: The quest for sovereignty (pp. 124–139). Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- Tabachnik, M. (2019). Citizenship, territoriality, and post-soviet nationhood: The politics of birthright citizenship in Azerbaijan, Georgia, and Moldova. London: Palgrave.
- Transnistrian Ministry of Economic Development. (2017). Statistical Yearbook [Статистический ежегодник]. Available at <http://mer.gospmr.org/gosudarstvennaya-sluzhba-statistiki/informacziya/ezh-egodnik-gosudarstvennoj-sluzhby-statistiki/statistich-eskij-ezhegodnik-2017.html>. Accessed 27 Feb 2020.
- Transnistrian Customs Agency. (2019). Внешняя Торговля Пмр По Основным Странам И Группам Стран В Разрезе Товарных Структур За Январь–Декабрь 2018 Г [Foreign trade of the PMR by major countries and groups of countries in terms of commodity structures for January–October 2019]. Available at <http://customs.gospmr.org/vneshnyaya-torgovlya-pmr-po-osnovnym-stra.html>. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- Transnistrian Republican Bank. (2018). Информация об основных странах-контрагентах по денежным переводам физических лиц посредством электронных систем без открытия банковского счёта [Information on the main counterparty countries for money transfers of individuals through electronic systems without opening a bank account]. Available at www.cbpmr.net/data/M_t_Country_27_01_19_2.pdf. Accessed 17 Dec 2019.
- Wolff, S. (2011). A resolvable frozen conflict? Designing a settlement for Transnistria. Nationalities Papers, 39(6), 863–870.

Monitoring and Evaluation

- Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Mozambique

Roberta Holanda Maschietto
Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra, Coimbra, Portugal

Synonyms

Civil war; Southern Africa

Definition

Following centuries of Portuguese colonialization and years of anti-colonial struggle, Mozambique became independent in 1975 under the leadership of the Mozambican Liberation Front (Frelimo). Between 1977 and 1992, this country endured an extremely violent war that opposed the government of Frelimo and the Mozambican National Resistance (Renamo). A peace accord was signed in 1992 after a long process of mediation, and its implementation was overseen by a United Nations mission, set up to monitor the first multiparty elections in 1994.

For nearly 20 years after the peace agreement, Mozambique was considered a successful case of peacebuilding. It kept political stability and positive macroeconomic indicators while receiving a large amount of foreign aid. Notwithstanding this, poverty has been a persistent problem, with Mozambique remaining one of the poorest countries in the world. Moreover, despite several institutional reforms and the emergence of new parties, Frelimo has constantly maintained political and economic dominance in the country. In 2013 this scenario and many pending issues that were not resolved with the peace agreement, in particular related to disarmament and demobilization, led to the resumption of violence by an armed faction of Renamo and its leader Dhlakama. A new peace agreement was signed in 2014, followed by renewed escalation of the conflict in 2015. In August 2019 a third peace deal was signed between Frelimo and Renamo. In October general elections took place, and, once more, Frelimo's candidate and current president, Filipe Nyusi, won. As widely shown in the news outlets, elections have been marked by violence and many irregularities, being contested by the opposition. It is unclear at the moment whether the peace deal will hold. Besides the contested elections, Renamo's has been fragmented after the death of its former leader, and an armed faction still threatens both the government and the current Renamo's leader.

Introduction

Mozambique gained its independence from Portugal in 1975 and was devastated by a protracted violent conflict between 1977 and 1992.

Notwithstanding the relative political stability since the signing of the peace accords, and the massive amount of foreign aid that flew to this country in the following two decades, Mozambique is still one of the poorest countries in the world, ranking 180 in the 2018 UNDP Human Development Index (UNDP 2019). Many of the problems this country faces today are reminiscent of unresolved issues that go back to the war as well as colonialism, and which were not resolved with the 1992 peace accords, in particular political centralism, inequality and lack of opportunities, and the shortcomings of a minimalist and incomplete process of security sector reform. All these contributed to the resumption of violence in 2013.

Colonialism and Early Independence

One of the key effects of colonialism in Mozambique was the institutionalization of several mechanisms of social stratification that affected the choice for a revolutionary alternative during the independence struggle. Before the arrival of the Portuguese, in 1498, Mozambique was organized into different communities with independent chieftaincies. This social structure was drastically affected by the arrival of the Portuguese, in particular from 1629, when the system of land grants called prazos was introduced. The prazo was a kind of feudal administrative scheme, which granted the settler the land and the responsibility to secure revenues and the local population's submission to the Portuguese administration (Newitt 1997). From the eighteenth century on, most of the revenues of the prazos came from the slave trade to Brazil and Cuba. After the slave trade was prohibited, most of the colonial profit came from the export of labor and transit fees to the region, in particular to South Africa, which was then undergoing a mineral revolution (Hall and Young 1997).

In 1930, following the coup d'état in Portugal, Salazar introduced a much more centralized system of administration, leading to a revision of the concession's system and forcing farmers in Mozambique to produce rice and cotton. In addition, a new law was introduced forcing the majority of African men to work as contract laborers for a state or private enterprise for at least 6 months to pay their taxes (Hanlon 1984). Salazar also introduced in 1953 the Regime do Indigenato (Indigenous Regime), dividing Africans and mulattos into two different groups: the assimilados (those who could read and write Portuguese, rejected “tribal” customs, and were employed in the capitalist economy) and the indigenas (the majority who were not considered citizens and remained subject to customary law) (Isaacman and Isaacman 1983). While virtually anyone could become an assimilado, in practice only a small minority was able to ascend to this status. Ironically, while the purpose of assimilation was to create a class of black Portuguese with the aim of preventing possible nationalist movements, it was the assimilados who were mostly exposed to the contrasts of inequality and racial prejudice, something that contributed to the increased discontent with and rejection of the colonial system.

After Salazar’s death, his successor Marcello Caetano introduced a series of reforms in order to delink the metropolitan economy from that of the African colonies, but by now the impetus toward independence was high and hard to contain. While resistance took place in many forms all throughout the colonial period, it was through the creation of Frelimo that the idea of independence through revolution took a more organized and concrete form. Frelimo was created in June 1962 as the fusion between several emerging movements, having Eduardo Mondlane as its first leader.

The anti-colonial war started officially in September 1964. Internal divisions within Frelimo were particularly acute during the first years, reaching a peak in the late 1960s. Following Mondlane’s death through a parcel bomb, Samora Machel assumed the leadership of the movement, consolidating its radical and revolutionary agenda. This ideological commitment permeated the many experiments of social engineering during the anti-colonial war, carried within the so-called liberated zones and which would set the basis of the post-independence agenda.

After years of intense fighting, independence ensued on June 25, 1975, precipitated by yet another coup d’état in Portugal. It was preceded by a series of meetings and accords, which laid the foundations for the progressive transfer of political and military power to Frelimo and provided the legal basis for the transition (Hall and Young 1997).

The same day Mozambique gained independence, Frelimo nationalized land and, 1 month later, the social sectors of law, medicine, education, and funeral services (Hall and Young 1997). While health and education showed overall impressive results, the effects of this radical agenda were far more controversial in the field of the economy. A major problem the new country faced was the massive exodus of white people, which resulted in the abandonment of virtually all existing businesses, the disappearance of most skilled and semi-skilled workers, and the creation of massive unemployment. Facing this pressure, Frelimo opted to seize the abandoned businesses starting a process of state intervention, but this did not prevent the radical fall of crop exports. The situation was hardened by natural calamities and got even worse when Frelimo decided to enforce the United Nations sanctions on Rhodesia, which was one of its most important trading partners.

The economic situation led Frelimo to rethink its agenda. The Party’s Third Congress in 1977 would provide a much more radical response to the crisis reflecting the party’s turn toward a Marxist-Leninist agenda. In practice this meant a strong commitment to fight imperialism, including internally, by tackling the colonial bourgeoisie, the small and middle internal bourgeoisie, as well as “marginal elements from the labouring classes, corrupted by the process and crimes of the colonial war” (Frelimo 1977). Key to this process was the expansion of Frelimo’s political base, which took place through several mechanisms, including the investment on the creation of mass democratic organizations, such as the Organization of the Mozambican Woman (OMM), the Mozambique Youth Movement (OJM), and the Production Councils. While these organizations created space for dialogue and reflection, they were also instrumenting to allow the progressive penetration of the party's ideology into the masses. What was called "democratic centralism" represented, in fact, the merging of party and state while ensuring a constant contact with the base (Hanlon 1991). The effects of this system were so pervasive that they are still present in contemporary Mozambique and greatly affect the quality of this country's democracy.

In the economy realm, Frelimo's strategy for industrialization was based on agricultural surplus and included, first, investing heavily in state farms and, second, investing in cooperative schemes along with the project of "villagization" – the building of the communal villages. These policies turned out to be extremely problematic, especially because they were distant from the reality of the rural population and revealed the actual gap that existed between the ideology of Frelimo and the values of everyday rural Mozambicans. Discontent was heightened by the fact that most of the communal villages were created with a high degree of compulsion under the pressure of the war and natural disasters. From 1978, there were also cases of forced villagization (Hanlon 1984; Abrahamsson and Nilsson 1995). These different dynamics influenced the development of the war at a later stage.

The 1977–1992 War

Understanding the war in Mozambique requires navigating through both the external facets that ignited and sustained the conflict and the internal dimensions related to the legacies of the colonial period and Frelimo's model of statebuilding. On the external front, the regional landscape played a key role. Being a socialist country surrounded by apartheid South Africa and white-dominated Rhodesia, Mozambique was perceived as a threat to the regional balance, particularly given its role in supporting other liberation movements. The creation of Renamo, the Mozambican National Resistance, which became the enemy of Frelimo, goes back to 1974, when an agreement was made between the Rhodesian Central Intelligence Organisation and Portugal. Renamo was meant to be a fifth column to spy on the Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) guerrillas based in Mozambique (Finnegan 1992). The first attacks from Rhodesia were a response to Mozambique's decision to apply sanctions to that country as well as its support for ZANU guerrillas. Later, Renamo's tasks were broadened to include the destruction of infrastructure, targeting the country's state apparatus.

At this stage, Renamo contingents included personnel of the elite black units of the Portuguese colonial forces, who fled Mozambique before or immediately after independence, and members of the Flechas unit (a counter-insurgency unit created by Portugal to fight Frelimo and controlled by the Rhodesian Intelligence) (Hall and Young 1997). These were later joined by inmates freed from Mozambican re-education camps, former Frelimo soldiers imprisoned for corruption who had guerrilla and military skills, as well as some régulos (local authorities).

In 1980, as the Rhodesian war ended, and black-ruled Zimbabwe emerged, Frelimo hoped that no further harm would come from this front. However, with the rise of the government of Prime Minister P. W. Botha, South Africa entered the phase of the doctrine of Total Strategy, which included the pursuit of an increasingly more aggressive war against the enemies of apartheid. As a result, an agreement between a South African military commander and his Rhodesian counterpart resulted in the transfer of Renamo to South Africa. With South Africa's massive investment, Renamo became a real machine of destabilization. By 1982 it had destroyed 840 schools, 12 health clinics, 24 maternity clinics, 174 health posts, 2 centers for the handicapped, and 900 shops as well as kidnapped 52 foreign technicians and killed 12 (Hall and Young 1997, p. 129).

Internationally, with the intensification of the Cold War and the policy of "constructive engagement" toward South Africa, the United States, while not officially supporting Renamo, cancelled all aid to Mozambique (Abrahamsson and Nilsson 1995). This posture was mirrored by other donors, who also refrained from sending aid, even in the face of the humanitarian crisis that took place in the early 1980s and which ended up killing 100,000 people by starvation (Hanlon 1991).

Trapped between the war, natural disasters, and lack of aid, Frelimo was forced to join the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) as a condition to be able to reschedule its debts and obtain relief aid. Another condition was to start peace negotiations with South Africa, leading to the signing of the Nkomati Accord in 1984, whereby Mozambique committed to stop supporting the anti-apartheid movement African National Congress and South Africa committed to stop supporting Renamo. South Africa, however, never complied with the accord. Instead, just a few months later, its aid to Renamo actually escalated (Hanlon 1991). Moreover, the resumption of aid did not compensate for the major loss in agricultural production (Abrahamsson and Nilsson 1995). In urgent need of credit, especially to import food, Mozambique entered the era of stabilization agreeing to its first structural adjustment in 1986 and shifting away from the socialist experiment. The side effects of aid and adjustment in Mozambique were multiple and included aid dependency, the undermining of the state's legitimacy, and market distortions. These further contributed to the war, by feeding local grievances.

Internally, one of the main problems faced by Frelimo was the contradictory relationship between its modernizing ideals and the values held by the peasantry. Frelimo's policies were based on Marxist ideologies, but in practice peasants and revolutionaries had different objectives; the former just wanted their land back from the colonizers, while the latter wanted a new society (Cahen 1987; Chingono 1996). The way the communal villages were implemented further fuelled the contradiction between ideology and reality. Geffray (1991), in his study of the district of Eráti in Nampula province, noticed that, while initially there was rural support for the implementation of the communal villages, this support highly diminished as people's displacement became more coercive; this further enhanced local conflict dynamics. This tension was compounded by the fact that land governance was de facto linked with the local authorities – the régulos – who in turn were stripped of their powers by Frelimo. This created resentment and, in the worst case, led some old régulos to support Renamo.

Other studies disputed the extent to which Geffray's analysis was generalizable to Mozambique as a whole. Roesch (1992), for instance, observed that very few communal villages in the province of Gaza were the result of coercive government actions. Manning (2002) furthermore showed that not everyone rejected how Frelimo stripped traditional authorities of their power, as, in many cases, the régulos were linked to the colonial abuses. According to O'Laughlin (1992) and Chingono (1996), more than the issue of identity, what was at stake in the war was Frelimo's strategy of accumulation based on wage-sectors, which undermined peasants' security, pushing them to the poverty zone.

Notwithstanding these different interpretations and internal variations of the relationship between Frelimo and the rural population, the fact is that Renamo consciously used the contradictions embedded in Frelimo's social transformative agenda in order to gain support. In particular, Renamo stressed its role as promoter of democracy and pluralism (a discourse that is still resonant today). Notwithstanding this, Renamo also relied heavily on violence and brutality to recruit soldiers. Indeed, most of Renamo's recruits were abducted and stayed in their camps under threats and extreme psychological pressure, punishment for escaping being usually death (Gersony 1988; Minter 1989). Also, all those who were captured had to spend several days as captives and testified to terrible acts of violence. Given the duration of the war and the intensity of violence that took place in Mozambique, it is remarkable how peace endured following the peace accords of 1992.

The Peace Process

The peace process in Mozambique was influenced by several factors. Firstly, with the demise of the Cold War, the United States increased its interest in fostering peace in Mozambique, whereas the Soviet Union drastically cut its military support to Frelimo. Regionally, the end of apartheid paved the way for the end of South Africa's support to Renamo. Zimbabwe, the main regional supporter of Frelimo, faced increasing internal contestation of its involvement in its neighbor's war. These factors, along with the constant droughts and the social economic effects of structural adjustment, had a major impact on the parties' capacity to pursue war eventually leading to a stalemate (Hume 1994). Internally, in 1989, Renamo held its first party congress kick-starting its progressive transformation from an armed faction into a political organization. The same year, Frelimo held its Fifth Party Congress officially calling off the socialist experiment and committing to promulgate a new constitution.

Negotiations between Frelimo and Renamo were pushed by a few members of the Protestant and Catholic churches, notably the Community of Sant'Egidio, and several neighbors (Kenya, Zimbabwe, later Botswana, and Malawi). Formal peace talks started in July 1989 and were later mediated by a collective body comprised of four observers from the Catholic Church and hosted by the Italian government culminating in the General Peace Agreement (GPA) on October 4, 1992. The UN was tasked to ensure and monitor its implementation. Donors had a major influence on the process contributing financially as well as with advice to each of the parties (Hume 1994; Syngé 1997).

The GPA consisted of seven protocols focused on military, political, and humanitarian issues and included a timetable for the elections and its monitoring mechanisms. While very comprehensive, it also contained several problems. In particular, many elements were not adequately discussed, including practical elements related to military questions, guarantees, and the ceasefire itself (Hume 1994; Syngé 1997). Despite this, and while critiques of UNOMOZ (the UN operation in Mozambique) abound (Syngé 1997), there is a general consensus that the mission was successful in ensuring the non-resumption of the armed conflict and in establishing a minimum level of trust between the parties in order for elections to take place in a stable environment.

The first Mozambican elections were set for October 27–28, 1994. Its final phase was marked by tensions and several incidents, including threats and allegations of intimidation. One day before the election, Renamo's leader, Afonso Dhlakama, announced a boycott stating that there were several irregularities in the process (Syngé 1997). However, the National Elections Commission decided that the election should go ahead and, at the last minute, extended the process for a third day. Notwithstanding the boycott, Mozambicans went to the poles in large numbers, leading Dhlakama to lift the boycott at the end of the second day. The results gave victory to Frelimo's candidate Joaquim Chissano with 53% of the presidential votes against 35% to Dhlakama. In the National Assembly, Frelimo won 129 seats against 112 for Renamo. The elections were considered fair overall by international observers (Syngé 1997). On December 9, 1994, Chissano was sworn in as president marking the end of the UNOMOZ mandate and the start of its withdrawal.

It is important to highlight that, if the formal negotiations were key to guarantee peace in Mozambique, so were the many local and civil society initiatives aiming at reconciliation. Differently from South Africans, Mozambicans ruled out the option of a truth commission and preferred, instead, to focus on forgiveness and social reintegration (Van Den Bergh 2009). The reasoning for this was the general understanding that punishment would only delay peace and it was very difficult at that stage to clearly separate victims and perpetrators of violence.

At the national level, the mass organizations played an important role in preparing people for peace. They joined the seminars promoted by the Association of European Parliamentarians in Africa (AWEPA) and the Christian Council of Mozambique (CCM) which aimed to explain the peace agreement and its implications for the daily lives of citizens (Van Den Bergh 2009). The churches also engaged in several activities at the grassroots level before and after the peace agreement.

At the local level, a series of endogenous initiatives for social reconciliation took place based on spiritual rituals for social reintegration. As the vast majority of the Mozambican population was rural, local rituals played a fundamental role in consolidating peace and promoting reconciliation as well as restoring communities and restabilizing social order. Honwana (1996) noted that these rituals were widespread after the war and often a precondition for social reintegration, e.g., for families to accept ex-child-soldiers back home. They were specifically important because they spoke the language of these communities being in line with their social cosmology and defining their identity and sense of belonging.

Peace Times

Until 2013, Mozambique had often been portrayed in the policy and academic literature as a peacebuilding success story. Three main reasons accounted for this label: firstly, unlike other countries that went through peace processes during that same period, in Mozambique the war did not resume after the signing of the peace accords; secondly, the previous rebel movement, Renamo, successfully transformed itself into a political party taking part in government; and thirdly, over the following 20 years, the country showed a remarkable level of economic recovery following the recommendations of the international financial institutions. This picture, however, says very little about the concrete effects of peace to everyday Mozambicans, especially the vast majority living in the rural areas. Under closer scrutiny, several indicators show that the peace dividend was in fact very asymmetrically distributed (Pitcher 2002; Hanlon and Smart 2008; Maschietto 2016). Additionally, important matters remained unresolved with the peace accords, in particular in the domain of the security sector reform. These events call into question the dominant view that reconciliation in Mozambique was ever successful; as Bueno (2019) observes, not only there exists a problem of inclusion that affects both the political and economic sphere, but also there has never been a systematic attempt to recreate a national narrative based on truth-seeking and justice. As discussed below, this scenario has progressively widened the conflictual dynamics that contributed to the resumption of violence in 2013.

The Development Landscape

Notwithstanding the steady positive economic indicators, notably an average of 7% GDP annual growth and relative low inflation rates over two decades, Mozambique never managed to become self-sufficient. The period of structural adjustment, which started during the war, hit harshly the social sector, and the rushed and fast-paced process of privatization led to a situation where a small bureaucratic elite (of Frelimo) suddenly became the new entrepreneurial class, contributing to strengthening the party's power (Hanlon 1996; Pitcher 2002). Additionally, the high influx of aid during this period also made Mozambique one of the most aid-dependent countries in the world bringing along serious problems of accountability, sovereignty, and sustainability.

In the second half of the 1990s, as the number of foreign investors in Mozambique increased, the country moved toward the phase of the so-called megaprojects concentrated mostly in the mineral sector. These projects have been criticized on their developing potential, in particular, because the contracted firms have major tax and fiscal exemptions leading to the loss of great potential state revenue, but also because the projects create few jobs, do not contribute to the diversification of the economy, and increase the country's economic vulnerability (Hanlon and Smart 2008; Cunguara 2012). The agricultural sector, which is crucial for the livelihoods of most of the population, has been neglected, compounding the still high level of poverty. As of today, Mozambique still depends on imports for most of its consumer goods including food, in particular from South Africa. Moreover, the Mozambican economy has suffered from extremely low international competitiveness, a situation magnified by the lack of adequate infrastructure, the inefficient government bureaucracy, and the poorly educated workforce all of which are worsened by the high levels of corruption.

Corruption has been indeed a central problem in Mozambique. One of the biggest challenges for fighting corruption is linked to the strong relationship between Frelimo and the overall functioning of the state apparatus, which has become stronger under President Guebuza (2005–2015). During this period, the distinction between the private and the public sphere has been increasingly blurred as the discovery of mineral resources in the country has created a major rush from several members of the government to create enterprises in order to control part of the extractive sector (Weimer et al. 2012).

Exemplar of the appropriation of the state for private interests was the recent scandal of the hidden debts. The scandal was revealed in 2016, when it became public that semi-public entities in the country (Mozambique Asset Management/MAM, ProIndicus, and the Mozambique Tuna Company EMATUM) had taken on debts backed by government guarantees without the approval of the National Assembly, which is against the law. The total debt surpassed one billion USD. Officially, the loan was taken to back the establishment of tuna fishing and maritime security business, but there were numerous flaws in the process and several schemes of corruption. The discovery of the loan led to the suspension of all general budget support from the G14 group of donors and was followed by an audit and the international investigation involving the banks which provided the loan (Credit Suisse and VTB). One of the main consequences of the hidden debts scandal has been the sudden slowdown of economic growth, leading to a default, not least due to the sudden decrease in foreign investment.

Complementing this complex macroeconomic picture is the everyday landscape of development. According to a 2018 World Bank report (Baez Ramirez et al. 2018), as of 2014/2015, the share of Mozambicans living below the poverty line was 48.4%, which means that there is a trend in poverty reduction. Nevertheless, it is also the case that in absolute terms the number of poor has increased from 11 million in 2002/2003 to 12.3 million in 2014/2015, largely due to the rapid population growth. According to the latest Human Development Report, Mozambique scored 0.437, staying at the very bottom of the ranking (180 out of 189 countries), along with countries such as Mali, Chad, South Sudan, and Niger (UNDP 2019). Poverty is compounded by the disconnection between the levels of economic growth and its redistribution, leading to high levels of inequality (Hanlon and Smart 2008; Baez Ramirez et al. 2018). Moreover, whereas for many years poverty reduction policies were conducted in line with the Action Plans for the Reduction of (Absolute) Poverty, the Mozambican versions of the World Bank/IMF Poverty Strategy Reduction Papers, critics have noticed that these policies have generally focused on the achievement of the MDGs leaving aside aspects such as how productivity (especially agriculture, the basic pillar of livelihood of most Mozambicans) may affect the former (Cunguara 2012). The result is the low level of competitiveness of the agricultural sector, which in turn affects the levels of poverty.

The State of Democracy

The economic and development landscape in Mozambique cannot be separated from the political scenario and the state of democracy. While formally being a multiparty democracy, the dominance of Frelimo since the peace accords has been a central feature of the political scenario. Frelimo's dominance is the result of several factors that enhance this party's ability to dominate the political landscape, including the rigid and hierarchic structure of the party, its high level of organization and resources as compared to the opposition, the very fragmentation of the opposition (which led to a split in Renamo and the creation of the second main opposition party, the Mozambican Democratic Movement, MDM, in 2009), Frelimo's control of the economy, and the fact that, while formally independent, the executive in fact dominates the legislative and the judiciary (Hanlon and Smart 2008; Morier-Genoud 2009; BTI 2018).

Frelimo's dominance is reflected in the elections. Since 1994 there have been general elections every 5 years (for president and the Assembly of the Republic and since 2009 for provincial Assemblies as well), and since 1998 elections have taken place also at the level of an increasing number of newly created municipalities. As of January 2020, Frelimo has won all presidential elections (1994, 1999, 2004, 2009, 2014, and 2019) as well as the majority of seats in Parliament and most municipal elections (1998, 2003, 2008, 2013, 2018) (although municipal elections have been much more contested and have provided more space for the opposition to consolidate its presence). With different degrees, irregularities have been reported in virtually all elections. These have included problems with the registration process, limitations of the freedom of assembly and movement, ballot box stuffing, and vote counting issues, among others detailed in the many issues of the Mozambique Political Process Bulletin, edited by Joseph Hanlon and the Public Integrity Centre since 1993, as well as by the media. These problems have been compounded by the politicized nature of the National Electoral Commission and its ability and effectiveness to oversee the electoral process, as well as by the highly uneven playing field between the parties, reflected in the discrepant access to resources for political campaigning that favors Frelimo (Manning 2010; Azevedo-Harman 2015).

The 1999 elections were particularly tense as the results were very narrowly in favor of Frelimo's candidate, then president Joaquim Chissano. This prompted Renamo to contest the results and led to a series of protests that ended in clashes with the police, 40 deaths during confrontation, and the subsequent death of over 80 prisoners in an overcrowded prison in Montepuez (Reuters 2000). The 2014 elections, also contested by Renamo, ended up intensifying the conflict that had resumed in 2013 and leading to an even more complex and violent election process in 2019 (see next section).

Political centralism has increased sharply during the presidency of Armando Guebuza. Indeed, during his two mandates, Guebuza strengthened the power of Frelimo by further merging the party and the state apparatus, including by turning a blind eye to corruption and the progressive control of the extractive sector by members of the Frelimo party (Weimer et al. 2012; Fael and Cortez 2013). Additionally, Guebuza adopted a strong confrontational stand toward Renamo, something that compounded the resumption of the conflict in 2013. Guebuza unsuccessfully tried to amend the constitution to run for a third term. Still, while unable to run again, and notwithstanding the split inside Frelimo between moderates and pro-Guebuza, he was able to influence the choice of the next Frelimo's candidate, former defense minister Filipe Nyusi, in an attempt to keep his influence strong in the forthcoming governments.

Political centralism in Mozambique directly affects the existing space for civil society to be active and effective. Since the introduction of the multiparty system, the number of civil society organizations (CSOs) has grown significantly; however, their effectiveness is hindered by a series of structural aspects, most of all the strong political competition between Frelimo and Renamo. Fear of intimidation, retaliation, and emotional unease, all affect the perception of freedom that individuals have to speak up their minds (Francisco et al. 2007; Maschietto 2016). This is enhanced by the fact that often CSOs do not have financial autonomy and their ability to function depends on the good will of the government bureaucracy.

More recently, constraints on political freedoms have been on the rise. Freedom of assembly has been infringed by the police on several occasions in recent years (BTI 2018). Freedom of expression has also been challenged repeatedly. In 2015, Carlos Nuno Castel-Branco, a renowned Mozambican academic, and Fernando Mbanze, editor of the independent newssheet Mediafax, faced trial in Maputo, due to an opinion post published on Facebook back in 2013, criticizing then president Guebuza and his administration. The post was interpreted by the State Prosecutor's Office as act of libel against the president, something classified as a crime against state security in Mozambique (Fauvet 2015). The trial unleashed strong reactions worldwide. Castel-Branco and Mbanze were eventually acquitted, but the fact that the trial happened in the first place was alarming. To make things worse, just 3 days before their trial, journalist Paulo Machava, editor and owner of the electronic newspaper Diário de Notícias, who was also organizing a manifestation to be held against the trial, was murdered while doing his morning exercises. He was shot by men who were following him in a vehicle (Reuters 2015). These and other episode contribute to a climate of pressure and fear among journalists and intellectuals in the country, resulting in a high degree of self-censorship.

At the level of the everyday, the gains arising from democracy are even more diffused and less clear, since the willingness to express oneself critically can have direct effects in terms of one's ability to have access to basic resources for their livelihood. This reflects an imbalance between the formal gains of civil liberties in contrast to the material benefits of democracy, which, in turn, affects the functioning of democracy (Maschietto 2016). As a large number of people do not have secure livelihood options, they feel the need to get attached to politics or silence criticism for fear of losing what is, in fact, their citizens' rights. This problem is further linked to the complex relation between citizenship and political culture in Mozambique. As Macamo suggests (2017, p. 4), as much as during colonialism, the idea of citizenship during independence was fundamentally based on the assumption that "individual liberty is a function of a national political project, and not necessarily inherent to the individuals themselves." Therefore, citizenship is not perceived as a natural individual right, but something that is only possible through the existence of the state, which, additionally, confers upon itself the right to determine what is "good" for everyone, a legacy from the liberation war.

The Shortcomings of the Security Sector Reform

The peacebuilding process in Mozambique has been characterized by a marked emphasis on economic development and political issues, in contrast to a much more modest engagement with the reform of the security sector (Lalá 2006). Unsurprisingly, security matters were the most sensitive in the context of the peace negotiations. The high level of distrust between the parties and the lack of adequate information along with the fear of mediators of ruining the progress of the negotiations eventually led to a situation where this realm was minimized in order to foster the peace accords.

Demobilization was particularly challenging. For starters, no party knew exactly how many troops they had and how many were killed during the war. Additionally, soldiers of the Armed Forces of Mozambique (FAM) were reluctant to give up arms until they were sure about the new process of recruitment. On top of this, and unexpectedly, soldiers of both sides were unwilling to enter the new army (Synge 1997; Van Den Bergh 2009). Demobilization eventually proceeded, and reintegration was pushed by the creation of a Reintegration Support Scheme (RSS) of monthly support for 2 years in cash, to be paid for 6 months by the government and 18 months by donors (Vines 2013).

The constitution of the new armed forces was a crucial element to ensure stability in the immediate after war. The creation of the new Armed Forces of Defence of Mozambique (FADM) needed to be in place before elections and work as a stabilizing force once the UN mission was concluded. Following the negotiations, the plan was for the FADM to be constituted by 30,000-strong army on the ground before the elections, 50% from each party. This number turned out to be far too optimistic and overstated the willingness of soldiers to reintegrate. In practice, the final selection of new soldiers amounted to 12,195 (8,533 from Frelimo and 3,662 from Renamo); this number was further reduced to 11,579 as there were too many middle-level officers, so some of the volunteers had to be demobilized (Vines 2013).

Disarmament was also highly resisted by both Frelimo and Renamo. Eventually, under pressure, a process of arms collection took place, but only 200,000 weapons were collected. These were handed over to the government and, according to records, only 24,000 have been destroyed (Leão 2004).

More broadly, looking at the long term, the security sector reform in Mozambique was based on three central aspects that included the training of a few battalions for the new armed forces, a clear institutional division between the armed forces and the Ministry of Defence, and the assurance that a civilian would serve as a minister and would report before Parliament. These were, nonetheless, limited targets to ensure the effectiveness and good governance of this sector (Lalá 2006). Notably, the reform remained largely limited to the defense arena, not including the police and the intelligence (and the integration of these sectors, including the integration of Renamo in the latter). This compounded other problems, such as the fact that, while the armed forces have always been subject to civilian (political) control (even before independence), the peace accords failed to democratize its oversight. Additionally, the transfer of ex-armed forces personnel to the police (especially for high command posts) led to Renamo's further suspicion and ultimately facilitated the tacit acceptance of Renamo's leader maintenance of a personal guard, which never disarmed (ibid.). As discussed below, these factors affected the resumption of violence 20 years after the peace agreement.

Renewed Conflict in 2013

The resumption of violence in 2013 must be understood along the persistent patterns of political centralism, the lack of proper redistribution of the peace dividend, the incomplete process of security sector reform, and the more recent discovery of mineral resources in the country.

The new surge of instability started in April 2012, when clashes between Renamo ex-combatants – Renamo's leader Dhlakama's "Presidential Guard" – and the government riot police took place in Nampula, then the residence of Dhlakama. On October 2012, Dhlakama moved to Gorongosa, where Renamo held its base during the war, making threats of resuming the war and dividing the country in two as well as urging a revision of the 1992 Peace Accords. In 2013, reacting to the electoral law approved in December 2012, Renamo started to engage in a series of activities which included ambushes on cars, lorries, and buses as well as military convoys; the blocking of one of the main transport arteries of the country; and the boycott of the 2013 municipal elections. Frelimo, then under the presidency of Guebuza, responded by resorting to military power in order to contain these actions, but at the same time it pushed for negotiations, emphasizing a conciliatory speech and the primacy of peace.

On October 17, 2013, the army occupied a Renamo's base, where many members were gathered to commemorate the anniversary of the death of the movement's first leader, Matsangaissa. Soon afterward, Dhlakama pulled out of the 1992 Peace Accords. This situation alarmed Mozambicans, many of whom started to flee from the region where the clashes were taking place. According to a Chatham House Report, all through 2013 at least 60 people were killed and more than 300 injured (Vines et al. 2015, p. 23). After months of clashes, Renamo actually succeeded in changing the electoral law making a much criticized deal with Frelimo that was later endorsed in Parliament and which marked a significant setback in the democratic procedures that regulated the National Elections Commission and its executive secretariat. This deal maintained the politicized nature of the National Elections Commission, in charge of organizing the 2014 elections, only altering the number of members of each party and the total number of members (5 would be from Frelimo, 4 from Renamo, 1 from MDM, and the remaining 5 from civil society) and excluding from the body an attorney appointed by the Higher Council of the Public Prosecutor's Office (Fauvet 2014). The deal further politicized the Electoral Administration Technical Secretariat (STAE), the executive body responsible for implementing the elections, which now would also include political appointees. Finally, the deal was agreed without previous consultation to the National Assembly, only later submitted for approval in the context of the urgent "spirit of reconciliation," which, ultimately, led to the concession of most of Renamo's requests.

Still, clashes continued, and only after several rounds of negotiations, on August 24, a ceasefire was agreed upon, followed by a peace agreement on September 4, just ahead of the 2014 elections. The agreement included amnesty to all Renamo members from 2012 until the date of the accord, and Dhlakama agreed on a plan of progressive incorporation of Renamo ex-combatants into the Armed Forces and the police. Yet, many important items remained to be negotiated, in particular, specific aspects related to security and defense, the separation of the state apparatus from the political parties, and unspecified economic matters included in the agenda.

Notwithstanding what seemed an initial victory of Renamo and its insurgency, the 2014 October elections did not pave well for this party. Filipe Nyusi won the presidency with 57% of the votes and Frelimo won 144 seats in the National Assembly. Dhlakama obtained 37% of the votes and Renamo got 89 seats. MDM candidate Daviz Simango won 6% of the votes, and the party got 17 seats in the National Assembly (Mozambique Political Process Bulletin 2014). Both Dhlakama and Simango rejected the results, and in January 2015, Renamo boycotted the opening of the National Assembly. Additionally, Dhlakama demanded that provincial autonomy was given to the provinces where Renamo had won the majority of votes (Nampula, Zambézia, Tete, Manica, and Sofala), bringing decentralization at the heart of the conflict agenda. In Mozambique, the provincial governors are appointed by the central government. This is due to the bifurcated decentralization system in this country, which provides devolution power only to the municipalities (which have been created gradually), while the provinces and districts have deconcentrated administrative powers. Dhlakama's demands were turned into a bill proposed by Renamo in the National Assembly, only to be rejected based on its supposed unconstitutionality. At the time, constitutionalist lawyer Gilles Cistac contested this argument publicly, something that cost his life (he was murdered in March that year, in what was considered a politically motivated assassination) (Ganho 2016).

These events led to the escalation of the conflict, the resumption of violence, and several clashes between Renamo and state forces through 2015 and 2016. In December 2016 Dhlakama announced an unexpected truce, which was extended a few times, until it was extended indefinitely in May 2017. In the meantime, peace talks resumed, fostered by a Contact Group created by president Nyusi, which included several international governments. In 2018 an agreement was finally reached between Nyusi and Dhlakama, including a decentralization agreement incorporating constitutional amendments and the signature of a memorandum of understanding on military affairs allowing for the launch of a second DDR process (AIM 2018; Kössler 2018). Dhlakama never saw the approval of the constitutional amendment, passing away on May 3 that same year due to health issues. According to the amendment, mayors, provincial governors, and district administrators will be appointed by whichever political party win a majority in the municipal, provincial, or district assembly. While providing space for more participation of the opposition in the country's politics, the amendment also transferred political power from voters to the parties. This was a setback to democracy, but politically the agreement paid off. Following the death of Dhlakama, the presidency of Renamo passed to Ossufo Momade and in August 2018 Momade and Nyusi signed a new DDR agreement. A final peace deal was signed the next year, on August 6, 2019, followed by general elections in October.

Current Situation

The leading up to the general elections held in October 2019 was probably the tensest so far in Mozambique and was condemned by many actors, including the Mozambican civil society, the European Union, and Human Rights Watch. There were several episodes of abuses, such as the arbitrary arrest of opposition candidates and violations of the right of peaceful assembly (CIP 2019b; Wan 2019). Also, about 300,000 ghost voters had been registered in the province of Gaza (Pitcher 2019).

Many episodes of violence also took place from supporters of all parties and included attacks to houses, beatings, and arsons. A shocking episode was the assassination of a leading civil society election observer, Anastácio Matavel, who was shot ten times by men in a driving car. Matavel was just coming out of a training session for other national observers in Xai-Xai, Gaza province, and the event took place about a week before the elections. As the car crashed soon afterward, killing two of the five men, it was soon discovered that four of them were members of the national police force. These and many other episodes were covered in length by the media and summarized in several editions of the Mozambique Political Process Bulletin.

In this context, Frelimo's victory was not surprising, although the margin of victory was astonishing: Filipe Nyusi won the presidency with 73%; Frelimo gained 184 of 250 parliament seats, while Renamo won 60 (losing 19 as compared to the previous government) and MDM only 6 (as opposed to 17 it previously had) (CIP 2019a). Frelimo further won all 10 governorship and 628 seats in provincial assemblies, compared to 156 for Renamo and 10 for MDM (ibid.).

At the time of writing, the results are still being contested, and many actors, including the Mozambican civil society, have released critical statements about the electoral process, not least of all the posture of the National Elections Committee and of the Constitutional Council. There is no perspective, though, that contestations will lead to any significant change in terms of political power redistribution. The question to be asked is how this scenario will impact the dynamics of violence that have formally stopped with the 2019 peace agreement. And here the perspective is not optimistic.

For starters, there is the problem of Renamo's fragmentation. The choice of Ossufo Momade as new leader of Renamo following Dhlakama's death was not accepted by all factions within Renamo. A self-denominated Renamo Military Junta, led by Mariano Nhongo (who proclaimed himself president of Renamo), is active and has called for a revision of the peace agreements signed in 2019 by Momade. Nhongo further stated that he will never recognize the leadership of Momade (even though the latter has been elected as party leader during a Renamo's congress) and has claimed responsibility for several attacks taking place in central Mozambique after the elections (although he denied responsibility for previous attacks) (AIM 2019b). So far it is unclear the actual support that Nhongo has and what will be the Junta's role in the new political scenario.

Besides this, another major problem today in Mozambique, which is not directly connected with the old Renamo-Frelimo rivalry, but which affects conflict and peace dynamics, is the occurrence of several attacks and brutal violence in the northern province of Cabo Delgado, where a radical Islamic group that calls itself Al-Shabaab has operated since the end of 2017. The group has been carrying attacks that include beheadings and burning houses, terrorizing the population of several districts in Cabo Delgado. A recent report on the matter (Habibe et al. 2019) notices that this group has links with networks of the Somali-based jihadist group Al-Shabaab. Nonetheless, as also noted in the report, access to this group and research in the regions where attacks have taken place are extremely difficult, many journalists having been detained. The government of Mozambique has denied any links of this group with international terrorist networks and has taken a hard-line stance on the matter, something that resulted in clashes and death tolls on both sides, as well as of civilians. How this will develop, and how it will affect the government, its resources, and the overall investment in defense, is to be seen.

On top of this, there are still pending issues from the peace agreement that need to be resolved, demobilization and reintegration being a case in point. An initial deadline to dismantle the residual forces of Renamo was August 21, 2019, but while this process started, it stalled as the focus went to the electoral process (AIM 2019a). Giving the split inside Renamo, it is not clear how many armed men will be in fact disarmed and reintegrated.

Summary

After being considered a successful case of peacebuilding for 20 years, violence has resumed in Mozambique, driven by several unresolved issues that go back to the 1992 peace accords, but also bringing new elements related to the way democracy has materialized in this country, not least of all by maintaining a very asymmetrical distribution of the peace dividend.

It is too soon to assess the extent to which peace will endure this time. It seems important though to stress a major difference between the 1992 peace agreement context and the current one: if in 1992 there was a clear war fatigue and many hopes toward peace, the current setting is one of disillusionment with the peace that came through. This general disillusionment has many facets. For starters, while Renamo military wing had several ex-combatants, there are indications that there has been new recruitment of fresh participants (Vines 2019), which suggests that armed violence is not just residual, but may be seen as still an option for political change by part of the population.

While there is no doubt that unresolved issues from the past have influenced the current scenario, it is also the case that new elements are at play, particularly related to the distribution of the country's wealth. It should be noted that other forms of violence are also present in Mozambique that have not necessarily been analyzed within a context of "violent conflict" and which, nevertheless, are important components of the current scenario. In fact, over the last years, different forms of violence have been on the rise, notably lynching, kidnapping for ransom (which involve highly sophisticated organized crime networks), politically motivated violence, and attacks to local authorities in different districts, besides the attacks in Cabo Delgado (Faleg 2019). While apparently different in nature, these different manifestations of violence can be analyzed as indicating the complex relationship between society and the state and the constant dispute regarding what are the parameters of legitimacy of the social contract. Some of them can further be seen as extensions of the violence from war times now assuming a new shape (Bertelsen 2016). Importantly, they point to the dispersion of power and power contestation, something that can be heightened in periods of social distress and in contexts of increased perceived inequality – something that in the case of Mozambique is further accentuated by the recent discovery of mineral resources and the competition for its control and management (Weimer forthcoming).

In summary, understanding the different dynamics of violence in Mozambique – beyond the main stage of political conflict – and the prospects for a more inclusive and just peace requires engaging with the different layers of the political, social, and economic changes and continuities which are at the heart of the continuous process of state and nation-building. If anything, the Mozambican case shows that peacebuilding success cannot be measured in a short time span of 5 or 10 years after peace agreements are signed. On the contrary, the sustainability of peace is conditioned by the serious addressment of structural issues and the more equalized distribution of the peace dividend.

Cross-References

- ▶ Colonialism
- ▶ Mediation
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ South Africa

References

- Abrahamsson, H., & Nilsson, A. (1995). Mozambique. The troubled transition. From socialist construction to free market capitalism. London: Zed Books.
- Agência de Informação de Moçambique (AIM). (2018). Mozambique: Government and Renamo sign memorandum on military issues, 17 August. <https://allafrica.com/stories/201808100615.html>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Agência de Informação de Moçambique (AIM). (2019a). Mozambique: Police training of ex-Renamo Guerrillas ends, 4 December. https://allafrica.com/stories/201912041079.html?aa_source=nwsltr-mozambique-en. Accessed 16 Jan 2019.
- Agência de Informação de Moçambique (AIM). (2019b). Mozambique: Resignation of Momade is price of peace, says Nhongo, 30 December. https://allafrica.com/stories/201912310176.html?aa_source=nwsltr-mozambique-en. Accessed 16 Jan 2019.
- AWEPA. (2014). Mozambique political process bulletin (2014), 56, 28 November, edited by Joe Hanlon. http://www.open.ac.uk/technology/mozambique/sites/www.open.ac.uk.technology/mozambique/files/files/Mozambique_Bulletin_56_Election_results_2014%281%29.pdf. Accessed 7 April 2020.
- Azevedo-Harman, E. (2015). Patching things up in Mozambique. Journal of Democracy, 26(2), 139–150.
- Baez Ramirez, J. E., Caruso, G. D., Niu, C., & Myers, C. A. (2018). Mozambique poverty assessment: Strong but not broadly shared growth: Overview (English).

- Washington, DC: World Bank Group. <http://documents.worldbank.org/curated/en/377881540320229995/Overview>
- Bertelsen, B. E. (2016). Violent becomings. State formation, sociality, and power in Mozambique (Ethnography, theory, experiment). New York/Oxford: Berghahn.
- Bertelsmann Stiftung (BTI). (2018). Mozambique country report. Gütersloh: Bertelsmann Stiftung. <http://www.bti-project.org>. Accessed 15 Sept 2019.
- Bueno, N. (2019). Reconciliation in Mozambique: Was it ever achieved? Conflict, Security & Development, 19 (5), 427–452.
- Cahen, M. (1987). La Revolution Implosée. Études sur 12 ans d'Indépendance (1975–1987). Paris: L'Harmattan.
- Centro de Integridade Pública (CIP). (2019a). Mozambique political process bulletin, 2019 General Elections, 87, 27 October.
- Centro de Integridade Pública (CIP). (2019b). Mozambique political process bulletin, 2019 General Elections, 90, 10 November.
- Chingono, M. F. (1996). The state, violence and development: The political economy of war in Mozambique, 1975–1992. Aldershot/Brookfield: Ashgate.
- Cunguara, B. (2012). An exposition of development failures in Mozambique. Review of African Political Economy, 39, 161–170.
- Fael, B., & Cortez, E. (2013). Controlo da corrupção não foi prioridade na agenda da governação no período 2005–2013. In CIP Newsletter, Boa Governação, Transparência e Integridade (Vol. 19). Maputo: Centro de Integridade Pública de Moçambique. <http://www.cip.org.mz/article.asp?lang=&sub=news&docno=272>. Accessed 15 Mar 2014.
- Faleg, G. (2019). Conflict prevention in Mozambique. Can there be peace after the storm? Conflict Series Prevention, Brief 5, April. European Union Institute for Security Studies. <https://www.iss.europa.eu/content/conflict-prevention-mozambique>. Accessed 14 February 2020.
- Fauvet, P. (2014). Assembly sitting begins, with election laws top of agenda, AIM, 19 February. http://allafrica.com/stories/201402200250.html?aa_source=newsltr-mozambique-en. Accessed 27 Feb 2014.
- Fauvet, P. (2015). Mozambique: Academic and journalist in the dock over Facebook post. African Arguments. <https://africanarguments.org/2015/09/02/mozambique-academic-and-journalist-in-the-dock-over-facebook-post/>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Finnegan, W. (1992). A complicated war: The harrowing of Mozambique. Berkeley/Los Angeles/London: University of California Press.
- Francisco, A., Mucavele, A., Monjane, P., Seuane, S. (2007). Mozambican civil society within: Evaluation, challenges, opportunities and action. Civil Society Index, Mozambique. Foundation for Community Development (trans: Rabelo, P.). http://www.iese.ac.mz/lib/af/pub/CSI%20Moz%2007%20english_.pdf. Accessed 10 February 2020.
- Frelimo. (1977). Guidelines for a people's democracy. Document prepared for the Mozambican Liberation Movement's 3rd Congress in February 1977. <https://www.politicsweb.co.za/opinion/frelimos-1977-guide-lines-for-a-peoples-democracy>. Accessed 16 Sept 2019.
- Ganho, A. (2016). The murder of Gilles Cistac: Mozambique's future at a crossroads. Review of African Political Economy, 43(147), 142–150.
- Geffray, C. (1991). A causa das armas. Antropologia da guerra contemporânea em Moçambique (A. Odete Ferreira, Trans.). Porto: Edições Afrontamento.
- Gersony, R. (1988). Summary of Mozambican refugees accounts of principally conflict-related experience in Mozambique. Washington, DC: Bureau for Refugee Programs, US Department of State.
- Habibe, S., Forquilha, S., & Pereira, J. (2019). Islamic radicalization in Northern Mozambique. The case of Mocimboa da Praia, Cadernos IESE, 17. <http://www.iese.ac.mz/cadernos-17-eng/>
- Hall, M., & Young, T. (1997). Confronting leviathan. Mozambique since independence. London: Hurst and Company.
- Hanlon, J. ([1984] 1990). Mozambique. The revolution under fire (Fourth impression). London: Zed Books.
- Hanlon, J. (1991). Mozambique. Who calls the shot? London/Bloomington/Indianapolis: James Currey/Indiana University Press.
- Hanlon, J. (1996). Peace without profit. How the IMF blocks rebuilding in Mozambique (African issues). Oxford/Portsmouth: James Currey/Heinemann.
- Hanlon, J., & Smart, T. (2008). Do bicycles equal development in Mozambique? Suffolk/Rochester: James Currey.
- Honwana, A. (1996). Sealing the past, facing the future: Trauma healing in rural Mozambique. In Accord, an international review of peace initiatives, the Mozambican peace process in perspective (pp. 75–81). London: Conciliation Resources.
- Hume, C. (1994). Ending Mozambique's war. The role of mediation and good offices. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Isaacman, A., & Isaacman, B. (1983). Mozambique: From colonialism to revolution, 1900–1982. Boulder: Westview, Aldershot, G. Gower.
- Kössler, K. (2018, December 20). Conflict and decentralization in Mozambique: The challenges of implementation. ConstitutionNet. <http://constitutionnet.org/news/conflict-and-decentralization-mozambique-challenges-implementation>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Lalá, A. A. (2006). Democratic governance and security sector reform: Realities from post-war Mozambique. Nação e Defesa, 104, 35–60.
- Leão, A. (2004). Weapons in Mozambique. Reducing availability and demand. Institute for Security Studies Monographs. <https://journals.co.za/content/ismono/2004/94>. Accessed 14 February 2020.
- Macamo, E. (2017). Power, conflict, and citizenship: Mozambique's contemporary struggles. Citizenship

- Studies*, 21(2), 196–209. As times goes by or how far till Banjul: African citizenship aspirations.
- Manning, C. (2002). The politics of peace in Mozambique. Post-conflict democratization, 1992–2000. Westport/London/Connecticut: Praeger.
- Manning, C. (2010). Mozambique's slide into one-party rule. Journal of Democracy, 21(2), 151–165.
- Maschietto, R. H. (2016). Beyond peacebuilding. The challenges of empowerment promotion in Mozambique (Rethinking peace and conflict studies). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Minter, W. (1989). The Mozambican National Resistance (Renamo) as described by ex-participants. Research report submitted to Ford Foundation and Swedish International Development Agency, Washington, DC.
- Morier-Genoud, E. (2009). Mozambique since 1989. Shaping democracy after socialism. In A. R. Mustapha & L. Whitfield (Eds.), Turning points in African democracy (pp. 153–166). Suffolk: James Currey.
- Newitt, M. (1997). História de Moçambique. Sintra: Publicações Europa-América.
- O'Laughlin, B. (1992). Interpretation matter: Evaluating the war in Mozambique. Southern Africa Report, 7, 23–33.
- Pitcher, A. M. (2002). Transforming Mozambique. The politics of privatization, 1975–2000. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Pitcher, A. (2019, October 23). Mozambique's elections saw violence, vote rigging and a landslide victory for the Frelimo party. The Washington Post. <https://www.washingtonpost.com/politics/2019/10/23/mozambique-s-elections-saw-violence-vote-rigging-landslide-victory-frelimo-party/>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Reuters. (2000, November 24). The deaths of 82 in Mozambique jail are called mysterious. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2000/11/24/world/the-deaths-of-82-in-mozambique-jail-are-called-mysterious.html>. Accessed 14 Feb 2010.
- Reuters. (2015, August 31). Mozambique journalist is shot dead while jogging. The Guardian. <https://www.theguardian.com/media/greenslade/2015/aug/31/mozambique-journalist-is-shot-dead-while-jogging>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Roesch, O. (1992). Renamo and the peasantry in Southern Mozambique: A view from Gaza province. Canadian Journal of African Studies, 26(3), 462–484.
- Synge, R. (1997). Mozambique. UN peacekeeping in action, 1992–94. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- United Nations Development Program (UNDP). (2019). Human development reports. Mozambique. <http://hdr.undp.org/en/countries/profiles/MOZ>. Accessed 10 Feb 2020.
- Van den Bergh, L. (2009). Why peace worked. Mozambicans look back. Amsterdam: Association of European Parliamentarians with Africa (AWEPA).
- Vines, A. (2013). Renamo's rise and decline: The politics of reintegration in Mozambique. International Peacekeeping, 20(3), 375–393.
- Vines, A. (2019). Prospects for a sustainable elite bargain in Mozambique. Third time lucky? (Research paper). London: Chatham House.
- Vines, A., Thompson, H., Jensen, S. K., & Azevedo-Harman, E. (2015). Mozambique to 2018 managers, mediators and magnates, Chatham House report. The Royal Institute of International Affairs. <https://www.chathamhouse.org/publication/mozambique-2018>. Accessed 15 Feb 2020.
- Wan, J. (2019, November 14). Mozambique: An unexpected landslide, an expected crisis. African Arguments. <https://africanarguments.org/2019/11/14/mozambique-elections-frelimo-unexpected-landslide-expected-crisis/>. Accessed 14 Feb 2020.
- Weimer, B. (forthcoming). Vampires, jihadists and state violence in Mozambique. Reflections on violent manifestations of local discontent and their implications for peacebuilding. Maputo, IESE.
- Weimer, B., Macuane, J. J., & Buur, L. (2012). A economia do political settlement em Moçambique: Contexto e implicações da descentralização. In: Weimer, B. (Org.), Moçambique: descentralizar o centralismo. Economia política, recursos e resultados (pp. 31–75). Maputo: IESE.

Muhammad

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Multiple Missions

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations

Multiple Operations

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations

Music Reconciliation = Social Cohesion

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Mysticism

- ▶ Islam and Peace

N

National Identity Formation

- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

Nationalism

- ▶ Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis
- ▶ Identity and Political Violence

NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding

Thierry Tardy
NATO Defense College, Rome, Italy

Introduction

Peace operations and peacebuilding are about policies and state and non-state actors that get involved in these policies. As a military alliance established to deter and defend against the Soviet Union during the Cold War, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) is not intuitively associated with the notions of peace operations and peacebuilding.

With the end of the Cold War though, NATO embraced a broad crisis management agenda that led the organization to run what it calls peace support operations, from the Balkans to Afghanistan and even Libya. Those missions have shed light on the Organization's nature, combining a mix of a "liberal peace" aspiration with a more traditional Realpolitik agenda. Although NATO would not easily refer to those missions as being about peacebuilding, what peace support operations are supposed to do is largely about creating the security conditions for peace to be built.

In this context, the 2014 Russian aggression in Ukraine led NATO to come back to its fundamental, though dormant, collective defense mandate. Simultaneously, NATO's crisis management agenda became secondary.

As of 2016, NATO conceptualized the notion of "projecting stability" as a core task, alongside collective defense. In many ways, projecting stability is a new phrase for crisis management and contains an important peacebuilding dimension. But NATO's aspiration to play a key role in projecting stability, most notably towards its southern periphery, is also facing conceptual, political, and operational challenges. NATO wants to contribute to building peace worldwide, but its record, added-value, or local perception show a more complex picture.

NATO's Peace Concept: Definitions

Although NATO has been involved in a variety of peace operations since the early 1990s, conceptual thinking about "peace operations" or “peacebuilding” has remained limited within the institution, and overall those two terms are not germane to NATO parlance.

Back in the 1990s, NATO referred to “peace support operations,” “crisis response operations,” and to the broad term of “crisis management” to refer to operations launched outside the framework of article 5 of the Washington Treaty (so-called non-article 5 operations). A few months before the Atlantic Alliance engaged in former Yugoslavia (see below), the 1991 Strategic Concept asserted that “In the event of crises which might lead to a military threat to the security of Alliance members, the Alliance’s military forces can complement and reinforce political actions within a broad approach to security, and thereby contribute to the management of such crises and their peaceful resolution” (NATO 1991).

The 1999 Strategic Concept referred to the Alliance’s “commitment, exemplified in the Balkans, to conflict prevention and crisis management, including through peace support operations,” which reflected NATO’s determination to “shape its security environment and enhance the peace and stability of the Euro-Atlantic area.” (NATO 1999).

Ten years later, the 2010 Strategic Concept made “crisis management” one of the three core tasks of NATO, together with collective defense and cooperative security; crisis management is defined as a mix of political and military tools to “help manage developing crises that have the potential to affect Alliance security, before they escalate into conflicts; to stop ongoing conflicts where they affect Alliance security; and to help consolidate stability in postconflict situations where that contributes to Euro-Atlantic security” (NATO 2010). The term “stabilization operations” is also often referred to in particular in the Afghan context (and in reference to the US terminology) to capture the role of the military in contributing to negative peace (Sloan 2016).

These broad definitions do not refer to “peacebuilding” per se yet NATO’s activity in crisis management includes the task of contributing to building peace in an unstable environment.

In 2001, a NATO document titled “Peace Support Operations” stated that these operations are “designed to tackle the complex emergencies and robust challenges posed by collapsed or collapsing states in an uncertain and evolving strategic environment”; they “involve military forces, diplomatic and humanitarian agencies and are designed to achieve a long-term political settlement or other specified condition.” These operations also involve a “spectrum of activities, which may include Peace Enforcement and Peacekeeping as well as Conflict Prevention, Peacemaking, Peace Building and Humanitarian Relief” (NATO 2001).

At its core, while NATO’s conception of peace support operations is inherently military-focused, and potentially coercive, it is not fundamentally dissimilar from what other actors such as the UN or the EU do in their respective peace operations. Peace support operations are multifunctional and multilayered activities; insofar as NATO primarily offers the military component of a broader international response, that component is aimed at “creating the necessary conditions for other organisations to do their work and so create a stable, self-sustaining secure environment” (NATO 2001).

In legal terms, with the exception of NATO’s operation against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in 1999, all NATO peace support operations have been legally grounded in a UNSC Resolution. Formally, the large NATO peace support operations such as IFOR/SFOR in Bosnia-Herzegovina, KFOR in Kosovo, or ISAF in Afghanistan have also been deployed with the consent of the host states.

NATO Embraces Crisis Management

The Balkans

NATO was created in 1949 as a collective defense organization, i.e., a military alliance aimed to deter any potential enemy to take aggressive action against NATO’s member states and to collectively defend its member states if attacked. Throughout the Cold War, the collective defense mandate prevailed and prevented any scenario involving NATO troops in any form of peace operation; this, during the Cold War, was simply not NATO’s job.

Among many other strategic effects, the end of the Cold War fundamentally altered NATO's raison d'être and policy (Yost 1998). The collapse of the Soviet Union deprived NATO of its enemy, and with it of its central collective defense mandate. As there was no longer any threat to defend against, why would NATO continue to do collective defense, except as a general, and secondary, insurance policy? This was reflected in academic and policy debates by suggestions of a potential demise of NATO, for lack of a raison d'être (Mearsheimer 1990; McCalla 1996).

In parallel, the evolution of the European security environment in the early 1990s, in particular the Yugoslav conflicts, was conducive to a positioning by NATO that, practically, gave it a new role. As of the second half of 1992, while war was raging in Bosnia-Herzegovina (and had stopped for a while in Croatia), NATO became involved in the management of these conflicts, initially through its contribution to the implementation of economic embargoes in the Adriatic Sea and no-fly zones over the territory of Bosnia-Herzegovina, and then through more kinetic activities (Schulte 1997; Kaufman 2002). In 1995, NATO conducted air strikes against the Serbian forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina, leading to the opening of peace talks and eventually to the signature of the Dayton Peace Accords. NATO then deployed a 55,000 strong force (Implementation Force, IFOR) to contribute to the implementation of the Accord.

A few years later, the Atlantic Alliance engaged in an air campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia to put an end to president Milosevic's repressive policy against the Kosovar population in Serbia. The operation was run on humanitarian grounds, but with no UN Security Council backing, which arguably undermined both its legality and legitimacy (Mandelbaum 1999; Roberts 1999). The operation also marked a shift away from peace support to open coercion. Contrary to the UN or the European Union, NATO's conception of crisis management includes war-type activities (as will be seen in Afghanistan and Libya), which can furthermore take place outside of a solid international law framework if deemed necessary (Frantzen 2004).

NATO's war-fighting operation was followed by a more traditional peacekeeping-type mission deployed in Kosovo as of June 1999 (KFOR) and still operating in 2019 (Mulchinock 2017).

Overall, the 1990s transformed NATO into a peacekeeping actor; and – with the above-mentioned noticeable difference with the UN/EU on coercion – NATO's peacekeeping role is comparable to what other peacekeeping actors do.

NATO's Crisis Management, from Afghanistan to Libya

The 911 events in New York and Washington led to the first ever invocation of the Washington Treaty's article 5 (that says that an attack on one NATO member is considered as an attack on all). Yet NATO as an Alliance was not involved in the military operation ('Enduring Freedom') launched by the US and a few other states against the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in the fall of 2001. In parallel with Operation Enduring Freedom, a Stabilization operation was created in Afghanistan by a coalition of states; this operation, called International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), was then taken over by NATO in August 2003.

This marked a qualitative evolution of NATO's role in crisis management. Through ISAF, not only did NATO move far from Europe to embrace a more global role but it also ran a new kind of operations, combining traditional peacekeeping and more robust counter-insurgency tasks. ISAF closed the debate about NATO's out-of-area operations, while opening new discussions about the Comprehensive Approach and the necessity to make security and development actors work together, NATO's value-promotion mandate, and the nature of NATO's defense posture (Morelli and Belkin 2009; Rynning 2012; Auerswald and Saideman 2014).

NATO's crisis management role was then further tested in Libya in 2011. In the context of the so-called Arab Springs that unfolded in Tunisia and then Egypt in 2010, Western powers, most specifically France and the UK, advocated for a military operation against Libya's Qaddafi aimed at protecting the civilian population under the threat of massive violations of human rights (Weighill and Gaub 2018). The operation was authorized by the UN Security Council (UNSC Res. 1973 of 17 March 2011). It was launched on humanitarian grounds, in reference to the “Responsibility to Protect” norm (Hehir and Murray 2013); yet the shift in the objective from civilian protection to regime change, and the subsequent overthrow and killing of Qaddafi was largely interpreted as misuse of the norm (Carati 2017).

Furthermore, the destabilization of Libya that followed – and its spill-over effects on the Sahel region – made any argument by which NATO acts as a security provider or peacebuilder difficult to support. In lieu of projecting stability, NATO could also be, even if unintentionally, projecting instability.

The Return of Power Politics, NATO's Crisis Management Loses Precedence

The Ukraine Moment

2014 marks a turning point in NATO's role as a crisis management actor. On the one hand, NATO puts an end to the largest crisis management operation ever run by the Alliance – the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan – after 11 years of presence. The Alliance remains in Afghanistan with its Resolute Support Mission, a noncombat operation mandated to support the Afghan armed and security forces.

On the other hand, NATO's posture and post-Cold War trajectory is altered by Russia's invasion and annexation of Crimea in the spring of 2014. This event leads to a significant reorientation of NATO's policy, back to the original collective defense mandate, and away from the crisis management agenda (Moore and Damon 2017).

At the NATO Summit that follows the Ukraine crisis, the Allies adopt a Readiness Action Plan (RAP) that aims at responding to the “challenges posed by Russia and their strategic implications.” Officially, the Plan is both about collective defense and crisis management, yet in reality the focus is ostensibly on the strengthening of NATO's defense posture vis-à-vis Russia (NATO 2014). The RAP includes so-called assurance measures and adaptation measures. The assurance measures include continuous air, land, and maritime presence and meaningful military activity in the eastern part of the Alliance, both on a rotational basis. Adaptation measures are about the responsiveness of NATO's forces, in particular the NATO Response Force (NRF), and how they could be used in the hypothesis of an escalation with Russia. In November 2014, NATO Secretary General Jens Stoltenberg states that the Readiness Action Plan is “the biggest reinforcement of our collective defence since the end of the Cold War. And it is my top priority to implement this plan in full and on time” (Stoltenberg 2014).

Crisis Management's Lost Relevance?

One consequence of this reorientation is that NATO's crisis management role becomes secondary. Two reasons explain this evolution. One is the prominence of collective defense in the context of the resurgence of a potentially aggressive Russia. The salience of the Russian threat makes it politically difficult for NATO to focus on two simultaneous tasks, and crisis management suffers as a consequence. This is especially the case as crisis management is sometimes perceived as less of a strategic necessity than the territorial integrity of NATO member states.

The second reason has to do with crisis management as an activity and what it means for NATO. Taking the operations in Afghanistan and Libya together, quite a few member states and observers would point to a certain intervention fatigue, and question the effectiveness and relevance of intrusive and complex military operations. “What is it that these operations have achieved that makes the world safer?” is not an easy question (Joint Analysis and Lessons Learned Centre 2015; Hardt 2018; Engelbrekt et al. 2015). Such questioning is not specific to NATO and would apply to the broad constellation of international interventions, be they UN-led, EU-led, African Union-led, or run under the auspices of coalitions; how have these operations contributed to international stability over the last 25 years is not so obvious. There is, however, a specificity of NATO operations in that they are principally military, raising the question of what a military response can bring to problems that are always much broader and for the resolution of which NATO can therefore only be in support.

As a consequence of these trends, in 2019, NATO is engaged in (only) four peace support operations: in Afghanistan (Mission Resolute Support), in Kosovo (KFOR), in the Mediterranean Sea (operation Sea Guardian), and in Iraq (NATO Mission Iraq), for a total of more than 20,000 troops deployed (NATO website 2019a). Yet apart from the Afghan mission that counts 16,000 troops, other operations are limited in scope and hardly make NATO a significant peace-maker.

Projecting Stability: The New NATO's Crisis Management Agenda

What Is "Projecting Stability"?

In a post-Ukraine and post-ISAF moment, NATO has started to re-think its crisis management and cooperative security agenda, to introduce a new concept: "projecting stability" (Berti and Diaz-Plaja 2018). The concept was formally launched by NATO Allies at their 2016 Summit in Warsaw. The Summit final communiqué states that "The greatest responsibility of the Alliance is to protect and defend our territory and our populations against attack, as set out in Article 5 of the Washington Treaty. And so renewed emphasis has been placed on deterrence and collective defence." It then poses that "At the same time, NATO must retain its ability to respond to crises beyond its borders, and remain actively engaged in projecting stability and enhancing international security through working with partners and other international organisations" (NATO 2016).

At the core of the projecting stability agenda is the nexus between internal and external security: the fact that the security situation at the periphery of NATO member states inevitably impacts the security within NATO, and therefore requires to be factored in. As stated by NATO Secretary General, "if our neighbors are more stable, we are more secure" (Stoltenberg 2016). NATO therefore needs to play a role in contributing to stability at its periphery, through military-focused activities such as capacity-building, defense institution building and sector reform, training, as well as through the type of peace support operations that have been run over the last 25 years.

In geographical terms, "projecting stability" is principally looking southward. This has to do with the instability that has characterized NATO's southern neighborhood over the last 10 years or so, with associated consequences in terms of state fragility, terrorism, or massive migrations. NATO officially pursues a 360-degree approach, implying that it must respond to threats coming from all directions (NATO 2018); yet implicitly, while the Deterrence and Defense agenda of NATO looks east to respond to Russia's aggressive policy, projecting stability is more of a Southern policy. And these two tasks have tended to replace the three core tasks (as defined in the 2010 Strategic Concept) of collective defense, crisis management, and cooperative security.

In practice, projecting stability operates the merger between crisis management and cooperative security. It draws on the operational dimension of crisis management (i.e., the deployment of military assets) and on the various cooperation formats that fall within the cooperative security portfolio, such as the Mediterranean Dialogue, the Istanbul Cooperation Initiative, or the Partnership for Peace.

This said, there is also a sense of restraint in "projecting stability" compared with past activities, at three different levels: first, the value-promotion agenda that theoretically characterized NATO's operations in the past (from Afghanistan to Libya) is less central to projecting stability. The very word "stability" implies a retrenchment from past commitments as it is less transformative. Projecting stability is more about ensuring a certain level of resilience and functioning public authorities than it is about promoting liberal values. In this sense, projecting stability connects to the cooperative security core task, as defined in the 2010 Strategic Concept. Second, NATO insists on the consent-based nature of projecting stability. The objective is to establish cooperation with countries that would request assistance and to promote a locally owned process as much as possible. Of course, in many cases, NATO remains in a position of dominant actor providing assistance to politically weaker partners, yet the intent is to minimize the effect of such imbalance. Third, there is a recognition that the military dimension to “building peace” is necessary but not sufficient, and that NATO can therefore only contribute to broader efforts. This leads NATO back to the debate about the Comprehensive Approach and the necessity to reach out to civilian actors, be they local or international. In this context, the NATO-EU dialogue becomes particularly important, as the EU theoretically provides assets that NATO is lacking, in terms of financial resources or more security-focused and civilian capacity (Tardy and Lindstrom 2019).

This is not to say that large-scale operations or even coercive ones are ruled out under “projecting stability.” A lesson from the last 20 years is that unexpected developments can lead to unexpected responses, as shown after 9/11 or in Libya. And policy documents refer to crisis management operations as being part of the projecting stability agenda, as is the case of Operation Resolute Support in Afghanistan, which is a capacity-building mission but nonetheless counts 16,000 personnel.

There is also a strong conflict prevention dimension to projecting stability. The focus on resilience and capacity-building in states that are potentially exporting insecurity reflects intent to prevent a given situation to further deteriorate, for the good of that particular state, and ultimately for NATO's own good. This is to be supported by a better understanding of security evolutions in the South, through the newly-established Strategic Direction South (the so-called Southern Hub), mandated to “provide NATO a strategic-level lens to better anticipate, preempt, limit, and overcome challenges” (NATO website 2019b).

The Dilemmas of Projecting Stability

NATO's approach to peace operations or peacebuilding is marked by the nature of the institution as well as by the recent history of what its operations have been. On the one hand, NATO presents itself as a security and defense actor that aspires to contribute to international peace and security, notably through crisis management or projecting stability. Some of its past or present activities, in Bosnia-Herzegovina or Kosovo (post-1999), are very similar to what the UN or the European Union do in their own peace operations. On the other hand though, NATO is by nature an institution that develops an interest-driven agenda that is not necessarily compatible with what a liberal internationalist peacebuilding agenda carries. Most specifically, NATO's past operations in Kosovo (air operation), Afghanistan, and Libya and the controversy that these operations led to inevitably alter the reading of NATO's peace agenda. As a military alliance counting the USA, France, or Turkey as members, NATO can hardly be perceived as a benevolent actor that pursues a cosmopolitan agenda.

This said, in its peacekeeping/peacebuilding policy, NATO faces the same kind of dilemmas as any other peace actor, in terms of political support by its own member states, clarity and complexity of mandates, lack of local buy-in or ownership, and uneasy coordination with other actors. At these four levels, the literature on peacebuilding and how its main stakeholders struggle in delivering on their respective mandates is relevant to NATO's own policy and practices (Koops et al. 2015).

Beyond these issues, NATO is currently facing two sets of challenges in relation to its peacekeeping/peacebuilding role. One is operational and has to do with the added-value of a military-focused organization in tackling multifaceted threats that are not necessarily military related. The sources of instability at the Southern periphery of the Alliance are arguably diverse and relate to a wide range of issues – political, economic, societal, environmental, etc. – for which NATO displays no obvious competence or comparative advantage. The military or security dimension of stability can be essential, and NATO does have an expertise and resources in this domain, but how can NATO play a decisive role when the military dimension is only part of a much wider equation, or when the problem at stake is simply not military in nature? This begs the question of the operationalization of projecting stability and how NATO can maximize the role that it can play, alongside other actors and activities.

The second challenge is more political and asks whether NATO should be engaged in crisis management or stability promotion. Given the difficulties encountered in Afghanistan or Libya, the resurgence and immediacy of the Russian threat, and the above-mentioned operational complexity, whether crisis management must continue to absorb political attention and resources is not unanimously accepted within the Alliance. It may even be seen as a diversion by some observers or member states that would want to prioritize collective defense over any other function (Keller 2017). The role of NATO in counter-terrorism (CT) is part of this conversation. Counter-terrorism at the Southern periphery of the Alliance is theoretically central to NATO's policy; yet only a few member states have a clear vision for NATO in this respect, and the consensus on prioritizing CT is in the end minimal. This debate is sometimes referred to as the "East versus South" debate (the East being about Russia and the South being about North Africa and the Middle East) and touches upon NATO's internal cohesion and purpose. It shapes policy discussions within the Alliance and would influence any forthcoming debate on NATO's future core tasks.

Summary

NATO was created as a collective defense organization and evolved, with the end of the Cold War, as a crisis management actor. This implied tasks that pertain to the broad field of peace operations and peacebuilding, as illustrated in Bosnia-Herzegovina or Kosovo. From the early 1990s up to the 2014 Ukrainian crisis, NATO could even have been described primarily as a crisis management actor. As such, NATO was more politicized, and more coercive, than other crisis management actors such as the UN or the EU, but not different to the extent that it would be in a distinct groupings.

This changed with the 2014 Ukrainian crisis; not only did the crisis bring collective defense back, but a certain crisis management fatigue also appeared with Afghanistan. Crisis management became secondary to NATO's agenda and identity as a consequence. With projecting stability, NATO intends to redefine its own crisis management role, while acknowledging the limits of its political and operational capacity. NATO still wants to be a peace-maker, by providing security where, in the end, it would matter for itself. Whether NATO member states all agree that this should be a core task for the Alliance, and whether local recipients of NATO's projecting stability activities all concur that NATO is the appropriate response to their own security problems, are yet to be secured.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions
- ▶ Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Auerswald, D. P., & Saideman, S. M. (2014). NATO in Afghanistan: Fighting together, fighting alone. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Berti, B., & Diaz-Plaja, R.-E. (2018). Projecting stability. Change and continuity. In Hope, I. (Ed.), Projecting stability: Elixir or snake oil? (Research paper 1). Rome: NATO Defense College.

- Carati, A. (2017). Responsibility to protect, NATO and the problem of who should intervene: Reassessing the intervention in Libya. Global Change, Peace & Security, 29(3), 293–309.
- Engelbrekt, K., Mohlin, M., & Wagnsson, C. (2015). The NATO intervention in Libya. Lessons learned from the campaign. London: Routledge.
- Frantzen, H. (Ed.). (2004). NATO and peace support operations, 1991–1999: Policies and doctrines. London: Frank Cass.
- Hardt, H. (2018). NATO's lessons in crisis. NATO's lessons in crisis. Institutional memory in international organizations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hehir, A., & Murray, R. (Eds.). (2013). Libya, the responsibility to protect and the future of humanitarian intervention. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Joint Analysis and Lessons Learned Centre. (2015, October). Comprehensive study on the strategic lessons learned from ISAF, Lisbon.
- Kaufman, J. P. (2002). NATO and the former Yugoslavia: Crisis, conflict, and the Atlantic Alliance. Oxford: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Keller, P. (2017). Divided by geography? NATO's internal debate about the eastern and southern flanks. In K. Friis (Ed.), NATO and collective defence in the 21st century. London: Routledge.
- Koops, J., et al. (2015). The Oxford handbook of UN peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mandelbaum, M. (1999). A perfect failure: NATO's war against Yugoslavia. Foreign Affairs, 78(5).
- McCalla, R. B. (1996). NATO's persistence after the Cold War. International Organization, 50(3), 445–475.
- Mearsheimer, J. J. (1990). Back to the future: Instability in Europe after the Cold War. International Security, 15(1), 5–56.
- Moore, R., & Damon, C. (Eds.). (2017). NATO's return to Europe: Engaging Ukraine, Russia, and beyond. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Morelli, V., & Belkin, P. (2009). NATO in Afghanistan: A test of the transatlantic alliance. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service.
- Mulchinock, N. (2017). NATO and the Western Balkans. From Neutral Spectator to Proactive Peacemaker. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- NATO. (1999). The Alliance's Strategic Concept Approved by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, Washington, DC, 24 April.
- NATO. (2001, July). Peace support operations, AJP-3.4.1.
- NATO. (2010). "Active Engagement, Modern Defence", Strategic Concept for the Defence and Security of the Members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Adopted by Heads of State and Government at the NATO Summit in Lisbon, 19–20 November.
- NATO. Warsaw summit final Communiqué, 8–9 July 2016.
- NATO. Brussels summit declaration issued by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Brussels, 11–12 July 2018.
- NATO website. (2019a). Operations and missions: Past and present. https://www.nato.int/cps/en/natohq/topics_52060.htm
- NATO website. (2019b). NATO strategic direction south. <https://thesouthernhub.org/default>
- North Atlantic Council. Alliance's new strategic concept agreed by the heads of state and government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council, 8 November 1991.
- North Atlantic Council. Wales summit declaration issued by the Heads of State and Government participating in the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Wales, 5 September 2014.
- Roberts, A. (1999). NATO's 'Humanitarian War' over Kosovo. Survival, 41(3).
- Rynning, S. (2012). NATO in Afghanistan: The liberal disconnect. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Schulte, G. L. (1997). Former Yugoslavia and the new NATO. Survival, 39, 1.
- Sloan, E. C. (2016). Modern military strategy: An introduction. London: Routledge.
- Stoltenberg, J. Press conference, Estonia, 20 November 2014. https://www.nato.int/cps/en/natohq/news_114965.htm
- Stoltenberg, J. Projecting stability: Charting NATO's future. Speech to the Atlantic Council, Washington, DC, 6 April 2016.
- Tardy, T., & Lindstrom, G. (2019). The scope of EU-NATO cooperation. In Lindstrom & Tardy (Eds.), NATO and the EU. The essential partners (NDC research report no. 5). Rome: NATO Defense College.
- Weighill, R., & Gaub, F. (2018). The Cauldron: NATO's campaign in Libya. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Yost, D. S. (1998). The new NATO and collective security. Survival, 40(2), 135–160.

Natural Disasters

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Needlework

- ▶ Textile-Making as Research Method

Negative Peace

- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches

Negotiation

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Bargaining (see Negotiation); Distributive negotiation; Dual-concern models; Integrative negotiation; Negotiation climate; Negotiation phases; Negotiation power; Negotiation process; Negotiation strategy; Negotiation styles (see Negotiation Strategy); Negotiation tactics; Win-lose negotiation (see Distributive Negotiation); Win-Win negotiation (see Integrative Negotiation)

Definition

Negotiation is a common process for resolving a wide variety of disagreements over both tangible and intangible interests among two or more parties with common interests to motivate finding a mutually acceptable solution.

Description

“Negotiation is a process in which explicit proposals are put forward for the ostensible purposes of resolving specific disagreements among two or more parties with both conflicting and common interests” (Ikle 1964). The heart of this definition is the requirement that the parties involved have both conflicting and common interests. Without conflicting interests, there are no differences to be resolved; without common ones, there is no motivation to resolve the differences.

However, negotiations are unlikely to solve disagreements in belief, as the history of theological disputes demonstrates or when the parties have little or nothing in common and absolutely contradictory beliefs as to where justice and fairness lie, such apparently as the parties to the Middle East Peace Process. Furthermore, practices vary both between and within cultures, usually in manageable ways (Khan 2019; Gelfand and Brett 2004) but sometimes in extreme ways such as occurred during the 1953 Korean War truce talks (Joy 1955). Negotiators sometimes engage in “bad faith” or “surface” bargaining with no intention to reach agreement, hence inclusion of the word “ostensible” in the definition. Negotiations are not limited to two-party disputes, although at some point the number of parties can become unmanageable and other methods such as arbitration, mediation, voting, representation, or hierarchical management may prove more effective. Thus, in addition to the fundamental requirement for both conflicting and common interests, Mnookin (2010) suggests five considerations in deciding whether negotiation is likely to be useful:

- The tangible and intangible interests at stake
- The likely achievability of at least a minimum acceptable settlement
- The probable outcome of negotiation compared with alternative strategies
- The cost, precedents set, secrets disclosed, and time lost in negotiating
- The likelihood that opponents actually will carry out any agreement reached

Mnookin suggests that even if likely to fail, negotiation may improve relationships so be worthwhile in the long term, nor does negotiating preclude employing simultaneous alternative strategies. Strikes and wars often continue during negotiations. Nelson Mandela, based on “a calm and sober assessment of the political situation. . . fifty years of non-violence had brought the African people nothing but more repressive legislation, and fewer and fewer rights,” negotiated with the South African government while leading a guerrilla army, thus changing the balance of power in his favor at the negotiating table.

The Negotiation Climate

Several theorists (e.g., Pruitt 1988; Rahim 1990; Thomas and Kilmann 1974) suggest that the relationship between two parties depends primarily on only two factors: concern for one’s own goals with and concern for the relationship with the opponent. Both vary from low to high depending on circumstances and the specific conflict of the moment, and the combination largely shapes the negotiation climate and the tactics employed, as seen in Fig. 1. It cannot be assumed that each party will have the same levels of concern and thus may pursue quite different strategies and tactics.

A person with little interest in the outcome tends to avoid conflict particularly if the relationship is more important than the issue. A husband may care a lot more about his relationship with his wife than what sort of sofa she chooses for the living room. On the job the next day selling cars, he doesn’t really care what the family-car buyer he probably never will see again thinks of him, he just wants to get the highest commission he can (to pay for that sofa); so the relationship is likely to be competitive. But, when the buyer for the biggest company in town needs an instant replacement for a wrecked car, he will want her coming back whenever they need a new car, which is frequently, and so will work to meet her needs. However, as noted above, it cannot be assumed, with several dealers to choose from, that she will have the same collaborative attitude.

These dual-concern models pass many tests of good theory. In using only two variables to predict behavior, they are parsimonious. They are logical and conceptually empirical despite practical difficulties in reliably measuring the independent variables. However, some individuals may employ the same strategy regardless of the situation based on their personality or allow their emotions to dominate rational assessment.

Distributive Negotiation

Traditional bargaining, now often called “distributive” or “win-lose,” divides naturally into phases, although theorists differ somewhat as to what and how many there are. A common formulation specifies four, labeling them preparation, exploration, bargaining, and closing (Churchman 1995). The phases are descriptive, not prescriptive. Negotiations often involve more than one issue. If so, negotiators may go through each issue phase-by-phase, may go through each phase issue-by-issue, or may follow some combination, and may skip phrases or take breaks within or between phases during which the situation is reassessed.

The effort and time appropriate, available, and consumed by preparation vary considerably from one negotiation to another. A tourist in the Middle East buying a souvenir is unlikely to have done much more preparation before heading into the bazaar than noting the high-priced examples available from the shop in his five-star hotel. Once home and in the market for a new TV or car, he is likely to confer with his family on preferences, consult evaluations of various brands and models, and search the Internet to learn the advantages, disadvantages, options, and prices available of each model being considered. Back in his office at the Department of State preparing

Negotiation, Fig. 1
Dual-concern models of negotiation

| | | | | |
|-------------------------|--------|---|---|---|
| Concern for Your Issues | High | Contend (Pruitt) Dominate (Rahim) Compete (Thomas) | | Problem-solve (Pruitt) Integrate (Rahim) Collaborate (Thomas) |
| | Medium | | Compromise (Thomas) Compromise (Rahim) | |
| | Low | Inaction (Pruitt) Avoid (Rahim) Avoid (Thomas) Low | Medium | Yield (Pruitt) Oblige (Rahim) Accommodate (Thomas) High |

Concern for Your Opponent

for an international conference on climate change, he is likely to be part of a team of economic, political, scientific, technical, and other specialists such as media who will work for months considering possible venues and timing, collecting information on the likely concerns of other nations, identifying and defining issues, setting goals, developing and ordering proposals by preference, searching for unintended consequences, and working out roles for team members and strategies and tactics for the actual bargaining.

The most crucial preparatory decision is the “deadlock price [or point],” sometimes called a “reserve” or “security” price, on each issue. Deadlock prices are the points at which negotiators will stop making concessions and end the negotiation without an agreement. It also is useful to pre-plan “Optimistic” and “Realistic” settlements, as well as a “First” offer (forming the mnemonic FORD). These four points form a “bargaining range.” Agreement is theoretically possible if the bargaining ranges of the parties overlap. The negotiation “dance” settles where within those overlapping ranges agreement will be reached. Subjects participating in bargaining simulations did better when they had such intermediate targets in addition to deadlock prices (Raiffa 1982).

Instead of Deadlock, Roger Fisher and William Ury (1981) proposed identifying one’s Best Alternative to Negotiated Agreement, now commonly referred to by its acronym BATNA. It encourages negotiators to consider their options if agreement is not reached as a way of determining the minimum acceptable agreement. A simple example is the buyer who wants a car to get to work. The BATNA would lead to consideration of alternatives such as riding a bike (not forgetting to consider year-round weather), carpooling, or taking a bus, the costs and convenience of each helping to decide how much to spend on a car and thus what sort of car to buy.

The exploratory phase begins when negotiators first meet and focuses on relationships and communicating needs to opponents. Negotiators make or renew acquaintance, explain their interests and needs, listen to opponents’ interests and needs, and more generally try to establish an advantageous bargaining climate. The time and approaches taken vary with how well negotiators already know one another as well as with culture, personality, power, history, the issues at stake, the venue, and the agenda, whether formal or informal. If the negotiations are high profile, both sides may have a media strategy aimed at constituents, opponents, and the public.

The transition to the bargaining phase often is seamless. It shifts the emphasis to making, justifying, and responding to proposals, perhaps ambiguous at first. Classic bargaining tactics dominate this phase (e.g., Churchman 1995; Lewicki 1999; Zartmann and Berman 1982). Ellen Raider (personal conversation) uses the mnemonic AEIOU to classify them. Slightly reformulated, A is for attacking opponents, E is for evading issues, I is for informing opponents, O is for opening tactics, and U is for unifying tactics that lead to agreement. Proposals include an offer, vague or specific, partial or complete (“we might be able to pay a little more if you were able to deliver sooner” vs. “we will pay $525 including shipping for delivery next Monday”), and might include conditions, threats, or ultimatums. They often include a face-saving rationale for making concessions. Counter proposals can be nearly instantaneous or can come after further discussion or caucusing.

Whenever there are as many or more issues as there are negotiators, and they differ as to their relative importance to the opponents, negotiators can “link” or “logroll” them to mutual advantage. Consider the situation in Fig. 2. If the negotiators use the common tactic of splitting the difference evenly, each will receive half the value of each item for a total value of $1.50. If instead Negotiator 1 concedes all of Item B to Negotiator 2 in exchange for receiving all of Item A, each negotiator receives $2 in value, a 33% increase for both parties. Total value grows from $3 to $4. Of course, intermediate positions to total surrender on issues are possible. The most common such

| | Item A | Item B |
|-------------------------|--------|--------|
| Value to Negotiator One | 1 | 2 |
| Value to Negotiator Two | 2 | 1 |

Negotiation, Fig. 2 The linkage principle linkages in sales negotiations involve quality, quantity, and time. In turn this suggests that increasing rather than reducing the number of issues being negotiated improves the likelihood of a mutually advantageous and satisfying agreement. It is a major tactic by which both distributive and integrative negotiators “enlarge the pie” under consideration.

The fourth, closing, phase becomes possible when one or more proposals meet the needs of all parties. An agreement might include recognition of the need for ratification by higher authority, an effective implementation or delivery date, provisions for monitoring performance, and methods for resolving disputes. While most terms will be specific, it is not uncommon for some to be left ambiguous or specified for later settlement rather than delay implementation of what can be agreed to at the moment.

The closing itself may vary from a simple “OK” or handshake to a formal written document completed by dignitaries in formal signing ceremonies. One way to evaluate the agreement is to calculate the value of the difference between the agreed and one’s deadlock price divided by the number of hours spent preparing for and completing the negotiation. However, apart from the difficulty of valuing some agreements, just as poker players seldom reveal their cards if everyone else folds lest it give away whether or not they were bluffing, negotiators seldom reveal their deadlock price to others even after agreement lest it affects future negotiations, so the calculation usually can be made only for one’s side.

Integrative Negotiation

Integrative negotiation, often called “win-win” or “principled,” is the fashionable alternative to distributive bargaining. As suggested by dual-concern models, it becomes more likely when the parties have high regard for one another and high concern for the issues at stake, that is, when the upper right-hand corner of Fig. 1 describes the situation. It has been particularly successful in labor-management disputes mediated by the US government’s Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, which suggests a five-stage process.

The goal of the first stage is a mutually acceptable definition of the problems or conflicts. The parties complete this stage jointly. The model calls for depersonalizing issues and focusing on the primary problems while identifying and keeping less important ones out of the picture for the moment.

The parties complete the second stage separately and focus on clear identification of their own interests (Lax and Sebenius 1986), taking positions or developing proposals at this point.

The third stage focuses on finding as many options as possible that might meet the needs identified in stage two. The major technique is collective brainstorming by all parties with one idea inspiring the next, with the usual rule that criticism of suggestions is not permitted at this stage.

The fourth stage requires the parties to develop relevant criteria for assessing options such as cost, impact on company competitiveness and thus survivability, legality, likelihood of approval by union members, retention of workforce, and technical feasibility.

The fifth stage requires assessing each third-stage option on the basis of the fourth-stage criteria. Often, negotiators vote as to whether or not each option meets each criterion. Sometimes options are referred to a committee for evaluation. The results presented in a simple grid often make the best resolution obvious. Even when this does not happen, the process usually narrows the choices sufficiently to make agreement easier and quicker.

Distributive vs. Integrative Negotiation

Just as a football team must be prepared to play both offense and defense, negotiators regardless of their preference need to be prepared for both distributive and integrative strategies (Churchman 1995; Lewicki 1999; Raiffa 1982; Zartmann and Berman 1982). The common criticisms of distributive negotiations fail to explain why it survives despite the availability of a supposedly superior approach. Even when integrative negotiation does occur, Mnookin (2010) argues anecdotally that without continued training, negotiators soon revert to distributive practices.

The Role of Power

Negotiating power comes in many forms and can be positive, the power to do, or negative, the power to prevent, regardless of what the other parties regard as desirable, fair, or just. It can be real, perceived, or ephemeral, either increasing, stable, or declining over time. The party that appears more powerful often is busier, so perhaps less able to prepare or assign its best people to every negotiation.

Generally, power increases with the number of different ways negotiators have to meet their needs. The negotiator with an eminent deadline usually is in a weaker position, particularly if the opponent knows it and can delay. Some situations impose deadlines that give one side real power. For example, farm workers have more negotiating power at harvest time when farmers fear losing their entire crop to delay; teachers at the end of a long holiday when parents want a break from the constant squabbling of their children or schools are scheduled for accreditation visits. Knowledge – economic, legal, technical, of precedents, or of opponents' tastes and ambitions – enhances power. Resources – equipment, money, skilled personnel, supplies, and the like – often are sources of power. Authority – the real or pretended limits on ability to make or refuse agreements – along with personal characteristics such as audacity, charisma, glibness, integrity, persistence, and ruthlessness are common sources of power.

Negotiators increase power by manipulating its sources. They add technical experts or articulate or charismatic spokesmen to their team. Sometimes they delay negotiation until an advantageous time. They can exploit or create divisions to weaken opponents. They can suggest an agenda that arranges items to their advantage, present a draft agreement that will shape the situation to advantage, or volunteer to take meeting minutes thus gaining control of the record. If weak, they can search for allies, appeal to the opponent's good nature, or beg for mercy (Churchman 1995; Lewicki et al. 1997).

Conclusion

Negotiation has proven a useful tool for settling many if not all types of conflict for thousands of years in a wide variety of circumstances and cultures providing that the parties involved have some common interests to motivate finding a mutually acceptable solution. However, it is a complicated tool that must be learned through continual study, observation, and practice.

Summary

Negotiation is a common process for resolving a wide variety of disagreements over both tangible and intangible interests among two or more parties with common interests to motivate finding a mutually acceptable solution.

Appendix

Fifty Negotiation Tactics

Brief definitions follow of common tactics used by negotiators combined in myriad ways (Churchman 1995). Also Known By [AKB] names are given at the end of each definition.

Acceptance Time: The time between hearing a proposal and deciding how to react to it.

Agenda: The issues to be resolved in the order they are to be negotiated.

Ambiguity vs. Clarity: The degree of equivocation or specificity in a proposal or statement.

Authority: The limits superiors placed on what agreements a negotiator can conclude.

Back Channels: Off-the-record, often secret, discussions outside the formal negotiating process, often conducted by an intermediary.

Bad Guy/Good Guy: The bad guy tries to intimidate and soften opponents. The good guy seeks concessions and agreement by being helpful and understanding. AKB Mutt and Jeff.

Bargaining Climate: The relationship, friendly to antagonistic, cooperative to competitive, among negotiators, as well as general context affecting the negotiating situation.

Bargaining Range: All offers a negotiator will make on each issue. If it overlaps those of opponents, then there is a settlement range within which agreement should be possible.

Better Than That: An attempt to get an undefined concession by saying, simply, "You've got to do better than that."

Bluffing or Lying: A negotiator can bluff or lie by commission, omission, interpretation, or arithmetic calculation.

Body Language: The notion that negotiators reveal real meaning by uncontrolled expressions or gestures. In fact, they may be acting, revealing, or meaningless. AKB Nonverbal Communication.

Bottom Line: The total benefits and costs of a deal, intended or not.

Boulwarism: Named after the GE negotiator who made his first offer his last. AKB, First and Last Offer.

Caucus: A private meeting requested by the negotiators on one side.

Closing: Providing a basis for bringing negotiations to a successful conclusion.

Concession Making: Reducing (for the seller) or increasing (for the buyer) the last offer made, sometimes with conditions such as a deadline. AKB Tit-for-tat.

Deadlines: The time or date by which a negotiation must be concluded one way or another, whether real or a bargaining tactic to put pressure on opponents to settle.

Deadlock: Suggesting or threatening to end negotiation unless the opponent meets some condition. Closely related to the idea of "Best Alternative to a Negotiated Agreement" abbreviated BATNA. Also, it can refer to an outcome rather than a tactic if no agreement is reached.

Delay: Slowing the negotiating pace, often in hope conditions, will change favorably for one's side.

Divide and Conquer: Weakening opponents by exploiting any differences within their ranks.

Empathy: Understanding or pretending to understand and sympathize with how opponents feel.

Face Saving: Reframing issues to make concessions easier for oneself or opponents. AKB Reframing.

Good or Bad Faith: Negotiating with or without intent to reach agreement or carrying out a bargain as agreed. AKB Surface Bargaining.

Haggling: Alternating concessions often in ritualistic fashion with little or no discussion until agreement or deadlock is reached.

Ignorance: Feigned or real lack of understanding to obtain or verify information.

Information. Information disparities among parties are common. Guard against being taken advantage of by a deficit through preparation and caucuses while putting any advantage to good use. Information can include knowledge of opponents gathered by varied means. Sometimes, providing an overwhelming combination of relevant and irrelevant or trivial information in hope of overwhelming or confusing opponents. AKB Snow Job.

Linkage: Discussing two or more issues together so concessions on one can be exchanged advantageously for concessions on the other. AKB Log Rolling, Tie-ins, Tradeoffs.

Listening: Assessing what opponents say both factually and in terms of how they feel about what they are saying, sometimes emphasizing one's understanding to improve the Bargaining Climate.

Objections: Explanations of why opponents' proposals are unsatisfactory, aimed at testing the resolve of opponents or in hope of obtaining concessions.

One-text Procedure: A draft agreement revised by each party in turn until all are satisfied.

Perseverance: Taking the time to avoid hasty agreements that often leave negotiators with the uneasy feeling that additional concessions could have been gained or that some issues were overlooked.

Persuasion: Trying to convince opponents that the current offer is the best they can get and that it is fair and meets their needs.

Power: The ability to reward or prevent action.

Precedent: Prior agreements, current conditions, fait accompli, laws, or past decisions or other basis for or agreements, offers, or concessions.

Preconditions: Effort to obtain advantage before negotiations start, including but not limited to manipulating the agenda, selecting the venue, or impressing opponents. AKB Fait Accompli.

Proposal: A suggestion as to how to resolve one or more issues, also used for purposes such as showing resolve or reducing opponents' hopes. It might include concessions, conditions, or time limits and may be partial or complete, firm or flexible, and specific or ambiguous.

Questions and Answers: Questions can obtain or give information, keep things moving, or challenge opponents politely. Answers may be clear or not, complete or not, relevant or not, true or not.

Raisin Picking: Obtaining bids from competitors and then either using the lowest bid on each component to develop a counter proposal or (less often) trying to buy each component at the cheapest price in the separate bids and assembling them oneself. AKB Cherry Picking.

Reverse Auction: Sellers are told who they are bidding against to encourage each to offer the best possible price. AKB Belly-up Negotiation.

Salami Slicing: Asking for small concessions in succession especially after all seems settled until the opponent says "No." AKB Nibble, Nickle and Diming, One Step at a Time.

Sibylline Books: Offering an attractive price lacking essential components that increase the price. Bait and Switch are unethical variations offering nonexistent items (the bait) to lure the buyer to a more expensive alternative (the switch). AKB Bait and Switch, Low Balling, Take back.

Signal: An ambiguous or disavowable statement or action to alert opponents of one's willingness to negotiate or to explore particular approaches to resolving a conflict. AKB Trial balloon.

Silence: Silence can emphasize a point, give oneself time to think, convey disappointment, or gain listener attention.

Split the difference: Suggesting closing at a point usually but not always half-way between recent positions.

Strawman: A false or unimportant issue raised and defended at length in hope eventually of entirely conceding it for something of importance. AKB Red Herring, Throwaway.

Take it or Leave It: Attaching the phrase or a similar one such as "best and final" to an offer to indicate that it is the last a negotiator will make, true or not. AKB Best and Final Offer.

Threat: An ambiguous warning of probable consequences if a demand is not met.

Timing: Tactics used or points raised too soon or too late can lose their effectiveness.

Toughness: The tougher the negotiator, the slower and smaller the concessions. Getting tougher signals approaching deadlock.

Ultimatum: A threat that is specific as to what must be done by what time to avoid undesirable consequences for failure to agree, concede, or comply with a demand.

Venue: Negotiations can be on your territory, the opponent's, alternate between the two, be on neutral territory, or take some form of communication such as letter, phone, or the Internet.

Cross-References

► Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Churchman, D. (1995). Negotiation: Process, tactics, theory. Lanham: University Press of America.
- Fisher, R., & Ury, W. (1981). Getting to yes. Boston: Houghton Mifflin.
- Gelfand, M., & Brett, J. (2004). The handbook of negotiation and culture. Stanford: Stanford Business Books.
- Ikle, F. (1964). How nations negotiate. New York: Frederick A. Praeger.
- Joy, C. (1955). How communists negotiate. New York: Macmillan.
- Khan, M. (2019). The Palgrave handbook of cross-cultural business negotiation. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Lax, D., & Sebenius, J. (1986). The manager as negotiator: Bargaining for cooperation and competitive gain. New York: The Free Press.
- Lewicki, R., et al. (1997). Essentials of negotiation. Boston: Irwin McGraw-Hill.
- Lewicki, R., et al. (1999). Negotiation. Boston: Irwin McGraw-Hill.
- Mnookin, R. (2010). Bargaining with the devil. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Pruitt, D. (1988). Negotiation behavior. New York: Academic.
- Rahim, M. (1990). Theory and research in conflict management. Westport: Greenwood.
- Raiffa, H. (1982). The art & science of negotiation. Cambridge: Belknap/Harvard.
- Thomas, K., & Kilmann, R. (1974). Thomas-Kilmann conflict mode instrument. Tuxedo: Xicom.
- Zartmann, I., & Berman, M. (1982). The practical negotiator. New Haven: Yale.

Negotiation Climate

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Phases

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Power

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Process

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Strategy

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Styles (see Negotiation Strategy)

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiation Tactics

- ▶ Negotiation

Negotiations

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

News and Conflict

- ▶ Peace Journalism

NGOs

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

Non-majoritarian Institutions

- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements

Non-proliferation

- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Non-state Actors

- ▶ Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Nonviolence

- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Technology and Peace

Nonviolence and Civil Resistance

Iain Attack
Trinity College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Definition/Description

Nonviolence or civil resistance is a collective political action outside the formal institutions or procedures of the state that avoids the systematic or deliberate use of violence or armed force. Nonviolence as a form of collective political action tends to occur through civil society groups or social movements, reflecting failures, weaknesses, or limits to conventional state-based politics. Civil disobedience is an exemplification of nonviolence as a separate category of political activity, distinct from both conventional parliamentary politics and violent resistance.

A distinction is sometimes made between principled and pragmatic nonviolence, or between those who seek alternatives to the use of violence for moral reasons and those who employ the methods of nonviolence because of their tactical and strategic effectiveness. Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr. are often identified as principled proponents of nonviolence, while Gene Sharp is identified as a theorist of nonviolent struggle or civil resistance for pragmatic or strategic reasons.

Both principled and pragmatic nonviolence require a sustained and consistent commitment to the use of nonviolence as the basis for effective civil resistance. Pragmatic nonviolence can be linked to negative peace because it provides an innovative set of techniques or methods aimed at avoiding violence for political purposes. Principled nonviolence connects to a broader vision of social justice involving the peaceful or nonviolent resolution of conflict at multiple levels, and as such can be linked to positive peace.

Introduction

Nonviolence or civil resistance is a collective political action outside the formal institutions or procedures of the state that avoids the systematic or deliberate use of violence or armed force. As such, nonviolence is a form of political action that can be distinguished both from state-based institutional politics and from political violence or armed resistance (Schock 2003, p. 705).

Nonviolence as a form of collective political action tends to occur through civil society groups or social movements, reflecting failures, weaknesses, or limits to conventional state-based politics. Civil society groups and social movements use nonviolence where they do not have access to conventional parliamentary politics, in highly undemocratic or dictatorial regimes, for example, or where there have been significant failures in the decision-making procedures of the state. Nonviolence has been used successfully to dismantle dictatorships, end colonial rule, resist foreign aggression, and preserve and extend democratic practices and human rights. According to Gene Sharp, one of the foremost theorists of nonviolence: “It is a complex type of struggle that has been applied against ruthless dictatorships, as well as in relatively democratic societies” (Sharp 2005, p. 511).

Those who employ the methods of nonviolent political action, as distinct from various forms of political violence or armed struggle, do so sometimes for moral reasons, through pacifist objections to the use of violence for political purposes, for example, but more often for pragmatic reasons, because of the unavailability of the means required for armed struggle, for instance, or because the methods of collective nonviolent action are seen to be the most effective under the circumstances. This connects to a classic distinction in much of the literature on nonviolence, between those who choose its methods primarily for principled (or ethical) reasons and those who use nonviolence primarily for pragmatic (or strategic) reasons. Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr., are often identified as principled proponents of nonviolence, for example, while Gene Sharp is identified as a theorist of nonviolent struggle or civil resistance for pragmatic or strategic reasons.

Mahatma Gandhi and Satyagraha

Mohandas (Mahatma) Gandhi (1869–1948) is regarded as one of the seminal figures in the development of the theory and practice of nonviolence. He began his career as a political activist while working as a lawyer in South Africa, pioneering the techniques associated with his method of satyagraha or mass nonviolent civil disobedience in response to government discrimination against the Indian community in that country. He returned to India in 1914 and became a central figure in the lengthy struggle against British colonial rule, as well as many other campaigns for social and political reform in India (involving the caste system and Hindu-Muslim relations for example). He was assassinated by a Hindu extremist in 1948, just months after India achieved its independence. Gandhi's thought and practice has been hugely influential on subsequent generations of nonviolent activists worldwide, such as Martin Luther King, Jr., in the United States.

Gandhi derived many of his central ideas or concepts about nonviolence from his interpretation of Indian religious and philosophical concepts and traditions. Ahimsa is often used as a synonym for nonviolence (as a moral principle) and satyagraha as a synonym for nonviolent action, in Gandhian thought. Ahimsa (from the Sanskrit or Gujarati) literally means non-harm or non-injury (a-himsa), to living things in thought, word, and deed. “For Gandhi, ahimsa was the belief in the sacredness of life and the refusal to do harm to living things, an interpretation that was based on the deep-rooted Hindu tradition of not doing harm” (Mayton 2001, p. 308).

Gandhi coined the term satyagraha “by joining the Sanskrit satya (truth) with agraha (holding firmly)” (Dalton 1993, p. 9). Thus, for Gandhi, satyagraha means “truth-force” or “soul-force.” “Satyagraha is literally holding on to Truth and it means, therefore, Truth-force” (Gandhi 1961, p. 3). Furthermore, the “truth” in “truth-force” or satyagraha involves a commitment to nonviolence or ahimsa. Satyagraha thus finds its source or motive in nonviolence as an ethical or moral principle.

For Gandhi, satyagraha involved testing the commitment to nonviolence or ahimsa against specific situations of conflict or injustice to see how it can be applied (which is why he called his autobiography The Story of My Experiments with Truth) (1982). In other words, Gandhi used the term satyagraha to describe the application of the principle of nonviolence (or ahimsa) to collective action to achieve social and political change. Hence, according to Joan Bondurant, “Nonviolence when used in connection with satyagraha means the exercise of power or influence to effect change without injury to the opponent” (Bondurant 1965, p. 9).

Gandhi's salt march of 1930 is a prominent example of his use of satyagraha to link a specific example of injustice under British colonial rule to the broader campaign for Indian independence. The colonial government had monopolized the manufacture of salt and levied a tax on its sale since the nineteenth century. As such, it represented or symbolized the many injustices associated with British colonialism in India. Thus, the immediate objective of the salt march and the campaign it initiated was to end the injustices associated with the British salt monopoly. The broader objective of the salt march, however, was to promote the campaign for Indian independence through breaking Indians' complicity with British colonial rule and demonstrating their capacity for political mobilization.

The salt march sparked a nationwide series of protests and civil disobedience, involving the production and sale of salt, that lasted for a year, until the Gandhi-Irwin Agreement of March 1931. Gandhi himself was arrested, as were prominent leaders of the Indian National Congress (Sharp 2005, p. 105). As many as 100,000 Indians were also arrested and “placed in prisons, detention camp, and improvised jails” during the salt satyagraha of 1930–1931 (Sharp 2005, p. 110).

Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Ethics of Nonviolence

Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), promoted the use of the methods of nonviolent political action in his role as a leader of the US civil rights movement from the time of the bus boycott in Montgomery, Alabama (1955–1956), to his assassination in 1968. King was influenced in his commitment to nonviolence by the example of Mahatma Gandhi as well as his interpretation of Christian theology. King rose to prominence soon after being appointed pastor of a Baptist church in Montgomery and obtaining his doctorate in systematic theology. Like Gandhi, King combined a strong principled or ethical commitment to nonviolence with an awareness of its effectiveness in supporting struggles for justice and equality. He stated that he “found in the nonviolent resistance philosophy of Gandhi...the only morally and practically sound method open to oppressed people in their struggle for freedom” (King 1958, p. 85).

King’s ethical commitment to nonviolence is exemplified by the central connection he makes between nonviolence and “the principle of love” as a guiding precept for efforts to achieve political change, using the Christian theological concept of agape, or the love of God for human beings operating through the human heart. King defines agape as disinterested or unconditional love. It is unconditional in that it is “not set in motion by any quality or function of its objects” (Watley 1985, p. 124). As such, he distinguishes agape from eros, or aesthetic or romantic love, and philia, or reciprocal love between friends, the affectionate love of friendship. In this sense it is not a sentimental or affectionate emotion, as he states repeatedly, but provides instead the basis for ethical interaction between human beings, even in situations of social and political conflict. Thus, King states: “The nonviolent resister not only refuses to shoot his opponent but he also refuses to hate him” (King [1958] 1991, p. 19).

King also followed Gandhi in employing a wide variety of the methods of nonviolent political action to help achieve specific political objectives. In the case of the civil rights movement, these objectives were associated with ending segregation and legalized discrimination against African Americans in the United States, and its achievements include the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. The use of nonviolent methods by the civil rights movement involved marches, public protests, boycotts, and civil disobedience. The civil rights movement resisted white supremacist and police violence and directly challenged attempts to criminalize or suppress activists through jailing or imprisoning them while retaining a commitment to nonviolence during this period. A seminal event was the march on Washington for civil rights in 1963, when King delivered his famous “I have a dream” speech to hundreds of thousands of people in front of the Lincoln Memorial.

Gene Sharp and Strategic Nonviolence

Gene Sharp (1928–2018) was a prominent and highly influential US scholar of nonviolence who developed a systematic and comprehensive theory of nonviolent political action, emphasizing its pragmatic or strategic dimension. Sharp provides a thorough and detailed analysis of the dynamics and effectiveness of nonviolence as a method of political and social change in his three-volume study The Politics of Nonviolent Action (1973). The central ideas from Sharp’s theory of nonviolent political action were summarized and distilled in his book From Dictatorship to Democracy (2012) (originally published in 1993), which has been used as guide to civil resistance in numerous countries, from Myanmar to Serbia.

Two basic components of Gene Sharp’s theory include his three categories of nonviolent action as well as his three mechanisms of nonviolent political change. Sharp catalogued 198 specific methods of nonviolent action in the second volume of The Politics of Nonviolent Action (The Methods of Nonviolent Action), ranging from petitions to the creation of parallel governments or sources of political authority. Each of these 198 methods falls into one of three general classes or categories of nonviolent action: protest, noncooperation, and intervention. All three categories of nonviolent political action can be combined as part of an effective nonviolent strategy. Furthermore, each category involves different levels of intensity in the confrontation between the nonviolent activists and their opponents.

The methods of nonviolent protest include demonstrations, petitions, marches, and so on. Nonviolent protests are symbolic actions that aim to communicate dissent, “draw public attention to a claim or grievance,” express “the unity and determination of the resistance,” and “challenge the uncommitted to take a stand in relation to” an issue, according to Michael Randle in his book Civil Resistance (1994, p. 112).

Noncooperation involves the deliberate withdrawal from participation in economic or political systems governed or controlled by the opponent, so that it becomes difficult for those systems to continue to function. Nonviolent noncooperation includes strikes, boycotts, and various forms of civil disobedience.

Nonviolent intervention involves more active forms of civil resistance that go beyond noncooperation and directly challenge the power of the opponent. Nonviolent intervention can involve both the disruption of established institutions or behavior patterns and the creation of new institutions or behavior patterns that are preferred. Disruptive methods include nonviolent occupations or blockades, for example, and as such involve a more direct confrontation with one’s opponent than does noncooperation. Creative methods of nonviolent intervention include establishing alternative institutions and even in some cases a parallel or substitute government.

Sharp also talks about three mechanisms of political change resulting from nonviolent action: conversion, accommodation, and coercion. Through the “conversion” mechanism, the opponent accepts the aims of those engaged in nonviolent action. This involves a process of persuasion, perhaps through an appeal to a common set of values or norms (such as democracy or human rights).

In the case of “accommodation,” the opponent grants at least some of the activists’ demands, even though they have not been convinced or persuaded by them. They do so voluntarily, perhaps because the cost of continuing to deny them has become too high. According to Michael Nojeim: “In nonviolent accommodation. . .the opponent undertakes a cost-benefit analysis and concludes that the costs of continuing to fight the nonviolent activists exceed the benefits” (Nojeim 2004, p. 35).

Through “nonviolent coercion,” the power of the nonviolent activists has increased, and the power of the opponent has decreased, to such an extent that the opponent has no choice but to grant their demands. According to Sharp, nonviolent coercion must be available as an alternative to violence (which is also coercive) in those situations where neither conversion nor accommodation will work.

Nonviolent protest as a category of political action can perhaps be more closely associated with “conversion” or persuasion as a mechanism of political change since it is essentially a form of communication. Noncooperation can aim at least initially at some form of accommodation with the opponent, since it involves inflicting economic or political costs upon them to convince them to change their behavior or policies. Nonviolent disruptive intervention, on the other hand, can become increasingly coercive, designed to force the opponent to concede at least some of the activists’ demands.

Nonviolence and Civil Disobedience

Civil disobedience is one of the central methods of nonviolent political action, employed during campaigns led by both Gandhi and King, for example. Civil disobedience can be defined as the deliberate violation of specific laws in order to achieve publicity for a cause, mobilize public opinion, and put pressure on the government or those with political or economic power. It is an obvious exemplification of nonviolence as a separate category of political activity, distinct from both conventional parliamentary politics and violent resistance. Civil disobedience can be seen as one of the more controversial methods associated with nonviolent political action, precisely because it involves breaking the law and confrontation with state or government authorities, in both democratic and nondemocratic systems of government.

Two defining characteristics of democracy are important in terms of justifications for civil disobedience within a liberal democratic state: popular sovereignty and equality before the law. Popular sovereignty is important, for example, because it means that the people themselves make the laws to which they are subject and which the protesters will then claim they are justified in breaking. Similarly, equality before the law suggests that no individual or group has a right to break a law that others have an obligation to obey.

Thus, as Michael Walzer points out, it is important to acknowledge that for “many political philosophers...there exists a prima facie obligation to obey the laws of the most inclusive organized society of which one is a member, that is, for most men (sic), the state.” However, Walzer also points out “the existence of a prima facie obligation to obey means no more than that disobedience must always be justified” (Walzer 1970, p. 16). In other words, obedience to the law is not an absolute obligation under all circumstances.

Gandhi, for example, justified civil disobedience only as a method of last resort, even if he used it himself on numerous occasions. Other lawful means of achieving change must have been tried and have failed, such as conventional parliamentary politics, negotiation, and protest. Thus, Gandhi used civil disobedience as a final phase of a satyagraha campaign, methods such as communicating dissent or other forms of noncooperation having been ineffective or unsuccessful (Nojeim 2004, p. 39).

John Rawls provided an influential definition of (and set of criteria for) justified civil disobedience within a liberal democracy that explicitly connects it to nonviolence. Rawls defines civil disobedience as: “a public, nonviolent, conscientious yet political act contrary to law usually done with the aim of bringing about a change in the law or policies of the government” (Rawls 1973, p. 364).

The conscientious (as distinct from criminal) motivation of those who engage in civil disobedience can be demonstrated by both its public and nonviolent character but also by their appeal to a higher law. This “higher law” can be either positive (or human-made) or natural (e.g., in the form of a universal moral principle). Thus, the civil rights activists in the United States appealed to the US Constitution (and the Supreme Court) against state or county segregation laws. They also appealed to universal moral principles (or shared values within the society) to justify their actions (including civil disobedience), such as human dignity or racial equality. In other words, for those who engage in civil disobedience: “their illegal conduct...was motivated by respect for some moral principle which, in the judgment of the protestors, was violated by the law and which deserved greater respect than the law itself.” It is this “conscientiousness that sets it apart from ordinary criminality” (Bedau 1991, p. 9). King’s famous “Letter from Birmingham City Jail” was written to defend the use of civil disobedience to achieve civil rights in the southern United States, after one of his numerous arrests for participating in nonviolent direct action.

Civil disobedience can be used to challenge specific unjust or discriminatory laws in a democracy, where constitutional methods have failed or are unavailable for some reason, without challenging or undermining the system of government as a whole. In fact, such focused or targetted civil disobedience can strengthen or improve a democratic system through reforming or eliminating laws inimical to civil liberties or preventing equal representation and participation in the political life of the state.

Paradoxically perhaps, according to King, civil disobedience can express “the very highest respect for law” precisely because those who engage in it are willing to pay the price for doing so in order to reform and change unjust laws. “I submit that an individual who breaks a law that conscience tells him is unjust, and willingly accepts the penalty by staying in jail to arouse the conscience of the community over its injustice, is in reality expressing the very highest respect for law” (King [1963] 1991, p. 294).

Pragmatic Versus Principled Nonviolence

In some ways it seems that there are important differences between proponents of pragmatic and principled nonviolence, and yet both approaches require a sustained and consistent commitment to the use of nonviolence as the basis for effective civil resistance. This suggests that the division between principled and pragmatic proponents of nonviolence is an artificial one, and yet it retains its usefulness as an analytical device for distinguishing between the motives or reasons for the use of nonviolence as well as perhaps as a basis for identifying a broader vision of a fully just society.

According to Thomas Weber, for example, Sharp asks “whether nonviolence as a political technique can be separated from nonviolence as a moral principle” and comes to the conclusion that “belief systems and techniques are separable” (Weber 2003, p. 255), in other words, that one does not need to be a pacifist to employ nonviolent political action effectively. “Sharp differentiated the techniques of nonviolence from any set belief system, suggesting that the action and strategy were what made a movement nonviolent” (Hallward and Norman 2015, p. 20), and not moral opposition to the use of violence as such.

Thus, according to Sharp: “The primary rationale for use of nonviolent struggle has nothing to do with an ethical or religious rejection of violence” (Sharp 2005, p. 511) but rather with its efficacy as a mechanism for achieving political and social change. There is no point in preaching about the immorality of war and violence. The need, instead, is a practical or pragmatic one of developing alternative, nonviolent forms of conducting conflict and struggle.

Nonetheless, Sharp claims that the effectiveness of these methods depends at least partly upon their nonviolent character (Sharp 2005, p. 511), because of their capacity for mass popular mobilization, for example. According to Kurt Schock: “The basis of power of nonviolent resistance is the sustained mobilization of large numbers of people, which generates pressure from outside the system in order to give challenges greater leverage within institutional political and legal channels.” He goes on to claim that “armed movements are less likely to mobilize broad-based support and the support of influential allies; the barriers to participation are higher in violent movements” (Schock 2015b, p. 184). Erica Chenoweth and Maria J. Stephan provide a thorough analysis of reasons for the strategic effectiveness of nonviolence in their groundbreaking empirical study of civil resistance, Why civil resistance works: The strategic logic of nonviolent conflict (2011).

Gandhi and King, on the other hand, both had a profound ethical commitment to nonviolence, derived from a broader philosophical, theological, or even cosmological vision. Gandhi, for example, distinguished between “nonviolence as a policy” (pragmatic) and “nonviolence as a creed” (principled) (Sharp 1979, p. 96). Gandhi and King, however, were also innovative political strategists and were concerned with the effectiveness of nonviolent political action for achieving their political objectives. The moral commitment associated with principled nonviolence has a practical dimension because it can provide the satyagrahi with the confidence and courage necessary to persist with nonviolence “even in the face of severe repression and danger” and to continue with the discipline of nonviolent political action (Sharp 1979, p. 106).

Sharp, as a proponent of pragmatic nonviolence, is concerned with developing effective methods of exerting power to achieve social and political objectives, which involves defeating one’s opponent, while for proponents of ideological or principled nonviolence such as Gandhi, the focus is on transforming human relationships (especially conflict) to achieve truth, understood as human unity and the satisfaction of fundamental human needs. For Gandhi, this connects to a quest for some sort of political order that transcends the limitations of the conventional state and conforms more closely to the full ethical requirements of nonviolence or ahimsa. Similarly, King spoke of the “beloved community” as encapsulating the broader values of social justice he associated with nonviolence.

Michael Randle suggests that civil resistance in general involves a combination of the tradition of individual moral dissent, expressed by pacifism and conscientious objection to war, for example, with organized collective action for social or political change, manifested in struggles for national independence or workers' rights, for instance (Randle 1994, p. 22). Proponents and theoreticians of nonviolent action often claim that Gandhi was among the first to combine these two traditions of individual moral commitment and dissent, reflected in his principled approach to nonviolence, with a practical concern for the methods of collective action to achieve political and social change. King wrote, for example, that "Gandhi was probably the first person in history to lift the love ethic of Jesus above mere interaction between individuals to a powerful and effective social force on a large scale" (Stride toward Freedom, 1958, p. 84).

Sharp, for instance, does not extend his skepticism concerning principled nonviolence to Gandhi, since he distinguishes satyagraha as a form of collective nonviolent political struggle from the tradition of individual or individualistic dissent he finds embodied in Western pacifism. One of Sharp's books, for example, is called Gandhi as a Political Strategist. According to Sharp, "Nonviolence for Gandhi was not only personal but also social and political" (Sharp 1979, p. 92). This suggests that what is required is an understanding of nonviolent political action that incorporates both its pragmatic and its principled elements, acknowledging the power dimension of political or social change (its pragmatic aspect) while expressing concern for the intrinsic moral worth of human beings and human relationships (its principled aspect).

Summary

Nonviolence or civil resistance can be identified as a distinctive form of political action, separate from both state-based politics and political violence. As such, it involves collective action, often through civil society organizations or social movements, to achieve social or political objectives without the systematic or deliberate use of violence. Civil disobedience provides an obvious illustration or example of the distinctive character of nonviolence as a category of political action, since it involves noncooperation or even confrontation with the state or those in positions of political authority but without the use of violence.

A distinction is sometimes made between principled and pragmatic reasons for using nonviolence or civil resistance, exemplified by Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King, Jr., on the one hand, and Gene Sharp on the other. This distinction is useful analytically to help us understand different dimensions of nonviolence, although in practice Gandhi and King were masterful political strategists, while Sharp recognized that the consistent use of nonviolence strengthened its effectiveness as a form of political action.

These links between the pragmatic and principled dimensions of nonviolence and civil resistance connect to broader issues in the analysis of peace and conflict. We can ask, for example, whether nonviolence can be reduced to an innovative set of techniques or methods that avoid violence for political purposes. This involves focusing on nonviolence as a form of negative peace aimed primarily at eliminating or at least reducing or containing violence as a mechanism for achieving social or political change.

On the other hand, we can connect nonviolent political action or civil resistance to a broader vision of social justice involving a commitment to forms of social and political organization based on the peaceful or nonviolent resolution of conflict at multiple levels, from interpersonal to community, national, and even international relations. Such a commitment would also involve cognate norms or values that form part of this vision of social justice, such as the exclusively peaceful or nonviolent protection of human dignity and human rights. Thus, this broader vision of the role of nonviolence connects to positive peace, because it does not merely address political violence as a negative phenomenon but also suggests positive and constructive components of a society that recognizes the connection between social justice and peace.

Cross-References

- ▶ Pacifism and Peace
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Search for Peace, the

References

- Ackerman, P., & Duvall, J. (2000). A force more powerful: A century of nonviolent conflict. New York: Palgrave.
- Atack, I. (2012). Nonviolence in political theory. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Bedau, H. A. (1991). Introduction. In H. A. Bedau (Ed.), Civil disobedience in focus (pp. 1–12). London: Routledge.
- Bondurant, J. (1965). Conquest of violence: The Gandhian philosophy of conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Chenoweth, E., & Stephan, M. J. (2011). Why civil resistance works: The strategic logic of nonviolent conflict. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Dalton, D. (1993). Mahatma Gandhi: Nonviolent power in action. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Gandhi, M. K. (1961). Non-violent resistance (satyagraha). New York: Schocken Books.
- Gandhi, M. K. (1982). An autobiography, or, the story of my experiments with truth. Harmondsworth: Penguin.
- Hallward, M. C., & Norman, J. M. (2015). Understanding nonviolence. In M. C. Hallward & J. M. Norman (Eds.), Understanding nonviolence: Contours and contexts (pp. 14–35). Cambridge: Polity.
- King, M. L., Jr. (1958). Stride toward freedom: The Montgomery story. Boston: Beacon Press.
- King, M. L., Jr. ([1958] 1991). An experiment in love. In J. M. Washington (Ed.), A testament of hope: The essential writings and speeches of Martin Luther King, Jr. (pp. 16–20). New York: HarperCollins Publishers.
- King, M. L., Jr. ([1963] 1991). Letter from Birmingham City jail. In J. M. Washington (Ed.), A Testament of hope: The essential writings and speeches of Martin Luther King, Jr. (pp. 289–302). New York: HarperCollins Publishers.
- Mayton, D. M., II. (2001). Gandhi as peacebuilder: The social psychology of satyagraha. In D. J. Christie, R. V. Wagner, & D. A. Winter (Eds.), Peace, conflict, and violence: Peace psychology for the 21st century (pp. 307–313). Englewood Cliffs: Prentice-Hall.
- Nojeim, M. J. (2004). Gandhi and King: The power of nonviolent resistance. Westport: Praeger.
- Randle, M. (1994). Civil resistance. London: Fontana Press.
- Rawls, J. (1973). A theory of justice. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Roberts, A., & Ash, T. A. (Eds.). (2009). Civil resistance and power politics: The experience of non-violent action from Gandhi to the present. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Schell, J. (2005). The unconquerable world: Power, non-violence and the will of the people. London: Penguin Books.
- Schock, K. (2003). Nonviolent action and its misconceptions: Insights for social scientists. PS: Political Science and Politics, 36, 705–712.
- Schock, K. (2015a). Civil resistance today. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Schock, K. (2015b). Rural movements and economic policy. In M. C. Hallward & J. M. Norman (Eds.), Understanding nonviolence: Contours and contexts (pp. 171–186). Cambridge: Polity.
- Sharp, G. (1973). The politics of nonviolent action (three volumes). Boston: Porter Sargent Publishers.
- Sharp, G. (1979). Gandhi's evaluation of Indian nonviolent action. In G. Sharp (Ed.), Gandhi as a political strategist (pp. 87–120). Boston: Porter Sargent Publishers.
- Sharp, G. (2005). Waging nonviolent struggle: 20th century practice and 21st century potential. Boston: Porter Sargent Publishers.
- Sharp, G. (2012). From dictatorship to democracy: A conceptual framework for liberation. London: Serpent's Tail.
- Walzer, M. (1970). The obligation to disobey. In M. Walzer (Ed.), Obligations: Essays on disobedience, war, and citizenship (pp. 3–23). Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Watley, W. (1985). Roots of resistance: The nonviolent ethic of Martin Luther King, Jr. Valley Forge: Judson Press.
- Weber, T. (2003). Nonviolence is who? Gene Sharp and Gandhi. Peace & Change, 28(2), 250–270.

Nonviolent Peacekeeping

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Nonviolent Protection

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Normalization of Violence

- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Normative

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

North Macedonia

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The

Northern Ireland

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

O

Occupied Palestinian Territories

► Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Offline and Online (De)radicalization: An Overview of the Case of Kosovo

Florian Qehaja¹, Teuta Avdimetaj², Ramadan Ilazi^{2,3} and Skënder Perteshi²

¹Kosovar Centre for Security Studies (KCSS), Prishtina, Kosovo

²PAVE Project, Prishtina, Kosovo

³Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Keywords

Radicalization · De-radicalization · Kosovo · Online radicalization · Foreign fighters · Reintegration

Introduction

Given that radicalization is tied to global, sociological, and political drivers as well as ideological and psychological factors, its polarizing tendencies can be witnessed among various ethnic, religious, and cultural population groups. While radicalization into violent extremism can take many forms, following the rise of transnational terrorist organizations such as Al Qaeda and Islamic State (IS), the term has become largely associated with religiously inspired, and specifically Islamist-based, non-state violence. If historical cases of radicalization and violent extremism serve as a reference, it can be understood that prevalent extremist ideological tendencies can change over time based on the social and (geo)-political context. While the concept of violent extremism broadly implies any kind of “engagement in violence associated with radical political, social, cultural, and religious ideologies and groups generally” (Holmer 2013, p. 1), the contemporary intention is to prevent the spread of two particular forms of extremism (though not only): religious-based extremism and nationalism. There are increasing policy statements for “whole-society approach” (Pilkington 2018), which are reflective of an inductive line yet, not grounded empirically.

The existing trends of extremism and radicalization echoes a complex picture with no single driver whereas the general observation of scholars is lack of understanding the complexities pertaining violent extremism (Neumann 2016; Roy 2017). The EU defines violent extremism broadly, as any extremist group aiming to impose certain political or religious ideology, and often through the use of force (EU Council 2017). The prevailing security challenge is depicted by extremist groups who communicate through a distorted form of Islam, also conducting terrorist activities throughout Europe (Neumann 2016). In the Western Balkans, the rise of Islamic extremism became a new phenomenon dating from the arrival of Mujahedeen elements in early 1990s in countries such as Bosnia and Herzegovina (Azinovic and Jusic 2015, p. 70), as well as with the end of conflicts (Kosovo, North Macedonia) through the work of camouflaged NGOs and individuals from the Gulf States. The peak of the challenge was revealed by the time over 1000 individuals from the Western Balkans joined foreign conflicts in Syria and Iraq whereby there are hundreds of supporters still present in the countries and propagate the extremist ideology (Kelmendi 2018, p. 6).

The same challenge is equally found with the rise of nationalism and right-wing extremism. Nationalism is indigenous type of extremism in the Western Balkans with daunting consequences in the past whereas is being re-brought by different political parties and right-wing groups (Mujanovic 2018). The increasing narrative of nationalism is manifested into different forms of populism often promoting mono-ethnic states to the detriment of multiethnicity which has been cultivated in the last two decades – albeit limitedly – across the region. The failure to apply a more holistic approach in preventing further widespread of extremism, may lead to a heightened regional insecurity and violence, with direct implications for the EU.

This entry is based on the research conducted in the framework of the PAVE project and discusses the concept of offline and online radicalization potentially leading to violent extremism (PAVE 2020). It also examines main government and nongovernment de-radicalization initiatives in Kosovo. The first section provides an overview of how the concept of radicalization is defined in the current research, drawing on the work of different scholars and practitioners. The section notes the bias in the current research of linking the concept of radicalization with the Muslim religion. The discussion addresses both offline and online radicalization process. The second section discusses how the concept of de-radicalization is defined in the current research, including how different governments have responded to online radicalization. The third section provides an overview of the government and nongovernment de-radicalization initiatives in Kosovo that focus on community resilience and reintegration of radicalized individuals in the society. The last section offers concluding thoughts about the current state of research and the way forward.

Radicalization and Its Manifestation(s)

There is little agreement among scholars and practitioners when it comes to defining the concept of radicalization. What we know is that radicalization is not a new phenomenon and waves of its violent and terrorist expressions have been present historically, although, arguably, as a concept it has become more popular in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, against the United States. While today radicalization is normalized as a negative connotation, from a historical perspective, the term was also used to refer to progressive ideas. For instance, during and in the aftermath of the American Civil War in 1865, the concept Radical Republicans was used to refer to members of the Congress who promoted emancipation of the slaves as well as believed in the equal rights and opportunities for the freed blacks. In other words, “ideas that are radical at some point could be liberal or even conservative for another.” (Kaya 2020, p. 3). The connection between radicalization and violent actions is relatively new. Comparatively speaking, it should be noted that across all past expressions of radicalization – the number of radicalized individuals who commit to violence has been extremely low.

Since radicalization often takes place at the intersection of an enabling (structural) environment characterized by factors such as deprivation, exclusion, experience of perceived injustice, and a personal trajectory such as alienation/identity crisis, radicalization has emerged from social processes and conditions common to societies throughout modern history, encompassing numerous radical and (revolutionary) social movements (Sageman 2017). Thus, current efforts to conceptualize radicalization often borrow from the social movement theory (SMT), viewing social movements as “[a] set of opinions and beliefs in a population, which represents preferences for changing some elements of the social structure and/or reward distribution of a society.” (Zald 1987, p. 2).

Ideological and behavioral radicalization is an important dimension of our understanding of radicalization as a cognitive process. According to Peter Neumann (2013, pp. 874–875), a key difference in radicalization can be located between the “political ideas that are diametrically opposed to a society’s core values,” or “methods by which actors seek to realize any political aim.” In other words, one of the challenges in defining radicalization is the extent to which we connect (ideological) radicalization with violent actions. Neumann (2013) continues that for some governments it is mainly a cognitive process while for others there is explicit connection with violence. On the other hand, Timothy Williams (2019, p. 86) holds that ideological and behavioral radicalization “co-exist and influence each other.” In this sense, we can understand radicalization both as an incremental process of adopting extremist views and ideas but not necessarily acting on them, as well as a process through which extremist ideas influence an individual to commit violent extremist acts.

Radicalization, can be understood, both as a social, psychological, and ideological process of a person increasingly becoming receptive of radical views that also justify violence as means of achieving political goals (PAVE project, 2020). Trip et al. (2019) hold that radicalization can be viewed as a functional as well as descriptive phenomenon. While from the functional perspective radicalization is seen as a “preparation for intergroup conflict,” descriptive definitions denote a change in “beliefs, feelings, and behaviours that justify intergroup violence.” (Ibid, para. 3). Therefore, radicalization is often a diverse and multifactorial phenomenon that is difficult to pinpoint to a single variable or driver. It is a complex process whose understanding requires an all-encompassing approach that takes into account sociopolitical contexts, groups’ dynamics, and individual circumstances. Radicalization can translate into more tangible actions often leading to – what is widely being referred – violent extremism. Violent extremism is usefully defined as “the active adjustment of an ideology and associated praxis to challenge the state and its elites, usually through violence” (Joffe 2012, p. 1), while as a phenomenon most commonly observed among the marginalized. In the policy circles, violent extremism is aimed to be prevented through different holistic means, otherwise defined into Prevention of Violent Extremism (PVE). There is no internationally agreed definition of PVE yet, according to Rosand “PVE is intended to capture non-kinetic and proactive measures to prevent and counter efforts by violent extremists to radicalize, recruit, and mobilize followers to violence” (2016, p. 1).

Indeed, while Islamist radicalization dominated the terrorism research and policy responses at the international level in the post 9–11 context yet, the far right in recent years has posed a growing threat to security and peace. The current scholarship seems to overlook the impact that the wars following the breakup of Yugoslavia in the 1990s had in creating the modern far-right extremism movement, which also inspired people from Europe to join the Serbian (Orthodox) and Croatian (Catholic) armies out of religious convictions (See for more information on the war of the breakup of Yugoslavia: Denich 1994; Anderson 1995). Both Anders Breivik and the attacker of Christchurch/New Zealand, among others, were partly inspired by Serbian nationalism (Coalson 2019). But promoting ethnic-division and hatred is only part of how nationalistic ethno-political radicalization is manifested in the Western Balkans. It is also shaped by the perceived threat from Islam echoing a similar theme across the EU.

Another dimension of the national ethno-political groups in the Western Balkans is their international links, especially to Russia. Kosovo holds a particular relevance for Serbia and is an important space where ethno-national extremism combined with religion are performed (Vllasi 2020). While Pro-Russian nationalist groups are most widespread and active in Serbia, they also operate across borders in Serb-inhabited areas of neighboring countries, such as North Kosovo (Prague Security Studies Institute 2019). In addition to promoting interethnic hatred, these groups disseminate anti-Western propaganda and a narrative that aims to undermine Kosovo's territorial integrity (Ibid). The militarization of these groups – such as through reported training in Russia, youth indoctrination, and individuals joining pro-Russian forces as foreign fighters in Ukraine – is of concern (Ibid). But perhaps the most worrisome aspect of this phenomenon is the current alarming lack of information regarding the different pathways in which right wing extremism takes root and evolves in Kosovo. National ethno-political radicalism in the Western Balkans is also manifested through anti-liberal and anti-EU narratives (Kelly 2019).

The Online and Offline Dimensions

As radicalization and violent extremism studies experienced an exponential growth in the past two decades, various scholars have purported that there are multiple paths towards radicalization and violent extremism, cautioning from any attempts to draw causal relationships between the interrelated factors. Increasingly, there is a focus on psychological factors influencing an individual's cognitive susceptibility to violent extremist thought/ideology. The internet has undoubtedly transformed the communication and networking culture, and in doing so, it has created ample opportunities to expand, diversify, and access the general populace or particular targeted audience – an opportunity that has been seized by extremist groups. Determining the exact role that the internet plays in the radicalization process is subject of disagreement in academia, though there is certainty that online channels such as social media platforms, are widely utilized to spread radical ideologies, leading to an increase in extremist content that is not confined to the use of a particular entity or group (Conway 2017). A RAND report investigating 15 cases of violent extremism shows that the internet can serve as a source of information, communication, and of propaganda for extremist ideology, while also enhancing opportunities to accelerate the process of radicalization (Behr et al. 2019).

Central to the scholarly debate on the internet's role in the radicalization process is the question whether online propaganda is more effective than physical social networks (Meleagrou-Hitchens and Kaderbhai 2017). As online platforms are increasingly becoming main spheres of interaction among people, and especially youth, the internet is being viewed as instrumental in “normalizing” both radical ideas that lead to violent extremism and terrorism. Torok (2013) argues that the challenge lies in determining “the mechanisms and power relations that underlie this phenomenon of online media used to promote radicalization which in some cases can develop into terrorism” (Ibid). Narratives of victimization play an important role in the process of radicalization, especially with respect to online radicalization. Part of the reason for this is the capacity of the online platforms to have a wider reach and also the nature of the online platforms that sustain an information environment that is free from filters that check against facts and reality. In other words, this has to do with the so-called “post-truth” which means that the online platforms are more suitable to appeal to beliefs and emotions of the people (Anderson and Rainie 2017). Online radicalization narratives often involve shock and awe tactics or moral shock campaigns. Aarten, Mulder, and Pemberton (2018, p. 558) hold that: “The link between victimization experiences and radicalization can be direct, with victimization experiences serving as a causal factor in the development and extremity of religious and political views that may motivate political violence and terrorism.”

Studies investigating drivers of radicalization in Kosovo, with a primary focus on individuals who joined the foreign conflicts in Syria and Iraq, have attributed a mix of factors to the phenomenon. According to Kraja (2017, p. 5) some of these factors include “weak economy, political instability, poor education system and the rise of various Islamic nongovernmental organizations competing in Kosovo's newly democratized public sphere,” and less stringent circumstances, such as issues of identity, belonging and social isolation or outright exclusion”. They also found that extremist propaganda videos disseminated online have been vital for Islamic State's (IS) recruitment efforts. A study on the use of online narratives targeted to the Kosovo audience shows that IS exploited the vulnerabilities of the postwar society grappling with "forging an identity, past grievances pertaining to the 1998–1999 war such as wartime rape and the perceived bias against Muslims" and used this to "incite recruits from Kosovo to join its war efforts in the Middle East." (Kraja 2017, p. 6). In addition to this "the IS narrative to Kosovo's public is a power play that lures its followers with the promise of an alternative way of life in the so-called caliphate, purportedly compliant with Sharia." (Ibid, p. 6). Another report by the Kosovar Centre for Security Studies (KCSS) found that Imams have a tendency to develop their own profiles on social media platforms such as Facebook or Twitter and publish sermons and other lectures. This can be both important for counter-narrative measures as well as potentially be abused to promote radical content by lectures or sermons not sanctioned by religious authorities (Jakupi and Kelmendi 2019). The most worrisome finding of the report is that online extremist narratives are much better organized and effectively disseminated than counter-narrative activities including alternative narratives conducted by nongovernment organizations and state institutions (Ibid). However, there is a lack of evidence to suggest that an individual's radicalization took place exclusively online, whether from consumption of online propaganda or through virtual socialization. Studies suggest that the separation between online and offline environments is artificial and does not reflect the reality of pathways into violent extremism (Beadle 2017, p. 13). Instead, radicalization appears as "a blend of interconnected social processes in the 'real' as much as the 'virtual' domain" with the internet serving as a platform for these mechanisms, "a socializing setting through engagement with radical discourses exploiting vulnerabilities and hedging into social communities" (Ibid.).

Yet, a key difference between offline and online radicalization seems to be that spaces of offline radicalization are generally easier to identify, such as religious places of worship, educational establishment, and prisons. However, given the ubiquity of virtual communication, online radicalization seems difficult to both pinpoint key venues of concern, as well as devise responses that are effective. A particularly important challenge for online radicalization is also the cooperation and relationship between government and regulatory bodies and companies that have created and manage social platforms or other online communication means. There seems to be an inherent tension in deploying counter radicalization measures online, without the state appearing to establish comprehensive interception abilities that can infringe upon civil liberties and rights of citizens.

Toward Understanding De-radicalization

The current research does not provide conceptual or operational clarity concerning de-radicalization, challenging efforts to effectively address the issue of radicalization. What we know is that governments seem to increasingly recognize the importance of reintegrating in the society individuals that committed violent or terrorist acts (Horgan and Braddock 2010). But, is the goal to pacify the citizens and target their ideology or manage and prevent their potential violent behavior? (Veldhuis 2012). In a generalized context, de-radicalization refers to attempts to counter and oppose the radical doctrine, the ideological positions, or interpretations that are utilized to justify radical views as well as violence in their pursuit. Although de-radicalization, understood more broadly as the reversal of radicalization processes, remains a significant strategic policy objective in countering violent extremism, the approach suffers from a number of shortcomings. The overarching shortcoming has to do with difficulty in translating programs into a mere de-radicalization of individuals: the practice shows that the maximum de-radicalization program could reach is disengagement of individuals (Holmer 2013, p. 1).

While behavioral and cognitive elements of de-radicalization are seen as important for disrupting the radicalization process, they are often not clearly identified. That is because there are inherent challenges to determine whether changes in behavior match changes in objectives/intentions – exacerbated by the fact that de-radicalization programs are often implemented in prison contexts where inmates have strong incentives to misrepresent their views.

When it comes to de-radicalization, existing literature is also marred by a lack of empirical research investigating drivers to de-radicalize. De-radicalization programs tend to have a more limited focus on cognitive factors and the socialization context without accounting for other structural conditions. Some studies show that the process of de-radicalization is affected by the nature and trajectory of radicalization of the individual. Lina Grip and Jenniina Kotajoki (2019, p. 391) hold that “the degree of voluntarism, motivations for joining extremist groups (including ideological beliefs) and role and time spent in the organisation are suggested to have an impact on disengagement and reintegration processes.”

Disengagement and reintegration are conceptually part of exit efforts. Disengagement is a closely associated concept with behavior and cognitive elements of de-radicalization. It refers to the efforts not oriented towards convincing an individual to abandon her/his radical worldview or beliefs, but to influence the radicalized individual to disengage from violence. Disengagement is often implemented through programs that seek to develop critical thinking or counter the radical beliefs by a figure of authority. While disengagement, or the ability to desist violence, can occur without de-radicalization, it may not be possible to achieve de-radicalization without associated changes in belief, behavior, and modes of belonging. This implies a third stage – rehabilitation and resocialization. For example, in Kosovo, the government planned for a de-radicalization program that involved bringing vetted Imams to have sessions in the correctional facilities with violent extremist offenders, including foreign fighter returnees from Syria and Iraq. The goal was to counter radical ideological views through religious teachings that dispel extremist propaganda. However, because the program was sponsored by the government and was heavily promoted to show the institutions’ resolve to fight radicalization, the vetted Imams were seen as “Western collaborators.” This significantly impaired the credibility of Imams among the targeted audience in correctional facilities and rendered the program unsuccessful.

Effectively targeting and distinguishing between offline and online factors in the radicalization process has become a daunting task in de-radicalization efforts. In the framework of online de-radicalization, disruption is a central theme. The disruption approach is defined by the UK government as “working with filtering companies, disrupting the use of the internet for extremist messaging and increasing the use of the internet to promote alternative views to the radicalised messages that may otherwise be accessed.” (Behr et al. 2019, p. 4). There are two levels that top the disruption activity: (1) a technical element which involves tracing and tracking radical content online, including different channels or handles in social media platforms that disseminate such information and (2) a narrative component, disseminating counter-narratives online to the radical content.

With respect to the technical dimension of online de-radicalization through disruption, in 2017, companies such as Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube established the Global Internet Forum to Counter Terrorism (GIFCT). The forum provides direct support, including through technology and knowledge, as well as helps coordinate main stakeholders to disrupt extremist content in their platforms (GIFCT 2017). While important progress has been made by tech companies to counter radicalism and prevent their platforms from being abused by extremist groups, a key challenge remains the versatility of these groups. Groups promoting radicalism and extremist ideas if blocked or removed by a particular channel from an online social media platform, simply open a different one. One way that GIFTC has responded to this is by creating a data of “hashes” which is used as a digital fingerprint to track radical activity online (Macdonald 2018).

Overall, the burgeoning field of preventing and countering violent extremism (P/CVE) research has been exploring factors that make individuals or groups more vulnerable to radicalization. While many studies have looked into individual-level factors, in the more recent years, there is greater focus on exploring the role of communities, a meso-level type of analysis of investigating the issue. This presents a paradigm shift in the conceptualization of violent extremism – shifting away from a pathways approach focused on a person's radicalization trajectory, and towards an ecological view that takes into account how characteristics of the social environment can either incite or reduce involvement in violent extremism (Weine 2013). This increased attention towards community resilience is grounded on research that identifies community engagement as one of the main factors determining the presence, prevalence, or absence of violent extremism across contexts (Jakupi and Kraja 2018). Thus, strengthening community resilience has become the goal of numerous projects operating within the P/CVE framework, explicitly or implicitly also targeting some aspect of de-radicalization. The next section examines in more detail government and non-government initiatives that seek to build community resilience against radicalization.

Kosovo's Response to Radicalization and Violent Extremism

This section examines government and non-government initiatives in Kosovo that have demonstrated potential for building resilience in communities and for empowering local communities to intervene to prevent or disrupt the process of radicalization of members in their midst. Moreover, it explores initiatives that tie rehabilitation and reintegration efforts for individuals formerly associated with violent extremist group, including foreign fighter returnees and their family members. While the majority of available information derives from Kosovo's experience in addressing Islamist-motivated radicalization, there is a notable absence of projects or initiatives targeting right wing or specifically far right extremism. Unsurprisingly, the lack of political attention to address the issue of ethno-based extremism, particularly among Serb-majority municipalities, has led to a neglect of the issue among civil society and donor community alike.

In mapping out good practices or promising initiatives for community resilience a few initial challenges become apparent that should be recognized – namely, an ambiguity over the understanding of community resilience and a lack of systematic impact assessments of implemented P/CVE projects. To begin with, one of the challenges in identifying good practices for strengthening community resilience against online and offline radicalization is the lack of an agreed-upon definition of the concept itself. Based on an inductive thematic analysis of definitions and descriptions, community resilience remains an amorphous notion that is perceived and applied differently by different actors (Patel et al. 2017). This implies that too many projects may often be mistakenly labelled as functioning to strengthen community resilience. Alternatively, a number of projects that even though they work on supporting core elements of community resilience such as local knowledge, community networks, and relationships, or resources, they are not categorized as such.

Many projects seem to also employ counter-narratives to push back against extremist recruitment and propaganda. Counter-narratives aim to offer a positive alternative to extremist propaganda, or to deconstruct or delegitimize extremist narratives (Silverman et al. 2016). Nevertheless, while the counter-narrative approach has gained widespread acceptance, Glazzard argues that it is built on very shaky theoretical and empirical foundations (Glazzard 2017). Reed (2018) confirms that there is a lack of empirical evidence to support underlying assumptions in current counter-narrative approaches, but he also adds that the challenge is in identifying which narratives work and why. This underscores the need for the use of rigorous standards and methodologies to ensure a more effective approach, including a clear theory of change, monitoring and evaluation provisions, and application of lessons learnt in future counter-narrative campaigns (Ibid., p. 3).

The absence of systematic impact assessments as a result of inconsistent and incoherent monitoring and evaluation practices for P/CVE projects is factor that hinders efforts to identify good practices on community resilience. The evaluation of projects aimed at building community resilience is one of the main ways to assess the effectiveness of programming. Yet, practitioners can only test their programs reliably when adopting rigorous research designs, but these are often the most difficult and costly research designs to implement (Ambroznik 2018). What does constitute a good practice? What are some of the criteria used in determining whether a project has had a positive impact on community resilience, or online and offline de-radicalization more specifically? Are these criteria being applied, monitored, and evaluated consistently? In the countries/case studies that are subject of this research, there is a significant dearth of projects that seem to provide clear answers to these questions.

Kosovo citizens primarily identify through their ethnic backgrounds, i.e., Albanians, Serbs. Religion has always been a secondary source to identification, especially to Albanians who maintained religion largely in the private sphere. Kosovo's majority Albanian population is Muslim, but there are strong Albanian-Catholic as well as Protestant communities. The Serbian community in Kosovo which represents over 5% of the population is predominantly Orthodox-Christians. Kosovo is a secular state, and as Isa Blumi (2005, p. 2) notes Kosovar Albanians "have traditionally practiced Islam in ways unique to the region, practices which included the synthesis of a number of local forms of spiritual traditions which ultimately evolved into complicated rituals in which Muslims and local Christians often shared the same spiritual site." Some journalists have described Kosovo's approach to practicing Muslim religion as "Islam lite" (Irish Times 2012). In other words, secularity is not only a legal status of the state of Kosovo, but the very nature of its society.

In the aftermath of the war in 1999, Kosovo started to receive much needed help from other countries, including from Gulf States, which also brought along a variety of programs that promoted different schools of interpretation of Islam, including Wahhabism (Gall 2016) as a more conservative strain. After 1999, Kosovo's indigenous Islamic tradition was challenged by the external influence of faith-based organizations which came mainly from Gulf States and propagated a version of religious doctrine that sought to breed intolerance and oppose secularism (Blumi 2005). Kosovo postwar situation, including socioeconomic vulnerabilities were abused and exploited to create "an environment conducive to radicalization." (Shtuni 2016, p. 1).

Government of Kosovo has undertaken a number of initiatives to curb the radicalization process, especially in the aftermath of the phenomenon of foreign fighters in the country, which saw an estimated 400 citizens travel to Syria and Iraq to join violent extremist groups such as IS. Kosovo is a member of the Global Coalition to Defeat ISIS. In 2015, the government approved a national "Strategy on Prevention of Violent Extremism and Radicalisation Leading to Terrorism 2015–2020" as well as the Law on Prohibition of Joining the Armed Conflicts Outside State Territory (Kosovo Assembly 2015). Kosovo's Financial Intelligence Unit is part of the Egmont Group which strengthens cooperation internationally against money laundering and finance of terrorism. In line with efforts to strengthen the strategic and legal framework to prevent and counter violent extremism and terrorism, Kosovo is in the process of updating key strategic documents, including the strategy against terrorism. The strategy against terrorism and the strategy for the prevention of violent extremism is expected to be merged in one document and be in line with European Union (EU) acquis.

Kosovo is the only country in the Western Balkans to have established a specialized unit to focus only on rehabilitation and de-radicalization programs. The Division for Prevention and Reintegration of Radicalized Persons (DPRRI) operates under the Department for Public Safety of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. The purpose of DPRRI is to coordinate and monitor the reintegration process of radicalized individuals, and those repatriated from foreign conflicts. Ministry of Justice of Kosovo has established a rehabilitation and de-radicalization program in the Kosovo Correctional Services which primarily includes vocational training opportunities. The Ministry of Justice also launched a program with the Islamic Community of Kosovo to provide imams in the prisons to address the ideological dimension of radicalization and provide counter-narratives, but as mentioned earlier, this program was terminated.

Besides DPRRI, at the local level, the Ministry of Internal Affairs in 2016 piloted a new mechanism for early detection and prevention called the Referral Mechanism. This program proved not to be very successful in the Municipality of Gjilan with only 12 cases of early detection among youth and successful rehabilitation and reintegration in the society, through a combined intervention of peer support, family support, and counselling. The government plans to establish similar mechanisms across all municipalities of Kosovo. In addition to this, each municipality in Kosovo has established Municipal Community Safety Councils (MCSC) which are security forums where the Police Station commander participates in regular monthly meetings and reports for the security situation. MCSC include also participants from civil society, religious leaders, community leaders, and departments from the local municipal government. MCSC play an important role in de-radicalization efforts by facilitating coordination and mobilization of resources.

With respect to online de-radicalization, the government of Kosovo adopted the National Cyber Security Strategy and Action Plan 2016–2019 which states that “Extremist and radical groups are increasingly using Cyberspace for organisation and media propaganda to promote their activities, recruit new members, organize terrorist actions, and thus pose a threat to national security of the Republic of Kosovo.” (MIA 2015, p. 11). The strategy includes “incitement to terrorist acts and glorification of violence” as part of the definition of cybercrime. The strategy utilizes the concept cyberterrorism and refers it as a preferred choice for “terrorists because it can be accomplished with only modest financial resources, with anonymity, and from a great distance.” (Ibid., p. 7). However, the action plan comes short of outlining concrete measures for online de-radicalization.

Civil society in Kosovo has been a pioneer of de-radicalization efforts, including promoting important policies which the government has adopted and working more broadly within the P/CVE framework. For instance, Global Community Engagement Resilience Fund (GCERF) is a global fund that aims to strengthen community resilience by supporting local initiatives to address the drivers of violent extremism. GCEF operates in seven countries, including Kosovo where it has worked with local partners on awareness, life skills training, development of alternative narratives, leadership training, cultural and sports activities, etc. It is important to note that GCERF does not distinguish between targeting online (de)radicalization and offline (de)radicalization, though based on the type of the projects they support, it is evident that implemented activities often cover both. Although GCERF publishes information regarding project (local) partners, activity type, total resources allocated in Kosovo, there are no publicly available assessment reports on project impact – which makes it harder to evaluate whether the implemented activities follow a theory of change or resources match its stated goals. GCERF has a new supporting scheme 2020 for Western Balkans Countries which support countries to strength community resilience against violent extremism and support region in rehabilitation of the repatriated individuals from conflict zones. Under the AFM, GCERF will fund consortia of CSOs to implement initiatives aimed at enabling the environment for rehabilitation and reintegration of RFTFs and their families (GCERF 2020).

Resonant Voices Initiative (RVI) is a regional project in the Western Balkans that aims to counter terrorist propaganda, hate speech, disinformation, harassment, and intimidation present in the online sphere. This initiative addresses (de)radicalization primarily in the online sphere. It seeks to provide a platform for networking journalists, activists, and community leaders who challenge dangerous messages online, it maps online radicalization trends, and it offers training, mentoring, and technical support to counter-narrative campaigns. In such a manner, they purport to mobilize local actors to address the “weaponization” of information that targets vulnerable audiences and disrupts community cohesion with their target communities involving a diverse set of stakeholders. As part of their programs to build community actors’ skills to develop counter-narrative campaigns, they claim to provide training on impact metrics, which is encouraging in terms of testing campaign outcome. However, there is no publicly available study that provides a comprehensive analysis of how impactful the RVI projects have been. Without such a study, it becomes harder to determine the rigor of RVI project monitoring and evaluation practices and the consistency of their coherent application throughout different projects.

The Dutch Embassy in Kosovo, supported through the Netherlands’ Fund for Regional Partnership and MATRA fund has implemented a series of projects in Kosovo that target community resilience. For instance, the “Building Resilience: Communities against Violent Extremism” project is currently being implemented with the purpose of strengthening community resilience through inclusivity. This project aims to empower local communities in Kosovo, targeting women and youth to mobilize informal resilience networks against violent extremism. This project seeks to also provide local communities a platform to address security-related concerns as well as information how to facilitate the reintegration process of conflict-zone returnees. As a result of this project, one of implementing partners (KCSS) has established a Women’s Security Forum – which is the only platform in Kosovo to provide women across different municipalities in Kosovo an open venue to discuss security issues through a gender-sensitive lens. These forums offer a chance for women to address their concerns related to security, including radicalization and violent extremism, and to discuss ways in which they can mobilize in their communities to address these issues. While there is no specific targeting of online or offline (de)radicalization, the multimedia coverage of the project on raising awareness about violent extremism and how to facilitate the reintegration of FFs and their family members allows for a wider audience reach. Similarly, data are currently lacking in terms of monitoring and evaluation of these projects, which could help to determine their impact.

In Kosovo, there are also programs that focus on some of the most vulnerable groups affected by radicalization and violent extremism. For instance, “Youth for Youth- increasing resilience among the vulnerable youth in Kosovo” is a project that is currently being implemented in Kosovo to support the reintegration of children returnees from the foreign conflict zones in Syria and Iraq. While the main target audience of this project are the children returnees, children from other backgrounds participate in project activities as well – to avoid stigmatization and promote inclusiveness. This project targets offline (de)radicalization by promoting social skills of the children returnees and facilitating their reintegration in society. Its strength lies on engaging directly with the affected communities from violent extremism, fostering cooperation between civil society and institutional representatives that lead rehabilitation and reintegration efforts for FTFs and their family members. However, as the project is ongoing, to date there are no evaluations of the project activities in achieving the intended project goals. Needless to say, rehabilitation and reintegration programs present a long-term approach to tackling the issue of radicalization and violent extremism whose actual effectiveness we will be able to see years or even decades later.

It should be noted that in mapping of initiatives with the purpose of building community resilience against violent extremism, projects which function primarily in an unstructured or informal manner have not been taken into account. This entry mapped out a number of initiatives that fall within the selected criteria to support community resilience to highlight the type of projects that are being implemented in Kosovo. However, this entry does not provide an extensive evaluation of the impact of such initiatives in increasing community resilience against online and offline (de)radicalization. To a great extent, such an undertaking hinges upon publicly available data on community resilience projects and the (lack of) project monitoring and evaluation reports. Moreover, the P/CVE moniker attached to projects that seek to build community resilience often garners criticism for being too narrowly tailored to violent extremism when other issues are of equal or greater concern to communities (Weine 2015). The design and implementation of projects to foster community resilience against online and offline (de)radicalization is also donor driven, which in turn is influenced by countries' broader strategic policy framework to counter terrorism and prevent violent extremism, which may conceptualize the term resilience differently and as a result seek different ways to engage with the communities.

Summary

There is a myriad of academic and policy research showing that there is no "one-size-fits-all" definition of radicalization and violent extremism. The reason for having no widely agreed definition and concept has to do with different drivers leading to individual or structural radicalization and also the evolving types of ideological underpinnings of radicalization. There is also often a thin line dividing certain groups from transmitting their radical views from freedom of expression, especially if this is not translated into antagonizing society or, most importantly, being manifested into violence. While radicalization can greatly challenge societal cohesion and cause structural problems in every community, it is violent extremism which represent a severe concern for physical security, thereby upholding the level of fear among communities.

Kosovo case is indeed a relevant example which showed a trajectory of increased radicalization cells which have been nevertheless diminished promptly as a result of societal response. There is no single individual or structural drivers which led to tens of Kosovans joining foreign conflicts in Syria and Iraq yet, it could be concluded that diverse set of identity, socioeconomic, and individual drivers have led to many of them being prone to radical ideas. Kosovan community has cultivated for centuries certain level of resilience such as: family influence, mediation, wisdom of "community pride", mobilization against external "evil" as well as other factors, all of which – along many other factors – could have contributed to the purpose of preventing further widespread violent extremist ideologies. This is being helped through the support of number of international initiatives which, after reaching some level of donor coordination, have managed to produce tangible results. In short, community resilience combined with limited state's foothold marks a recipe for decreasing the potential of radicalization and violent extremism.

Acknowledgements PAVE project has received funding from the European Union's Horizon 2020 research and innovation program under grant agreement No 870769. The content provided in this entry reflects the author's views only. Neither the Research Executive Agency (REA) nor the European Commission are responsible for any use that may be made of the information it contains.

References

- Aarten, P. G. M., Moulder, E., Pemberton, A. (2018), n (2018). The narrative of victimization and deradicalization: An expert view. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism, 41(7), 557–572. Retrieved from <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/1057610X.2017.1311111>
- Anderson, D. (1995). The Collapse of Yugoslavia. Background and summary. Retrieved from Parliamentary Research Service – Australian Parliament. <https://www.aph.gov.au/binaries/library/pubs/rp/1995-96/96rp14.pdf>
- Anderson, J., & Rainie, L. (2017). The future of truth and misinformation online. Retrieved from Pew Research Center: <https://www.pewresearch.org/internet/2017/10/19/the-future-of-truth-and-misinformation-online/>
- Ambroznik, C. E. (2018). Countering violent extremism locally, cornell university. Retrieved from https://ecommons.cornell.edu/bitstream/handle/1813/59442/Ambrozik_cornellgrad_0058F_10853.pdf?sequence=1&isAllowed=y
- Azinovic, V., & Jusic, M. (2015). The new lure of Syrian war – The foreign fighters Bosnian Contigent. Sarajevo: The Atlantic Initiative.
- Beadle, S. (2017). How does the Internet facilitate radicalization? Retrieved from RCC: https://www.rcc.int/swp/download/docs/How_does_the_Internet_facilitate_radical.pdf/ab9f498321b2feb4c29473f0cd74242c.pdf
- Behr, I.v., Reding, A., Edwards, Ch., & Gribbon, L. (2019). Radicalisation in the digital era the use of the internet in 15 cases of terrorism and extremism, RAND Corporation. Retrieved from <https://www.rand.org/content/>

- dam/rand/pubs/research_reports/RR400/RR453/RAND_RR453.pdf
- Blumi, I. (2005). Political Islam among the Albanians: Are the Taliban coming to the Balkans? (2nd ed.). Prishtina: Kosovar Institute for Policy Research and Development (KIPRED).
- Coalson, R. (2019). Christchurch attacks: Suspect took inspiration from former Yugoslavia's ethnically fueled wars. Retrieved from Radio Free Europe: <https://www.rferl.org/a/christchurch-attacks-yugoslavia-tarrant-inspiration-suspect-new-zealand/29823655.html>
- Conway, M. (2017). Determining the role of the internet in violent extremism and terrorism: Six suggestions for progressing research. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism, 40(1), 77–98. Retrieved from <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/pdf/10.1080/1057610X.2016.1157408>
- Denich, B. (1994). Dismembering Yugoslavia: Nationalist ideologies and the symbolic revival of genocide. American Ethnologist, 367–390.
- EU Council. (2017). Conclusions on EU external action on counter-terrorism. Brussels: Council of the European Union.
- Gall, C. (2016, May 21). How Kosovo was turned into fertile ground for ISIS. Retrieved from The New York Times: <https://docs.house.gov/meetings/FA/FA00/20170614/106115/HHRG-115-FA00-20170614-SD002.pdf>
- Glazzard, A. (2017, May). Losing the plot: Narrative, counter-narrative and violent extremism. Retrieved from <https://icct.nl/wp-content/uploads/2017/05/ICCT-Glazzard-Losing-the-Plot-May-2017.pdf>
- Global Internet Forum to Counter Terrorism (GIFCT). (2017). <https://gifct.org/about/>
- Grip, L., Kotajoki, J. (2019). Deradicalisation, disengagement, rehabilitation and reintegration of violent extremists in conflict-affected contexts: A systematic literature review. Conflict, Security & Development, 19(4), 371–402. Retrieved from <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1080/14678802.2019.1626577?journalCode=ccsd20>
- Holmer, G. (2013). Countering violent extremism: A peacebuilding perspective. Washington, DC: USIP.
- Horgan, J., & Braddock, K. (2010). Rehabilitating the terrorists?: Challenges in assessing the effectiveness of de-radicalization programs. Terrorism and Political Violence, 22, 267–291. Routledge. Retrieved from <https://www.start.umd.edu/sites/default/files/files/publications/Derad.pdf>
- Irish Times. (2012, April 12). 'Islam-lite' Kosovars determined to stay secular. Retrieved from <https://www.irishtimes.com/news/islam-lite-kosovars-determined-to-stay-secular-1.499614>
- Jakupi, R., & Kraja, G. (2018). Accounting for the difference: Vulnerability and resilience to violent extremism in Kosovo. Retrieved from https://www.berghof-foundation.org/fileadmin/redaktion/Publications/Other_Resources/WB_PVE/CTR_CaseStudy3Kosovo_e.pdf
- Jakupi, R., & Kelmendi, V. (2019). Countering the myths of IS: How to counter the IS narrative online? The case of Albanian-speaking countries, Kosovar Centre for Security Studies. Retrieved from http://www.qkss.org/repository/docs/Countering-ISIS-myths-eng_724280.pdf
- Joffe, G. (2012). Introduction: Antiphonal responses, social movements and networks. In G. Joffe (Ed.), Islamist radicalisation in North Africa: Politics and process (pp. 1–8). London: Routledge.
- Kaya, A. (2020). Assessment by Ayhan Kaya, Advisory Board Member of the PAVE project.
- Kelly, L. (2019). Overview of research on far right extremism in the Western Balkans. Brighton: K4D Helpdesk Report. Institute of Development Studies.
- Kelmendi, V. (2018). Citizens perception and community response on returned foreign fighters. Prishtina: Kosovar Center for Security Studies (KCSS).
- Kosovo Assembly. (2015). The law on the prohibition of joining armed conflicts outside state territory. Retrieved from <http://old.kuvendikosoves.org/common/docs/ligjet/05-L-02.pdf>
- Kraja, G. (2017). The Islamic State narrative in Kosovo deconstructed one story at a time, Kosovar Centre for Security Studies. Retrieved from http://www.qkss.org/repository/docs/ISNinKosovo-eng_794656.pdf
- Macdonald, S. (2018). How tech companies are trying to disrupt terrorist social media activity. Retrieved from Scientific American: <https://www.scientificamerican.com/article/how-tech-companies-are-trying-to-disrupt-terrorist-social-media-activity/>
- Meleagrou-Hitchens, A. A., & Nick, A. K. (2017). The impact of digital communications technology on radicalization and recruitment. International Affairs, 93, 1233–1249. 10.1093/ia/iix103. Retrieved from https://www.researchgate.net/publication/319431504_The_impact_of_digital_communications_technology_on_radicalization_and_recruitment
- Ministry of Internal Affairs of the Republic of Kosovo, National Cyber Security Strategy and Action Plan 2016–2019. Retrieved from http://www.kryeministriks.net/repository/docs/National_Cyber_Security_Strategy_and_Action_Plan_2016-2019_per_publicim_1202.pdf
- Mujanovic, J. (2018). Hunger and fury: The crisis of democracy in the Western Balkans. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Neumann, P. (2013). The trouble with radicalization. International Affairs (Royal Institute of International Affairs 1944-), 89(4), 874–875. Retrieved from <http://www.jstor.org/stable/23479398>
- Neumann, P. R. (2016). Radicalized: New jihadists and the threat to the west. London: Bloomsbury Publishing.
- Patel, S. S., Rogers, M. B., Amlôt, R., & Rubin, G. J. (2017). What do we mean by 'community resilience'? A systematic literature review of how it is defined in the literature. Retrieved from <http://currents.plos.org/disasters/index.html%3Fp=28783.html>

- Pilkington, H. (2018, August 1). Violent extremism: How communities can help counter it. Retrieved from The Conversation: <https://theconversation.com/violent-extremism-how-communities-can-help-counter-it-100622>
- Prague Security Studies Institute. (2019). Briefing paper VI: EXTERNAL INFLUENCE IN EXTREMISM AND RADICALISM. Retrieved from <https://www.balkancrossroads.com/bp-vi-extremism-radicalism>
- Preventing and Addressing Violent Extremism through Community Resilience (PAVE). (2020). Horizon 2020 Project, European Union Framework Programme for Research and Innovation, European Commission. <https://www.pave-project.eu/downloads>
- Reed, A. (2018). An inconvenient truth: Countering terrorist narratives – fighting a threat we do not understand, international centre for counter-terrorism – The Hague. Retrieved from <https://icct.nl/publication/an-inconvenient-truth-countering-terrorist-narratives-fighting-a-threat-we-do-not-understand/>
- Rosand, E. (2016). Communities first: A blueprint for organizing and sustaining a global movement against violent extremism. Washington, DC: The Prevention Project.
- Roy, O. (2017, April 13). Who are the new jihadis? Retrieved from The Guardian: <https://www.theguardian.com/news/2017/apr/13/who-are-the-new-jihadis>
- Sageman, M. (2017). Turning to political violence the emergence of terrorism. University of Pennsylvania Press, JSTOR. Retrieved from <http://www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctv2t49xr>
- Shtuni, A. (2016). Dynamics of radicalization and violent extremism in Kosovo. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace (USIP).
- Silverman, T., Stewartl, C. J., Amanullah, Z., & Birdwell, J. (2016). THE IMPACT OF COUNTER-NARRATIVES Tanya Silverman Christopher J. Stewart Insights from a year-long cross-platform pilot study of counter-narrative curation, targeting, evaluation and impact. Retrieved from https://www.isdglobal.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/08/Impact-of-Counter-Narratives_ONLINE_1.pdf
- Torok, R. (2013). Developing an explanatory model for the process of online radicalization and terrorism. SpringerOpen, Security Informatics, Article number 6. Retrieved from <https://security-informatics.springeropen.com/articles/10.1186/2190-8532-2-6#citeas>
- The Global Community Engagement and Resilience Fund (GCEF). (2020). Kosovo. <https://www.gcerf.org/kosovo/>
- Trip, S., Bora, C. H., Marian, M., Halmajan, A., & Drugas, M. I. (2019). Psychological mechanisms involved in radicalization and extremism. A Rational Emotive Behavioral Conceptualization. Retrieved from Frontiers in Psychology: <https://www.frontiersin.org/articles/10.3389/fpsyg.2019.00437/full>
- Veldhuis, T. (2012). Designing rehabilitation and reintegration programmes for violent extremist offenders: A realist approach, ICCT research paper. Retrieved from <http://icct.nl/app/uploads/2015/05/ICCT-Veldhuis-Designing-Rehabilitation-Reintegration-Programmes-March-2012.pdf>
- Vllasi, E. (2020). Russian influence in Kosovo: In the shadows of myth and reality. Prishtina: Kosovar Centre for Security Studies (KCSS).
- Weine, S. (2013). Building community resilience. Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, 14(2), 81–89.
- Weine, S. (2015). Best practices for developing resilient communities and addressing violent extremism. Retrieved from <https://www.start.umd.edu/publication/best-practices-developing-resilient-communities-and-addressing-violent-extremism>
- Williams, T. (2019). Ideological and behavioural radicalisation into terrorism – an alternative sequencing. Journal for Deradicalization, 85–107. Retrieved from <https://journals.sfu.ca/jd/index.php/jd/article/download/215/155>
- Zald, M. N. (1987). Social movements in an organizational society: Collected essays. New Brunswick: Transaction Books.

Ohrid Framework Agreement, The

Lura Pollozhani
Centre for Southeast European Studies,
University of Graz, Graz, Austria

Synonyms

Consociational democracy; Minority rights; North Macedonia; Peace agreements

Definition

The Ohrid Framework Agreement is a peace agreement which marked the end of the interethnic conflict in North Macedonia (This article uses the new constitutional name of North Macedonia resulting from the Prespa Agreement and the subsequent constitutional changes in 2019 (Final Agreement 2019). The name “Macedonia” is used when referred to in original quotations) in 2001 between the Macedonian state and the ethnic Albanian guerilla group, the National Liberation Army. It is an agreement which ensured education, language, decentralization, and equitable representation rights for non-majority communities which constitute at least 20% of the population. Non-majority communities in North Macedonia are the Albanian, Turkish, Bosnian, Serbian, Romani, and Vlach communities, whereas the threshold of 20% at the state level is only reached by the Albanian community, at the local level all communities reach the threshold in a given municipality or municipalities. The Ohrid Framework Agreement laid the foundation for a power-sharing arrangement in the country. The constitutional and legislative amendments that the Agreement entailed have largely changed the political and legal landscape of the country enabling the inclusion of the ethnic Albanian and other communities and advancing their equal and equitable treatment.

The Ohrid Framework Agreement

The Ohrid Framework Agreement (OFA) ended the 2001 interethnic conflict in North Macedonia (see chapter ► “Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia”) between the Macedonian state and ethnic Albanian fighters under the Albanian National Liberation Army (NLA), establishing the pillars of consociational democracy (Lijphart 1977). The OFA had to address numerous issues and disparities of the society of North Macedonia and most importantly had to instill trust and legitimacy in the state for all communities. As Bieber (2020) notes, until the 2001, state legitimacy had been a key challenge to the authorities particularly in regard to the Albanian community. He adds that despite the fact that Albanians had been formally included in the government since the state’s independence in 1991, it still “remained dominated by the Macedonian majority, with few Albanians employed by the state and the constitutional and institutional self-understanding of a nation state. This only changed (partially) through the 2001 conflict and the Ohrid Framework Agreement” (Bieber 2020, p. 21). The role of the conflict goes hand in hand with the OFA because the conflict accelerated the solutions to issues that non-majority communities, particularly the ethnic Albanian, had been trying to articulate and advocate for since 1991. North Macedonia left Yugoslavia without a conflict and through a peaceful process, and as a result many of the institutions and practices of the way the state functioned under Yugoslavia, as well as many of its disparities, remained, or even deepened, including its relations with non-majority ethnic groups. As Bieber succinctly notes, “[w]hile North Macedonia lacked a revolutionary moment as in Serbia or a clear democratic breakthrough as in Croatia, the Ohrid Framework Agreement was a turning point” (Bieber 2020, p. 55). The OFA became the first major challenge in the new state and, as such, reconfigured the relationship of the state with its citizens.

The OFA was agreed upon in the town of Ohrid, from where it gets its name, and was signed in the capital of Skopje on August 13, 2001. The agreement was signed by President Boris Trajkovski, who was also the initiator of the talks; the leaders of two of the major ethnic Macedonian political parties, the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization-Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (VMRO-DPMNE) and Social Democratic Union of Macedonia (SDSM); and the two major ethnic Albanian political parties, the Democratic Party of Albanians (DPA) and the Party for Democratic Prosperity (PPD) (it is important to note that the NLA had no separate representatives in the negotiations, instead being represented by the ethnic Albanian political parties). Lastly, the OFA was also signed by two witnesses, Special Representative of the European Union (EU) Francois Leotard and Special Representative of the United States (USA) James Pardew, who were the main mediators and guarantors of the agreement. While Florian Bieber and Soren Keil (2009) have noted that North Macedonia and indeed any of the countries in the Western Balkans cannot be considered as “a fully fledged consociational democracy” (p. 340), the OFA has been instrumental in establishing a power-sharing arrangement along the lines described by Bieber and Keil (2009) as one that “supports the inclusion of different ethnic groups in decision-making bodies at the central, regional and local levels, allows for the self-governance of these groups and provides them with veto rights or other comparable protections from being outvoted” (p. 340).

The agreement rests on the basic principle that there “are no territorial solutions to ethnic issues” (OFA 2001, Article 1.2, p. 1) as the NLA did not pursue an outright secessionist agenda (Bieber and Keil 2009, p. 345), thus the agreement reaffirms the territorial integrity of the state. The OFA rests on five pillars: decentralization, non-discrimination and equitable representation, parliamentary representation, education and use of language, and expression of identity. These pillars largely represent the main grievances that the ethnic Albanian population living in North Macedonia had. While the OFA mentions the word “Albanian” only once in its main text when referring to the cessation of hostilities, it has widely been used by the ethnic Albanian community to increase its rights and representation within the country, which will be further explored in the following section. However, the agreement itself uses the term “communities of at least 20%” or makes referrals to “at least 20% of the population”, not mentioning any community in particular. In addition to its main text, the OFA holds three annexes that set out the way in which it will be implemented, namely, Annex A, Constitutional Amendment; Annex B, Legislative Modifications; and Annex C, Implementation and Confidence-Building Measures. The annexes show that the OFA “was conceptualized as a framework” (Spaskovska 2010, p.14) which “implies a process of legal development rather than the conclusive settlement of all issues relating to interethnic relation” (Bieber 2004, p. 244), therefore setting out guidelines for steps that needed to be agreed with a broader consensus in parliament. The OFA did not include a detailed framework such as the so-called Ahtisaari Plan for Kosovo, leaving many aspects open to further deliberation and change.

The development of a decentralized government established under Article 3 of the Agreement constitutes a key pillar for its implementation and addressing the concerns of ethnic Albanians. Decentralization is a tool which ensures that governance is closer to the citizens and which can enable a more equitable share of resources. It also constituted a key request by ethnic Albanian leaders and NLA fighters. Since the NLA did not seek secession, substantial decentralization of the country would enable adequate and equitable representation and distribution of resources starting from the local level. The Agreement foresees a new census under Article 3.2 along with a revisiting of the municipal boundaries of the country. The new census, which was carried out in 2002, was particularly important for an agreement which bases the distribution of rights on the percentage of the communities. This aspect of the Agreement has, over the years, become a further point of contestation with communities arguing about the real number of the different communities which could either enable or inhibit the enjoyment of more rights (Vrgova 2015; for more details on the politics of censuses, see chapter ► “Census Politics in Deeply Divided Societies” in this volume). As decentralization serves to tackle representation and an equitable distribution of resources (due to fiscal decentralization), Article 4 of the OFA targets nondiscrimination and equitable representation, including the equal treatment and the equitable representation of communities in terms of employment. The issue of employment had to be addressed due to the large disparities particularly in the public sector, as at the time of the conflict in 2001, “84.5% of the employed were ethnic Macedonians, while only 7.5% were Albanians” (Brunnbauer 2004, p. 580). This large disparity is why employment in the public sector constituted one of the priority issues for the NLA and the Albanian political parties. Article 4 also regulates the employment of judges, specifying that for the Constitutional Court “one-third of the judges will be chosen by the Assembly by a majority of the total number of Representatives that includes a majority of the total number of Representatives claiming to belong to the communities not in the majority in the population of Macedonia” (OFA 2001, Article 4. 3, p.3). The inclusion of the employment of judges is particularly important, as even in contemporary North Macedonia, as the trust of the judicial system among the Albanians and other minorities continues to be lower than among ethnic Macedonians (Taleski et al. 2016, p. 33). This has been a result of the handling of highly sensitive cases, such as the Sopot case, where a group of Albanians were arbitrarily convicted and arrested (Taleski et al. 2016) affecting the public perception of the legal system among ethnic Albanians.

OFA's Article 5 addresses the issue of parliamentary inclusiveness in the sense that it establishes a mechanism through which issues that are important to non-majority communities are approved by them as well. Thus, Article 5 establishes the principle of a qualified two-thirds majority, or what has come to be known as the Badinter majority (Spaskovska 2010, p. 14) which requires a double majority from the ethnic Macedonian representatives and the representatives of other communities, on issues such as education, language rights, local finances, the city of Skopje, use of symbols, etc. All of these issues that need a Badinter majority are issues for which Albanians had been struggling to create inclusive policies on in the first decade of the republic, setting up a new mechanism to improve the quality of representation. Since non-majority communities themselves have never constituted a majority without the votes of Macedonian parties, the adoption of laws that would affect them would be very difficult; with the Badinter majority, their influence on policies affecting them is guaranteed. There are two other pressing issues that the OFA addresses, which were part of the NLA demands and those of Albanian political parties: education and the use of languages that are not the Macedonian language. The OFA guarantees education in the primary and secondary level in the "students' native language" (OFA 2001, Article 6, p. 3) which was also previously foreseen with the Constitution of the country and is to the benefit of several non-majority communities in North Macedonia, with teaching provided in Macedonian, Albanian, and Turkish. What was novel in the OFA is the guarantee of state funding for university-level teaching. This responded to a long-held priority of enabling education in Albanian as political parties had "consistently campaigned to give Albanian a more prominent place as a language of instruction in the educational system, arguing in particular that the unavailability of higher education through the medium of Albanian discriminates against the Albanian-speaking population" (Brown 2000, p. 130). If we consider the fact that at the point of the OFA being signed the only university that filled this condition- teaching university level classes in Albanian- was the University of Tetovo which was still an illegal entity (Koppa 2001, p. 51; for more details, see chapter ► "Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia"), the provision for state funded university education was an important step in ensuring improvement in the area of university education for the Albanian community. More specifically, with the OFA, the state funding is provided for education in the language spoken by at least 20% of the population which has ensured higher education in Albanian, as they continue to be the only non-majority community that meets the threshold.

The OFA also sets out to regulate the use of language at the national and at the local level. Brown (2000) notes that a "key concern in Albanian political activism within Macedonia has been the place of the Albanian language in the state" (p.130) and the issue of the use of the Albanian language continues to be a concern in contemporary politics. The persistence of this issue is a result of the difficulty the parties faced in reaching a clear agreement on settling the status of the Albanian language during the OFA negotiations, which is why Article 6 regulates the use of languages by affirming that Macedonian and its alphabet is the official language, as well as any other language which is spoken by at least 20% of the population (OFA 2001, p. 3) however the use of language as stipulated in the Agreement has yet to be implemented fully. At the local level, any language other than Macedonian spoken by at least 20% of the population is also official, whereas languages which are spoken by less than 20% of the population are delegated to a decision by the local authorities. To date, the language threshold at the national level includes only the use of the Albanian language, in addition to the Macedonian language, whereas at the local level there is more diversity with Serbian, Turkish, Bosnian, Romani and Vlach languages having official status either by reaching the threshold or by voluntary voting of the city council. The expression of identity constitutes the last pillar upon which the OFA is built and, as the other pillars, is shrouded in the historical context of the country. In 1997, the mayor of Gostivar, a city in the southern region of the country, was arrested due to showing national symbols of another state, in this case the Albanian flag, and four people died in the clashes involving the incident (Koppa 2001, p. 44; for more details, see chapter ► “Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia”). In Article 7 of the OFA (2001, p. 3), local authorities are allowed to use emblems which mark a community’s identity, next to the state emblem. This is a particularly important aspect as it opened up the state to allowing the expression of identities other than the ethnic Macedonian. The protection of public space for the display of only state symbols, which in themselves were perceived to constitute symbols which are largely significant to the ethnic majority of the country, contributed to the feelings of exclusion of other communities from public space and from engaging more actively with the state. The OFA main agreement text finishes with this issue and goes on with the stipulations on the implementation of the agreement. The next stage for the Agreement to be transposed into legislation was its presentation at the Assembly for its adoption, which constituted an important second stage of negotiations, considering that the implementation of the OFA would need to be followed with the development of further legal and regulatory frameworks, which are still ongoing to this day.

Accommodation of Communities Post-OFA

The constitutional and legislative changes which have been adopted to enable the full implementation of the OFA have been several and have spanned a longer period than initially foreseen due to contestations and disagreements by different political actors. One point of contention regarding the Constitution at the outset was the changes to the Preamble. The agreement itself already poses a wording for the Preamble; however, this is not the same wording which was later adopted by the members of parliament. The main difference between the text suggested in the OFA and the Preamble which was later adopted is that the wording on the OFA is largely civic-based, while the agreed wording was “[c]arved along ethnic lines but also ambiguously evoking civic values” (Spaskovska 2010, pp. 14–5). To illustrate this, see the Preamble of the 1991 Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia that states:

Taking as the points of departure the historical, cultural, spiritual and statehood heritage of the Macedonian people and their struggle over centuries for national and social freedom as well as for the creation of their own state [...] as well as the historical fact that Macedonia is established as a national state of the Macedonian people, in which full equality as citizens and permanent co-existence with the Macedonian people is provided for Albanians, Turks, Vlachs, Romanians and other nationalities living in the Republic of Macedonia [...]. (Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia 1991, Preamble)

Preambles are significant because they delineate the belonging to the state, who is an insider and who is not. The Preamble of the Macedonian constitution was contentious because it very clearly established the state as belonging to the Macedonian people. Hence, the wording for the Preamble stipulated by the OFA to replace the original text suggested a strictly civic interpretation, whereby it lists the citizens of the state as the “owners” of the state rather than citing any one particular group or people:

The citizens of the Republic of Macedonia, taking over responsibility for the present and future of their fatherland, aware and grateful to their predecessors for their sacrifice and dedication in their endeavors and struggle to create an independent and sovereign state of Macedonia [...]. (OFA 2001, Annex A)

However, this wording was not satisfactory for ethnic Macedonian parties, as they also wanted to include the national element to it; therefore, the Preamble which was agreed upon with Amendment IV to the Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia stipulated the following:

The citizens of the Republic of Macedonia, the Macedonian people, as well as citizens living within its borders who are part of the Albanian people, the Turkish people, the Vlach people, the Serbian people, the Romany people, the Bosniak people and others taking responsibility for the present and future of their fatherland [...]. (Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia, Amendment IV).

The compromise text initiates the Preamble with the word “citizens” but goes on to list them, separating the Macedonian people primarily and then listing the other communities living in North Macedonia while not entirely abandoning the “hierarchization” of belonging. This formulation of the Preamble has remained the same and has received wide consensus although there is recurring criticism that the opportunity for building a civic country was missed at this critical juncture. Ljubica Spaskovska (2010, pp. 23-4) argues that the “ethno-national conception of citizenship, emphasising the ‘ownership’ of the country by its ethnic Macedonian majority [...] was replaced after the 2001 conflict by an ethnicised one, whereby belonging to one of Macedonia’s ethnic communities became the primary factor.” However, this was already the case with the previous formulation of 1991, only that now, with the OFA, a different way of the enactment of citizenship through ethnicity among non-majority communities was introduced. The text which was agreed upon shows the persistent importance of symbolism and of ethnic groups in North Macedonia, which did not cease to matter with the instillation of the OFA into the constitutional and legal framework of the country.

The hesitation toward a more open conception at the outset was to be expected, as well as a hesitation toward change, as “power-sharing systems must be conceived of as being more flexible and process oriented, eventually leading to a diminishing of ethnic identity, rather than static and unchangeable” (Bieber 2004, p. 239). Indeed, the implementation of the OFA and the changes that it has caused in the topography of politics in North Macedonia must be understood as a long process which still influences contemporary politics and thinking. Firstly, the OFA and its subsequent legislative amendments had important implications on the electoral system and representation in the country. With the changes to the Law on Local Self-Government in 2002 (Закон за локална самоуправа 2002) and the Law on Territorial Organisation of the Local Self-Government in 2004 (Закон за Територијалната Организација на Локалната Самоуправа во Република Македонија 2004), there was a significant reduction in the number of municipalities, from 123 to 84 (Spaskovska 2010, p. 15). This has important implications, because by changing the borders of municipalities some municipalities, mainly in the southwest region, such as Struga and Kichevo, where a majority of ethnic Albanians live, would have new municipal borders where the ethnic Albanian population would be a majority within the municipality, which would result in more locally elected officials being representative of ethnic Albanians and other non-majority communities living in a given municipality. In short, these municipal border changes ensured that there would be units of local self government which were governed by the majority in a given unit (municipality) even if the community was a non-majority community at the national level, better reflecting the population living within the borders of the unit. The same applies for the municipal border changes within the city of Skopje, which was separated into 11 municipalities with the aim of having equitable representation of communities across the capital. If the city had been considered as one unit, that would have meant a limitation to the exercise of rights such as the use of language and education at the local level for non-majority communities since the 20% threshold would be harder to reach. Ognen Vangelov (2017) notes that negotiations between the political parties on the municipal border changes also “focused on gerrymandering in ethnically mixed areas [...] [t]he junior Albanian partner insisted on creating a number of municipalities where Albanians would become new majorities in Western Macedonia” (p. 27) which would have implications for local elections and the representation of parties representing non-majority communities, including the ethnic Albanian parties, in winning mayoral and city council positions. The reduction of municipalities would also have important implications for the enjoyment of other rights, most notably in regard to language rights, whereby a community has to constitute at least 20% for its language to be official at the local level, which with shifting municipal borders would be reached by more communities at the local level. In a context where even adequate local representation had been elusive to non-majority communities, this was a significant step forward. Nevertheless, it has made the electoral system an enabler of ethnic politics, as “for two decades the Macedonian electorate has been caught up in the web of constant ‘ethnification of the political process’” (Bieber as cited in Spaskovska 2010, p. 21). This shows another aspect of the complexity of multiethnic politics in North Macedonia and of the challenges of the OFA. Namely, neither the agreement nor the changes that it foresaw guarantee reserved seats for communities, as is the case in Kosovo, for example. Thus, the crux of the electoral balance of the current system, which at the same time has been a vicious circle of ethnic politics, is the fact that for communities to be represented in the Assembly or at the local level by a member of their ethnic group, if this is to be considered (as it has mostly been) the most adequate form of representation, then ethnic politics and rhetoric will not altogether be missing from the political space.

Another important change foreseen by the OFA and implemented by constitutional and legislative changes is the principle of a qualified two-thirds majority or the Badinter principle, which enables non-majority communities to have an influence on decision-making on issues which directly affect them. This principle has considerably shifted decision-making as other communities have the power to stop legislation that is harmful to them, or not in their interest. This would not have been able to be achieved without this principle as party representing nonmajority communities would be able to reach a sufficient number of seats to veto policies. However, this principle has also been criticized for not enabling the influence of all communities. As Bieber and Keil (2009) explain:

This concept, which is also part of the Macedonian Constitution, ensures the recognition of all minorities- not only the Albanian population of Macedonia. This form of special majorities is, however, limited to the areas of constitutional changes, culture, language, education, identification and symbols, plus the laws on local self-government. This rather restricted form of (indirect) veto rights, while having the advantage of avoiding constant blocking, has been criticized for the enforcement of Macedonia’s binational division and the dominance of the Albanian minority over other minorities in Macedonia. (p. 353)

Indeed, due to the constitutional, legislative, and political changes that OFA has entailed, it has often been criticized within the country and more generally that instead of promoting the consolidation of a multiethnic state, the OFA has created a binational state “that empowers Macedonians and Albanians at the expense of smaller minorities” (Bieber and Keil 2009, p. 352). Jelena Džankić (2015) notes two weaknesses of the agreement: first, it “induced the ethnic fragmentation of citizenship and hardened the lines between the ethnic Macedonians and ethnic Albanians; and second, it increased the perception of the identity threat both from inside the country and from the outside” (p. 85). Though it must be noted that citizenship in North Macedonia was already fragmented before the OFA, the criticism of the agreement that what should have done away with fragmentation is simply reinforcing it through other lines, is a poignant one.

However, this criticism cannot be directed solely at the Agreement itself, but rather to the reactions of the political elites and the population toward it. The strengthening of fragmentation particularly is due to a diverging narrative on the meaning of the OFA and its importance to the political and social landscape of the country. Namely, while ethnic Albanians lauded the agreement as a victory, ethnic Macedonians largely considered the Agreement as a loss. Robert Pichler (2009) highlights this divergent vision by noting that:

[b]y establishing a system of power-sharing, the former model, which favored the ethnic Macedonian majority, was abandoned. In exchange, ethnic Macedonians were guaranteed the territorial integrity of the Macedonian state, a circumstance that excluded any territorial solution to ethnic conflict, something, however, they had regarded as self-evident from the very beginning. As a consequence, the OFA was seen by Albanians as an important step forward, whereby Macedonians regarded it an unjust and forced compromise that rewarded the use of violence against the democratically elected state institutions. (p. 218)

This perspective of the OFA persists to the present day, as it has never stopped being a target for ethno-national rhetoric. Ognen Vangelov (2017) cites a study 7 years after the signing of the agreement, whereby “70% of the ethnic Albanians believed that the agreement provided a good long-term solution for Macedonia, while only 30% of Macedonians agreed” (p. 26). Brunnbauer (2004), on the other hand, notes a different aspect to the agreement by stating that the “new constitution combines the concept of civic citizenship with elements of de facto consociationalism, and satisfies the demand of the Albanian minority to help shape the destiny of their country using a collective voice” (p. 565). Indeed, despite the weaknesses that it has, the OFA managed to open up the space of Macedonian politics and society to include the ethnic Albanian and other communities in state-building and to give them a voice in their future within the state.

The Agreement’s Implementation Influence in Contemporary Politics

The implementation of the OFA is still not a fait accompli; however, large strides have been made in recent years. In the first years after its signing, the OFA faced considerable challenges, leading Ulf Brunnbauer to note that the first 2 years “proved that external monitoring, support and occasionally intervention is crucial for the realization of the planned reforms because, without international mediation, the political parties in the Republic of Macedonia hardly find compromises on [...] vital issues” (as quoted in Bieber and Keil 2009, p. 359). The reforms that the OFA entailed continue to lead to polemics, the most significant of which is the use of language. While the OFA and the subsequent Amendment V of the Constitution established that the official language of the state is the Macedonian language and its Cyrillic alphabet and “[a]ny other language spoken by at least 20% of the population” (Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia, Amendment V), the implementation of this provision was lagging behind. This led to the 2008 Law on the Use of Languages, which was considered insufficient by all ethnic Albanian parties because it was not being implemented and because it did not address the application of the use of languages in different areas, such as education or culture, leaving a lot of space for interpretation, thus making the law very selective and not providing a solution to the issue of the use of language. As a result, with the 2017 parliament, a new law on the use of languages was adopted and came into force on January 14, 2019. The 2019 Law on the Use of Languages make the 2008 Law void and invalid. The public debate on the adoption on the Law on the Use of Languages was ethnically charged, with strong opposition by several Macedonian academics, often with the use of racist language and invoking strong ethnonational rhetoric (Gruevska-Madzovska 2018), showing how sensitive the topic of minority rights still is in the context of North Macedonia.

This might be a result of what Spaskovska (2012) calls the “‘fractured’ nature” (p. 392) of the citizenship framework post-OFA. However, the fractured nature of the state has been its fixture since its independence, and with the signing of the OFA, the fracture became further defined and regulated. For all its merits and shortcomings, the OFA initiated a top-down process of inclusion, which makes its implementation difficult, further hampering policies which would enable a move beyond it. Even the Assembly was not in agreement with all the OFA represented which is why changes to the Constitution took longer to adopt and implement. The citizens, too, continue to have two separate interpretations of the meaning of the OFA and the meaning of a multiethnic society. However, not all has been lost; there have also been new opportunities for the country in establishing the legacy of the OFA and its spirit. With the constitutional changes which were necessitated by the change of the name as a result of the Prespa Agreement between North Macedonia and Greece, the Preamble of the Constitution was changed yet again, and this time, it was changed to also include the OFA as one of the key documents which characterize the state (Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia, Amendment XXXIV). In addition, the parliamentary elections of 2016 presented for the first time large cross-ethnic voting, as many ethnic Albanians chose to vote for a traditionally ethnic Macedonian party. As a result, the government advanced the concept of “one society” with the adoption of the National Strategy for the development of the concept of one society and interculturalism 2020-2022. These recent changes and shifts were mainly made possible due to the wave of protests which encapsulated the country between 2013 and 2016 which saw the mobilization of different ethnic groups to combat state capture and illiberal practices by the VMRO-DPMNE-led government. This was a significant shift as the protests and movements culminating with the Sarena Revolucija (Colorful Revolution) were the first instance where different communities were participating in protests together in large numbers, across the country. These were followed by counterprotests which were heavy in nationalist rhetoric and chants, showing that in North Macedonia, still, with every step forward, there is also a step backward. In the context of the fulfillment of the vision set out by the OFA, it can be concluded that it continues to be a process which is often challenged by political and intellectual elites. Its legacy and influence on the state have been significant in that it has enabled the expansion of access and belonging to the state for the different communities living in the country and has established the foundations for the construction of a multiethnic democracy and inclusive society which remains an unfulfilled mission.

Cross-References

- ▶ Census Politics in Deeply Divided Societies
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia

References

- Bieber, F. (2004). Power sharing as ethnic representation in post conflict societies: The cases of Bosnia, Macedonia and Kosovo. In A. M. Pippidi & I. Krastev (Eds.), Nationalism after communism: Lessons learned (pp. 231–249). Budapest/New York: Central European University Press.
- Bieber, F. (2020). The rise of authoritarianism in the western Balkans. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bieber, F., & Keil, S. (2009). Power-sharing revisited: Lessons learned in the Balkans? Review of Central and East European Law, 34, 337–360.

- Brown, K. (2000). In the realm of the double-headed eagle: parapoltics in Macedonia, 1994-9. In J. K. Cowan (Ed.), Macedonia: The Politics of Identity and Difference (pp. 122–139). London: Pluto Press.
- Brunnbauer, U. (2004). Fertility, families and ethnic conflict: Macedonians and Albanians in the Republic of Macedonia, 1944-2002. Nationalities Papers: The Journal of Nationalism and Ethnicity, 32(3), 565–598.
- Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia. Retrieved from https://www.sobranie.mk/the-constitution-of-the-republic-of-macedonia-ns_article-constitution-of-the-republic-of-north-macedonia.nspх.
- Džankić, J. (2015). Citizenship in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro. New York: Routledge.
- Final Agreement for the Settlement of the Differences as Described in the United Nations Security Council Resolutions 817 (1993) and 845 (1993), the Termination of the Interim Accord of 1995, and the Establishment of a Strategic Partnership between the Parties. (2019). Effective in February 2019. Retrieved from <https://vlada.mk/sites/default/files/dokumenti/spogodba-en.pdf>.
- Gruevska-Madzovska. (2018). Груевска – Маџовска До Арифи: Во 2001 Дигнавте Оружје На Сопствената Држава, Ги Избркавте Македонците Од Сопствените Огништа. Pogled. Retrieved from <https://pogled.mk/gruevska-madhovska-do-arifi-vo-2001-dignav/>.
- Koppa, M. (2001). Ethnic Albanians in the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia: Between nationality and citizenship. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 7(4), 37–65.
- Lijphart, A. (1977). Democracy in plural societies: A comparative exploration. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- National Strategy for the development of the concept of one society and interculturalism 2020-2022. Retrieved from <https://vlada.mk/nacionalni-strategii>.
- Ohrid Framework Agreement. (2001). Retrieved from <https://www.osce.org/skopje/100622?download=true>
- Pichler, R. (2009). Historiography and the politics of education in the Republic of Macedonia (1991-2008). In A. Dimou (Ed.), “Transition” and the politics of history education in Southeastern Europe (pp. 217–250). Gottingen: V&R Unipress.
- Spaskovska, L. (2010). In Search of a Demos: Transformations of Citizenship and Belonging in the Republic of Macedonia. Working Paper 2010/11. Edinburgh.
- Spaskovska, L. (2012). The fractured ‘we’ and the ethnonational ‘I’: The Macedonian citizenship framework. Citizenship Studies, 16(3–4), 383–396.
- Taleski, D., Kmezcic, M., & Pollozhani, L. (2016). Improving checks and balances in the republic of Macedonia: judicial control of executive. EPI Working Papers, pp. 19–27. Retrieved from https://epi.org.mk/docs/D4V_Democracy%20and%20Rule%20of%20Law_en.pdf.
- Vangelov, O. (2017). Stalled European Integration, the Primordialization of Nationalism, and Autocratization in Macedonia between 2008 and 2015. Intersections. East European Journal of Society and Politics, 3(4), 17–40.

Vrgova, R. (2015). Census, identity, and the politics of numbers: The case of Macedonia. Contemporary Southeastern Europe, 2(2), 107–125.

Закон за локална самоуправа [Law on Local Self-Government] ("Службен весник на Република Македонија " бр.5 од 29 јануари 2002 год.). Retrieved from http://mks.gov.mk/images/laws/Zakon_za_lokalnata_samouprava.pdf.

Закон за Територијалната Организација на Локалната Самоуправа во Република Македонија [Law on Territorial Organization of the Local Self-Government of the Republic of Macedonia] („Службен весник на Република Македонија“ бр. 55/2004, 12/2005, 98/2008 и 106/2008). Retrieved from http://mks.gov.mk/images/laws/konsolidiran_zakon_za_teritorijalna_organizacija.pdf.

the coercively imposed behavioral changes or produce physical, mental, or emotional damage, injury, or death. The rise and decline of organized brutality have historically been shaped by a variety of social processes among which three stand out: the cumulative bureaucratization of coercion, centrifugal ideologization, and the envelopment of micro-solidarity (Malešević 2010, 2017, 2019).

The cumulative bureaucratization of coercion is an ongoing and open-ended historical process that refers to the continuous increase in the organizational capacity for coercion and the enhanced capability to internally pacify social order through the monopolistic threat of the use of violence. Since complex social organizations require hierarchical division of labor, discipline, efficient systems of coordination, and control, they inevitably rely on coercive means to implement organizational goals. This is obvious for military, police, insurgencies, and other armed institutions, but the same organizing principle underpins nearly all complex systems – from hospitals and schools to private corporations and religious institutions. All of these organizations deploy coercive penalties for insubordination and disobedience. Although the cumulative bureaucratization of coercion predates the formation of first states, there is no doubt that state formation has been the most significant historical mechanism for its development and expansion. More specifically since first states emerged through warfare in early Mesolithic (c. 12,000 BCE), this process has historically been dependent on the proliferation of the war-state-society nexus (Malešević 2014). The coercive organizational power has historically expanded through warfare but also through other forms of organized violence including slavery, serfdom, corvée labor, religious persecutions, and political massacres among many others.

The bureaucratization of coercion has historically been cumulative in a sense that coercive power has continued to expand over the last 12,000 years. This is not to say that this process is teleological or even evolutionary. Although some coercive organizations have disintegrated, have been destroyed or merged with others, or have experienced substantial decline and downward trends, the coercive organizational power as

Ombudsmen

► Alternative Dispute Resolution

Oppression

► Feminist Peace Research

Organized Brutality

Siniša Malešević

School of Sociology, University College, Dublin, Ireland

Definition

Organized brutality is a concept that refers to the social and historical phenomenon where the growth in the coercive, ideological, and micro-interactive capacities of social organizations often leads to the increase of physical or non-physical forms of violence. The focus here is on the collective violence through which social organizations intentionally or unintentionally foster such has largely continued to expand and proliferate throughout the world (Malešević 2010, 2017). For example, Roman and ancient Chinese empires have disappeared, but their places have been taken by other states and civilizations that have managed to continue to increase their respective coercive organizational capacities. Hence contemporary states such as the USA, Russia, or China possess much more coercive organizational powers than any of their historical predecessors. Although this process has been continuous for many centuries, the cumulative bureaucratization of coercion has largely accelerated in the last 200 years as the nation-states gradually established a monopoly on the legitimate use of violence over their territories (Tilly 1985; Weber 1968).

One of the main reasons why bureaucratization of coercion has been cumulative is the fact that organizational power is isomorphic, meaning that efficient and successful organizations tend to be imitated and replicated. Hence as Kumar (2017) demonstrates, the leading imperial states from Ottomans, Romanovs, and Habsburgs to more recently French and British have grounded themselves in the legacy of the Roman Empire and have emulated many of the Roman practices in its organization, ideology, warfare, and politics. These isomorphic features are most visible in the technological sphere as military organizations generally tend to copy and use new technological inventions – from stirrup, chariot, and gunpowder to catapult, canon or nuclear bombs, and drones.

The continuous increase in the coercive organizational power was also dependent on rise of state apparatuses and vice versa. Both Tilly (1985) and Mann (1993) have analyzed how state formation and organized violence have been mutually constitutive processes. With the proliferation of warfare in early modern Europe, the rulers were forced to reform and expand their bureaucratic apparatuses and also to invest in science and technology with the view of building better networks of transport and communication as well as better weapon systems. The proliferation of continuous warfare played a crucial role in the centralization of state power which in turn fostered other social organizations to adopt a similar model of hierarchical control. The last several centuries have witnessed a continuous and cumulative bureaucratization of coercion which is particularly visible in the ability of states and other organizations to expand their infrastructural reach, surveillance capacities, social penetration, and organizational dominance (Malešević 2010, 2017).

In addition to ever-increasing coercive powers, organized brutality is also rooted in ideology. More specifically as the cumulative bureaucratization of coercion involves violence and force, its long-term success is often premised on attaining a degree of legitimacy. Since human beings cannot be dominated for long through the physical force alone, all social organizations tend to deploy different normative codes to justify the existing systems of organization. Throughout history rulers utilized mythological and religious discourses, imperial creeds, dynastic claims, and civilizing missions among many others to successfully legitimize their right to rule. However, before the modern era, much of political justification was vertical in a sense that the rulers had to justify their claims to their fellow aristocrats and much less so to ordinary, mostly peasant, population. After the French and American revolutions and the Latin American war of independence, the gradual expansion of the idea of popular sovereignty legitimacy has become a much more significant ingredient of organizational domination. Thus, in modernity most complex social organizations focus extensively on ideological justification. The state rulers rely on nationalism and other ideological doctrines to legitimize their right to govern, while other social organizations deploy a variety of ideological doctrines to justify their existence. In this context modernity opens a space for greater presence of ideological power. Ideological creeds became central to the process of legitimization but also as means to mobilize large numbers of individuals for political goals. Whereas in the premodern context military power was built around the temporary alliances of nobility, as one could not arm peasants who would easily turn weapons against their masters, in modernity the entire population can be mobilized for violent conflicts. Hence the proliferation of ideological power goes hand in hand with the expansion of coercive organizational capacities. While in the traditional world the rulers had no organizational or ideological capabilities to mobilize large number of people to fight in wars, revolutions, insurgencies, or rebellions, in modernity organized violence becomes a public affair that requires a degree of public support and public involvement. In this sense modern social organizations require that citizens are part and parcel of the specific ideological project. Hence it is no accident that all modern nation-states deploy similar practices in education, mass media, military, police, courts, and other institutions to make their citizens into a loyal and nationally conscious members of their respective nations. This “nationalization of the masses” fosters a degree of ideological unity among enormously heterogenous population (Mosse 1991). Although the state has historically been at the helm of this process, ideological penetration of citizenry involves a variety of other social organizations from private businesses, religious institutions, and political parties to civil society groups and social movements. This mass scale and ongoing process of centrifugal ideologization through which specific ideological creeds became a second nature to most citizens has particularly intensified in modernity. With the rise of transport and communication networks together with the dramatically increased educational and informational spheres (including the compulsory schooling and dramatically raised literacy rates), modern social organizations have relied extensively on ideologization to justify their coercive organizational forms. The centrifugal ideologization has also contributed toward undercutting social divisions within societies as it relied on recognizable ideological tropes to generate a degree of ideological unity. Nevertheless, ideologization is not only a top-down process to be associated exclusively with the state apparatuses. Instead civil society organizations and social movements that challenge the state power have also increased their ideological penetration and have become capable of mobilizing large number of individuals.

The historical trajectory of organized brutality has been shaped by the ever-rising coercive organizational powers and the greater ideological penetration of social organizations. However, these two structural processes could make a substantial impact on human behavior only when couched in the language and practices of everyday life. In other words, the macrostructural processes can gain most influence when framed as familiar and personalized micro-interactions. Human beings are emotional and meaning-oriented species that attain moral and emotional fulfilment through the networks of personalized bonds. The everyday social interactions are centered on pockets of micro-solidarity from which individuals gather their emotional attachments, moral support, and a degree of ontological security. The micro-solidarity involves protracted emotional commitment often farmed by direct, face-to-face, interaction. As social organizations are by definition large, distant, and bureaucratic entities, they lack this impersonal, emotional, and direct touch. Hence if social organizations aim to mold the behavior of large groups of individuals, it is crucial that they successfully emulate the discourse of this micro-universe. The decades of research on behavior of small groups, including the dynamics of battlefields, revolutionary cells, insurgencies, and terrorist networks, have shown that violent behavior is often motivated by a strong sense of attachment to one’s micro-groups. Most people join violent organizations and perform violent acts as members of kinship and friendship-based groups. The scholarship points out that emotional ties, a sense of responsibility toward significant others, and a feelings of ethical fulfilment play a decisive role in motivating individuals to take part in violence including the acts of self-sacrifice (Della Porta 2013; Malešević 2014, 2017; Sageman 2004). Hence to successfully tap into this micro-universe, social organizations tend to mimic the language and practices of micro-solidarity. It is no accident that nearly all ideological doctrines utilize the discourses of kinship and close friendship and depict their members as brothers, sisters, comrades, or family members. From “Muslim brotherhood” and “our communist comrades” to “feminist sisterhood” and “sons and daughters of our nation,” one can encounter numerous instances of how ideologies emulate the language of micro-level solidarity.

When successful this envelopment of micro-solidarity has contributed significantly toward making coercive social organizations resemble one's precious family members and close friends. By penetrating this world of micro-level interactions, social organizations blend the macro-organizational goals and the micro-interactional and deeply personal ambitions. Hence wars between nation-states are not depicted for what they are, the two or more bureaucratic entities attempting to destroy each other, but as merciless and cowardly enemy who senselessly attacks our brothers, sisters, mothers, and fathers. Through the envelopment of micro-solidarity, coercive and bureaucratic social organizations are transformed into "our motherlands" and "our sacred comradeships," and human relationships toward bureaucratic entities become naturalized and normalized. Since inception of the first large-scale polities 12,000 years ago, social organizations were looking for ways to tap into the microworld of families, friendships, and peer groups. Nevertheless, most premodern states and other social organizations did not possess enough organizational capacity and ideological know-how to fully penetrate the microcosm of everyday life. It is only with the intensified development of cumulative bureaucratization of coercion and centrifugal ideologization in the last two 200 years that the envelopment of micro-solidarity has become much more reachable goal for social organizations. By projecting the micro-solidarities onto the ideological canvas of large-scale social organizations, one attains powerful tools for popular mobilization and legitimization of violent social action.

Organized brutality is rooted in these three historical processes, and its long-term dynamics has been shaped by the cumulative rise of coercive organizational capacities, ideological penetration, and their embedment into the localized networks of micro-solidarities. Although the scale of organized violence has oscillated through time and space with some geographical locations and historical periods, experiencing more destruction and human casualties than other the long-term historical trajectory points toward the continuous rise of organizational, ideological, and micro-interactive potential for the large-scale violence.

Cross-References

- ▶ Genocide
- ▶ Grounded Nationalism
- ▶ Identity and Political Violence
- ▶ Terrorism
- ▶ War

References

- Della Porta, D. (2013). Clandestine political violence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kumar, K. (2017). Visions of empire. How five imperial regimes shaped the world. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2010). The sociology of war and violence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2014). Is war becoming obsolete? A sociological analysis. The Sociological Review, 62(2), 65–86.
- Malešević, S. (2017). The rise of organised brutality: A historical sociology of violence. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Malešević, S. (2019). Grounded nationalisms: A sociological analysis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mann, M. (1993). The sources of social power II: The rise of classes and nation states 1760–1914. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mosse, G. (1991). The nationalization of the masses: Political symbolism and mass movements in Germany from the Napoleonic wars through the third Reich. Cornell: Cornell University Press.
- Sageman, M. (2004). Understanding terror networks. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Tilly, C. (1985). War making and state making as organized crime. In P. Evans, D. Rueschemeyer, & T. Skocpol (Eds.), Bringing the state back in. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Weber, M. (1968 [1921]). Economy and society. New York: Bedminster Press.

Organized Crime

- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Outcomes

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations

P

Pacific Island States

- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Pacifism

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Pacifism and Peace

Richard Jackson
University of Otago, Dunedin, New Zealand

Description

This chapter explores the relationship between pacifism and peace. It begins by noting how pacifism and peace are natural bedfellows, but how in practice pacifism and its commitment to anti-militarism and the construction of nonviolent politics has been subjugated and excluded from dominant conceptions of peace in international relations (IR), as well as the field of peace studies. It then examines some of the reasons and consequences of excluding pacifism from peace, before making a number of arguments for why pacifism ought to be considered central to peace.

Introduction

It would be reasonable to assume that pacifism, a philosophical and practical approach which aims to end war and militarism and replace it with nonviolent, peaceful ways of dealing with political conflict, is closely linked to dominant conceptions of peace. After all, they are both normatively oriented towards reducing violence and harm and creating the conditions for human dignity and flourishing. In fact, the two concepts have only rarely been discussed together, and most conceptions of peace over the past few centuries implicitly or explicitly reject the pacifist position, arguing instead that peace can only be won and guaranteed through the means of national defence, security, law and order, and the just use of limited force against aggression or crimes against humanity. Not infrequently, it is argued that pacifism can actually be the opposite of peace or pose a threat to peace because it entails passivity and nonaction in the face of violent aggression (Jackson 2019a).

The aim of this chapter is to outline some of the reasons why and how pacifism has been decoupled from dominant conceptions of peace, including concepts of peace employed in the field of peace studies, and some of the reasons for and consequences of this theoretical and practical estrangement. It will also outline some of the main arguments by pacifists for why peace theory and practice should embrace pacifism and take its ideas, ethics, and practices much more seriously.

Definitions

The term pacifism, derived from the Latin for “peacemaking,” is commonly understood to be an approach which expresses a negative opposition to war and violence, on the one hand, and a positive commitment to peacebuilding and the construction of peaceful alternatives to the use of violence within politics and society, on the other. As with other political or philosophical approaches, such as feminism, anarchism, environmentalism, and so on, there are many varieties of pacifism which rest on a continuum between forms of absolute pacifism at one end, and just-war pacifism or selective pacifism at the other (Cady 2010). The most common distinctions are between absolute pacifism which rejects all forms of violence and just-war pacifism which accepts that there may be restricted or exceptional circumstances or occasions when lethal force can be justifiably used; and between personal pacifism which opposes killing as a personal act and therefore refuses to participate in any violent activities (sometimes called conscientious objection), and political pacifism which opposes war as a social practice and works to dismantle the broader war system (Ryan 2015).

In recent years, the study and practice of non-violent resistance has grown tremendously (Chenoweth and Stephan 2011; Vinthagen 2015). In this context, pacifism and nonviolence are sometimes viewed as synonymous, if not as interchangeable terms, because both approaches oppose the use of organized violence in politics and seek to build more peaceful, nonviolent societies. However, it is more common to argue that pacifism is a type of principled nonviolence, due to its roots in religious or moral principles, while most of the nonviolent resistance movements we currently see around the world are rooted in what has been termed pragmatic nonviolence, which is a strategic orientation towards political struggle that does not require its participants to be morally opposed to violence per se.

The definition of peace is much more difficult to determine, as the term is employed in different ways and there is no consensus on its meaning. Within politics and international relations there is no doubt that it is an example of “an essentially contested concept” or a “floating signifier,” which actors and approaches attach their own meanings to. In this respect, it is similar to other contested concepts such as democracy, freedom, security, terrorism, and the like. Additionally, different philosophical approaches – realism, liberalism, Marxism, feminism, and so on – will each conceptualize it differently. At the same time, it is also fair to say that IR has focused much more attention on war, power, competition, and state survival than on the question of peace, and peace remains an underdeveloped, as well as a contested, concept in the field (Richmond 2008). Notwithstanding this, peace is most often conceived of simply as the absence of war or large-scale political violence, and is associated with possessing strong national defence (peace through strength), hegemony (Pax Romana), deterrence and balance of power (the cold peace), military alliances (collective security), security communities, international organizations, international law, and the like. It has also variously come to be associated with notions of tranquillity, stability, security, law and order, freedom (the “liberal peace”), democracy (the “democratic peace”), and capitalism (the “capitalist peace”).

Within the field of peace studies, the most widely employed conception of peace is the dichotomy proposed by Galtung (1969) of “negative peace” and “positive peace.” Negative peace accords with the broader IR conception of peace as a condition marked by the absence of war or large-scale political violence. Positive peace, as its name suggests, entails more than the absence of violence but also the presence of social justice, equality, human dignity, and the like. Although peace normally remains undefined in the field, and is undertheorized, a number of different types of peace have been articulated, with varying degrees of conceptual detail and precision, including notions such as: “hybrid peace” (Mac Ginty 2010); “indigenous peace” (Mac Ginty 2008); “everyday peace” (Mac Ginty 2014); “agonistic peace” (Shinko 2008); “resilient peace” (Johansson 2015); “post-liberal peace” (Richmond 2011a); “quality peace” (Wallenstein 2015); and more rarely, “emancipatory peace”

(Richmond 2007), among others. Each of these concepts focuses on a different value, characteristic, or aspect of what the author thinks peace embodies or ought to embody. This illustrates the complexity of determining what peace is, as well as the continuing lack of consensus on the meaning of the term.

Recently, the notion of measuring states or levels of peace in a “peace continuum” from low levels of peacefulness to high levels of positive peace, as opposed to the more commonly used dichotomy of peace versus war, has been proposed (Davenport et al. 2018). This accords with the global peace index, a measure proposed each year by the Institute for Economics and Peace in which a large number of statistical measures are employed to rank states’ peacefulness. States with lower levels of violent conflict, violent crime, military spending, weapons proliferation, prison populations, displaced persons, political instability, terrorism, and so on are ranked higher on the scale of peacefulness. Importantly, this exercise remains primarily within the negative peace paradigm, as few positive measures related to social justice or human flourishing are included as measures of peacefulness.

The Absence of Pacifism in Peace

It is paradoxical that while pacifism and pacifists, as well as a great many nonviolent resistance movements, have played a significant role in shaping the nature and practices of states and the international system over the past one hundred years (Jackson forthcoming 2020a; Ryan 2013), as a philosophy and practice, pacifism remains subjugated and largely excluded from discussions about peace in IR (Jackson 2018a). Examples of the influence of pacifism and pacifists can be seen in, among others: the conscientious objector movement; past and current disarmament campaigns, including the Nobel Peace Prize winning antinuclear campaign; efforts to establish the League of Nations, later the United Nations, and to promote international cooperation through the development of international organizations; the drawing up of international humanitarian laws and conventions, including international conventions related to human rights, disarmament, and civilian protection; and the establishment of peaceful mechanisms for resolving conflicts between states, such as the international Court of Justice in the Hague. Nonviolent resistance movements have also had a major impact through the political transformation of states and regions, including: anti-colonial struggles in India, Africa, and elsewhere; the civil rights movements in the USA, South Africa, Poland, the Philippines, and many other places; the anti-Soviet struggles across Eastern Europe and the fall of the iron curtain; the third wave of democracy in Africa and Asia in the 1990s; and more recently, the Color Revolutions in Europe (see Chenoweth and Stephen 2011; Roberts and Ash 2009; Schock 2011).

Nevertheless, despite its real-world influence, pacifism and nonviolence, particularly the anti-war variety, is noticeable by its absence from peace theory within IR and politics more generally (see Jackson 2018a, 2019a). Instead, it can be seen in a multitude of ways that virtually all of the most common notions of peace in IR assume the centrality, necessity, and normativity of military force. For example, it is a basic assumption within IR that because of human nature and the anarchic nature of the international system, peace within and between states requires a certain level of security which can only be guaranteed by the possession of significant military force by a sovereign power (Jespersen 2019). Consequently, today, only a handful of mostly small or micro states do not have a standing army. Similarly, accepted political theory assumes that states, the central actors of IR, are peaceful primarily because they have a monopoly on violence within their borders, and it is the loss of that monopoly on violence that leads to war and violence. This is why international peacebuilding efforts always involve programs to rebuild and professionalize the military – what is called Security Sector Reform (SSR). In other areas of IR, particularly from a realist or neorealist perspective, it is assumed that a balance of military power (conventional or nuclear), with or without alliances, is a helpful way of ensuring a more peaceful international system. In other perspectives, such as liberal and neoliberal approaches, security cooperation, security regimes, and security communities, all of them based on a certain level of military force, are assumed to be important for creating and maintaining peace and stability.

More specifically, the use and maintenance of military force is central to the primary peace theory of the international community. Peace support operations, peacekeeping missions, and peacebuilding operations are all predicated upon employing military forces in the first instance, establishing law and order (through the use or threat of coercion) and then constructing strong state institutions, including the military forces who are then tasked with maintaining a monopoly on the use of violence and ensuring security and law and order (Jackson 2018b). Within this context, going to war for peace or fighting for peace is understood to be a perfectly consistent and reasonable position. In this respect, the military is viewed as an inherently positive force which can be employed for both security and humanitarian purposes such as genocide prevention, civilian protection, democracy promotion, and so on. In many respects, this is an extension of the broader dominance of just-war theory within IR (Jackson 2019b), which asserts, contra pacifism, that violence is sometimes justified and legitimate when properly regulated, and that maintaining a system of military force is ethically acceptable. A notable aspect here is that, among others, many just-war theorists in IR do not simply ignore pacifism in their discussions of war and peace, but actively denigrate and suppress it, viewing it as antithetical to peace and dangerous to the stability of the international system (Jackson 2019a).

Crucially, peace studies fares little better than IR in taking pacifism seriously or developing peace theories which challenge the state-centric and militaristic nature of the current status quo (Jackson 2018b; see also Gnoth 2020). Once again, a careful examination of peace theory within peace studies reveals that pacifism garners little or no attention at all, and remains marginalized or subjugated in discussions around what peace is and how it ought to be constructed. For example, as noted above, the most famous conception of peace in the field is the dichotomy proposed by Galtung (1969) of “positive peace” and “negative peace.” This is important, because in contrast to the dominant IR conception, Galtung’s argument that peace ought to go beyond the mere absence of direct violence opens up the possibility of exploring how states and military violence contribute to the maintenance of negative peace, and how a pacifist peace logically ought to therefore be the ultimate aim of working towards positive peace. However, in practice, this has not really happened among peace scholars. Instead, it can be argued that although “scholars contemplating the subject of peace have argued that it is something more than the mere absence of interstate or civil war, yet they have treated peace precisely in this manner” (Davenport et al. 2018, p. 2; see also Campbell et al. 2017). An example of this is the concept of “quality peace” and its related notion of a “peace continuum” in which states of peace can be measured on a continuum (Davenport et al. 2018). The point is that on this continuum, the positive peace endpoint nevertheless still considers the state and its military as an essential and normal element of a condition of peace.

Similarly, it can be noted that the conception of the “liberal peace” which has been a key approach within post-conflict peacebuilding studies retains a central role for military force, usually described in terms of security or law and order. In this conception of peace, a centralized monopoly on violence by the institutions of the state provides the necessary framework for dealing with political and social difference, radical disagreement, or threats which might upset the tranquillity of the polis. In other words, similar to the peace theory of IR more broadly, the ontological and epistemological heart of the liberal peace is a Hobbesian view of human nature, community, and the international system, as well as a naïve instrumental notion of violence (Jackson 2018b). This conception therefore, in direct opposition to pacifist and nonviolent peace theories, retains a permanent place for the normative use of violence within politics (see also Jabri 1996).

Partly in response to criticisms of the liberal peace, particularly its top-down, state-centric security foundations, the conception of the “hybrid peace” emerged as an alternative within peace studies. The hybrid peace, or what some called a “hybrid local-liberal peace,” (Richmond 2012) suggested that in the inevitable clash between the local and the international – the internal and the external – during peacebuilding operations or in peace interventions, unexpected, new, hybrid forms of peace which take on forms and expressions not necessarily prescribed or accepted by the dominant powers would be produced (Mac Ginty 2010). This is less a theoretically informed prescription for building peace than a post hoc description of the often unexpected and highly contingent forms of peace which sometimes emerge in specific historical formations. Most importantly, as a peace theory, the hybrid peace only contingently challenges the acceptance of violence inasmuch as local actors do so in the context of their struggles against the imposition of externally directed liberal peacebuilding (Jackson 2018b). There is no systematic critique or deconstruction of the inherent violence of the liberal peace, nor any systematic attempt to construct an alternative nonviolent or pacifist form of peace.

Another form of peace theory which also has little direct engagement with pacifism is the notion of peace formation, sometimes referred to as the “local peace” or “everyday peace” (Mac Ginty 2014). This is a bottom-up approach to constructing peaceful societies which builds on the kinds of small-scale, nonviolent “everyday peace” practices (Mac Ginty 2013) which exist in every society, including deeply divided societies. Frequently ignored in large-scale, externally imposed peacebuilding missions (Richmond 2011b; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013), this conception of peace relies a great deal on local critical agency. Of critical importance here is an implicit acknowledgement that practice is constitutive of politics and political community. In other words, nonviolent everyday peace practices can help to (re)constitute the violent state or (violent) forms of liberal peacebuilding. However, despite its potential for developing a systematic approach to peace which builds on the constitutive effects of peaceful practices and incorporates pacifism and nonviolence, in recent formulations at least, the local peace appears as a highly contingent, unsystematic form of peace which occurs in specific localities, but which often lacks institutional or ideological power or reach. More importantly, it does not entail any systematic critique of the violence inherent to contemporary political forms, or advocate for an explicitly pacifist, nonviolent, or demilitarized alternative.

In contrast to previous conceptions, the more recent notion of the “post-liberal peace” has genuine potential for developing a normative peace theory which recognizes and deals with the reality of the violent modern state and the constitutive nature of violence, and takes pacifism and nonviolence seriously. This is because it is not focused on the state as the organizing principle, but instead “highlights the importance of local voices and narratives (not just local elites), and enables self-government, self-determination, empathy, care, and an understanding of cultural dynamics within the everyday” (Richmond 2009, p. 570). Such a peace, it is argued, enhances the capacity of the local to resist violence, struggle for social justice, and promote empathy, solidarity, and respect for life (Jabri 2007). Crucially, Richmond argues that a more radical post-liberal peace “cannot develop while clinging to notions of territorially bounded, sovereign and state-centric international space,” but must instead go “beyond Westphalia” (2009, pp. 569–570). This recognition of the need to develop a kind of peace beyond the nation state and its mode of violent sovereign power (Bloom 2017), and to construct local forms of peace which resist violence, is very promising. Nevertheless, even here, recent conceptions of post-liberal peace continue to ignore the ethical and theoretical consideration of violence and militarism and the necessity of an explicitly nonviolent, pacifist politics.

Lastly, without going into detail, even more radical conceptions such as “agonistic peace” (Shinko 2008), “resilient peace” (Johansson 2015), and “emancipatory peace” (Richmond 2007) most often fail to engage with the question of the violent modern state and the assumed necessity for some kind of military force to maintain law and order, defend the political community, or protect civilians from harms like genocide. That is, no current conception of peace in the peace studies or IR literature appears to give any kind of sustained or serious consideration to the question of whether peace must by necessity be nonviolent or pacifistic, or whether peace is compatible with the maintenance of a war system or the modern nation state. Instead, all of the main narratives and theories about peace retain a role for the military and the selective use of limited forms of collective violence, thus ignoring and subjugating pacifist theory.

The Reasons and Consequences of Excluding Pacifism from Peace

The puzzle of why pacifism has been subjugated in conceptions of peace can be explained in part by applying a critical theory approach (Jackson 2018a). That is, acknowledging that “all knowledge is for someone and for some purpose” (Cox 1981, p. 128; original emphasis), it is possible to deduce what and who the subjugation of pacifism works for in IR, and what the functional and ideological consequences of its exclusion from peace theory are. From this perspective, it can be broadly argued that subjugating pacifism functions to maintain the core identity and boundaries of IR as a discipline primarily concerned with states, war, military force, national security, coercion, alliances, strategy, and the like, and to maintain the dominance of IR theories and approaches such as neorealism, deterrence theory, just-war theory, and the like. Excluding pacifism from conceptions of peace leaves these power-knowledge structures, and the actors who directly benefit from them, in place and unchallenged.

Directly related to this, the war system which is in part sustained by the assumption that war and military force is required for peace has a great many powerful material interests directly tied to its continuation. Additionally, individuals, groups, institutions, and processes directly tied to the war system – the military and security services, the military-industrial-entertainment complex, war memorials and commemoration, defence intellectuals and security think tanks, and the like – wield significant material and ideational power in society. With its opposition to war and the war system on which it is based, and its anti-militarism, pacifism poses a challenge to the influence and material interests of all of these groups and institutions. There is a direct material interest therefore in subjugating pacifism and ensuring that it does not influence dominant conceptions or practices of peace. In other words, “because pacifism – like other knowledges and forms of ethical reasoning such as feminism, anarchism, and environmentalism – threatens aspects of the existing political and epistemic order, there is a direct interest in subjugating it and treating it as a revolutionary, system-destabilising form of knowledge” (Jackson 2018a, p. 170).

More prosaically, it can be argued that is not in the interests of states (who have a monopoly on violence) to encourage the belief that military violence is ineffective or inferior to nonviolence, or that nonviolent political orders are possible and desirable, and nor do governments “want to support development of the capacity of their own citizenry to take direct action, as this would increase the possibility of challenges to the system of government” (Martin 2015). As a theory and practice of politics, pacifism, in other words, poses a direct challenge to the authority and dominatory form of sovereign power (Bloom 2017) of the state over its citizens. This explains, in part, its deliberate exclusion from politically accepted conceptions of peace.

At the broadest level, the consequences of excluding pacifism from dominant theories and practices of peace have been to reify and reinforce the state, militarism, and the war system, as well as the dominant security-oriented forms of knowledge-power about peace and politics within society. More specifically, the silencing and subjugation of pacifism in ongoing discussions about peace limits the basis on which discussions about the use of force (Jackson 2019b), peacebuilding (Jackson 2018b), state-building, democratization, social justice, and other political challenges take place. As such, it also limits our ethical imagination in thinking about how to respond to security threats, humanitarian response, civilian protection, and the like (Jackson 2019a), and thus functions to prevent progressive change in the violence-producing, violence-maintaining epistemic and material structures which currently dominate the international system, thereby impeding progress towards a more peaceful world.

For peace studies, the silencing and exclusion of pacifism has resulted in a field that while oriented towards the resolution of violent conflict does not seriously challenge the violence and militarism of the state, but rather works with states and international organizations to reform and limit the harm caused by the war system. Thus, large parts of the field are focused on understanding and improving peacebuilding missions aimed at building strong liberal democratic states, improving peacekeeping operations, security sector reform, economic development, mediating disputes between and within states, improving diplomacy, and so on. In many ways following IR, this activity proceeds on the assumption that the modern state with its monopoly on violence, as well as broader international security structures, are an essential element in the creation of more peaceful societies. This can be characterized as a “peace as pacification” or system-maintenance orientation. Certainly, it is an example of problem-solving theory in the Coxian sense, aimed at reforming rather than transforming the current status quo and its power structures. Introducing pacifism into peace theory would radically transform both the aims and means of the field’s primary conception of peace.

Bringing Pacifism into Peace Theory

There are at least six compelling reasons why dominant conceptions of peace are deeply problematic, and why pacifism therefore needs to be brought into the heart of peace theory. First, the assumption that peace requires the continuing presence of states as guarantors of security and law and order, and that the establishment of states has created a more peaceful world order, is highly debatable. On the contrary, there is overwhelming evidence that the modern state is an inherently violent form of political organization, rather than a neutral actor which provides the security necessary for peaceful forms of political life. At the very least, the state has violent historical origins; it is defined as a sovereign actor with a monopoly on the legitimate use of violence, and empirically states have an unrivalled historical record of employing mass violence against their own citizens. Among others, Rummel (1994) has demonstrated that modern states have been responsible for the deaths of 170–200 million people over the past century, not including the wars they have initiated which have killed similar numbers or the deaths and suffering caused by centuries of imperialism and colonialism. Beyond its record of employing direct physical violence as a mode of power and domination, the modern state also dominates and controls society through epistemically and culturally violent forms of biopower and governmental power.

In addition, assumptions about the naturalness and necessity of the state for the maintenance of peace fail to account for the state’s interdependence with capitalism and the violence and harms of structural violence, colonialism, and ecocide. As a state-maintained system, global capitalism generates numerous kinds of direct, cultural, ecological, and structural violence (see Roberts 2007; Leech 2012), including more than 100,000 preventable deaths each day from poverty-related causes. At the same time, the cultural and structural violence associated with capitalism can be linked to hundreds of thousands of deaths per year from unsafe work practices, pollution, domestic violence, suicide, crime, and the like. In the 1970s, a number of peace researchers controversially estimated that structural violence resulted in 18 million annual deaths (see Gleditsch, Nordkvelle and Strand 2014, p. 149). Regardless of the exactitude of this figure, there is little doubt that large regions of the world, as well as particular localities within so-called developed states, experience capitalism-related generational poverty which is implicated in a plethora of social ills and harms (Wilkinson and Pickett 2009), and at present, wealth inequality caused by neoliberal capitalism is at unprecedented levels and threatens to unleash deep economic crisis, mass instability, and violent intergroup conflict.

These foundational observations suggest that, to the extent that they assume a role for the modern state, current conceptions of peace within both IR and peace studies are highly flawed and function primarily to obscure the extent to which the current global order remains extremely violent and harmful to human beings and their societies. Pacifist theory, with its commitment to opposing all forms of violence, especially the use of direct military violence as a form of political power, and its commitment to constructing nonviolent political communities, has the potential to develop and realize a more ethical conception of peace, and a form of peace more compatible with human well-being, human flourishing, and ecological balance.

Second, and directly related to the failure to properly assess the role of the state, dominant conceptions of peace do not appear to attend properly to the nature of violence itself. As a form of social action, violence is a brutal, incomprehensible, traumatic, world-shattering experience which is devoid of meaning in its material experience (see Wallace 2016; Scarry 1985). It most often leaves both its victims and its perpetrators with permanent physical and/or psychological injuries. Several theorists, including Clausewitz, also draw attention to the psychological dimensions of violence in terms of its inherent escalatory and mimetic processes – which is, in part, a consequence of its brute material horror.

It is also important to note that empirically, a reasonable evaluation would suggest that violence has proven to be a failure in creating either sustained negative or positive peace, or in promoting positive social values. Dustin Howes (2013, p. 433) concludes that the pacifist argument that violence rarely works to achieve its strategic and normative aims is backed up by “gathering evidence for the ineffectiveness of violence in a variety of empirical literatures.” In part, this empirical failure is because the proponents and practitioners of violence misunderstand the relationship between violence, coercion, and power (Jackson 2019a), assuming that the ability to wield violence directly corresponds to compliance and obedience, rather than resistance and defiance.

In a sense, these problems with the dominant ontology of violence within peace theory are also related to the prevalent assumption that violence can be best viewed as an instrument or tool which has predictable outcomes and is normatively neutral in and of itself. This might be tenable in the short term, but more realistically, violence is a form of constitutive social action rather than an instrument or tool. In other words, while violence can always achieve immediate outcomes like dead bodies, pain, suffering, and material destruction, and will sometimes achieve certain short-term goals like the destruction of an enemy’s means to fight, its longer-term effects are by virtue of its constitutive and world-shattering nature, unpredictable (Wallace 2016). More importantly, the use of violence as a tool is virtually always ends destroying. It is more likely that in employing violence to enforce a peace agreement in the present, for example, the long-term effects will be to reinforce the discourses and psychological mechanisms that encourage future resorts to violence to resolve political conflict and the entrenchment of an ongoing cycle of violence which undermines the long-term establishment of peace. Hannah Arendt makes the pertinent observation that “[t]he practice of violence, like all action, changes the world, but the most probable change is to a more violent world” (1970, p. 80).

Another problem with including violence as part of peace is that violence is inherently anti-political; given that peace is an inherently political condition, or at least, has a political dimension, this makes current conceptions of peace somewhat contradictory. In other words, following an important strand of political theory, it can be argued that violence is the antithesis of politics; it is “politics’ constitutive outside. It sets the limits of politics” (Frazer and Hutchings 2007, p. 92). At the very least, no one would dispute that “violence is counterproductive to politics” (Howes 2013, p. 428). This is because, in part, violence is inherently dominatory and dogmatic, while politics is dialogic, relational, and open ended in terms of the search for truth.

Consequential to this, the fact that violence ends the otherness that is another human life (Wallace 2016, p. 73; see also May 2015) radically abrogates our responsibility to that other, and prevents them from challenging the truth or justice of our political project or indeed, our characterization of them as oppressors, rebels, terrorists, or any label used to dehumanize them in order to permit lethal force. The use of violence therefore is incompatible with a political project rooted in the recognition of the other, of difference, of radical human interdependence, and of the impossibility of certainty or absolute truth. In short, the use or reliance on violence is incompatible with peace defined in political or normative terms. The point is that employing violence and maintaining the capacity for mass violence within conceptions of peace necessitates downplaying or obscuring these troubling aspects of a naïve instrumental view of violence. Bringing pacifist theory and practice into peace would avoid this misreading and lead to a conception of peace that is both more realistic and more ethically consistent.

A third problem with current conceptions of peace is that the centrality of violence to peace is rooted in large part in the acceptance of just-war theory. The problem is that as a basis for ethical reasoning about the use of military force and the conduct of war, just-war theory is highly problematic (see Jackson 2019b; Ryan 2013). Some of the main problems with it include, among others: its tendency towards decontextualization, abstraction, and the use of unrealistic analogy in its ethical reasoning; the problematic beliefs and assumptions that the theory rests on, such as its instrumental view of violence, its unrealistic short-term understand of what war is, and the contradictions this creates in the theory; the empirical and normative consequences of the theory in the real world of international politics, such as the reification of the war system, the continuing spread of weapons, and the failure to limit war and military violence; and finally, its refusal to take serious alternatives to war as a means of security and protection.

Directly related to this, a fourth problem with excluding pacifism from peace, and constructing peace on the foundations of military force, is the connection between militarism, war, and the climate change emergency, and the urgent need for political and social alternatives which will mitigate rather than exacerbate the climate crisis. Military forces are responsible for a large portion of climate change emissions, and in their activities, they cause a great deal of environmental and ecological harm. Militarism is also tied in with capitalism and imperialism, which are also deeply implicated in the climate crisis. The point is that a realistic and nonviolent form of peace needs to be based on ecological nonviolence. The anti-militarism of pacifism, as well as its nonviolent ethos, makes it an ideal part of peace theory and practice from this perspective.

A fifth reason for bringing pacifism into peace is that, as pacifists and others rightfully note, the ontological distinction between means and ends which dominant conceptions of peace rest on – that is, the assumption that the means of achieving peace through military violence can be theoretically and ethically separated from the ends sought – is untenable (Jackson 2020b). In reality, and following pacifist theory, it is impossible to separate the means and ends of social action, including the use of military violence. And to attempt to do so – to insist that the means by which peace is achieved may sometimes have to be different to the ends being pursued – is to mistake a necessary heuristic practice with the nature of reality. In human activity, as in nature, events occur in a continuous stream and every end becomes the means or cause for what follows. What this means is that the outcomes of all political actions, including the use of military force, are already prefigured in, or an extension of, the means employed to achieve them, and “[h]owever hard we try to separate means and ends, the results we achieve are extensions of the policies we live” (Cady 2010, p. 56). Most importantly, ontologically speaking, “Means and ends are aspects of one and the same event” (Ibid.). From this perspective, it is logically implausible that peace can be built on the basis of violence and militarism.

Another perspective on this is to look at violence, especially war and military violence, as an embodied, repetitive kind of collective social action. That is, structuration theory or constitutive theory draws our attention to the ways in which violence is constitutive of social structures, actors, identities, practices, and society at large. At the simplest level, we can note that mass-organized violence cannot occur without the prior construction of what can be seen as a socially and historically embedded “war system” which provides: institutional arrangements for the scientific development of weapons and military strategies; a political-economic system for the production and disbursement of weapons and war materials; a logistical system for the training and material support of military personnel; a medical care system for the physical and psychological well-being of the troops; a system of doctrines, laws, and norms governing the use of deadly violence; a violence-supporting culture; the memorialization of the war dead; and accepted public narratives which define identities of friend and enemy, worthy and unworthy victims, threats and dangers; and more. The construction of such material systems and social practices with their inherent values, norms, and expectations, as well as the repetition of organized violence over time, functions to create war and violence as a sedimented, self-perpetuating social structure. In this way, the repetitive practices of political violence reproduce, materialize, and reconstruct political violence as a social-material structure, thereby helping to constitute a society in which political violence against human bodies has become an accepted and normalized mode of practice and way of being. From this perspective, it is once again difficult to see how the material and social practice of violence could constitute its opposite – a peaceful, nonviolent society. Pacifist theory avoids this problem, in part through its insistence on maintaining means–ends consistency and giving primacy to prefiguration.

A sixth and final reason for bringing pacifism and peace together is simply the proven track record of nonviolence and alternatives to war. There is by now a large and ever-growing literature on the successes of nonviolent resistance movements, even against armed opponents, in achieving political change, protecting civilians in the midst of civil wars, providing security, demilitarizing society, and so on (for summaries, see Jackson 2018a, 2019a). There is even evidence that unsuccessful nonviolent resistance movements nevertheless have a positive effect in creating stronger democracies and more human rights protection (Chenoweth and Stephen 2011). The main point is that following Cady (2010, p. 95), “[w]hen faced with the objection ‘it won’t work’, the pacifist response must be, simply, that nonviolent action does work and has a history to document the claim.” This empirical record of success provides compelling evidence and a compelling reason for arguing that pacifism should be central to conceptions of peace, and that such a position would be both practical and realistic.

Summary

The main task for peace theorists and interested scholars is to de-subjugate pacifism and nonviolence and begin to take it seriously as a part of IR and peace studies. The theory and practice of pacifism can help to interrogate dominant conceptions of peace, uncover the role of violence and domination in the current status quo, and explore how nonviolent forms of peace can be envisaged and built on the foundations of the current international system. The large and growing literatures on nonviolent resistance and revolutionary nonviolence, unarmed civilian peacekeeping, nonwarring communities, and civilian-based defence, among others (see Jackson et al. 2020; Chenoweth and Stephan 2011; Kaplan 2017; Burrowes 1996; Wallace 2016), provide an important foundation for such investigations.

Key analytical and ethical questions which will need to be addressed include, among others: Who is peace for? What exactly is peace, and how can it be identified? What is its ontological essence or characteristics? Is there only one ideal kind of peace, or are there many, contextual forms of peace? What are the core values of peace for different cultures and groups? How can peace be constructed in ways that maintain means–ends consistency and prefigure the kind of peace sought? What different forms of violence does peace aim to address, and is a truly nonviolent peace possible? What are the central ethical concerns in conceptualizing peace?

Cross-References

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace

References

- Arendt, H. (1970). On violence. New York: Harcourt, Brace & World.
- Bloom, P. (2017). Beyond power and resistance: Politics at the radical limits. London: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Burrows, R. (1996). The strategy of nonviolent defense: A Gandhian approach. New York: State University of New York Press.
- Cady, D. (2010). From Warism to Pacifism: A moral continuum (2nd ed.). Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Campbell, S., Findley, M., & Kikuta, K. (2017). An ontology of peace: Landscapes of conflict and cooperation with application to Colombia. International Studies Review, 19, 92–113.
- Chenoweth, E., & Stephan, M. (2011). Why civil resistance works: The strategic logic of nonviolent conflict. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Cox, R. (1981). Social forces, states and world orders: Beyond International Relations Theory. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 10(2), 126–155.
- Davenport, C., Melander, E., & Regan, P. (2018). The Peace Continuum: What it is and how to study it. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Frazer, E., & Hutchings, K. (2007). Argument and rhetoric in the justification of political violence. European Journal of Political Theory, 6(2), 180–199.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Gleditsch, N., Nordkvelle, J., & Strand, H. (2014). Peace research – Just the study of war? Journal of Peace Research, 51(2), 145–158.
- Gnoth, A. (2020). A crisis of criticality: Reimagining Academia in international peacebuilding. Doctoral Thesis, University of Otago.
- Howes, D. (2013). The failure of Pacifism and the success of nonviolence. Perspectives on Politics, 11(2), 427–466.
- Jabri, V. (1996). Discourses on violence: Conflict analysis reconsidered. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Jabri, V. (2007). War and the transformation of global politics. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jackson, R. (2018a). Pacifism: The anatomy of a subjugated knowledge. Critical Studies on Security, 6(2), 160–175.
- Jackson, R. (2018b). Post-liberal peacebuilding and the pacifist state. Peacebuilding, 6(1), 1–16.
- Jackson, R. (2019a). Pacifism and the ethical imagination. International Politics, 56(2), 212–227.
- Jackson, R. (2019b). A pacifist critique of just war theory. In L. Cordeiro-Rodrigues & D. Singh (Eds.), Comparative just war theory: An introduction to international perspectives. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Jackson, R. (forthcoming 2020a). Pacifism and International Relations. In O. P. Richmond & G. Visoka (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of peacebuilding, statebuilding, and peace formation. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jackson, R. (2020b). A defence of revolutionary nonviolence. In R. Jackson, J. Llewellyn, G. Leonard, A. Gnoth, & T. Karena (Eds.), Revolutionary nonviolence: Concepts, cases and controversies. London: Zed Books.
- Jackson, R., Llewellyn, J., Leonard, G., Gnoth, A., & Karena, T. (Eds.). (2020). Revolutionary nonviolence: Concepts, cases and controversies. London: Zed Books.
- Jespersen, M. (2019). Challenging hobbes: Is war inevitable? Global Society, 34(1), 21–35.
- Johansson, P. (2015). Nurturing adaptive peace: Resilience thinking for peacebuilders. Paper prepared for the XVth biennial conference of the IASC, ‘The commons amidst complexity and change’, 25–29 May 2015, Edmonton, Canada. https://dlc.dlib.indiana.edu/dlc/bitstream/handle/10535/9838/Johansson_Patrik_Adaptive_Peace_May15.pdf?sequence=1&isAllowed=y
- Kaplan, O. (2017). Resisting war: How communities protect themselves. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Leech, G. (2012). Capitalism: A structural genocide. London: Zed.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Indigenous peace-making versus the liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41(4), 391–412.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2013). Indicators +: A proposal for everyday peace indicators. Evaluation and Program Planning, 36(1), 56–63.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Martin, B. (2015). The dynamics of nonviolence knowledge. Mobilization, 21(4), 533–545.
- May, T. (2015). Nonviolent resistance: A philosophical introduction. Cambridge, UK: Polity.
- Richmond, O. (2007). The transformation of peace. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

- Richmond, O. (2008). Peace in international relations. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. (2009). A post-liberal peace: Eireanism and the everyday. Review of International Studies, 35(3), 557–580.
- Richmond, R. (2011a). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, R. (2011b). Critical agency, resistance and a Post-Colonial Civil Society. Cooperation and Conflict, 46(4), 419–440.
- Richmond, O. (2012). A pedagogy of peacebuilding: Infrapolitics, resistance and liberation. International Political Sociology, 6(2), 115–131.
- Roberts, D. (2007). Human insecurity: Global structures of violence. London: Zed.
- Roberts, R., & Ash, T. (Eds.). (2009). Civil resistance and power politics: The experience of non-violent action from Gandhi to the present. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rummel, R. J. (1994). Death by Government. New Brunswick: Transaction Books.
- Ryan, C. (2013). Pacifism, just war, and self-defense. Philosophia, 41, 977–1005.
- Ryan, C. (2015). Pacifism(s). Philosophical Forum, 46(1), 17–39.
- Scarry, E. (1985). Injury and the structure of war. Representations, 10(Spring), 1–51.
- Schock, K. (2011). Unarmed insurrections: People power movements in nondemocracies. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Shinko, R. (2008). Agonistic peace: A postmodern reading. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 36(3), 473–491.
- Vinthagen, S. (2015). A theory of nonviolent action: How civil resistance works. London: Zed Books.
- Wallace, M. (2016). Security without weapons: Rethinking violence, violent action, and civilian protection. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Wallensteen, P. (2015). Quality peace: Peacebuilding, victory, and world order. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Wilkinson, R., & Pickett, K. (2009). The spirit level: Why more equal societies almost always do better. London: Bloomsbury.

Painting

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Palestine

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

Pareto Optimal Agreement

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Pariah Weapons Control

- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding

Joanne Wallis
 Department of Politics and International Relations, University of Adelaide, Adelaide, SA, Australia

Definition

Constitutions create state institutions, provide a legal framework for the exercise of state power, and establish the relationship between people and their government. They also perform a foundational role by defining the political bond between citizens and embedding state institutions in society. While most constitutions are written, states do not necessarily need a written constitution in order to demonstrate constitutionalism, whereby limitations are imposed on the powers of government, the rule of law is observed, and fundamental human rights are protected. Indeed, some states, such as the United Kingdom, New Zealand, and Israel, do not have written constitutions. Constitution-making refers to the process of creating a constitution; this includes not just writing the document itself but also to activities such as electing constitution-makers, civic education programs, public consultations, and information campaigns. Therefore, constitution-making is not only a technical exercise conducted by constitutional lawyers but also as a significant political process. Constitution-making can play an important role in peacebuilding in conflict-affected societies; it can contribute to negotiating compromises, building social solidarity, embedding locally legitimate modes of governance, reconciling grievances, addressing the underlying causes of conflict, and transforming society toward more sustainable, peaceful relationships. The more participatory the constitution-making process, the more likely it will play this role (Wallis 2014).

Constitution-Making

Several variables affect the nature of the constitution-making process. The first is its timeframe; there is usually merit in having a deadline, but it should be flexible and not overly rushed.

The second is the nature of the constitution-making body. There are four common types: constitutional conventions, which are elected solely to adopt the constitution; mandated constituent legislatures, which are elected to both adopt the constitution and act as an ordinary legislature; self-created constituent legislatures, which are elected as ordinary parliaments, but then turn themselves into constituent assemblies; and self-created legislating assemblies, which are elected as constitutional conventions but then assume legislative powers (Elster 2012). If the constitution is made or adopted by an elected body, the timing and conduct of elections can affect the process, with a transparent agreed-upon timetable and a proportional, rather than majoritarian, electoral system seen as preferable. In general, it is recommended that constitutions be drafted by specially convened and broadly representative conventions, which are less likely to be swayed by political interests and more likely to make compromises.

The third variable is how the constitution-making body makes decisions, with consensus decision-making, rather than majoritarian voting, seen as preferable for all but the most difficult decisions.

The fourth variable is the balance between publicity and secrecy. Publicity is seen as constraining partisanship and encouraging constitution-makers to provide reasons for their decisions, while also posing the risk of encouraging grandstanding and the irreversibility of publicly stated positions. Secrecy may facilitate compromise and provide space for constitution-makers to think clearly.

The fifth variable is the degree of public participation, which is the focus of this chapter.

The final variable is the way the constitution is adopted, with the two most common options: ratifying the constitution by popular referendum or adopting after the vote of an elected legislature.

Participatory Constitution-Making

The liberal principle of “popular sovereignty” holds that the ultimate political authority resides in the general will or consent of the people. Liberal political theory often regards a constitution as the tangible manifestation of the “social contract” that records a population’s general will. In the late eighteenth century, this idea was relatively uncontroversial; it was thought possible to identify the hypothetical general will according to which the population would exercise their popular sovereignty, or “constituent power,” to make a constitution. The constitution then codified the institutionalization of that will in a government, converting the population’s sovereign power into “constituted power” (Preuss 1993). In fragmented and divided conflict-affected societies, identifying this general will can be more difficult. This has led to calls for a “process-based view of popular sovereignty” in which “people get to speak,” so that they may negotiate and agree their general will by participating in making their state’s constitution (Chambers 2004, p. 161).

Electing a constituent assembly to draft and/or ratify the constitution, or to ratify the constitution at a referendum, are examples of public participation. But the extensive participation involved in recent constitution-making processes has developed the idea beyond this. Participation now includes civic education, consultations with political parties and civil society groups, public debates and open meetings, written public submissions, and publicity in the media. Participatory constitution-making processes also have a demonstration effect, whereby there is an emerging expectation that future processes will involve a degree of participation. Indeed, there is strong evidence that the public wants to participate; in South Africa over 2 million public submissions were made.

If a constitution-making process includes opportunities for public participation, timing is likely to affect what kind of public feedback is gathered; early consultations tend to focus on the process itself, later ones on drafts of the constitution. Whether public participation is legally mandated is also likely to affect its role in, and influence on, the process and resulting constitution, as is how it is collected and analyzed.

The literature on participatory constitution-making has its intellectual foundations in the literature relating to the benefits of political participation, which has its roots in the literature on deliberative democracy. Deliberative democrats argue that reflection upon – and consequently transformation of – preferences in a public forum is essential to political decision-making (Dryzek 1990). Guided by this literature, it is possible to identify several arguments about the positive role that participatory constitution-making can play in peacebuilding.

First, public participation can improve the accountability of constitution-makers if participants are given opportunities to challenge them, and can broaden their minds by exposing them to more information and ideas (Moehler 2008).

Second, public participation can motivate people in fragmented or divided conflict-affected societies to feel sufficient unity to develop the kind of long-term political solidarity that can create a political community capable of sharing a general will and exercising constituent power. A sense of social solidarity is particularly important for liberal democracies if people are to be sufficiently united and organized to select representatives, without descending into conflict and the mobilization of communal sentiments to attract votes. Public participation in constitution-making can play a role in building solidarity because deliberation requires individuals to provide reasons for their proposals and to negotiate about issues of mutual concern (Cohen 1998).

This may result in them agreeing to common societal values, aspirations, and shared symbols that can generate a sense of common identity, which may produce sufficient solidarity to unify a political community, particularly if these values, aspirations, and symbols resonate widely (Arato 2004). Constitutions can also recognize and organize the popular sovereignty of the people; establish binding, reciprocal relationships between them; and serve as an expression of their self-determination (Lerner 2011). In so doing, they often identify shared characteristics, symbols, and principles that build a sense of common identity (Hart and Stimson 1993). However, when there is insufficient participation, these efforts can entrench a potentially divisive, exclusionary, and destabilizing view of the state and its people's identity, as occurred in Iraq (Weiner 2011).

Third, public participation can encourage parties to a conflict to refine their aspirations, mediate their differences and make compromises, if it provides a forum to address grievances without resorting to violence (Tierney 2004). This may encourage reconciliation, particularly if constitution-making is accompanied by a combination of international or domestic criminal trials, truth commissions, reparations, rehabilitation, and indigenous peace initiatives. But constitution-making can prolong or restart a conflict if it perpetuates the political dynamics that gave rise to the conflict, or fails to achieve genuine consensus (Morrow 2010).

Fourth, public participation can play a role in "citizenization," whereby individuals become "citizens" who are educated about their rights and responsibilities, become interested in government, and seek future opportunities for political participation (Mansbridge 1995). Consequently, it can encourage people to have higher expectations of their government, greater awareness of existing democratic deficits and an ability to critically evaluate the performance of their government (Moehler 2008). Participatory constitution-making can also facilitate this by inspiring the emergence of an active public sphere in which the media and civil society empower citizens to engage in political participation. Citizenization can be particularly important in fragmented or divided conflict-affected societies in which people may have had little experience of being treated as citizens of their state, or may have previously viewed their state as illegitimate or been in conflict with their state. Participatory constitution-making may also help to generate an “ethos of constitutionalism,” whereby the people see the constitution, and the state institutions and legal system that it creates, as legitimate (Hatchard et al. 2004). Indeed, a study of all constitutions made between 1789 and 2005 found that participation positively correlated with the endurance of the resulting constitution (Elkins et al. 2009). An ethos of constitutionalism can facilitate peacebuilding, by encouraging citizens to channel their grievances through state institutions, rather than resorting to open conflict.

Fifth, public participation can help the constitution to become “an autobiography of the nation” (Ndulo 1998–2000, p. 83) that is “built upon the culture, knowledge, and experiences of the people” (Gordon 1999, p. 582). The state institutions it creates may therefore represent the interests, practices, and institutions that are already viewed as legitimate and effective by the population. While there is room for scepticism concerning how many public submissions are incorporated into final constitutions, examples from the Asia-Pacific demonstrate that participation can result in constitutions that recognize local practices, institutions, and customary law, as people exercise their constituent power to create institutions that reflect their society (Hassall and Saunders 2002). There is also optimism that participation will see the constitution include more provisions to protect human rights (Samuels 2006), although scepticism has been expressed about this outcome (Widner 2007).

Scepticism About Participatory Constitution-Making

Although there are strong reasons to believe that participatory constitution-making can play a positive role in peacebuilding, there is also scepticism.

First, there are questions about the ability of people to participate in constitution-making.

There are concerns that ordinary people may become disillusioned or targets of manipulation, deception, and extremism, or induced to hold inaccurate, biased, or damaging beliefs, if they do not possess sufficient knowledge and expertise to judge what is in their collective interests (Fearon and Laitin 2000). In addition to implying a patronizing view of peoples’ capabilities, this argument overlooks that participation allows a public forum for challenging such problematic beliefs. More persuasive is the concern that material inequalities between participants may conceal existing power relations and disadvantage the inarticulate or those without access to sophisticated political vocabulary. In developing countries peoples’ daily lives are often occupied by more immediate concerns, with onerous expectations of participation giving rise to potential “tyranny” (Cooke and Kothari 2001). This suggests that civic education is vital, as is material support to help people participate, such as funding for transport to public consultation meetings, or for wages lost as a result of attending a meeting. Sceptics are also concerned that, even in ideal deliberative conditions, it may be difficult to find reasons for a political decision on which all agree (McCarthy 1998). Yet as these difficulties are likely to persist, particularly in conflict-affected societies, participation seems to offer a good way to address them and negotiate compromises, rather than imposing a constitution that may satisfy only those who made it.

Second, there is scepticism about why people participate in constitution-making. There are concerns that people are self-interested and participate only in order to access resources or power; if they do not succeed, they may become alienated (Bermeo 2003). This may exacerbate existing societal divisions, or even lead to new factions developing, thereby restarting or generating conflict, particularly if the institutions to mediate conflict are not yet in place. Therefore, there are concerns that it may be difficult to achieve the level of trust or mutual understanding required for deliberation. However, cases such as the Bougainville region of Papua New Guinea suggest that participation can provide a space for agonistic encounters between potentially hostile groups and thereby foster reconciliation and achieve mutual understanding if it is depoliticized and provides a space for compromise. This can “help make a constitution more just and durable” (Brown 2008, p. 683).

Third, mindful of the frequent scarcity of resources in conflict-affected societies, sceptics are concerned about the resources and institutional capacity required to facilitate extensive participation in constitution-making (Bannon 2007). Sceptics caution that if the demand for participation overwhelms capacity, this may give rise to instability and disorder (Huntington 1968). A common solution is to appoint or elect representatives, although this raises the question of whether representatives should deliberate based on reasons that they find compelling or reasons that appeal to their constituents or – if elected as party representatives – their political party (Gutmann and Thompson 1996). Related to this, there is concern that participation is time-consuming and can prolong transitional rule, entrench the regime overseeing the process, and distract attention from other development issues (Riker 1995). This highlights why transparent timeframes are recommended for participatory constitution-making processes.

Fourth, there is scepticism about what “participation” means. If participation just means attending public meetings, particularly if literacy levels are low, the process is conducted in an unfamiliar language, or civil society is weak and unable to promote clear agendas, then it risks being superficial. Yet while participation is likely to be most beneficial when participants are well informed and their involvement is meaningful, particularly when civil society is robust and pluralistic, the Bougainville case illustrates that benefits can still be achieved in less ideal conditions. Alternatively, if the level of required participation is high, requiring meaningful expressions of views on a constitutional issue or, even more demandingly, for those views to be recorded and transmitted into the draft constitution, this could place unrealistic expectations on citizens (Scheuerman 2006). Yet active participation, including during constitution-making, can play a valuable role in achieving citizenization in conflict-affected societies. In situations where the population has fought a long struggle for self-determination, it may be difficult to deny them the opportunity.

Even if participants make significant contributions to the constitutional debate, there is scepticism about how seriously constitution-drafters should deliberate on these contributions in order for participation to “serve plausible normative or instrumental purposes” (Miller 2010, p. 636). Related concerns are procedural, including how much weight should be accorded to submissions by individuals, as opposed to by civil society and interest groups (Gloppen 1997). Typically, public feedback is digested for constitution drafters, who then exercise their discretion. Feedback may also be statistically analyzed, with the majority view holding sway, as occurred in Bougainville, where the Bougainville Constitutional Commission was guided by a matrix of choices that quantified the feedback given during the public consultations. While sceptics question whether this results in more than “cosmetic changes” to the draft (Tushnet 2008), the Bougainville case highlights how public feedback can be used as the basis for the constitution. The contrary argument is that incorporating significant changes based on public feedback can generate an incoherent, cumbersome, and inconsistent constitution (Elster 1993). Again, although public feedback was considered during the Bougainville process, it has resulted in a coherent constitution.

Finally, sceptics point to numerous constitutions that have involved a high degree of participation, but have failed to achieve legitimacy (such as of Eritrea or Fiji), while other long-standing constitutions made without substantial public participation have acquired legitimacy (such as of Australia, Canada, and the United States), as have more recent constitutions in post-Communist Europe (Partlett 2012). This overlooks that most were made in states in which “state and nation emerged pari passu” (Smith 1994, p. 67). In fragmented and divided conflict-affected societies, the constitution has to do more than record a societal consensus among an existing political community – it has to constitute that consensus and that community.

Summary

Constitution-making can play a positive role in peacebuilding, although this will depend upon the level of public participation involved. Participation can be measured along a continuum. At one extreme, participation is minimal, and the constitution is made by local elites or imposed by an external force, or there are opportunities for participation, but the outcomes have little impact on the resulting constitution. In these circumstances, it is unlikely to play a positive role. At the other extreme, there is extensive public participation, in which there is widespread public consultation and genuine opportunities for their feedback to shape the future constitution. This is likely to play a positive role.

While acknowledging scepticism about the role of public participation, it can result in a constitution that creates state institutions which reflect the interests of the population, encourage citizenization, inculcate an ethos of constitutionalism, and inspire the emergence of a public sphere. Participation can also assist in building a sense of political community and social solidarity and can facilitate compromise, reconciliation, and the resolution of grievances.

However, context will be influential, and it may be that the institutions created by the constitution have more bearing on the future performance of the state. The nature of societal cleavages may also form a limitation on opportunities for public participation, particularly if they are stark and involve violence, as in Iraq or Bosnia.

Finally, this chapter is not ideologically neutral. It has explicitly been guided by liberal political theory. It is acknowledged that liberal principles do not always accurately describe the nature of a peaceful and prosperous social reality. The liberal ontological assumption of individual agency can clash with ontological assumptions based on local relatedness which resonate in many non-Western conflict-affected societies (Wallis and Richmond 2017). There is accordingly a substantial literature that is highly critical of liberal peacebuilding. Yet these critiques are primarily directed at what has essentially been neoliberal peacebuilding, which has emphasized individual autonomy removed from the basic principles of justice. Neoliberal peacebuilding has strayed far from most understandings of liberalism, which recognize that individuals may have conflicting – as well as common – interests, and therefore need to be offered the protection of basic principles of justice (Rawls 1971). This suggests that liberalism, guided by the principle of popular sovereignty and its implication that people should consent to the manner in which their political unit is governed, including the extent to which it reflects individualism or relatedness, can play a role in peacebuilding. This suggests that existing political and legal pluralism should neither be rejected as uncivilized nor accepted uncritically, but instead brought into critical dialogues in discussions of how society will be organized. Therefore, liberal norms can be “renegotiated in context” (Richmond 2015, p. 56), with a participatory constitution-making process providing an opportunity for this negotiation to take place.

References

- Arato, A. (2004). Iraq and its aftermath. Dissent, 51(2), 21–28.
- Bannon, A. L. (2007). Designing a constitution-drafting process: Lessons from Kenya. Yale Law Journal, 116, 1824–1872.
- Bermeo, N. (2003). Ordinary people in extraordinary times: The citizenry and the breakdown of democracy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Brown, N. J. (2008). Reason, interest, rationality, and passion in constitution drafting. Perspectives on Politics, 6(4), 675–689.
- Chambers, S. (2004). Democracy, popular sovereignty, and constitutional legitimacy. Constellations, 11(2), 153–173.
- Cohen, J. (1998). Democracy and liberty. In J. Elster (Ed.), Deliberative democracy (pp. 185–231). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cooke, B., & Kothari, U. (2001). The case for participation as tyranny. In B. Cooke & U. Kothari (Eds.), Participation: The new tyranny? (pp. 1–15). London: Zed Books.
- Dryzek, J. S. (1990). Discursive democracy: Politics, policy, and political science. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Elkins, Z., Ginsburg, T., & Melton, J. (2009). The endurance of national constitutions. New York: Cambridge University Press.

- Elster, J. (1993). Constitution-making in Eastern Europe: Rebuilding the boat in the open sea. Public Administration, 71(1–2), 169–217.
- Elster, J. (2012). The optimal design of a constituent assembly. In H. Landemore & J. Elster (Eds.), Collective wisdom: Principles and mechanisms (pp. 148–172). New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Fearon, J., & Laitin, D. (2000). Violence and the social construction of ethnic identity. International Organization, 54(4), 845–877.
- Gloppen, S. (1997). South Africa: The battle over the constitution. Brookfield: Ashgate.
- Gordon, R. (1999). Growing constitutions. University of Pennsylvania. Journal of Constitutional Law, 1(3), 528–582.
- Gutmann, A., & Thompson, D. (1996). Democracy and disagreement. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Hart, V., & Stimson, S. C. (1993). Introduction. In V. Hart & S. C. Stimson (Eds.), Writing a national identity: Political, economic, and cultural perspectives on the written constitution (pp. 1–12). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Hassall, G., & Saunders, C. (2002). Asia-Pacific constitutional systems. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hatchard, J., Ndulo, M., & Slinn, P. (2004). Comparative constitutionalism and good governance in the commonwealth: An eastern and southern African perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Huntington, S. P. (1968). Political order in changing societies. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Lerner, H. (2011). Making constitutions in deeply divided societies. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mansbridge, J. (1995). Does participation make better citizens? http://www.cpn.org/sections/new_citizenship/theory/mansbridge1.html. Accessed 6 Mar 2010.
- McCarthy, T. (1998). Legitimacy and diversity: Dialectical reflections on analytical distinctions. In M. Rosenfeld & A. Arato (Eds.), Habermas on law and democracy: Critical exchanges (pp. 115–155). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Miller, L. E. (2010). Designing constitution-making processes: Lessons from the past, questions for the future. In L. E. Miller (Ed.), Framing the state in times of transition: Case studies in constitution making (pp. 601–666). Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace Press.
- Moehler, D. C. (2008). Distrusting democrats: Outcomes of participatory constitution making. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Morrow, J. (2010). Deconstituting Mesopotamia: Cutting a deal on the regionalization of Iraq. In L. E. Miller (Ed.), Framing the state in times of transition: Case studies in constitution making (pp. 563–600). Washington, DC: U.S. Institute of Peace Press.
- Ndulo, M. (1998–2000). The democratic state in Africa: The challenges for institution building. National Black Law Journal, 16(1), 70–101.
- Partlett, W. (2012). The dangers of popular constitution-making. Brooklyn Journal of International Law, 38(1), 193–238.
- Preuss, U. K. (1993). Constitution-making and nation-building: Reflections on political transformations in East and Western Europe. European Journal of Philosophy, 1(1), 81–92.
- Rawls, J. A. (1971). A theory of justice. Cambridge: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2015). The dilemmas of a hybrid peace: Negative or positive? Cooperation and Conflict, 50(1), 50–68.
- Riker, W. H. (1995). The experience of creating institutions: The framing of the United States Constitution. In J. Knight & I. Sened (Eds.), Explaining social institutions (pp. 121–144). Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Samuels, K. (2006). Constitution building processes and democratization: A discussion of twelve case studies. Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance.
- Scheuerman, W. E. (2006). Critical theory beyond Habermas. In J. S. Dryzek, B. Honig, & A. Phillips (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of political theory (pp. 85–105). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Smith, A. D. (1994). State-making and nation-building. In J. A. Hall (Ed.), The state: Critical concepts (Vol. II, pp. 59–89). London: Routledge.
- Tierney, S. (2004). Constitutional law and national pluralism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Tushnet, M. (2008). Some skepticism about normative constitutional advice. William and Mary Law Review, 49(4), 1473–1495.
- Wallis, J. (2014). Constitution making during state building. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Wallis, J., & Richmond, O. P. (2017). From constructivist to critical engagements with peacebuilding: Implications for hybrid peace. Third World Thematics, 2(4), 422–445.
- Weiner, A. S. (2011). Constitutions as peace treaties: A cautionary tale for the Arab Spring. Stanford Law Review Online, 64(8), 8–15.
- Widner, J. A. (2007). Constitution writing in post-conflict settings: An overview. William and Mary Law Review, 49, 1513–1537.

Participatory Photography

- ▶ Auto-photography

Participatory research

- ▶ Textile-Making as Research Method

Patriarchy

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

PCRD

- ▶ Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach

Peace

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace
- ▶ Peace Journalism
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Peace Accord

- ▶ Sierra Leone

Peace Activism

- ▶ Textiles Making Peace

Peace Agreement

- ▶ In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda
- ▶ Sierra Leone

Peace Agreement Design

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Peace Agreement Implementation

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Peace Agreements

Jason Quinn¹ and Josefina Echavarría Alvarez²
¹Peace Accords Matrix Program and Colombian Implementation Barometer Initiative, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

²Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Peace Accords Matrix Program, Colombian Implementation Barometer Initiative, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

Definitions

Types and Prevalence

In contemporary usage, the term peace agreement loosely describes any textual instrument produced in a process aimed at ending or preventing armed conflict between two or more parties. Such a typology stretches from protocols, principles, frameworks, and memorandums at one end, toward single and limited issue agreements and comprehensive accords at the other.

Here the most common types of peace agreements are presented by surveying the most widely used datasets and research projects on peace agreements. The Uppsala Conflict Data Program (UCDP) Peace Agreement Dataset at the University of Uppsala (Sweden) contains 217 peace agreements of various types signed between 1975 and 2011 (UCDP 2020). Of these 217 peace agreements, all but 20 were signed in civil wars. Of the 20 agreements signed between nations, 12 were in one conflict (Iraq-Iran).

Limiting the present inquiry henceforth to only civil war agreements, 57 agreements are considered “Full Agreements.” These, according to UCDP criteria, are agreements that are intended to “settle the whole incompatibility” between the warring parties. Hence intentionality plays a key role in the way UCDP and other projects categorize peace agreements, and rightly so. Furthermore, there are 100 “Partial” agreements that are intended to “settle a part of the incompatibility.” Very often partial accords serve to consolidate negotiation gains on one or more issues toward the objective of reaching a complete agreement.

In addition to full and partial accords, UCDP recognizes 39 “Process” agreements, which “initiate a process that aims to settle the incompatibility.” In other words, a process agreement is one that sets a general course for future negotiations but does not necessarily reflect any mutual agreement on any issue.

Another research project that focuses on peace agreements is the Peace Accords Matrix (PAM) program at the University of Notre Dame (USA), where the emphasis lies on the degree of implementation of peace agreements considered to be “Comprehensive” in several respects (PAM 2020). Comprehensive peace agreements (CPA) result from a negotiation process that included both (a) the major parties to the conflict and (b) the substantive issues underlying the main dispute. A “major party” is a group that can alter the outcome of the peace process for better or worse (Darby and MacGinty 2003, p. 7). The “substantive” issues are those representing the main areas of contention between the warring parties. Generally speaking, CPAs are more inclusive and more substantive than other types of accords and represent the endpoint of a negotiation process. They usually incorporate or subsume previously negotiated partial agreements and initiate a multi-year implementation process whereby the reforms in the accord are put into practice. The PAM program currently identifies 41 CPAs reached after 1989 that meet these criteria (Some of the newer cases are not yet uploaded to the database.). Incorporated or reaffirmed within these CPAs are approximately 280 previously negotiated accords.

Introduction

Key issues covered in this entry are the prevalence of contemporary peace agreements in civil wars versus interstate wars, the different types and functions of contemporary peace accords, their respective success rates in light of their form and function, the development of the research program on peace agreements, and current research trajectories, including recent debates. The first and subsequent waves of peace agreements research are surveyed, in which agreement type, quality, and the role of monitoring and verification of peace agreement implementation are underlined. Finally, the article suggests that new directions of research can improve negotiations and peace accord design by focusing on the most common challenges to implementation.

Historical Background

In a prominent study of civil wars that ended between 1940 and 1990, Barbara Walter (1997, p. 335) brought to the attention of many an intriguing and overlooked puzzle: “Unlike interstate wars, civil wars rarely end in negotiated settlements.” Walter found only eight successful negotiated settlements in civil wars during the period. Fundamental differences between civil wars and wars between nations, she argued, explained this long-term historical trend. The main ones being that after a peace accord is signed between nations, the two armies remain armed and able to provide for their own protection. The two armies also travel back to their respective states reducing security dilemmas. In civil wars, by contrast, the rebels must demobilize and disarm and have no way thereafter to protect themselves from the government army (who remains armed and mobilized) or enforce the future implementation of the peace accord. Thus, the twin problems to be solved, argues Walter, are rebel insecurity and agreement enforcement. Her proposed solution to these problems were strong international third-party guarantees.

Fast forward roughly 30 years from the last year of data in Walter's study, the general pattern she described has been turned completely upside-down. In recent articles, international relations scholars are now trying to explain "the demise of peace treaties in interstate war" (Fazal 2013) and the great "rise of the peace agreement" in civil wars (Bell 2006, pp. 373–374). Brancati and Snyder (2013) calculate, for instance, that over 60% of civil war terminations after 1990 have ended in a peace agreement, compared to less than 20% during the Cold War.

According to the United Nations peace agreement database (UN Peacemaker 2020), the number of civil war peace agreements negotiated in the 1940s, 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s total 2, 1, 3, and 5 per decade, respectively. There were 36 civil war peace agreements negotiated in the 1980s. This number exploded to 265 agreements in the 1990's. The next decade (2000–2009) again saw a large increase in civil war agreements with the negotiation of 214 agreements. The trend since 2010 appears to remain one of high prevalence (123 agreements in the first half decade) although data from the last several years is lacking. To summarize these trends, more civil war agreements were signed in virtually any 5-year period between 1990 and 2017 than were signed in the 50 years preceding 1990.

What are the explanations for such a remarkable shift? Bell attributes the rise of peace accords after 1990 to increased "international attention devoted to such conflict." Items that deserve to be highlighted include increased "mediation" and "negotiation" efforts; increased acceptance of "standard settlement designs"; increased acceptance of negotiations and accords as "reform" and "constitution making" processes; and "the emergence of legal standards" domestically and internationally addressing peace agreements and their enforcement. To sum, Bell (2006, p. 374) emphasizes the progressively accepted view by domestic and international actors of "the peace agreement as a binding document." All these points translate into greater verification and monitoring which means greater implementation.

Similarly, in Fazal's explanation of "the demise of peace treaties in interstate war," she argues that nation-states no longer want to sign formal peace treaties with other states due to "the emergence of a strong and growing canon" of international law regulating the conduct of actors involved in the termination of wars. This heightened focus on accountability that has developed over the last several decades, Fazal argues, creates "disincentives for states to conclude formal peace treaties" (696) because they know that they will be "obliged to pay the costs of compliance and to bear the consequences of noncompliance" (699). The main inference is that signing a peace agreement today reflects a much higher display of commitment by conflict actors than the same act did in the past.

Key Issues

Measuring Content

In addition to the shifts mentioned above, the overall share of content devoted to particular types of reforms has changed significantly in recent decades. Whereas the pages of civil war peace agreements were once dominated by military and security issues, in contemporary agreements a much larger content share is devoted to political-, social-, development-, and justice-related reforms and issues (See, for example, The Final Accord for the Termination of the Conflict and a Stable and Durable Peace, signed in 2016 between the Colombian government and the FARC-EP guerrillas (Kroc Institute 2020).).

As with the previous comparisons, we illustrate this trend using several databases and comparing five periods: 1940 to 1969, 1970 to 1989, 1990 to 1999, 2000 to 2009, and 2010 to the last year of available data.

Starting with reforms to the political system and using the UN database of agreements, there were five agreements between 1940 and 1969 that contained political reforms (Constitution-making; Reform of the Current Constitution; Holding of Elections; Electoral Reform; Development of Political Parties; Election Timeline; Legislative, Executive, President/Prime Minister; Subnational Government; Representation in the Executive; Representation in the Legislature; Representation in the Judiciary; Representation in Local/Regional Authorities; Minority Participation and Minority Rights; Governance and Institutional Power-sharing). This number, however, does not tell us how much of the agreement dealt with political reforms. For this insight, we examine the number of paragraphs in an agreement with political reforms. Across these five agreements, there were a total of 62 paragraphs dealing with political reforms or roughly 12 paragraphs per accord. In the next period, 1970 to 1989, there were 24 agreements that outlined reforms to the political system, discussed in a total of 451 paragraphs. This results in an average of roughly 19 political-related paragraphs per accord for this period. From 1990 to 1999, 149 accords contained political reforms spread across 3705 paragraphs. This comes to an average of 25 paragraphs per agreement or a roughly 20% increase in content share discussing political reforms compared to the first period examined and a 25% increase compared to the second period. We see a further jump from 2000 to 2009 with 126 accords aimed at political reforms across 4071 paragraphs or 32 paragraphs per accord. From 2010 to 2017, the share of content devoted to political reforms remains high at 30 paragraphs per agreement.

Looking next at justice issues, there are one accord and four paragraphs devoted to justice issues between 1940 and 1969. Between 1970 and 1989, this number remained at the same level at 4 paragraphs per accord (18 accords, 80 paragraphs). In the 1990s, we find 114 accords covering various justice issues within 1281 paragraphs or 11 justice-related paragraphs per accord. This represents more than a doubling in justice-related content share from previous periods. In 2000 to 2009, the average peace agreement contained 16 paragraphs dealing with justice issues (110 accords and 1798 paragraphs). The most recent numbers after 2010 suggest a trend of approximately 12 paragraphs with justice content per agreement (Judicial System Reform; Independence of the Judiciary; Justice Reform; Accountability, Truth Finding, Transitional Justice Bodies; Restitution for Victims; Immunity; Amnesty).

Switching now to content related to socioeconomic development issues, there is an average of four paragraphs devoted to development topics per agreement between 1940 and 1969. In the next examination period (1970–1989), the average number of paragraphs dealing with socioeconomic development issues rose to seven paragraphs per accord. In the 1990s, the content share dealing with development reforms approximately tripled to 20 paragraphs per agreement. Peace agreements signed between 2000 and 2009 contained 26 paragraphs on development issues on average, and agreements signed after 2010 averaged 27 development-related paragraphs per accord.

On the issue of human rights, there is virtually no content before 1970. From 1970 to 1989, the share of human rights-related content more than doubled to ten paragraphs per accord. As with other topics, a dramatic increase in the share of content dealing with human rights issues took place in the 1990s with 128 accords and 2278 paragraphs or 18 paragraphs per agreement. After 2000, human rights-related content remains high at 19 paragraphs per accord, with a slight decline to 15 paragraphs per accord after 2010 (Socio-economic Development; Natural Resources and Wealth Sharing; Water; Land Regulation; Other Property Issues; Infrastructure, Transport and Communications; Reconstruction and Development; Economic Activities; Social Services and Housing; Health Services; Tackling Poverty; Education and Science; Environment; Media Regulation).

Lastly, the data shows that the current diplomatic and international emphasis on implementation of peace agreements is a relatively recent development in world politics. No peace agreements from 1940 to 1969 called for implementation monitoring bodies or observers, dealt with procedures in case of violations, or specified implementation timelines (Implementation Monitoring Bodies/Commissions; Observers; Procedures in Case of Violations; Implementation Timeline). In the period 1970 to 1989, peace agreements contained an average of eight paragraphs dealing with these specific issues of implementation planning and verification. From 1990 to 1999, the share of implementation-related content more than doubled to 19 and then almost tripled from 2000 to 2009 (23 paragraphs per agreement). After 2010, the amount of emphasis in peace agreements devoted to implementation planning, timelines, disputes, and verification has remained steady at 23 paragraphs per agreement on average.

Measuring Success

Two issues complicate efforts to evaluate the success or failure of peace agreements. First, success rates have changed over time with accords negotiated before 1990 having high failure rates and accords negotiated after 1990 having high success rates. Second, different types of agreements have different goals and success rates.

Beginning with the UCDP project (UCDP 2020), success rates by peace agreement type are examined using the most common metric of success in the empirical literature: Did the agreement end the conflict for at least 5 years?

For “process” accords, which are intended to start negotiations but not necessary end violence right away, 16 out of 39 agreements were followed by a cessation of violence. This translates into a 41% success rate.

For “partial” accords, which are likewise not generally intended to end the conflict, peace followed 59 out of 100 partial accords. This translates into a success rate of 59%.

For “full” agreements, of which there are 57 in total, the civil war ended in 43 agreements. This equals a success rate of 75%. Not only is this a remarkably high rate of success, but many of the 14 “failed” accords were only “temporary failures.” That is, residual violence continued in the post-accord period for 1 or more years but eventually subsided. In sum, full agreements, which were intended by the signatories to end the conflict, accomplished this objective in three out of four cases.

By comparison, Hartzell and Hoddie (2007, p. 78) report a 66% success rate on a sample of 38 agreements (1945–1999). Mattes and Savun (2010) have 51 cases (1945–2005) of which 67% succeeded in ending the conflict.

Moving to the success rates of comprehensive peace agreements tracked by the Peace Accords Matrix project (Joshi et al. 2015), the signatory rebel group and government returned to fighting in 30% of the cases (The threshold used here is very low at 25 battle-related deaths.). In other words, 70% of CPAs achieved peace between the signatories. Another study found 80% of the 31 countries that negotiated a comprehensive peace agreement between 1989 and 2012 were no longer fighting a civil war of any kind as of 2016 (Joshi and Wallenstein 2018).

Regarding the ten or so CPA “failures,” it’s important to note that most of these cases went on to be successes as low levels of residual violence subsided with 2 or 3 years of implementation.

This is a very important and overlooked facet in understanding peace agreements and their success rates. Relaxing the criteria that violence cease immediately changes the picture entirely. If residual violence is allowed to decline over a 36-month period, for example, several of the so-called failures flip over to the success column. This leaves only five failed cases and a revised success rate of 85%.

Research Trends and Debates

All of the above trends and changing dynamics play themselves out in complicated ways in academic research. For many research topics on peace agreements, the question is not whether a particular relationship holds true or not but when it held true and how has the relationship changed over time. Rapidly changing dynamics predictably fuel debates within any academic area.

For example, given the temporal trends already covered in previous sections concerning peace agreement type, prevalence, content, and success rate, it might be surprising to learn that the most often touted finding from the last two decades of research on civil war peace agreements is that “more than half of all peace agreements fail.”

One can find the exact phrase in the BBC, The Guardian, New York Times, The Hill, and in hundreds of speeches and addresses. Delivering the keynote address at the International Crises Group’s

“In Pursuit of Peace” dinner, US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton stated that the academic research shows that “more than half of all peace agreements fail within 5 years” as “traditional peace-making methods are proving less effective.”

At this time of writing, a Google Scholar search (in quotes) of the phrase “half of all peace agreements fail” delivers almost 1,100 exact matches and the phrase “more than half of all peace agreements fail” returns over 450 exact matches.

As should be evident by our survey of peace agreement success rates in a previous section, the finding that half or more than half of all peace agreements fail has no foundation of empirical support. The explanation lies in the fact that the earliest studies on peace agreement efficacy were conducted on samples of civil wars that had an overrepresentation of pre-1990 agreements in the sample. As might be expected, these studies found high failure rates, and unfortunately the finding “stuck” to a quite large degree.

It should be noted that “first wave” studies generally represented the very first efforts to put together a sample of peace agreements for study. These studies, having been conducted before the establishment of major databases and the working out of accepted typologies, had small sample sizes and a heterogeneous mix of accord types. To give a concrete example, in Licklider’s (1995) pioneering article “The consequences of negotiated settlements in civil wars,” the failure rate is 50% for peace agreements, and the sample size is 15 agreements. Most of these were signed between 1945 and 1969, and there are no peace agreements in the list of cases signed after 1987.

In subsequent waves of peace agreement and civil war studies, most of the peace agreements were negotiated after 1990, and these studies focused more on differentiating peace accords based on content, that is, on the specific types of provisions negotiated by the parties. Peace agreement success, most of these studies found, was rooted in the overall quality of the agreement.

Generally speaking, research has shown that agreements are more likely to succeed when they contain political, economic, military, or territorial power-sharing (Hartzell and Hoddie 2003; Bussmann and Ranft 2016), justice system reforms and transitional justice mechanisms (Druckman and Wagner 2019; Dancy 2018; Cox 2020; Steinert 2019), development and reconstruction provisions (Keels and Mason 2019), civil-military reforms (Berg 2020), and international verification and implementation monitoring (Mattes and Savun 2010; Doyle and Sambanis 2000; Quinn et al. 2007) just to cover a limited number of policy-issue areas. It remains unanswered which of these areas, if any, are necessary conditions for agreement success. Joshi and Quinn (2015) examined 51 types of provisions in 195 agreements negotiated between 1975 and 2011 and found that the total number of policy domains covered by an agreement may be the strongest predictor of overall success.

While still recognizing the critical importance of accord content and purpose, studies are increasingly focusing on agreement implementation. In general these studies find that the risk of civil war recurrence declines commensurate with the degree of accord implementation which also correlates with improvement along a number of quality of life indicators (Quinn et al. 2019; Joshi and Quinn 2017; Jarstad and Nilsson 2008). To sum, reform-minded agreements that address the social and political root causes of conflict, in addition to security, and which are implemented at higher levels, are associated with a more durable, longer-lasting peace and improvement along a good number of quality of life indicators.

Summary and Future Directions

Major international trends in peace agreement negotiations and signings suggest that since the 1990s, the use of agreed-upon documents to commit warring parties to cease hostilities and build peace is now extremely prevalent. The “popularity” of peace agreements to settle disputes is because they have shown to be highly effective in bringing internal wars to an end and as vehicles for achieving social, economic, and political reforms. International accompaniment and monitoring of peace agreement implementation is also a growing characteristic of peace agreements which has contributed to higher implementation and a growing success rate.

Future directions for research and practice on civil war peace agreements will involve more detailed examinations of common points of contention and failure in post-agreement settings and efforts to reverse engineer potential solutions back into the negotiation phase. Key among these are not only objective matters but also problems related to partisan bias, media bias, and issues of subjectivity and perception. Although international monitoring helps to provide a neutral, non-partisan assessment, this can be overshadowed by the more dramatic and biased narratives pushed by conflict actors, activists, special interest groups, and the media.

New innovative frameworks for practice should seek to de-politicize the implementation bargaining space and extend the negotiations that led to the signing of the accord into the implementation period in a formal way. While it is acknowledged that pre-agreement negotiations between the major parties require trade-offs and flexibilities in demands and positions, as well as the accompaniment of guarantors and facilitators in order to maintain order and keep the parties moving forward, this too is needed during the implementation period to the same degree or higher. Also government's efforts to transform accord language into concrete policy targets and timelines are a major source of post-agreement contention that is in need of innovative solutions. Implementation would be less contentious if policy targets and timelines and full accord costing and financing were made an integral part of negotiations and accord design.

Cross-References

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The

References

Barbara W. F., (1997). The critical barrier to civil war settlement. International organization, 51(3), 335–364.

Bell, C. (2006). Peace agreements: Their nature and legal status. American Journal of International Law (2006): 373–412.

Berg, L.-A. (2020). Civil–military relations and civil war recurrence: Security forces in postwar politics. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 64(7), 1307–1334. 0022002720903356.

Brancati, D., & Snyder, J. L. (2013). Time to kill: The impact of election timing on postconflict stability. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 57(5), 822–853.

Bussmann, M., & Ranft, F. (2016). Distribution of military power and prospects of post-conflict peace. Peace Economics, Peace Science and Public Policy, 22(4), 385–392.

Cox, J. M. (2020). Negotiating justice: Ceasefires, peace agreements, and post-conflict justice. Journal of Peace Research, 57(3), 466–481.

Dancy, G. (2018). Deals with the devil? Conflict amnesties, civil war, and sustainable peace. International Organization, 72(2), 387–421.

Darby, J., & MacGinty, R. (2003). Contemporary Peacemaking: Conflict, Violence and Peace Processes Palgrave: New York.

Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2000). International peacebuilding: A theoretical and quantitative analysis. American political science review, 779–801.

Druckman, D., & Wagner, L. (2019). Justice matters: Peace negotiations, stable agreements, and durable peace. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 63(2), 287–316.

Fazal, Tanisha M. (2013). The demise of peace treaties in interstate war. International Organization 695–724.

Hartzell, C. A., & Hoddie, M. (2007). Crafting peace: Power-sharing institutions and the negotiated settlement of civil wars. Penn State Press.

Jarstad, A. K., & Nilsson, D. (2008). From words to deeds: The implementation of power-sharing pacts in peace accords. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 25 (3), 206–223.

Joshi, M., & Wallenstein, P., eds. (2018). Understanding quality peace: Peacebuilding after civil war. Routledge.

Joshi, M., & Quinn, J. M. (2017). Implementing the peace: The aggregate implementation of comprehensive peace agreements and peace duration after intrastate armed conflict. British Journal of Political Science, 47(4), 869–892.

Joshi, M., & Quinn, J. M. (2015). Is the sum greater than the parts? The terms of civil war peace agreements and the commitment problem revisited. Negotiation Journal 31(1), 7–30.

Joshi, M., Quinn, J. M., & Regan, P. M. (2015). Annualized implementation data on comprehensive intrastate peace accords, 1989–2012. Journal of Peace Research, 52(4), 551–562.

Keels, E., & Mason, T. D. (2019). Seeds of peace? Land reform and civil war recurrence following negotiated settlements. Cooperation and Conflict, 54(1), 44–63.

Kroc Institute. (2020). Three years after the signing of the final agreement in Colombia: Moving toward territorial transformation. Accessed June 2020.

Licklider, R. (1995). The consequences of negotiated settlements in civil wars, 1945–1993. American Political Science Review, 89(3), 681–690.

- Mattes, M., & Savun, B. (2010). Information, agreement design, and the durability of civil war settlements. American Journal of Political Science, 54(2), 511–524.
- PAM (Peace Accords Matrix). (2020). Peace accords matrix. University of Notre Dame. <https://peaceaccords.nd.edu>. Accessed 5 June 2020.
- Quinn, J. M., Mason, T. D., & Gurses, M. (2007). Sustaining the peace: Determinants of civil war recurrence. International Interactions, 33(2), 167–193.
- Quinn, J., Joshi, M., & Melander, E. (2019). One dyadic peace leads to another? Conflict systems, terminations, and net reduction in fighting groups. International Studies Quarterly, 63(4), 863–875.
- Steinert, C. V. (2019). Trial fairness before impact: Tracing the link between post-conflict trials and peace stability. International Interactions, 45(6), 1003–1031.
- UCDP (Uppsala Conflict Data Program). (2020). Uppsala Conflict Data Program. University of Uppsala. <https://ucdp.uu.se>. Accessed 5 June 2020.
- UN Peacemaker. (2020). Peace agreements database search. United Nations Peacemaker. <https://peacemaker.un.org/document-search>. Accessed 5 June 2020.

Peace and Conflict in Brazil

Marcos Alan Ferreira
 Department of International Relations, Federal University of Paraiba (UFPB), Joao Pessoa, Brazil

Definition

The Federative Republic of Brazil is a country located in South America, the largest in its subregion and the fifth in the world in terms of size. Its history is marked by colonization by Portugal between 1500 and 1822, a monarchic period from 1822 to 1889, followed by the Republican era lasting from 1889 to the present. Unlike the image of peace and joy that often permeates the country due to its low participation in international conflicts, Brazil has a background of numerous conflicts and intense violence, often related to struggles against inequality, discrimination, and minorities recognition. Currently, the main challenge is chronic social violence, mostly related to the clashes between organized crime and the state. Brazil ranks as one of the most violent countries in the world and its citizens, even those not involved in illicit networks, experience the collateral effects of a society with high levels of violence (robbery, homicides, violence against women, etc.), especially those living in poor urban areas.

Colonialism, Conflict, and Violence in Brazil

If peace is the absence or significant reduction of violence in a society, it can be said that the history of Brazil is far from peaceful. On the contrary, behind the joy and cordiality perceived in the manifestations of the Brazilian culture – such as football and carnival – there are also brutal and cruel episodes of violence. Direct violence arising from rebellions, conflicts, and revolts is intertwined with structural and cultural violence rooted in a context of exploitation, inequality, and prejudice.

Before the Portuguese invaded Brazilian territory, it was estimated that two million natives lived there, divided into hundreds of ethnic groups. The arrival of Pedro Álvares Cabral's expedition in 1500 enabled a colonization that extracted raw materials, progressing firstly in the Northeast and Southeast of the territory and focusing mainly on the exploitation of sugarcane and brazilwood monoculture. This exploitation was based on extensive employment of slave labor from Africa and the perpetration of violence against the indigenous population, especially against the ethnic groups of the Tupi linguistic group that inhabited the coastal areas. When faced with the lethal superiority of the Portuguese armaments, indigenous people who were not enslaved were murdered. Many also perished due to diseases brought from Europe to the Americas. It is estimated that less than 10% of the native Brazilian population survived the Portuguese invasion 100 years after the arrival of the Cabral fleet (Churchill 2000).

The book The Masters and the Slaves, first published in 1933 by the sociologist Gilberto Freyre and seen as a classic in Brazilian historiography, provides an important theoretical contribution and explanation about the racial construction of Brazil. Freyre claimed that close relations between masters and slaves prior to 1888, in addition to the allegedly benign character of Portuguese invasion, created a miscegenation between the three races (Natives, African slaves, and Europeans). This context created a “meta-race” or a “race beyond race (s),” setting up in Brazil a racial democracy (Freyre 1986).

This idea of racial democracy was later criticized by important social scientists. For Florestan Fernandes, this “racial democracy” was a myth, since miscegenation aimed to “increase the mass of the slave population and to differentiate the intermediate dependent strata,” not to promote racial equality (Fernandes 2007, p. 44). For Thomas Skidmore, the concept of racial democracy obscured the racial repression historically promoted by European white elites (Skidmore 1974). When the violence experienced in Brazil, now extensively examined by the Brazilian historiography, is analyzed, it becomes clear that structural violence in Brazil was born of this asymmetric power interaction between European settlers, African black slaves, and natives.

According to Ailton Krenak, historian and indigenous philosopher, “the invention of Brazil is born exactly from the invasion initially made by the Portuguese, then continued by the Dutch and then continued by the French in a motto where the invasions never ended” (Krenak cited by Bolognesi 2018a). In other words, the idea of Brazil was born from the violence of invasions that subjugated indigenous and Africans, perpetuating a direct, structural, and cultural violence that survives today. Thus, while important for understanding Brazil’s social construction, the racial democracy concept can hide the tensions and violence experienced by groups like Afro-Americans and native people. At the root of the conflicts that would arise in the centuries to come is a search for recognition by the populations silenced by the elites that historically controlled the Brazilian territory.

This is clear in a remarkable episode in Brazilian history: the Tamoyo Confederation (1556–1567). This was the first organized native movement against the land occupation by Portugal. The union of tribes in the Tamoyo Confederation fought for 2 years continuously to avoid the ongoing settlement of Portuguese settlers and descendants in the Bay of Rio de Janeiro. Despite the establishment of a truce, the Portuguese were strengthened and continued to raid the villages to enslave and imprison natives. In 1567, the Portuguese military officer Estacio de Sá arrived in Rio de Janeiro and led the expulsion of the tamoyos and the French navy who had allied with them later during the conflict. After this episode, given the difficulty the Portuguese had in enslaving indigenous Brazilians, the importation of African slaves was intensified.

Soon the foundations of the colony’s defensive organization emerged to deal with the ambitions of the French, English, and Dutch governments. Among the first wars between colonial Brazil and a foreign country were the expulsion of the French army from Guanabara Bay (1566) – still in the context of the Tamoyos Confederation war – and the city of Sao Luis (1615). Moreover, during the process of territorial expansion in the seventeenth and early eighteenth century, the bandeirantes – Portuguese explorers and fortune hunters – and their followers led the defense of the newly conquered territory. As the bandeirantes searched for wealth and attempted to enslave the indigenous tribes, they had several clashes with natives in the provinces of Mato Grosso, Bahia, and Rio de Janeiro. In 1707, the bandeirantes revolted against Portuguese interests by claiming the gold they had just found in the interior of Brazil, initiating the Emboabas War.

Apart from these episodes, there were recurring battles against the Dutch invasions after 1624. In search of sugarcane market control and slaves supply, the Netherlands controlled the Northeast Brazil territories from 1637 to 1644. An insurrection conducted by Portugal started in 1644 and culminated in the Dutch capitulation in 1654. The conflict against the Netherlands fostered more military investments in Brazil, strengthening the Portuguese army there.

During the eighteenth century, colonial Brazil experienced various internal conflicts. The War of Muscates (1710–1711) put the landowning elites of the Olinda region and Portuguese traders at war. Subsequently, a similar war called The Revolt of Vila Rica (1720) pitted the Portuguese against the population of the Ouro Preto region, who revolted against the unequal distribution of wealth from gold mining. Finally, in 1789, the country experienced the separatist movement known as the Inconfidência Mineira, inspired by the United States War of Independence and French liberal ideals. Led by the intellectual elite of the wealthy city of Ouro Preto – a financial center for Portuguese gold exploration – the revolt was severely repressed by Portugal. Its leader, José Joaquim da Silva Xavier, a.k.a. Tiradentes, was hanged in 1792 and had his body in parts exposed to deter any further attempt to question the power of the metropolis. The date of his execution, April 21, is today a Brazilian national holiday.

Consolidation of the Military and the Paraguayan War

After the invasion of Portugal by Napoleonic troops, the Portuguese court moved with all its officers and the royal family to Brazil, arriving in 1808. This episode facilitated the consolidation of the military in the country, with the formation in 1810 of the Royal Military Academy in Rio de Janeiro. In the following years, military hospitals, arsenals of war, and weapon industries were organized.

After the independence proclaimed by emperor Dom Pedro I in 1822, some important wars broke out in Brazil. Dissidents gathered in the Confederation of Ecuador (1824), which opposed the monarchy and sought to create an independent territory in northeastern Brazil, but was defeated by the imperial forces. Subsequently, the Cisplatine War (1825–1828) opposed Brazil and the United Provinces of the River Plate (currently Argentina and Uruguay). Defeated, Brazil ceded the territory that would allow the independence of the Republic of Uruguay.

As explained by Nelson W. Sodre, the colonial era would end symbolically on August 18, 1831 with the creation of the National Guard, which made the Brazilian military apparatus autonomous from Portugal's army doctrine (Sodre 1969). Separatists groups were defeated by the National Guard in the following decades in several important conflicts. Some of those can be highlighted as more significant, especially because of the popular power of such movements.

Among the most important conflicts in Imperial Brazil was driven by the Cabanagem, a separatist movement conducted in Grão-Pará province in 1835–1840. The Cabanagem refers to the type of hut used by the poorest people living along the rivers of northern Brazil. The main location of the conflict was the city of Belem. The popular revolt against white elites linked to the Empire gathered slaves, Indians, and local elites and was one of the most important mass rebellions in Brazilian history. After repressive actions ordered by province governor Bernardo Lobo de Sousa in 1833 against any intent of separation of the Brazilian Empire, the tension remained strong for 2 years. In 1835, rebels – jointly with local landowners – killed Lobo de Sousa and fought against Portuguese forces for the separation of the province of Grão-Pará. After 5 years of intense struggles and decisive support from the British Navy, the Brazilian Empire defeated the rebels. In the 5 years of conflict, between 30% and 40% of the population of Belém died, totaling more than 40,000 deaths (Harris 2010).

In the same period, other important conflicts against the Empire emerged. As summarized by Harris (2010, p. 287),

Rio Grande do Sul's Farroupilha revolt and Maranhão's Balaiada continued in those regions' countryside. There would be other liberal eruptions in São Paulo (1842), Minas Gerais (1842), and Pernambuco (1848). The rural insurgency on the Alagoas and Pernambuco border, the Cabanada, had simmered for three years (1832-1835). Though not liberal in origin, it challenged the control of land by new landowners. The Muslim slave rebellion [Malê revolt] in the city of Salvador in January 1835 had threatened to overthrow the regional leaders, but the plot was discovered before it got under way. The Sabinada in that province had also been put down in March 1838, four months after it began. The challenge to the new nation and its leaders, popular exclusion from the political process, land confiscation, capitalist transformation, and slavery had been vigorous yet they were put down robustly. The reprisal allowed centralized authority to be reimposed on the regions. In [the Cabanagem in] Pará, this forced a reconfiguration of local patron/client relations and the local ruling class to find common interest and become dependent on national rulers.

One hundred and seventy years later, the inequality in rural areas that engendered conflicts like Cabanagem and Sabinada continues to kill thousands of people annually in Brazil. Especially concentrated in the northern region, these conflicts killed nearly 1,500 people in 2018 in disputes between farmers (and its militias) and peasants. In states like Pará, Mato Grosso, and Tocantins, the low presence of police and public policies makes the peasants even more vulnerable to the political and paramilitary power of landowners (CPT 2018). In summary, it can be said that the inequality in rural areas that triggered the Cabanagem war was not solved by the conflict, leading to other struggles in search of social justice in the countryside.

One of the major wars in the history of Brazil happened 30 years after Cabanagem, the Paraguayan War (1864–1870). Regarded as the largest international armed conflict that has occurred in South America, the Paraguayan War was fought between Paraguay and the Triple Alliance (Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay). The conflict began with the invasion of the Brazilian province of Mato Grosso by the Paraguayan army under orders from President Francisco Solano López. Besides seeking a Paraguayan outlet to the sea, Solano López feared that the Brazilian Empire and the Republic of Argentina would dismantle and economically isolate the smaller Southern Cone countries.

After successive defeats in battles in the first years of conflict, the Brazilian army was reorganized by Marshal Duque de Caxias. He took control of the troops and empowered them to win the conflict in 1870. Key to winning the war was the recognition of slaves' descendants as citizens, allowing them to serve in the Brazilian army. The years of intense battles resulted in more than 350,000 dead, 80% of these being Paraguayans. Although they modernized their armies, Argentina and Brazil had huge debts at the end of the war that would affect their trade balance for more than a decade. Paraguay lost a significant part of its territory and 69% of its male population.

This result makes some historians like José Chiavenato call the war an “American Genocide” (Chiavenato 1979).

Challenges to Peace in the Republican Era: Revolutions and Revolts in the Building of a New Nation

In 1889 the monarchy was overthrown by a military coup d'état led by Marshal Deodoro da Fonseca. Behind the coup was a profound weakening of the monarchy for diverse reasons, such as the abolition of slavery in 1888 that dissatisfied landowners against the royal family, the succession of the throne being in the hands of Princess Isabel and a Frenchman – since she was married to Prince Gaston, Count of Eu – and the strengthening of republican ideas among the armed forces.

Despite the republican consolidation in the following decades of the twentieth century, the initial years were ones of intense revolts and disputes, many of which victimized thousands of Brazilians. Four years after the proclamation of the republic, in search of greater autonomy for the state of Rio Grande do Sul, the Federalist Riograndense Revolution (Farroupilha) decimated 10,000 people between 1893 and 1895. Shortly before, in 1891, the Armada Revolt – which had two moments of conflict – gathered Navy mutineers against the centralization of power by Deodoro da Fonseca and Floriano Peixoto. The first Armada Revolt led to the resignation of President Deodoro da Fonseca after the mutineers, who had control of several warships, threatened to bomb the city of Rio de Janeiro, which was then the capital of Brazil. In 1893, with Brazil already under the presidency of Floriano Peixoto, the conflict escalated. Bombings of army positions in the city of Rio de Janeiro led to the capital being shifted to Petrópolis until 1903. The revolt was contained in 1894 by the Republic with the support of the United States, which entered the conflict after the mutineers sunk its boats moored in Rio de Janeiro.

In the nineteenth century, the War of Canudos (1896–1897) was considered the most violent civil conflict in the Republic. In the city of Canudos, state of Bahia, 25,000 inhabitants joined Messianic leader Antonio Conselheiro, who promised miracles in an area plagued by drought, poverty, and land control in the hands of few families. Landowners joined the Catholic Church to contain the movement, but the army only acted after the rumor spread that the movement wanted to re-establish the monarchy. The army's brutal response killed 25,000 people – 20,000 of them residents of Canudos – and the 5,000 Canudos' houses were set on fire. The Canudos' story was immortalized in the classic of Brazilian literature, Os Sertões, by Euclides da Cunha.

In its early years, the Republic was dominated by the oligarchy linked to coffee and livestock production in the states of Minas Gerais and São Paulo. Because of this dominance, the period called the First Republic (1899–1930) is also referred to as “coffee with milk politics.” The First Republic would be shaken in the 1920s by revolts by low-rank officers, especially in the city of São Paulo in 1924 and in the communist movement Coluna Prestes (1925–1927). In the first revolt, the city of São Paulo was taken for 23 days and bombed by the central government. Later, in 1929, the São Paulo elites broke the “coffee with milk politics,” elevating Julio Prestes as a presidency candidate. This context, added to the 1929 economic crisis, made the situation unsustainable, which led to the Brazilian Revolution in 1930.

The latter ousted the President Washington Luís in a movement conducted by the Minas Gerais, Rio Grande do Sul, and Paraíba states. While Julio Prestes won the election in March 1930, Getúlio Vargas – second place in the presidential elections – assumed the leadership in a coup d'état in October. Supported by the Brazilian army, especially low-rank officials, the Revolution meant more than just a political revolt. It was only able to occur due to a number of reasons. Among them was the change in the social structure of Brazil. In a country that had abolished slavery only 42 years earlier, there was a mass of Afro-descendants and their children who were without work and deprived of social protection. Still, immigrants from Europe and Japan had made society more diverse, especially in the South and Southeast regions. In the economy, industry was growing, as was the power of cities and their populations. In the armed forces, there was dissatisfaction with the fraudulent elections and the precarious conditions of low-rank officials (see more in Bolognesi 2018b; Sodré 1969). These economic and social changes were key to the violent and radical change led by Getúlio Vargas.

Two years later, a group of military personnel from São Paulo, Mato Grosso, and Rio Grande do Sul united against the government demanding a new constitution. This is called the 1932 Constitutionalist Revolution. The revolt started after the death of four young people who were protesting against the dictatorship of Getúlio Vargas. In 87 days of fighting between the São Paulo state police and Brazilian armed forces, more than 2,000 people died. Although São Paulo's forces capitulated, the conflict led to the creation of the 1934 Constitution.

Later, in 1937, Getúlio Vargas assumed dictatorial powers, denouncing a communist plan to overthrow him – which subsequently proved to be a false accusation. This period is called the Estado Novo dictatorship, in which the Congress was closed and a new Constitution gave full power to the executive branch. Inspired by fascist movements in Europe, including the Nazis, Vargas' own words clearly define this moment in Brazilian history: “The Estado Novo does not recognize the rights of individuals against the collectivity. Individuals have no rights, they have duties! Rights belong to the collectivity! The State, overcoming the struggle of interests, guarantees the rights of the community and enforces its duties towards it” (Vargas 1938, p. 311). Vargas only left power in 1945, when military officials removed him to call elections. Eurico Gaspar Dutra became president, ending the dictatorship of the Estado Novo.

Beyond the domestic conflicts, Brazil was the only South American country directly involved in the two great wars. Brazil's late involvement in World War I allowed only a few dozen soldiers to be involved in preparatory missions with French troops. However, in World War II, the country became more involved. It declared war on the Axis in August 1942 after successive sinking of ships in the Brazilian coast. The next year, Brazil supported the Allies in attacking Italian and German forces with its army and air force.

The Brazilian participation, comprising 22,000 men, allowed significant wins, such as the acquisition of Massarosa, Camaiole, and Monte Prano, in Italy. Then, in cooperation with North-American troops, Brazil took control of Monte Castelo and opened spaces for British forces to move ahead to Bologna. After losing almost 500 men, Brazilian forces finally arrived in Turin on May 2, 1945, in the city of Susa, where the country ended its participation, joining the French troops on the Franco-Italian border.

Brazil (Again) Under Dictatorship: The Military Regime (1964–1985)

From 1945 to 1964, Brazil experienced a short period of democracy. During this time, however, the political scenario was permeated by upheavals. Among them was the suicide of Getúlio Vargas in his second term (which started in 1951 and was interrupted in 1954), the strong presence of the military in political affairs, and a president who resigned after 8 months in office (Janio Quadros, in 1961). Finally, in 1964, there was a new military coup against then left-wing President João Goulart.

From 1960, Brazil began to study and develop its own military doctrine with US support, adapting the North American model to the national conditions and material and geographic attributes of Brazil. A strongly ideologized, Brazilian military took over the mission to combat communism through the so-called “National Security Doctrine” and also decided to move from sporadic interventions in national political life to the full control of the state.

This approach culminated in the overthrow of President Joao Goulart in March–April 1964. The new regime adopted a nationalist and developmental policy, opposing strictly leftist movements. The following year after the coup, Brazil sent troops to support US intervention in the Dominican Republic.

From the beginning, the military regime showed no compliance with democracy. While the initial promise was to call elections, the military period lasted 21 years. In particular, the repression became stronger in 1968 with the so-called decree “Ato Institucional no. 5,” or AI-5, which suspended Constitution, gave the President dictatorial powers, closed Congress and state legislatures, and limited social and political liberties, censoring all of the country’s media and torturing and exiling dissidents.

The dictatorship context generated new conflicts in response to government limitations to liberty and political participation. Urban guerrillas sought to organize themselves to overthrow the regime and were strongly repressed. Although they proposed to create guerrillas in the rural area, leftist groups stand out in the urban area in movements such as the National Liberation Action (ALN), the National Liberation Command (COLINA), the October 8 Revolutionary Movement (MR-8), the Communist Party of Brazil (PCdoB), the Popular Revolutionary Vanguard (VPR), and the Palmares Revolutionary Armed Vanguard (VAR-Palmares). They all led urban guerrillas – labeled terrorism by the government – with actions like kidnapping ambassadors in exchange for political prisoners, bank robberies, attacks on government targets, and theft of army weapons.

In the rural area, the main conflict occurred in the north of the country with the establishment of the Araguaia Guerrilla. It was created by the Communist Party of Brazil with the aim of developing a socialist revolution. A group of 80 of the guerrillas was exterminated by the Brazilian government through counterinsurgency tactics during 1973–1974. Among the guerrillas, 22 disappeared and demanded the Brazilian government answer to the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights. The Court has attributed to the State responsibility “for the forced disappearance and, therefore, for the violation of the rights to the recognition of legal personality, life, personal integrity and personal freedom” (IACHR 2009).

According to Human Rights Watch, the military dictatorship in Brazil tortured 20,000 and killed 434 people (Human Rights Watch 2019). Moreover, the National Truth Commission, which examined the military dictatorship period, estimated that at least 8,350 indigenous people were killed, directly or indirectly, due to land depletion, forced evictions from their territories, contagion by infectious diseases, prisons, torture, and mistreatment (CNV 2014).

Despite the lack of guarantee of individual freedoms, the dictatorship reached the peak of its popularity in the 1970s, with the “Brazilian miracle” – the economic boom in mid-1970s – which was grounded in huge infrastructure buildings through loans that generated significant debt for the national economy in the decades to come.

In the final years of the 1970s, Brazil’s dictatorship fell into decay due to the difficulties of stimulating the economy, the organization of social movements claiming democracy, and the rise in poverty due to the government’s economic project. In 1979 the government approved an Amnesty Law for political crimes committed during the military regime, which cleared the military of their human rights violations. In 1985, the civilian Jose Sarney became president, ending the series of military presidents and juntas.

Emergence of Criminal Violence and Police Repression Responses

According to Seguridad, Justicia y Paz, a Mexican NGO engaged in analysis of public security in Latin America, 21 out of 50 most violent cities in the world are located in Brazil, fluctuating between 30 to 60 homicides per 100,000 inhabitants (Seguridad, Justicia y Paz 2016: 1–4). The sociologist Jacobo Waiselfisz, coordinator of the yearbook Mapa da Violência (Map of Violence), adds more alarming data to this discussion: grounded in analysis data provided by Brazilian Ministry of Health, he shows that, between 1980 and 2014, at least 830,000 people have been assassinated in Brazil (Waiselfisz 2015, p. 16).

High levels of poverty, social inequality, and chaotic urbanization are important factors contributing to the growth in homicides rates in the region of Latin America – and Brazil is no exception (Ferreira 2017). Together, these three factors perpetuate structural violence, understood here as conceptualized by Johan Galtung (1969) as a form of violence that often goes unnoticed but that victimizes thousands of people daily through unjust social structures. This structural violence spills over into an increase in anomic direct violence, making Brazil a setting in which the violence rate in some hotspots by far exceeds those of conventional battlefields (Perea 2019). In turn, this direct violence is currently strongly linked to organized crime, a phenomenon that first emerged in Brazil in the nineteenth century.

The movement known as cangaço, which rose to prominence in the northeastern hinterland at the end of the nineteenth and start of the twentieth century, was the forerunner among Brazilian organized crime groups (Oliveira Filho 2013, p. 13). Led by Virgulino Ferreira da Silva, Lampião (“The Captain”), the cangaço had hierarchical organization, division of functions and was involved in looting of villages, farms, and small towns. The cangaço was actually a response to another armed group, the jagunços, who were mercenaries paid by landowners to protect and expand the limits of their farms. In turn, the cangaçeiros had social support from the population because of some of their activities, such as free parties (“bailes”) and charity, which they provided in exchange for shelter and information about police forces (Singelmann 1975). Due to these characteristics, the cangaço are seen as “social bandits” that emerged and developed in adaptation to the existing inequality in the rural area of Northeast Brazil, as extensively analyzed by Hobsbawn (1981) in his classic book Bandits. Nevertheless, the cruel and harsh behavior of the cangaceiros’ towards their own class when their material interests were at risk cannot be neglected (Singelmann 1975, pp. 59–60). Moreover, “throughout history, violence has been an integral part of political processes in Brazil; the cangaço was one manifestation of this endemic violence, and it survived for so long precisely because of its political nature” (Singelmann 1975, p. 61).

Later in twentieth century, a kind of clandestine lottery called Jogo do Bicho (“the animal game”) was popularized in Rio de Janeiro. (James Green describes Jogo do Bicho as a “clandestine game of chance, in which sets of numbers are linked to twenty-five animals and the outcome of a bet follows the winning numbers of the official national lottery”. Moreover, “although officials at all levels might have been involved in receiving betting kickbacks in exchange for protecting those organizing the underground game, many also actively participated in repressing this popular form of gambling entertainment. After all, an officer of the law could not expect to receive protection money if there were no threat that the police might arrest a lawbreaker” (Green 2012.) This activity, sponsored by organized groups, developed and persists today through corrupt police and politicians (Silva 2003, p. 9). Aside from being a key financier of Rio de Janeiro’s carnival throughout history, the Jogo do Bicho started using its structure for drug distribution there in the 1970s. Homicides and other forms of violence soon emerged and are still prevalent in wake of the cocaine trafficking in Rio de Janeiro and throughout Brazil.

By the end of the 1970s, the organization of criminals in Rio de Janeiro began to be better structured specifically to distribute and sell illicit drugs. The pioneer criminal organization with this kind of structuration was Comando Vermelho (Red Command), which was created in the 1970s in the Ilha Grande prison, in Angra dos Reis, state of Rio de Janeiro. The combination of common prisoners with political prisoners arrested during the repression in the period of military dictatorship in Brazil (1964–1985) allowed ordinary prisoners to gain knowledge regarding organization, hierarchical structure, protection actions, and confrontation against state security forces (Oliveira Filho 2013, p. 15).

Criminals realized that the city of Rio de Janeiro provided strategically useful locations for storing two of the main drugs consumed in Brazil and abroad: cocaine and marijuana. Soon drug dealers associated with the Comando Vermelho turned antagonism between favela residents and the police to their advantage, demanding that favela residents turn a blind eye to their business. Such developments were possible because of the dissemination of urban warfare tactics through interactions in prisons between criminals and former guerrilla members.

Other criminal organizations later emerged in search of profits from drug trafficking, such as Amigos dos Amigos (Friends of Friends) and the Primeiro Comando da Capital (First Command of the Capital [PCC]), Família do Norte (Northern Family), and other small groups in urban areas. They have increased their presence and power in the border regions by eliminating intermediate groups, which increases violence (Muggah and Diniz 2014; Ferreira and Framento 2019).

The Brazilian war on drugs is now heavily based on a repressive approach that causes more deaths and damages than drug use itself. According to Amnesty International,

[t]he re-democratization of Brazil, which gave rise to the 1988 Constitution (. . .), failed to bring about changes in the structures of Brazil’s public security and police forces, resulting in corps that are out of line with the rule of law and the requirements of a plural and diverse democratic society. Public security policy in Brazil is dominated by repressive police operations, justified by the logic of the “war on drugs”, leading to a high number of deaths from police action. (Amnesty International 2015, p. 13)

Lea Rekow (2016, p. 82) sees this militarism as being part of a wider framework of “structural violence” that produces suffering – both directly through acts of violence, torture, and murder, and indirectly through an institutionalized political social pathology that results in dispossession, lack of social policies, and insecurity. Between 2009 and 2016, 741 police were killed in operations against crime, while 17,688 people died in police operations (FBSP 2016, pp. 6–7). By 2019, the toll of this militarism created a dire statistic: 1,810 people killed by police in Rio de Janeiro alone, with an average of five per day, the highest number since official records began in 1998 (BBC 2020).

Another element is toward whom the repression is directed. Although drug use also manifests in rich areas, repression is focused on less economic privileged areas. Consequently, the situation of insecurity and lack of peace in societies like Brazil is closely related to the criminalization of poverty and securitization of poor areas (Gledhill 2015). Such repressive policies cause high social costs by fostering the continuation of marginalization of poor areas, violating human rights, increasing the prison population in Brazil, and generating a new cycle of obstacles to the development of human capacities to dismantle structural violence (Carvalho and Pellegrino 2015, pp. 1–2). Moreover, the repressive policy is discriminatory, given it affects mainly black people and youth living in poor areas (FBSP 2016, p. 21).

These negative impacts of the state approach to combating organized crime paradoxically increase the profits of drug trafficking organizations. By generating more insecurity and reproducing a daunting scenario for the youth at the periphery by not promoting the reduction of structural violence, the state fosters the possibility of these young men turning against their own society and instead associating with organized crime. For the youth affected by structural violence, organized crime emerges as an outlet they are co-opted into to meet their basic needs (Blackwell and Duarte 2014). Consequently, this strengthens criminal groups, both symbolically and operationally, spreading more violence, intimidation, and corruption within the state, and preventing the full functioning of democratic institutions (GCD 2011, p. 14). Thus, the repressive policies can make the state less effective when organized crime finds an opportunity to recruit new youth for trafficking and corrupt state agents (Garzón-Vergara 2016, p. 16).

No Peace at Home, but Promoting Peace Abroad

Despite the chronic violence that Brazil experiences throughout its history, the country has actively participated in United Nations (UN) peacekeeping operations since its beginnings. Subsequent to the end of the Cold War, the use of armed forces was required to support the Brazilian foreign policy, and Brazil became a major player in several peacekeeping missions sponsored by the UN such as in Angola, Lebanon, Mozambique, and Timor-Leste, in addition to sending troops and military observers to the various conflict regions of the world. In 2004, the Brazilian Army took command of peacekeeping forces in Haiti and, after his leadership in the pacification of the Caribbean country, General Carlos Alberto dos Santos Cruz became the commander of the peacekeeping force in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (known by its acronym, MONUSCO) in 2013.

In addition to the robust Brazilian involvement in peacekeeping operations, in the 2010s, the Brazilian armed forces have been called to lead specific missions in favelas in Rio de Janeiro. Within the pacification program created by the Department of Security of Rio de Janeiro (Unidade de Polícia Pacificadora – UPPs), the military has assisted the police since 2010. The army's role has been to recover territories that had been occupied for decades by drug dealers and militiamen, such as the favelas Complexo do Alemão and Maré. However, just after the Olympic Summer Games and a pervasive economic crisis in Rio de Janeiro state, the UPPs were abandoned, and in December 2019, the army left the favelas.

Initially the pacification policy with the use of the armed forces was seen as valuable to residents, especially in relation to guaranteeing the predictability of their daily lives, reducing fear, and increasing a feeling of peace in the slums. However, in relation to social development and integration of the favela into the city, over the years, this public policy has proven to be unstable. In fact, the pacification process was directed to “creating areas of control that literally pacify local tensions without solving the economic, political and cultural sources of social conflict” (Rodrigues et al. 2018, p. 100), quite similar to other interventions of the state in the social sphere seen throughout Brazilian history. Another criticism is that the fight against crime is not a mission of the armed forces and can give rise to excessive use of force against the population, as demonstrated by several episodes in which the army victimized innocents in recent decades.

While it is difficult in such a challenging scenario to determine ways to build a peaceful society, one cannot neglect the role of subalterns for a different future. Social actors like NGOs, collectives, and social projects sponsored by public universities (the so-called Projetos de Extensão) are working to overcome or reduce cultural and structural violence in several social settings (see, for example, Kuhlmann et al. 2019). The Redes da Maré, Programa Universidade Ação, and several other actors are strongly dedicated to bringing to attention the notion that the alarming violence in Brazil cannot be normalized and deserves more peaceful responses.

Summary

Brazil's history has manifested brutal and cruel episodes of violence since the beginnings of the Portuguese colonization. The exploitation of the country has generated numerous social revolts, from the Tamoyo Confederation to the struggle of NGOs in defense of people attacked by state and crime groups in favelas today. Despite political and social upheavals, the structural and cultural violence in one of the most unequal countries in the world has not significantly changed (Perea 2019; Schwarz 2019).

In the between the many conflicts, the nation's political history was also not peaceful; in fact, it has been quite opposite to a view of joy and happiness expressed in cultural manifestations like the nation's world-class football feats and carnival. Clashes in colonial period between Portugal and other European powers, revolutions, and coups experienced in 1889 and 1930, and resistance by left-wing movements against the military regime (1964–1985), mark the historical background of peace and conflict in Brazil.

Currently, the social violence is intimately connected with organized crime and state repressive responses. This phenomenon has generated thousands of deaths across Brazil since the 1980s, victimizing mostly the young, poor, and minorities. While the current picture is not peaceful, there are important initiatives from peace formers like NGOs, collectives, and social projects conducted by universities in Brazil. Together with a change in the scope of public policies, these initiatives have the potential to create a less violent Brazil in the decades to come.

Cross-References

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Social Capital and Peace
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding
- ▶ Violent Conflicts in South America

References

- Amnesty International. (2015). You killed my son: Homicides by military policy in the Rio de Janeiro. London: AI.
- BBC News. (2020). Rio violence: Police killings reach record high in 2019. Available at: <https://www.bbc.com/news/world-latin-america-51220364>
- Blackwell, A., & Duarte, P. (2014). Violence, crime and social exclusion. In Organization of American States (OAS) (Ed.), Inequality and social exclusion in the Americas: 14 essays (2nd ed.). Washington, DC: OAS.
- Bolognesi, L., (Director). (2018a). Episode 1: Guerras de Conquista [Television series episode]. In L. Bolognesi (Director), Guerras do Brasil.doc. São Paulo: Netflix.
- Bolognesi, L., (Director). (2018b). Episode 4: A Revolução de 1930 [Television series episode]. In L. Bolognesi (Director), Guerras do Brasil.doc. São Paulo: Netflix.
- Carvalho, I. S., & Pellegrino, A. P. (2015, March). Políticas de Drogas no Brasil: A mudança já começou. Instituto Igarapé, Série Artigos Estratégicos, 16, Rio de Janeiro.
- Chiavenato, J. (1979). Genocídio Americano: a Guerra do Paraguai. Brasília: Brasiliense.
- Churchill, W. (2000). Genocide of native populations in South America. In I. W. Charny (Ed.), Encyclopedia of genocide. Santa Barbara: ABC-CLIO.
- CNV – Comissão Nacional da Verdade. (2014). Relatório da Comissão Nacional da Verdade (Vol. II), 10 de dezembro de 2014. Available at: http://cnv.memoriasreveladas.gov.br/index.php?option=com_content&view=article&id=571
- CPT – Comissão Pastoral da Terra. (2018). Conflitos no Campo Brasil 2018. Goiania: CPT.
- FBSP – Fórum Brasileiro de Segurança Pública. (2016). Anuário Brasileiro de Segurança Pública 2016. São Paulo: FBSP.
- Fernandes, F. (2007). O negro no mundo dos brancos. São Paulo: Global.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2017). Criminality and violence in South America: The challenges for peace and UNASUR's response. International Studies Perspectives, 18(1), 64–80.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V., & Framento, R. (2019). Degradação da Paz no Norte do Brasil: O Conflito Entre Primeiro Comando da Capital (PCC) e Família do Norte (FDN). Revista Brasileira de Políticas Públicas e Internacionais, 4(2), 91–114.
- Freyre, G. (1986). The masters and the slaves: A study in the development of Brazilian civilization (trans: Putnam, S.). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Garzón-Vergara, J. C. (2016, June). Qual é a relação entre o crime organizado e os homicídios na América Latina? Instituto Igarapé – Nota de Homicídios 3, Rio de Janeiro.
- GCD – Global Commission on Drugs. (2011). Guerra às drogas. Available in: http://www.globalcommissionnondrugs.org/wpcontent/uploads/2012/03/GCDP_WaronDrugs_PT.pdf

- Gledhill, J. (2015). The new war on the poor: The production of insecurity in Latin America. London: Zed Books.
- Green, J. (2012). Laws of chance: Brazil's clandestine lottery and the making of urban public life: Review by James Green. ReVista – Harvard Review of Latin America, Winter, Available at: <https://revista.drclas.harvard.edu/book/brazilian-animal-game>
- Harris, M. (2010). Rebellion on the Amazon the Cabanagem, race, and popular culture in the North of Brazil, 1798–1840. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Hobsbawn, E. (1981). Bandits. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Human Rights Watch. (2019). Brasil: Bolsonaro comemora ditadura brutal. Presidente retoma comemorações do golpe militar de 1964. Available at: <https://www.hrw.org/pt/news/2019/03/27/328619>
- IACHR – Inter-American Court of Human Rights. (2009). Caso Gomes Lund e Outros (“Guerrilha do Araguaia”) vs. Brasil. Washington, DC. Available at: http://www.corteidh.or.cr/docs/casos/articulos/seriec_219_por.pdf
- Kuhlmann, P. R. L., Ramos, L., & Araújo, S. G. S. (2019). Arte e Construção da Paz. In M. A. S. V. Ferreira, R. H. Maschietto, & P. R. L. Kuhlmann (Eds.), Estudos para a Paz: conceitos e debates. São Cristóvão-SE: Editora UFS.
- Lea, Rekow. (2016). Rio De Janeiro's Olympic Legacy: Public Security for Whom?. Journal of Human Security, 12(1), 74–90.
- Muggah, R., & Diniz, G. (2014, October). Protegendo as Fronteiras: O Brasil e sua estratégia “América como Prioridade contra o crime organizado transnacional, Instituto Igarapé - Série Artigo Estratégico, 5. Rio de Janeiro.
- Oliveira Filho, R. G. (2013). O Tratamento Jurídico Penal das Organizações Criminosas no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro. Ph.D. Thesis, Law – Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro. Available at: <http://sci-hub.tw/10.17771/PUCRio.acad.21215>
- Perea, C. M. (2019). Extreme violence without war and its social reproduction implications for building peace in Latin America. Peacebuilding, 1–14. <http://sci-hub.tw/10.1080/21647259.2019.1633105>
- Rodrigues, T., Brancoli, F., & Kalil, M. (2018). Brazil, pacification and major events: Forging an “Ambience of Security” in Rio. Revista de Estudios en Seguridad Internacional, 4(1), 71–86.
- Schwarz, L. (2019). Sobre o Autoritarismo Brasileiro. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras.
- Seguridad, Justicia y Paz. (2016, October 3). The 50 most violent cities in the world 2015. Mexico, DF at: <http://www.seguridadjusticiaypaz.org.mx/biblioteca/prensa/send/6-prensa/231-caracas-venezuela-the-most-violent-city-in-the-world>
- Silva, E. A. (2003). Crime Organizado. São Paulo: Atlas.
- Singelmann, P. (1975). Political structure and social banditry in Northeast Brazil. Journal of Latin American Studies, 7(1), 59.
- Skidmore, T. E. (1974). Black into white: Race and nationality in Brazilian thought. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sodré, N. W. (1969). História Militar do Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: Civilização Brasileira.
- Vargas, G. (1938). A Nova política do Brasil, volume 5. Rio de Janeiro: Livraria José Olympio Editora.
- Waiselfisz, J. (2015). Mapa da violência 2016: homicídios por armas de fogo no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: FLACSO/Cebela.

Peace and Conflict Studies

► Peace Journalism

Peace and Conflict Textiles

► Textile-Making as Research Method

Peace and Dialogue Structures

► Peace Infrastructures

Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Karin Aggestam and Annika Bergman-Rosamond
Department of Political Science, Lund University, Lund, Sweden

Synonyms

Feminist foreign policy; Gender justice; Empowerment; Peaceful transformation; Inclusion; Dialogue; Women; Sweden; Gender equality; Peace diplomacy; Ethics; Intersectional approach

Definition

In recent decades, there has been a global recognition of the co-constitutive relationship between gender justice and peaceful transformation of previously war-torn societies. This chapter investigates how “women-friendly states” have located their foreign policies within notions of gender equality and empowerment. It focuses on how feminist foreign policy is to all intents and purposes ethical and conducive to the transformation of conflict and peace. The case of Sweden is used as an empirical illustration being the first country to launch a feminist foreign policy and to actively advocate for the inclusion of more women in peacemaking. By way of conclusion, three remarks are made. First, core principles of feminist foreign policy and peace diplomacy are to be inclusive and dialogical. Second, feminist foreign policy stipulates a requirement to problematize essentialist notions of masculinity, femininity, and structural inequalities as a way to challenge traditional foreign policy practices. Third, the conduct of feminist-oriented foreign policy and transformative peace diplomacy has to be attentive to the ways gender interacts with other intersectional categories, such as class, ethnicity, and sexuality.

Introduction

In recent decades, there has been a global recognition of the co-constitutive relationship between gender justice and peaceful transformation of previously war-torn societies. Hence, the concept of peace has several connotations. Negative peace refers to the absence of inter- or intrastate violence, while positive peace relates to a more expansive and positive understanding, including the ending of structural violence, societal injustices, and gendered oppression (Galtung 1964). Feminist interpretations of peace resonate more with a positive peace that emphasizes forward-looking solutions to gendered violence, subordination, and injustices. Feminist contributions to peace research stress the importance of gender equality and women’s empowerment in peace processes. Contemporary research shows how an increase of women in peace processes appear to result in a less conflictual world (UN Women 2019, 2018; Krause et al. 2018). For example, Caprioli’s (2000) research highlights the significance of domestic gender equality and its pacifying and peaceful effects on state behavior. A growing number of gender-inclusive peace agreements also promote women’s empowerment and the emergence of gender-equal and peaceful societies (True and Riveros-Morales 2019). Women’s equal right to participate in formal and informal institutions as well as peacemaking is central to the realization of gender-just peace (Björkdahl 2012). This global recognition of the interplay between gender equality and peace has led some states, such as Australia, Canada, Norway, Sweden, France, Mexico, and South Africa, to adopt a feminist or a pro-gender foreign policy platform, which centers on advancing the peacebuilding logics emanating from the United Nations (UN) Security Council resolution 1325 on Women, Peace, Security (WPS) agenda (see also chapter by ▶ “Women, Peace and Security Agenda”).

This chapter focuses on “women-friendly states” that conduct foreign policies based on gender equality and empowerment, framing these policies as “smart diplomacy and economics” that are conducive to peace (Clinton 2010; Wallström 2016). Such foreign policy framing largely builds on the “women-peace hypothesis,” which assumes that women are somehow inherently peaceful in opposition to men. The latter part of the chapter specifically addresses feminist foreign policy in theory and practice. A key argument is that the adoption of a feminist foreign policy to all intents and purposes is ethical and, as such, central to the transformation of conflict and peace. The chapter empirically illustrates this argument through the case of Sweden, as the first country to launch a feminist foreign policy, and to actively advocate for the inclusion of more women in peacemaking. A key argument is that Sweden has achieved some results in its quest to include more women in peacemaking. However, this has not necessarily been coupled with a deeper and more thoroughgoing analysis of gendered structural violence and inequalities, which are fundamental barriers to peaceful change. By way of conclusion, three remarks are made. First, Sweden’s feminist foreign policy illustrates the necessity to pursue a peace diplomacy that is inclusive and dialogical. Second, feminist foreign policy stipulates a requirement to problematize essentialist notions of masculinity, femininity, and structural inequalities as a way to challenge traditional foreign policy practices. Third, the conduct of feminist-oriented foreign policy and transformative peace diplomacy has to be attentive to the ways gender interplays with other intersectional categories, such as class, ethnicity, and sexuality.

Peace, Gender, and Foreign Policy

Historically, the “women-peace hypothesis” has been used as a strategic argument in the mobilization of women’s activism and political struggles for gender equality and peaceful change (see chapter by ► “Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\)”). Women are assumed to possess empathetic, caring, and cooperative skills, while men frequently are assigned competitive and power-oriented characteristics expressed in the enactment of military masculinity (Maoz 2009). In addition, this gendered dichotomization of men and women provides an explanation for why women historically have been marginalized and excluded from formal politics and peace diplomacy, a tendency that remains intact in peace diplomacy. Hence, the hypothesis has evoked criticism because of the tendency to frame women as a monolithic inherently peaceful group, rather than as a diverse gender category, possessing different characteristics and skills (Aharoni 2016; Alison 2007; Sjoberg and Gentry 2007). The peacefulness is often assumed to emerge from women’s maternal experiences placing them well to engage in inclusive and dialogical peacebuilding processes (Reardon 1985; Ruddick 1989). While essentialism can be damaging by furthering stereotypical ideas about the abilities and characteristics of women and men, it is important to recognize that women have distinct experiences and abilities. In particular, women’s experiences of care and inclusive dialogue are conducive to successful peacemaking, which in turn can add new ideas and practices to peacebuilding. However, this requires treating femininity and masculinity and other gender characteristics as social constructions rather than as static features, and therefore subject to change (Cockburn 2007). By definition, women’s peacefulness is a feature of their socially constructed gender roles rather than their inherent biological peaceful qualities. From this follows that women and men possess a variety of identity markers, skills, and qualities, and not all women are prone to peaceful dialogue, and not all men are competitive and wedded to militarism (Alison 2007). This insight is key to critical analyses of how masculinities and femininities are constructed in foreign policy, in relation to matters of peace and security. Central here is scholarship that investigates variations in the ways women and men conduct peace negotiation and mediation (see chapter by ► “Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus”). Such scholarship holds that the skills required for successful peacemaking are usually more compatible with feminine rather than masculine characteristics. In part, this has to do with typically masculine traits frequently being associated with a competitive transactional negotiation behavior, whereas feminine characteristics are linked to transformational problem-solving, dialogical ethics, and inclusive peacemaking (Florea et al. 2003; Robinson 2011). In short, there is reason to treat the underlying assumptions of the women-peace hypothesis with caution, while also recognizing its strategic merits.

Gender and Foreign Policy

As noted above, the women-peace hypothesis and the WPS-agenda are informing contemporary policy discourses and practices. By adopting an activist stance on the WPS-agenda, a growing number of states seek to realize peace through their pro-gender and feminist-informed foreign and security policies by increasing women’s participation in peacebuilding, national armed forces, and international peace support operations (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2019). As women tend to hold different perspectives than men on questions of war and peace, given their distinct experiences and socially constructed gender roles (Wibben et al. 2019), they may facilitate the achievement of a sustainable peace. Yet, women continue to be marginalized and excluded from formal political and diplomatic decision-making on foreign policy, security, and peace (Aggestam and Towns 2018, 2019). Nonetheless, gender-just advocacy and coalition building between domestic and international actors take place globally, for example, the coalition “friends of WPS” within the UN Security Council, which shows willingness to coordinate global advocacy in this area.

While a number of studies have assessed the impact of UN SCR 1325 (Olsson and Gizelis 2015), there are surprisingly few that address gender and foreign policy overall (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2016; Aggestam and True 2020, 2021; Bilgic 2016; Hudson and Heidl 2015). In the study of diplomacy, there has recently been a “gender turn” (Aggestam and Towns 2019) with a growing number of studies that focus on descriptive representation and gendered institutions (Aggestam and Towns 2018). Yet, academic scholarship on gender and foreign policy remains scarce and the subfield of foreign policy analysis has overall been gender-blind (Hudson 2014). As Karen Smith (2019) argues, “the sex of the decision-maker and the gendered nature of the decision-making processes have generally been left out of the picture.”

This has spurred additional studies that probe the basic question, raised some decades ago, by Cynthia Enloe (2000): “where are the women” in foreign policy and peacemaking? Other studies examine the correlation between gender equality, empowerment, women’s participation in foreign policy, security, and peace. The results indicate that states with poor records on gender inequality are more likely to be involved in intrastate conflicts (Caprioli 2000; Melander 2005). These studies have also been useful for policymakers, practitioners, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in their quest to promote pro-gender norms in foreign policy, gender mainstreaming, and inclusion in peace diplomacy.

More recent work has explored the increase of women in foreign policy leadership. Sylvia Bashevkin (2018) has studied four US female Secretaries of State since 1980 and the gendered assumption that women leaders reflects the female electorate in their foreign policy orientation and that they are doves on defense compared with male leaders. On the contrary, Bashevkin concludes that not all women foreign policy leaders have supported pro-gender norms in foreign policy. Genovese (1993) study also shows how women leaders tend to act more masculine in foreign policy as a way to overcome what is seen as feminine weakness.

Feminist Foreign Policy and Peacebuilding

In 2014, the Swedish Red-Green coalition government surprised the world by adopting an explicitly feminist foreign policy, a groundbreaking decision by all accounts. Other states have since moved in a similar direction by integrating pro-gender norms into their foreign policies (Aggestam and True 2020). Canada launched a feminist international development assistance policy in 2017 (Parisi 2020; Robinson 2021), while Mexico launched a feminist platform for all aspects of its foreign policy in 2020. Common to most of these countries is their commitment to the adoption of a rights-based, less elite-driven, and gender-just foreign policy. At the center of their foreign policy practice is their support for the objectives of the WPS-agenda (Aggestam and True 2020). This involves confronting patriarchal power relations, gendered hierarchies, and violence that undergird contemporary conflict and global politics. Adopting a feminist framework for foreign policy conduct is a transformative peace project, embedded in a strong commitment to women’s participation in all aspects of peace diplomacy. As noted previously, feminist foreign policy then is to all intents and purposes ethical and wedded to the peaceful and just transformation of global society (Aggestam et al. 2019; Bergman-Rosamond 2020; Robinson 2021; True 2016). However, feminist foreign policy is also located within policy pragmatism and compromise as well as the pursuit of national interests globally, which, at times, are inconsistent with the ethical and peaceful ideals of gender-just peace diplomacy (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2016). For example, Sweden's track record as one of the world's largest exporters of arms, in proportion to its population, seemingly may contradict the ethically framed peace logic of the country's feminist foreign policy as well as demilitarizing aspects of the WPS-agenda (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2016; Agius and Edenberg 2019). It should be noted though that the transformation of the embedded patriarchal structures and gender biases that prevail in global politics is a long-term feminist endeavor, which is likely to give rise to long-term national and global resistance (Aggestam et al. 2019; Aggestam and True 2021).

Still, feminist foreign policy, signals a strong commitment to inclusive security and durable peace and, as such, is a "shift, from the openly declared pursuit of national interests in foreign policy to the growing emphasis on ethical or moral duties to protect the rights and interests of others" (Chandler 2003, p. 295). The focus of the next section is Sweden's feminist foreign policy with its commitment to pursue "women-friendly" peace diplomacy.

Feminist Foreign Policy and Peace Diplomacy

While Sweden's feminist foreign policy is path-breaking and new, it is also intimately linked to its longstanding solid support for the WPS-agenda (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2019). Moreover, it builds on the Swedish self-narrative as a peaceful and cosmopolitan-minded gender-just state (Bergman-Rosamond 2020), wedded to the institutions of the UN, its generous budget to international development assistance, and, most relevant here to the explicit protection of girls and women (and other marginalized groups) from harm and discrimination within and beyond borders (Bergman-Rosamond 2013).

Sweden's feminist foreign policy rests on the three "Rs": rights, representation, and resources, coupled with a fourth 'R,' that of realism, which entails staying attentive to the results of feminist foreign policy and ensuring that initiatives are implemented on the ground. More specifically, feminist foreign policy aims to "strengthen all women's and girls' Rights, Representation and Resources, based on the Reality in which they live." (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019, p. 11). While the four Rs are of equal significance and intimately linked the focus in this chapter is on women's representation in peace diplomacy, a domain where women's underrepresentation historically has been strikingly low (Aggestam and Towns 2019).

In 2019, women negotiators made up only of 13% and they amounted to 6% in all negotiation delegations (UN Women 2019). This poor record has led Sweden to take "action to increase women's representation and participation in the discussion, negotiation, drafting, interpretation and implementation of resolutions and key documents on disarmament and non-proliferation" (Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019b, p. 8). As noted above, representation is a key feature of UN SCR 1325, in particular the significance of promoting women's participation in the prevention, management, and resolution of global conflicts. The official Swedish line is that "gender equality contributes to peace" and "when women are involved in peace processes, the likelihood of lasting peace increases" (Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019a, p. 7).

While promoting all aspects of gender-just representation in peacemaking Sweden has singled out mediation as a key "weapon for peace" to ensure women's participation and empowerment in peacemaking (Wallström and Soini 2016). To this end, Sweden has sought to promote women's engagement in peace mediation processes (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019) in Latin America, Asia, Africa, and the Middle East. The booklet Handbook – Sweden's Feminist Foreign Policy, published by Sweden in 2018, presents the general methods and aims of feminist foreign policy and expresses Sweden's commitment to gender-just peacebuilding (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2018). By way of illustration, the establishment of the Swedish Women's Mediation Network in 2015 (Folke Bernadotte Academy 2017: n.d.) is flagged as a groundbreaking example of gender-just peace diplomacy in the Handbook (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2018). The network seeks to "promote peaceful conflict resolution and actively support women's meaningful participation in peacebuilding initiative, before, during and after conflicts" (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2018, pp. 64–65; see also Aggestam and Svensson 2018). The mediation network is committed to ethically situate women's representation in peace processes within international law and human rights. What is more, it relies on the assumption that women's participation in peace processes will increase the chances of peace agreements being reached and sustained over time (Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2018, p. 63). As of 2019, 15 female senior Swedish diplomats and members of civil society have taken active part in the network. Sweden is also part of the larger Nordic Women Mediation Network (NWMN) and Global Alliance, which coordinates a range of mediating activities, advocacy, and mentoring as a way of facilitating dialogue between regional women networks beyond the Nordic sphere, such as Arab Women Mediators, Femwise-Africa, Mediterranean Women Mediators, Women Mediators across the Commonwealth. In addition, the Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs has launched the hashtag #MoreWomenMorePeace# to raise awareness of the significance of including more women in peacebuilding and peace negotiations (Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2017, p. 54, see also Aggestam 2019).

In the publication "Sweden's feminist foreign policy – Examples from three years of implementation" (2019), Sweden's efforts have been highlighted to draw attention to the WPS-agenda and women's participation in peacemaking. In line with Sweden's commitment to a result-orientated feminist foreign policy (Bergman-Rosamond 2020), the document lists a range of "results" in terms of supporting women's participation in peace processes in Columbia, Mali, Syria, Afghanistan, Myanmar, and Somalia "through policy, technical and financial support" (Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019a, p. 10). One key example is "the incorporation of a clear gender perspective in Colombia's peace agreement, which can in turn serve as a model for others" (2019, p. 24). What is more, Sweden's support for the Women's Advisory Committee (WAC) of the Syrian opposition, along with support for the UN-led peace talks in Geneva as well as the provision of mediation training of Afghan women through cooperation with the Swedish Embassy (Ministry for Foreign Affairs 2019a, p. 10) are viewed as such achievements.

While the efforts briefly introduced above are consistent with the broad contours of the WPS agenda and the representation logic of FFP, such documents reveal less about peacemaking practices by the local women that Sweden seeks to assist. Nor do they say much about the gendered and intersectional injustices that undergird conflict, war, and peace, with the structural underpinnings of conflict and post-conflict situations being insufficiently explored. Moreover, Sweden's FFP, associated with the Red-Green coalition government that has been in power since 2014, is undergirded by an explicitly liberal feminist logic that tends to assume that "adding women" to peacemaking will automatically generate gender just positive peace. Thania Paffenholz et al.'s (2016) research is insightful here because it challenges that position, noting that more representation of women in negotiation processes and the settlement of peace agreements does not necessarily produce gender-just and sustainable peace. Paffenholz's study indicates that what matters more is whether women actually can influence the negotiations and the policy-making processes. In some ways, Sweden's gender-just peace diplomacy "mirrors broader depoliticized global strategies of simply "counting" women and "adding" them to peace negotiations, without questioning the militarized infrastructure and power dynamics that underpin such negotiations" (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2019, p. 41). Yet, feminist-informed foreign policy discourse and conduct that embrace gender-just inclusion can help to reframe peace diplomacy and its practices in a more inclusive and dialogical fashion (Aggestam and Bergman-Rosamond 2019). Nonetheless, for peace diplomacy to become more inclusive and dialogical essentialist understandings of masculinity and femininity and the gendered power relations that tend to define peacemaking as well as orthodox foreign policy practices need to be profoundly challenged (Aggestam et al. 2019; see also chapter by ▶ “Masculinity and Conflict”). This involves being mindful of how gender intersects with other intersectional categories, such as class, ethnicity, and sexuality, and, how this in turn impacts the durability of transformative and sustainable peace.

Summary

Peace and gender equality are now important issues in global politics. With the adoption of UN Security Council resolution 1325 in 2000, the WPS-agenda has now become central to the foreign policies and practices of a growing number of states. Underlying some of these international normative frameworks is the “women-peace hypothesis,” which characterizes women as innately peaceful. Yet, gender is a social construction, which is fluid rather than static, and, thus, subject to transformative change. By implication, the qualities of men and women are products of social construction rather than inherent abilities. Yet, while conceding that the women-peace hypothesis is undergirded by essentialism and gendered assumptions, it is important to seriously consider the distinct contributions that women make to peacemaking, in particular by drawing upon their distinct experience of war and peace as well as their tendency to privilege inclusive and empathetic dialogue over competitive approaches to peacebuilding. This chapter has focused on peace in relation to feminist foreign policy. By way of conclusion, three remarks are made. First, the case of Sweden’s feminist foreign policy shows the necessity of pursuing gender just peace diplomacy that is inclusive and dialogical. Second, this stipulates a requirement to problematize essentialist notions of masculinity and femininity as well as structural inequalities, which traditional foreign policy practices build on. Third, the conduct of feminist-oriented foreign policy and transformative peace diplomacy has to be attentive to the ways gender intersects with other intersectional categories, such as class, ethnicity, and sexuality.

Cross-References

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Peace in International Relations Theory
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus
- ▶ Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)
- ▶ Women’s Organizations in Post-conflict Contexts
- ▶ Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\)

References

- Aggestam, K. (2019). WPS, peace negotiations and agreements. In S. Davies & J. True (Eds.), Handbook on women, peace, security. Oxford University Press.
- Aggestam, A., & Bergman-Rosamond, A. (2016). Swedish feminist foreign policy in the making: Ethics, politics and gender. Ethics and International Affairs, 20(3), 323–334.
- Aggestam, K., & Bergman-Rosamond, A. (2019). Re-politicising the gender-security nexus. Sweden’s feminist foreign policy. European Review of International Studies, 5(3), 30–48.
- Aggestam, K., & Svensson, I. (2018). Where are the women in peace mediation? In K. Aggestam & Towns (Eds.), Gendering diplomacy and international negotiation. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Aggestam, K., & Towns, A. (Eds.). (2018). Gendering diplomacy and international negotiation. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Aggestam, K., & Towns, A. (2019). The gender turn in diplomacy: A new research agenda. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 21(1), 9–28.
- Aggestam, K., & True, J. (2020). Gendering foreign policy: A comparative framework for analysis. Foreign Policy Analysis, 16(2), 143.
- Aggestam, K., & True, J. (2021) Political leadership and gendered multilevel games in foreign policy, International Affairs, 97(2), 385–404.
- Aggestam, K., Bergman-Rosamond, A., & Kronsell, A. (2019). Theorising feminist foreign policy. International Relations, 33(1), 23–39.
- Agius, C., & Edénborg, E. (2019). Gendered bordering practices in Swedish and Russian foreign and security policy. Political Geography, 71, 56–66.
- Aharoni, S. (2016). Who needs the women and peace hypothesis? Rethinking modes of inquiry on gender and conflict in Israel/Palestine. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 19(3), 311–326.
- Alison, M. (2007). Wartime sexual violence: Women’s human rights and questions of masculinity. Review of International Studies, 33(1), 75–90.

- Bashevian, S. (2018). Women as foreign policy leaders. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Bergman-Rosamond, A. (2013). Protection beyond borders: Gender cosmopolitanism and co-constitutive obligation. Global Society, 27(1), 319–336.
- Bergman-Rosamond, A. (2020). Swedish feminist foreign policy and “gender cosmopolitanism”. Foreign Policy Analysis, 16(2), 217–235.
- Bilgic, A. (2016). Turkey, power and the west: Gendered international relations and foreign policy. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Björkdahl, A. (2012). A gender-just peace: Exploring the post-Dayton peace agreement. Peace & Change. A Journal of Peace Research, 37(2), 286–317.
- Caprioli, M. (2000). Gendered conflict. Journal of Peace Research, 37(1), 51–68.
- Chandler, D. (2003). Rhetoric without responsibility: The attraction of ethical foreign policy. British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 5(3), 295–316.
- Clinton, H. (2010). Development in the 21st century. Foreign Policy, January 6. www.foreignpolicy.com/articles/2010/01/06/hillary_clinton_on_development_in_the21stcentury. Accessed 10 June 2013.
- Cockburn, C. (2007). From where we stand: War, women's activism and feminist analysis. Zed Books.
- Enloe, C. (2000). The morning after: Sexual politics at the end of the cold war. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Florea, N., Brown, S., Butler, M., & Hernandez, M. (2003). Negotiating from Mars to Venus: Gender in simulated international negotiations. Simulation Gaming, 24, 226–248.
- Folke Bernadotte Academy. (n.d.). Swedish women's mediation network. <https://fba.se/en/areas-of-expertise/dialogue-mediation/swedish-womens-mediation-network/>
- Galtung, J. (1964). An editorial. Journal of Peace Research, 1(1), 1–4.
- Genovese, M. A. (Ed.). (1993). Women as national leaders. Newberry Park: Sage.
- Hudson, V. (2014). Sex and world peace. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Hudson, V., & Heid, P. (2015). The Hillary doctrine: Sex and American foreign policy. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Krause, J., Krause, W., & Bränfors, P. (2018). Women's participation in peace negotiations and the durability of peace. International Interactions Empirical and Theoretical Research in International Relations, 44(6), 985–1016.
- Maoz, I. (2009). The women and peace hypothesis? The effect of opponent negotiators' gender on the evaluation of compromise solutions in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. International Negotiation, 14(3), 519–536.
- Melander, E. (2005). Gender Equality and intrastate armed conflict. International Studies Quarterly, 49(4), 695–714.
- Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (2017). p. 10.
- Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (2019a).
- Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (2019b).
- Olsson, L., & Gizelis, T.-I. (Eds.). (2015). Gender, peace and security. London: Routledge.
- Paffenholz, T., Ross, N., Dixon, S., Schluchter, A.-L., & True, J. (2016). Making women count – Not just counting women: Assessing women's inclusion and influence on peace negotiations. Report ITI and UN Women, January 4.
- Parisi, L. (2020). Canada's new feminist international assistance policy: Business as usual? Foreign Policy Analysis, 16(2), 163–180.
- Reardon, B. (1985). Sexism and the war system. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Robinson, F. (2011). The ethics of care. In A feminist approach to human security. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Robinson, F. (2021). Feminist foreign policy as ethical foreign policy? A care ethics perspective. Journal of International Political Theory, 17(1), 20–37.
- Ruddick, S. (1989). Maternal thinking: Towards a politics of peace. Beacon Press.
- Sjoberg, & Gentry, C. (2007). Mothers, monsters, whores: Women's violence in global politics. Zed Books.
- Smith, K. (2019). Missing in analysis: Women in foreign policy-making. Foreign Policy Analysis, 16(1), 130–141.
- Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (2018). Handbook Sweden's feminist foreign policy. <https://www.government.se/4ae557/contentassets/fc115607a4ad4bca913cd8d11c2339dc/handbook%2D%2D-swedens-feminist-foreign-policy.pdf>. Accessed 16 Nov 2020.
- Swedish Ministry for Foreign Affairs. (2019). Sweden's feminist foreign policy Examples from three years of implementation. <https://www.government.se/4ab455/contentassets/654bcc72d8f44da087386b4906043521/swedens-feminist-foreign-policy%2D%2Dexamples-from-three-years-of-implementation.pdf>. Accessed 16 Nov 2020.
- True, J. (2016) Explaining the Global Diffusion of the Women, Peace and Security Agenda. International Political Science Review 37(3), 307–323.
- True, J., & Riveros-Morales, Y. (2019). Towards inclusive peace: Analysing gender-sensitive peace agreements 2000–2016. International Political Science Review, 40(1), 23–40.
- UN Women. (2018). Series on inclusive peace processes. <https://www.unwomen.org/en/digital-library/publications/2018/12/series-on-inclusive-peace-processes>
- UN Women. (2019). Facts and figures: Women, peace, and security. <https://www.unwomen.org/en/what-we-do/peace-and-security/facts-and-figures>
- Wallström, M. (2016). Speech by Minister for Foreign Affairs at the Georgetown University's Institute for Women, Peace and Security, 2016.
- Wallström, M., & Soini, T. Mediation: The real wapon for peace. Huffington Post, 29 January, 2016.
- Wibben, A., Confortini, C., Roohi, S., Aharoni, S., Vastapuu, L., & Vaittinen. (2019). Collective discussion: Piecing-up feminist peace research. International Political Sociology, 13(1), 86–107.

Peace and Political Unsettlement

Jan Pospisil

