

Oliver P. Richmond
Gëzim Visoka
Editors

The Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies

palgrave
macmillan

The Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies

Oliver P. Richmond • Gëzim Visoka
Editors

The Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies

With 58 Figures and 28 Tables

palgrave
macmillan

Editors

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester
Department of Politics
Manchester, UK

Gëzim Visoka
Dublin City University
School of Law and Government
Dublin, Ireland

ISBN 978-3-030-77953-5 ISBN 978-3-030-77954-2 (eBook)
<https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-030-77954-2>

© Springer Nature Switzerland AG 2022

This work is subject to copyright. All rights are reserved by the Publisher, whether the whole or part of the material is concerned, specifically the rights of translation, reprinting, reuse of illustrations, recitation, broadcasting, reproduction on microfilms or in any other physical way, and transmission or information storage and retrieval, electronic adaptation, computer software, or by similar or dissimilar methodology now known or hereafter developed.

The use of general descriptive names, registered names, trademarks, service marks, etc. in this publication does not imply, even in the absence of a specific statement, that such names are exempt from the relevant protective laws and regulations and therefore free for general use.

The publisher, the authors, and the editors are safe to assume that the advice and information in this book are believed to be true and accurate at the date of publication. Neither the publisher nor the authors or the editors give a warranty, expressed or implied, with respect to the material contained herein or for any errors or omissions that may have been made. The publisher remains neutral with regard to jurisdictional claims in published maps and institutional affiliations.

This Springer imprint is published by the registered company Springer Nature Switzerland AG
The registered company address is: Gewerbestrasse 11, 6330 Cham, Switzerland

For Eira and Erik, and Leander

Preface

The Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies contains a comprehensive overview of major concepts, cases, and approaches to the study of peace and conflict across different humanities and social sciences disciplines. Peace and conflict studies (PCS) is one of the major sub-disciplines of international studies (including political sciences and international relations) and has emerged from a need to understand war and its related systems and concepts and how to respond to it afterward. Over time, peace and conflict studies has become an important site for inter-disciplinary studies, spanning war, peace, and conflict studies; security and development; state formation and state building; law and human rights; civil society and political authority; philosophy and religion; the anthropology and history of political order; environmental dimensions; as well as the arts and literature, psychology, and material conditions of peace, peacemaking, peace agreements, the peaceful state, the nature of regional and international cooperation and organization, among others. This interdisciplinary area of studies has also attracted scholars interested in ethics, alternative methodologies, and critical theory.

While there is extensive written scholarly work on various aspects of peace and conflict, there is no up-to-date academic encyclopedia which encompasses this fast-growing and highly significant area of research. Thus, we are delighted to present to you the first edition of the Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies which has brought together leading and emerging scholars from different disciplines to provide the most comprehensive and up-to-date resource on peace and conflict concepts, theories, methods, approaches, case studies, institutions, policies, and practices. Matters concerning peace, conflict, security, and development – which are at the heart of this discipline – are a concern not only for a niche academic community but also the wider public (as the history of twentieth-century disarmament, pacifist, and human rights campaigns illustrate). Hence, we have aimed at making the Palgrave Encyclopedia of Peace and Conflict Studies an easy-to-access, updatable, and expandable online platform to cover various relevant themes widely, which is important for both the scholarly community and the general public, hopefully also making an impact on policy makers. It is a living reference work, easily discoverable and searchable, spanning the foundational, historical, and contemporary themes. It combines breadth and depth, flexibility, global reach, and academic rigor in the age of digital learning, in order to support the interdisciplinary development of critical theories and methods necessary for the continuing study of peace. The entries in this first edition examine a broad range of topics from disciplinary perspectives, key concepts, types and histories of conflicts, and actors to institutions, networks, and practices, as well as peacemaking, peacekeeping, peacebuilding operations, and “peacegraphy” and arts.

This encyclopedic project has been in the making since 2017, and it would not have been possible without the immense dedication of a number of people. First and foremost, we are grateful to all the contributors for their creative and original work for this project, which has been essential in making it a cutting-edge reference work. We are grateful to the section editors, Sandra Pogodda, Kai Michael Kenkel, Johanna Mannergren Selimovic, Maria-Adriana Deiana, and Liridona Veliu, for their outstanding work in commissioning and reviewing entries. Finally, at Palgrave/Springer, we are grateful to Sarah Roughley for encouraging us to undertake this project, Ruth Lefevre for exceptional editorial guidance and support, and Sunali Mull and Salmanul Faris Nedum Palli for excellent and tireless editorial assistance. We are also grateful to other colleagues, such as John Doyle at Dublin City University, for supporting the project in various ways over the years.

Manchester, UK
Dublin, Ireland
May 2022

Oliver P. Richmond
Gëzim Visoka

List of Topics

Actors, Institutions and Networks

Section Editor: Maria-Adriana Deiana

Census Politics in Deeply Divided Societies
Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict
Diasporas in Peace and Conflict
EU Conditionality in the Western Balkans
Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
Gender and Mediation
Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements
Land Politics and Conflict
LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
Masculinity and Conflict
Role of State and Non-state Terrorism in Peace Processes, The Roles of Victims in Peacebuilding
Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
Transitional Justice in Croatia
Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus
Women, Peace and Security Agenda
Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts
Youth and Peacebuilding

Conflict Societies and Cases

Section Editor: Liridona Veliu

Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution
Yemen Conflict
Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT)

War and Peace in Somalia
Violent Conflicts in South America
United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK)
Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy
Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State
Sierra Leone
Russia and Frozen Conflicts in the Post-Soviet Space
Revolution, Violence, and the Pursuit of Peace
Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
Popular Protest in Palestine
Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo
Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
Peace Formation in Bougainville
Peace and Conflict in Brazil
Ohrid Framework Agreement, The
Mozambique
Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
Maoist Conflict in India
Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka
Kenya's War on Terror
Kashmir Conflict, The
In Search of Justice, Peace, and Reconciliation in Northern Uganda
Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
DR Congo: Local and International Peacebuilders' Interaction
Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans

Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia
 Colombian Peace Agreement 2016
 Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
 Civil Society and State Violence in South America
 Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis
 Bosnian Genocide

Disciplines/Concepts

Section Editor: Sandra Pogodda

Alternative Dispute Resolution
 Asian Approaches to Peace
 Asymmetrical Warfare
 Balkan as a Concept
 Balkanization
 Civil Resistance for Peace and Conflict Management, Role of Civil Society and Peacebuilding: Critical Review
 Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
 Conflict and Hunger
 Conflict Fieldwork
 Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
 Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
 Conflicts and Natural Disasters
 Culture and Conflict Resolution
 Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research
 Cyber Conflict
 Decentralization and Conflict Prevention
 Deconstruction in International Interventions
 Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR)
 Emancipatory Peace
 Ethnographic Peace Research
 Everyday Peace
 Fair Division
 Grounded Nationalism
 Human Geography and Peacebuilding
 Human Security
 Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament
 Humanitarian Disarmament II: Case Studies
 Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
 Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace

Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts
 Identity and Political Violence
 Indigenous Approaches to Peace
 Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
 International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
 International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
 Intersectionality and Peace
 Islam and Peace
 Just War Theory Across Time and Culture
 Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
 Local Peacebuilding
 Measuring Peace
 Mediation
 Negotiation
 Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
 Offline and Online (De)radicalization: An Overview of the Case of Kosovo Organized Brutality
 Pacifism and Peace
 Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding
 Peace Agreements
 Peace and Political Unsettlement
 Peace Formation
 Peace in International Relations Theory
 Peace Infrastructures
 Peace Measuring Approaches
 Peace Through Tourism
 Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
 Peacebuilding Consequences
 Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
 Phenomenological Peace
 Police Reform and Peacebuilding
 Politics of Passportization and Territorial Conflicts
 Post-Conflict Elections
 Post-Conflict Nation-Building
 Prisoners' Dilemma
 Private Peacemaking and Dialogic Approach to Mediation
 Protection of Civilians
 Reflexivity in the Study of Security and Conflict
 Resilience and Peace
 Search for Peace, the

Secession and Self-Determination
 Social Capital and Peace
 Statehood Conflicts
 Technology and Peace
 Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
 Urban Violence and Crime
 Voting Systems
 Youth Bulge and Conflict
 Youth Gang Violence in Honduras
 Zones of Peace

Peace Operations and Missions

Section Editor: Kai Michael Kenkel

Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation
 Assessment of Peace Operations
 Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
 Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
 European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The Evolution of Practice in United Nations
 Peacekeeping Operations Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture
 Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
 Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
 Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
 NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
 Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
 Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
 Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach
 Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
 R2P and Prevention
 Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
 Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
 Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity
 UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia
 UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan
 UN Peacebuilding in Timor-Leste
 UN Security Council and International Interventions
 Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping
 Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
 United Nations Missions in Haiti
 Use of Force in Peace Operations

Peaceography and Arts

Section Editor: Johanna Mannergren Selimovic

Art and Reconciliation
 Auto-photography
 Divided Cities
 Feminist Peace Research
 Geocoding as a Method for Mapping
 Conflict-Related Violence
 How Apologies After War and Atrocities Matter in International Politics
 Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
 Measuring the Implementation of the Women,
 Peace, and Security Agenda
 Memorials and Transitional Justice
 Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy
 Peace Journalism
 Perpetrator Research
 Photography and Peace
 Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace
 Research
 Silence and Peacebuilding
 Street Art and Peace
 Textile-Making as Research Method
 Textiles Making Peace
 Theatre and Peacebuilding
 Urban Peacebuilding
 Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF)

About the Editors

Oliver P. Richmond is Professor of IR, Peace and Conflict Studies in the Department of Politics, University of Manchester, UK. He is also international professor at Dublin City University and at the University of Tübingen. His publications include The Grand Design (Oxford University Press, 2021). He is co-editor of the Palgrave book series Rethinking Peace and Conflict Studies and co-editor of the journal Peacebuilding.

Dr. Gëzim Visoka is Associate Professor of Peace and Conflict Studies at Dublin City University, Ireland. His research expertise is on state recognition, peacebuilding, and international critical theory. Dr. Visoka is author or editor of numerous books, journal articles, and book chapters. Some of his recent books include: The Oxford Handbook of Peacebuilding, Statebuilding, and Peace Formation (with Oliver P. Richmond, Oxford University Press, 2021); Normalization in World Politics (with Nicolas Lemay-Hébert, The University of Michigan Press, 2022); and Routledge Handbook of State Recognition (with John Doyle and Edward Newman, Routledge, 2020), among others. He is deputy editor of Peacebuilding journal (Taylor and Francis), editor of Routledge Studies in Statehood (Taylor and Francis), and co-editor of Rethinking Peace and Conflict Studies series (Palgrave Macmillan).

About the Section Editors

Sandra Pogodda
Politics Department
University of Manchester
Manchester, UK

Liridona Veliu
School of Law and Government
Dublin City University
Dublin, Ireland

Maria-Adriana Deiana
School of History, Anthropology Philosophy and Politics
Queen's University Belfast Belfast, UK

Kai Michael Kenkel
Institute of International Relations
Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro
Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Johanna Mannergren Selimovic
Södertörn University
Stockholm, Sweden

Contributors

Maxwell Adjei Department of Political Science, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Karin Aggestam Department of Political Science, Lund University, Lund, Sweden

Billy Agwanda Istanbul Commerce University, Istanbul, Turkey

Mohamed Salah Ahmed Ankara Yildirim Beyazit University, Ankara, Turkey

Luqman B. Ajala Department of History and International Studies, Al-Hikmah University, Ilorin, Nigeria

Yaser Alashqar International Peace Studies, Trinity College Dublin, the University of Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Teresa Almeida Cravo Faculty of Economics and Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra, Coimbra, Portugal

Christine Andrä Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University, Aberystwyth, UK

Runa Annasdotter Neely Villanova University, Villanova, PA, USA

Nadine Ansorg GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies, Hamburg, Germany
University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

Beatriz E. Arias López Faculty of Nursing, University of Antioquia, Medellín, Colombia

Catherine Arthur Humanitarian and Conflict Response Institute, University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Ugur Yasin Asal Istanbul Commerce University, Istanbul, Turkey

Iain Atack Trinity College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Teuta Avdimetaj PAVE Project, Prishtina, Kosovo

Kevin Avruch School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution, George Mason University, Fairfax, VA, USA

Mikael Baaz Department of Law, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Jessie Barton-Hronešová Oxford Department of International Development, St Antony's College, University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Donnacha Ó Beacháin School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Michael Beary Delgany, County Wicklow, Ireland

Hartmut Behr Newcastle University, Newcastle, UK

Roberto Belloni Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento, Trento, Italy

Helen Berents School of Justice, Faculty of Law, Queensland University of Technology, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Annika Bergman-Rosamond Department of Political Science, Lund University, Lund, Sweden

Florian Bieber Center for Southeast European Studies, University of Graz, Graz, Austria

Annika Björkdahl Department of Political Science, Lund University, Lund, Sweden

Berit Bliesemann de Guevara Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University, Aberystwyth, UK

Ingvild Bode University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

Volker Boege The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Birgit Bräuchler Monash University, Melbourne, VIC, Australia

Morgan Brigg The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

M. Anne Brown The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Brendan Ciarán Browne Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland

Dafina Buçaj Loyola Law School, LMU, Los Angeles, CA, USA

Susanne Buckley-Zistel Center for Conflict Studies, Philipps University Marburg, Marburg, Germany

Richard Caplan University of Oxford, Oxford, UK

Fabio Carbone International Institute for Peace through Tourism, New York, NY, USA

Coventry University, Coventry, UK

David Chandler University of Westminster, London, UK

Alejandro Chehtman Universidad Torcuato Di Tella, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Yasmin Chilmeran Middle East and North Africa Programme, Swedish Institute of International Affairs, Stockholm, Sweden

David Churchman California State University Dominguez Hills, California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Catia Cecilia Confortini Peace and Justice Studies Program, Wellesley College, Wellesley, MA, USA

Laurence Cooley School of Government, University of Birmingham, Birmingham, UK

Neil Cooper School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Laura A. Coral Velásquez Facultad de Artes ASAB, Universidad Distrital Francisco José de Caldas, Bogotá, Colombia

Adriana Cuppuleri School of International Studies, University of Trento, Trento, Italy

Evellin C. da Silva Graduate Program – Public Management and International Cooperation (PGPCI), Federal University of Paraíba (UFPB), João Pessoa, Brazil

Marwan Darweish Center for Trust Peace and Social Relations, Coventry University, Coventry, UK

Sophia Dawkins Yale University, New Haven, CT, USA

Cedric de Coning Norwegian Institute of International Affairs, Oslo, Norway

Maria-Adriana Deiana Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Olga Demetriou School of Government and International Affairs, Durham University, Durham, UK

Liam Devereux Newcastle University, Newcastle, UK

Paul F. Diehl University of Texas-Dallas, Richardson, TX, USA

Elise Ditta Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

Amanda E. Donahoe History and Political Science, Centenary College of Louisiana, Shreveport, LA, USA

Caitriona Dowd School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Nita Dragusha University of Prishtina, Prishtina, Kosovo

Daniel Druckman George Mason University, Arlington, VA, USA
Macquarie University, Sydney, NSW, Australia
University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Marita Eastmond School of Global studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Josefina Echavarría Alvarez Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Peace Accords Matrix Program, Colombian Implementation Barometer Initiative, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

Filip Ejdus Faculty of Political Science, University of Belgrade, Belgrade, Serbia

Emma Elfversson Department of Peace and Conflict Research, Uppsala University, Uppsala, Sweden

Juanita Esguerra-Rezk Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

Peace and Development Research, School of Global Studies, Gothenburg University, Gothenburg, Sweden

Ibrahim Galal Fakirah Yemen and Gulf Program, Middle East Institute (MEI), Washington, DC, USA

Marta Fernández Institute of International Relations (IRI), Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro (PUC-Rio), Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Marcos Alan Ferreira Department of International Relations, Federal University of Paraíba (UFPB), Joao Pessoa, Brazil

James Fitzgerald School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Conor Foley Pontifícia Universidade Católica, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Susan Forde University of York, York, UK

Orli Fridman Faculty of Media and Communications (FMK), Singidunum University, Belgrade, Serbia

School for International Training (SIT), Belgrade, Serbia

Ellen Furnari Pleasant Hill, CA, USA

Yoshiaki Furuzawa Hiroshima City University, Hiroshima, Japan

Mohd Tahir Ganie Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction, School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Ramesh Ganohariti School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Alexander Gilder Department of Law and Criminology and Centre for International Security, Royal Holloway, University of London, Egham, UK

Niall Gilmartin School of Applied Social and Policy Sciences, Ulster University, Newtownabbey, UK

- Mary Graham The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia
- Paul Gready Centre for Applied Human Rights, University of York, York, UK
- Lucas Guerra Institute of International Relations (IRI), Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro (PUC-Rio), Rio de Janeiro, Brazil
- Ivan Gusic Lund University, Lund, Sweden
Department of Global Political Studies, Malmö University, Malmö, Sweden
- Karl Gustafsson Department of Economic History and International Relations, Stockholm University, Stockholm, Sweden
- Thao-Nguyen Ha Department of Political Science, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, TN, USA
- Maria Hadjipavlou Department of Social and Political Sciences, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus
- Jamie J. Hagen Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK
- Landon E. Hancock School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA
- Jenny Hedström Swedish Defence University, Stockholm, Sweden
- Sara Hellmüller Centre on Conflict, Development and Peacebuilding, Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, Geneva, Switzerland
- Marina E. Henke Northwestern University, Evanston, IL, USA
Hertie School, Berlin, Germany
- Eric Hoddy Department of Urban Studies and Planning, The University of Sheffield, Sheffield, UK
- Ramadan Ilazi PAVE Project, Prishtina, Kosovo
Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland
- Richard Jackson University of Otago, Dunedin, New Zealand
- Sarah Jankowitz Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK
- Rachel Julian Leeds Beckett University, Leeds, UK
- Stefanie Kappler Durham University, Durham, UK
- Dženeta Karabegović Department of Political Science and Sociology, University of Salzburg, Salzburg, Austria
- Vidushi Kaushik Ireland India Institute, School of Law and Government, Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland
- Gráinne Kelly International Conflict Research Institute (INCORE), Ulster University, Belfast, Ireland
- Rachel Kerr Department of War Studies, King's College London, London, UK

Walt Kilroy Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Dong Jin Kim Irish School of Ecumenics, Trinity College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Michael Otieno Kisaka Hacettepe University, Ankara, Turkey

Athena R. Kolbe School of Social Work, College of Health and Human Services, University of North Carolina Wilmington, Wilmington, NC, USA

Balázs Áron Kovács forumZFD – Forum Civil Peace Service, Davao City, Philippines

Florian P. Kühn School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Katarina Kušić The Center for Advanced Studies of Southeastern Europe, University of Rijeka, Rijeka, Croatia

Luka Biong D. Kuol Africa Center for Strategic Studies (ACSS), National Defense University, WA, USA

Peace Research Institute Oslo, Oslo, Norway

University of Juba, Juba, South Sudan

Sabine Kurtenbach GIGA German Institute of Global and Area Studies, Hamburg, Germany

George Kyris University of Birmingham, Birmingham, UK

Daniela Lai London South Bank University, London, UK

Marion Laurence Centre for International Policy Studies, University of Ottawa, Ottawa, ON, Canada

Department of Political Science, University of Toronto, Toronto, ON, Canada

Marko Lehti Tampere Peace Research Institute, Tampere University, Tampere, Finland

Fujian Li China Foreign Affairs University, Beijing, China

Mona Lilja School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Walter Lotze Harvard Kennedy School of Government, Boston, MA, USA

Marije Luitjens School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Roger Mac Ginty Durham University, Durham, UK

Norrie MacQueen University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, UK

Siniša Malešević School of Sociology, University College, Dublin, Ireland

Johanna Mannergren Selimovic Södertörn University, Stockholm, Sweden

Roberta Holanda Maschietto Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra, Coimbra, Portugal

Erin McCandless School of Governance, University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa

Laura McLeod University of Manchester, Manchester, UK

Patrick McQuestion Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

Marie-Therese Meye Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim, Mannheim, Germany

Gearoid Millar Department of Sociology, Institute for Conflict, Transition, and Peace Research (ICTPR), University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, UK

Farid Mirbagheri University of Nicosia, Nicosia, Cyprus

Miraji H. Mohamed School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Frank Möller Tampere Peace Research Institute, Tampere University, Tampere, Finland

Caitlin Mollica School of Justice, Faculty of Law, Queensland University of Technology, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Robert Muharremi Public Policy and Governance, Rochester Institute of Technology – Kosovo Campus, Prishtina, Kosovo

Jasmin Mujanović Brea, CA, USA

Itziar Mujika Chao Department of International Public Law, International Relations and History of Law and Hegoa Institute for International Cooperation and Development Studies, University of the Basque Country (UPV/EHU), Bilbao, Spain

Cera Murtagh Villanova University, Villanova, PA, USA

Vjosa Musliu Department of Political Science, Vrije Universiteit Brussel (VUB), Brussels, Belgium

Conflict and Development Research Group, Ghent University, Ghent, Belgium

Heela Najibullah University of Zurich, Zurich, Switzerland

Ibrahim Natil Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Edward Newman University of Leeds, Leeds, UK

Holger Niemann Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg (IFSH), Hamburg, Germany

Manuela Nilsson Department of Peace and Development Studies, Linnaeus University, Växjö, Sweden

- Israel Nyaburi Nyadera University of Macau, Macau, China
Ankara Yildirim Beyazit University, Ankara, Turkey
- Maria O'Reilly Leeds Beckett University, Leeds, UK
- Camilla Orjuela School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden
- Antonio de Aguiar Patriota Embassy of Brazil, Cairo, Egypt
- Savita Pawnday Global Centre for the Responsibility to Protect, New York, NY, USA
- Andrea Peinhopf School of Slavonic and East European Studies, University College London, London, UK
- Skënder Perteshi PAVE Project, Prishtina, Kosovo
- Sandra Pogodda University of Manchester, Manchester, UK
- Lura Pollozhani Centre for Southeast European Studies, University of Graz, Graz, Austria
- Jan Pospisil ASPR – Austrian Study Centre for Peace and Conflict Resolution, Vienna, Austria
- Nilanjana Premaratna Umeå University, Umeå, Sweden
- Florian Qehaja Kosovar Centre for Security Studies (KCSS), Prishtina, Kosovo
- Jason Quinn Peace Accords Matrix Program and Colombian Implementation Barometer Initiative, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA
- Natalia Rayol Fontoura University of Florida, Gainesville, FL, USA
- Benjamin Reilly School of Social Sciences, University of Western Australia, Crawley, WA, Australia
- Emily Paddon Rhoads Department of Political Science, Swarthmore College, Swarthmore, PA, USA
- Oliver P. Richmond University of Manchester, Department of Politics, Manchester, UK
- Andrew Rigby Center for Trust Peace and Social Relations, Coventry University, Coventry, UK
- Heidi Riley School of Politics and International Relations, University College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland
- Sandra Milena Rios Oyola Institut de sciences politiques Louvain-Europe (ISPOLE), Université catholique de Louvain, Louvain-la-Neuve, Belgium
- Denise Ripamonti Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), School of Law and Government, Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Francine Rossone de Paula School of History, Anthropology, Philosophy and Politics, Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Michael Schulz School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Mary Hope Schwoebel Nova Southeastern University, Fort Lauderdale, FL, USA

Rashmi Singh The Pontifical Catholic University of Minas Gerais, PUC Minas, Belo Horizonte, Brazil

Sarah Smith Centre for Women, Peace and Security, London School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK

Ivor Sokolić European Institute, London School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK

Elena B. Stavrevska Centre for Women, Peace and Security, London School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK

Jaclyn D. Streitfeld-Hall Global Centre for the Responsibility to Protect, New York, NY, USA

Renata Summa Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Evrin Tan KU Leuven Public Governance Institute, Leuven, Belgium

Thierry Tardy NATO Defense College, Rome, Italy

Ioannis Tellidis College of International Studies, Kyung Hee University, Yongin-si, South Korea

Waradas Thiyagaraja University of Colombo, Colombo, Sri Lanka

Maria Todorova University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign, IL, USA

Patrick Tom Independent Researcher, St Andrews, UK

Catherine Turner Durham University, Durham, UK

Yuji Uesugi Waseda University, Tokyo, Japan

Leena Vastapuu Tampere Peace Research Institute, Tampere, Finland
European Union Advisory Mission in the Central African Republic, Bangui, Central African Republic

Liridona Veliu School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Stellan Vinthagen Department of Sociology, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA, USA

Gëzim Visoka Dublin City University, School of Law and Government, Dublin, Ireland

Polly O. Walker Baker Institute for Peace and Conflict Studies, Juniata College, Huntingdon, PA, USA

Joanne Wallis Department of Politics and International Relations, University of Adelaide, Adelaide, SA, Australia

Dawn Walsh University College Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Oliver Walton University of Bath, Bath, UK

Annick T. R. Wibben War Studies, Swedish Defence University, Stockholm, Sweden

Timothy Williams Department of Political Science, Bundeswehr University Munich, Munich, Germany

Florian Zollmann Newcastle University, Newcastle, UK

A

Aboriginal Conflict Management

- ▶ Indigenous Approaches to Peace

Abuse

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Accompaniment

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Accord

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Acknowledgement

- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

Actor-Centered Peacebuilding

- ▶ Resilience and Peace

Adaptation

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Adaptive Capacity

- ▶ Resilience and Peace

Adivasi/Indigenous Politics

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Adjudication

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Aesthetics

- ▶ Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation
- ▶ Street Art and Peace

Afghanistan

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Africa

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

Agency

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Agreements

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Aid

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

al-Shabaab

- ▶ Kenya's War on Terror

Alternative Commemorations

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

Alternative Dispute Resolution

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Adjudication; Arbitration; Conciliation; Contract embellishment; Dispute resolution; Facilitation; Fact-finding; Local civil dialogue; Med-arb; Mediation; Mediation-arbitration; Mini-trials; Mock Trials; Ombudsmen; Pareto optimal agreement; Private Tribunals; Rent-a-judges; Summary jury trials

Description

When parties in conflict cannot negotiate or manage their own conflicts, they sometimes resort to one of several forms of “alternative dispute resolution.” Some are informal variations of adjudicatory processes such as torts with a judge and jury, others originate with more consensual methods, and still others mingle the two. Beyond the methods described below, those more suitable to national and international disputes are discussed separately under Search for Peace. (Haltorn and McCann 2004, McQuillan et al. 2007).

Arbitration is a quasi-judicial process in which a neutral, the arbitrator, decides how to resolve a dispute based on the competitive presentation of information by the disputants. Arbitrators usually are selected based on substantive expertise concerning the type of dispute. Either or both the process, the decision can be advisory or compulsory and usually is not appealable except for causes such as bias. It is particularly appropriate when speed is desirable or confidential or proprietary information is involved. In some forms, the arbitrator must choose one of the disputants' proposals without modification, an approach that fosters moderation as arbitrators tend to choose the less extreme position (American Arbitration Association 1992; Goodman 2016; Kellor 1999).

Non-violent alternatives to the courts for resolving disputes with distinct strengths and weaknesses are described in this article.

Conciliation typically consists of private, often back-and-forth, third-party consultations to reduce tensions sufficiently for some other methods such as negotiation (discussed in a separate article) or one of the other methods mentioned in this article to have a chance of success (Ladd 2005).

Contract embellishment seeks to reach a Pareto optimal agreement. After the parties reach a tentative agreement, the embellisher interviews each party confidentially to determine the relative importance they attach to each possible resolution of each issue, usually by requiring them to distribute 100 points to each possibility for each issue. Totaling the ratings for each possible combination followed by inspection or the sort function for a spreadsheet enables the embellisher to identify the optimum resolution for each party and for the combined parties. The embellisher can then write an optimum proposal to discuss privately with each party. If all think it an improvement, it replaces the tentative one without change (Raiffa 1982).

Fact-finding by an agreed-upon neutral identifies relevant laws, witnesses, and any other information that is likely to assist in reaching a resolution through some other dispute resolution process. It is particularly common in labor-management disputes. By prior agreement, the findings may be kept confidential, admissible or not in subsequent procedures, or made public.

Facilitation. See Mediation.

Local civil dialogue is conducted in "safe spaces" such as libraries and churches to discuss problems within an agreed set of rules that (with group pressure) usually ensure civility. It aims to bring together people "hungry for community" and provides them with a like-minded audience representing a wide range of opinions. Usually, there is a substantial initial turnout that dwindles with successive meetings as it becomes clear that the group lacks the political or institutional apparatus to do more than talk.

Mediation is a process in which an impartial third-party neutral facilitates two or more disputants who retain the power of decision to reach an accord. It can be voluntary or mandatory, and any decision may or may not be enforceable by law. Mediation frequently has resulted in innovative resolutions with higher satisfaction and compliance than compulsory methods. It works best in relatively small-scale conflicts where there have been close relationships between two more-or-less equal disputants. It is potentially more confidential than arbitration (although in some cases mediators can be compelled to testify if the dispute ends in court). Most mediators are impartial, avoiding any case in which they have an interest or in which even the appearance of favoritism might cost them the confidence of one party. However, some mediators believe they should help the weaker party, particularly when the disparity is great. Still other mediators employ "transformative mediation" in which they try to improve relationships in addition to helping reach agreement (Beer and Steif 1997; Bens 2016; Bush and Folger 2004; Folberg and Taylor 1984; Kaner 2014; Kolb and Associates 1994; Ladd 2005; Moore 2003; Mosten 2001).

Mediation-arbitration or med-arb begins as mediation and shifts to arbitration (see above) if the disputants fail to reach agreement, either the mediator changing roles or bringing in a different individual as the arbitrator if needed.

Mini-trials also known as or similar to adjudication, mock trials, private tribunals, rent-a-judge, or summary jury trials, each with minor variations. They usually include competitive presentations of evidence following formal procedural rules before a judge or jury often of appropriate experts who are able to ask questions and have either advisory or decision-making authority. The judge or the jury, often joined by a facilitator, retire to reach a settlement that results in an order, judgment, or decree, usually appealable to some higher authority.

Ombudsmen are selected by and paid for by an organization to prevent, minimize, or mitigate complaints, conflicts, or problems with or among employees and customers. In some cases, the institutional affiliation may compromise their supposed impartiality and neutrality.

Summary

These methods and the variations on them in name and method, each with its own strengths and weaknesses and thus appropriateness to different situations, are a few among the proliferating non-violent methods that can be used to manage or resolve a widening range of conflicts (Deutsch 1973, 2006; Purkey 2010).

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- American Arbitration Association. (1992). Arbitration and the law. New York: Author.
- Beer, J., & Steif, E. (1997). Mediator's handbook. Gabriola Island: New Society.
- Bennett, S. (2002). Arbitration: Essential concepts. New York: American Lawyer Media.
- Bens, I. (2016). Facilitation at a glance. Methuen: Goal QPC.
- Bush, R., & Folger, J. (2004). The promise of mediation. Hoboken: John Wiley & Sons.
- Deutsch, M. (1973). The resolution of conflict: Constructive and destructive processes. New Haven: Yale.

- Deutsch, M., et al. (2006). Handbook of conflict resolution. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Folberg, J., & Taylor, A. (1984). Mediation. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Goodman, A. (2016). Basic skills for the new arbitrator. Portland: Solomon.
- Haltom, W., & McCann, M. (2004). Distorting the law: Politics, Media and the Litigation Crisis. Chicago: University of Chicago
- Kaner, S. (2014). Facilitator's guide to participatory decision-making. San Francisco: Jossey Bass.
- Kellor, F. (1999). American arbitration: Its history, functions and achievements. Washington D.C.: Beard Books.
- Kolb, D., & Associates. (1994). When talk works: Profiles of mediators. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Ladd, P. (2005). Mediation, conciliation, and emotions: A practitioner's guide for understanding emotions in dispute resolution. Lanham: University Press of America.
- McQuillan, L., et al. (2007). Jackpot justice: The cost of America's tort system. San Francisco: Pacific Research Institute.
- Moore, C. (2003). The mediation process: Practical strategies for resolving conflict. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass.
- Moore, C. (2014). The mediation process. San Francisco: Jossey Bass.
- Mosten, F. (2001). The Mosten guide to building a mediation career. Hoboken: John Wiley & Sons.
- Purkey, W., et al. (2010). From conflict to conciliation: How to defuse difficult situations. Thousand Oaks: Corwin.
- Raiffa, H. (1982). The Art & Science of Negotiation. Boston: Harvard.

Analysis of Multiparty Multi-issue Disputes

- ▶ Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts

Anti-colonial Struggles

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

Arbitration

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Argentina

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America

Aristotle

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Armed conflict

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

Luqman B. Ajala
 Department of History and International Studies, Al-Hikmah University, Ilorin, Nigeria

Synonyms

Africa; Armed conflict; Indigenous conflict resolution; Peacebuilding; South Africa; Ubuntu system

Definition

Most peace interventions in the conflicts in Africa have proved ineffective due to the lack of knowledge in understanding the crisis environment coupled with the inability to appreciate the cultural value of the people in the resolution of the crises. Indigenous conflict resolution in Africa has its unique prescriptions in contrast with the Western models. It is aimed at restoring social equilibrium by reconciling parties to a dispute for sustainable peace. In the adjudication of dispute in traditional African societies, the guilty ones are integrated back into the society for social harmony. The entry is an important contribution to the body of knowledge in peace studies and conflict resolution. It is believed that the extant methodologies used in traditional African societies could be adapted into the policy framework of the African Union (AU) Peace and Security Council along with the Western model. This entry also has wider implications for African cultural revival and indigenous conflict resolution.

Introduction

As armed conflicts have ravaged most communities in Africa, the search for peace in the continent has dominated discussions at the international level. In the search for durable peace in Africa, conflict resolution processes and peace initiatives have often been executed by various institutions that include the UN, regional organizations such as the AU, international and local NGO's and governments (Mpangala, 2004). Some of the peace efforts have been through peace negotiation and mediation, peacekeeping, and peace enforcement. It is common knowledge that conventional mechanisms for conflict resolution in Africa have in some cases proved ineffective to address the problems, although there have been little success in some areas. The failure to integrate the cultural value of the people into the peace policy and identifying the structural causes of conflict is one of the reasons why Western models of peacebuilding have failed in Africa (Kirby, 2006). For instance, the 1993–1994 UN Security Council peacekeeping force to Rwanda UNAMIR failed to broker peace between the government and RPF rebels, leading to the genocide of 1994 in Rwanda (Khan, 1998). In another example, the UN taskforce in Somalia in 1992 UNITAF failed to deliver, but later was withdrawn due to casualties it suffered in 1993 while in confrontation with one of the rebel groups in Somalia (Mosha, 1998).

Given the armed conflict scenario which has reduced Africa into theatre of war and genocide in the world, indigenous approaches to conflict resolution and its relevance for sustainable peace is discussed in this entry taking into consideration the South Africa's ubuntu peacebuilding strategy. The ubuntu system of conflict resolution epitomizes African value system as conflict is resolved at the communal level claims Murithi (2006). Indigenous approaches to conflict resolution could be adapted into the policy framework of the African Union (AU) Peace and Security Council along with the Western model. Even though Africa has been transformed through colonialism which introduced new values into the society, there remain certain African cultural practices such as local conflict resolution mechanisms and traditional peacebuilding methods that have survived the colonial onslaught (Zartman, 2000). The methods of conflict resolution in traditional society in Africa were deeply rooted in the customs and traditions of the African people. Bennett (1993, p. 32), posits by saying that in traditional African societies "the essence and processes of conflict resolution was to reconcile the parties to a dispute in the communities." Indigenous approaches to peacebuilding in Africa include mediation, accommodation, reconciliation and negotiation which are rooted in the knowledge, customs and history of Africans. As espoused by Mbiti (2010), African's peacebuilding processes, including reconciliation are not foreign notions and their intensity has accelerated wound healing and consensus building.

After a brief discussion on the crises in Africa and indigenous methods of conflict resolution, this entry outlines five key issues relevant to armed conflicts in Africa and indigenous conflict resolution. First, it provides the theoretical background and the critique of the Western models of peacebuilding (liberal peacebuilding). It then analyzes armed conflicts in Africa, highlighting the causes, dynamics, and consequences of the conflicts in some African countries. The entry shifts attention to Western model of conflict resolution in Africa, while the fourth part analyzes indigenous conflict resolution in Africa. The ubuntu system and peacebuilding in South Africa explicates how ubuntu is implemented during peacemaking process. It ends with a summary.

Theoretical Framework

Theories have been formulated in peace studies to explicate the concept of peacebuilding relative to the conflict resolution in the affected societies. However, the arguments for indigenous approaches to peacebuilding and conflict resolution in Africa have also developed. As an intervention strategy, peacebuilding is complementary to peacekeeping and peacemaking in an environment of crisis. With the objective of creating the conditions for a self-sustaining peace in order to prevent a return to armed conflict, peacebuilding is directed toward the eradication of the root causes of violence (Cravo, 2018). The theory of peacebuilding is an assumption that developed from the liberal peace model, as a transition from armed violence to lasting peace. Johan (1976) developed the concept of peacebuilding in his writing Three Approaches to Peace: Peacekeeping, Peacemaking and Peacebuilding. The theoretical assumptions for peace studies are found in the conception of triangle of violence and the triangle of peace. The understanding behind cultural violence calls for the practice of international intervention with the concepts of peacekeeping, peacemaking, and peacebuilding by Galtung. From peacekeeping and peacemaking conceptions, Galtung develops the concept of peacebuilding. Peacebuilding is an associative approach to conflict aimed at direct, structural, and cultural causes of violence in the longer term for positive peace (Cravo, 2018). Coming from the background of Galtung's theoretical assumptions, peacebuilding began as a key focus of international intervention in international crisis in the early 1990s, in particular by the UN.

Boutros-Ghali (1992, p. 27) defines peacebuilding as "the process by which an achieved peace is placed on durable foundations and which prevents violent conflict from recurring by dealing with the underlying economic, social, cultural and humanitarian problems responsible for the conflict." He emphasized further by declaring that "peacebuilding is the actions undertaken by national or international actors to identify and support structures which intend to strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid a relapse into conflict.” In the implementation of peacebuilding agenda, scholars have viewed with skepticism the execution of Western liberalism agenda. However, liberal peacebuilding was thus adopted by the UN as an agenda for international commitment to transform post-war nation-states. The elements of democratic elections, market liberalism, humanitarian assistance and the rule of law that underpin liberal peacebuilding gained this approach, massive international support to be used by the UN as well as other donor countries for transforming war affected nations (Hoffmann, 1995) including Angola, Namibia, and El-Salvador.

Without a doubt, the liberal peacekeeping model is widely acknowledged and supported, yet the critics like Roland Paris and Timothy Sisk, Oliver Richmond, and Kristoffer Liden have pointed out the flaws contained in the approach toward achieving durable peace through the Western liberalism. They backed up their argument with the failure recorded in countries like Angola, Mozambique, Rwanda, Somalia, and Bosnia and Herzegovina where peacebuilding efforts have failed to secure peace and they rather renewed violence. The Western approach of the liberal peace was, however, integrated into collective security instruments for the maintenance of peace (Michael, 2005). The adoption of maximalist approach, according to Roland Paris (Paris 1997, p. 55), “is an experiment in social engineering that involves transplanting Western models of social, political, and economic organisation into war-shattered states in order to control civil conflict - pacification through political and economic liberalization.” In another view, Paris (1997) is critical of liberal peacebuilding model for its ineffectiveness and failure to establishing sustainable peace, most especially in Africa. It is rather viewed with shocking revelations that its adoption has caused political and economic destabilizations in some war-torn countries with renewed violence by parties in conflict.

About 50 of those countries affected by wars that signed peace agreements in the 5 years of hostilities for instance, relapsed into violent conflicts (Collier et al., 2003).

In the case of Angola, political liberalization contributed to the resurgence of the violence in the country. Similar experience was witnessed in Mozambique as economic liberalization threatened to reignite the fragile peace in the country. After the peace agreement in Mozambique in October 1992 following 17 years of intermittent warfare, a democratic election supervised by UN was held. However, the World Bank and IMF imposed Structural Adjustment Programme (SAP) limited government’s efforts to deliver, with high rate of poverty in the country. As a result, the worsened living conditions led to armed banditry in the rural community that heightened tension and a possible uprising. Against this background, scholars have renewed the call for indigenous approaches to peacebuilding and conflict resolution in Africa against the current Western models (Bukari, 2013; Zartman, 2000). The state of insecurity caused by armed conflicts in African countries would be the major discussion in the next section in this entry.

Armed Conflicts in Africa

At one time or another, African countries have witnessed relative peace and experienced crises since their independence. When put side by side, there have been more periods of conflicts than the period of peace on the continent, as the largest number of armed conflicts in the world happened inside Africa (Straus, 2012). It is obvious that many African states have experienced civil wars, mass killings, and other forms of direct political violence right from the period of independence (Straus, 2012). It used to be inter-state wars at the initial stage however, the theatre of war changed from the kind of battle fought outside the state borders since most conflicts today occur within the states. These are intra-state conflicts such as civil-wars/guerrilla warfare, ethnic/religious conflicts, political violence, armed banditry and terrorism. Straus (2012, p. 179) corroborates this much in Wars do Change! Changing Patterns of Political Violence in Sub-Saharan Africa where he observes that the character of warfare in the region has changed. In his estimation, today's wars are typically fought on the peripheries of states, and insurgents tend to be militarily weak and somewhat factionalized.

The civil wars that have occurred in African countries, particularly in the 1990s include: war in Somalia between 1990 and 1993, ethnic violence between Tutsis and Hutus in Burundi 1991, ethnic war in Rwanda 1991–1992, ethnic war in Liberia between 1989 and 2003, warfare in Sierra Leone from 1991–2002, etc. Meanwhile, low intensive conflicts (LIC) emerged in some African countries in the late 2000s and early 2010s. This type of conflict include: 2006 Casamance rebellion in Senegal, the 2004–2007 Ogaden fighting for self-determination in Ethiopia, the Caprivi strip secession bid, Namibia, the 2003 Lord's Resistance Army offensive in Northern Uganda, the 2004 and later 2007 Cabinda separatist armed struggle in Angola, the 2014–2015 Boko Haram insurgency in Nigeria, Communal conflicts in Chad from 2006–2007, the 1996–2006 insurgency in the Central African Republic, the 2003–2010 violence in the western region of Dafur, Sudan, the 2009 communal violence in South Sudan, as well as 2007–2008 attacks by the Tuaregs in Northern Mali.

Apart from warfare and mass killings that characterized post-colonial experience in Africa, two forms of violence have come to feature in the conflict dynamics in the region: political violence and livelihood clashes. Political violence is associated with election-related violence, while livelihood clashes present themselves as farmer-herder conflict, over access to land, water, and other local resources. Political violence became raged in the 1990s, when one party system gave way to multi-party democracy. Electoral violence, that is, violence directly associated with an electoral contest, either before, during, or after a poll has continued to feature in Africa with such examples in Zimbabwe, Cote d'Ivoire and Kenya (Mueller, 2008). Violence had been witnessed in both Mali and Cote d'Ivoire in particular, over land and water, on resource conflicts (Bassett, 1988).

The UCPD/PRIО Armed Conflict data show that war, in particular civil war, has been a central feature of most Africa's post-colonial history.

About thirty countries in Africa or around 65% of all states in the region have experienced an armed conflict since independence (UCDP/PRIО Armed Conflict data, 2012). Some of these wars lasted for a long period of time having devastating consequences on both social and economy of affected states (Straus, 2012). For example, the wars that burst out in Angola and Sudan lasted more than 20 years. On the other hand, the recent PRIО Paper (2020) Conflict Trends in Africa, 1989–2019, reveals that Africa excels in various conflict resolution attempts despite being one of the most violent regions in the world.

The latest episode of violence in Africa concerns the act of trans-border terrorism in which insurgent groups move around and terrorize the people across national borders. The examples of this form of violence traverse many areas in the region. A typical example represents the terrorist activities of the Al-Qaeda in the Maghreb (AQIM) across the Sahel, in Mali, Niger, and Mauritania. Another terrorist organization, Al-Shabab, whose operational base is in Somalia, has been known to have launched sporadic armed attacks in Uganda and Kenya. The group was responsible for the multiple suicide bombings that occurred in Kampala in 2010. Williams Reno says that between 1990 and 2009, about 25 deaths were recorded through the "non-state armed conflicts" in the DRC, Ethiopia, Kenya, Nigeria, Somalia, Sudan, and Uganda (Reno, 2011). In the recent time, the IS acts of terrorism have become widespread in Africa. According to the PRIО Paper (2020, p. 35), "in 2019, nine countries in Africa (Cameroon, Niger, Chad, Nigeria, Libya, Burkina Faso, Mali, Somalia, and Mozambique) witnessed attacks by IS terrorist group within their territories." It is also reported in the PRIО Paper (2020) that from 2018–2019, the number of both state-based conflicts and battle-related deaths increased in Africa. Further, the number of state-based conflicts increased from 21 in 2018 to 25 in 2019 as a result of internationalized civil conflicts that occurred in Cameroon, Burkina Faso, Somalia, and Burundi (PRIО Paper 2020, p. 35). As in foregoing, armed conflicts and associated violence is still on a high scale in Africa with the latest acts of terrorism by IS which shifted base from the Middle East to Africa. Having analyzed the armed conflict scenario and state of insecurity in African countries in this section, this entry would also look into the factors behind armed conflicts in Africa in the following section.

Causes of Conflicts in Africa

The factors behind violent conflicts which have hampered development and made Africa to be unstable elicit a discussion in this section. This is done by investigating the root causes of armed-conflicts in Africa. What are the triggers for the conflicts and the reasons for the continued crises in the region? Studies on armed conflicts Warfare in Independent Africa (Reno, 2011) and The Causes of Conflict in Sub-Saharan Africa – Framework Document (DFID, 2001) show that the root of violent conflicts and civil strife in Africa is linked to a multiplicity of factors which include: availability of arms; unemployment; the abuse of ethnicity; exclusion (socio-political); weak states and state collapse; historical factors; natural resource wealth.

Availability of Arms

It has been confirmed in the literature on violence (which is dominated by studies of war and mass killing) such as Small Arms and Light Weapons Transfer in West Africa: A Stocktaking (Keili, 2008); State-Making, State-Breaking and State Failure: Explaining the Roots of “Third World” Insecurity (Mohammad, 1996), that the major factor causing the instability in some countries in Africa is the issue of small arms and light weapons (SALW), which are readily available in most countries in the region. It is believed that easy accessibility to small arms is fueling and sustaining the conflicts in some African countries. For example, the DFID (2001, p. 15), in The Causes of Conflict in Sub-Saharan Africa – Framework Document observes that “between 1972 and 1990, Ethiopia and Somalia imported $8 billion worth of small arms and light weapons.” “In 1992, the Angola government distributed an estimated 700,000 rifles to the population for their defence against UNITA” (Keili, 2008). Also, arms were supplied by governments to aid civil wars in Liberia, Sierra Leone, and Cote d’Ivoire (Keili, 2008). To clarify this further, Charles Taylor’s National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) was accused of supplying and distributing Foday Sankoh’s Revolutionary United Front (RUF) with arms to fuel the civil war in Sierra Leone. The conflict resulted in the death of over 50,000 people; 30,000 amputations; and over 257,000 women were reportedly raped in the crisis (Ploughshares, 2014). In another example, the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD) rebel group received weapons from Guinean governments which they used in killing civilians in Monrovia during the conflict in Liberia (Keili, 2008).

It is therefore to be noted that wide circulation of illicit arms across African states has reinforced conflicts within the region. The ready availability of these weapons has been able to fuel and sustain most ethnic and religious conflicts witnessed in some countries in Africa.

Tackling insecurity by reducing armed violence, the states in Africa have taken some initiatives against illegal arms trafficking and proliferation. These include: the ECOWAS Moratorium on Light Weapons, and the East African Action Programme on Illicit Arms Trafficking and SADC Arms Protocol. However, there are challenges toward the realization of the objective above due to the porous nature of most borders, weak enforcement, and large arms deposit on the continent, as well as well-established illegal supply chains.

Ethnicity

Ethnic violence is common in most states in Africa and has served as a potent source of conflicts in the region. The reason has to do with the inability by leaders to effectively manage the diversity there, as the region is configured by many states that comprise various ethnic groupings. Having said this, ethnicity by itself is not violent. However, violent conflict erupts when people resort to the use of ethnicity as primordial and make claims in its names as a means of advancing group interests (Turton, 1997). Again, what generates ethnic conflict is rather observed by Annan and Danso (2013) as the situation when identified groups in a fractured society or nation use ethnicity as instrument, most especially when they experience or feel being marginalized. Many studies identified ethnic fragmentation as one of the root causes of armed conflicts and civil war that broke out in Liberia such as that of Vinck et al. (2011) which say that 49% of the population reportedly identified ethnicity and ethnic divisions as the root cause of the Liberian civil wars. Specifically, in the 10-year rule of Samuel Doe, the Krahn and Mandingo ethnic groups were more favored than the others. This resulted in various ethnic tensions that involved the rebellion by Charles Taylor, an Americo-Liberian in 1996. The local militia led by the latter, stirred a civil war in the country. The Nigeria's civil war (1967–1970) resulted from unhealthy competition for power and ethnic rivalries among the major ethnic groups in the country. Similarly, ethnic tensions brew up in Nigeria (1993–1999) over the annulment of presidential election by the military in 1993.

Indeed, ethnic rivalry has been the major cause of internal conflicts in Nigeria. The examples of this are also found in other African countries such as Liberia, Uganda, Rwanda, Burundi, Somalia, Sudan, Congo, Guinea-Bissau, Cote d'Ivoire, Zimbabwe, and Kenya.

Exclusion and Inequality

Social exclusion occurs when the institutions that allocate resources and assign value operate in ways that systematically deny some groups the resources and recognition that would allow them to participate fully in social life (Zeitlyn, 2004). Social exclusion in conflicts is related to those who feel marginalized socially/economically and who tend to have recourse to violence or rebellion (Stewart, 2017). In African countries, some crises that have occurred had their roots in the politics of exclusion and social inequality. Stewart (2017) asserts that large numbers of people in developing countries (Africa) are socially excluded. According to him, these people are excluded by mainstream society from participating fully in the economic, social, and political life of the society where they live in – often because of their cultural, religious, or racial characteristics. The apartheid

South African government was notorious for the practice of the policy of exclusion targeted against the majority blacks in the country. As a result, the blacks in South Africa were up in arms and took offence against the apartheid regime over the discriminatory policies which advanced socio-economic and political inequality between the white and black population in the country.

The Nigerian civil war (1967–1970) resulted from politics of exclusion by the political elites (ethnic group) who controlled power at the center. In Nigeria, the July 29, 1966 coup d'état brought with it dynamics in power relations that resulted in the politics of exclusion by political leaders in the country. Meanwhile, the competition for power by major ethnic groups in Nigeria ignited local sentiments and subsequent attacks, forcing the Igbos to migrate to their region and declared the Independent Republic of Biafra in 1967 (Naffziger, 1973). As a corollary, Nigeria underwent war of attrition in the fate to keep the nation together and united, with attendant blood and destruction, until 1970 when the war was terminated. Political exclusion by the government helped to serve as a major instigator of the conflict in Cote d'Ivoire in 2002. Deeply rooted in ethnic-religious divisions and identity, the situation in the country was aggravated by politics of exclusion. As a result, Cote d'Ivoire broke into civil war in September 2002 (Ogwang 2011, p. 1).

Natural Resource Wealth

Resource control or access to natural resources has in many instances reinforced the conflicts in African states. The African states accommodate two types of resource-based conflict, one being wars of resource scarcity and wars of abundance. The most common conflicts of scarcity relate to the control of land and water rights (DFID, 2001). DFID (2001, p. 15), in "The Causes of Conflict in Sub-Saharan Africa," asserts that countries whose economies are dependent on natural resources such as oil and minerals face a high risk of conflict. The work of three expert UN panels on the relationship between illegal exploration of natural resources and conflict in Sierra Leone, Angola, and the DR, in 2011 conclude that "apart from diamond, trade in coltan, cobalt, gold, timber, and oil may play a more important role in fuelling conflict” (World Development Report, 2011). However, this position holds firmly with the Nigerian situation where poor management of oil resources provoked militancy by the youths in the oil rich Niger Delta region. The situation in the region created state of insecurity in which many oil expatriates were kidnapped by the militant groups, notably the Movement for the Emancipation of the Niger Delta (MEND). As a matter of fact, the armed groups in the Delta region engaged in oil theft and arms trafficking in the area. The studies conducted by Ashforth (2009) and the International Crisis Group (2008) estimated that 250,000–300,000 barrels, valued at more than US$3.8 billion, were stolen each year through “oil bunkering” from pipeline or storage facilities. This development, however, enamored the militants and prolonged the crisis in the oil rich region.

The civil wars in both Liberia and Sierra Leone, though not resource based at inception, the presence of minerals like diamond and timber in the region reinforced the conflicts. The above is corroborated by the outcome of research by UNODC (2015) and Harwell (2013) that the conventional political conflict in Liberia that spread to Sierra Leone and Cote d’Ivoire, later gave way to a more organized crime across the region as warring factions pillaged natural resources. Further studies confirm that at the height of the conflict in Sierra Leone, illegal exports accounted for more than 90% of its diamond trade Gberie (2002), or more than US$200 million in 2002 (Even-Zohar, 2003). In Liberia in 2001, timber valued between USD$168–180 million was illicitly traded off (UNODC, 2015). It is clear from above that armed conflicts in African countries resulted from many factors laying background for the state of insecurity in the region. In the next section, the consequences of armed conflicts in African countries would be analyzed.

The Consequences of Armed Conflicts in Africa

The armed conflicts in Africa have wreck havoc in the affected areas with attendant deaths and material losses. The continued warfare has claimed the lives of many, including children. For example, the civil war in Burundi, 1993–2005, claimed over 300,000 lives (Jackson, 2006), while over 250,000 people lost their lives in the 14 years civil war in Liberia (BBC, 2018). The same situation was witnessed in the 10 year Sierra Leone crisis where about 50,000 people were reportedly killed, and half the population displaced (Gberie 2002, p. 2). In an article by diplomatic editor Patrick Wintour, for example, the recent clashes in Libya have left more than 1000 people dead and more than 300,000 people displaced (The Guardian, 2019). Before the civil war in Angola got terminated in 2002, more than 15,000 deaths were recorded in the battle between government army and the rebel (UNITA) forces led by late Jonas Savimbi. In the war that started in Burundi in 1998 and lasted until 2008, over one hundred thousand people died as a result. The ethnic warfare involved Tutsis and Hutus for control of central government held by the minority Tutsi since the country independence in 1962. In the war in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) between 1996 and 2003, an estimated 5.4 million people were reportedly killed (Zenko, 2016). Between 2010 and 2011, some three thousand (3000) people were reportedly killed in the post-election conflict in Cote d’Ivoire which involved Laurent Gbagbo and Alhassan Quattara (France 24, 2011).

Appraising development and security issues in the risk environment, and the links between them, DFID (2001) research, Tackling Poverty by Reducing Armed Violence, observes that violent conflict is a major cause of poverty and a key barrier to development in many poor countries. It estimated that war leads to a large-scale population displacement, reduces access to basic services and human rights abuses. In a situation of war, DFID avers that people are denied access to land or employment; markets are disrupted; and public and private assets destroyed; and the entire community livelihoods are destroyed. As noted in conflict research, violence compromises human security and dignity. It is on this basis that more than 90 countries endorsed the 2008 Geneva Declaration on “Armed Violence and Development”.

The 2008 Declaration argues that living free from the threat of an armed conflict is a basic human need. To achieve stability by reducing violence in the region, therefore, African countries in 2000 signed the Lome Declaration which established standards and a regional response mechanism to unconstitutional changes in government.

This has been associated with a reduction in coups d'état from 15 in the 1990s to 5 from 2000 to mid-2010 (World Development Report, 2011). Despite this fact, human sufferings and material losses are still experienced in Africa due to violence associated with armed conflicts across the region. In Sudan, for example, more than two million people died in the long running civil war. In Rwanda, over 800,000 people lost their lives in the genocide that occurred in the civil war in 1994 (DFID, 2001). On the human sufferings in the Rwanda's war, about 250,000 rapes reportedly took place in 1994. For decades, countries such as Liberia, Sierra Leone, Cote d'Ivoire, and Guinea-Bissau were crippled by conflicts and civil strife in which violence and incessant killings were prevalent (Afolabi 2009, p. 24). In the 2007 election aftermath in Kenya, gangs and politically motivated groups engaged in ethnically aligned violence (Ashforth, 2009; ICG, 2008). Quoting DFID (2001, p. 9) in UNCHR, 2000, "in 2000, almost eleven million people in Africa were internally displaced." The effects of violence are profound for countries that have gone through civil wars in Africa. Thus, poverty in most countries in the region today is linked to the environment of crisis created by armed conflicts, leading to displacement of people and destruction of communities' livelihood.

In violence-prone and war-ravaged countries in Africa, school children are affected as school infrastructures get destroyed, leading to displacement of teachers and abrupt suspension of school program. Similarly, violence and armed conflicts in these countries destroyed the household assets of poor people; pervading fear of violent attacks prevented the locals from farming or travelling to schools, clinics, workplaces, and markets. As witnessed in Nigeria, economic neglect and alienation from political power triggered violence in the Niger Delta oil-rich region. The environment as a result became militarized by the local militia who engaged in kidnapping of foreign oil workers and massive oil theft in the area. In recent time, terrorism and armed banditry spread from the Sahel and Lake Chad area in West Africa. The Low Intensity Conflict (LIC) developed in the North East of Nigeria when a local Islamic group morphed into insurgency and launched attack against civilians. The Boko Haram insurgency spread from Nigeria to other neighboring states of Chad, Niger, and Cameroun. In the Sahel region, terrorism and armed banditry were launched by the Tuaregs in the Northern Mali. Countries like Senegal, Guinea, and Burkina Faso have been affected by the attacks from the terrorist groups in the area. In Kenya, the Al-Shabab terrorist group has established an operational base in the country, with frequent armed attack on civilians, both in the country and some other states in the region. Equally, North Africa had experienced a series of dramatic social protests and political turbulence (the Arab Spring), escalating into outright conflict in these countries, first in Tunisia, Egypt, and later in Libya. Armed conflicts in Africa are intense and have continued to wreck havoc on the continent. The armed conflicts in Africa have had consequential effects on the economy of most states in Africa. However, the interventions in the conflicts in Africa have been through external supports or local initiatives by regional African organizations. Most often, these interventions come in form of cease fires, peace agreements, and peacekeeping missions which constitute the basis of discussion in the next section.

Western Model of Conflict Resolution in Africa

In the 1990s, the increase in the number of violent conflicts in the world and Africa in particular, was given visibility and prominence on the international agenda for peace (Sollenberg & Wallensteen, 2000). Again, the nature of armed conflicts, particularly devastating civil wars call for interventionism (Mohammad, 1996). In the UN Agenda for Peace (1992), Boutros-Ghali called on the international organizations to address the threats to international peace and security. The Western model of peace was thus institutionalized in the UN peace agenda. These are 4 interrelated strategies: preventive diplomacy: peacemaking, peacekeeping, and peacebuilding. Preventive diplomacy refers to actions to prevent the occurrence of conflict or to prevent escalation of existing conflict and the effort to limit the conflict. On the other hand, peacemaking is conflict transformation which is aimed at preventing future conflict. Peacekeeping refers to activities undertaken to stabilize peace in a conflict environment, while peacebuilding is an activity that aims to resolve conflict by dealing with the roots of the conflict through peaceful methods.

Peace negotiations and mediations have come as intervention strategy in the conflicts in Africa. For instance, a religious NGO in Rome, Italy, called Saint Egidio served as a mediator in the peace negotiations between the FRELIMO government and the RENAMO rebel group in the civil war 1975–1990 in Mozambique (Romano, 1998). In the Burundi crisis, Julius Nyerere and later Nelson Mandela served as independent mediators through Nyerere Foundation. The peace interventions in African crises have also been internal or external based negotiations. The peace negotiations in Sudan between 1996 and 1997 reflect an example of internal based peace negotiations. This involved a peace deal between the government of Sudan and five rebel groups (The Sudan Peace Agreement, 1997, 4). In most cases, peace negotiations in Africa have often witnessed signing of peace agreements, ceasefire agreements and implementations of the agreements.

The deployment of troops by the UN, and other regional organizations has been a feature of peacekeeping in crisis area in Africa. This has involved the African Union (AU), ECOWAS, and the SADC. Peacekeeping by troops is a preventive strategy as a process that involves signing of the peace agreement for its implementation to avoid the conflict escalation. Through ECOMOG, the ECOWAS countries deployed peacekeeping troops in the Liberia and later Sierra Leone civil wars in the 1990s.

The peacebuilding approach as spelt out by the African Union (AU) in 2002 is an all-embracing strategy that aimed at restoring security, managing political transition, anchoring socio-economic development, promoting human rights and justice, and resource mobilization (NEPAD, 2005). In order to strengthen continental peace architecture, the African Union (AU) established an institutional framework to implement the concept of comprehensive policy that encompasses conflict prevention, peacemaking, peacekeeping, post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding. It is undeniable the fact that the Western interventions in the conflicts in Africa have been successful in some areas, yet, its failure in achieving sustainable peace has been attributed to the inability to consider the crisis environment and the cultural values of the people. The resolution of conflicts in traditional African society is embedded in the cultural values of the people. As a related topic in this entry, the indigenous approach to conflict resolution in Africa is analyzed in the following section under.

Indigenous Conflict Resolution in Africa

The nature and processes of resolving dispute in traditional African society is in contrast with that of the Western society. Indeed, the object, methods and focus of conflict resolution in traditional African society is in contrast with the Western model. The methods of conflict resolution in traditional society in Africa are deeply rooted in the customs and traditions of the African people. One of the most important features distinguishing between Western and African processes of dispute settlement is the manner in which the social relationships between the parties involved in the respective processes are treated. The relationship determines the procedural form of the attempt at settlement and thus determines the outcome of the dispute (Nader & Todd, 1978). The important feature of the conflict resolution processes in traditional African society is the restoration of the social relationships between the parties involved in a dispute. It is important to note that in the processes of dispute resolution in traditional society in Africa, the parties are interested in mending rather than terminating relationships (Cappelletti, 1992).

Among the Ashanti of Ghana, oath is used as a means of seeking redress in times of infractions of the social norms (Agisi, 1979). Among the Kamba of Kenya, the Kititu oath and Ndundu oaths are used to determine guilt or innocence of disputants (Elias, 1956). The Asande of Sudan employed oath to adjudicate over disputes, especially those involving witchcraft and adultery (Evans-Pritchard, 1937). Among the Gurage of Ethiopia, ritual oath-taking is a prominent feature of the adjudicating process to determine the guilt or innocence of disputants. Ordeal and oath-taking as methods of settling dispute are referred to as that of “proof” as against trial (Sanni, 1999). Importantly, however, the methods are not based on any objective standard or norm; rather, they are pivoted on certain unscientific hypotheses.

According to Allot (1960, p. 121), adjudication of dispute in traditional African society involves integration i.e., the losing party or even a criminal is integrated back into the society in order to achieve social equilibrium. For instance, among the Bunyoro of Uganda such a party is ordered to bring beer and meat, to be eaten by the disputants and adjudicators. This is to mark the reintegration of the guilty into the society (ibid). The duty of adjudicators, therefore, is to settle dispute, assuage injured feelings, restore peace and reach a compromise acceptable to disputants (Adewoye, 1977). Because of the importance attached to the settlement of disputes, adjudicators are determined to get to the root of any matter before them. Hence, they sometimes subject disputants to various ordeals in order to determine their guilt or innocence.

Among the Kalabari and Urobo of Nigeria, disputants or accused persons are asked to swim across a creek full of crocodiles; whoever does not come out alive, is adjudged guilty (Adewoye, 1977). Among the Itsekiri of Niger Delta, a fowl’s feather is besmeared with some charms (juju). If the feather’s quill easily passes through the tongue of the defendant, false charges would be brought against him (ibid). The adjudication of dispute by ordeal among the Yorubas in the South-Western Nigeria is usually administered by Sango or Ogun priest and by the Ogboni fraternity in very serious matters (Olaoba, 2002). Similarly, the Poro and Sande associations of the Mende of Sierra Leone oversee dispute adjudication through ordeal (Opoku, 1978). Conflict resolution promotes consensus-building, social bridge reconstructions, and the re-enactment of order in society. Conflicts hardly break up societies (Oтите, 2000). As an indigenous method of conflict resolution in South Africa, the ubuntu system adopted by the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (SATRC) in the post-apartheid South Africa is examined and discussed in the following section in this entry.

Ubuntu System and Peacebuilding in South Africa

The indigenous ubuntu peacebuilding mechanism is an African value-system for social harmony commonly found among the Bantu people in East, Central and Southern Africa. Peacemaking through the concept of ubuntu emphasizes the principles of reciprocity, inclusiveness, and a sense of shared destiny between peoples. In the ubuntu system, conflict or dispute or disagreement is resolved at the level of the family, at the village level, between members of an ethnic group, or even between different ethnic nations in the same region depending on the situation at hand (Murithi, 2006). In the context of the ubuntu societies found in South Africa, disputes would be resolved through an institution known as the Inkundla/Lekgotla which serves as a group mediation and reconciliation forum (Nomonde, 2000). This is a community-based conflict resolution committee saddled with the responsibility of finding a lasting solution to problems threatening social cohesion and corporate existence of the community. It is usually convened in the public and in attendance of the parties in the dispute including their family members and the general public, including women and children.

In principle, the proceedings would be led by a Council of Elders and their Chief or, in a serious issue, the King himself. The ubuntu concept as a cultural-world view holds that “a person is a person through other people.” Which means that ubuntu tries to capture the essence of what it means to be human, emphasizing the humanity in us. The practical peacebuilding processes of ubuntu is articulated and reflected in its effectiveness to preserve law and order in the society, as ubuntu society is embedded in communalism that maintains positive relations within the society as a collective task by every individual. For instance, a dispute between fellow members of a society is perceived as a matter related to the whole community. According to the notion of ubuntu, each member of the community is linked to each of the disputants, the victims or perpetrators.

The practical demonstration of ubuntu as indigenous conflict resolution and peacebuilding mechanism was renowned at the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (SATRC) in the post-apartheid period. In the post-apartheid South Africa which came about in the 1990, indigenous method of ubuntu was used to reconcile victims and the perpetrators of injustice during the apartheid period in the country. The system of ubuntu was used to stabilize the polity for a new South Africa just emerging from the apartheid experience. The cardinal objective of ubuntu in post-apartheid South Africa was to create a durable peace for harmonious relations in the society by forgiving and let go of the past. To institutionalize the concept of ubuntu for building durable peace in post-apartheid South Africa, the Truth and Reconciliation Commission was established. In the modus operandi of the Commission, the principles of forgiveness and reconciliation which ubuntu emphasizes guided the conduct of the tribunal for building peace in post-apartheid South Africa. In his work titled No Future Without Forgiveness the TRC Chairman, Archbishop Desmond Tutu was quoted to have said that the principles (of ubuntu) helped to guide the thoughts and actions of some of the perpetrators and victims who came before the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (SATRC) to confess and forgive (Graybill, 1998; Mani, 2002; Villavicencio & Verwoed, 2000).

Graybill (1998) also observes that during the TRC process, perpetrators openly confessed their sins, and victims freely forgave them. In essence, this turned to be the foundation for restorative justice legislation in South Africa. Before the TRC in South Africa, the ubuntu system facilitated sincere apologies from the perpetrators of injustice during the apartheid period, as well as forgiveness by the victims. For an instance, Major Mbina (former Captian of Ciskei Defence Force) testified before TRC saying that “some people who shot; probably shot without having been given orders, knowing that at the end it is the boss that will answer. That is what I want to make clear. I also ask for forgiveness. I empathise with families that lost their members. I ask forgiveness on behalf of the Ciskeian Defence Force, especially those that were involved. We ask for forgiveness” (TRC Report, 1998).

The ubuntu system of building peace is a recipe for reconciliation and social cohesion in post-apartheid South Africa. In the words of the Chairman South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC), Archbishop Desmond Tutu (1999), a person with ubuntu is open and available to others and does not feel threatened when others achieve because he or she recognises that they belong to a greater whole. Augustine (2011), Gathogo (2001), and Teffo (1994) explicate that African hospitality in ubuntu is ingrained in African cultural norm, values and customs that are relevant and important to the process of integration. The process of peacemaking in ubuntu is reflected in the principles of reciprocity, inclusivity, and a sense of shared destiny between peoples. The traditional societies in the countries of East, Central and Southern Africa utilised cultural practice of ubuntu as conflict resolution and peacebuilding mechanisms to regulate law and order within the society. In the principle of ubuntu, each member of the community is linked to each of the disputants, be they victims or perpetrators. The ubuntu system of conflict resolution and peacebuilding is aimed at resolving disputes and reconciling parties to disputes with a view to healing past wrongs and maintaining social cohesion.

Summary

Considering the state of insecurity in Africa and enormous resources that have been committed into the peace process on the continent with little success, especially by the UN and regional organisations, it is thus concluded that the revival of cultural practices of resolving disputes through communal efforts in Africa ought to be reconsidered. As a recipe for peacebuilding in post-apartheid South Africa, the ubuntu system of reconciliation and conflict resolution could be integrated into policy framework of entrenching durable peace in Africa. This could be operational along with other indigenous methods found in different societies in Africa. As a matter of policy, the African Union Peace and Security Council could adapt the indigenous approaches to conflict resolution and peacebuilding by digging into extant methodology used in traditional African societies. The idea is that the research institutes in Africa would be committed into how the relegated African values could be revived and made relevant in resolving conflicts in Africa using the knowledge long neglected by the policy makers.

This is not to say complete abandonment of liberal Western methods in use at the moment. Rather, indigenous conflict resolution mechanisms of ubuntu adopted to reconcile victims and perpetrators of injustice at the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission (SATRC) and other indigenous methods could be institutionalized alongside Western models. For example, consensus-building peculiar to Africans, based on African value system ought to be strengthened and institutionalized, as a preventive mechanism for power struggle that often escalate into open conflict and armed struggle in many African states.

Cross-References

- ▶ Indigenous Approaches to Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace and its Critiques
- ▶ Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Adewoye, O. (1977). The judicial system in southern Nigeria, 1854–1954. London: Longman Group Ltd..
- Afolabi, B. (2009). Peacemaking in the ECOWAS region: Challenges and prospects. Conflict Trends, 2009(2), 24–30. <https://hdi.handle.net/10520/EJC16047>.
- Agisi, E. O. (1979). An introduction to the study of African culture. London: Heinemann.
- Allot, A. N. (1960). Essay in African law. London: Butterworth.
- Annan, N., & Danso, S. (2013). Religion and ethnicity in Africa: An obstacle to development? In N. Sene Yaye (Ed.), Africa: A new Dawn? AU Herald: Addis Ababa.
- Ashforth, A. (2009). Ethnic violence and the prospects for democracy in the aftermath of the 2007 Kenyan elections. Public Culture, 21(1), 9–19. <https://doi.org/10.1215/08992363-2008-018>.
- Augustine, S. (2011). Ubuntu: An ethic for a new South Africa. Pietermaritzburg: Cluster Publications.
- Bassett, T. (1988). The political ecology of peasant-herder conflicts in northern Ivory Coast. Annals of the Association of the American Geographers, 78(3).
- BBC News (2018). The Liberia Profile <https://www.bbc.news/world-africa-13720504>.
- Bennett, T. W. (1993). Human rights and the African cultural tradition. Transformation, 22(1), 30–40.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping. New York: United Nations.
- Bukari, K. N. (2013). Exploring indigenous approaches to conflict resolution: The case of Bawku conflict in Ghana. Journal of Sociological Research, 4(2), 86–104.
- Cappelletti, M. (1992). Access to justice as a theoretical approach to law and a practical Programme for reform. South African Law Journal, 109, 22–39.
- Collier, P., Elliot, V. I., Hegre, H., Hoeffler, A., Reynal-Querol, M., & Sambanis, N. (2003). Breaking the conflict trap: Civil war and development policy. New York: Oxford University Press and World Bank.
- Cravo, T. A. (2018). Peacebuilding: Assumption, practices and critiques. ASPJ Africa and Francophone.1, 5–6. https://www.airuniversity.of.edu/Portals/10/ASPJ_French/Journal_EVOLUME-09_Issue-1/cravo_e.pdf.
- Department for International Development (DFID). (2001). The causes of conflict in sub-Saharan Africa – Framework document. London: Stairway Communications.
- Elias, T. O. (1956). The nature of African customary law. Manchester: University Press.
- Evans-Pritchard, E. (1937). Witchcraft oracles and magic. London: Oxford University Press.
- Even-Zohar, C. (2003). Sierra Leone diamond sector financial policy constraints. Washington D. C: Management Systems International. www.pacweb.org/Documents/diamonds_KP/6_War-Peace_sierraleone_Eng-Nov2002.

- France 24 (2011). ICC to probe post-election violence in Ivory Coast <http://www.france24.com/en/20111003-icc-probe-post-election-violence-ivory-coast-more-on-ocampo-hague>.
- Gathogo, J. (2001). The truth about African hospitality: Is there Hope for Africa? Mombassa: The Salt.
- Gberie, L. (2002). War and peace in Sierra Leone: Diamonds, corruption, and the Lebanese connection The diamonds and security project Occasional Paper 6 <https://impacttransform.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/09/2002-Nov-War-and-Peace-in-Sierra-Leone-Diamonds-Corruption-and-the-Lebanese-Connection.pdf>.
- Graybill, L. (1998). South Africa's truth and reconciliation commission: Ethical and theological perspectives. Ethics and International Affairs, 12, 43–62. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1747-7093.1998.tb00037.x>.
- Harwell, E. (2013). Forests, ex-combatants and durable security: Cross-sectoral implications of post-conflict programming. Working paper Programme on forests (PROFOR). In UNEP & UNDP (Ed.), The role of natural resources in diamond, and reintegration: Addressing risks and seizing opportunities. Washington, D. C.
- Hoffmann, S. (1995). The crisis of Liberal internationalism. Foreign Policy, 98, 159–177. <https://doi.org/10.2307/1148964>.
- International Crisis Group (ICG). (2008). Report on the Aftermath of Elections in Kenya. <https://www.crisisgroup.org/Africa/horn-africa/Kenya/Kenya-crisis>
- Jackson, S. (2006). The United Nations operation in Burundi (ONUB) – political and strategic lessons learned New York: Conflict Prevention and Peace Forum.
- Johan, G. (1976). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking and peacebuilding. In J. Galtung (Ed.), Essay in peace research (Vol. II, p. 282). Copenhagen: Ejlers.
- Kalaris, S. (2016). Kabila's repression: A consequence of UN inaction. New York: Council on Foreign Relations. <https://www.cfr.org/blog/kabilas-repression-consequence-un-inaction>.
- Keili, F. L. (2008). Small arms and light weapons transfer in west Africa: A stock-taking. In UNDIR, The complex dynamics of small arms in west Africa. Disarmament Forum 4. <https://www.undir.org/files/publications.pdfs/the-complex-dynamics-of-small-arms-in-west-africa-en-329.pdf>
- Khan, S. M., (1998). Lessons of peacekeeping in Rwanda paper for workshop on Learning from conflict resolution in Africa held in Arusha, Tanzania.
- Kirby, J. P. (2006). The earth cult and the ecology of peacebuilding in northern Ghana. In D. Miller, S. B. Kendic, A. A. Apusigah, & B. Harverkot (Eds.), African knowledge and sources: Understanding and supporting the ways of knowing in sub-Saharan Africa (pp. 129–148). Barneveld: COMPASS.
- Liden, K. (2011). Peace, self-governance and international engagement: From neo-colonial to post-colonial Peacebuilding. In Tadjbakhsh (Ed.), Rethinking the Liberal peace: External models and local alternatives. New York: Routledge.
- Mani, R. (2002). Beyond retribution: Seeking justice in the shadows of war. Cambridge, UK: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mbiti, J. (2010). Never break the pot that keeps you together: Peace and reconciliation in African religion. Dialogue and Alliance 24(1), <https://www.ups.org/resources/speeches-and-articles/3226-js-mbiti-peace-and-reconciliation-in-african-religion>.
- Michael, D. (2005). Three pillars of the Liberal peace. American Political Science Review 99(3), 463–466. <https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals/american-political-science-review/article/abs/three-pillars-of-the-liberal-peace>.
- Mohammad, A. (1996). State-making, state-breaking and state failure: Explaining the roots of 'third world' insecurity. In Goode et al. (Eds.), Between development and destruction, an enquiry into the causes of conflict in post-colonial states. London: Macmillan Press Ltd.
- Mosha, F. G. 1998 Lessons learnt from experiences of conflict resolution and peacemaking in Africa – with special Reference to Somalia. Paper for A Special Workshop on Conflict Resolution in Africa: Arusha.
- Mpangala, G. P. (2004). Conflict resolution and peacebuilding in africa as a process: Case studies of Burundi and the Democratic Republic of Congo. A Paper presented at Nyerere Week Conference on Africa's Road Map to Development and Self Reliance: Reality or Myth? 22–24, April.
- Mueller, S. (2008). The political economy of Kenya's crisis. Journal of Eastern African Studies, 2(2), 185–210.
- Murithi, T. (2006). Practical peacemaking wisdom from Africa: Reflections on Ubuntu. The journal of Pan African Studies, 1(4), 25.
- Nader, L. and Todd, H. (1978). The disputing process: Law in ten societies. Journal of African Law 25(1), 53–54. New York: Columbia University Press. Published online: Cambridge University Press 2009. <https://www.cambridge.org/core/journals-of-african-law/article/abs/disputing-process-law-in-ten-societies-edited-by-laura-nader-harry-f-toddjr-new-york-columbia-university-press-1978>
- Naffziger, E. (1973). The political economy of disintegration in Nigeria. Journal of Modern African Studies 11(4), 505–536. Cambridge University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0022278X00008727>.
- NEPAD (2005). New partnership for Africa's development – african post-conflict reconstruction policy framework, <https://scarp.abc.ca/sites/scarp.abc.ca/files/AfricanPost-ConflictReconstructionPolicyFramework.pdf>.
- Nomonde, M. (2000). Xhosa practices of Ubuntu for South Africa. In I. W. Zartman (Ed.), Traditional cures for modern conflicts: African conflict 'medicine'. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Ogwang, T. (2011). The Root Causes of the Conflict in Ivory Coast Africa Portal Backgrounder, No.5, https://media.africaportal.org/documents/Backgrounder_No_5-The_Root_Causes_of_the_Conflict_in_Ivory_Coast.pdf.

- Olaoba, O. B. (2002). The significance of cross examination in Yoruba traditional jurisprudence. Ibadan: John Archers.
- Opoku, K. A. (1978). West African traditional religion. Accra (Ghana): FEP. International Private Limited.
- Otite, O. (2000). Ethnic pluralism and ethnic conflict in Nigeria. Ibadan: Shanson C. I. Ltd..
- Paris, R. (1997). Peacebuilding and the limits of Liberal internationalism. International Security, 22(2), 54–89. <https://doi.org/10.2307/2539367>.
- Paris, R. and Sisk, T. (2009). (eds). The Dilemmas of statebuilding confronting the contradictions of postwar peace operations London: Routledge.
- Ploughshares. (2014). Armed conflicts report - Sierra Leone: 1991–2002, https://www.justice.gov/sites/default/files/eoir/legacy/2014/02/25/Sierra Leone.pdf.
- Reno, W. (2011). Warfare in independent Africa: New approaches to African history. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace: The local infrapolitics of peacebuilding. London: Routledge.
- Romano, A. (1998). Peace is possible: Lessons from the Mozambique Peace Process. Paper for the Workshop on Learning from Conflict Resolution in Africa held in Arusha, Tanzania.
- Sanni, A. O. (Ed.). (1999). Introduction to Nigerian legal method. Ile-Ife: Kuntel Publishing House.
- Sollenberg, M., & Wallensteen, P. (2000). Armed conflict, 1989–1999. Journal of Peace Research, 37(5), 635–649. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343300037005007>.
- Stewart, F. (2017). Social exclusion and conflict: Analysis and policy implications, <https://en.unesco.org/inclusivemethod/publications/social-exclusion/conflict>.
- Straus, S. (2012). Wars do end! Changing patterns of political violence in sub-Saharan Africa. African Affairs, 111(443), 179–201. <https://doi.org/10.1093/afraf/ads015>.
- Teffo, J. (1994). The concept of Ubuntu as a cohesive moral value. Pretoria: Ubuntu School of Philosophy.
- The Guardian. (2019). US Accuses Russia of exploiting conflict in Libya, <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2019/nov/15/us-accuses-russia-of-exploiting-conflict-in-libya>.
- The Sudan Foundation. (1997). The Sudan peace agreement, <http://www.sufo.demon.co.uk>
- Truth and Reconciliation Commission Report. (1998). South Africa Commission of Inquiry from 1960–1995, vol. 1, 415–512.
- Turton, D. (1997). War and ethnicity: Global communications and local violence in North-East Africa and former Yugoslavia. Oxford Development Studies, 25(1), 77–94. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13600819708424123>.
- Tutu, D. (1999). No future without forgiveness. London: Rider.
- UNHCR, Geneva. (2000). State of the World's Refugees. United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). (2015). Supporting the ECOWAS Political Declaration on the Prevention of Drug Abuse, Illicit Drug Trafficking and Organised Crime in West Africa. https://www.unodc.org/documents/evaluation/indepth-evaluation/2015/RP_West_Africa_Final_Indepth_Evaluation_Report_Dec_2015.pdf
- United Nations Resolution 47/120A. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peacekeeping. New York: United Nations. https://www.un.org/en/sc/repertoire/89-92/Chapter_8/GENERAL_ISSUES/Item_29_Agenda_for_peace_.pdf.
- Uppsala Conflict Data Program (UCDP) and Center for the Study of Civil Wars, International Peace Research Institute, Oslo (PRIO). (2012). Armed-conflict dataset of Sub-Saharan African States. <http://ucdp.uu.se>
- Villa-Vicencio, & Verwoed. (2000). Looking back, reaching forward: Reflections on the truth and reconciliation Commission of South Africa. Cape Town: Cape Town University.
- Vinck, P., Pham, P. N., & Kreutzer, T. (2011). Talking peace: A population-based survey on attitudes about security, dispute resolution and post-conflict reconstruction in Liberia. Berkeley: Human Rights Centre, University of California.
- World Development Report. (2011). Conflict, security, and development. Washington D. C: World Bank.
- Zartman, I. W. (Ed.). (2000). Traditional cures for modern conflicts: African conflict 'medicine'. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Zeitlyn, S. (2004). Social exclusion in Asia: Some initial ideas. London: DFID.
- Zenko, M. (2016). Kabila's Repression: A Consequence of UN Inaction Council on Foreign Relations (CFR). <https://www.cfr.org/blog/kabilas-repression-consequence-un-inaction>

Armed Rebellion

► Yemen Conflict

Arms Control

► Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

► Search for Peace, the Art

► Textile-Making as Research Method

► Theatre and Peacebuilding

Art = Culture

► Art and Reconciliation

Art = Peace

► Textiles Making Peace

Art and Reconciliation

Rachel Kerr
Department of War Studies, King's College
London, London, UK

Synonyms

Art = culture; Crafts Visual materials; Photography; Drawing; Painting; Performance; Dance; Theatre; Music Reconciliation = social cohesion; Accord; Settlement; Harmony; Compromise; Rapprochement

Definition/Description

Art and reconciliation is an emerging area of scholarship and practice that explores the potential of art in transitional justice, specifically to foster one of its core goals: reconciliation. Art encompasses a wide range of practices, from large public art initiatives to very small-scale participatory workshops, and involves diverse art forms, including fine art, photography, film, theatre, dance, music, embodied practice, and traditional crafts. Reconciliation is more difficult to define but is usually conceptualized as a process of coming to terms, which can occur at a variety of different levels – with oneself and one's own experience, with other individuals, within a community, society or state, or inter-state. The relationship between art and reconciliation is both instrumental – what can art do to help foster reconciliation, and what are its limitations? – and instructive – what can art tell us about what reconciliation might entail?

Introduction

There has been a recent turn to the arts as a way of overcoming some of the challenges and shortcomings of institutional and formal transitional justice and peacebuilding interventions. There is widespread acknowledgement in transitional justice that while formal mechanisms might be necessary, they are by no means sufficient to deal with trauma associated with violent conflict and atrocity. Together with the recognition of the significance of individual and community-level processes in the “everyday,” this has opened the door to reflect on the potential role of art. Research and scholarship is catching up with the “visual turn” in International Relations and peace and conflict studies now also reflected in the field of transitional justice to address the question of what can art do for reconciliation? And what are its limits?

Concepts

Reconciliation is a contested concept. It is contested in terms of its meaning, and its application. For some, it is a byword for impunity, understood to be antithesis to justice or a vehicle for a politics of distraction, diverting attention from the inequality and injustice that might have led to conflict in the first place. Nonetheless, it is often cited as a core aim of transitional justice processes; an “absolute necessity” (Bloomfield et al. 2003, p. 12) for societies contending with legacies of violence and atrocity.

The concept of reconciliation deployed in transitional justice is rooted in the Christian tradition of reconciliation between an individual and God, involving confession, repentance, restitution, and forgiveness. It is not simply “forgive and forget” but requires something of the individual in the form of a reckoning and mercy from God (Frayling 2009). In the political and secular domain, it is conceived of as a process, with “thin” and “thick” versions (Hamber and Kelly 2009), from the mere absence of violent conflict, to a deeper empathy, more akin to the Christian conception. Archbishop Desmond Tutu described reconciliation as the engine of transition to a new South Africa built on pillars of love, understanding and redemption (Daly and Sarkin 2007).

For many, reconciliation denotes transformation, rather than simple restoration, of relationships, requiring something of both sides – a dialogue. John Paul Lederach described reconciliation as the discursive space in which paradoxical and competing tensions can be mediated (Lederach 1997). As psychologists William Longe and Peter Brecke have shown, this process of mediation is not linear and rational, but “evolutionary” and driven by emotions (Longe and Brecke 2003; Cohen 2005). The conception of reconciliation as discursive space and the recognition of the importance of emotion lends itself to an obvious connection to art and opens up the possibility of creative approaches to engage and to spark the “moral imagination” (Lederach 2005) needed for reconciliation to occur.

The potential of art as a tool of reconciliation has begun to be explored, and there are at least two ways of thinking about its contribution. The first, and most prominent, is instrumentalist – what can art do to help foster goals of reconciliation among individuals, communities, and societies? Can it provide a “creative pathway” to reconciliation, breaking silences, communicating across cultural divides, and restoring human dignity (Rush and Simic 2014)? The second is more conceptual – what can art, artists, and creative processes offer us as a way of understanding what the possibilities of reconciliation might be?

There are several ways in which art is deemed to be instrumental to reconciliation. Scholars like Peter Rush, Olivera Simic, and Cynthia Cohen have focused on the possibility of art to open up dialogue, to break silences, to create and nourish empathy, to give voice (and public recognition) to marginalized victims, and to heal (Rush and Simic 2014; Simic 2017; Cohen 2005; Kerr 2017).

The healing power of art draws on work on art therapies in health studies and psychology. It does not necessarily have to be focused on dealing with the immediate trauma; it can have therapeutic effect simply by bringing people together to have fun, celebrate community, and make new friendships. According to Lederach, “Art and finding our way back to humanity [are] connected” (cited in Naidu-Silverman 2015).

Cohen, meanwhile, argues that there is something about the aesthetic experience that makes it especially suited to reconciliation. Because it engages on a sensory level, it can help transcend discord, accommodate difference, and nourish empathy in a way that purely cognitive, rational engagement cannot (Cohen 2005). Catherine Cole also talks about the centrality of the aesthetic to “represent and activate cultural memory, stimulate cultural imaginaries, generate participatory engagement, depict charged subjects [and] reveal depth, complexity and the effective and embodied dimensions” (Cole 2014). Art leaves the outcome of engagement open and tolerates multiple “truths.” As such it can be a “precious site of reflection” (Simic 2017) and dialogue. Whether in a fixed installation, a performance, or participatory workshop, art can open up discursive space necessary for contestation and disruption of fixed narratives through experimentation with temporality and space (Cohen 2005; Kurze and Lamont 2019). Confronted with different stories, people can be inspired to re-imagine their own.

Others have highlighted the ways in which art can offer an alternative form of representation, filling in where language, or “cold statistical data,” is inadequate to relay the depth and breadth of human suffering across generations and in multiple spheres of life (Edkins 2003; de Greiff 2014). For example, photographs of victims, or spaces where they should be, connect more viscerally with the sense of loss than mere numbers could, and create what Peter Rush labels “affective justice”, through “visceral notions of personal and collective responsibility” (Rush and Simic 2014).

Art can also either complement or challenge official or localized narratives (Rush and Simic 2014), empower and give voice to marginalized victims, demonstrate resilience, demand respect, and celebrate diversity (Naidu-Silverman 2015). Finally, reconciliation is itself a creative process, requiring “moral imagination” (Lederach 2005), of each other’s experiences, and of a shared future (Cohen 2005).

Practice

Throughout history, people have responded creatively to conflict, making art that glorifies, commemorates, memorializes, or laments war and atrocity. It is only recently, however, that there has been a more purposeful application of the arts to peacebuilding and reconciliation activities and a more concerted effort systematically to study these initiatives (Fairey 2017).

There are a large number of projects around the world that have sought to use the power of art in peacebuilding, generally, and a smaller number that have focused specifically on reconciliation, and these vary significantly in form, scope, and ambition. Some organizations work globally, for example: Global Arts Corp, an international theatre group that puts on productions such as Truth in Translation (telling the story of the South African Truth and Reconciliation Commission), and runs reconciliation workshops; In Place of War, which works with community-based organizations in Africa, the Middle East and Asia to support arts-based initiatives; and Search for Common Ground, which uses participatory theatre in areas affected by conflict to spark dialogue and change perceptions.

Others are locally based initiatives, working in a single region, country, or community using the arts in different ways. In Northern Ireland, considerable investments were made into community theatre and other arts-based initiatives following the 1998 Good Friday Agreement (Rush and Simic 2014; Fairey 2017), whereas in South Africa, art was a “radical form of political participation” in the transition from apartheid (Garnsey 2019). In Indonesia and Myanmar, festivals provided opportunities for inter-cultural exchange, while in Nepal and Afghanistan, participatory theatre opened up unthreatening spaces for testimony (Naidu-Silverman 2015; Rush and Simic 2014).

In the Western Balkans, and in Bosnia and Herzegovina in particular, there has been a proliferation of arts projects. Some, like Most Mira, were aimed specifically at bringing together divided communities, and others with a more generalized intent to build capacity and opportunities for young people (Fairey 2018). Most Mira (Bridge of Peace) is an arts-based organization founded in 2008 in Prijedor, one of the areas most affected by the conflict, with the aim of bringing people together “to make friends across ethnicities and celebrate diversity” (Fairey 2018). It does this through participatory workshops in dance, theatre, music, circus skills, photography, and through festivals and exchanges. Most Mira, like other community-based organizations in Bosnia and Herzegovina and elsewhere, deliberately avoids using the term reconciliation, because of its negative political connotations, although, as founder Kemal Pervanic acknowledges, everybody understands that reconciliation is what the projects are about: “You can start this process (of reconciliation) and you can run it successfully without talking about it” (Fairey 2018).

Elsewhere, projects have focused more overtly on reconciliation. Portraits of Reconciliation was a series of photographs of survivors and perpetrators of the 1994 genocide in Rwanda involved in a community-driven process whereby perpetrators formally requested, and were afforded, forgiveness from survivors (Simic 2017). In the photographs, they are standing or sitting together, embodying what reconciliation meant to them with the distance between them reflecting the extent (or not) of forgiveness.

It is not only in postconflict settings that art has played a role in reconciliation; artistic approaches have also been employed in the context of indigenous-settler relations. For example, creative expression played a central role in and around the Canadian Truth and Reconciliation Commission and was positively encouraged by the TRC as a form of testimony. Statements were gathered in the form of poems, songs, books, videos, photographs, performances, blankets, quilts, carvings, drawings, and paintings. Beyond the TRC, art opened up new and critical spaces to explore and contest the complexities of reconciliation, to reclaim identity and culture, and also to resist (Dewar et al. 2013).

Dilemmas

Artists have always responded to conflict but what is new is the attempt to harness the power of art strategically to foster reconciliation. The potential of art to transform relationships is enormous, but its potential to transform society is limited. Post-conflict transformation requires political intervention and one of the dangers of focusing on, and lionizing, art, is that it distracts attention from the necessity for larger structural reform. Olivera Simic states it clearly when she says that “Art alone cannot address the needs of the victims or communities who still strive to afford basic needs such as education, health care and housing” (Simic 2017).

We must also remember that reconciliation is a political as well as a social and psychological process. Just as art can help foster empathy, it can also reinforce division, and privilege one narrative over another (Simic 2017). It can also be a means of challenging transitional justice institutions and approaches. As Arnaud Kurze points out, in some cases, young people have used art to establish what he labels “strategic confrontation spaces” in which to contest transitional justice practices (Kurze and Lamont 2019).

There is also the danger of inflated expectations. There is a gap between the reality of working creatively in unstable and highly sensitive situations and the expectations of donors for robust evidence of measurable outcomes (Fairey 2017). It can be hard to reconcile the instrumental bias of transitional justice and the noninstrumental bias of the arts, which may be fundamentally at odds, with artists valuing “opacity, ambiguity, irony, indirection, instability and disruption” (Cole 2014). As Catherine Cole argues, artists may want to keep transitional justice practitioners at arm’s length. But it may be precisely that ambiguity and dialogic space that makes art an appropriate site for reconciliation: “[S]ometimes it takes a broken shoe to fit a broken foot. Theater’s loose ends and available center are well matched to a subject that will not be fully located or known in a satisfying way” (Cole 2014).

Summary

There are many ways in which art is supposed to contribute to reconciliation, and countless examples of arts-based projects aimed at doing just that. The potential of art is enormous, but it would be naïve to think that alone, it can foster social repair. What it can do is to provide discursive space and the tools to nourish the creative imagination necessary for reconciliation. As such, the contribution of art to reconciliation is not only instrumental; it encourages us to recast reconciliation not as a goal to be measured but as discursive space in which relationships are negotiated.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

References

- Bloomfield, D., Barnes, T., & Huyse, L. (2003). Reconciliation after violent conflict: A handbook. International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance: Stockholm.
- Cohen, C. (2005). Creative approaches to reconciliation. In M. Fitzduff & C. E. Stout (Eds.), The psychology of resolving global conflicts: From war to peace. Westport: Greenwood. https://www.brandeis.edu/ethics/pdfs/publications/Creative_Approaches.pdf. Accessed 15 Nov 2019.
- Cole, C. (2014). At the convergence of transitional justice and art. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8, 314–322.
- Daly, E., & Sarkin, J. (2007). Reconciliation in divided societies: Finding common ground. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- De Greiff, P. (2014). On making the invisible visible: The role of cultural interventions in transitional justice processes. In C. Ramirez-Barat (Ed.), Transitional justice, culture and society: Beyond outreach (pp. 11–26). New York: Social Science Research Council.
- Dewar, J., Gaertner, D., Gota, A., Mathur, A., & McCall, S. (2013). Practicing reconciliation: A collaborative study of aboriginal art, resistance and cultural politics. Kamloops: CiCAC Press and Shingwauk Residential Schools Centre.
- Edkins, J. (2003). Trauma and the memory of politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Fairey, T. (2017). The arts in peacebuilding: Mapping practice. Art and reconciliation working paper. https://artreconciliation.org/wp-content/uploads/sites/181/2019/07/Fairey_ArtsPeacebuilding.pdf. Accessed 15 Nov 2019.
- Fairey, T. (2018). Participatory arts and peace-building: Embodying and challenging reconciliation. In I. Sertić (Ed.), Participatory arts for invisible communities (pp. 204–211). Zagreb: Omnimedia. http://paic-project.eu/wp-content/uploads/E-book_Paic.pdf. Accessed 15 Nov 2019.
- Frayling, N. (2009). Toward the healing of history: An explanation of the relationship between pardon and peace. In J. R. Quinn (Ed.), Reconciliation(s): Transitional justice in postconflict societies. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Garnsey, E. (2019). The justice of visual art: Creative state-building in times of political transition. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hamber, B., & Kelly, G. (2009). Beyond coexistence: Towards a working definition of reconciliation. In J. R. Quinn (Ed.), Reconciliation(s): Transitional justice in postconflict societies. Montreal: McGill-Queens University Press.
- Kerr, R. (2017). The “Art” of reconciliation. FICHL policy brief series 78. <http://www.toaep.org/pbs-pdf/78-kerr/>. Accessed 15 Nov 2019.
- Kurze, A., & Lamont, C. K. (Eds.). (2019). New critical spaces in transitional justice. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Bulding peace: Sustainable reconciliaiton in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute for Peace.
- Lederach, J. P. (2005). The moral imagination: The art and soul of building peace. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Longe, W., & Brecke, P. (2003). War and reconciliation: Reason and emotion in conflict resolution. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Naidu-Silverman, E. (2015). The contribution of art and culture in peace and reconciliation processes in Asia – A literature review and case studies from Pakistan, Nepal, Myanmar, Indonesia, Afghanistan, Sri Lanka and Bangladesh. CKU Occasional Paper. Copenhagen: Denmark. https://issuu.com/cku-centerforkulturogudvikling/docs/the_contribution_of_art_and_culture. Accessed 15 Nov 2019.
- Rush, P. D., & Simic, O. (Eds.). (2014). The arts of transitional justice: Culture, activism, and memory after atrocity. New York: Springer.
- Simic, O. (2017). Arts and transitional justice. In O. Simic (Ed.), An introduction to transitional justice (pp. 223–248). London: Routledge.

Artificial Intelligence

- Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

Artpeace

- Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation

Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation

Oliver P. Richmond

University of Manchester, Department of Politics, Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Aesthetics; Artpeace; Emancipation; Emotions; Justice; Peace art

Definition

Peace is rarely celebrated, noted, or described, except in passing, or in juxtaposition with violence, a celebration of glory, or as a depiction of the horrors of violence. Much art depicting war and peace is related to power and to just war thinking. Depictions of the higher ethical dynamics of peace, in parallel to those of often repeated virtues of war, are rarely referred to. On the one hand, it is clear that aesthetic and visual representations of peace, and the support of peace, has been a recurrent interest for artists, but, on the other hand, these representations have traditionally followed predictable and relatively limited themes. Yet, peace has been documented as a key part of human history, politics and relations from very early on and has engaged a multi-disciplinary group of thinkers. More recently, it has become clear that “artpeace” may offer forward looking insights and may be able to identify inequality and injustice from below. Yet, such sources are easily lost though they may signal the emancipatory qualities that peace requires.

“Pax optima rerum” (Peace is the greatest good)
 “Pax optima rerum quas homini nouisse datum est, pax una triumphis innumeris potior. . .” (peace is the best of things which it is given to man to know, a single peace is more powerful than countless triumphs). Silius Italicus, Punica, (25-101 AD)

Introduction

From Hiroshima to the Somme, from the Killing Fields of Cambodia to the genocide church in Ntarama, Rwanda, artistic and stylized, visual representations and memorials of war and conflict are commonplace (Bourke 2017). They are part of our everyday lived environment. They enable us to navigate around the seminal crises that mark the history of empire, and later, ideology and the state. They have provided a platform, space, and creative or critical mode for dealing with issues ranging from marginalization and injustice, to reconciliation, identity, and commemoration, regardless of how little formal power participants or its exponents may have. The arts have perhaps been conducive to such critical dynamics, because they connect “subaltern” (that is marginalized by identity, gender, class, and nationality) agency to a wider social and global consciousness (civil or perhaps global civil society which is mostly anti-war and supports the wide proscription of violence in its multiple forms).

Yet, violence dominates our media, our aesthetics, and everyday representations, emphasizing the value of sacrifice, the potential of war, as well as its costs, normally from an elite, state, or imperial perspective (Bevan 2015). World War One and Two memorials are common in city centers, churches, and shrines around the world (King 1998). Most capitals have a “tomb of the unknown soldier,” an eternal flame, and tributes for the heroes who laid down their lives in order to found or save their country, to fight for justice and equality, against (but sometimes supporting) imperialism, fascism, totalitarianism, predation, nationalism, and discrimination. Often, it is argued that wars were fought for peace. War cemeteries, from long forgotten wars and battles are common around the world, even in the most isolated places: they often contain the bodies of people from far away, who often fought in wars that were relatively distant to their own everyday lives and contexts. Rarely are there memorials to those more indirectly caught up in wars and violence, principally women and children, directly or indirectly (though this has become a growing trend more recently). Even less likely are commemorations of peace treaties, processes, peacekeeping, or peacebuilding.

This essay outlines, with reference to a number of arts-based sources (presented in footnotes via website links), (I have used this method, rather than direct illustrations in the text, because copyright costs for most are prohibitive.) a general evolution and development in the aesthetico-political engagement with, and representation of, peace. It examines the connection of social and ethical claims for peace with artistic representation, and resistance to injustice and hegemony. What emerges from the marriage of arts and peace represents a radical and emancipatory synthesis we could call “artpeace”.

The imprint of artpeace on global consciousness has been somewhat significant given that the more formal history of the state and international relations is mainly focused on war, conquest, hegemony, and governmentality. However, in recent times the association between peace and the arts has returned to more subaltern modes of critique partly because of the rejection of the liberal/neoliberal peace framework more widely, and because the return of multi-polarity at the geopolitical level, and the rise of populism and authoritarianism. These new modes are engaging with complex and very entrenched, often hidden power structures in specific localities (such as Colombia or Sri Lanka) and localized issues. They may point to issues may only indirectly be associated with violence (e.g., authoritarianism, quasi-liberal states, capitalism, social class, and related stratifications) as well as highlighting matters related to identity, environmentalism, historical and distributive justice, such as colonialism, land appropriation, and slavery.

This essay firstly outlines key dynamics in the history of peace art, offering a conceptual framework for its evolution, and then proposes the concept of “artpeace” as a basis for critical engagement in contemporary peace and conflict studies.

Discernible Dynamics of Peace and Art

Our understandings of the development of world history, of politics, society, and economy, are all informed by crucial moments in history – often battles or wars won or lost. Memorials often underline how violence is always tragic, but more creative, critical, and radical representations challenge systems of politics and representation. They tend to intimate that wars can never really be ‘won’ especially in the relational sense of international relations, or in the everyday sense of the local context. Social and cultural reactions to tragedy of World War I are a case in point, even if elite actors battled over achieving victory (Winter 2014). Peace has been elusive and tragic, as Keynes famously warned, (Keynes 1919) based upon new waves of domination, boundary setting, establishing new hegemonies, even if it is significant in its everyday senses. Even in art an unnuanced “victor’s peace” (see Richmond 2005) has all too often been celebrated aesthetically.

Peace has been rarely celebrated, noted, or described, except in passing, or in juxtaposition with violence, a celebration of glory, or as a depiction of the horrors of violence. Depictions of the higher dynamics of peace, in parallel to those of often repeated virtues of war, are rarely referred to. The everyday, state, and international dimensions of peace have proven difficult to capture, or artists find it uninteresting, or even unpopular: more plausibly such representations are easily erased. On the one hand it is clear that aesthetic representations of peace, and the support of peace, has been a recurrent interest for some artists, but on the other hand many surviving representations have followed predictable and relatively limited themes which have supported power, militarism, empires and states.

Yet, peace has been documented as a key part of human history, politics and relations from very early on, as the early Kadesh peace treaty illustrates, as an important part of power-relations (Kadesh Treaty) Its early stages indicated a limited artistic and creative record, and may have reflect a disinterest on the part of elites in general in peace as distinct from war, or the elusive, empathetic qualities of a social peace. They may have also represented an attempt to reduce and censor the wider significance of peace from view to preserve the status quo and its associated power relations.

Later stages, and critical currents, in the arts tend to be much more reflective, creative, emotionally sensitive, and culturally and socially attuned, and forward looking. In other words, they are able to identify inequality and injustice from below, hidden by the political structures of society, the state, and the international system. The arts detect undercurrents and perhaps communicate them, though less tangibly than formal systems of codification: for example, Hans Holbein’s painting, The Ambassadors (1533) clearly depicts the power and mastery of diplomacy. Yet it also more obliquely suggests it was linked with death rather than peace through the presence of an anamorphic skull, which can only be seen from an oblique perspective (Holbein 1533; Constantinou 1994). Thus, often the arts in relation to war and peace point to the limitations of political frameworks of agency based on power-relations, which effectively preserve war as a tool, structural violence, and inequality. However, artistic endeavor often hints at an alternative, critical vanguard of peace development from a social perspective, even if its engagement is sparse and simplistic in aesthetic terms compared to war. The state or empire has often harnessed the arts for propaganda purposes with respect to the latter (Adorno and Horkheimer 2002; Groys 2008).

The more critical undercurrents in the arts may foreground the beauty and contradictions of peace across multiple dimensions. This strategy, rather than glorifying power, promises to open up emotional, relational, and solidarity elements. It may point to cooperation and higher levels of co-existence, and highlights the longer-term political, social, and cultural dramas related to war and peace in IR, rather than merely the brutish immediacy of violence and power (Bleiker 2017).

This is especially so given the role of critique and emancipatory thinking in political and social commentary and in representing and imagining better modes of being for societies in general. The harder aesthetics of war often captured popular imagination and so have seemingly been more successfully translated into power than the aesthetics of peace. The latter often seem ethically correct from a critical perspective that focuses on the positionality of the weak, hidden, and marginalized. Consequently, it is also thoroughly suppressed and marginalized (although there has been a strong movement to valorize the ‘higher’ ethics and aesthetics of war and heroism throughout history).

Yet, the critical, radical, undercurrents and imaginaries of peace present in aesthetic representations appear to have more traction in the long term in terms of the survival of the human race than the oft repeated cul-de-sacs of imperialism, nationalism, and fascism (however ‘heroic’ they may initially appear). The advances that have been made in translating subaltern claims for security, freedom, rights, justice, and sustainability, step by step across a range of historical artifacts, into practical political life in the modern world, was thus often imagined first, created, and the reinforced across society (and the global) through the arts, following undercurrents, resistance and innovation in society (see, for example, Beales 1931). Through various media reached communities widely and deeply, often through undercurrents that may have represented more political legitimacy than more obvious narratives about and exercises of unequal power.

There have been chinks or breakthroughs that allowed more critical challenges, revolutionary learning, and creative responses, to emerge in several stages of the development of a relationship between peace and art (outlined below). These often subaltern-style interventions have had world changing impacts over the long term, perhaps because of the emotive and cultural power and weight they represent, even if little direct, structural, or governmental forms of power. Many such breakthroughs emerged from social, creative, and radical movements at grass roots levels. They have influenced how the arts reflect and interpret the world, how history is memorialized, how political order is legitimated formally and within society (more to the point within excluded groups), and how peace is maintained, stabilized, rebuilt, and developed further.

The diagram below (Table 1) outlines a possible historical typology of six stages for this relationship. This chronology is not concrete, as these stages overlap and often run forwards to the present, forming a sort of sediment for each other (connecting them to the evolution of the International Peace Architecture that I have outlined in other work) (Richmond 2021). Many of the artworks alluded to are not explicitly about peace, but their relevance to peace (and its related elements) as one of the eternal issues in the evolution of political philosophy, political theory, and history is clear.

A Historical Sketch of an Aesthetics of Peace

As the following examples endeavor to illustrate, following the path of the various stages outlined in the diagram above, the arts offer a range of openings for peace. Primarily, as these stages develop, they offer the possibility of firstly, highlighting violence and injustice; secondly, appealing to human emotions for solidarity and to commemorate; thirdly, advocating and educating different audiences on matters of rights, justice, sustainability across generations and across borders or locations; finally, using a common language of aesthetic sensibilities to support reconciliation and pluralism (i.e., in stages three to six in particular).

Artpeace is flexible, mobile, and often emerge from underground or subaltern groups, which are nonthreatening, but can build long term community links and consensus. They have historically been networked widely and have been available to powerful actors when they needed symbolic capital for peacemaking. They cut across boundaries via a common language which is nonverbal. They offer new narratives for mobilization, calm for reflection, group safety, conflict avoidance, accessibility for the marginal to develop platforms for

Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation, Table 1 The Evolution of the Relationship Between the Arts and Peace

Imperial, Nationalist, and Conservative phase

Stage 1: In ancient times, art was used to delineate territory, to embed centralized authority, to spread hegemony or law, through or after war. It was used to legitimate and expand authority.

Stage 2: It was used to memorialize and heroize, through a linkage between art and war, especially as empires grew and were replaced by nationalism and sovereignty, buttressed by conservative thinking on the role of war in the state and empire.

Cosmopolitan discovery and awakening

Stage 3: With the emergence of rights struggles during the last millennia a more critical, subaltern (often underground) wing of the arts became more prominent. It was used to highlight victimhood, arbitrary power, and to evoke an emotional response to injustice within a more cosmopolitan domestic and international framework.

Mainstream arts also continued to valorize empires, the state, battles and heroism, and diplomacy.

Stage 4: After the Enlightenment the subaltern arts were used to promote tolerance, independence and self-determination, and to campaign against violence as a political tool, creating a more heterogeneous understanding of cosmopolitanism. Disarmament and pacifism became common motifs, as well as labor rights, equality, an explicit social and transnational empathy.

Mainstream sources continued to valorize empires, the state, battles and heroism, and diplomacy in the context of various ideologies.

Revolution, resistance, and rethinking

Stage 5: By the nineteenth century, new wings of the arts, more plausibly able to represent more marginal views and groups from below, because of new formats, were being used as a revolutionary force to mobilize groups and networks across a wide range of rights claims. They targeted power structures deemed to be unjust, to help advocate, mobilize, codify and to incentivize campaigns such as those against slavery, imperialism, war, armaments, discrimination, racism, and poverty within both a state-centric and international framework. Disarmament and pacifism remained common motifs, as well as labor rights, equality, an explicit social and transnational empathy. Along with a new experimentalism in media this allowed for more subaltern expressions (as opposed to the ‘high arts’ epistemology that often valorized war and power).

Mainstream approaches were also being deployed to support war recruitment, intelligence gathering, nationalism, and self-determination struggles simultaneously, along with their traditional pursuits of enabling empires, the state, battles and heroism, and diplomacy. States and empires adopted (or co-opted) such representations and discourses over time because they carried such wide global legitimacy by the twentieth century.

Stage 6: The concept of “artpeace” is consolidated. More recently, it has shifted to a subaltern, bottom-up, grass-roots mode and turned against the state, empire (formal and informal), capitalism, and extraction, and began to align themselves with global justice debates (distributive, historical, and environmental). They have used increasingly experimental modes of engagement across a broadening range of the arts. These modes have been used to satirize power and its corruption, often through intense experimentalism in content and format, as well as to promote and disseminate subaltern and creative thinking about the evolving conditions of peace across multiple dimensions. In particular, they unpick the intellectual and practical limitations of centralized power, sovereignty, capitalism, injustice, and related and arbitrary reductionism after the Anthropocene, demanding global and environmental justice.

In parallel, it has become increasingly implausible to legitimately disseminate the values of old-fashioned empires, the state, valorize battles and heroism, and maintain elitist approaches to diplomacy (unless via propaganda, authoritarianism, and coercion). Indeed, high-level representations as in earlier stages are now seen often to represent hypocrisy or to be anachronistic.

growth, as well as the potential for elites to understand the experiences of the marginal (depending on the nature of the arts in question). They offer social legitimacy through relationality that politics often wants to emulate in its contracts, but often cannot reach because elites are more power-driven than consensus based. (See various outcomes of the Art of Peace, AHRC research project at the University of Manchester (2018–2021) among others. See also, Alison Bailey, The Art of Peace, British Council, undated.)

Yet, underlying this progressive path are the more reductive uses that states, empires, and elites have put the arts to in the early stages (including one and two in particular), which have echoed onwards throughout contemporary eras, acting as both a foundation of political order and stability, and obstacles to progress and political change. Indeed, the overwhelming capacity of discursive and state power, when united, can bend critical and challenging representations for peace, justice and emancipation, backwards toward founding narratives associated with nationalism, the state, and empire (as with Delacroix's work, mentioned below) (Delacroix 1830).

Early Examples: The Imperial, Nationalist, and Conservative phase

Building an aesthetics of peace into political and economic systems and settlements has long been an implausible task, given that they have mostly all been founded through clashes of power, war, domination, extraction, and hegemony: in stages one and two, the arts were deployed as validating baubles, if at all. Yet it was also the first step toward making such systems socially responsive and accountable in the later stages. Historical sources show very small steps toward peace often utilized, or even depended upon, critical and subaltern modes of representation that communicated such needs deeply with their audiences, however.

For example, the Kadesh Treaty represented a classic stage one type of example of political and arts. It ended the Battle of Kadesh between Ramesses II's Egypt and the Hittites of Muwatalli II in around 1274 BC. This battle is thought to be the largest chariot battle ever fought, involving perhaps 5,000 chariots. The peace was made via a treaty in around 1258 BC. A clay copy of the written treaty – itself now an artifact – survives in the Istanbul Archaeology Museum. A replica is on display at the headquarters of the United Nations, and an Egyptian version survives on papyrus. It has become one of a few global symbols of peace. Peace, as evidenced by the treaty, was determined by war rather than justice or rights at this early stage; it was shaped by violence more than anything else. Yet, it also required documenting and communicating to allcomers, preserved for eternity on stone, to capture the valuable moment that peace was made and to inscribe and guarantee the new political order and its boundaries. Such political orders were generally built on hegemony and coercion, colonialism, and imperialism even if they removed overt violence and communicate from a platform of power and domination to 'lower' social orders. Representing peace in concrete and also emotive ways governed the experience of peace among the population, allowing leaders to add to its permanence through forms of communication that worked upon multiple levels, beyond the diplomatic table where powerful and elite signatories of any treaty had once gathered (i.e., drawn on, or written in stone, literally). This elite dominated, instrumentalized form of the arts, placing it at the service of power, represented perhaps the longest stage in the history of the relationship between peace and the arts, and it continues to form the bedrock of later stages, with mixed consequences.

The extent of the prevalence of indirect and direct violence in the history of international, domestic, political, social, and economic relations and systems was rarely comprehended until it was too late by their victims. It was and often remains widely accepted that peace is 'all other times, except war...' to quote Thomas Hobbes, a famous (and tragic) theorist of civil war and power relations (Hobbes 1996, 2013). His work on the ubiquity and inescapability of war and its association with authoritarianism has often been taken as the last word on the matter since he wrote his famous book 'Leviathan' in the 1600s.

The overwhelming dominance of different forms of media, expression, and aesthetics by depictions of violence and their aftermath represents a self-fulfilling drama – often taken to be the only human drama – and a self-censorship of the possibilities for peace. It might be useful to consider why this is so and how such a dominant 'print capitalism' (Anderson 1991) of violent imperial and state mythologies might be displaced. The result has been the elevation of war and power in thought, politics, society and aesthetics, over peace to achieve that which Augustine called the "tranquillity of order" (Augustine 1993). This compromise is reflected in the lack of nuanced aesthetic reflection on peace in the early stages of artpeace.

When further evolution emerged, it advanced relatively rapidly from stages two through to six, this latter development taking in the scope of emancipatory thinking from the Classics to contemporary times. This process of development seemed to increasingly hope for the power of the state and international political economy to become more aligned with the anti-war and anti-violence sentiments of more radical peace representations, if only briefly, often drawing on the early classical lineage of Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, Cicero, or Augustine, as with much else in wider remit of the Humanities (Boucher and Kelly 2003; Brown et al. 2002). It is difficult to find in creative arts (as opposed to the instrumentalized arts of stage one) any deference to such thinking early on at least, and this tends to be a growing characteristic from stages three onwards.

By stage three, representations of a desire for something more than war – or a form of peace – become clearer. Thus, contra Henry Maine, peace is not a particularly “modern invention” but the scale of its representation has slowly improved (Henry Sumner Maine 1888: See also Kustermans 2018). However, peace representations were to receive little enough attention in a world dominated by imperial and extractive rationalities, or later one dominated by fascism, nationalism, and capitalism other than where violence threatened their own integrity (reflected in the early stages mentioned above). Apart from a few pacifist communities (Fabbro 1978) or countries with demilitarized constitutional orders (such modern Germany, Japan, or Costa Rica,), the rationality of politics was predicated on the controlled use violence, the related search for domination, profit, leadership, and heroism, to reward sacrifice. Yet, the tragic, cathartic Realist drama that emerged led to peace becoming all the more complex, which is why the artpeace relationship evolved against the odds.

Toward a More Enlightened Engagement: Cosmopolitan Discovery and Awakening

Stages three and four became platforms for the earliest clearly political representations of peace to incorporate both a higher thematic symbolism as well as a more everyday depiction. Lorenzetti, a Renaissance artist, painted a series of frescoes on the walls of the Hall of the Peace (Lorenzetti)

(Sala della Pace) in the Palazzo Pubblico of Siena from 1338–1340. The Effects of Good Government on Town and Country represents a rare and early characterization of what peace may mean beyond nonviolence, reiterating the classical lineage of the relationship between certain forms of ‘good’ government, and peace, order, and justice (i.e., the good life). His work sets the scene for a significant break with early stages. It proclaimed the importance and benefits of peace by depicting life in a well-ordered and prosperous city, while in a related picture, Allegory of Bad Government, the horrors of destruction and disease caused by war are portrayed in the same town by way of comparison. This is not merely an ethical commentary on immediate acts of war, or a representation of a victor’s peace, but constituted a substantial reflection upon the relationship between peace and war with the longer-term nature of political order.

A Ruben’s piece, Minerva Protects Pax from Mars, (1629–1630) (Paul) added a further dimension to this aesthetic-political evolution. This painting illustrated Rubens’ hopes for peace between England and Spain even as war loomed, which he, in his role as envoy to Philip IV of Spain, was attempting through negotiation to prevent. The painting depicted the sublime and elevated nature of the gods’ relation to peace, as well as symbols of the more mundane everyday aspects of peace. It also became a mechanism for peacemaking itself. Pax (peace) is represented by the goddess of the earth, who is sharing her resources while Minerva, goddess of wisdom, drives away Mars, the god of war. The picture was presented to Charles I of England as a gift to advocate for peace. It consolidated the idea that leaders had a responsibility to both god and the state no to follow naked interests and to deploy the mechanisms of war, but to follow the wisdom of cooperation and trust.

The Lorenzetti and the Rubens paintings revolved around the juxtaposition of peace and war, illustrating peace’s higher and everyday qualities, both advocating for peace and warning against war. Both hoped to have a diplomatic and political effect following the interests of elites, nobles, church, as well as – to some extent more than had been usual at this time – representing the views of society, intellectuals, and artists. Both also illustrate the difficulties of depicting peace in the flamboyant or emotive manner that wars are often represented by. Peace tends to be banal and every day, hard to detect even, though its processes were coming to be seen as depending on elite actions, government, as well as on social activism. Even in these laudable attempts at its depiction, the threat of war or violence becomes their main method through which peace gains its aesthetic life through the mechanism of contrast. Both paintings ultimately provided different avenues (divinity or more earthly politics) towards the proscription of violence. There was an early sense of possibility in peacemaking as opposed to the determinism of war.

The continuing repetition of the stereotypes of horror and bravery associated with glory and power, versus such more marginal possibilities, meant that violence or a victor's peace remained the dominant motif during stage three. It had by now gained a new life that translated into the exceptionalism of empire and the state, summed up in Weber's famous dictum about the state's monopoly over violence (Weber 2015). From this understanding, peace continued to be shorn of its wider, aesthetic, emotional, and ethical potential, remaining a narrowly conceived artifact or rarity, an outcome of power-backed war, formed by force relations rather than the emancipatory imagination harnessed to human potential. Art that turned in the direction of power was rapidly discredited, however, for wider society, opening the way for more radical, ethical intent inherent in artpeace.

The efforts of Lorenzetti and Rubens to offer peace as an elite aesthetico-political agenda opened the way for more subaltern advocacy and for further explorations of the socio-political potential of peace, against the broader foil of the failings of power, as stage four suggested. Power had shaped rather than followed society, art, and aesthetics, in other words, but there was also growing evidence that power, state, and empire were partly socially constructed, even at the grand scale indicated in such depictions. This realization gave artpeace approaches, and social actors, substantial agency and a hitherto little understood capacity to shape politics. The next two centuries were to host an epic aesthetic battle over the forces of imperialism, fascism, nationalism and the state (which ultimately was to lead to a nuclear standoff during the Cold War), and the subaltern critical agency aimed at the expansion of rights and related issues like disarmament (notably brought together by the Greenham Common campaign on the 1980s).

Into the Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries: Revolution, Resistance, and Rethinking

Artpeace was often represented by horror and emotion, and an assumption that it was the opposite of what was being depicted: the opposite of death, destruction, injustice, and arbitrariness (see, for example, The Apotheosis of War by Vasily Vereshchagin, also mentioned below) (Vereshchagin, 1871). In the high imperial, and the later fascist phases, of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the focus tended to be on horror of violence for a radical audience, or the glory and honor that war may represent for a conservative audience who are more taken with motifs of power, nationalism, heroism, stratification, restoration and counter-revolution. Artpeace was generally connected to Augustinian notions of "just war" as early stages inferred, where war was justified to protect a "higher" political order (empire, state, and elites) and to further its ambitions for itself against others (Guthrie & Quinlan 2007). More sophisticated depictions of peace remained something of a rarity, leaving much to be assumed, and the workings of the processes by which peace (even as a limited negative peace inherent in the balance of power) was arrived at were difficult to depict. The ease in depicting war placed its representations in the general terrain of propaganda, to glorify its relationship with individual heroism, to either celebrate or disguise imperialism and nationalism. References to peace were often exploited to try to legitimate war in such guises, as with De Neuville's Defence of Rorke's Drift, which heroized the British defense of their garrison against enormous numbers of Zulus, during the Anglo-Zulu War of 1879

(Alphonse de Neuville, 1880). Indeed, countless memorials, sites, museums, and galleries around the world continued to depict heroism, battles, war, glory, beauty, sexuality, and only very rarely the full horror of war. In these paradigms, war consumed so much political and social-aesthetic energy that the question of what comes next was rarely engaged with until stages four and onwards. Stage four represented both a continuation built on the bedrock of stages 1 and 2, and a turning point where political agency was becoming democratized and artpeace was expanding its range.

This fork in the road was evident in Delacroix's Liberty Leading the People, which celebrated the goals of the French Revolution and its aim of liberty, but also illustrated the sacrifices it entailed (Delacroix 1830). This painting commemorated the July Revolution of 1830, which toppled Charles X. Liberty, represented by a woman holding the tricolore flag and a gun and leading the people forward, echoing the French Revolution of 1879 and its goals. Using what has also nationalist iconography, revolutionary violence was offered as a legitimate mechanism to achieve liberty and a resurgent nation. This was to be an area of contestation for peace throughout this period, whether through just war, revolution and resistance to oppression, or later forms of humanitarian intervention. This argument illustrated that peace was subject to power, but that it was also determined by rights claims made by the masses. It connected peace to a larger project aimed at liberty, equality, and justice, though social justice was corralled into a reformed state project: nationalism would become something of a contradiction during the twentieth century.

What was significant for stage five was that peace was now something that could be claimed through the exercise of emancipatory agency by subaltern actors, from below. These very actors, previously ignored, were now driving history, preferably nonviolently (but often via the mechanism of revolutionary violence), across a range of terrains of human activities: from politics to the arts. Suddenly, the powerless (in Delacroix's context, the Third Estate) had representational, if not practical, leverage in the fundamental terrain of politics and international relations, about the nature of political order. The contested, age-old pairing of peace with war driven by elite power relations and cemented by the state and empire was weakening a little, and social agency was now being depicted in the context of struggles against the mechanisms of war and power, even if they were again soon deflected into nationalistic or imperial enterprises. This trend also revived the age-old problem of whether violence was justified in the name of peace if there was a just cause (and who determined any such causes)? There were increasingly subtle and emotive references to explicit justifications for such agency, lying in opposition to violence and war, discrimination, racism, and imperialism, and in support of more complex forms of justice. Revolutionary or emancipatory violence lurked in the background of such claims, just as violence lurks in the foreground of imperialism, authoritarian state, and other forms of oppressive hegemony.

Vasily Vereshchagin's painting, The Apotheosis of War, is thought to be one of the earliest explicitly pacifist paintings (Vereshchagin, 1871). It adopted the typical strategy of graphically displaying the horrors of violence pioneered by the likes of Goya, rather than depicting the pleasures of peace, as with Lorenzetti, or offering liberty as a peace worth fighting for as with Delacroix. This painting was inspired by the horrors associated with the Russo-Turkish War from 1877–1878. In this desolate picture there is no hint of hope or of a cause that justifies the violence portrayed or any attempt to produce empathy for its subjects (portrayed merely as objects). Its pacifist message is simply that there cannot even be a limited form of peace derived from violence. Peace art had until this point normally avoided such a stark rejection of violence, but the expanded platform that stage five provided perhaps now allowed for more radical, nonviolent demands to arise. These were being disseminated in an increasingly connected world as fundamental critiques of the way politics had previously been organized.

Artpeace still lacked a constructive vision for the most part, however (which is an accusation that could also be aimed at most other disciplinary areas). When it did endeavor to go beyond war, it often had an unexpectedly large impact as was the case with Goya's Execution or later Picasso's Guernica. (See <https://www.pablocassio.org/guernica.jsp>: <https://www.khanacademy.org/humanities/becoming-modern/romanticism/romanticism-in-spain/a/goya-third-of-may-1808>) Depicting the horror of violence was increasingly being seen as a subversive protest against stratified political power and a foil for subsequent, though still vague call for peace, as with works by Goya, Picasso, and Kollowitz (Goya 1814; Kollowitz 1924a; Picasso 1937). As in particular with Picasso's Guernica, the more graphic the depiction of violence, of futility and loss, the more it pointed to perhaps unspoken alternatives which consequence for the nation, the state, and humanity in general. This reflected the growing swell of public opinion and its heightened capacity to influence politics at 'ripe' moments since the start of the nineteenth century (and to be completely ignored when geopolitics dominated, such as in 1914).

Indeed, artpeace still appeared, even in this more sophisticated stage, to depend on the sponsorship of, or influences on the artist: thus it balanced toward power, glory, and honor. In stage five, however, it was also more clearly beginning to represent and preserve a humanist, critical commentary. As in Goya's piece, The Third of May, victimhood, even potential innocence, may be used as a mechanism to underline the injustice of violence and war. So, while the arts may represent and disseminate the architecture of power and the state of exception that allows the state to monopolize violence and deploy violence as a political tool (Drawing on Carl Schmitt, see Agamben 2005), artpeace was now beginning to challenge hegemony as underground movement became aware of an inexorable path toward rights and democracy as a standard by which to judge power and violence. The arts were more clearly challenging violence from a subaltern perspective by stage five, echoing and amplifying historical undercurrents pertaining to the proscription of violence and the expectation or right for a good life, which required the reimagining of political order. This impulse travelled along the networks that disseminated arts and rights thinking, which were also expanded during industrialization and the imperial era, from letter writing and small, local meetings, to large-scale conferences and international campaigning. These dynamics perhaps were to culminate (at least before the contemporary digital era) with Picasso's Guernica, and its twentieth century travels and travails (Van Hensbergen 2005).

By stage five, shocking viewers into confronting the dangers of using violence was increasingly problematic if it only supported a political system or form of peace settlement acceptable to power. Until this stage, art had normally been coopted into imperial or nationalist projects of war, rather than emancipatory collective action: it had constantly flirted with powerful propaganda, or artists had been dependent on power, or unaware of their own underlying assumptions. Representation was dominated by power, with only small corners left available for critical challenges.

With stage five, peace was also slowly mobilized by art at a more residual level, compared to the elite academic texts of Erasmus or Kant during the Enlightenment, or the grandiose paintings of Rubens. By the early twentieth century, the connections between art, protest against war, the exposure of war's relationship with iniquitous forms of power, and advocacy for peace, as well as intimations of its potential complexity, had been consolidated. A stage six was emerging, which foregrounded subaltern agency even further in the marriage between art, politics, and peace.

Hints of these developments were present in one of the most famous art movements of the early twentieth century. Dadaism emerged at a time of great stress and change in the period during and after World War One. It emerged in Zürich "the peaceful dead centre of the war" as Hans Richter, a leading exponent wrote – at the Cabaret Voltaire and spread to Paris, Berlin, and New York. Members of this avowedly anti-war movement were appalled by WWI. Hans Arp, a member of the Zürich Dada movement wrote, Revolted by the butchery of the 1914 World War, we in Zürich devoted ourselves to the arts. While the guns rumbled in the distance, we sang, painted, made collages, and wrote poems with all our might. We were seeking an art based on fundamentals to cure the madness of the age, and a new order of things that would restore the balance between heaven and hell. We had a dim premonition that that power-mad gangsters would one day use art itself as a way of deadening men's minds.

Out of this maelstrom of imagination, social and political commentary, radical rejectionism, and anti-foundationalism, was born an anti-nationalist, internationalist, and disruptive movement that hosted some of the great experimental writers, thinkers, and artists of the twentieth century. Though Dadaism was an internationalist, avant-garde reaction against nationalism, it often adopted a humanist and also universalizing tone. It quickly became famous because it often adopted a directly provocative tone with its audience: insulting the audience was a common occurrence. Dadaism was an aesthetic and anarchistic representation of the human and political challenge, not just of rebuilding Europe after WWI, but also of constructing a peace that would be self-sustaining and not reliant on the violence that was materially or aesthetically built into custom, institutions, and conservative representation of naturalistic orders.

Founded in 1916, and defunct by the early 1920s, it laid the way for the emergence of the subsequent debates about the multiple ways in which what was 'real' could be investigated and represented beyond romantic or realist expressions that valorized status and power. Through its experimentation with 'events', chance, installations, mobiles, collages, phonetic poems, film, and more generally attempts to disorientate and disrupt the expected medium and matter of art, it showed how the 'real' was simply an interest-based hegemonic representation rather than a naturalized order or representation. In the age-old balance between peace and war, this was biased toward the latter. Dadaism was designed to,

...bring home to the bourgeois the unreality of his world and the emptiness of all his endeavours, even including his profitable nationalism.

It represented a sharp break with the past, conservative and complacent sense that war and the higher representation ethics of arts were comfortably aligned. Art was now challenging power and disseminating scientific thought about progress with the need for radical social and political change, shocking as this might have been no longer enough. A revolution was required and it would not be denied. Tentative engagements with the social conditions of peace and justice could no longer be acceptable if the arts were to represent more than the tool of power. These dynamics were marked by an attempt to push back boundaries and hierarchies, to promote solidarity, empathy, and new networks of political creativity, through challenging existing and conservative categories, rather than to prove their sanctity. It was only one of such movements that were initiated as a reaction to WW1.

Its main challenge to war lay in its rejection of the existing order of politics, representation, and society that glorified war, or warned of its excesses, but also saw it as a plausible basis for peace. But it also consolidated the radical, creative energy and insight that the arts offered for peace that was relevant to society, rather than merely celebrate yet another elite victory. Hannah Hoch's collage from 1919, "Cut with the Kitchen Knife Through the First Epoch of the Weimar Beer-Belly Culture" (See <https://www.khanacademy.org/humanities/art-1010/dada-and-surrealism/dada2/a/hannah-hoch-cut-with-the-kitchen-knife-dada-through-the-last-weimar-beer-belly-cultural-epoch-of-germany>) portrayed war as self-destructive chaos that would debase humanity, rather than creating peace. The methodology of such work suggested an awareness of the potential of networks, relationality, and of social power, which were growing among populations more aware of their status and rights, though the disruption that was to be achieving through deploying them against existing political order was to be more ambiguous in practice. Substantively, it offered a challenge to the tendency to await a victor's peace following a 'glorious' war, and was connected closely with the more pacifist representation of Vereshchagin. However, it was also indicative of a level of desperation that radical methods and claims such as these had failed given the international and domestic circumstances, and the looming catastrophe of violence might be the only alternative: to meet fire with fire. Methodologically, such methods would also soon come to form the basis of often reactionary propaganda, aimed at delegitimizing emancipatory, non-violent claims and mobilizing violence in order to re-establish domestic and international hierarchies.

Though politics was coming to the fore in artpeace, artists still normally eschewed dangerous confrontation for more empathic and subtle modes of engagement that were perhaps less risky, during this period of heightened ideology. Those associated with peace movements, or at least with resistance to war, also often portrayed a sensitivity to issues such as identity, discrimination, property, and gender inequality as representing negative stratifications (as opposed to historical, conservative arguments which tended to see them as important frameworks for a social Darwinist world). For example, Kathe Kollwitz, a Polish artist who dealt in particular with women as subjects for her art, illustrated very plainly the impact of war on women but in particular their agency against war in her image, “Never Again War” (Kollwitz 1924b).

Similarly, the level of sectarianism, discrimination, and racism often evident in war was represented in the painting by a German Jewish painter in the period leading up to WWII. Felix Nussbaum was killed at Auschwitz in 1944, and his painting, ‘The Pearls’ is widely regarded as one of his most important (Nussbaum, 1938). It shows a Madonna and Child image superimposed over a battle scene, offering a complex anti-war protest, working on several different levels at once (especially if the viewer knows anything about the painter’s biographical details and context).

Perhaps the seminal example of artpeace is Picasso’s Guernica, which attempted to combine many of the motifs of peace art, including Dadaist confrontation. It was painted for the 1937 Exposition held in Paris, (Picasso 1937) and has become one of the most famous paintings in the world. It portrayed the suffering of the small Basque town of Guernica which was attacked by the Luftwaffe in April 1937. Its focus on suffering in its ordinary, everyday context, caused by a cynical, surprise air attack against innocent civilians, was underpinned by allusions to long standing Spanish myths of survival and power. It brought together radical epistemic-aesthetic innovations in modernity: artistic experimentalism with radical political challenges to fascism and the violence it valorized, as all as emotional, social appeals for solidarity and empathy. It deployed the tactic of relying on empathy to expose war and its connection with underlying, elemental and structural forces of nationalism, evil, and violence, while also appealing to a certain national character of resilience and eternity. It became a powerful symbol of the international and transnational peace movement during and after WWII, becoming associated with a number of different anti-war campaigns, including against the Vietnam War. The remarkable transversality of these movements – ordinary, powerless, global networks of people opposing total war as a political tool, along with all the power it engendered, and proposing various alternatives – were to become perhaps defining features of the post-war world. This was the basis for stage six in the artpeace evolution. Guernica spent most of its life at the Museum of Modern Art in New York before it was returned to a newly democratic Spain in the 1980s, in accordance with the wishes expressed by Picasso in his will. Basques have been calling for its relocation from Madrid to Bilbao ever since, as a symbol of the suffering the Basque country has endured and the peace it now hopes for.

Picasso also produced the most well-known emblem for contemporary peace movements, drawing on a common historical metaphor. His Dove from 1949 is now widely recognized in many different guises (Picasso 1949). It made no reference to violence, but offered a globally resonant symbol through an allusion to a more environmental, “commons” perspective of peace at a time in the Cold War when social movements were beginning to mobilize in the East and the West (Goedde 2019). He also composed several other peace images that focused on symbolizing peace independently (Picasso 1962). Also, around this time, his creation, War and Peace was painted onto the walls of a chapel in Vallauris in France during a period sometimes referred to as “the summer of War and Peace”. It depicted “war” as a tank and a figure with a bloody sword, a basket of bacteria, and a sack of skulls. These were opposed by a ‘peace fighter’ carrying a shield with a dove on it, and by a child ploughing the sea, drawn by a winged horse. This was the last major political composition produced by Picasso and made explicit a more complex motif the balance between war and peace (Picasso, 1952). This perhaps prefigured peacekeeping and peacebuilding practices later in the century, which were attempts to maintain and improve peace through a variety of different military, economic, political, social, and cultural tools. His support and recognition of peace movements both endorsed and heightened the transnational and transversal “rights” revolution that emerged after WW2, which challenged war and uncovered other forms of violence (Moyn 2018).

Broadening Approaches

The evolving depiction of artpeace and its relationship variously with power, hegemony, domination, imperialism, totalitarianism, authoritarianism, territory, heroism, tragedy, and inequality, as well as with balance, justice, and sustainability, was now gathering pace in a variety of different media. By stages five and six, the sophistication of the message was perhaps eclipsed by the possibilities inherent in global mobilization and advocacy, especially when subaltern artpeace connected with like-minded international or transnational actors, and were able to form cross-cutting alliances (assuming these were not formed for superficial purposes on either side). The arts provided a common grammar that was now coming into view and becoming more audible (especially when compared to its glacial pace over the previous several millennia).

Soon after WWI, and after it had destroyed the fabric constructed over previous generations, there emerged the phenomena of “peace museums”. There are now many of these around the world. Probably the most famous is the Hiroshima Peace Memorial Museum (Hiroshima Peace Memorial). This museum is sited on the original “ground zero,” where the US atomic weapon, absurdly named “Little Boy” was detonated. This location is marked by the eerie remains of a building in Hiroshima Peace Park called “Genbaku”. It is the sole architectural reminder of the damage and death caused at 8.15 in the morning of the 6th August, 1945. About 70,000 individuals were killed instantly, and many more in the period afterwards. The city of Hiroshima is now closely associated with civil resistance to nuclear weapons. The use of the A-bomb was commonly justified by Western scholars and policymakers on the grounds that the 140,000 deaths it caused were significantly less than the many possible deaths a land invasion of Japan would have caused, given the complete militarization of Japanese society at the time. An aesthetic, humanities influenced approach would, if following the rationale of early contributions to peace aesthetics, underline this philosophical ethical dilemma, probably making it extremely difficult to justify the level of violence applied even so. Such issues are not referred to in the rather anodyne museum which perhaps relates more to stages three and four than later developments in artpeace (perhaps more displaying a masterful diplomacy. Instead it focuses on cataloguing the events of the day and the suffering the bombing caused in an understated manner, perhaps because of acute political sensitivities over the admittance of Japanese or western guilt. However, the museum’s presence speaks for itself: a terrible catalogue and a warning, as well as place of memorialization, tranquility, and reflection about how to avoid such catastrophes in the future. Its reflectiveness points the observer to stage six concerns about radical alternatives from the subaltern perspective.

The preservation of widespread war damage and its use in public monuments or symbols became common after WW2. This practice reconnected the post-war epoch with the pre-war period, travelling over the rupture that war represented. This was the case with Marienkirche in Lübeck in Germany. This church, dating from 1250 was badly damaged in Allied bombing of civilian areas during World War II. Its church bells, in what is now a UNESCO listed church, fell from their tower in Allied bombing, and have since been left as a reminder on the floor of the rebuilt tower. (<https://st-marien-luebeck.de/>: https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/St._Mary%27s_Church,_L%C3%BCbeck) This dramatic, thought-provoking scene works on several different levels, again pointing toward stage six concerns.

Cartoons in newspapers have also been widely used to critique the incompetence and hypocrisy of war leaders, war, and inconsistent peace settlement processes. For example, J.N Ding Darling drew a series of cartoons opposing war during WW1, WWII, and after. These relied on the shock factor of futility, atrocity or tragedy, and represented peace as a necessary alternative. Others incorporated an element of satire, humor and irony. Cartoons continue to be used to critical effect in contemporary media to highlight a popular desire for peace and a resistance to war, particularly during the Iraq War from 2003, for example in the work of Steve Bell, spanning stages four to six. (See, for example, “We Have Gained 200 Yards of the Enemy Trenches—Dispatch from the Front—1916”, “Sign Him Up Before He Gets Over His Headache”, “Waiting for the Sword to Fall”, “Eventually, Why Not Now?” in Christopher D. Koss (ed.), A Ding Darling Sampler: The Editorial Cartoons of Jay N. Darling, Christopher Koss, 2004, See for example the many cartoons of Steve Bell in The Guardian on President GW Bush’s conduct during the Iraq War: <https://www.theguardian.com/Iraq/cartoons/0,,912730,00.html>)

As noted above, peace art has become a part of public architecture (though mainly decorative rather than structural), (Thanks to Stefanie Kappler for this important point) whether through the concurrent glorification of war and a victor’s peace, through the vilification of war and its mechanisms, the celebration of peacemaking, peacekeeping, peace treaties, the UN, peacemakers, civil society actors, or more marginally the attempted depiction of peace as a form in itself. For example, representing the common peace, disarmament, and development theme of the early post-war era, of converting the implements of war into those of peace, one public sculpture at the UN headquarters in New York depicts a figure holding a hammer aloft in one hand, and a sword in the other, which he is making into a ploughshare (Buchetich, 1959). Perhaps this was a confirmative of the dramatic developments in artpeace in stages five and six.

Also at the UN Secretariat building in New York is Marc Chagall’s stained glass window in the Public Lobby. It was a gift from United Nations staff and Chagall in memory of Dag Hammarskjold, the second Secretary-General of the UN. He and fifteen other people died with him in a plane crash while on a peace mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo in 1961. The window contains several well-known symbols of peace (UN Headquarters). Indeed, the United Nations family of organizations has been active in documenting peace in its own institutional terms, in the context of its work in the areas of international security, refugees, development, and health, via an extensive archive of historical photographs and posters. Many of them highlight the cooperative, legal and institutional, as well as the human stories of peace and war, though many also point to the fact that states remain the pre-eminent actors in international relations. Again, these images span the later stages of artpeace development but does so in via a rather traditional aesthetic form. (See the wide variety of UN posters spanning the end of WW2 to the contemporary era. Edward B. Marks & Katie Burke, For a Better World: Posters from the United Nations, Pomegranate Europe, 2000.)

Another well-known piece at UN Head Quarters is Non-Violence, by Carl Fredrik Reutersward, again at the UN Headquarters in New York (Reutersward 1988). This portrays a giant revolver with its barrel twisted into a knot, making the gun useless (ironically, this sculpture became less public after the security perimeter of the building was expanded after 9/11). It symbolizes the ease with which weapons can be made impotent, the waste they represent, and represents a powerful call for disarmament.

More ambivalent references to peace through violence, threat, or force remain common. The ambiguity of war and peace art remained visible in post Good Friday Agreement (1998) murals long after the agreement was struck, on house walls in Belfast. These murals became a tourist attraction and though some are still expressions of militantism, many have been repainted with less ambiguous messages about the benefits of the peace process. Walls, with their fluid aesthetic, that once glorified violence now reflect more optimistic messages illustrating how representation itself is renewed after war (even if aimed at tourists) (Hocking 2012). Murals tend to be repainted repeatedly, representing the changing environment and shifting politico-aesthetic responses to the dynamics of the post-Good Friday Agreement (1998) period. They were originally quite traditional representations of artpeace, but increasingly have shifted toward stages five and six.

Overall, during the stage six period, the artistic representations of peace have diversified substantially, as seen with arts that were deployed in the CND resistance movement around Greenham Common since 1981, (See <https://www.theartworks.org.uk/our-greenham>) or as mentioned above in Northern Ireland. One of the most poignant tragedies of the early post-cold war era, until the massive civilian losses that occurred in the Iraq war after 9/11 or the Rwandan Genocide in 1994, was the siege of Sarajevo during the breakup of Yugoslavia during the early 1990s. This drawn-out conflict was the scene of many poignant reminders of the hubris of the claims that peace had arrived after the Cold War, when set into relief by the political claims for justice, economic assistance, restitution, reparations, as well as a sustainable political order that conflict-affected populations were now raising. Many Sarajevans remember the U2 rock concert of 1997 (https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/U2_concert_in_Sarajevo;) as a final realization that the war was over, and the constant bombing and sniping that the city had endured for around 1000 days from 1992 to 1995 would not return. The strange process behind the realization of this unlikely concert was related in a quirky book, which may also be said to offer a more literary dimension to artpeace (Carter 2005). Of course, this book stands in a long but relatively recent line of examples in the literary peace genre, spanning Leo Tolstoy in the nineteenth century to Ernest Hemmingway, George Orwell, and beyond (Tolstoy 2007; Hemmingway 1940; Orwell, 1984).

Another creative example could once be found in the divided capital of Cyprus, Nicosia, Lefkosa, or Lefkoshia. From the late 1950s until 2003, an impassable so-called green-line divided the city's Greek and Turkish Cypriot inhabitants. One General Young marked the line on a Nicosia map to establish a buffer zone between the two communities. This was a strategy of divide and rule or divide and pacify, particularly after the city became the scene of intercommunal riots in December 1963. After a war in 1974, the green-line became part of an island wide buffer zone, patrolled by a UN peacekeeping force. In 2005, a painted pink line also appeared in the city, which was supposed to transgress the green line's patriarchal demarcations, categorizations, and divisions (Kamerić 2005). In a sophisticated challenge to the related dynamics of war, division, nationalism, and patriarchy, the pink line implied that war and division in Cyprus could be blame on such traditional categories.

More radical and satirical stances on the inadequacies of politics, and on the way they scarred the social landscape with violence, as well as the exploration of completely new directions, were developing at pace. They were also more visible to various global audiences than ever before, because of new communication technologies. They partly converged in the work of Banksy, a self-described "guerrilla graffiti artist" known for his resistance to war and violence in his public, hit and run style art, which has a habit of randomly appearing all around the world. He is associated with anti-capitalist and anti-Establishment pieces of work, as well as opposing various wars and oppressive political systems, including in the Middle East, the Iraq War, and War on Terror after 9/11, using the massive popular appeal of his to discredit establish modes of order and to raise the issue of what should come next (Banksy 2006). His window view through to a seeming paradise beyond the Israel/ Palestine buffer wall (2005) pointed to radical possibilities of peace despite conflict and division. (<https://community.atlasobscura.com/t/locations-of-banksy-art/2074/2>: <https://banksyexplained.com/the-segregation-wall-palestine-2005/>) His interpretation of the peace dove for Christmas in Bethlehem, in the Westbank in 2007, was also far more complex than Picasso's earlier drawings (mentioned above). (https://www.dailysabah.com/gallery/political-street-art-best-of-banksy/images?gallery_image=undefined#big) Yet, even during stage six of artpeace's development, it is common that exhibitions purporting to be about peace generally fell back on campaigning against war (a trend reflected in an exhibition in the Tate Britain in London in 2007, which touched on the Iraq war). (See the recreation of peace campaigner Brian Haw's Parliament Square Protest, Mark Wallinger (2007).)

Implications of Stages 1–6 for Practices Associated with Peacemaking

In the selections above of a range of aesthetic representations of war and peace, familiar and simple dynamics are illustrated: by stages three and four what artpeace is being used as a subaltern form of advocacy against war, and peace arts came to represent a critical resistance to war, often by appealing to emotion, religion, solidarity and community, or focusing on its tragedy. Sometimes, simple recording of names and dates is used, or more recently various types of humor to attack war-based systems, satirize them, or even undermine their legitimacy. However, until stages five and six artpeace also often works within the parameters of the state or empire, just as much as it may challenge iniquitous and unjust exercises of power.

This is a deficit in artpeace's creative imagination, leaving peace innovation to be dominated, often in reductive ways, by formal political and policy actors and powerful propaganda, at least until recently. This deficit illustrates an ambivalent attitude toward war but often also supports its metastructures via bureaucratic, technocratic, management, and stabilization techniques aimed mainly at propping up an imperfect, negative form of peace and a relatively crude international order. This parallels the paucity of ideas beyond the ideological debates of modern times (within which new alternatives have also not emerged).

Peace and conflict studies debates have recently focused on descriptive and methodological approaches (such as issues of locality and positionality), partly perhaps because of the regressive dynamics emerging that are pushing back scientific and ethical progress. Yet, the critical edge of peace art has continued to develop, pointing peace more broadly to issues of global justice (historical, distributive, and environmental) (Reid and Taylor 2010; Nussbaum 2015; Pogge 2001; Kohn 2013; Gonzalez 2017; Della Porta et al. (2007)).

The more creative and radical work this essay has examined, especially since Dadaism challenged WWI propaganda, has reinforced norms of nonviolence, underlined the hypocrisies of power in emotive and accessible ways, and sought to mobilize and consolidate a collective anti-war and anti-violence understanding in, and across, societies. This appears to be understood more broadly as a challenge to political elites, the state, geopolitics, neo-colonialism, and geo-economics, and intimates local to global-scale networks of solidarity, empathy, and global justice. Artpeace strategies have juxtaposed violence intuitively with imaginaries of calm, artisanship, beauty, connecting nonviolence and alternativity with justice and reconciliation. They highlighted in compressed ways the shocking historical, cultural, and humanistic information available about the consequences of violence. They have depicted the effects of violence on civilians, on public spaces, and on the innocent. They worked primarily by unsettling, perhaps in much more direct and assertive ways than in the past, common assumptions about violence as heroic, strategic, necessary, increasingly relating personal tragedy with major philosophical and systemic questions as well as creative new possibilities. It has increasingly expressed emotive and subaltern issues against run of dominant state-centric, military-industrial, autocratic, and neoliberal rationalities of power. It imagines responses and alternatives in intuitive sketches.

This has produced an elusive commentary with implications for peace and conflict studies. It guides peacemaking toward primary emotional and empathetic responses, considerations of subaltern voice and representation. This implies peacemaking probably becomes much less Burkean and more focused on reform, experimentation, and much improved systems of law, government, and institutions, as well as equality, rights, justice, and sustainability as responses. The performances of the Arts, their ability to transcend convention, boundaries, and systemic enclosures juxtapose themselves with the brutal oversimplifications of war and violence as power was historically transmitted through empires, states, militaries, alliances, international political economy, and classes to the modern era. From stages four to six they invite a broad social and subaltern consideration of the philosophical, ethical considerations of war as a political tool or historical event. While earlier stages left open the question of what must be done for there to be a good peace for the long term, later stages have clarified the imaginary of a peace with global justice. (See the UN's Sustaining Peace agenda, for scientific and political implications on this matter. UN Secretary-General 2018, para. 6.) As media and platforms for networked production and representation proliferate, the subaltern perspective is for the first time also much more accessible across, rather than enclosed by, international boundaries of empire, state, region, race, and class.

However, while more accessible it also still represents a substantial lacuna when compared with mainstream representations of victor's peace or peace that follow power. It reiterates the question of why technical and aesthetic representations of peace remain so limited, widely scattered, and in such a low volume (despite some acceleration over time)? Censorship and erasure of emancipatory political arguments has been historically common in imperial and state history, as well as in ideological terms, and the same appears to be true for artpeace, even in a digital age (where disinformation and propaganda can muddy the waters so easily). There can be little other explanation for the paucity of exemplars. Aesthetico-political projects also mirror power-relations in their survival and influence. Ultimately, much artistic peace work challenges war through broad brush emotions, or associates peace with elite and northern power or ideas, challenging, perhaps, the direct use of violence but less frequently the political systems that mobilize it.

Theoretical contributions on peace have made substantial advances over the last century, reflected in UN doctrine, (See Richmond 2020. See, on the policy evolution, among others, UN General Assembly International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ECOSOC), United Nations General Assembly Resolution 2200A (XXI), 16th December 1966: UN General Assembly, "Right of peoples to peace", UN General Assembly Resolution 39/11, 1984; Report of the Secretary-General, "An Agenda for Peace, Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping", A/47/277 - S/24111, 17 June 1992, paras 3 & 5; UN General Assembly and Security Council 2018) however. In some ways this was spurred by cultural legitimacy following the evolution of stages in art peace that this article has outlined. Attempts to moderate clashes of interests for states following the rationality of territorial sovereignty, for example, has received substantial theoretical critique translated into liberalism, multilateralism, international law and organization, and social movements, and the dilution of sovereignty in peace processes such as Northern Ireland. Yet, it has been rare for artistic representations to pre-empt and foreshadow such levels experimentation (such as the juxtaposition of improbable territorial maps mentioned below) though they generally support and disseminate innovations in popular, philosophic, and scientific thought. This indicates that more could be done in terms of aesthetic-political challenges against the legitimization of violence in political order, if artpeace wants to be more than an amplification of norms of co-existence and nonviolence. From Lorenzetti to Dada, this is clearly possibly and occasionally powerful. Such heightened levels might point to artpeace representing a synthesis of radical creativity and emancipatory political agendas, rather a simple marriage of emotive art and power-politics, or art with social aspirations for peace.

In order to disseminate and lock-in systems designed to produce and ensure peace in its more creative or expansive forms, widespread cultural understanding and experimentation (where it is safe to do so) are required. Yet, long standing blockages exist, divorced from social and ethical priorities and lying in complex political structures that also control representation. They usually support the state and the national interest, as well as capital and political ideologies that maintain stability in international order, making the whole edifice very conservative. They have had a retarding effect on the transmission of aesthetic-political forms of emancipation in order to compete with power-based representations. Peace aesthetics and representations are forced to deal with the immobilities and conservatism that comes with the preservation of existing order and its historical grounding in violence and injustice. This takes up most of the available creative-political resource, further hindering progress. The very gradualist pace of anti-war representational development indicates the scale of the task, perhaps mirroring calculations about revolutionary versus gradual change. Imagining alternative approaches and orders is more plausible in experimental media, while it is ethically risky in practice.

Widespread representations of more complex agendas rarely emerge (exceptions such as Lorenzetti's, mentioned above, are rare). Peacemaking, mediation, peacebuilding, peacekeeping, as well as the UN system, multilateralism, the donor systems, and the global array of NGOs are more or less completely absent from cultural forms of representation at an international level, and even in conflict-affected societies. The complexity of peace is often not even present in dry, realist representations of terrible violence, as in the Peace Museum in Hiroshima. This raises some worrying and substantial questions about the evolution of the international peace architecture, and how far it may have always been secondary and subsequent to the evolution of war and geopolitical power in the modern world.

Yet, this essay's limited collection of examples illustrates that efforts are evolving to depict how the commonplace desire for peace is represented in multiple forms and across dimensions. Indeed, the habitual celebration of war and conflict is more an ironic representation of a desire for a form of peace based upon dominance that would never be plausible because it would be without broad legitimacy. Often, this means an unviable form of peace, based on victory. Read more deeply perhaps, the selection in this essay also invariably illustrates an appeal to humanity and common decency, a repulsion toward violence, and a will toward its proscription. More radically, it indicates a concern that political elites and the political, social, and economic structures they support cannot yet prevent war or offer a high quality of peace. The arts underline social forms of resistance to violence and injustice, and mobilization against it, but only offer hints of a subsequent political order.

In summary, a will to peace is increasingly perceptible and complex, aesthetically, throughout history; there appears to be a gathering momentum over time toward a more nuanced engagement with peace. These representations rest on the weakening of elite, state or imperial monopolies over representation, connected to social revulsion toward war, as well as solidarity, resistance, and a growing understanding of how violence breeds violence down the ages. It partly represents a responsibility to represent peace as a pluralist, transnational, trans-scalar, and transversal endeavor. Developments in the aesthetic representations of peace hint at "pluriversalism" rather than hegemony, universalism, top-down, or even "common" narratives (Ndlovu-Gatsheni 2018; Querejazu 2021; Behr and Shani 2021).

Toward a Creative and Just Synthesis

The items examined in this essay represent a limited catalogue of what might be described as elite peace art, more easily accessible to western eyes, and preserved for posterity by powerful actors in the cultural sectors related to the state and global political economy. Though they contain some radical critique their import is limited to commentary on violence and its proscription, diplomacy, the art of government, emotions and the role of social advocacy. Reconstruction would be its next logical, ethico-political, aesthetic step.

It is likely that more radical, subaltern work, in line with the findings of recent critical scholarship and scientific progress, has been regularly erased in the past. Aesthetico-political challenges of this sort are ephemeral, and there clearly may be a problem with what can be described as “disappeared” subaltern peace art versus the more formal and elite sources from the west that have survived. If more subaltern contributions have disappeared, they cannot inform the political process nor play a role in peacemaking or emancipatory reform. Some may make it into the mainstream of course, but the selection criteria (and curation process) is little understood. While there is a widespread sense in critical terms that art, philosophy, and science should lead and inform power, there is actually a more empirically observable tendency for power to lead and influence. Hence frameworks like ‘policymaking’ and ‘policy relevance’, lead both representation and scholarship toward their needs. Funding programs do likewise, leading them toward the state, while counter-insurgency strategies are meant to induce loyalty. Certainly, art and scholarship often appear to be comfortable with power, and mainly point to peace when uncomfortable contradictions threaten hegemony or the international system. There have been some honorable exceptions, but we must assume there were many more subaltern contributions, now lost or erased.

When subaltern agency demands peace and elite actors have exhausted war as a political tool, there is a chance that artpeace, representing an archive of knowledge, elite or subaltern, may be rescued. It may come to mark a new political era of enhanced peace methodologies and epistemologies, as many of the sources cited above once did. At the same time, it is in power's interests to claim control of artifacts and aesthetics, and to erase them. This may explain why it seems there is a tendency for artpeace traditions to follow some kind of reactive power politics, whether at state, empire, religious, or other levels. Because art (culture and counter-culture) responds after or at best during war, power easily restrains its radical critique. Steps forward may occur when power aligns with social consensus and representation, or alternatively when power-structures suffer a collapse and a vacuum emerges, enabling creatively and hitherto marginalized approaches to develop and become visible. Its subaltern or controversial nature means it is necessary to broaden what is considered to be peace art in order to understand much wider political critiques of violence as well as reconstructions of the good life.

It may be that artifacts of artpeace mainly survive because power has failed to erase them, and there is social and elite demand and receptivity to creativity and new thinking. In some cases, arts-based narratives are the creation of power, emphasizing state or imperial prerogatives to the people. Thus, surviving artpeace needs special attention. The most radical critical work may not survive because of the intensity of its challenge or reconstruction, the less critical work that does survive censors itself to limited the goals of peace to fit within the existing order, and power-based art effectively reinforces the war machine. The artpeace referred to in this essay shows the potential (e.g., see Lorenzetti in the fourteenth century or Matobi in the twentieth century, as mentioned below) for radical and critical statements about rights, good government, sustainability, and responding to the contradictions of war over territorial sovereignty.

The preceding analysis illustrates that visual art defines and determines peace in very Eurocentric frameworks: it reflects the westernized story of art as well as the “whiggish” view of history as progress through a kind of Hegelian dialectic. Artpeace is related to, and often is attracted to, or appreciates power, perhaps allowing peace to follow power rather than scientific and emancipatory endeavors. Nevertheless, simultaneously it also offers a platform for creative resistance to achieve emancipation. Yet, many creative endeavors connected to everyday life throughout history have left little in the way direct traces. Its recovery, as well as the preservation of contemporary sources would be significant. A more substantive critique of power has led to innovations in social agency, for which artpeace has always offered hints, sometimes across the whole international geography.

One such critique involves a comparison between Abraham Ortelius' illustration for Thomas Moore's text 'Utopia' (c.1595) (See <https://orteliusmaps.com/book/ort234.html>) and Satomi Matoba's work depicting Utopia (1998). (See https://www.englishgallery.com/artists/artist_work/?mainId=129&groupId=non&p=3&_gnum=&media=Prints) They both represent the contradictions of peace and war. Moore's Utopia represents a set of impossible geographic and social features and rests upon a totalitarian form of peace many today would find unacceptable (which even Moore himself may not have been comfortable with). Matoba's remapping of the political world in this instance sees Hiroshima and Pearl Harbour imagined as geographical neighbors in the same detailed cartography, normally deployed to emphasize territorial sovereignty and separate political and cultural spaces, but instead now signifying a cosmopolitan but diverse cartography of peace after the extremes of violence.

Summary

Translating all of the above into a value contribution for peace and conflict studies, which provides indicators for future emancipatory paths offers an overall conceptual framework for artpeace. This represents a confluence and a synthesis of historical political and creative forces to make peace, one often overlooked or blocked for disciplinary reasons or by power. The grammars of humanities, social sciences, and the arts merge in this conceptual framing, often despite powerful interests and opposition. The arts have historically offered a platform of creativity for political innovation and alternative perspectives on violence not easily identifiable from a Eurocentric rationality, as well as creating alternative frameworks for a peaceful solution. They have suggested them centuries before they became social, state, and international practice in many cases, rehearsing the emancipatory and nonviolent potential of social imaginaries when fed into reformed political systems.

This suggests that in a contemporary setting, artpeace – as a platform for imagining emancipatory improvements to political systems that rest on violence and war – could offer new methods that would help solve power deadlocks, build legitimacy, reconciliation, justice, and contribute to peace formation processes. It would reimagine the nature of the state, good life, and international political order (by promoting positive forms of peace, highlighting unseen violence, and supporting the proscription of violence across the different scales of analysis from local to global). Its synthesis would be a source of practical reform in the longer term. It offers a grounded, resonant, alternative grammar of representation that utilizes transnational and transversal networks for peace-oriented communication, advocacy, reconciliation, justice, reform, and nonviolence.

Artpeace thus represents an overall conceptual framing of the synergy between arts and peace, as well as a methodological strategy for addressing conflict through the arts. In turn, "artpeacebuilding" represents an amalgamation of medium-term, peacebuilding strategies often dominated by top-down, external factors. Even so, it provides useful platforms for further creative, subaltern networks and synergies to be rediscovered or to emerge. "Artpeace formation," connected to social movements, resistance, civil society engagements, represents long-term, social, cultural, and bottom-up engagements with peace, including dynamics related to about cultural shifts, emotions, representation, memorialization, and reconciliation.

There may be many other subcategories that offer such synergies between arts and peace praxis, but their conceptual separation in disciplinary terms represents epistemological blockages brought about by specific rationalities of political order: from imperialism, geopolitics and the state to the international political economy, as well as the marginalization of creativity, race, class, and gender by zero-sum, positivist, epistemological frameworks. The exploration of art and peace represented in this essay illustrate the work they have done to come back together into a synthesis to suggest emancipatory practices for the long term, to consolidate and disseminate an aesthetico-political consensus that aims to remove war and violence and establish a just and sustainable political order from local to global scales. Artpeace formation represents critical, post- and de-colonial, and emancipatory attempts to refashion existing and mainly failing peace praxes in the context of underlying and creative grammars and representations associated with artpeace. More radically, they aim to resolve underlying structural divisions and respond to global justice issues.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Civil Society and Peacebuilding: Critical Review
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Peace in International Relations Theory
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Textile-Making as Research Method
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

References

- Adorno, T. W., & Horkheimer, M. (2002). The culture industry: Enlightenment as mass deception. In Dialectic of enlightenment: Philosophical fragments (pp. 94–136). Stanford: University of Stanford Press.
- Agamben, G. (2005). State of exception. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Anderson, B. (1991). Imagined communities: reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism (p. 224). London: Verso.
- Augustine. (1993). The city of god (pp. 690–691). New York: Random House.
- Banksy. (2006). Bombing Middle England. See <http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/entertainment/6340109.stm>: <http://walle.doffhotel.com/index.html>:
- Beales, A. C. F. (1931). The history of peace: A short account of the organized movements for international peace. New York: The Dial Press.
- Behr, H., & Shani, G. (2021, September). Rethinking emancipation in a critical IR: Normativity, cosmology, and pluriversal dialogue. Millennium.
- Bevan, S. (2015). Art from contemporary conflict. Imperial War Museum.
- Roland Bleiker, “In search of thinking space: Reflections on the aesthetic turn in international political theory.” Millennium, vol. 45, no. 2, Jan. 2017, pp. 258–264.
- Boucher, D., & Kelly, P. (Eds.). (2003). Political thinkers from Socrates to the present. OUP.
- Bourke, J. (Ed.). (2017). War and art: A visual history of modern conflict. Reaktion Books.
- Brown, C., Nardin, T., & Rengger, N. (Eds.). (2002). International relations in political thought. Cambridge.
- Buchetich, E. (1959). Let Us Beat Our Swords into Ploughshares (A Gift to the UN from the Soviet Union), New York.
- Carter, B. (2005). Fools rush in. New York: Wenner Books.
- Constantinou, C. (1994). Diplomatic representations...or who framed the Ambassadors? Millennium, 23(1), 1–23.
- de Goya, F. (1814). The Third of May, 1808: The execution of the defenders of Madrid. Madrid: Museo del Prado.
- de Neuville, A. A. (1880). Defence of Rorke's drift. New South Wales Art Gallery.
- Delacroix, E. (1830). Liberty leading the people. Paris: Louvre.
- Della Porta, D., Andretta, M., Calle, A., Combes, H., Eggert, N., Giugni, M. G., Hadden, J., Jimenez, M., & Marchetti, R. (2007). Global justice movements: Cross-national and transnational perspectives. London: Routledge.
- Fabbro, D. (1978). Peaceful societies: An introduction. Journal of Peace Research, 15(1), 67–83.
- Goedde, P. (2019). The politics of peace (pp. 43–44). Oxford University Press.
- Gonzalez, C. G. (2017). Global justice in the Anthropocene In L. Kotze (Ed.), Environmental law and governance for the Anthropocene New York: Hart Publishing Seattle University School of Law Research Paper No. 17-06, 2017. Available at SSRN: <https://ssrn.com/abstract=2929042>
- Groys, B. (2008). Art power. Cambridge, MA: MIT.
- Guthrie, C., & Quinlan, M. (2007). The structure of the tradition. In Just War: The Just War tradition: Ethics in modern warfare (pp. 11–15). London: Bloomsbury.
- Hemingway, E. (1940). For whom the Bell Tolls. New York: Scribner.
- Henry Sumner Maine. (1888). International law: A series of lectures delivered before the University of Cambridge (p. 8). London: John Murray.
- Hiroshima Peace Memorial Museum, <http://hpmuseum.jp/?lang=eng>
- Hobbes, T. (1996 [1651]). Leviathan (Cambridge texts in the history of political thought). CUP.
- Thomas Hobbes, De Cive, CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform, 2013 [1642]
- Hocking, B. T. (2012). Beautiful barriers: Art and identity along a Belfast ‘Peace’ Wall. Anthropology Matters Journal, 14(1).

- Hans Holbein The Ambassadors (1533) National Gallery, London
- Kadesh Treaty*, Istanbul Archaeological Museum, Turkey.
- Kamerić, Š. Pink Line vs Green Line, Public project; Nicosia, Cyprus, 2005. <https://sejlakameric.com/works/pink-line-vs-green-line/>
- Keynes, J. M. (1919). The economic consequences of the peace. London: Macmillan.
- King, A. (1998). Memorials of the Great War in Britain: The symbolism and politics of remembrance. Berg Publishers.
- Kohn, M. (2013). Postcolonialism and global justice. Journal of Global Ethics, 9(2), 187–200.
- Kathe Kollwitz, 1924a. Never again war.
- Kollwitz, K. (1924b). Never again war. <https://www.kollwitz.de/en/never-again-war-kn-205>
- Kustermans, J. (2018). Henry Maine and the modern invention of peace. Journal of the History of International Law / Revue d'histoire du Droit International, 20(1), 57–88.
- Lorenzetti. Allegory of Good Government: Effects of Good Government in the city, 1338–40. Frescos. Palazzo Pubblico, Siena, Italy.
- Moyn, S. (2018). Not enough: Human rights in and unequal world. Belnap Harvard University Press.
- Ndlovu-Gatsheni, S. J. (2018). A world without others? Specter of difference and toxic identitarian politics. International Journal of Critical Diversity Studies, 1(1), 80–96.
- Nussbaum, F. (1938). The pearls. <http://www.painting-analysis.com/pearls.htm>
- Nussbaum, M. C. (2015). Political liberalism and global justice. Journal of Global Ethics, 11(1), 68–79.
- Orwell, G. (1984). Secker & Warburg, 1949.
- Paul, P. Rubens | Minerva protects Pax from Mars (Peace and war), London: National Gallery.
- Picasso, P. (1937). Guernica. Madrid: Prado.
- Picasso, P. Dove. 9 January 1949., <https://www.tate.org.uk/art/artworks/picasso-dove-p11366>
- Picasso. (1952). War and peace. <https://www.tate.org.uk/whats-on/tate-liverpool/exhibition/picasso-peace-and-freedom/picasso-peace-and-freedom-explore-3>
- Picasso. The face of peace, date unknown: The Dove of peace, poster for the Congress of the National Movement for Peace, Picasso, May 1962
- Pogge, T. (2001). Priorities of global justice. Metaphilosophy, 32(1/2), 6–24.
- Querejazu, A. (2021). Cosmopraxis: Relational methods for a pluriversal IR. Review of International Studies, 1–16.
- Reid, H., & Taylor, B. (2010). Recovering the commons: Democracy, place, and global justice. Chicago: University of Illinois Press.
- Reutersward, C. F. (1988). Non-violence. New York: UN.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2020). Peace in IR. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2021). The grand design. OUP.
- Tolstoy, L. (2007 [1867]). War and peace. Penguin.
- UN General Assembly and Security Council. Peacebuilding and sustaining peace. Report of the UN Secretary General, A/72/707-S/2018/43, 18 Jan 2018
- UN Headquarters. Chagall's stained glass window. New York
- UN Secretary-General. (2018). Report of the Secretary-General, "Peacebuilding and sustaining peace". A/72/707-S/2018/43. United Nations: New York.
- Van Hensbergen, G. (2005). Guernica: The biography of a twentieth-century icon. London: Bloomsbury.
- Vereshchagin, V. (1871). The apotheosis of war. Tretyakov Gallery, Moscow.
- Weber, M. (2015). Weber's Rationalism and Modern Society, (Trans. and Ed. Tony Waters and Dagmar Waters). New York: Palgrave Books, pp. 129–198.
- Winter, J. (2014). Sites of memory, sites of mourning: The Great War In European cultural history. Cambridge University Press.

Arts-Based Research

► Textile-Making as Research Method

Asian Approaches to Peace

Yuji Uesugi
Waseda University, Tokyo, Japan

Synonyms

Developmental peace; Eastphalian peace; Emerging power; International order; International peace architecture; Postliberal peacebuilding; Rise of China

Description

Asian Approaches to Peace is not a term with an agreed dictionary definition; rather, there is no fixed definition of the term. It is included in the lexicon used in the academic field of peace and conflict studies. In the previous study of peacebuilding which grew in the post-Cold War era, Asia was seen as a conflict-prone area and was treated, by and large, as an area requiring intervention, as seen in the cases of Cambodia, Timor-Leste, Sri Lanka, Afghanistan, and Nepal. Asia as an agent for peace has never attracted sufficient attention from mainstream scholarship, except for some philosophical approaches to non-violence led by Gandhi (2019) and subaltern aspirations which crystalized into a “Non-Aligned Movement.” However, because of the rapidly increasing presence of emerging actors in Asia in the field of not only economics (especially, trade and investment) but also peacekeeping, peacebuilding, and development, mainstream scholarship can no longer continue to neglect alternative contributions or contestations presented or potentially projected by (re)emerging Asian powers such as China and India. This coincides with a series of setbacks in the post-Cold War era experienced by Western donors in their efforts to advocate for “Liberal Peace” in post-conflict societies (Paris 2004), embodied by the practice of humanitarian intervention and the notion of “Responsibility to Protect” (Evans 2009; Bellamy and Luck 2018) (see sections R2P and Prevention; Liberal Peace in Peace Operations). In light of this, Asian Approaches to Peace began to receive more than passing attention as an alternative to “Liberal Peace” or as a promising prototype for “Post-Liberal Peace” approaches (Richmond 2011; Uesugi 2020).

Introduction

Asia is a dynamic concept. From a Eurocentric point of view, it represents a geographic area ranging from Iran (West Asia), through Central, South, and South-East to East Asia, reaching Japan on the “far eastern” edge. Russia, Mongolia, Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea, and Pacific Islands countries may fall into an expanded geographic category of Asia (or Asia-Pacific); however, the term “Asia,” associated with Asian Approaches to Peace as used in peace and conflict studies, encompasses countries in East, South-East, and South Asia. In terms of demography, Asia accommodates multiple centers with growing populations, such as China, India, and Indonesia. It provides an attractive market and serves as a driver for economic growth. In the post-World War II recovery and development, the economic success of Japan, plus the Asian “Newly Industrialized Economies” (NIEs) – South Korea, Singapore, Taiwan, and Hong Kong – led the “miracle of Asia” (Schuman 2009; Stubbs 2018). Now China and India, because of their scale, add and reinforce the economic centrality of Asia. From the point of view of international relations focusing especially on the maintenance of international order, the rise of China (in terms of its increasing influence on the global economy, politics, and security affairs) has stimulated discussion about whether Asia constitutes an opportunity for or threat to the United States (Allison 2017). Because the center of gravity has shifted back to Asia, the twenty-first century has been recognized as the Asian century (Khanna 2019). It is in this context that Asian Approaches to Peace have received considerable attention from scholars of peace and conflict studies.

The term Asian Approaches to Peace encompasses peace efforts (including peacemaking, peacekeeping, peacebuilding, development aid, and other modalities) carried out by Asian actors who operate under distinctive philosophies, epistemologies, and methodologies with different premises and objectives from those of the mainstream approaches led by the West. To capture the image featured by a series of uncoordinated and spontaneous peace efforts by Asian actors, a label “Eastphalian Peace” was introduced as opposed to the much more familiar term, “Westphalian Peace” (Uesugi and Richmond 2021). In the following, outstanding features of the “Eastphalian Peace” will be outlined as an example of Asian Approaches to Peace.

Westphalian Peace

The current international peace architecture is based on the norms and principles established as the Westphalian system, under which the inviolability of sovereign states is respected and every sovereign state is treated as equal (see section International Peace Architecture, Blockages and Counter-Peace). The United Nations, in essence, rests on this Westphalian foundation, albeit it incorporates other logics or operational procedures (e.g., the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) operates against the principle of sovereign equality and preserves the privileges of its permanent members). Nevertheless, in the aftermath of World War II, the United Nations, upholding the Westphalian principles, helped many subalterns in Asia and Africa to claim their self-determination and thus facilitated their decolonization process (see section Secession and Self-Determination). Because these newly independent sovereign states suffered from foreign intervention and colonization, the Westphalian principles of inviolability of sovereignty and non-intervention in internal affairs of other states were very appealing to leaders of the newly independent states, to the extent that they still adhere to and guard the Westphalian principles rigidly today.

Amid the Cold War, some newly independent states formed the “Non-Aligned Movement,” with China, India, and Indonesia among others playing an instrumental role, which in 1954 established the Five Principles of Peaceful Coexistence – (1) mutual respect for territorial integrity and sovereignty, (2) mutual nonaggression, (3) mutual noninterference in internal affairs, (4) equality and mutual benefit, and (5) peaceful coexistence – as mutually acceptable parameters. Likewise, the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN), one of the most outstanding regional organizations in Asia, also maintains these principles as the core values that dictate their diplomatic relationship. As safeguards against colonial interference or imperial intervention by major powers, Asian leaders such as Zhou Enlai (China), Jawaharlal Nehru (India), and Sukarno (Indonesia) declared these five doctrines, which resonated well with the Westphalian premises.

During the Cold War, the principle of non-interference in internal affairs of other states might have contributed to the rise of dictatorship, authoritarianism, or military junta in Asia, e.g., the Philippines, Indonesia, South Korea, North Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Thailand, and Myanmar, albeit some of them were defeated by popular democratic movements in their respective societies. Despite the fact that many countries in Asia were liberated (though maintaining authoritarian attributes), Asian leaders, organizations, and people still cling to the orthodox principle of the Westphalian order, from which Western liberals have departed since the end of the Cold War. While the current international peace architecture still stems from the Westphalian order, usurpation of the sovereignty of a failed, fragile, or rogue state by major powers or the United Nations has been legitimized and advocated by the Western liberals in the form of robust peacekeeping, peacebuilding, statebuilding, humanitarian intervention, and sanctions, all of which are also based on the founding liberal values of the United Nations. This liberal deviation from the principles of sovereign equality and nonintervention translated into cosmopolitan but inevitably intrusive policies and actions now entitled “Responsibility to Protect” (see section R2P and Prevention), safeguarding human rights, promoting democracy, and embracing nonstate actors such as civil society in the arena traditionally handled by states (see section Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation).

Liberal Interventionism

During the Cold War, the “Non-Aligned Movement” served as an alternative framework for countries that wished to distance themselves from the two superpowers or maintain a balanced policy between the two competing hegemon. In the aftermath of the Cold War, however, the “Non-Aligned Movement” lost its attraction and salience while continuing to exist with 120 member states (Munro 2020). Under the “Pax Americana,” a new world order was envisioned and the so-called “international community” led by the United States initiated the Gulf War in 1991, a concerted effort in response to the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq. The United Nations intervened in a civil war in Cambodia, brokering the Paris peace accord in 1991, which gave rise to an unprecedented United Nations Peacekeeping Operation (UNPKO) called the United Nations

Transitional Authority in Cambodia (UNTAC). UNTAC was given an executive mandate to govern the territory and people of Cambodia on behalf of the sovereign state for 18 months in 1992–1993. The international community also intervened in a series of civil wars which erupted from 1991 onward in former Yugoslavia, and in 1995 the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) conducted airstrikes on recalcitrant parties to enforce the Dayton peace agreement (see section NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding). There were setbacks in such interventionist approaches by the "international community," as peace enforcement attempts by the United Nations in a civil war in Somalia in 1992 could not bring about peace (see section War and Peace in Somalia), and the United Nations also failed to prevent the genocide in Rwanda in 1994, and the "ethnic cleansing" in Bosnia-Herzegovina in 1995 (see section UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia). Nevertheless, liberal interventionism prevailed; for example, the International Criminal Tribunal for former Yugoslavia was established (see section Transitional Justice in Bosnia and Herzegovina).

After the September 11 attack on the United States in 2001 (9/11), retaliatory military invasions by the United States and its allies took place in Afghanistan and Iraq. While these interventions were successful in overthrowing the Taliban regime in Afghanistan and the Saddam Hussein regime in Iraq, both societies continue to suffer from violence, and in the case of Iraq, the collapse of the regime paved the way for the rise of the "Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS)." In retrospect, the post-Cold War liberal interventionism that was later hijacked by the post-9/11 counterinsurgency and counterterrorism operations did not bring sustainable democracy nor prevalence of human rights to the above-mentioned societies in a manner that the "Liberal Peace" approach anticipated (see section Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order). These setbacks seem to have demonstrated the diminishing power (and interests in providing public goods) of the superpower, the United States (see section Human Rights and Peace). The relative decline of the hegemonic influence of the United States has coincided with the rise of China.

Decline of Liberal Peace and the Rise of Asia

Against this backdrop, a large number of critical scholars of peace and conflict studies scrutinized "Liberal Peace" norms and practices with an aim to improve them or search for alternatives. As a result, what later became known as a "local turn" was advocated in which national or local ownership was emphasized in peacebuilding as opposed to orthodox statebuilding approaches using a Western state model – democracy and the market economy – as a template and remedy for peacebuilding in non-Western contexts (Donais 2009, 2012; Lee 2019) (see section Local Peacebuilding). The local turn has become more sophisticated and has led to a number of academic discussions revolving around the concept of hybridity (Mac Ginty 2011; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013) (See section Hybrid Peacebuilding). The local and hybrid turns gave rise to a number of criticisms of "Liberal Peace" and offered suggestions for improving the theory and practice of peacebuilding (Uesugi et al. 2021). These contributions, while underlining the role of local agencies, contexts, and dynamics, have had a limited impact on a dominant discourse and architecture of peacebuilding as they have been dictated by geopolitics and neo-liberal geoeconomics.

Meanwhile, the sheer magnitude of influence exercised by growing powers in Asia has become no longer negligible. In addition to Japan and the Four Asian Tigers (aka the NIEs) that had already achieved exceptionally high economic growth during the Cold War, China, India, and the ASEAN states have also experienced skyrocketing economic development, after recovering from the "Asian financial crisis" of 1997. In terms of the world ranking of GDP in 2020, China is placed second (after the United States), followed by Japan (third), and India (fifth), embodying the Asian Century. While the United States is still the richest country in the world and the GDP of Europe as a whole still exceeds that of China, the economic power and potential of these Asian countries are enormous. Economists were forecasting this trend a long time ago, and likewise security experts in the United States were also warning that the rise of China could pose a considerable threat to the United States' hegemony in Asia and beyond (Mearsheimer 2003). In the last two decades, this view has begun to be shared by scholars and practitioners of development and peacebuilding, in the context of emerging powers or the BRICS (Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa) (Richmond and Tellidis 2013).

Developmental Peace

In the past, the Bretton Woods Institutions – the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund (IMF) – and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) have monopolized the standards and leading practice of development aid (see section Peacebuilding-Development Nexus). However, emerging powers in Asia, such as China and India, while receiving aid from the OECD members, do not have to follow the guidelines set by the OECD's Development Assistance Committee (DAC) when they extend their support to their fellow developing countries in Asia and Africa. In fact, they have opposed the OECD-DAC model and the use of aid as political interference (Lauria and Fumagalli 2019).

New international organizations – the Shanghai Cooperation Organisation (SCO) established in 2001 – and financial institutions – the New Development Bank (formerly referred to as the BRICS Development Bank) established in 2014, and the Asian Infrastructure Investment Bank (AIIB) established in 2016 – were formed by emerging powers, offering alternative channels to the conventional West/North-centric aid. Furthermore, foreign direct investment, trade, foreign aid, and other forms of “South-South Cooperation” were explored by emerging powers (BRICS, Turkey, Saudi Arabia, Indonesia, and others). These aim for a “win-win” partnership and a mutually beneficial relationship, an antithesis of unilateral aid which has created a donor-recipient structural hierarchy.

Japan and South Korea – the only two states in Asia admitted to the OECD-DAC – have followed the aid policy and model set by the OECD-DAC. At the same time, they also share distinctive strategic priorities: economic infrastructure development and production facilities (Stallings and Kim 2016). Both of them spend half of their official development assistance (ODA) on these two focus areas, while the other DAC donors spend less than a quarter (ibid.).

Major Asian economic powers – China, India, Japan, and South Korea – share a philosophy of international cooperation which values the idea of recipients taking the lead (self-help and demand-driven aid) (ibid.). For example, Japan defines aid as mutually beneficial cooperation, and Japan's ODA aims to promote the self-help and self-reliance of the aid-recipient society (Ogawa 2019). The strategy of major Asian actors is based on their similar development experience, in which the first tasks were increasing productive capacity and fostering the development of human capital (through technical assistance, capacity building, and scholarship), with strong public-sector leadership (ibid.).

Unlike Western aid-related government agencies such as the United States Agency for International Development and the United Kingdom's Department for International Development, governmental aid agencies in both Japan and South Korea – the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) and the Korea International Cooperation Agency (KOICA) – have included the term “cooperation” in their name to reflect their fundamental spirit of seeing foreign aid as “win-win cooperation.” The equivalent organization in China is the China International Development Cooperation Agency (CIDCA), and in India the Indian Agency for Partnership in Development (IAPD), initially to be called the India International Development Cooperation Agency (IIDA). These propensities in Asia symbolize their preference to see development assistance as “cooperation” or “partnership” between equal partners rather than charity (Gulrajani and Faure 2019).

Large scale infrastructure projects financed by “yen loan” and implemented by Japanese private companies have been spearheaded by Japan’s ODA. This is known as Japan’s “commercial aid” model of development assistance in which the trinity of aid-trade-investment has been established as an operational standard (Kondoh 2015). Having been the most significant beneficiary of Japan’s ODA for the last 40 years, China has followed in Japan’s footsteps and also holds up “win-win cooperation” (Yang 2019) as a basic philosophy of its development aid, called “developmental peace.”

Japan and South Korea have adopted the state-led “commercial aid” model, in which their international cooperation is channeled through the aid-recipient government of middle-income countries, albeit they often collaborated with NGOs in their own countries when delivering humanitarian assistance to low-income countries (Stallings and Kim 2016) (see section Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society). There are a number of vibrant NGOs in India dealing with India’s domestic, social, and economic issues, and civil society organizations in India have been instrumental in agenda setting and shaping India’s policy (Saran 2018). However, they have been focused on their domestic front, and the government of India has not relied on Indian NGOs when it has executed its overseas development projects (Mawdsley 2010). South-East Asian countries that experienced democratization or a people’s revolution such as the Philippines (against Marcos’s dictatorship) and Indonesia (against Suharto’s dictatorship) have powerful civil society organizations, and many of their leaders are elite in the society and embedded in the domestic politics of the respective country.

Peacekeeping

In the case of UNPKOs, Asian countries have contributed their troops and police officers with South Asian countries such as India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, and Nepal being major contributors (see sections Assessment of Peace Operations; Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations; Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations). As of 31 December 2020, of the contribution of 81,832 troops and police personnel to 22 UNPKOs (including Special Political Missions) worldwide, six Asian countries are ranked within the top ten contributors: Bangladesh contributing 6,798; Nepal 5,715; India 5,425; Pakistan 4,737; Indonesia 2,827; and China 2,520 (UN 2020).

The Western countries, especially the United States and the United Kingdom, preferred to mobilize their military alliances such as the NATO when they sought to enforce peace, instead of relying on UNPKOs, as seen in the cases of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo, Afghanistan, and Libya, or the coalition of the willing as in the case of the US-led invasion of Iraq (see sections United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo; Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo; Different Layers of Afghan Conflict; The Libyan Conflict). In contrast to tendencies in the West to circumvent the United Nations, what is noticeable in Asia is that the United Nations is still seen as the only legitimate organ in the international community that can authorize peace operations, let alone other types of foreign military intervention. For instance, China has maintained its position that any foreign military intervention must be carried out with the consent of the host government and the United Nations should be the only legitimate authority that can call for foreign military intervention (Zürcher 2019, 2020). Since China started contributing its troops to UNPKOs for the first time (to UNTAC in 1992), China has become the leading troop and police contributor to the UNPKOs among the Permanent Members of the UNSC.

Due to its constitutional and domestic constraints, Japan has put self-restraints on its military overseas deployment, and it has deployed mainly to UNPKOs such as the UNTAC, the United Nations Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISSET), and the United Nations Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS) (see sections Post-conflict Timor-Leste; UN Peacebuilding in Timor-Leste; Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan; UN Missions in Sudan/South Sudan). After major combat between the US Forces and the Iraqi Army ended in 2003, the Japanese government created a time-bound special measures law to legitimize the deployment of self-defense forces to the Multi-National Force-Iraq (MNF-I) by referring to the UNSC resolutions (678, 687, 1441, and 1483) as the presence of a relevant resolution was a prerequisite for such deployment. This practice embodies Japan's adherence to the United Nations as the sole legitimate body to grant foreign military intervention (see section UN Security Council and International Interventions). Although Japan has upgraded its commitment to peace, operations under the slogan of "proactive contribution to peace based on the principle of international cooperation" and the so called "Peace and Security Legislations" enacted in 2016 allow the Japanese government to send its troops to non-UN peace operations; Japan in principle continues to maintain its traditional and conservative posture, avoiding its engagement in enforcement actions (see section Use of Force in Peace Operations).

Summary

Asian Approaches to Peace, which were outlined in the above discussion, comparing "Eastphalian Peace" with "Liberal Peace," have two shared features. First, they are based on the Westphalian principles, from which the Western liberal approach has already deviated. Second, while the primary agencies in Asian Approaches to Peace are public actors such as the state and thus their endeavors have the characteristic of "state-centricity" (Howe 2018), private entities, the state-owned enterprises (SOE) in the case of China, are also closely intertwined with the state-led efforts. These place emphasis on economic infrastructure development and are usually characterized as the trinity of aid, trade, and investment (Fukuda-Parr and Shiga 2016; Shimomura and Wang 2015). With the rise of Asia and the emergence of an alternative "Eastphalian Peace," Western "liberal" deviations will be pulled back, and interventionist developmental practices will be replaced by the recipient-led approaches adhering to Westphalian principles, with an emphasis on economic development that can foster mutual gains. Such features have led "Eastphalian Peace" to be characterized as the perfection of Westphalian principles (Ginsburg 2010).

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo
- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia
- ▶ UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)
- ▶ UN Peacebuilding in Timor-Leste
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

References

- Allison, G. (2017). Destined for war: Can America and China Escape Thucydides's trap? Houghton Mifflin Harcourt.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Luck, E. C. (2018). The responsibility to protect: From promise to practice. Polity.
- Donais, T. (2009). Empowerment or imposition? Dilemmas of local ownership in post-conflict peacebuilding processes. Peace and Change, 34(1), 3–26.
- Donais, T. (2012). Peacebuilding and local ownership: Post-conflict consensus-building. New York: Routledge.
- Evans, G. (2009). The responsibility to protect: Ending mass atrocity crimes once and for all. Brookings Institution Press.
- Fukuda-Parr, S., & Shiga, H. (2016). Normative framing of development cooperation: Japanese Bilateral Aid between the DAC and Southern Donors (JICA-RI Working Paper, No. 130). Tokyo: JICA Research Institute.
- Gandhi, M. K. (2019). The power of nonviolent resistance: Selected writings. Penguin Classics.
- Ginsburg, T. (2010). Eastphalia as the perfection of Westphalia. Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, 17(1), 27–45.
- Gulrajani, N., & Faure, R. (2019). Donors in transition and the future of development cooperation: What do the data from Brazil, India, China and South Africa reveal? Public Administration and Development, 39(4-5), 231–244.
- Howe, B. (2018). State-centric challenges to human-centered governance. In B. Howe (Ed.), National security, statecentricity, and governance in East Asia (pp. 1–14). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Khanna, P. (2019). The future is Asian: Commerce, conflict, and culture in the 21st century. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Kondoh, H. (2015). Convergence of aid models in emerging donors? Learning processes, norms and identities, and recipients (JICA-RI Working Paper, No. 106). Tokyo: JICA Research Institute.
- Lauria, V., & Fumagalli, C. (2019). BRICS, the Southern Model and the evolving landscape of development assistance: Toward a new taxonomy. Public Administration and Development, 39(4-5), 215–230.
- Lee, S. (2019). Local ownership in Asian peacebuilding: Development of local peacebuilding models. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Mawdsley, E. (2010). Non-DAC donors and the changing landscape of foreign aid: the (in)significance of India's development cooperation with Kenya. Journal of Eastern African Studies, 4(2), 361–379, <https://doi.org/10.1080/17531055.2010.487345>
- Mearsheimer, J. J. (2003). The tragedy of great power politics. New York/London: W. W. Norton & Company.
- Munro, A. (2020). Non-aligned movement. Encyclopedia Britannica. 18 February. <https://www.britannica.com/topic/Non-Aligned-Movement>. Accessed 20 Feb 2021.
- Ogawa, H. (2019). Normality of international norms power, interests, and knowledge in Japan's ODA politics. Journal of International Development Studies, 28(3), 5–18.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. Oxon/New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P., & Tellidis, I. (2013). The BRICS and international peacebuilding and statebuilding. NOREF Report.
- Saran, S. (2018). India's role in a liberal post-western world. The International Spectator, 53(1), 92–108, <https://doi.org/10.1080/03932729.2018.1396433>
- Schuman, M. (2009). The miracle: The epic story of Asia's Quest for wealth. HarperCollins e-books.
- Shimomura, Y., & Wang, P. (2015). Chains of knowledge creation and emerging donors (JICA-RI Working Paper, No. 88). Tokyo: JICA Research Institute.
- Stallings, B., & Kim, E. M. (2016). Japan, Korea, and China: Styles of ODA in East Asia. In H. Kato, J. Page, & Y. Shimomura (Eds.), Japan's development assistance: Foreign aid and the post-2015 agenda (pp. 120–134). Basingstoke/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Stubbs, R. (2018). Rethinking Asia's economic miracle: The political economy of war, prosperity and crisis (2nd ed.). London: Palgrave.
- Uesugi, Y. (Ed.). (2020). Hybrid peacebuilding in Asia. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Uesugi, Y., and Richmond, O. P. (2021). The western international peace architecture and the emergence of the Eastphalian peace. Global Society. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13600826.2021.1942803>
- Uesugi, Y., Deekeling, A., Umeyama, S. S., McDonald-Colbert, L. Eds. (2021). Operationalisation of hybrid peacebuilding in Asia. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- United Nations Peacekeeping. (2020). Troop and police contributors. <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/troop-and-police-contributors>
- Yang, D. (2019). Win–Win cooperation. In C. Fang & P. Nolan (Eds.), Routledge Handbook of the belt and road (pp. 257–262). Oxon/New York: Routledge.
- Zürcher, C. (2019). 30 years of Chinese peacekeeping. CIPS, University of Ottawa.
- Zürcher, C. (2020). China as a peacekeeper—Past, present, and future. International Journal: Canada's Journal of Global Policy Analysis, 75(2), 123–143.

Assessment of Peace Operations

Paul F. Diehl¹ and Daniel Druckman^{2,3,4}

¹University of Texas-Dallas, Richardson, TX, USA

²George Mason University, Arlington, VA, USA

³Macquarie University, Sydney, NSW, Australia

⁴University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Synonyms

Evaluation; Multiple missions; Multiple operations; Outcomes; Peacebuilding; Peacekeeping

Description

Valid assessments of peace operations are essential for policymakers designing effective strategies and actions. Yet accurate evaluations can be difficult and are compounded by several limitations. This chapter begins with a specification of various considerations that go into the process of creating benchmarks or criteria for success and failure in peace operations: (1) multiple operations, (2) multiple missions, (3) multiple stakeholders, (4) time frames, and (5) baselines. Following this is a brief overview of the primary approaches used in analysis for determining peace operation success; these focus on limiting violence and are assessed by reference to any renewal of warfare and civilian casualties, among other indicators. Finally, the chapter explores some alternatives that go beyond the modal approaches. These deal with other peace operation missions such as the delivery of humanitarian assistance and election supervision.

Introduction

In analyses of peace operations, whether scholarly or policy-making, the central concern has been with if, when, and how they work (or not).

Accordingly, much of the focus has been on the independent or causal factors (e.g., force size, conflict context, peacebuilding strategy) affecting peace operation success. Much less attention has been given to the dependent or outcome variables that define and measure success. Nevertheless, the benchmarks against how we assess peace operation success are critical in developing scholarly generalizations and policymaking adaptations. Defined incorrectly or too narrowly, success assessments might draw myopic or incorrect conclusions about the consequences of peace operations. Equally important, the factors that promote peace operation success on one dimension might be irrelevant or even counterproductive if success is judged according to different criteria; such a circumstance could lead to negative policy decisions.

This article considers questions concerning how peace operations are assessed. It begins with a specification of various considerations that go into the process of creating benchmarks or criteria for success and failure in peace operations. Following this is a brief overview of the primary approaches used in analysis for determining peace operation success. Finally, we discuss some alternatives that go beyond the modal approaches (see also Caplan 2019).

Considerations in Peace Operation Success

Evaluating peace operations might appear to be a simple process, but there are a series of considerations that analysts must address in making judgments.

Multiple Operations

Typically, peace operations are assessed in isolation of other efforts directed at the same goal. In fact, however, a given peace operation can be related to other operations deployed simultaneously or sequentially in the same conflict. Some peace operations such as the United Nations (UN) and Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) cooperation and codeployment in operations in Sierra Leone and Liberia suggest that analysts cannot look at operations separately in making judgments on success; the actions of one organization influence the other (Balas 2011). In addition, some conflicts experience multiple peace operations in sequence. For example, there have been eight UN operations in Haiti over several decades. The actions and prior success/failure of the preceding operations influence the outcomes of succeeding ones, and thus some consideration of the nonindependence of cases is required. There is also the consideration that multiple organizations conduct peace operations; whereas the UN still conducts a plurality of them, many other agents (e.g., regional organizations, multinational coalitions) collectively represent a majority, and how one analyzes those operations must be adjusted accordingly (Diehl and Balas 2014).

Diehl and Druckman (2010) identified a series of other dimensions of evaluation decisions, and these are addressed in the sections to follow.

Multiple Missions

Peace operations now conduct a variety of different missions, ranging from traditional cease-fire monitoring to election supervision to peacebuilding tasks such as promoting the rule of law and fostering local security or security sector reform (SSR). Indeed, the average operation in the post-Cold War era involves almost five different missions (Diehl and Druckman 2018). Fundamentally, different kinds of missions require, at least in part, different criteria for evaluating success.

The standards used for success and the associated need to be specific to the mission's goals. For example, if the mission is cease-fire monitoring and therefore the goal is to contain violence, assessments might examine violence levels in the area of deployment and measure the number of casualties both for members of the disputing parties and for the peace force. If, however, another mission of the operation deals with civilian protection and the goal is to protect human rights, a key concern is whether atrocities have been reduced or genocidal incidents avoided. The bottom line is that assessments will need to be multifaceted and reflective of the missions that peacekeepers are asked to perform.

Stakeholders in Peace Operations

When analyzing peacekeeping success, the question arises: success for whom? Although rarely addressed in total, there are several sets of stakeholders in peace operations, each of which might generate different standards for success: the international community, states contributing personnel, the primary disputing states or groups, and the local population. Success for one stakeholder might not be translated to the same benefits for another, and indeed the outcome might be the opposite. For example, successful cease-fire monitoring might benefit the disputant that has seized control of a given geographic area but disadvantage the population living in that area who are subject to human rights violations committed by that disputant. There needs to be recognition that success is defined in different ways by the various stakeholders with political and economic interests in the same operation. The issue of multiple stakeholders with different interests arises with regard to a large variety of evaluation research projects (Druckman 2005).

Time Frame

Defining success also involves a decision on whether one adopts a short- versus long-term perspective (or both). From a short-term perspective, this could be the achievement of goals during the course of a peace operation or in some time frame immediately following the withdrawal of the peacekeeping force. An illustration could be the improvement of medical conditions during a humanitarian operation. Short-term, it is often easiest to tie the actions of the peace operation to the observed outcome in a causal sense. This can be accomplished with an interrupted time series analysis where the interruption is the point where the peacekeepers exit the operation.

Assessing peace operations from a long-term perspective generally means looking at conditions for more than a few years after the operation, even as much as a few decades. The assumption is that many of their effects are only evident many years in the future. This is necessary for particular missions carried out by the peace operation, such as those promoting larger societal changes such as the rule of law or democratization. These are generally long-term processes that require assessments that are only apparent in the long run and when outcomes have stabilized. For example, various peacekeeping efforts in East Timor were almost universally considered a success in the immediate aftermath, only to prompt a reassessment when violence and instability returned in 2006. Similarly, reassessments are needed to take account of the recent eruptions of violence in Mozambique and in Nagorno-Karabakh about 20 years after the agreements were signed (1992 and 1994, respectively).

Two concerns arise in making long-term assessments. First is determining how long a window should be considered in evaluating outcomes; too long or too short time frames each raise their own validity problems. Second, the longer the time period that passes between the end of the operation and the assessment, the more difficult it will be to draw causal conclusions about the impact of the operation per se; intervening forces are likely to have as great or greater impact on future conditions than the peace operations.

Different standards are appropriate for short- and long-term success. For example, slowing refugee flows is a short-term indicator of success, whereas refugee repatriation is a process more appropriate for long-term evaluation. Short-term assessments are often useful to policymakers in order to make adjustments in an ongoing operation. Long-term outcomes better serve policy planners for the future.

Baseline

Implicitly, assessments of peace operations consider outcomes in comparison to a baseline; in practice, this means determining whether the situation during or after a peace operation is better than a referent standard. The choice of that baseline, however, can have a dramatic effect on whether the final judgment is success or failure. One comparison is against a situation in which no action was taken, what can be called the “better than nothing” or “absence-based” standard.

Unfortunately, peace operations can automatically be regarded as successful for any improvement in the situation, and intervention choices are also rarely between only peace operations and inaction.

Another standard for evaluation is comparing peace operations to other policy alternatives. This assumes an accurate list of alternative policies. Even then, many of these options are not mutually exclusive, and thus it is difficult to determine the extent to which the selection of the peace operation option affected other choices on the decision-making menu. There is also the problem of making an accurate counter-factual or scenario-based analysis of what would have happened if other alternatives had been selected. Would systemic war crimes of rape in the Congo been avoided if France and the United States launched military action or a team of mediators from African states had been sent to the country? Analysts might need to compare different alternatives across cases, some with peace operations and others with alternatives, assuming that such cases are comparable. Guidelines for making these comparisons can be found in the literature on structured focused comparisons (George and Bennett 2005).

Another standard is one in which the conditions prior to deployment are compared to those during and following the operation, a “before versus after,” pretest-posttest, or interrupted time series design. This standard has the advantage of making comparisons across missions possible or “normalizing” the baseline, as moderate levels of violence during peacekeeping might be considered progress in some contexts (e.g., deployment during full-scale civil war) but backsliding in others (e.g., deployment following a cease-fire).

A final baseline of effectiveness is achieved by comparing effectiveness across peace operations, a cross-sectional rather than longitudinal comparison, or what is referred to as “benchmarking.” This approach generates only relative or comparative assessments. A relatively successful operation might still have significant flaws, which are masked when the baseline is composed largely of failed missions. A variation would be to use the most successful operation or an ideal type as an aspirational benchmark, but this assures, almost by definition, that most operations will fall short.

Complicating all assessments is that peace operations are disproportionately sent to the most serious or violence-prone conflicts. This selection bias increases the difficulty of making progress for peace operations and makes comparisons to alternative lesser conflicts invalid.

Assessing Peace Operations in Practice

Various organizations such as the UN have units dedicated to “lessons learned,” and scholarly research on peace operation outcomes is extensive. Most conclude that “peacekeeping works” (Di Salvatore and Ruggeri 2017; Sandler 2017; Fortna 2008), although this is not an unqualified assessment. Nevertheless, these conclusions are largely a function of the criteria used to evaluate effectiveness, even as the judgments are valid. Overwhelmingly, the approach has been to focus on the cease-fire monitoring and missions related to the limitation of violence; this is usually done to the exclusion of other missions. Many studies have developed indicators for monitoring violence abatement following cease-fire agreements (e.g., Fortna 2008; Mullenbach 2005). There are several good reasons for this emphasis. First, early peacekeeping operations had this as a primary mandate, and even as peacekeeping has evolved into peacebuilding, those missions have retained their centrality. Second, from a causal standpoint, it is likely that success in limiting violence is a prerequisite (although not a guarantee) of success in other missions such as delivering humanitarian assistance and supervising democratic elections. Finally, indicators and data are more readily available for violence-related goals than for other missions such as building civil society.

Various indicators are used to assess whether peace operations are successful in limiting violence. Most common is the concept of “peace duration” or the time from the deployment of the peace operation to the outbreak of the next serious violence incident (this often is the onset of a new civil or interstate war between the disputants, but one could adopt many different severity thresholds). The longer the period of time to the next conflict, the more successful the peace operation is said to be. If “robust” peacekeeping operations are sent to contexts of active wars, duration could be measured from the time of deployment to the end of significant violence. The stakeholder(s) for this benchmark is unclear, although there seems to be an implicit assumption that all of them benefit from the preventing or, in the case of spoilers, renewing violent conflict. Similarly, assessments of whether the conflict has spread or diffused to other areas of the country or neighboring states are also a general standard for effectiveness (Pushkina 2006; O’Neill and Rees 2005).

More specific to individual stakeholders are counts of casualties during the peace operation deployment. One type is peacekeeper deaths during deployment, getting at some of the interests of troop contributing states but also indirectly indicating support for the operation among the disputants and general levels of violence in the area. Civilian casualties have more recently been a measure of peace operation effectiveness, indicating a UN priority in mandates. This also reflects some concern with the local populations as those vested in outcomes as well as a difference between the country sponsoring the mission and the country hosting the peacekeepers.

In most cases, there is a cross-sectional and sometimes temporal comparison of violence propensity in the peace operations. That is, analyses try to specify the conditions under which the same operation is more successful (which months or years) or which operations are more successful relative to the others based on certain factors (e.g., force size).

To the extent that peacekeepers keep the disputing parties apart, in order to prevent recurrences of violence, the force may be more effective in managing than in resolving the conflict. A question of interest is how can peace operations make progress toward resolving the underlying sources of the conflict? This is the more difficult challenge. It entails designing a peace (or negotiation) process that makes progress toward a durable peace. (See Druckman and Wagner 2019, for an approach as well as indicators of peace outcomes.)

Assessing other missions beyond violence abatement is less common. There are some suggested evaluation questions relating to mission goals and numerous possible indicators (see Diehl and Druckman 2010), but in most cases these have not been applied empirically and therefore remain hypothetical (an exception is Druckman and Diehl 2013). These missions generally fall under the rubric of peacebuilding and therefore take place in a post-conflict context in which a peace agreement exists and the operation is charged with a number of duties beyond truce supervision.

Evaluations of election supervision missions examine whether the peace operation could facilitate “free and fair” elections, and most often have a short-term orientation; indicators include the percentage of those eligible registering and turning out to vote in the initial election. Longer-term assessments of democratization effects operate from a more holistic perspective of the political system and take an extended view, considering democratic processes after a designated time period (range of 2–10 years is most common) after the peace operation (see the Freedom House yearly updates of indicators of democracy and good governance).

Other evaluations could focus on short-term missions such as delivering humanitarian assistance (indicated by volume of deliveries, reductions in suffering, and other indicators) or disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR – measured by among other things the volume of weapons collected and number of militias disbanded). Longer-term peacebuilding missions, including (re)establishing local security, governance, and the rule of law, are effectively designed to strengthen the state. Evaluations are often made according to standards for legal infrastructure and benchmarks for delivering basic government services; these can be evaluated at various short- and long-term junctures. More difficult is considering whether peace operations facilitate economic development and well-being (see Beber et al. 2019); these are best seen in long-range perspectives, but there are many factors other than peace operations that are likely to have a greater impact on the economy. Further, there is evidence showing that economic growth following peace agreements lags behind security and governance reforms. This is due to a reluctance to invest in the formerly war-torn society until the banks become stable, a process that often takes as many as 8 years (O’Reilly 2014). In many peacebuilding assessments, the stakeholder is in the form of the central state, as this is often the focus of the so-called liberal peace model (Richmond 2011). Nevertheless, there is now increasing concern with local effects of peace operations and the population most directly impacted by operations.

Shifting the locus of assessment to the local populations does more than change the level of analysis; it also leads analysts to ask different questions and make different judgments. Firchow (2018) considers some of the same evaluation dimensions as those studies at higher levels – security, human rights, development, and social – but conceptually they are different as are the indicators used in evaluation. Considering “Everyday Peace” first means using participation rates of the local population in peacebuilding as a standard for assessment. The perceptions of the local populations are also critical in determining the level of peace achieved by peace operations. Thus, perceptions of local security and safety and whether locals are involved in community groups are among many different indicators of peace. The local approach is more focused on positive peace aspects, such as access to education, medical care, and clean water. Not all of these can be directly tied back to the peace operation, but they do provide a more all-inclusive picture of success for those who live in areas where peace operations were deployed (although everyday indicators could be applied to any society). The focus on the local level also means that assessments will rely extensively on surveys and focus groups rather than the aggregate data (e.g., number of casualties) that are employed for valuations involving other stakeholders. This makes it more difficult to construct “just in time” assessments and is considerably more labor intensive than other approaches.

Evaluations of peace operations typically look at the mandates and missions given to the operations by the authorizing organizations. In one sense, this is logical given that operations are assessed on what they were asked to achieve. On the other hand, this potentially misses other outcomes of interest that go beyond the formal assignments given the operation. Some have labelled these as “unintended consequences,” from the perspective of the mandate provisions (Aoi et al. 2007), and the negative ones are usually the ones identified. Most prominent have been the sexual abuse and exploitation perpetrated by peacekeeping soldiers (Nordas and Rustad 2013). Analysts have also considered how peace operations have affected local economies, civil-military relations, and the like. Additional impacts, including those with respect to refugees, terrorism, infant mortality, crime and inequality, are widely analyzed but not with respect to peace operations (Di Salvatore and Ruggeri 2017). These are most often from the perspective of local population stakeholders, but outcomes can also be felt for the countries that contribute the troops. Thus, scholars and policymakers need to look beyond mandates to understand the impact of peace operations and therefore to make comprehensive assessments. A more holistic approach to assessment, perhaps along the lines of dynamical systems models, would be appropriate (see Diehl and Druckman 2018).

Conclusion

In this article we addressed the challenges posed by assessments of the effectiveness of peace operations. It should be apparent to the reader that this is a task fraught with difficulties. It is no longer the case that peace operations have an exclusive goal of reducing violence and upholding the provisions of cease-fire agreements. Modern peacekeepers deployed in any country ravaged by war conduct multiple operations and missions. For the evaluator this complexity presents challenges for assessing impacts on the conflict or population: Which operation and missions had the key impacts on the post-conflict events? Added to this dilemma are the various stakeholders with interests in the way the conflict is managed or resolved. These interests may clash, particularly with regard to the host and sponsoring countries as well as the local populations. Thus, the question is effectiveness for which group or constituency?

Additional assessment considerations are time frames and baselines. Some missions, such as violence abatement, can be evaluated over the short term (in months), but they can also be judged over a longer time period of years. On the other hand, the more ambitious goal of societal change, such as democratization or creating a rule of law, can only be appraised over a long period of time. The long-term assessments make it difficult to attribute cause to the peace operation per se.

Peace operations can be treated as case studies and understood within their own context. Alternatively, they can be understood in relation to other, largely comparable, operations. The former may consist of a longitudinal or time series analysis in which change is traced over the course of unfolding historical events. The latter entails a cross-sectional evaluation in which different country operations, usually over a similar time period, are compared. Both approaches address the question: compared to what? Both types of comparisons are valuable and can be used in a complementary fashion.

More ambitious evaluations search for evidence of conflict resolution, in which former combatants consider the sources of their conflict. Although relatively rare, this is a gold standard for effectiveness and prevention of further conflict. It merges with peacebuilding activities. Monitoring the progress made toward achieving this aspiration would be useful. One approach is to design holistic programs following the discussion by Diehl and Druckman (2018) and elsewhere.

There is little doubt that we are no longer in an evaluation culture that strives for bottom-line results on easily measurable outcomes. The new world of peace operations alerts us to a need for developing more complex architectures for judging progress in the various missions deployed by international organizations and countries around the world.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

References

- Aoi, C., de Coning, C., & Thakur, R. (2007). Unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations. Hong Kong: United Nations University Press.
- Balas, A. (2011). It takes two (or more) to keep the peace: Multiple simultaneous peace operations. Journal of International Peacekeeping, 15(3–4), 384–421.
- Beber, B., Gilligan, M. J., Guardado, J., & Karim, S. (2019). The promise and peril of peacekeeping economies. International Studies Quarterly, 63(2), 364–379.
- Caplan, R. (2019). Measuring peace: Principles, practices, and politics. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Di Salvatore, J. & Ruggeri, A. (2017). Effectiveness of peacekeeping operations. Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics. <https://doi.org/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.013.586>.
- Diehl, P. F., & Balas, A. (2014). Peace operations (2nd ed.). Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Diehl, P. F., & Druckman, D. (2010). Evaluating peace operations. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Diehl, P. F., & Druckman, D. (2018). Multiple peacekeeping missions: Analyzing the interdependence of peace operation missions and outcomes. International Peacekeeping, 25(1), 28–51.
- Druckman, D. (2005). Doing research: Methods of inquiry for conflict analysis. Thousand Oaks: Sage.
- Druckman, D., & Diehl, P. F. (Eds.). (2013). Peace operation success: A comparative analysis. Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.
- Druckman, D., & Wagner, L. (2019). Justice matters: Peace negotiations, stable agreements, and durable peace. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 63(2), 287–316.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Fortna, V. P. (2008). Does peacekeeping work? Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- George, A. L., & Bennett, A. (2005). Case studies and theory development in the social sciences. Cambridge: MIT Press.
- Mullenbach, M. (2005). Deciding to keep peace: An analysis of international influences on the establishment of third-party peacekeeping missions. International Studies Quarterly, 49(3), 529–555.
- Nordas, R., & Rustad, S. C. A. (2013). Sexual exploitation and abuse by peacekeepers: Understanding variation. International Interactions, 39(4), 511–534.
- O'Neill, J. P., & Rees, N. (2005). United Nations peacekeeping in the post-Cold War era. London: Routledge.
- O'Reilly, C. (2014). Investments and institutions in post-civil war recovery. Comparative Economic Studies, 56(1), 1–24.
- Pushkina, D. (2006). A recipe for success?: Ingredients of a successful peacekeeping operation. International Peacekeeping, 13(2), 133–149.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Sandler, T. (2017). International peacekeeping operations: Burden sharing and effectiveness. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 61(9), 1875–1897.

Assistance

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Asymmetrical Warfare

Alejandro Chehtman

Universidad Torcuato Di Tella, Buenos Aires, Argentina

Definition

Although asymmetrical warfare has been part of nonconventional warfare for much of human history, it has become increasingly prevalent in recent times. This entry argues that this form of warfare is characterized, first and foremost, by significant material asymmetries between belligerents, both in terms of number of troops and most significantly in terms of the vast technological differences between belligerents. Yet this type of conflict is also characterized by four additional albeit related asymmetries, namely, asymmetrical strategies, asymmetrical status, asymmetrical moral standing, and asymmetrical weapons systems. These features have further entailed that this type of conflict blurs the traditional borders separating war from peacetime, war from crime, combatants from civilians, and even traditional geographical borders. Finally, this entry examines the deep legal, ethical, and strategic challenges that asymmetrical warfare creates.

Introduction

It is often suggested that there has recently been a shift in the paradigm of war. Most contemporary wars are described as “new” (Kaldor 1999), “fourth-generation” or “nonlinear” wars (Paul 1994), “borderless” wars (Chayes 2015), as well as increasingly asymmetrical wars. These notions point to different ways in which these new scenarios diverge from conventional warfare which, at least in modern times, has been typically a geographically circumscribed armed conflict between professional, armed state forces with somewhat comparable firepower. In them, each belligerent engages the enemy forces directly and generally pursues geopolitical interests, and all parties, at least recently, acknowledge that fighting is regulated by the laws of armed conflict (LOAC) or international humanitarian law (IHL). Against this general framework, asymmetrical warfare captures a type of violent struggle that differs in concrete and relevant ways from this type of conventional wars by opposing belligerents that are to be considered asymmetrical in terms of their material and technological capacities, their normative or legal status, the way in which they engage each other, and the objectives they pursue. These wars are typically associated with guerrilla tactics, terrorism, targeted killings, torture, information warfare, and the threat of use of weapons of mass destruction (Metz 2001).

As a form of nonconventional warfare, however, it is not particularly new. Although conceptualization of asymmetrical warfare is fairly recent (Metz 2001), forms of asymmetrical warfare, at least as parts of hybrid wars, have been identified as far back as the Peloponnesian War in the fifth century BC and the conquest of Germania in 9 AD (Mansoor 2012; Lacey 2012, respectively). In any event, asymmetrical wars have attracted an enormous amount of scholarly and policy attention over the last 20 years. Furthermore, its use as an analytical tool has expanded and is currently crucial in law, IR, philosophy, and military studies. There is, as a result, a certain amount of disagreement about its precise conceptual contours.

One influential definition of asymmetrical warfare goes as follows: “[i]n the realm of military affairs and national security, asymmetry is acting, organizing, and thinking differently than opponents in order to maximize one’s own advantages, exploit an opponent’s weaknesses, attain the initiative, or gain greater freedom of action. It can be political-strategic, military strategic, or a combination of these. It can entail different methods, technologies, values, organizations, time perspectives, or some combination of these. It can be short-term or long-term. It can be deliberate or by default. It can be discrete or pursued in combination with symmetric approaches. It can have both psychological and physical dimensions” (Metz & Johnson 2001). Similarly, it is generally accepted that it covers the whole spectrum of war, from the tactical to the operational and strategic levels (Schmitt 2007). These approaches indicate, at the very least, the broad, all-encompassing character of this notion and its increasing significance in the twenty-first-century warfare.

Nevertheless, it is worth trying to provide greater conceptual precision in terms of the defining features of asymmetrical warfare and its implications. This entry shall delve into the specific asymmetries that characterize this type of warfare (Section “Different Forms of Asymmetry”) and the challenges these features raise legally, ethically, and doctrinally (Section “Key Challenges Posed by Asymmetrical Warfare”).

Different Forms of Asymmetry

Several key features have been identified as embodying the nature of asymmetrical warfare. Perhaps the prevailing one is the significant disparity in power between opposing actors in a conflict. As suggested by Benvensiti & Cohen (2014), discipline and training around legal regulation has allowed states to amass huge numbers of troops, by contrast to insurgent and non-state organizations, based on familial, societal, or ideological relationships. Furthermore, it increasingly seems that the large technological gap between belligerents is significantly more decisive than the numerical gap between them. These differences may obtain also between countries. Most brutally, during parts of the twenty-first century, US military expenditure was expected to equal that of the whole of the rest of the world put together (Price Waterhouse Cooper 2005). Accordingly, Brazil, Venezuela, and other emerging countries have provided for asymmetrical conflict strategies as official policy in respect of potential conflicts with greater powers (e.g., Brazil's National Defense Strategy 2010).

Furthermore, material asymmetries entail further broad forms of relevant asymmetry between belligerents. First, asymmetrical fighting has serious implications in terms of the strategic goals pursued and the tactics favored (Malis 2012). As clearly put by Mao Tse-Tung, "defeat is the invariable outcome where native forces fight with inferior weapons against modernized forces on the latter's terms" (cited in Mack 1975, emphasis in the original). As a result, stronger and weaker states seek to fight each one on its own terms. Arreguín-Toft (2001) has conceptualized this insight through the comparison of direct approaches that "target the adversary's armed forces in order to destroy the adversary's capacity to fight," against indirect approaches that seek to undermine the adversary's will to fight. On this basis, he has influentially argued that weaker parties increase their chance of defeating stronger ones when they resort to opposite-approach strategic interactions, namely, when they use an indirect form of defense, such as guerrilla warfare, against a direct form of attack, such as the blitzkrieg form of attack, or when they use direct attacks against indirect ones. Such increase in the chances of winning – it has been plausibly suggested – has significantly to do with the capacity of opposite-approach interactions to lengthen the war and exploit stronger powers frequent political vulnerability vis-à-vis this type of armed conflict. By contrast, stronger parties reportedly win more often when they adopt same-approach interactions (although sometimes, they are politically too costly to pursue).

Accordingly, asymmetric warfare creates incentives to resort to certain means and methods of warfare. Dominant strategies in asymmetrical warfare include terrorism, guerrilla warfare, and use of human shields for the weaker party and rendition and illegal interrogation – usually amounting to torture – indiscriminate attacks, as well as targeted killing operations for the stronger side. An underappreciated implication of these strategies is that these strategies often involve lower levels of killings than in conventional wars. As Gross (2012) illustrates, "Communists fighting the British in Malaya between 1948 and 1960 killed fewer than three thousand civilians during their 12-year insurrection before giving it up (...). In Kenya, the Mau Mau insurgency's (1952–60) highly publicized attacks on British and Asian civilians took about 60 lives, but thousands more among African civilians who supported British policy . . . while IRA and Palestinian guerrillas (since 2000) have taken fewer than one thousand civilian lives in their respective struggles." This feature of asymmetrical war is related to the fact that it often entails a fight for legitimacy and influence over the relevant populations (Malis 2012), rather than an attempt to directly claim territory. Doctrines of counterinsurgency and counterterrorism – popular in asymmetrical warfare – are construed largely with this aim in mind.

Second, asymmetrical warfare involves a broad variety of actors, with very different legal and normative status. Schmitt (2007) captures this feature by reference to US involvement in Iraq: "There are more contractors in Iraq today than all non-US Coalition forces combined. At the same time, consider the variety of forces facing the Coalition: the regular army, Republican Guards; Special Republic Guards; Fedayeen Saddam paramilitary forces; civilians impressed into services; groups led by tribal leaders whose authority was at risk; religious zealots fighting the Christians; those who wanted a political voice (Sadr and his Mahdi Army); those who had a relative killed, wounded or insulted during the fighting; foreign jihadists; and pure criminals." In his recent novel Limónov, Carrere (2013) further illustrates this colorfully by referring to those participating in the wars in the Balkans during the 1990s: “the hordes of young farmers thrilled to have a drink while shooting their guns, soon were joined by all sorts of football hooligans, petty and big criminals, genuine psychopaths, foreign mercenaries, Russian Slavophiles who arrived to defend orthodoxy (with the Serbs), neo-Nazis nostalgic for Ustaše (with the Croats), and jihadists. . .” fighting with Muslims from Bosnia.

There are also vast differences in the political economy of each of these groups. That is, whereas in conventional wars, belligerents are funded through a centralized economy, in asymmetrical wars, these state forces often fight groups that need to resort to pillage, kidnappings, the traffic of illicit substances, as well as voluntary/ideological financial assistance to fund their forces. Others still act, serving as proxies for a state (Chayes 2015).

This wide variety of participants encompasses a large variety of drives and motivations. Kaldor (1999) emphasizes the relevance of identity politics in many asymmetrical wars; others highlight religious fanaticism, financial gain, as well as an organization often based on familial and societal relationships, rather than the brutal discipline of professional armies (Murray 2012). Crucially, this form of asymmetry reinforces the sense in which asymmetrical warfare is considered to be blurring the distinction between soldiers and criminals. In Neff’s (2005) words, “[t]roughout the whole of human history, the soldier and the murderer . . . had always been seen to be playing very different deadly games, governed by very different sets of rules” (emphasis in the original). This is hardly how belligerents perceive each other in contemporary asymmetrical conflicts.

Third, and relatedly, asymmetrical warfare is conducted between morally or normatively asymmetrical belligerents. They are often conceived as traditional just wars, as law enforcement much like ordinary crime fighting. Examples of this abound; they go from the US expedition against Pancho Villa in 1916–1917 to the so-called war on terror. That is, unlike the majority of situations in conventional wars, belligerents in asymmetrical warfare typically have very different claims or justifications for fighting. Many states attribute guilt or culpability to non-state actors, guerrilla, or terrorist organizations and generally label them as criminals or at least unlawful combatants, while non-state groups characterize state armed forces as oppressors or infidels with no legitimate claim to be there, let alone to fight. As we shall see in the following section, this has important legal and moral implications. Because more and more conflicts are portrayed as fights between aggressive villains rather than “honorable foes or brothers in arms” (Gross 2012), the treatment of enemy fighters and even civilians varies significantly in terms of the rights and protections afforded to them. This moral asymmetry often entails also a rejection of neutrality, as well as supports the belief that the winning party will pass stern judgment, often through criminal prosecutions and punishment, over the losing one (Neff 2005).

Fourth, asymmetrical wars are characterized by the employment of certain types of weapons that are related to its dominant strategic aims. Remotely piloted aircraft systems or drones constitute an incremental though crucial tool to fight an enemy in both remote and densely populated areas. Nonlethal or less lethal weapons are also useful if stronger parties are to fight belligerents that hide behind human shields. They include kinetic weaponry, such as beanbag projectiles, or rubber bullets as well as non-kinetic weapons including chemical weapons such as calmatives, which allow troops to render subjects unconscious by depressing neurological functions; electromagnetic weapons such as Active Denial System (ADS), which create the sensation of intense burning without causing tissue damage; and acoustical weapons, which allow troops to repel or subdue crowds by causing pain and suffering. This type of weapon is typically aimed at combatants and non-combatants alike.

Cyber warfare is perhaps the archetype of an asymmetrical war, given the “easiness of use,” “high potential medial leverage effect” (Maupeou 2009), the low level of the entrance barrier, and the involvement of the private sector and of “irregular” participants. As recently put by Poulsen (2015), “a defender has to get it right every time, while an attacker only has to succeed once.” Cyber is also directly linked to asymmetries of participants: for instance, the Russian government recruited hackers on social networks to conduct a computer assault on Georgia; similarly, China also resorts to “patriotic hackers,” thereby renouncing both to a reliable command structure and also the legal status as combatants (Malis 2012). Typically, cyberattacks blur the distinction between military and nonmilitary objectives.

Finally, many asymmetrical conflicts have been described as “decentralized, somewhat sporadic, and clearly psychologically oriented” (Jaeger and Paserman 2009). As a result of all these features, asymmetrical warfare not only blurs the distinction between war and crime, with its moral and legal implications. The borders between war and peace, as well as geographical borders, are also becoming increasingly porous, marked by the broad heterogeneity of participants, the prevailing strategies and complex scenarios in which fighting takes place, and the broad temporal and geographical dimensions in which asymmetrical warfare materializes. Also, even though the total number of fatalities has decreased vis-à-vis conventional wars, the distribution of harm has increasingly affected noncombatants. As Kaldor (1999) recalls, the ratio of military/civilian deaths has gone from 8:1 at the beginning of the twentieth century to almost 1:8 in recent wars (whereas it was roughly 1:1 during World War 2).

Key Challenges Posed by Asymmetrical Warfare

The main features of asymmetrical warfare highlighted in the previous section pose a series of profound legal, ethical, and operational challenges for the conduct of war.

Asymmetrical warfare has important implications for IHL. For one, even when the laws of armed conflict apply, they do not necessarily apply in the same way to different belligerents. As a result of the blurring lines between participants in armed conflicts and nonparticipants, of the use of new technologies such as nonlethal weapons and cyber-capabilities, or of certain tactics including the use of human shields and terrorism, the principles of distinction, necessity, and proportionality are seriously weakened or reinterpreted. In turn, the principle of precautions in war, which involves taking all the relevant measures to minimize harm to noncombatants and civilian objects, applies differently between belligerents, given the fact that technologically advanced militaries can do this to a far greater extent due to their greater capacity to gather and process information via different means and the availability of precision-guided munitions. Some claim that we are even “witnessing the birth of a capabilities-based IHL regime” (Schmitt 2007).

Others argue that asymmetrical warfare undermines the principle of separation between the jus ad bellum and the jus in bello (Benvensiti 2009), one of the cornerstones of the international legal regulation of warfare. This, in turn, puts into question the legal symmetry in bello between belligerents. In effect, in asymmetrical warfare, it is often the case that state actors qualify non-state belligerents as “unlawful,” or better, “unprivileged” combatants in international armed conflicts, and prosecute them for domestic offences, notably terrorism. Although there is significant controversy regarding the scope and implications of these notions, it is increasingly clear that such fighters lose significant legal protections under IHL (Baxter 1951), even if not all protection.

Nonetheless, perhaps the most serious legal challenge of asymmetrical warfare is the lack of reciprocity between belligerents, produced by the material and moral asymmetries highlighted above. This, in turn, entails a systematic violation of IHL, which is one of its defining and most problematic features. Examples of this include the use of protective emblems to conceal military objects, such as the marking of the Ba’ath Party building in Basra with the emblem of the Red Cross, or the reported misuse of ambulances and Mosques for military purposes during the battle of Fallujah in November 2004 (Schmitt 2007). The reason for this is not hard to explain. Weaker belligerents have little incentives to comply with legal rules that would not allow them to win; similarly, strong belligerents consider to be legitimized to use excessive force on the grounds that they fight criminals and those associated with them. When “belligerents see themselves as disadvantaged by normative boundaries, those boundaries may well be ignored” (Schmitt 2007). Furthermore, stronger belligerents are typically less concerned with forging a lasting peace than with destroying the enemy’s capacity to conduct operations (Gross 2012), and they often feel IHL would force them to fight “with one hand tied behind [their] back” (HCJ 1999). At the same time, it is also important to note that IHL favors state belligerents by providing them with a tool to control huge armies through discipline and training, thereby “making the decision to go to war less risky than it would be otherwise”; for them, compliance with IHL may prove costly in the short run, but it significantly benefits stronger states in the long run (Benvenisti & Cohen 2014).

From an ethical perspective, it has been argued that asymmetrical warfare poses the following dilemma (Rodin 2006): either it denies the weak party the right to resort to asymmetric tactics, which entails denying them the right to resort to military force, or if we grant them that right, this will necessarily weaken the protections afforded to noncombatants. This dilemma presupposes that certain means or methods of warfare are pro tanto impermissible on grounds that they violate a key principle, such as the distinction between combatants and noncombatants or the prohibition of directly targeting noncombatants. In this sense, work on military ethics has been concerned with the moral permissibility of resorting to irregular or unconventional war, including guerrilla tactics, the use of human shields, and even resort to terror-bombing (Fabre 2012). For many, this type of inquiry ultimately entails examining when the moral weight of the just cause may suffice to justify resorting to certain tactics or weapons that would affect civilians or civilian objects, often directly.

However, ethical thinking on asymmetrical warfare may need to go beyond this dilemma. For instance, it may need to assess the impact a legitimate authority’s order to fight (or lack thereof) has on the permissibility of fighting generally. In this respect, it must look at the different ethical standings of a variety of actors, from professional armies (from democratic to non-democratic regimes) to non-state armed groups, private security companies, and even forces fighting under authorization of multilateral organizations such as the UN. It may be that under certain conditions, each of these groups is morally entitled to fight, yet it is likely that the conditions under which it is legitimate for them to engage in military action are different (Gross 2015).

Furthermore, much ethical thinking is looking at the particular moral difference that certain weapons or tactics make for the permissibility of certain actions and weapons systems, even when their use is not pro tanto impermissible. For instance, we may consider whether or not the more discriminatory capabilities of drone strikes may make resort to force permissible (i.e., proportionate) in a wider set of contexts than the use of conventional troops (Chehtman 2017), as well as how the fact that drone operators are not themselves at risk may affect the moral limits imposed by the principles of necessity and proportionality to the permissible use of force (Kahn 2002). Similarly, much debate has focused on the weight that must be given to the presence of voluntary and involuntary shields standing next to the enemy forces in calculations of necessary and proportionate harm (Haque 2018).

Finally, asymmetrical warfare poses important and indeed very difficult challenges from the point of view of the strategic thinking on how to win this type of war. This issue is particularly sensitive since, according to the empirical data available, although strong belligerents have won more than 70% of all the asymmetrical wars fought between 1800 and 1998, weak actors have won increasingly more during the same period, going from winning only 11.8% of the time between 1800 and 1949 to as far as 55% in the period 1950–1998 (Arreguín-Toft 2001).

It is generally claimed that unlike the approach prevalent in conventional conflicts, main strategies in asymmetrical warfare are directed toward demoralizing the opponent and achieving support of the local population rather than directly claim territorial control. Since the attacks of September 11, the dominant approaches against terrorist organizations in particular have been counterinsurgency (COIN) and counterterrorism (Chayes 2015). COIN focuses on winning over the population rather than destroying enemy forces. However, it has hardly delivered on its promises. For one, it increases the threat for troops on the ground and requires a significantly greater number of them increasing the political pressure for governments. At the same time, it has not been “effective in reducing violence in regions already experiencing significant security problems” (Beath et al. 2012).

Counterterrorism, in turn, has been defined as “actions taken directly against terrorist networks and indirectly to influence and render global and regional environments inhospitable to terrorist networks” (US Government 2009). Targeted killings are a central component of this strategy, which has also been pursued through extraordinary renditions and harsh interrogations usually amounting to torture. Counterterrorism does not put as many ground troops in the line of fire as COIN but has hardly delivered better results (Finkelstein et al. 2012). Targeted killings using drones are far more precise than conventional airpower or missiles, thereby bringing down the number of civilian casualties. Nevertheless, according to a number of empirical studies, this type of strategy has hardly been successful in weakening terrorist organizations or curtailing their capacity to conduct attacks (cf. Chehtman 2017).

Cross-References

► Cyber Conflict

References

- Arreguin-Toft, I. (2001). How the weak win wars. International Security, 26(1), 93–128.
- Baxter, R. (1951). So-called ‘unprivileged belligerency’: Spies, guerrillas and saboteurs. BYIL, 323–345.
- Beath, A., Christia, F., & Enikolopov, R. (2012). Winning hearts and minds through development: Evidence from a field experiment in Afghanistan. MIT Political Science Department Research Paper No. 2011-14.
- Benvensiti, E. (2009). Rethinking the divide between Jus ad Bellum and Jus in Bello in warfare against nonstate actors. Yale Journal of International Law, 34, 541–548.
- Benvensiti, E. & Cohen, A. (2014). War is governance: explaining the logic of the laws of war from a principal-agent perspective. Michigan Law Review 112(8), 1363–1415.
- Brazil, National Strategy of Defense. (2010). Available at https://www2.gwu.edu/~clai/recent_events/2010/Brazil_Defense/National_Strategy_of_Defense.pdf. Last visited, December 20, 2019.
- Carrère, E. (2013). Limónov. Anagrama.
- Chayes, A. (2015). Borderless wars. Civil military disorder and legal uncertainty. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Chehtman, A. (2017). The ad bellum challenge of drones: recalibrating permissible use of force. European Journal of International Law, 28(1), 173–197.
- Chehtman, A. (2018). Revisionist just war theory and the concept of war crimes. Leiden Journal of International Law, 31(1), 171–194.
- Fabre, C. (2012). Cosmopolitan war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Finkelstein, C., Ohlin, J. D., & Altman, A. (Eds.). (2012). Targeted killings: Law and morality in an asymmetric world. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Gross, M. (2012). Moral dilemmas of modern war. Torture, assassination and blackmail in an age of asymmetric conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gross, M. (2015). The ethics of insurgency. A critical guide to just Guerrilla warfare. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Haque, A. A. (2018). Human shields. In S. Lazar & H. Frowe (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of ethics of war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- HJC 5100/94. (1999). The public committee against Torture v. Israel 53(4) PD 1, 36–37 (Isr.).
- Jaeger, D., & Paserman, D. (2009). The shape of things to come? On the dynamics of suicide attacks and targeted killings. Quarterly Journal of Political Science, 4(4), 315–342.
- Kahn, P. (2002). The paradox of riskless warfare. Faculty Scholarship Series, Paper 326.
- Kaldor, M. (1999). New and old wars. Organized violence in a Global Era. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Lacey, J. (2012). Conquering Germania: A province too far. In W. Murray & P. R. Mansoor (Eds.), Hybrid warfare. Fighting complex opponents from the ancient world to the present. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mack, A. (1975). Why big nations lose small wars: The politics of asymmetric conflict. World Politics, 27(2), 175–200.
- Malis, C. (2012). Unconventional forms of war. In Y. Boyer & J. Lindley-French (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of war. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mansoor, P. R. (2012). Introduction: hybrid warfare in history. In W. Murray & P. R. Mansoor (Eds.), Hybrid Warfare. Fighting complex opponents from the ancient - world to the present*. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

- Maupeou, S. (2009). Internet, nouvelle infrastructure vitale. Défense nationale et sécurité collective, 3.
- Metz, S. (2001, July–August). Strategic asymmetry. Military Review, 23–31.
- Metz, S., & Johnson, D. V. (2001). Asymmetry and US Military strategy: Definition, background, and strategic concepts. Carlisle: Strategic Studies Institute.
- Murray, W. (2012). Conclusion: What the past suggests. In W. Murray & P. R. Mansoor (Eds.), Hybrid warfare. Fighting complex opponents from the ancient world to the present. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Neff, S. (2005). War and the law of nations: A general history. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Paul, T. V. (1994). Asymmetric conflicts: War initiation by weaker powers. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Poulsen, K. (2015). Surprise! America already has a Manhattan project for developing cyber attacks. Wired (18/2/2015).
- Price Waterhouse Cooper. (2005). The defense industry in the 21st century. Available at: www.pwc.pl/en/publikacje/defence_industry_ads.pdf. Last visited December 20, 2019.
- Rodin, D. (2006). The ethics of asymmetric war. In R. Sorabji & D. Rodin (Eds.), The ethics of war: Shared problems in different traditions. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Schmitt, M. (2007). Asymmetrical warfare and international humanitarian law. Air Force Law Review, 62(1), 2–42.
- US Government, Counterterrorism, Joint Publication. (2009, November 13). Available at: <file:///Users/llama/Desktop/31130.pdf>. Last accessed 21 Dec 2019.

Augustine

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Autonomy

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Autophotography

- ▶ Auto-photography

Auto-photography

Leena Vastapu

Tampere Peace Research Institute, Tampere, Finland

European Union Advisory Mission in the Central African Republic, Bangui, Central African Republic

Synonyms

Autophotography; Participatory photography; Photo-elicitation; Photovoice; Pluralist photography; Qualitative research; Research ethics; Visual peace and conflict research

Definition/Description

Auto-photography is a visual research method where research participants are asked to take photographs on predetermined themes. Often the themes concern the daily lives of the research participants and are extensive in nature, such as “who am I,” “my current life,” or “my daily struggles.” The resulted photographs form the basis of photo-elicitation interviews that are conducted between the research participant and researcher. In the interview situation, the photographs are used as a stimulus: the photographer explains why each picture was taken and its relation to the provided theme. As a method, auto-photography is lengthy and may be costly if traditional cameras are used and/or photographs developed. However, researchers have found that auto-photography tends to provide extremely rich and informative research data when compared to qualitative interviews alone. There are several ethical issues to consider when utilizing auto-photography which makes it particularly relevant to peace and conflict researchers. For scholars in this field it should be a natural part of the research process to consider ethics at all stages of the research process from planification to publication ethics. This is particularly crucial if field research is conducted in fragile and/or conflict-ridden environments.

Introduction

It is a persistent challenge for a social scientist to find the most applicable methodology to grasp the realities of those researched upon. One the one hand, the research participant may come from a social environment parallel to that of the researcher having somewhat similar spoken and unspoken languages, cultural codes, and gestures. On the other hand, there might be such cleavages between the social realities of the researcher and the research participant that finding a shared language between these two worlds seems almost impossible. Participatory image methods originate from the desire to bridge this gap – of the need to lessen epistemic violence (Spivak 1988) between the researcher and the research participant – through careful methodological choices. This chapter presents one method from this wider group, auto-photography, by detailing its practices, variations, and historical background with selected empirical examples attached.

Auto-photography: Participatory Research Method with a Photographic Element

Auto-photography is a research method that belongs to the wider category of participant-generated image methods (Balomenou and Garrod 2015). In auto-photography, the research participants are asked to photograph their everyday lives typically under predetermined themes. The themes are often extensive, such as my current life, aspirations, fears, hopes, or daily struggles; themes that give the photographer a significant amount of expressive freedom. Therefore, in comparison to structured or semi-structured interviews alone, the research participant is less limited in this method by the agenda or predetermined question set of the researcher than in the traditional qualitative methods and thus possesses a significant amount of interpretative freedom (see, e.g., Dodman 2003; Vastapuu 2018a). As Thomas (2009, p. 3) writes: “Photos are the production of the research subject and reflect her or his intent or position when snapping the picture.” The practical steps of auto-photography are typically the following, albeit many types of variations occur:

1. Contextual/background research in order to choose the individuals whose participation will be requested
2. Explaining the potential research participants the insights of the project as well as their rights and obligations in the process
3. Asking participants an informed consent, preferably in a written format
4. Providing the research participants with clear practical instructions on the process, such as which cameras to use and how to use them
5. Giving the participants clear instructions on the themes to be photographed and the ethical guidelines and limitations of the process, preferably in a written format
6. Waiting for the participants to take the photographs within a given timeline and answering their questions during the process
7. Conducting photo-elicitation interviews with the research participant (please see details below)
8. Transcribing the interview material
9. Organizing and analyzing the interview material
10. Producing the research publications that may or may not entail the original photographs (please see the ethics section)

Photo-elicitation is a method where a photograph is placed in a research interview. The photograph may be already existing (e.g., archival material), may have been taken by the researcher, or the interviewee herself (Harper 2002, p. 13). In the case of auto-photography, the final option applies. Depending on the research design, the photographs may be developed before the interview or examined directly from the screen in the actual interview situation, where the research participant explains her/his reasoning and motivation for taking the photograph in question and its insights to the researcher. Interestingly, according to Harper (ibid.), photo-elicitation interviews seem to produce not only more information than regular interviews alone but also different kinds of information. Harper (ibid.) argues that this may be related to physical development of the brain: the sections of the brain processing visual information are evolutionary older than those processing verbal information.

The transcription and organization of the interview material may be done with the help of a program designed for qualitative research, such as NVivo or ATLAS.ti. This is in no way obligatory, however, and the researcher is free to choose the best-fitting method to organize the material. Often, researchers tend to arrange auto-photographic research data according to the provided interview themes, which makes it convenient and somewhat easy to do comparisons between various data sets.

History of Participatory Photography

Variations of participatory photography have been used in academia for more than 60 years. In the mid-1950s, a documentary photographer John Collier Jr. took pictures of the living surroundings of research participants in Canada as a part of a larger project with the aim to examine the effects of environmental factors for the mental health of local residents. He placed the resulted photographs in interview situations and named the process as photo-interview, which thus became one of the first documented applications of the photo-elicitation method in a research setting. Overall, Collier's work (1957, see also Collier 1967) has been instrumental in the development of visual studies in various academic fields from anthropology to sociology (Harper 2002).

A decade after Collier, in 1966, Sol Worth and John Adair launched a research project with Navajo Native Americans with the aim to record the "Navajo" way of seeing the world. They acquired 16 mm film cameras and gave them to selected research participants, taught them to utilize the cameras and perform simple film edits, and asked the participants to capture their living surroundings. Even though the reported research results have also faced criticism – such as over-emphasizing ethnic and racial differences – their project needs however be mentioned as one of the critical steps in the development of participatory image methodologies (Thomas 2009, p. 2).

Instamatic cameras became popular in the 1970s and 1980s and presented the next step in the development of auto-photography and other participatory image methods. Despite the fact that the results were very promising – after all, it was possible to conduct photo-elicitation interviews immediately after capturing the photo – the high costs related to the process prevented the wider usage of instamatic cameras. An answer came in the form of disposable cameras of the 1980s and 1990s, which allowed for a cheap and straightforward tool for auto-photography (ibid.). However, the quality of the produced photographs was often very poor.

Today's increasingly visualized world provides huge potential for methods such as auto-photography. Cameras are regularly installed in smart phones, and photos can be instantly shared online or examined directly from screens. In practice, this means low costs and easy applicability but also a demand for increased ethical awareness.

Variations of Auto-photography

In 2015, Nika Balomenou and Brian Garrod conducted a systematic review of "participant-generated image methods" in the field of social sciences by examining 286 research projects from 1970s onward. They found out that the field was highly fragmented and that only slight alterations could be found between differently named research methods. Interestingly, the naming of the method and the research references used were typically dependent on the disciplinary context (Balomenou and Garrod 2015, p. 2). The majority of anthropological studies used the term photovoice, making it also the most popular term with over 120 hits. At the second place was the term autophotography (another way of writing auto-photography), originating from the field of psychology, with 37 research projects recorded (ibid., pp. 4–5). The researchers came to the conclusion that there are no significant differences between auto-photography and photovoice on methodological terms (albeit it can be argued that an empowering element can be found more often from photovoice projects than from auto-photography). It is important to be aware, however, that also terms other than auto-photography can produce relevant hits from online searching engines. Indeed, Balomenou and Garrod (ibid.) found out that in addition to these two terms, there were also 40 other options that were used while describing a participant-generated image method (ibid.). This reveals the significant fragmentation and inconsistency of the field.

In addition to anthropology and psychology, auto-photography or its variations have been used in several academic fields, such as sociology and especially visual sociology (e.g., Hockey and Collinson 2006), urban studies (e.g., Delgado 2015; Dodman 2003), leisure studies (e.g., Garrod 2009), gender studies (e.g., Bilsky 1998), aging studies (e.g., Phoenix 2010), landscape planning (e.g., Yamashita 2002), and international relations (e.g., Bleiker and Kay 2007; Vastapuu 2018a, b), to mention a few examples.

Ethical Considerations

Research reports on auto-photography unfortunately tend to lack some of the basic information of the research settings: sampling methods and sample size, number of photographs required/taken, and the possible usage of incentives in the process (Balomenou and Garrod 2015, pp. 10–14). The first two pieces of information are easy to gather and report, nevertheless, the usage of incentives is a more challenging issue even to decide upon. By incentive is meant a monetary or other compensation to the participant. The decision if incentives should or should not be used requires careful ethical consideration and should reflect the social positioning of the research participant and the cultural context where the study is conducted upon. For instance, if a taxi driver is asked to photograph her daily realities and use her time not only to the process itself but also to the interview session, it might not be a bad idea to pay for her meal, transportation fees to the research site, and possibly even a per diem. After all, the taxi driver cannot work and earn money during the time she uses for the research process. At least in some research settings, donated cameras have been given to the research participants as an incentive, alongside food and transportation costs (Vastapuu 2018a).

At the heart of auto-photography are photographs. Their usage and publication, nonetheless, requires careful ethical consideration that is regrettably rarely present in auto-photographic research reports. Some issues need to be emphasized here: (1) the research participants should always be informed how and why their photographs are used; if and how they have the right to withdraw their participation from the project; and who has the final rights over the produced photographs, including their storage. (2) Publishing the participant-generated photographs is in no way obligatory in the research outputs and should not be done if there are any doubts over the safety and security of the research participants. In auto-photography, photographs are a tool and means to understand the lifeworlds of the participants and not research products as such. Therefore, it is entirely acceptable to explain the insights of the research photographs in a written format instead of publishing the photographs, or even modify the photographs as visual art to blur the identities of the research participants (ibid.). Especially in times of rapidly developing facial recognition techniques and other AI tools related to visual images, the necessity to safeguard the privacy and safety of the research participants cannot be emphasized enough.

Summary

Auto-photography is a fascinating research method with high potential in today's visualized world. Albeit it is questionable if the method directly allows for the researcher to “see” in the eyes of the research participant, it provides as a minimum the researcher another, complementary way of seeing and understanding the realities of the research participants and has thus potential to lessen epistemic violence in various types of research projects. Auto-photography should not be used hastily, however, and numerous practical and ethical decisions need to be taken before applying the method. All in all, auto-photography has huge and largely untapped potential in peace and conflict research.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research
- ▶ Ethnographic Peace Research
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/ Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding
- ▶ Youth and Peacebuilding

References

- Balomenou, N., & Garrod, B. (2015). A review of participant-generated image methods in the social sciences. Journal of Mixed Methods Research, 10, 335–351.
- Bilsky, L. (1998). Giving voice to women: An Israeli case study. Israel Studies, 3(2), 47–79.
- Bleiker, R., & Kay, A. (2007). Representing HIV/AIDS in Africa: Pluralist photography and local empowerment. International Studies Quarterly, 51(1), 139–163.
- Collier, J. J. (1957). Photography in anthropology: A report on two experiments. American Anthropologist, 59(5), 843–859.
- Collier, J. (1967). Visual anthropology: Photography as a research method. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston.
- Delgado, M. (2015). Urban youth and photovoice: Visual ethnography in action. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Dodman, D. R. (2003). Shooting in the city: An auto-photographic exploration of the urban environment in Kingston, Jamaica. Area, 35(3), 293–304.
- Garrod, B. (2009). Understanding the relationship between tourism destination imagery and tourist photography. Journal of Travel Research, 47(3), 346–358.
- Harper, D. (2002). Talking about pictures: A case for photo elicitation. Visual Studies, 17(1), 13–26.
- Hockey, J., & Collinson, J. A. (2006). Seeing the way: Visual sociology and the distance runner's perspective. Visual Studies, 21(1), 70–81.
- Phoenix, C. (2010). Auto-photography in aging studies: Exploring issues of identity construction in mature bodybuilders. Journal of Aging Studies, 24(3), 167–180.
- Spivak, G. C. (1988). Can the subaltern speak? In C. Nelson & L. Grossberg (Eds.), Marxism and the interpretation of culture. Basingstoke: Macmillan Education.
- Thomas, M. E. (2009). Auto-photography. In R. Kitchin & N. Thrift (Eds.), International encyclopedia of human geography. Oxford: Elsevier.
- Vastapuu, L. (2018a). Liberia's women veterans: War, roles and reintegration. With illustrations by Emmi Nieminen. London: Zed Books.
- Vastapuu, L. (2018b). Auto-photographing (in)securities: Former young female soldiers' post-war struggles in Monrovia. In J. Vuori & R. Saugmann (Eds.), Visual security studies: Sights and spectacles of insecurity and war. London: Routledge.
- Yamashita, S. (2002). Perception and evaluation of water in landscape: Use of photo-projective method to compare child and adult residents' perceptions of a Japanese river environment. Landscape and Urban Planning, 62(1), 3–17.

B

Balance of Power

- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Balkan as a Concept

Maria Todorova
University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign, IL, USA

Synonyms

Balkan Linguistic Union; Balkan studies; Balkanism; Balkanization; Southeast Europe; Southeast European studies; The Balkans

Introduction

The term Balkan has a number of manifestations that can be grouped into three categories. At its simplest, it is a name: first, the name of a mountain, later the designation of a region, as well as the political entities within. It is also used as a personal name and the name of institutions dealing with the region. Secondly, Balkan is employed as a metaphor, mostly, but not exclusively, negative. By the beginning of the twentieth century, it became a pejorative, a symbol for the aggressive, intolerant, barbarian, savage, semi-developed, semicivilized, and semioriental. This array of stereotypes, although of relatively recent origins, stepped on a deeper layer of oppositions between Catholicism and Orthodoxy, Europe and Asia, West and East, and especially Christianity and Islam. Based on the metaphoric use of the notion, a specific power discourse developed in the twentieth century. Its utilization in the real world of politics – balkanism – shapes attitudes and actions toward the Balkans. Thirdly, the Balkans can be approached through a scholarly category of analysis, the notion of historical legacy, which is intimately intertwined with the character of the Balkans as a concrete historical region. As a concept, “Balkan” has a modern provenance.

The Name

A Turkish word meaning “mountain,” “balkan” as a noun entered the peninsula with the arrival of the Ottoman Turks. Its earliest mention in the writings of the Italian humanist writer, poet, and diplomat Filippo Buonaccorsi Callimaco (1533) in the late fifteenth century, designated as Balkan the ancient Haemus, the mountain range crossing Bulgaria from east to west. In 1577, the German priest Salomon Schweigger was the first traveler, after Callimaco, to communicate the Turkish name of the mountain, thus documenting its further spread (Schweigger 1608). Throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, Haemus and Balkan were used side by side or interchangeably, but exclusively for the mountain. Since the nineteenth century, Balkan was applied to the whole south-east European peninsula, becoming the name of a region. The first to coin and use the term “Balkan peninsula” (Balkanhalbeiland) was the German geographer August Zeune (1808) who, in his 1808 work Goesa, looked for a name analogous to the Apennine and Pyrenean (Iberian) peninsulas. In this he replicated an over two millennia old erroneous geographical belief that the Haemus served as the peninsula’s northern border. This was corrected by Johann Georg von Hahn and Theobald Fischer (1893), who proposed “Southeast Europe” in place of the names used thus far: Hellenic, Illyrian, Dardanian, Roman, Byzantine, Thracian, South-Slavic, Greek, Slavo-Greek, Turkey-in-Europe, European Levant, Peninsula Orientale, and Balkan. By that time, however, the term had gained currency and ascendancy over the earlier ones, and also began to be increasingly used with a political connotation. So widespread was the use of the name, that in 1918, the Serbian geographer Jovan Cvijić (1918), perfectly aware of the incorrect employment of the term, used it in his seminal La péninsule balkanique.

While both “Balkan” and “Southeast Europe” as designations stem from the nineteenth century, they are elements of two very different cartographic taxonomies, even as they aim to describe the same region. “Southeast Europe” belongs to a classification which presumes Europe as a bounded territory with a center and respectively with regional positions in relation to this center, i.e., Northern, Eastern, Western, Southern, and Northwestern, Northeastern, Southwestern, and Southeastern. Balkan, on the other hand, although clearly a European subcategory, does not carry this implicitly. It is of the same family as regional designations like the Caucasus, Scandinavia, the Baltic, the Caribbean, Latin America (instead of South America), Sub-Saharan Africa, Polynesia, Melanesia, etc., based on a prominent geographical characteristic.

In the interwar period, there were attempts, both in Germany and the USA, to use Southeast Europe as a neutral, nonpolitical, and nonideological name, but this was discredited when Wirtschaftsraum Grossdeutschland Südost became an important concept in the geopolitical expansion of the Nazis (Bernath 1973; Kaser 1900; Drace-Francis 2006). In the postwar era, Southeast Europe and the Balkans have been used interchangeably as geographic and historical designators, even in the works of one and the same author. There have been also some subtle differences, although even these are not systematic. In a number of German-language academic works, building upon a geographical approach, the lands southeast of the Carpathian range shape the entity Southeast Europe, of which the Balkans is considered a geographical subregion. Hungary and occasionally Slovakia are catalogued as southeast European, but not considered Balkan within this matrix. A few others count as Balkan only the lands south of the Danube and therefore leave Romania out. In a majority of works, the Balkans are usually confined to Albania, Bulgaria, Greece, Romania, the states of the former Yugoslavia, and European Turkey (Brunnbauer et al. 2019). The important thing to note is that the classificatory efforts of geographers and historians are closely related to the immediate physical characteristics of the region or to common historical and social characteristics. They are, thus, removed from the subsequent decontextualization of the notion.

This is also reflected in the institutions that research and dispense knowledge about the Balkans, some of which are named Institutes for Balkan Studies, others Institutes for the study of Southeast Europe, but all have the same research agendas. Balkan Studies, broadly defined as a scholarly subfield analyzing Balkan societies as an entity in a historical perspective, began to be gradually shaped at the end of the nineteenth century. This came at a time when the newly created states, seceded from the Ottoman Empire, were creating the infrastructure of their national state institutions and were “nationalizing” their populations. In the humanities, research from the outside had been organized around Oriental Studies, a discipline with an already long and illustrious pedigree from the Renaissance on, with important institutions in France, Great Britain and the Habsburg Empire, and the addition from the eighteenth century on of Slavic Studies (Slavistics) primarily in Russia, the Habsburg Empire and Germany (Lockman 2004; Lapteva 2005; Palacký and Döbler 1833). As early as the 1890s, the universities of Sofia, Belgrade, Bucharest, and Zagreb had opened chairs in Slavistics.

The two fields of Oriental and Slavic studies, however, were not in direct communication. The comparative thrust of Slavic studies prompted their practitioners in the Balkan countries to look beyond the national borders and promulgate first a common South Slavic space and then to branch it further to the non-Slavs, and slowly arrive at the notion of a common Balkan cultural space. The impetus came from ethnography and folklore studies which, while serving national goals, were steeped in the historic-comparative method and implicitly refuted the notion of national uniqueness. These broadly educated scholars – Ivan Shishmanov, Boian Penev, Niko Županić, Jovan Cvijić, Nikolaos Politis, Bogdan Hasdeu, Nicolae Iorga, etc. – early on recognized the potential of an all-Balkan approach, even as many of them became prominent political figures in their respective nations (Mishkova 2019). What is most significant is that this impetus began from scholars within the region. The pioneer in shaping the Balkan commonality lies with linguistics, which was the first to devise the term “balkanisms” to signify commonalities, quite opposite to the present-day pejorative use, signifying fragmentation. But even in linguistics, which devised the concept of a Balkan linguistic union and is associated with Kristian Sandfeld, it is often forgotten that the first to perceive these links were Slovene scholars in the Habsburg Empire, Jernej Kopitar, and Franz Miklosich (Friedman 2009; Schaller 1975). Thus, while developing in the shadow of “orientalistics” and “slavistics,” balkanistics” was a scholarly discipline generated from within and until the First World War defined mostly with its contributions in the fields of folklore, linguistics, ethnography, and literary studies.

All of this is not to minimize the crucial role of German scholarship, especially in the Habsburg Empire, for the institutionalization of regional research with the creation of the first “Bosnian-Herzegovinian Institute for Balkan Research” in Sarajevo in 1904. This was followed by the Institute of Southeast European Studies, founded in 1914 by Iorga, and the creation of courses on Balkan history in the national universities. In the interwar period, with the sole exception of Germany which continued regional research, scholarship in France, Britain, and the United States not only lagged behind the German achievement but was conducted on a fragmented, nation-state basis. By contrast, the interwar period, and especially the 1930s, saw the heyday of Balkan Studies from within, with the Belgrade-based Balkan Institute (1934–1941) and the Bucharest located Institute for Balkan Studies and Research (1937–1948), led by Victor Papacostea, which gave the most radical expression of the belief in Balkan unity and uniqueness. Remarkably, the most imaginative work was conducted on the Middle Ages (Mishkova 2019).

While the Second World War undid much of this momentum, by the mid-1960s, there was again a powerful spur with the foundation in the subsequent decades of research institutes in Romania, Bulgaria, Greece (already in the 1950s), Yugoslavia, and a Balkan section in the Albanian historical institute, all within the network of the AIESEE (Association Internationale d’Études du Sud-Est Européen). As the Balkans were politically fragmented, these institutes served as a way to circumvent the political divisions and guarantee a fruitful scholarly exchange, even as they had to walk the delicate line of adhering to national agendas. It is probably too early to generalize about the state of Balkan Studies in the present era, with the assault on area studies in most of the West and the limited resources for research in the Balkan countries themselves, coupled with the mobility of scholars. Nonetheless, valuable research is being produced (Daskalov and Marinov 2013; Daskalov and Mishkova 2014; Daskalov and Vezekov 2015; Daskalov et al. 2017), often neglected if written in the local languages. On the outside, German balkanological scholarship, usually under the rubric of Südosteuropaforschung, continues to preserve its premier place (Sundhaussen and Clewing 2016; Brunnbauer et al. 2019; Calic 2016, 2019; Hinrichs et al. 2014). While Balkan scholarship finds outlets in general European, Slavic, Oriental, and comparative journals, there are also an important number of specialized periodicals using both names (Balkan and Southeast European): Études balkaniques (Bulgaria), Revue des études sud-est européennes (RESEE)/Journal of South-East European Studies (Romania), Balkan Studies (Greece), Balkanica (Serbia), Balkanologie (France), Südost-Europa (Germany), Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas (Germany), Journal Southeastern Europe (Italy), Contemporary Southeastern Europe (Austria), Southeast European and Black Sea Studies (Greece), Journal of Balkan and Near Eastern Studies (UK), and others.

Finally, “Balkan” is also used as a personal name: a given name in Turkey and a common family name in Bulgaria (as in Balkanski, Balkanska). In both countries, the noun form “balkan” is a synonym for mountain mostly in the vernacular. In all Balkan languages, Balkan as an adjective can be used with an emotional ingredient varying from neutral to derogative. There are two exceptions to this rule: in Turkish, where Balkan as a whole does not have the exclusively pejorative component; and in Bulgarian, which has all the range from negative through neutral to highly positive, as a synonym for courage and independence (Todorova 1997/2009). Thus, in the region itself “Balkan” has a deep-rooted and living presence as a name. This brief survey of the occurrence and different employments of the name “Balkan” is significant, because it illustrates its life and persistence quite outside and independent of its metaphoric use.

The Metaphor

Like “bugger” and “Byzantine,” sobriquets coming from the same geographical area of Southeastern Europe, “Balkan” is a notion that was disassociated from its ontological base and began a life of its own in the realm of ideas. “Bugger,” a term for sodomite, as well as an offensive form of address, comes from the medieval heretics in Provence, the bougres, deriving their name from the Bulgarians, among whom the medieval Christian dualist Bogomil sect was first formed. By now, it is so far removed both in name and in time from its beginnings, that only an intrepid scholar would trace its geographic origins. “Byzantine,” a sixteenth-century neologism, first used to designate a specific art form and applied retrospectively to a historical entity, the (Eastern) Roman Empire, that never used the name, became a synonym for complicated, scheming, intriguing, and hypocritical. While clearly alluding to an existing entity within the historical knowledge of the educated public, it still refers to something that has gone down in history. “Balkan,” on the other hand, became a signifier that was not only “metaphorized” fairly recently (in the early twentieth century), but because of the continued and dynamic presence of its signified, exerts an enormous and adverse pressure upon it (Todorova 2012).

During the nineteenth century, Balkans was increasingly employed with a political connotation, rather than in a purely geographical sense, to designate the states which had emerged out of the Ottoman empire: Greece, Serbia, Montenegro, Romania, and Bulgaria. There was also a parallel process of disintegrating imperial formations in one part of Europe, and unification of large nation states, most notably Germany and Italy, in another part. Not only German nationalists were opposing the phenomenon of mini states. Liberal political thought shared the disdain for small state formations. The aversion of some early socialists against the “Völkerabfälle” in the Balkans can be explained not only in terms of their anti-peasant and anti-Slav bias, but also in terms of their derision against the “Kleinstaaterei.” This was not preserved in the tradition of the international communist movement in the twentieth century (Szporluk 1988).

By the end of the nineteenth century, the Balkans were acquiring a negative connotation, although this was only a gradual process, triggered by the events accompanying the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire and the creation of small, weak, economically backward and dependent nation states, striving to modernize.

The return of Macedonia to the direct rule of the Porte after the Treaty of Berlin in 1878, opened the way for revolutionary action against the Ottoman Empire and, at the same time, guerilla warfare between contending factions from the neighboring countries. The birth of the Macedonian question enhanced the reputation of the peninsula as a turbulent region. However, violence as its Leitmotiv was a post-Balkan Wars phenomenon, when a thoroughly negative value was conclusively sealed to the Balkans. The cruelties of these wars, in a European climate which believed in the stability of the belle époque, gave rise to the stereotypical images of a particularly harsh and savage region. These persisted, no matter that European barbarities largely outnumbered and outdid Balkan atrocities only a few years later, during the First World War (The Other Balkan Wars 1993). So enduring are these stereotypes, that the assassination of Archduke Ferdinand in Sarajevo is still often evoked as the principal reason for the global imperialistic conflagration despite definitive scholarly verdicts about the war's causes. Accordingly, the sobriquet "powder keg of Europe," coined at that time, can still be heard. In fact, all Balkan states tried to avoid the war. They never became a major theater of operation, although the war proved devastating for their populations and their economies.

The term "balkanization" (see section ► Balkanization), the most important notion deriving from "Balkan," came into being as a result of the Balkan wars and the First World War. "Balkanization," most often used to denote the process of nationalist fragmentation of former geographic and political units into new and problematically viable small states, was not created in the course of the 100 years when the Balkan nations gradually seceded from the Ottoman empire. When it was coined, at the end of the First World War, only one Balkan nation was added to the already existing Balkan map: Albania; all others had been nineteenth-century formations. Rather, the great proliferation of small states as a result of the Great War was triggered by the disintegration of the Habsburg and the Romanov empires, and the emergence of Poland, Austria, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania. Yugoslavia creation, on the other hand, was, technically speaking, the reverse of "balkanization." The falling apart of the Austro-Hungarian and Russian empires resembled the previous disintegration of the Ottoman Empire and the term "balkanization," employed as a comparison, entered the political vocabulary after the system of treaties following the First World War sealed the new European divisions (Todorova 1997/2009).

The interwar period added yet another attitude which had seasoned as an integral part of nineteenth-century European thinking, the racial, and the "hopelessly mixed races" of the Balkans were an easy target (Mowrer 1921). A distinctive feature of modern racism was the continuous transition from science to aesthetics, where beauty was based on an immutable classical ideal, and became identical with the middle-class world of white Europeans. As a rule, it was based on racial purity. The Balkans, the classical territory of antiquity, were a double disappointment. Not only did they breathe havoc, but the classical archetype was nowhere to be seen. The racial verdict began with a more open rendering of the formerly subdued and nonjudgmental motif of racial mixture. What in the nineteenth century were almost neutral renderings of the ethnic and religious complexity of the Balkans, evoking only an occasional characterization as "strange nationalities," now produced feelings of impurity and revulsion about the repellent "cross-breeds." It could be argued that interwar racism was a fairly short-lived phenomenon, culminating in Nazi atrocities in Greece and Yugoslavia, but the ethnic diversity of the region has hardly achieved the status of celebrated multiculturalism.

After the Second World War, the negative designation Balkan all but disappeared, submerged in the bipolar Cold War rhetoric. It resurfaced again in the course of a twofold process after 1989. The first was the EU expansion to the east. The strategy and costs of this expansion, and the potential competition between candidates, resulted in the differential treatment of Eastern Europe's subregions. The Central European ideology of the 1980s (in Poland, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia) evoked the Balkans as its constituting other (Schöpflin and Wood 1989). Rhetorically successful, it all but disappeared after it achieved its goals. The second coinciding process was Yugoslavia's bloody disintegration. None of the other Balkan countries was ever involved, yet the world insisted on naming this a "Balkan" conflict, even the "Third Balkan war." To a great extent, this was the result of an attempt not to get involved, to restrict the problems to Europe's southeastern corner. Rhetorically, it was based on cultural arguments, particularly the "clash of civilizations" theory, positing that international conflicts would occur not so much between states and ideologies but along cultural, especially religious, fault-lines (Huntington 1996).

It was the time of the blooming of balkanism, the discursive paradigm that described the region as essentially different from Europe and legitimized a policy of relative noninvolvement and isolation. This ended with the unintended consequences from the 1999 NATO bombing of Yugoslavia. Its rhetorical legitimization as defense of universal human rights effectively pushed the Balkans back into the Western political sphere and brought Europeans and Americans deep into the Balkans. They are running several protectorates in the newly devised area of the "Western Balkans" (see section ► Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans). The rest of the region is no more Balkan, but effectively part of Europe. There is the curious but predictable restraining of the balkanist rhetoric: it no longer serves power politics, although it is there, conveniently submerged but readily at hand (Todorova 2000).

While the powerful negative outside ascriptions have been to a great extent internalized in the region as a self-ascription (what some define as self-colonization), there is also an opposite trend. As already mentioned, Balkan has also served as a positive metaphor, especially in Bulgaria, where it denotes independence, love of freedom, resistance, courage, and dignity. Folk songs and literature abound in eulogies to the Balkan range, which figures as a pillar of Bulgarian liberty and a symbol of its nationhood even in the national hymn. In this case, the metaphoric use is still closely related to its geographic signified, maybe because the Balkan range lies entirely within the confines of Bulgaria. In several other Balkan countries today, next to the disparaging use common to the one shared by outsiders, the notion can also have a positive connotation, signifying pride, defiance, and a certain savoir vivre (Todorova 1997/2009).

The array of negative stereotypes that was formed gradually in the course of centuries, crystallized in a power discourse after the First World War. In the next decades, it gained additional features and in its broad outlines continues to be handed down almost unalterable, having undergone what is defined as "discursive hardening" and a persistent "mental map" in which information about the region is placed, most notably in journalistic, political, and literary output. To put it succinctly, balkanism expresses the idea that explanatory approaches to phenomena in the Balkans rest upon a stable system of stereotypes that place the Balkans in a cognitive straightjacket. Balkanism was coined both as mirror and foil of orientalism, to both pay homage to Edward Said (1979) and to argue for similarities but also substantive differences between the two categories. Practically all descriptions of the Balkans offer as a central characteristic their transitional status. The West and the Orient are usually presented as incompatible entities, anti-worlds, but completed anti-worlds. The Balkans, on the other hand, have always evoked the image of a bridge or a crossroads. They have been compared to a bridge between East and West, Europe and Asia, but also between stages of growth, invoking labels as semi-developed, semicolonial, semicivilized, and semioriental. Unlike orientalism, a discourse about an imputed opposition, balkanism is a discourse about an imputed ambiguity. The lack of a colonial predicament for the Balkans also distinguishes the two, as do questions of race, color, religion, language, and gender. Yet, the main difference between the two is the geographic and historical concreteness of the Balkans versus the mostly metaphorical and symbolic nature of the Orient, thus challenging the scholar to deal with its ontology, rather than simply with its metaphoric functions (Todorova 2010).

Balkan: The Historical Legacy

A better way to approach the malleability of boundaries and to deconstruct the stark and reified opposition between “civilizations” is the concept of historical legacy. It allows a calmer reflection on the scholarly project of making sense of the Balkans, which is a sub-question of how to think about historical regions. The notion of historical legacy has numerous advantages over more structural categories of analysis such as borders, space, territoriality, insofar as it more clearly articulates the dynamism and fluidity of historical change. It appears to be the most appropriate category for analyzing long-term regional developments, avoiding the reification of contemporary, or latter-day, regions. It does not displace the notion of space; instead, it retains the valuable features of spatial analysis while simultaneously refining the vector of time and making it more historically specific.

Any region can be approached as the complex result of the interplay of numerous historical periods, traditions, and legacies. For purely cognitive purposes, one can distinguish between legacy as continuity and legacy as perception. Legacy as continuity is the survival and gradual waning of some of the characteristics of the entity immediately before its collapse. Legacy as perception, on the other hand, is the articulation and rearticulation of how the entity is seen at different time periods by different individuals or groups. These should not be interpreted as “real” versus “imagined” characteristics: the characteristics of continuity are themselves often perceptual, and perceptions are no less a matter of continuous real social facts. In both cases, the categories designate social facts, which are at different removes from experience, but in the instance of perception, the social fact is removed yet a further step from immediate reality (Todorova 2002).

Of the political legacies which have shaped Southeastern Europe as a whole (the period of Greek antiquity, Hellenism, Roman rule, etc.), two can be singled out as crucial up until the nineteenth century. One is the Byzantine millennium with its profound political, institutional, legal, religious, and general cultural impact. The other is the half millennium of Ottoman rule that gave the peninsula its name and established the longest period of political unity it had ever experienced. Not only did part of Southeastern Europe acquire a new name during this period, it has been chiefly the Ottoman elements, or the ones perceived as such, which have formed the current stereotype of the Balkans.

This Ottoman legacy is different from the Ottoman polity as a whole; it is a process that began after the Ottoman Empire ceased to exist and is the aggregate of characteristics handed down chiefly from the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. A systematic review of the workings of the Ottoman legacy as continuity in the political, cultural, social, and economic spheres reveals different degrees of perseverance. In practically all spheres, the break began almost immediately after the onset of political independence in the separate Balkan states and, as a whole, was completed by the end of the First World War; in the realms of demography and popular culture, it continued and was gradually transformed into the influence of the Turkish nation-state. After the First World War, the Ottoman legacy as perception became the process of interaction between an ever-evolving and accumulating past, and ever-evolving and accumulating perceptions of generations of people redefining the past. This legacy is not a reconstruction, but rather a construction of the past in works of historiography, fiction, journalism, and everyday discourse. Being one of the most important pillars in the discourse of the different Balkan nationalisms, it is bound to be reproduced for some time to come, both in its negative connotation for the Christian Balkan states and in its romantic garb as neo-Ottomanism in contemporary Turkey. In the narrow sense of the word, then, one can argue that the Balkans are the Ottoman legacy (Todorova 1997/2009).

In the broad sense of the word, however, the Balkans, utilized as a synonym for Southeastern Europe and expanding its time-span to archaeology and antiquity, are characterized by numerous historical periods, traditions, and legacies, some of which have been synchronic or overlapping, whereas others have been consecutive or completely separate. Thus, one can speak of synchronic and overlapping periods, by taking the example of the late Roman, Byzantine, and early Ottoman empires, and the period of great migrations from Central Asia (with its numerous political legacies as well as the social legacy of semi-nomadism), which peaked in the fourth-fifth centuries and whose spurts were felt until the fifteenth-sixteenth centuries. The same goes for the synchronic workings of the whole variety of different religious systems in the region, both as legacies and ongoing processes. An instance of caesura between periods, and little if any overlap between legacies is, for example, the Hellenistic and communist period and legacy. Otherwise, legacies fade away in intensity with the passage of time but, in principle, they would be overlapping by definition, forming a complex palimpsest (Todorova 2007).

Some legacies have played themselves out in the same geographic space, whereas others have involved it in different mega-regions. An example of the first would be the Byzantine and the Ottoman period and legacy. Until the sixteenth century, there was an almost complete spatial coincidence between their respective spheres of influence, both in Europe and in Asia Minor. After the early sixteenth century, the Ottoman Empire expanded its space in North Africa and elsewhere, but in the Balkans, both the space of the historical periods and that of the legacies are coincidental. For an example of the second sort, one can point to another two period and legacies. The Roman Empire, which included Southeastern Europe in a space stretching from the British Isles to the Caspian and Mesopotamia (but excluding much of Northern and Central Europe). The period and legacy of communism, on the other hand, involved part of Southeastern Europe in a space encompassing the whole of Eastern Europe, and stretching through the Eurasian landmass to Central Asia (including China, Vietnam, and Cuba in some counts) (Todorova 2007).

Periods and legacies can also be classified according to their influence in different spheres of social life: political, economic, demographic, and cultural. In the religious sphere, one can single out the Christian, Muslim, and Judaic traditions with their numerous sects and branches; in the sphere of art and culture, the legacies of the pre-Greeks, the Greeks, and the numerous ethnic groups that settled the peninsula; in social and demographic terms, the legacies of large and incessant migrations, ethnic diversity, semi-nomadism, a large and egalitarian agricultural sphere, and late urbanization alongside a constant continuity of urban life.

Thinking in terms of historical legacies – characterized by simultaneous, overlapping, and gradually waning effects – allows to emphasize the complexity and plasticity of the historical process. In the case of the Balkans, it allows to rescue the region from a debilitating diachronic and spatial ghettoization and insert it into multifarious cognitive frameworks over space and time. Europe itself, in this vision, appears as a complex palimpsest of differently shaped entities, which not only exposes the porosity of internal frontiers but also questions the absolute stability of external ones. In this respect, the task for balkanologists consists not so much of “provincializing” Europe (Chakrabarty 2000) but of “de-provincializing” Western Europe, which has heretofore expropriated the category of Europe with concrete political and moral consequences. If this project is successful, one will actually succeed in “provincializing” Europe effectively for the rest of the world, insofar as the European paradigm will have broadened to include not only a cleansed abstract ideal and version of power, but also one of dependency, subordination, and messy struggles.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans

References

- Bernath, M. (1973). Südosteuropäische Geschichte als gesonderte Disziplin. In Forschungen zur osteuropäischen Geschichte (Vol. 20). Berlin: O. Harassowitz.

- Brunnbauer, U., Clewing, K., & Schmitt, O. (Eds.). (2019). Handbuch zur Geschichte Südosteuropas. Berlin: De Gruyter.
- Calic, M.-J. (2016, 2019). Südosteuropa. Welgschichte einer Region. München: C.H.Beck; The Great Cauldron: A history of Southeastern Europe. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Callimaco, F. (1533). Philippi Callimachi Experientis ad Innocentium octavum pontificem maximum. De bello Turcis inference oratorio. Haganoae: Stezer Johann.
- Chakrabarty, D. (2000). Provincializing Europe: Post-colonial thought and historical difference. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Cvijic, J. (1918). La Péninsule balkanique, géographie humaine. Paris: A. Colin.
- Daskalov, R., & Marinov, T. (Eds.). (2013). Entangled histories of the Balkans. One: National Ideologies and language policies. Leiden: Brill.
- Daskalov, R., & Mishkova, D. (Eds.). (2014). Entangled histories of the Balkans. Two: Transfers of political ideologies and institutions. Leiden: Brill.
- Daskalov, R., & Vezekov, A. (Eds.). (2015). Entangled histories of the Balkans. Three: Shared pasts, disputed legacies. Leiden: Brill.
- Daskalov, R., Mishkova, D., Marinov, T., & Vezekov, A. (Eds.). (2017). Entangled histories of the Balkans. Four: Concepts, approaches, and (self-) representations. Leiden: Brill.
- Drace-Francis, A. (2006). Zur Geschichte des Südosteuropaskonzepts bis 1914. In K. Kaser, D. Gramshammer-Hohl, & R. Pichler (Eds.), Europa und die Grenzen im Kopf. Wieser Encyklopädie des Europäischen Ostens (Vol. 11, pp. 275–286). Wieser: Klagenfurt.
- Fischer, T. (1893). Länderkunde der drei südeuropäischen Halbinseln. Wien/Leipzig: F.Temsky/G. Freytag.
- Friedman, V. (2009). Balkans as a linguistic area. In Concise encyclopedia of languages of the worlds (pp. 119–134). Oxford: Elsevier.
- Hinrichs, U., Kahl, T., & Himstedt-Vaid, P. (Eds.). (2014). Handbuch Balkan. Studienausgabe. Wiesbaden: Harassowitz.
- Huntington, S. (1996). The clash of civilizations and the remaking of world order. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- Kaser, K. (1900). Südosteuropäische Geschichte und Geschichtswissenschaft. Wien/Köln/Weimar: Böhlau.
- Lapteva, L. P. (2005). Istoriia Slavianovedeniia v Rosii v XIX veke. Moscow: Indrik.
- Lockman, Z. (2004). Contending visions of the Middle East: The history and politics of orientalism. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mishkova, D. (2019). Beyond Balkanism: The scholarly politics of region making. London/New York: Routledge.
- Mowrer, P. S. (1921). Balkanized Europe. A study in political analysis and reconstruction. New York: E. P. Dutton.
- Palacký, F., & Döbler, J. (1833). Joseph Dobrowsky's Leben und gelehrtes Wirken. Prague: Gottlieb Haase Söhne..
- Said, E. (1979). Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.
- Schaller, H. W. (1975). Die Balkansprachen: Eine Einführung in die Balkanphilologie. Heidelberg: Universitätsverlag C. Winter.
- Schöpfli, G., & Wood, N. (Eds.). (1989). Search of Central Europe. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Schweigger, S. (1608). Eine neue Reysbescheribung aus Tuetschland nach Konstantinopel und Jerusalem. Nuremberg: Johann Lantsenberger.
- Sundhaussen, H., & Clewing, K. (Eds.). (2016). Lexikon zur Geschichte Südosteuropas. Wien/Köln/Weimar: Böhlau.
- Szporluk, R. (1988). Communism and nationalism: Karl Marx versus Friedrich List. New York: Oxford University Press.
- The Other Balkan Wars. (1993). A 1913 Carnegie endowment inquiry in retrospect with a new introduction and reflections on the present conflict by George F. Kennan. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Todorova, M. (1997/2009). Imagining the Balkans. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Todorova, M. (2000). The Balkans: From invention to intervention. In W. J. Buckley (Ed.), Kosovo: Contending voices on Balkan interventions (pp. 159–169). Grand Rapids/London: Eerdmans.
- Todorova, M. (2002). Der Balkan als Analysekategorie: Grenzen, Raum. Zeit, Geschichte und Gesellschaft, 3, 470–492.
- Todorova, M. (2007). Historische Vermächtnisse zwischen Europa und dem Nahen Osten/ Historical Legacies Between Europe and the Near East. Berlin: Brandenburgische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Wissenschaftskolleg zu Berlin, Fritz Thyssen Stiftung.
- Todorova, M. (2010). Balkanism and postcolonialism, or on the beauty of the airplane view. In C. Bradatan & S. Oushakine (Eds.), In Marx's shadow. Lanham: Lexington Books.
- Todorova, M. (2012). Der Balkan. In P. Boer, H. Duchhardt, G. Kreis, & W. Schmale (Eds.), Europäische Erinnerungsorte. Oldenbourg: Muenchen.
- Zeune, A. (1808). Goea. Versuch einer wissenschaftlichen Erdbeschreibung. Berlin: Wittich.

Balkan Linguistic Union

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept

Balkan Studies

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept

Balkanism

► Balkan as a Concept

Balkanization

Liridona Velu
 School of Law and Government,
 Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Barbarism; Disintegration; Disunity; Division; Fragmentation; Secession; Separation; The Balkans; Tribalism

Definition

‘Balkanization’ has no clear definition. Derived from troubling occurrences in the Balkans, it has most often been used to describe a wide range of complex and problematic situations, people, and events. The word was coined in the beginning of the twentieth century to depict events which took place during the Balkan wars (1912–1913) and the First World War (WWI) (1914–1918) in reference to occurrences that had happened before in the Balkan Peninsula. WWI was a reminder of the collapse of Ottoman Empire in the nineteenth century and the appearance of separate Balkan states that emerged from it. To describe the dreadful consequences of this war in reshuffling Europe’s map, ‘balkanization’ was coined to transmit an alarming call for preventing a Balkan apocalyptic scenario to resituate itself in Europe. Hence, in its more specific definitions, ‘balkanization’ is tightly connected to historical events related to wars and conflicts in the Balkans.

In its most general description though, ‘balkanization’ refers to the division, partition, compartmentalization, or splitting up of a whole into hostile and sometimes homogenous parts. Retaining its main conceptual thread, ‘balkanization’ nowadays persists to refer to the unwelcomed disintegration of a previously existing unit and all the undesirable symptoms that come with it. However, the word has moved beyond its reference to the Balkan Peninsula to currently describe similar scenarios taking place in a variety of places and spaces, disciplines, and fields of thought such as economy, architecture, gastronomy, poetry, and others. While it might seem that ‘balkanization’ is being used as detached from the Balkan Peninsula, it continues to transmit negative stereotypes of the Balkans and which, considering the growth in usage and explanatory power that the term is currently gaining, also risk to grow.

Introduction

Maria Todorova (1997), to whom canonical reference is made when it comes to studies on the Balkans, considers ‘balkanization’ as “the most important word and notion deriving from Balkan” (p. 32). Along the lines of Edward Said’s Orientalism (1979), Todorova (1997) coined balkanism which “expresses the idea that explanatory approaches to phenomena in Southeastern Europe, that is, ‘the Balkans’, often rest upon a discourse (in the Foucauldian sense) or a stable system of stereotypes (for the ones who shun the notion of ‘discourse’), which place the Balkans in a cognitive straightjacket” (Todorova 2010, p. 176). Taking forward such a position by inspecting ‘balkanization’ as an explanatory approach not only of phenomena in the Balkans but also elsewhere, recent research (see Velu 2018) argues for a constant use of the word as inserted within single quotation marks with the purpose of questioning the cognitive conventionality that encloses it and enhancing awareness on its discursive nature. As an enduring discourse of stereotyping and region labelling not only of the Balkans but beyond, such endeavors of deconstructing ‘balkanization’ are relevant for enabling a better understanding and comparison of discourses of differences and otherness across Europe and elsewhere.

Initially used by journalists and politicians, ‘balkanization’ served the role of an explanatory conceptual device that would help them make sense of the new world order emerging from the disintegration of the Habsburg and Romanov Empire by comparing that with the secession of the Balkan nations following the crumbling of the Ottoman Empire in the nineteenth century. Following the Second World War (WWII) (1939–1945), ‘balkanization’ would undergo its most substantial manifestation. Its explanatory logic was applied to understand occurrences which not only transcended the Balkans and Europe and extended its geographic scope to include Africa and the United States, but they also surpassed politics and journalism and entered the realm of linguistics, demography, information technology, gastronomy, and others. Herein ‘balkanization’ stretched its scope of descriptive faculty to a diverse and extensive range of phenomena of prevailing pejorative and derogatory nature. This has not escaped the attention of critical scholars who by the end of the twentieth century and early twenty-first century took forward endeavors of denaturalizing and reclaiming ‘balkanization’. This entry follows the logic of focusing in each one of these endeavors as specific subheadings. The first subheading focuses on the first conceptual articulations of ‘balkanization’ and its contextualization in the geography and events of the Balkan Peninsula surrounding WWI. The second subheading unravels the wave of decontextualizing ‘balkanization’ from the peninsula and recontextualizing it to a variety of other geographies and fields of thought which oscillated after WWII. Finally, the third subheading explores the attempts of different scholars which emerged during and after the Yugoslav Wars with the purpose of unwrapping the discourse from its metahistorical obviousness by historicizing it and scrutinizing the interplay of powers operating underneath.

Birth: Coining ‘Balkanization’

‘Balkanization’ as a word was conceived during the Balkan wars and WWI to describe these events through the prism of similar occurrences which had before taken place in the Balkan Peninsula. The disintegration of the Habsburg and Romanov Empire which conditioned the emergence of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Hungary, Poland, Latvia, and Lithuania was the new political constellation that needed to be understood and explained. Since the Balkan people had faced something similar at the end of the nineteenth century with the disintegration of the Ottoman Empire and the emergence of Bulgaria, Greece, Montenegro Romania, and Serbia, this made the Balkans a suitable comparison unit to the new political reality that Europe needed to face. However, as Todorova states, “when the term was coined, at the end of WWI, only one Balkan nation, Albania, was added to the already existing Balkan map; all others had been nineteenth century formations” (Todorova 1997, p. 32). During this time, considering the nature of events that the word was designed to describe, its main conceptual connotation was disintegration, but not only, as ‘balkanization’ would never be a neutral descriptive term synonymous to division, fragmentation, dissolution, or any other similar expressions. ‘Balkanization’ was coined retrospectively to enable the apprehension of the mutating European subject and its present, by replacing it with the Balkan subject and its past. The discourse was established to convey everything political that led to and resulted from the crumbling of previously functional entreties, and as such it communicated an uninvited and undesirable condition. Since such a gruesome scenario that Europe was facing was being looked at through the experiences of the Balkans, the uninvited and undesirable Balkan subject also came to life.

The Oxford English Dictionary traces the word’s first appearance in 1914 at the College of Surgeons Fellowship address by E. H. Bradford Amer where he is quoted to have said: “How long the present Balkanization [emphasis added] of Europe is to continue. . . no one can tell, but it is certain that the Mexicanization of North America will stop at the Rio Grande” (“balkanization” 2013). The statement made by Bradford Amer is inaccessible as a full entry online.

This is different from what Todorova (1997) considers the first written appearance of ‘balkanization’ which did not take place until December 20, 1918, when Greenwall (1918) under the title “Rathenau, Head of Great Industry, Predicts the ‘Balkanization of Europe’” would write for The New York Times: “Black ruin will face us, and there will be a great tide of emigration probably to South America and the Far East and certainly to Russia. It will be most dreadful, and the result will be the Balkanization of Europe” (Greenwall 1918). Greenwall was reiterating Walther Rathenau who served as the German Foreign Minister during the Weimar Republic and was leading proponent of the idea for a Central European economic union. His definition of ‘balkanization’ witnesses for the politically charged nature of the term and the pejorative connotations it represented already in its newborn stages.

After Rathenau’s statement, Todorova (1997) traces ‘balkanization’ in a set of different early twentieth century newspapers such as the The Nineteenth Century and Public Opinion, as well as the novel Europe-Whither Bound by Stephen Graham (1922) and Arnold J. Toynbee’s (1922) The Western Question in Greece and Turkey: A Study in the Contact of Civilisations. As a concept being mainly coined and introduced by journalists, ‘balkanization’ would in 1923 be referred to by Leon Trotsky. Trotsky who had been a military correspondent in the Balkans of the newspaper Kievskaya Mysl in 1912 would write for the Soviet Pravda: “Victorious France is now maintaining her mastery only by Balkanizing Europe... Britain’s traditional mask is of hypocrisy. As a result, our unfortunate continent is cut up, divided, exhausted, disorganized and Balkanized – transformed into a madhouse” (Jordan 2007, p. 61). Throughout these references, ‘balkanization’ was used to transmit alarming warnings of apocalyptic scenarios in Europe and the West. It is safe to say that not once was the word used to describe circumstances welcomed by these authors and at times also the subjects of their writings. Although such circumstances and subjects were of a wide variety which contributed to the ambiguity of the term and which persists even now, there was no doubt as to how threatening and dangerous and hence unwanted ‘balkanization’ was being perceived as.

Such perceptions were substantively evidenced in 1921 when ‘balkanization’ made its prominent debut. Both Todorova (1997) and Lene Hansen (2006) refer to Paul Scott Mowrer’s (1921) definition of ‘balkanization’ in his Balkanized Europe: A study in Political Analysis and Reconstruction. Mowrer who had been the European correspondent for the Chicago Daily News and who had previously reported on the first Balkan War and WWI defines “the meaning of the word ‘Balkanization’: the creation, in a region of hopelessly mixed races, of a medley of small states with more or less backward populations, economically and financially weak, covetous, intriguing, afraid, a continual prey to the machinations of the great powers, and to the violent promptings of their own passions” (p. 25). Hansen (2006) considers Mowrer’s statement as one which “links the construction of a highly inferior and negative construction of ‘Balkan peoples’ as weak, covetous, intriguing, and afraid with their propensity for violence and passion to the region’s geopolitical ability to become a cataclysmic part of European great power politics, thereby triggering wider wars” (p. 92). As Todorova (1997) states, “[b]alkanization not only had come to denote the parcelization of large and viable political units, but had also become a synonym for a reversion to the tribal, the backward, the primitive, the barbarian” (p. 3). As the next subheading reveals, the geographic reference to events in the Balkan Peninsula would not necessarily continue to be the main markers of ‘balkanization’, but rather its political connotations. ‘Balkanization’ would be recontextualized to a variety of spaces and contexts that had nothing to do with the Balkan Peninsula. Hence, even in the present, one finds less references to ‘balkanized’ Balkans than ‘balkanized’ Europe or others.

Recontextualization: ‘Balkanization’ Everywhere

With the creation of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY) whose origins can be traced back to 1942 and the establishment of the Anti-Fascist Council for the National Liberation of Yugoslavia, the end of WWII showed the Balkans as united under the popular slogan of “brotherhood and unity.” With the proclamation of the Federal People’s Republic of Yugoslavia (FPRY) on November 29, 1945, the world had the chance to see a divergent and antagonistic trend to that of disunity in the Balkan Peninsula. Yugoslavia was an antithesis to ‘balkanization’. On this premise, it would be expected that the word would be used less frequently or at least not grow in its descriptive scope. Contrary to such expectations, ‘balkanization’ would not only persist to exist in the vocabulary of political insults, but it would further be used to widen its explanatory power to places and spaces which transcend the European continent and the West in general. The dimensions that ‘balkanization’ would gain through time exceed any geographic references to include fields of thought and disciplines, and they continue to enlarge currently. However, even as resituated in a set of diverse contexts and as upgraded in meaning as to include phenomena that are not necessarily wars which result with disintegration of states or other entities, the discourse retained its derogatory conceptual connotations and its analogous references to the Balkans.

The recontextualization of ‘balkanization’ would take sway around the events of WWII. Already before WWII references to ‘balkanization’ are found in United States court cases in relation to disputes of trade and economy. The Supreme Court of the USA, in a 1941 case of Duckworth challenging the constitutionality of an Arkansas statute which required permission for the transportation of liquor, would refer to Congress potentially “suffocating and retarding and Balkanizing American commerce, trade and industry [emphasis added]” (Duckworth v. Arkansas 1941). Not too long after this, in another case ruled by the US Supreme Court, ‘balkanization’ was equalized to “trade barriers so high between the states that the stream of interstate commerce cannot flow over them” (H. P. Hood & Sons 1949). The Supreme Court insisted on referring to ‘balkanization’ as the growing risk of local restraints that would threaten the free flow of goods and services. This trend would persist as 20 years later in another case of 1979 on legislation governing wildlife on federal lands, the Supreme Court would refer to “economic Balkanization” as that which “had plagued relations among the Colonies and later among the States under the Articles of Confederation” (Hughes v. Oklahoma 1979).

‘Balkanization’ would substantially be used to synopsise the troubled and brimming relations within and among colonies. Travelling from the Balkans across Europe and the USA, the wind of decolonization processes in Africa in the period of post-WWII would also be looked at through ‘balkanized’ lenses. William Edward Burghardt Du Bois (1945), among others known as a dedicated Pan-Africanist and the leader of the black civil rights organization Niagara Movement, would state that “Americanization has never yet meant a synthesis of what Africa, Europe, and Asia had to contribute to the new and vigorous republic of the West; it meant largely the attempt to achieve a dead level of uniformity, intolerant of all variation” (p. 72). Such Western influence, according to Du Bois (1945), used “balkanization” to subjugate other smaller states into “‘spheres of influence’ and investment centers, and then often succumb into disfranchised colonies” (p. 72). Being exposed to such ideas of Du Bois, Kwame Nkrumah as the first Prime Minister and President of Ghana upon the country’s declaration of independence from Britain in 1957 would be extensively referring to analogies between the Balkans and contemporary Africa to call for the unification of Africa (see Nkrumah 1961, 1963). Nkrumah and other anti-colonial African leaders such as Leopold Sedar Senghor, Ahmed Sékou Touré, and others, as Neuberger (1976) states, would use the term “balkanization” or “balkanisation” and which “rapidly became a basic part of the phraseology of modern African nationalism” (p. 523). Boubou Hama (1974) and Julius Kambage Nyerere (see Mwakikagile 2010) would be other names to add to the list of African nationalists to which ‘balkanization’ became a reference point on issues of colonial legacy in the continent and the way forward. To Nyerere's regionalization attempts of unifying East Africa before independence, Nkrumah has reportedly been referring to as "'balkanization' on a large scale" (Mwakikagile 2010, p. 582). To these and other African leaders, 'balkanization' has stood for different associations; however, as Neuberger (1976) states, they "[a]ll are agreed that an inherent feature is fragmentation" (p. 523). As to what degree of that fragmentation would be tolerable or acceptable, "there is no consensus" says Neuberger (1976, p. 523).

Around this time when 'balkanization' was increasingly used to explain phenomena that were taking place in a territorial range which surpassed Europe and the West and gained global geographic dimensions, the word would enter the vocabulary of a diverse set of disciplines which also surpassed the field of politics and international relations and elaborated on questions of human identity. Ayn Rand's (1977) lecture titled "Global Balkanization" would use 'balkanization' to refer to "the process of the collapse of a civilization [emphasis added]" (p. 3) and hence all that it entails. Although with 'balkanization' Rand (1977) understands the "breakup of larger nations into ethnic tribes" (p. 14), she considers this breakup as the reason for the collapse of everything else. "How long would the achievements of a technological civilization last under this sort of tribal management?" (p. 14) asks Rand (1977), equating balkanization with "global tribalism" (p. 15). References that would contribute to the global magnitudes of 'balkanization' are to be found in many other sources that resemble Rand's fuming resentment of the Balkans as the source of the misfortune that was about to hit the Western civilization. Along the same lines, Patrick Glynn (1993) would issue a warning to the world in his "The Age of Balkanization": "A fundamental change is under way in the character of global political life. . . The ferocious war in the Balkans is but one manifestation of a reemergent barbarism apparent in many corners of the earth." Another example of this would be Harold Bloom who, as Todorova (1997) states, "introduced 'balkanization' to mourn everything he detested in his discipline" (p. 36). "Finding myself now surrounded by professors of hip-hop; by clones of Gallic-Germanic theory; by ideologues of gender and of various sexual persuasions; by multiculturalists unlimited, I realize that the Balkanization of literary [emphasis added] studies is irreversible" declared Bloom (1994, p. 517) who was also considered as "immortal" and "greatest literary critic on the planet" (Martin 2017).

Placing 'balkanization' in the heart of debates which aim to establish what it is that differentiates the civilized from the tribal has paved the way for the word to explain a specter of events and phenomena that need no geographical determinants. 'Balkanization' is now being used in reference to conceptual spaces as much as places. Through an analysis on Twitter, Velu (2018) finds 'balkanization' used in association to events taking place in around one hundred existing or unexisting places around the globe, including here the North Pole (see Paul 2012) and EUgoslavia (see Karnitschnig 2016). Her list of 124 conceptual archetypes associated to 'balkanization' identifies, among others, references being made to demographic 'balkanization' (Frey 1996, 1999), 'balkanization' of the Internet (Cooper 2015), of news media (Evans 2016; Herzfeld 2017), education (Liberalteacher 2016), global financial market (Weber 2017), academia (Dreier 2016), advertising agency business (Crain 2015), digital health (Wilkins 2014), and even the 'balkanization' of burgers (Pollack 2011). References to 'balkanization' are made in poetry (Repass 2016) and art (Balkanization 2016). This drives Velu (2018) to conclude that "the growth in usage and meanings associated with 'balkanization' is due to the ambiguity it conveys and vice versa" (p. 98). She further adds that 'balkanization' "lives in the constant reinvention of meanings by bringing together and at the same time separating, by differentiating and at the same time equalizing wholeness and particularity, homogeneity and heterogeneity, 'us' and 'them'" (Velu 2018, p. 98). This dynamic of "us" and "them" reflected from and on that of "self" and "other," no matter the contexts that it is being replicated in, derives from continuous comparison between the Balkans and the West.

Hence, “[n]o matter the diversity and ambiguity of meanings that the ‘balkanization’ discourse represents, it is still based on a red thread of analogous references to the Balkan Peninsula” states Velju (2018, p. 98).

Balkanism: ‘Balkanization’ Deconstructed and Reclaimed

A series of interconnected events which started in 1991 led to the Yugoslav Wars and eventually to the collapse of the Yugoslav state. These events were preceded by the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989 and a wave of revolutions in Central and Eastern European states which ended the communist rule in these countries and put an end to the Eastern Bloc. Predrag Simić (2013) argues that such occurrences “revived old Western stereotypes about the Balkans and ‘Balkanisation’” (p. 113) and as a result a series of new studies about the Balkans emerged. He identifies two main strands of this literature: on the one side, there is the works of Samuel Huntington (1993), Robert Kaplan (1993), Noel Malcolm (1998), and Morton Abramowitz (1993) as those who reinterpreted and reproduced the history of the Balkans as to support political and military intervention in the region; and on the other side, concurrently to these authors, there is the emergence of the first momentous wave which brought a deconstructing and critical view on the Balkans and which, among others, was headed by Todorova (1994, 1996, 1997, 2010), Vesna Goldsworthy (1998, 2003), and Mark Mazower (2002). Through a sequence of writings which aimed to desubstantialize and destabilize the Balkans as a discourse, and with that ‘balkanization’, the latter authors conditioned the first serious resistance to old and rejuvenated labels and portrayals of the Balkans. Some of these authors’ incentives went further by aiming to reclaim ‘balkanization’ and used the discourse in a subversive manner by adding to it some positive nuances. Some other authors, including here Simić (2013) himself, took forward genealogical incentives of historicizing the discourse and revealing its power telos to say that “the wars fought in the Balkans do not differ substantially from other civil or religious wars fought in Europe or elsewhere” (p. 127) and that, hence, the Balkans “have no monopoly over barbarity” (Todorova 1997, p. 7).

Todorova’s major breakthrough in the study of the Balkans was preceded by the work of others such as Milica Bakić-Hayden and Robert M. Hayden (1992; Bakić-Hayden 1995), who in their own manner, similarly to Todorova, were paving the way for the decomposition of the naturalized pejorative nuances conveyed through the Balkans and ‘balkanization’. Different from Todorova (1996) who considered balkanism as an academic-explanatory approach to the discourses on the Balkans which is “seemingly identical, but actually only a similar phenomenon” (p. 10) to Orientalism, Bakić-Hayden and Hayden (1992) examine the European construction of itself versus Yugoslavia and the Balkans through orientalist variations of the latter. Bakić-Hayden (1995) calls these variations “nesting orientalism” which “is a pattern of reproduction of the original dichotomy upon which Orientalism is premised. In this pattern, Asia is more ‘East’ or ‘other’ than eastern Europe; within eastern Europe itself this gradation is reproduced with the Balkans perceived as most ‘eastern’; within the Balkans there are similarly constructed hierarchies” (p. 918). Todorova’s work which followed that of Said (1979) shared with the latter, among others, the focus on discourses as central in the construction of “self” and “other” and the creation of subject positions such as that of the Balkans in Todorova’s case and the Orient in the case of Said. With this, a debate on whether or not the Balkans are a distinct and specific category of othering and hence deserving of their own investigation emerged. Such debates were heavily centralized around discussions on colonialism and questions of whether or not were the Balkans a subject to colonial rule, as well as pro and against argumentations on the geographic fixities of the region. Upholding the position that “‘Balkanism’ is not merely a sub-species of orientalism” (Todorova, 1994, p. 454; 1996, p. 10), Hammond (2007) would add that “the emphasis should now be on furthering knowledge of the specificities of balkanism and of its intricate relationship to both the changing realities of the peninsula and the vicissitudes of Western diplomacy” (p. 215).

Hence, the work of Todorova and some others remained concentrated around revealing and unravelling the Western discursive imagery of the Balkans. This wave of literature argued for a genealogical examination of ‘balkanization’, which, as James Der Derian (2009) claimed, “seems to have enjoyed the standing of common wisdom and thus avoided critical scrutiny” (p. 101). Their efforts, however, were taken a step forward or aside, by other authors who took it upon themselves to reclaim ‘balkanization’. Such intentions are indeed stemming from the similar vocation of disrupting the idea that ‘balkanization’ as a discourse of pejorative portrayals was inherent and natural only to the Balkans, but they further attempt to shed some light on different positive aspects and qualities that ‘balkanization’ already did or could possibly convey. Already in 1994, Stjepan Meštrović wrote The Balkanization of the West: The Confluence of Postmodernism and Postcommunism in which he argued that “Balkanization is a genuinely postmodern phenomenon, if one understands postmodernism to be a rebellion against the grand narratives of the Enlightenment” (p. 179). David Campbell (1998) explains the European and American fear of ‘balkanization’ as one connected to the fear of multiculturalism as deriving from a “fictive notion of a prior time of unfragmented community that is itself produced by a discourse of coherence” (p. 167). He claims that “balkanization stems from the desire for a bounded community and the nostalgia for a politics of place rather than a problematization of identity politics” (Campbell 1998, p. 169). Andrej Grubačić (2010) made the call: Don't mourn, balkanize! as he speaks of “balkanization from below as a tradition and narrative that affirms social and cultural affinities, as well as on customs in common resulting from interethnic mutual aid and solidarity, and resulting in what can be termed an interethnic self-activity, one that was severed through the Euro-colonial intervention” (p. 158). Recognizing that ‘balkanization’ had now entered the realm of mathematics, international law, digital world, software, and others, Srdjan Jovanović Weiss (2011) reverses the negative connotations of the discourse by further stationing it in the field of architecture by asking: “[a]rchitects are not particularly happy with how desolate corporate architecture has become clean minimalist forms turned into postmodern cubes. What if we Balkanized it?”. He claims that ‘balkanization’ “also has positive aspects, it depicts political self-determination: not in order to fight, but rather to maintain its differentiation, its autonomy,” and as such “[i]t is a chance for the small” (Weiss 2011) versus the sophisticated and selective potencies of capitalism and corporations.

In most recent research, ‘balkanization’ has been inspected through the prism of the Euro-Atlantic integration processes of the Balkans and reviewed in reference to the process of Europeanization. This has resulted with the hitherto conceptualization of ‘balkanization’ to broaden up as to include literature on EU enlargement and regionalism. It remains unclear whether the work of these authors can be considered as one of deconstructing or reclaiming ‘balkanization’ due to while on one side it continues to refer to the discourse to explain certain periods or events in the region, on the other it nevertheless offers with explanatory accounts as to how the discourse arose. Dorian Jano (2008) claims that when it comes to literature on the Balkans, “the ‘Balkanization paradigm’ has dominated the debate” (p. 56). He proposes the term “last Balkanization” as the “situation of the Western Balkan states in the ’90s undergoing their last disintegration process” (Jano 2008, p. 58) on their way to Europeanization. With this he joins other author’s attempts of not only reclaiming the discourse as one among the other steps which, in a way, have led to Europe and the West but also of automatically revealing that, if seen under the light of the integration processes of the Western Balkans, ‘balkanization’ had always been a discourse of constitutive and negotiating identities of “self” and “other” between the Balkans and the West. Other more recent and less critical literature on ‘balkanization’ versus the Europeanization of Western Balkans (see Džankić et al. 2019; Vučković and Đorđević 2019) also almost inevitably can be read as recognizing the constructed character of the Balkans through ‘balkanization’ as a process of othering the region from Europe and the West in general. Some others as Othon Anastasakis (2005) refer more explicitly to “‘Europeanization, South East European style’ as an increasingly demanding, externally driven, and coercive process of domestic and regional change brought about by the EU” by calling the process “uneven” (p. 77). Such uneven interactions between the Balkans and the West continue to call for studies which address the discourse of ‘balkanization’ under the light of more local literature coming from the Balkans themselves. An example of this is the recent work of Diana Mishkova (2019) which, in her own words, “reverses the perspective and looks at the Balkans primarily inside-out, from within the Balkans towards its “self” and the outside world” arguing that “‘Balkan’ self-understanding has rarely received attention” (p. 3).

Summary and Future Work

‘Balkanization’ has its semantic roots in the events of the Balkan Wars and WWI. The first time the word was used was to explain the collapse of the Habsburg and Romanov Empire in reference to the collapse of the Ottoman Empire and what it had done to the Balkan Peninsula. ‘Balkanization’, in other words, was not coined to convey the then reality of the Balkans, but rather that of Europe while comparing it to events that belonged to the Balkans’ past. Until WWII and the establishment of SFRY, the word would be used to explain occurrences that had some relations to those of the Balkan Peninsula. With the wave of decolonization movements and literature, ‘balkanization’ would transcend the geographic borders of the Balkan Peninsula and Europe and it would find application in a set of diverse settings stretching to the USA and Africa. Moreover, beyond its geographic and political connotations, ‘balkanization’ would be recontextualized to describe various phenomena in jurisprudence, literary studies, demography, and others. Its conceptualization would stretch and narrow and accommodate to convey the needs of many institutional as well as individual authors. Following the collapse of Yugoslavia and the emergence of a series of writing on the Balkans, ‘balkanization’ would receive some critical attention. Studies would dispute the obviousness that the discourse was surrounded by and the consequences that it entailed for the Balkan people. Congruently, both strands, that of constructing and deconstructing ‘balkanization’, continue to exist as the discourse is gaining more attention on its constitutive nature, while the word continues to broaden up in its explanatory parameters and be applied to different context, fields of thought, and disciplines.

As a derivative of “the Balkans,” ‘balkanization’ is a discourse of identity construction and othering in which the “self” and “other” or the “us” and “them” oscillate between the Balkans on one side and the West on the other. Beyond its contextualization in the Balkan Peninsula, ‘balkanization’ continues to be used to describe or refer to a highly divergent set of scenarios and phenomena where the Balkans and the West are replaced with other subject positions. The nature of the relationship between these subjects is defined by imbalanced power relations, and hence whether used in the field of literature, art, informatics, finances, economy, jurisprudence, or others, ‘balkanization’ is or brings about destruction and collapse. Deriving from collapsing events in Europe and used in reference to similar events that had previously taken place more specifically in the Balkan Peninsula, the discourse even as recontextualized and reclaimed continues to be associated to apocalyptic scenarios. From this perspective and given its semantic origins, the word ‘balkanization’ will always convey something pejorative about the Balkan people. Considering this, further discussions on whether or not should the word be even used due to its insulting nature would convert the debate into one on political correctness. However, the question of whether or not the usage of ‘balkanization’ should be considered as a politically (in)correct act does not exclude and moreover should include continuing endeavors of debunking the discourse. The dose of naturalness that the word has gained by now and the wide explanatory dimensions that the discourse has reached require discussions which would bring about awareness rather than uniformed obedience upon a prohibitory request.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept
- ▶ Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans
- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Grounded Nationalism
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Secession and Self-determination
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Abramowitz, M. (1993). Preface, The other Balkan wars: A 1913 Carnegie Endowment inquiry in retrospect. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Anastasakis, O. (2005). The Europeanization of the Balkans. The Brown Journal of World Affairs, 7(1), 77–88.
- Bakić-Hayden, M. (1995). Nesting orientalisms: The case of former Yugoslavia. Slavic Review, 54(4), 917–931.
- Bakić-Hayden, M., & Hayden, R. (1992). Orientalist variations on the theme “Balkans”: Symbolic geography in recent Yugoslav cultural politics. Slavic Review, 51(1), 1–15.
- “balkanization”. (2013, December). Retrieved from Oxford English Dictionary: <https://www.oed.com/view/Entry/370684?redirectedFrom=balkanization#eid>
- Balkanization. (2016). ArtRabbit. Retrieved June 25, 2019, from <https://www.artrabbit.com/events/balkanization>
- Bloom, H. (1994). The Western Canon: The books and school of the ages. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Campbell, D. (1998). National deconstruction: Violence, identity and justice in Bosnia. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Cooper, R. (2015, March 30). Say not the balkanization of the internet. Retrieved June 2, 2017, from U.S. Chamber of Commerce Foundation: <https://www.uschamberfoundation.org/blog/post/say-no-balkanization-internet/42923>
- Crain, R. (2015, September 14). Did agencies specialize themselves to death? Ad Age. Retrieved June 29, 2019, from <https://adage.com/article/rance-crain/agencies-specialize-death/300339>
- Der Derian, J. (2009). S/N: International theory, balkanization and the new world order. In J. Der Derian (Ed.), Critical practices in international theory: Selected essays (pp. 97–119). London: Routledge.
- Dreier, P. (2016, February 22). Academic Drivel Report. The American Prospect. Retrieved from <http://prospect.org/article/academic-drivel-report>
- Du Bois Edward Burghardt, W. (1945). Color and democracy: Colonies and peace. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Duckworth v. Arkansas, 314 U.S. 390 (U.S. Supreme Court December 15, 1941).
- Džankić, J., Keil, S., & Kmezić, M. (2019). The europeanisation of the Western Balkans: A failure of EU conditionality? London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Evans, G. (2016, November 4). Barack Obama & Bill Maher slam “balkanization” of news media, warn of dire post-Trump “damage”. Deadline. Retrieved June 25, 2019, from <https://deadline.com/2016/11/barack-obama-bill-maher-donald-trump-real-time-with-bill-maher-1201848895/>
- Frey, W. H. (1996). Immigration, domestic migration, and demographic balkanization in America: New evidence for the 1990s. Population and Development Review, 22(4), 741–763.
- Frey, W. H. (1999). Immigration and demographic balkanization. In J. W. Hughes & J. J. Seneca (Eds.), America’s demographic dapestry: Baseline for the new millenium (pp. 78–100). New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Glynn, P. (1993, July). The age of balkanization. Commentary. Retrieved June 30, 2019, from <https://www.commentarymagazine.com/articles/the-age-of-balkanization/>
- Goldsworthy, V. (1998). Inventing Ruritania: The imperialism of imagination. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Goldsworthy, V. (2003, August 5). Invention and in(ter)vention: The rhetoric of Balkanization. Retrieved August 25, 2016, from Eurozine: <http://www.eurozine.com/articles/2003-05-08-goldsworthy-en.html>
- Graham, S. (1922). Europe – whither bound? (Quo vadis Europa?): Being letters of travel from the capitals of Europe in the year 1921. Toronto: Ryerson Press.
- Greenwall, H. (1918, December 19). Sees German ruin for generations: Rathenau, head of great industry, predicts the “balkanization of Europe”. New York Times. Retrieved August 27, 2016, from <http://query.nytimes.com/mem/archive-free/pdf?res=9E0CE1DC1339E13ABC4851DFB4678383609EDE>
- Grubačić, A. (2010). Don’t mourn, balkanize!: Essays after Yugoslavia. Oakland: PM Press.
- H. P. Hood & Sons, 336 U.S. 525 (U.S. Supreme Court April 4, 1949).
- Hama, B. (1974). Les grands problèmes de l’Afrique des indépendances. Paris: P.J.Oswald.
- Hammond, A. (2007). Typologies of the East: On distinguishing Balkanism and Orientalism. Nineteenth-Century Contexts, 29(2–3), 201–218.
- Hansen, L. (2006). Security as practice: Discourse analysis and the Bosnian war. New York: Routledge.
- Herzfeld, N. (2017, March 3). Noreen Herzfeld on “the balkanization of the media”. Avon Hills Salon.

- Retrieved June 25, 2019, from <https://avonhillssalon.com/2017/03/03/noreen-herzfeld-on-the-balkanization-of-the-media/>
- Hughes v. Oklahoma, 441 U.S. 322 (U.S. Supreme Court April 24, 1979).
- Huntington, S. (1993). The clash of civilizations? Foreign Affairs, 27(3), 22–49.
- Jano, D. (2008). From ‘Balkanization’ to ‘Europeanization’: The stages of Western Balkans complex transformations. L’Europe en Formation, 349–350(3), 55–69.
- Jordan, D. D. (2007). A. B. Jordan: A southern editor’s view of Europe between the wars. Charlotte: Popular Street Press.
- Kaplan, R. (1993). Balkan ghosts: A journey through history. New York: Vintage Press.
- Karnitschnig, M. (2016, September 22). Welcome to EUgoslavia. Politico. Retrieved June 28, 2019, from <https://www.politico.eu/article/welcome-to-eugoslavia-balkans-regional-blocs-diplomacy-policy-eurozone-allies/>
- Liberalteacher. (2016, December 24). The balkanization of American education and the election of Donald Trump. The Public Educator. Retrieved June 6, 2017, from <https://thepubliceducator.com/2016/12/24/the-balkanization-of-american-education-and-the-election-of-donald-trump/>
- Malcolm, N. (1998). Kosovo: A short history. New York: New York University Press.
- Martin, A. (2017, April 14). The immortal Harold Bloom, the greatest literary critic on the planet. The Independent. Retrieved June 28, 2019, from https://www.independent.co.uk/news/long_reads/the-immortal-harold-bloom-the-greatest-literary-critic-on-the-planet-a7681621.html
- Mazower, M. (2002). The Balkans: A short history. New York: The Modern Library.
- Meštrović, S. (1994). The balkanization of the West: The confluence of postmodernism and post communism. London: Routledge.
- Mishkova, D. (2019). Beyond balkanism: The cholarly politics of region-making. New York: Routledge.
- Mowrer, P. S. (1921). Balkanized Europe: A study in political analysis and reconstruction. New York: E.P. Dutton & Company.
- Mwakikagile, G. (2010). Nyerere and Africa: End of an era. Pretoria: New African Press.
- Neuberger, B. (1976). The African concept of balkanisation. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 14(3), 523–529.
- Nkrumah, K. (1961). I speak of freedom: A statement of African ideology. London: William Heinemann Ltd.
- Nkrumah, K. (1963). Africa must unite. New York: Frederick A. Praeger.
- Paul, Aditya [adityampaul]. (2012, September 28). Russia doesn’t argue over trifling islands when they can claim the North Pole @venkatananth @rubenmasc <http://ow.ly/e3Nbj> [Tweet]. Retrieved June 28, 2019, from <https://twitter.com/adityampaul/status/251633464821039104>
- Pollack, J. (2011, October 16). Deconstructed dish: Burgers get balkanized. National Post. Retrieved June 6, 2017, from <http://news.nationalpost.com/appetizer/deconstructed-dish-burgers-get-balkanized>
- Rand, A. (1977, April 10). Global balkanization. Retrieved June 3, 2017, from Proctors: http://www.proctors.com.au/MRhomepage.nsf/985f14ab922be306482577d5003a2040/80757a214bb332fb4825789c002b515d/\$FILE/AR%20Global%20Balkanization%201977.pdf
- Repass, W. (2016, November 28). Balkanization. Retrieved June 30, 2019, from Hobart: http://www.hobartpulp.com/web_features/balkanization
- Said, E. (1979). Orientalism. New York: Vintage Books.
- Simić, P. (2013). Balkans and Balkanisation: Western perceptions of the Balkans in the Carnegie Commission’s Report on the Balkan Wars from 1914 to 1966. Journal of International Affairs, 18(2), 113–134. Retrieved March 3, 2017, from http://sam.gov.tr/wp-content/uploads/2013/09/Predrag_Simic.pdf.
- Todorova, M. (1994). The Balkans: From discovery to invention. Slavic Review, 53(2), 453–482.
- Todorova, M. (1996). The construction of Western discourse of the Balkans. Etnol, 19, 7–24.
- Todorova, M. (1997). Imagining the Balkans. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Todorova, M. (2010). Balkanism and postcolonialism, or on the beauty of the airplane view. In C. Bradatan & S. A. Oushakine (Eds.), Marx’s shadow: Knowledge, power and intellectuals in Eastern Europe and Russia (pp. 175–196). Lanham: Lexington Books.
- Toynbee, A. J. (1922). The Western question in Greece and Turkey: A study in the contact of civilisations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company.
- Veliu, L. (2018). #Balkanization: A critical study of otherness through Twitter. Wiesbaden: Springer.
- Vučković, V., & Đorđević, V. (2019). Balkanizing europeanization: Fight against corruption and regional relations in the Western Balkans. Bern: Peter Lang D.
- Weber, A. (2017, March 17). Carney warns of balkanization risk in global financial markets. Retrieved June 6, 2017, from <https://www.bloomberg.com/news/articles/2017-03-17/carney-warns-of-balkanization-risk-in-global-financial-markets>
- Weiss, S. J. (2011, November 13). Balkanization. Retrieved from Atlas of Transformation: <http://monumenttotransformation.org/atlas-of-transformation/html/b/balkanization/balkanization-srdjan-jovanovic-weiss.html>
- Wilkins, S. (2014, October 3). My wife has 11 patient portals and none of them are very helpful. . .nor do they play well together. LinkedIn. Retrieved July 1, 2019, from <https://www.linkedin.com/pulse/20141003130710-234729-my-wife-has-11-patient-portals-and-none-of-them-are-very-helpful-nor-do-they-play-well-together/>

Further Readings

- Goldsworthy, V. (1998). Inventing Ruritania: The imperialism of imagination. New Haven: Yale University Press.

- Hansen, L. (2006). Security as practice: Discourse analysis and the Bosnian war. New York: Routledge.
- Todorova, M. (1997). Imagining the Balkans. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Veliu, L. (2018). #Balkanization: A critical study of otherness through Twitter. Wiesbaden: Springer.

Barbarism

- ▶ Balkanization

Bargaining (see Negotiation)

- ▶ Negotiation

BDS

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

Big Data

- ▶ Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

Bosnian Genocide

Jasmin Mujanović
Brea, CA, USA

Keywords

Bosnia and Herzegovina · Crimes against humanity · Genocide · Yugoslav Wars

Definition

The Bosnian Genocide refers to the 1992–1995 campaign by Serb nationalist forces, sponsored and directed by the then government in Serbia, in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) during the Bosnian War that aimed to exterminate and expel the non-Serb population in the parts of the country that had come under the control of the self-declared Republika Srpska (RS) entity. This campaign disproportionately affected members of the Bosniak community, who account for nearly 65% of all casualties during the war. Although the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) has limited recognition of the genocide to the events in the Srebrenica area in July 1995, other relevant courts as well as the consensus opinion within the scholarly literature situates Srebrenica as only the deadliest episode within a broader, systematic genocidal project targeting Bosniaks and other non-Serbs in RS-administered territories during this period.

Introduction

The Bosnian Genocide refers to the systematic campaign of extermination and expulsions of non-Serbs in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) during the Bosnian War (1992–1995) conducted by the Army of the Republika Srpska (VRS), directed by the wartime leadership of the self-declared Republika Srpska (RS), in particular its President Radovan Karadžić, and organized and financed by the then regime in Serbia. While Serb nationalist authorities targeted both BiH's Bosniak and Croat communities during this campaign, according to the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the Bosniak community accounted for nearly 65% of the total victims of the Bosnian War, and nearly 70% of all civilian deaths during the conflict (Zwierzchowski and Tabeau 2010). As such, in most of the scholarly literature, the Bosnian Genocide refers to the specific genocidal campaign against the Bosniak community of BiH by the VRS et al.

To date, the ICTY and its residual mechanism has only formally recognized the killings in Srebrenica in July 1995 as genocidal in nature. Other European courts have expanded the genocide label, however, to other killing sites in BiH, and these, taken together with the ICTY decision(s), gesture clearly also at a legal justification for the Bosnian Genocide label. In 1999, the German Federal Court of Justice upheld a lower court ruling against Nikola Jorgić on 11 counts of genocide, committed during his tenure as a member of a Serb nationalist paramilitary in the Doboj region of central Bosnia (International Crimes Database n.d.-a). In the case of Novislav Đajić, the Bavarian Appeals Court upheld a lower court ruling on 14 counts of murder and 1 count of attempted murder (International Crimes Database n.d.-b), which the ICTY interpreted as having concluded that genocide had occurred within the territory of the municipality of Foča in the summer of 1992 (International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Former Yugoslavia since 1991, 2001, pp. 207–208). A still third German court convicted Maksim Sokolović of “five counts of inflicting physical injuries to Muslim civilians and 56 counts of unlawfully detaining Muslim civilians. [The court] also held that this conduct qualified as aiding genocide” (International Crimes Database n.d.-c).

As such, in political commemorations in the EU, the term “Srebrenica Genocide” is often used. But owing to both dissenting opinions in repeated ICTY decisions which addressed the question of whether virtually identical killings in other Bosnian municipalities constituted one singular campaign, and the widespread consensus in the academic literature that they did, there has been a growing normative shift toward adopting the term “Bosnian Genocide” (or “Genocide in Bosnia”) as a reflection of the logical improbability that a genocide – the highest crime in international law – could be localized to a single municipality.

The Historical and Political Facts of the Bosnian Genocide

There are two primary streams of evidence regarding the facts of the Bosnian Genocide: One concerns the political and practical preparatory documentation for the killings and expulsions by the RS and Serbian governments; the other focuses on the actual realization of these plans through mass killings, expulsions, extralegal internment, torture, and sexual violence. The latter was not the product of random or localized initiatives by individual units within the military and political hierarchy of the VRS/RS. The former clearly demonstrates that the actual realization of the Bosnian Genocide was politically directed and organized, and that its execution required significant resources that could only be marshalled through the specific direction of the RS and Serbian leadership.

Perhaps the most significant piece of evidence concerning the formal intent of the Serb nationalist authorities in BiH to enact a genocide is the adoption of the “Six Strategic Goals of the Serb People” by the self-declared “Assembly of the Serb People of BiH.” This body was formed in October 1991, prior to BiH’s formal declaration of independence in March 1992, and already clearly demonstrated the exclusionary, sectarian intentions of the Serb Democratic Party (SDS), the leading political bloc among ethnic Serbs in BiH.

To wit, the “Six Strategic Goals” were:

1. State delineation from the other two national communities
2. The establishment of a corridor between Semberia [sic] and Krajina
3. The establishment of a corridor in the valley of the Drina River, meaning the elimination of the Drina as a border between the two Serb states
4. The establishment of a border on the rivers of the Una and Neretva
5. The division of the city of Sarajevo into Serb and Muslim parts, and the establishment of a state authority in each part
6. Creation of an outlet for Republika Srpska to the sea (Karcic 2015)

The summation of all six goals was the creation of an ethnically homogenous political space in a region defined by centuries-long ethnic cohabitation and pluralism. Moreover, the realization of such a homogenous space could only be accomplished using violence and terror, as the entire RS leadership both recognized and embraced. However, as Edina Becirevic (2014, p. 61) notes, the “Six Strategic Goals” were themselves a “program of activity and . . . measures. . . designed within the wider context of a war plan known simply as ‘RAM’ (which means ‘the frame,’ a reference to ‘reframing Yugoslavia’). A functional extension of the SANU Memorandum, RAM had existed since at least early 1991; it outlined plans to achieve Yugoslavia without Slovenia, and to conquer territories of Croatia and [BiH].” The SANU Memorandum was a treatise written in 1985 by members of the Serbian Academy of Arts and Sciences (SANU), and leaked to the Yugoslav media in 1986, which laid out a comprehensive set of grievances concerning the overall status of Serbia and the Serbian people within the federation. It claimed that Serbs in Kosovo were the victims of a genocide organized by local Albanians and that Serbs were the subject of widespread discrimination throughout that country; that Serbia was being economically plundered by Slovenia and Croatia; that there was no distinct Bosnian and Herzegovinian people and that all ethnic Serb intellectuals and artists from BiH were exclusively Serbian; and that status of the Serbian nation could only be properly addressed the cultural and political unity of the Serbs. In short, the document became the intellectual foundation of the Serb nationalist revival during the 1980s and 1990s. Becirevic goes on to observe that “RAM originated in the top circles of Serb operatives of the Yugoslav counterintelligence service. It involved the deployment of a network of secret operatives whose aim was to arm Serbs in Croatia [BiH] and to prepare them for war. The RAM plan was presented as evidence in The Hague to prove that Slobodan Milošević had a clear and developed scheme to purge non-Serbs from territories he aimed to conquer in Croatia and [BiH]” (p. 62).

Taken together, the SANU Memorandum, RAM, and the “Six Strategic Goals” represent a clear body of evidence showing intent to forcibly exterminate and expel non-Serbs from the territories in Croatia and BiH which came under the control of Belgrade’s proxy forces in those countries between 1991 and 1995. The locus of these activities was BiH, as the incorporation of the “west bank of the Drina River” (i.e., eastern BiH) had since emergence of the modern Serbian state in the early nineteenth century been, arguably, the central foreign policy concern of successive generations of Serbian nationalist leaders (Hajdarpašić 2015, pp. 18–52).

This gambit, in turn, was the loadstar of the broader concept of a “Greater Serbia,” which Milošević and his counterparts in BiH and Croatia sought to create through their genocidal efforts (Donia 2015, pp. 10, 47–48). That is an irridentist conception of Serbia, whose origins too date to the nineteenth century, which would, ideally, see the state stretch from the “Virovitica–Karlovac–Karlobag line” in Croatia and include all Yugoslav territories to its south and east (i.e., approximately two-thirds of Croatia, and all of BiH, Serbia proper, Vojvodina, Kosovo, Montenegro, and North Macedonia). By the time of the onset of the Croatian and Bosnian Wars, that concept had been reduced to the occupation of the territories which initially formed the RS in BiH and Republika Srpska Krajina (RSK) in Croatia, as well as what was then the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia, Montenegro, and the Serbian provinces of Vojvodina and Kosovo).

The Bosnia Genocide in a Historical Context

Belgrade’s expansionist-sectarian aspirations in the 1990s were not entirely without practical precedent either. The expansion of the Serbian state into contemporary Southeastern Serbia, Kosovo, and North Macedonia over the course of the latter half of the nineteenth century and the early twentieth century had also entailed the mass expulsion (and extermination) of non-Serb peoples, in particular Slavic Muslims (in particular Bosniaks) and ethnic Albanians. Djordje Stefanović (pp. 468–469) writes of the policies of the then Obrenović court in seizing control from the aforementioned territories from the receding Ottoman Empire in the 1870s and 1880s, and the ensuing demographic changes in the region:

...the Serbian regime ‘encouraged’ about 71,000 Muslims, including 49,000 Albanians ‘to leave.’ The regime then gradually settled Serbs and Montenegrins in these territories. Prior to 1878, the Serbs comprised not more than one half of the population of Niš, the largest city in the region; by 1884 the Serbian share rose to 80%. According to Ottoman sources, Serbian forces also destroyed mosques in Leskovac, Prokuplje, and Vranje (Stefanović 2005).

Corresponding with Stefanović’s account, Edin Hajdarpašić (2008, p. 719) observes that “[in] most towns in Serbia, the native Muslim population was forced to leave in several waves that culminated in the 1860s and 1870s with the expulsion of nearly all ‘Turks’ and the destruction of most mosques and other sites associated with Islam or the Ottomans.”

It is important to recall that the term “Turk” in the nineteenth century did not necessarily refer to ethnic Turks but was more commonly a derogatory term for Slavic Muslims, who in converting to Islam were characterized by Serb nationalists as now being “Turkified” (from the Serbian “poturice”/“poturčeni”) (Sells 1998, p. 41). This, in turn, was an act of categorical betrayal because in the Serb nationalist discourse these Slavic Muslims were, in reality, lapsed Serbs who had betrayed their faith (Orthodoxy) and their nation and adopted the customs and religion of the invading Ottomans. As such, violence done against such apostates was a necessary part of the purification and liberation of the Serb body politic. This logic was one of the central ideological claims of the architects of the Bosnian Genocide. Ratko Mladić, for instance, declared upon the entry of Serb nationalist forces into the Srebrenica enclave in July 1995: “We gift this town to the Serb people. Finally, the moment has come, after the uprising against the Dahijas, for us to take revenge against the Turks” (Mujanović 2021). The dahije were members of the Janissary order who seized power in the Sanjak of Smederevo in 1799, in opposition to the central rule of the Porte, and were in turn toppled by local Serbian rebels during the First Serbian Uprising (1804–1813), which helped precipitate the formation of the modern Serbian state after 1815. A clear line was thus drawn by the architects of the Bosnian Genocide and the anti-Muslim pogroms in Serbia in the nineteenth century.

In that sense, the Bosnian Genocide was conceptualized by its architects as the culmination of a process that had begun more than a century earlier. This further speaks to the necessarily systematic nature of the violence during the 1990s. Precisely because the Bosnian Genocide was the “completion” of the purification of the whole of the political space conceived of as being “rightly” under the dominion of the Serbian state – i.e., the extermination and expulsion of Muslims from the incipient “Greater Serbia” – it required the political and logistical support of the government in Belgrade.

The Serbian State and the Genocide in BiH

Given the scale of the violence, it is not possible within the confines of this discussion to provide an exhaustive accounting of each relevant atrocity site. Despite this, it is possible to provide a broad overview of the major episodes in this sustained campaign, of which the killings in Srebrenica were only the culmination. After all, by July 1995 Srebrenica had been under siege for the better part of 4 years, and every major settlement along the eastern border of BiH had been almost wholly cleansed of its non-Serb population by the VRS et al.

As Becirevic (2014) notes, the SDS regime in BiH had, in coordination with their superiors in Belgrade, laid the groundwork for the onset of the genocide already by 1991. This preparatory work involved the creation of so-called “crisis staffs” and the detailed planning of the onset of atrocities by Serb militants; handing out arms and munitions to Serb nationalist paramilitaries; identifying and seizing critical transportation nodes and corridors; and identifying Bosniak and Croat community leaders and otherwise significant individuals (such as those with military training) and targeting these in the first round of executions (a process referred to as “eliticide,” the purposeful destruction of social and cultural elites within a given community). The SDS regime had so effectively laid the groundwork for the commencement of this project that when the violence was fully unleashed – in April 1992, nominally in response to BiH’s declaration of independence in March – it effectively amounted to a “blitzkrieg” (Becirevic, p. 82). Noel Malcolm, arguably the premier historian of BiH, likewise observed that it was “evident that. . .this entire joint operation of regular and paramilitary forces. . .had been prepared for quite some time” (1994, p. 237). “Using the advantages of surprise and overwhelming superiority,” he continues “the federal [Yugoslav] army and its paramilitary adjuncts carved out within the first five to six weeks an area of conquest covering more than 60% of the entire Bosnian territory” (ibid., p. 238).

The timeline and territorial spread of these operations, in turn, correspond exactly to the major killing sites of the first portion of the Bosnian Genocide. By the end of 1992, for instance, the towns and outlying areas of Bijeljina, Brčko, Banja Luka, Bosanski Brod, Foča, Prijedor, Višegrad, and Zvornik, among others, had been completely overrun by VRS forces. Their entire non-Serb populations were by that point already executed, expelled, or detained in a network of concentration camps that spanned the territory of VRS-occupied BiH. In these camps, physical and sexual violence was routine. As many as 50,000 people are estimated to have been raped or otherwise sexually assaulted during the war (Bell 2018, p. 3), the majority of which are believed to have been Bosniak women assaulted by Serb nationalist forces. The scholarly literature has centered sexual violence as a central pillar of the Bosnian Genocide, wherein the desecration and violation of women’s bodies and personal autonomy was seen by perpetrators as instrumental to destroying their community in its entirety.

Simultaneously, nearly every other major population center in the country was besieged by VRS forces, with the civilian population deliberately targeted, including the capital Sarajevo, but also Tuzla, Bihać, Mostar, Goražde, Žepa, and, of course, Srebrenica. The Siege of Sarajevo, the conduct of which resulted in a litany of crimes against humanity convictions at the ICTY for Karadžić, Mladić, as well as two leading VRS commanders, Stanislav Galić and Dragomir Milošević, was especially significant in this respect. Due to the near-total encirclement of the capital for the duration of the war, the Bosnian government was severely limited in its capacities to mount a sustained defense of its citizens. As such, large portions of government held territory operated essentially as self-contained units, where in the Army of the Republic of BiH (ARBiH) and the civilian population could depend on little in the way of direction or aid from the government in Sarajevo. This remained the case until the tail end of 1994, at least, and continued into 1995 (most obviously in Srebrenica but also Žepa).

In the capital itself, the civilian population was exposed to continuous bombardment, targeted sniper fire, and cut off from electricity, water, food, and medical supplies except those that were occasionally brought in by the UN. According to the Bosnian Book of Dead, generally considered the most exhaustive account of the war’s death toll, 13,952 people were killed in the capital alone – of which 5,564 were civilians and 705 were minors (Tokača 2012, pp. 164–166). VRS forces never successfully managed to seize the city as such, but they made deep intrusions into the Grbavica neighborhood, for instance, which allowed them to freely target every major civilian installation in the city; hospitals and clinics, schools, libraries, archives, mosques, and Catholic churches were all deliberately targeted.

This campaign of “culturicide” – the destruction of culturally significant (but militarily irrelevant) objects and sites – was one of the major war aims of the VRS, and its political leadership. Much as with the aforementioned policy of eliticide the destruction of BiH’s cultural heritage, in particular segments of which were associated with the Bosniak community, aimed to destroy both this community’s history and sources of identity, as well as to eliminate all traces of multiethnic, prewar life (Nikolić 2016, p. 170). In so doing, the architects of the war and genocide in BiH aimed to not merely remake the country’s demographic and political structure but also to rewrite its history, an attempt which can be likened to the “Year Zero” concept by the Khmer

Rouge regime in Cambodia, which sought to do away with all social and cultural history prior to the assumption of power by this movement in 1975.

Postwar Genocide Denial and Triumphalism

The RS regime and its benefactors in Belgrade, ultimately, failed in erasing the Bosniak people or their culture from BiH, or appending the Bosnian state to Serbia. After the signing of the Dayton Peace Accords in 1995, the RS became one of the constitutive entities of the postwar Bosnian state, but BiH retained its independence and internationally recognized sovereignty, which it had gained in 1992. Yet the Serb nationalist project in BiH also, doubtlessly, succeeded by certain key metrics. The Bosniak community was devastated by the genocide; in large parts of Eastern and Northwestern BiH (i.e., in the RS entity) the Bosniak and broader non-Serb population declined precipitously. According to the 2013 census, the first census in the country since 1991, the Bosniak population in what is today the RS entity in effect halved, declining from 441,077 (28.0%) to 171,839 (14.0%); the Croat population declined from 144,129 (9.2%) to 29,645 (2.4%). During this same period the Serb population increased from 872,610 (55.5%) to 1,001,299 (81.5%) (Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina 2013). More broadly, the degree of ethnic polarization across the country has greatly increased, while sites and the extent of ethnic cohabitation has decreased (although not disappeared).

More fundamentally, it is difficult not to characterize the mere existence of the RS, even as administrative unit within BiH, as a major “accomplishment” of the genocide. This is a polity whose creation was explicitly premised on the genocidal extermination and expulsion of non-Serbs, and its postwar leadership has remained both openly hostile to the restoration of multiethnic life, and maintains an officially negationist and revisionist posture toward the facts of the genocide and the nature of the dissolution of Yugoslavia. Returnee communities, in particular ethnic Bosniaks, are the targets of frequent harassment, intimidation, and institutional discrimination (Al Jazeera Balkans 2021); Bosniak children are prevented from referring to their language as “Bosnian” within RS schools (Radio Slobodna Evropa 2021); discrimination against non-Serbs in the social service and health care sectors is widespread (Radio Slobodna Evropa 2021); and the government spends millions of Euros every year promoting and publishing media which denies the genocide, and/or glorifies perpetrators (Rosensaft 2021).

In a society that is characterized by large-scale segregation, the RS is a virtual apartheid regime, a political space significantly less free and less democratic (including for ethnic Serbs who happen to oppose the long ruling Alliance of Independent Social Democrats [SNSD] government) than the already illiberal state within which it is embedded. The SNSD was founded in 1996 as a relatively moderate alternative to the extremist and militant SDS. The party was part of an ostensibly reformist coalition government in the late 1990s, during which time the bloc’s leader, Milorad Dodik, was at pains to emphasize his pro-Western credentials. After this government was ousted in 2000, Dodik and the SNSD reconstituted themselves as the premier opposition bloc in the region, and by 2006 they had won government outright. As late as 2007, Dodik maintained some pretense of his old reformist credentials; in 2007, for instance, he formally recognized the events in Srebrenica as genocide, and his party continued to embrace NATO membership for BiH for some years later. But already by the decade’s end the party had moved sharply to the right. In 2012 the party was ejected from the Socialist International for its embrace of ultranationalism, secessionism, and genocide denial. Today, the SNSD is, rhetorically at least, as extremist as the wartime SDS, while the SDS, ironically, has reconstituted itself as a comparatively mild-mannered nationalist-conservative bloc.

Moreover, the Bosnian Genocide has entered the collective political imagination of the Western far right, as a model for the kind of anti-Muslim pogroms that they desire in their own societies.

As noted elsewhere, “[b]y the 2010s, Bosnian Genocide denial and the valorization of Serb nationalist war criminals became a staple of Western far-right discourses – a pillar of their ideological and political lexicon like the Confederacy, the Third Reich, or the African apartheid regimes. It soon started featuring in the manifestos of far-right terrorists including those of Anders Breivik and Brenton Tarrant, among others” (Mujanović 2021).

For Bosnians and Herzegovinians themselves, especially members of the Bosniak community, it is the institutionalized and government-sponsored regime of negationism and denial in both the RS entity and contemporary Serbia that is the most immediate concern, as well as the state ambitions of these governments to again undermine or challenge the sovereignty and territorial integrity of the Bosnian state. The experience of the genocide has convinced large segments of the Bosniak community that their survival as a distinct people is intrinsically tied to the preservation of the state of BiH. This is especially so because inasmuch as denial represents a form of continuing rhetorical violence against their community, the architects of the genocide clearly succeeded also in capturing the political mainstream of ethnic Serb politics across the region. Absent a major, categorical transformation within this community – of which there are only fragmented signs at present – Bosniaks and other “pro-BiH” actors in BiH (i.e., the broad spectrum of political parties and actors who, generally, are advocates of BiH’s sovereignty and territorial integrity but are also pro-EU, pro-NATO, and advocates for liberal-democratic constitutional reforms of the existing Dayton-era constitution) will necessarily feel that that they and their community remain targets of a committed and militant revanchist project.

Summary

The Bosnian Genocide was the systematic campaign of extermination and expulsions of non-Serbs, and Bosniaks in particular, conducted by Serbia’s proxy forces in BiH during the Bosnian War. While to date only the July 1995 killings in Srebrenica have formally been characterized as genocide by the ICTY, the scholarly, and increasingly political, consensus considers the entirety of the “Greater Serbia” project in BiH as part of one, singular, genocide. Despite this, revisionist and negationist accounts remain mainstream in Serbia and the RS entity in BiH, and much of the political agenda which animated the killings in the first place remains intact within the broader Serb political establishment.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans
- ▶ EU Conditionality in the Western Balkans
- ▶ Grounded Nationalism
- ▶ Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Identity and Political Violence
- ▶ Protection of Civilians
- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia

References

- Al Jazeera Balkans. (2021). BiH: Povratnike uznemirio napad u Vlasenici. Retrieved from Al Jazeera Balkans: <https://balkans.aljazeera.net/news/balkan/2021/7/29/bih-povratnike-uznemirio-napad-u-vlasenici>
- Becirevic, E. (2014). Genocide on the Drina River. New Haven and London: Yale University Press.
- Bell, J. O. (2018). The Bosnian war crimes justice strategy a decade later (FICHL policy briefs series). Torkel Opsahl Academic EPublisher, Florence, Italy.
- Donia, R. (2015). Radovan Karadžić: Architect of the Bosnian genocide. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina. (2013). Entitet: RS. Retrieved from Popis 2013: <http://www.statistika.ba/?show=12&id=29800>
- Hajdarpašić, E. (2008). Out of the ruins of the ottoman empire: Reflections on the ottoman legacy in South-eastern Europe. Middle Eastern Studies, 44, 715–734.
- Hajdarpašić, E. (2015). Whose Bosnia? Nationalism and political imagination in the Balkans, 1840–1914. Ithaca and London: Cornell University Press.
- International Crimes Database. (n.d.-a). The prosecutor v. Maksim Sokolovic. Retrieved from International Crimes Database: <http://www.internationalcrimesdatabase.org/Case/44/Sokolovic/>

- International Crimes Database. (n.d.-b). The prosecutor v. Nikola Jorgić. Retrieved from International Crimes Database: <http://www.internationalcrimesdatabase.org/Case/1088/Jorgi%C4%87/>
- International Crimes Database. (n.d.-c). The Prosecutor v. offciv. Novislav Djajic. Retrieved from International Crimes Database: <http://www.internationalcrimesdatabase.org/Case/1096>
- International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Former Yugoslavia since 1991. (2001). Prosecutor v. Radislav Krstic. Retrieved from International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: <https://www.icty.org/x/cases/krstic/tjug/en/krs-tj010802e.pdf>
- Karcic, H. (2015). Blueprint for genocide: the destruction of Muslims in Eastern Bosnia. Retrieved from openDemocracy: <https://www.opendemocracy.net/en/can-europe-make-it/blueprint-for-genocide-destruction-of-muslims-in-eastern-bosnia/>
- Malcolm, N. (1994). Bosnia: A short history. London: Papermac.
- Mujanović, J. (2021). The Balkan roots of the far Right's "great replacement" theory. Retrieved from Newlines: <https://newlinesmag.com/essays/the-balkan-roots-of-the-far-rights-great-replacement-theory/>
- Nikolić, D. (2016). Echo of silence: Memory, politics, and heritage in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina, a case study: Višegrad. In B. T. Plewa (Ed.), Whose memory? Which future? Remembering ethnic cleansing and lost cultural diversity in Eastern, Central and Southeastern Europe (pp. 170–207). New York and Oxford: Berghahn.
- Radio Slobodan Evropa. (2021). Ustavni sud BiH utvrdio da su učenici u Konjević Polju diskriminirani. Retrieved from Radio Slobodan Evropa: <https://www.slobodnaevropa.org/a/ustavni-sud-bih-utvrdio-da-su-u-%C4%8Denici-u-konjevi%C4%87-polju-diskriminirani/31324416.html>
- Radio Slobodna Evropa (2021). Salkić: Sistemska diskriminacija Bošnjaka u Republici Srpskoj. Retrieved from Radio Slobodna Evropa: <https://www.slobodnaevropa.org/a/30675729.html>
- Rosensaft, M. Z. (2021). Deceptive Report Escalates Srebrenica Genocide Denial Campaign. Retrieved from Just Security: <https://www.justsecurity.org/author/rosensaftmenachem/>
- Sells, M. A. (1998). The bridge betrayed: Religion and genocide in Bosnia. Berkley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.
- Stefanović, D. (2005). Seeing the Albanians through Serbian eyes: The inventors of the tradition of intolerance and their critics, 1804–1939. European History Quarterly, 35, 465–492.
- Tokača, M. (2012). The Bosnian book of the dead: Human losses in Bosnia and Herzegovina 1991–1995. Sarajevo: Istraživačko dokumentacioni centar Sarajevo.
- Zwierzchowski, J., & Tabeau, E. (2010). The 1992–95 War in Bosnia and Herzegovina: Census-based multiple system estimation of casualties undercount. Retrieved from International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia: https://www.icty.org/x/file/About/OTP/War_Demographics/en/bih_casualty_undercount_conf_paper_100201.pdf

Bottom-Up Peace

- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Technology and Peace

Brazil

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America

BRICS

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

C

Calendars

► Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis

Billy Agwanda¹, Israel Nyaburi Nyadera^{2,3} and Ugur Yasin Asal¹

¹Istanbul Commerce University, Istanbul, Turkey

²University of Macau, Macau, China

³Ankara Yildirim Beyazit University, Ankara, Turkey

Synonyms

Civil War; Conflict; Identity and Conflict; Marginalization; Nationalism

Description

Decades after independence, Cameroon, once divided between the British and the French during the colonial period, continues to experience sustained conflicts between its Francophone and Anglophone citizens. The government has failed to reconcile the sharp differences coined around linguistic identities inherited from the former colonial powers. While this crisis threatens to split the country, it has received little attention from scholars and peace advocates. This entry traces the historical roots of the conflict and discusses the role of social media in spreading identity consciousness, and how slow response by international actors has prolonged the crisis. The entry identifies government failure in post-independence state/nation building as being a catalyst to the protracted conflict. The entry provides recommendations encouraging swift action to address the deep-rooted grievances, proactive measures to avert a possible crisis in the future, and involvement of regional or international actors to pool resources needed to promote sustainable peace.

Introduction

Since the end of World War 2, the nature of conflict and war has greatly transformed. Whereas there is a significant drop in interstate conflicts, intrastate conflicts have drastically increased. Some of these conflicts have been due to causes such as religious intolerance, ethnicity, struggle for political power, secession, terrorism, and the struggle over scarce natural resources (Duffield 2014; Nyadera and Bincof 2019; Kaldor 2005).

The manner in which these conflicts are fought has often increased time frames for conflict resolution and resulted in extensive loss of human life and resources. While conflicts have been widespread across the globe, Africa has been host to some of the most vicious conflicts with some spanning decades (Nyadera 2018; Kacowicz 1997; Deng 1996). Indeed, postcolonial African states continue to experience the challenges of establishing single national identities largely due to the diverse nature of African societies and their colonial heritage that either exploited these differences or attempted to change the indigenous cultural identities. In Cameroon, competing colonial interests by the British and the French left legacies that continue to impact the country for more than a century later.

Cameroon is located in Central Africa and neighbors Central African Republic to the east, Chad (northeast), Republic of the Congo (southeast), Equatorial Guinea and Gabon to the South, and Nigeria (west). Having become independent in 1960, Cameroon marked its 59th anniversary as a republic in 2019. However, this has been arguably the most volatile periods for the country that continues to be deeply entrenched in decades of domestic conflict emerging from colonial era disagreements and sentiments. These disagreements are manifested in the ongoing Anglophone conflict that has further been fuelled by ethnicity and religious intolerance.

Cameroon was founded under the sphere of influence of the Germans in 1884 before they were displaced by a military coalition of the British, Belgians, and the French during World War I in 1919 (Friedrichsmeyer et al. 1998). This led to the consequent subdivision of Cameroon into regions under the protectorate of both England and France. When the League of Nations was established as the new international organization among other mandates to guarantee world peace, Cameroon was formally divided to France and Britain with each European power controlling four-fifths and one-fifth of the Cameroonian territory respectively (Dupraz 2019: 644). The region under British influence included a long stretch near the eastern Nigerian border that the British referred to as Northern and Southern Cameroon.

After the collapse of the League of Nations following its failure to prevent World War I, Cameroon reverted to a United Nations trust territory in 1946 (Jones 1965; Gardinier 1978) but still under the sphere of influence of the French and British. While both colonial powers were reluctant to give up their colonial territories, the anticolonial sentiments blowing across Africa and the new constraints put by the UN Charter regarding self-determination of former colonies led to the establishment of an autonomous state of French Cameroon in 1956. Four years later in 1960, the Republic of Cameroon acquired full independence under the presidency of Ahmadou Ahidjo (Fanso 1999: 285). While the British had merged their colonial sphere of influence in Cameroon (northwest and southwest Cameroon) to Nigeria due to administrative purposes (Ngo 1987: 245), United Nations arranged a referendum in the north-western and south-western regions to decide whether they preferred a political union with the Republic of Cameroon.

Whereas the Southwesterners voted in favor of such a union, the Northwesterners rejected the vote in favor of a merger with Nigeria (Mehler 2014: 53). Consequently, the new Federal Republic of Cameroon constituted two states including the former French zone (Cameroon Oriental) and Cameroon Occidental that was under the British influence.

Soon after independence, the government began to marginalize the federalist Anglophone political class and its nationalist movement that was being spearheaded by the Union des Populations du Cameroun (UPC) by abolishing party politics. The Union Nationale Camerounaise (UNC) that was established in 1966 became the sole entity to take charge of all organized social and political affairs (Bayart 1973: 132). The regime of President Ahmadou further consolidated power in 1972 by abolishing all federal states and cutting down on the powers of the subnational states (Eyoh 2004: 99). Following radical antidemocratic changes in the political system, the state was officially renamed as the Republic of Cameroon, and this marked the beginning of the Anglophone discontentment in the new republic.

The Colonial Roots of Anglophone Cameroon Conflict

The tensions experienced in the Anglophone occupied regions in Cameroon emerged from an intricate and highly contested process of decolonization in Cameroon beginning from the 1950s to 1960s when the country gained independence. Unfortunately for British Southern Cameroon, independence meant that they either accept joining Nigeria (integration) or Cameroon (reunification), without the right of gaining independence. This option was operationalized during UN-imposed plebiscite in February 11, 1961, it established the basis of the Union between the two Cameroons. According to Konings (2005), the decision by Southern Cameroonians to vote in favor of establishing a union with the French Cameroon during the 1961 plebiscite was because of the prevailing discontentment of the people toward the British indirect administrative system and the influence of Nigerians in the region.

The British had serious oversight for failing to take into consideration the territorial boundaries between Nigeria that was under their complete sphere of influence and Cameroon. This led to conflicts of interests between Nigerians and Southern Cameroonians as it facilitated the dominant Igbo tribe from Nigeria to easily migrate into Southern Cameroon, develop enterprises, and impose themselves as the key actors in various sectors of the economy through trading in goods such as palm oil and transportation (Delancey 1974). By the 1950s, the Igbo from Nigeria were the leading economic actors in towns such as Kumba, Tiko, and Limbe, and worked in important institutions such as the Cameroon Development Cooperation (Konings 2005). Additionally, they constituted approximately 30% of the total population in Southern Cameroon and 80% of the entire work force in the region.

The increasing domination by the Igbo from Nigeria led to the emergence of marginalization sentiments by indigenous Southern Cameroonians who accused the British administration in Nigeria for being behind their economic and political marginalization (Konings 2005: 8). They demanded for more political representation in the Nigerian administration that seemed a more important colony to the British and succeeded in this endeavor by attaining regional status in the Nigerian Federation even though the autonomy was limited. The favoritism of Nigeria by the British at the expense of the Southern Cameroonians established an Anglophone Cameroon nationalistic consciousness that was exemplified by their decision to vote in favor of forming a union with the French Cameroon as a possible means to regain their sovereignty in 1961 (Tiewa and Vudo 2015). Northern Cameroon however voted to remain with Nigeria. While this was a strategic move at the time, it has proven to be a precursor of today's Anglophone problems in Cameroon.

What had appeared to be a big success for the Southern Anglophone Cameroon toward increasing their sovereignty turned out to be a "trap" because their emancipation for federalism did not account for their differences of cultural identity that was more oriented with the English. Instead, this merger became a transitional process in which the region became integrated into a highly centralized unitary state where they became a minority (Ebune 1992). The failure to grant independence to Southern Cameroon and a forced plebiscite to choose whether to either join Nigeria or French Cameroon solidified grounds for further marginalization of the Anglophone Cameroonians. This gradually established a strong sense of Anglophone consciousness; sentiments of being economically, culturally, and politically marginalized; and a sense of being dominated by the Francophone-hegemonic state. According to a column published in the East Oregonian (6th June 2010), these sentiments and the recognition of the cultural dichotomy between Anglophone and Francophone Cameroon continues to exist and has often led to tensions. Fanso (2017) argues that the benchmark for finding a solution as claimed by the Southern Cameroonians has therefore been pegged to the attainment of autonomy for their own state, Ambazonia, or the implementation of a federalism system of governance as envisioned during independence.

The Reemergence of the Anglophonic Consciousness After Independence

The popular sentiment among Southern Cameroonians led by the proindependence nationalists maintains that the decolonization process did not offer them a meaningful opportunity to determine their destiny through independence. This is because the federal arrangement that was provided for during independence was unconstitutionally abolished by the Francophone-dominated central government (Konings and Nyamnjoh 1997: 196). Anglophone Cameroonians therefore developed the feeling of being marginalized not only economically but also in other key sectors of the society such as education and in judicial processes. Moreover, despite the substantive oil reserves that were discovered in the regions dominated by the Anglophone Cameroonians, they did not benefit from the natural resource.

The 1990s became a significant time frame in as far as the Anglophone conflict in Cameroon is concerned. While Africa was experiencing the wind of political liberalization in the 1990s, Cameroon was not left behind. Specifically, the region dominated by Anglophone Cameroonians witnessed the emergence of political parties and movements that became the avenues through which a rejuvenated push for national independence of the region was advanced. In 1990, the Social Democratic Party was established in the Anglophone region and received significant support of 86.3% in Northwest and 51.6% in Southwest during the 1992 presidential elections (Chereji and Lohkoko 2012: 14). Even though the party did not register overall presidential electoral vote victory that declared in favor of the CPDM, the Anglophone regions contested the results as having been rigged (Gwaibi 2018: 12).

The violent protests led to the declaration of a state of emergency by President Paul Biya in 1992 for 3 months with the opposition leaders from the Anglophone areas placed under house surveillance (Cameroon Tribune, 26 October 1992). While these acts were condemned by USA, Germany, and European Union with threats of cutting down foreign aid, France continued to provide assistance to the Biya regime to safeguard French interests in Cameroon. According to Konings (1997), this period also saw the emergence of radical groups such as the Ambazonia movement that pushed for secession, and other groups such as the All Anglophone Congress (AAC) and the Cameroon Anglophone Movement (CAM) that pushed for federalism (Nkwi and Nyamnjoh 2011: 295).

While the popularity of the Social Democratic Party was dwindling among the Anglophone Cameroonians because it had evolved into a national party drawing support even among the Francophone Cameroonians, new groups mounted pressure for political autonomy (Konings and Nyamnjoh 1997: 216). These other political formations such as the Ambazonia movement and the Cameroon Anglophone Movement organized demonstrations and other forms of civil disobedience against the Francophone-dominated central government. These included boycott of national days of celebrations such as the national feast day on 20th May which they declared as a day of mourning and shame (Nkwi and Nyamnjoh 2011: 217). Instead they rallied the Anglophone Cameroonians to celebrate the “day of independence” on 1st October and the “day of the plebiscite” on the 11th February.

It is widely argued that the reemergence of the Anglophone consciousness after independence is influenced by four fundamental issues that have remained unsolved. These include communal stratification, economic exploitation, political subordination, and a clash of cultural identity.

- (i) The communal stratification that emerged from the partition of Cameroon into culturally distinctive administrative territories after independence has only acted to further deepen the existing differences. While the Anglophone regions were allocated two political representative territories, the centralization of power and violation of constitutional provisions have only increased the desire for the region to actively demand for secession. According to Ladson-Billings (1995), this communal stratification only reminds the Anglophones of their identity and emphasizes their perceptions of being different from the Francophones. Indeed, it is these feelings of indifference that this entry argues have solidified the collective Anglophonic consciousness.

- (ii) Economic marginalization continues to be a significant driving factor for the call to secession of Ambazonia. The residents of Anglophone Cameroon singled out the absence of significant development projects in the region such as good schools, hospitals, accessible roads, or market centers despite the region being a key contributor to the Cameroonian economy through the oil wells under government control in their region. The SONARA oil refinery with an estimated annual output of 2.1 million tonnes of crude oil (Reuters 2019) has been cited by Anglophone Cameroonians as one among other state-owned companies in which they are marginalized in terms of employment. Another source of economic grievance is imbalance in allocation of opportunities. According to Chereji and Lohkoko (2012), high-ranking officials in the corporation are from Francophone regions while Anglophones have relegated to lower employment cadres to work as security guards and drivers. Additionally, in another major factory called the CDC Banana Plantation in Tiko, the top management is drawn entirely from the Francophone regions while the Anglophone Cameroonians are relegated to work as manual laborers with low remuneration and very poor working conditions (Chereji and Lohkoko, 2012). In other parts of the country, Anglophones also cite very low chances to gain employment as was witnessed in 2011 when the graduate recruitment program targeting 25,000 graduates in Cameroon only absorbed 1000 Anglophones in low clerical positions.
- (iii) Political subordination underlies the continued struggle for secession by Ambazonia. Having been dominated by the British during the colonial times and the Francophone Cameroonians after independence, the Anglophones continue to feel colonized in their own homeland. The successive regimes of Cameroon reneged on the reunification agreement that granted some degree of political autonomy to the Anglophones through the federal system. When Paul Biya took over power in 1982, all influential administrative positions in the national government were reserved for the Francophone Cameroonians. According to Takougang (1993), the President, Speaker of the National Assembly, Minister for Justice and Legal Affairs, Keeper of the Seal, the Chief Justice, and the Minister for Finance were all Francophone Cameroonians.

- (iv) Clash of cultural identity also plays a significant role in fuelling the secessionist consciousness by the Anglophone Cameroonians. According to Reader (2009: 31), identity can lead to conflict when there is pursuit of competing needs and values within different groups or identities. Nfor (2000) and Anyangwe (2014) argue that residents of Cameroon Anglophone have protested against the attempt by the central government to marginalize their language and culture. They pointed out government measures such as transformation of the General Certificate of Education Board into a parasitical with its management exclusively appointed by the presidency; exclusive use of French language in public offices, whereas the country is bilingual.

Contemporary Manifestations of the Anglophone Conflict

Since 2016, the Anglophone conflict has significantly increased as more Anglophone movements whether those that support decentralization of power (federalism) or proindependence have taken up arms through violence or petitioning of international and regional organizations such as the United Nations and the African Union. Before the current spate of violence characterized by deaths, bloodshed, and destruction of properties, there were a series of events that fuelled transition into the current state of affairs. Foremost, in 2016, thousands of teachers and lawyers in the Anglophone regions took to the streets to protest what they termed as a systematic marginalization by the Cameroon government. Among many other claims, these groups of protesting lawyers and teachers accused the government of deploying jurists who were only conversant with French civil laws and not the common law that applied to the Anglophone regions. Government teachers deployed to the Anglophone regions were also faulted for not being able to speak in English.

On the 21st November 2016, a local radio newscaster called Mancho in Bamenda (an Anglophone city) sparked a movement popularly referred to as the Coffin Revolution when he went to one of the busiest roundabouts in the city and stood inside a coffin to castigate the Cameroonian government (Voice of Africa, 26 May 2018). Mancho rebuked the government for the low structural and economic development in the city and declared his willingness to die protesting against the systematic cultural and economic marginalization on the Anglophone Cameroonians. This event was soon followed by another protest by students from the University of Buea in the Anglophone region on the 28th November 2016. Key among their grievances were the failure of the government to remit education grants for the final-year students and the insistence of the university administration that all students must pay a fee to check their results from the university's online portal system.

The extent of frustrations by a large section of the Anglophone Cameroon regarding their socio-cultural, political, and economic marginalization by the hegemonic Francophone-dominated government of Cameroon was captured in a speech delivered by Joseph Wirba to the parliament on 13th December 2016. While highlighting the plights of Anglophone Cameroon that included allegations of sexual violence such as rape by security forces, police brutality on students, and excessive use of force on protesters, he said:

Our ancestors and forefathers trusted you to go into a gentleman's agreement. That two people who consider themselves brothers could go to live together. If this is what you show us after 55 years, then those who are saying that we should break Cameroon are right. They are correct! The people of West Cameroon cannot be your slaves. The people of West Cameroon, are not, you did not conquer them in war. When injustice becomes law, resistance becomes a duty.

The significance of these events in understanding how the conflict has transformed is that the government responded in a manner that has been criticized as having been excessive and provocative to the Anglophone Cameroonians. In the protests by students, lawyers, and teachers, the government cracked down heavily on the protesters. Videos emerging on several social media accounts such as Twitter and Facebook document how police among other illegitimate acts, beat up students ruthlessly, broke into students' residential buildings, forced students to roll in mud, and arrested and humiliated students of either gender. More than 100 students arrested during protests claimed to have been tortured and detained in dehumanizing conditions (Tembon 2018: 8–9). The demonstrating Anglophone lawyers also claimed to have been subjected to brutal treatment and humiliation including the confiscation of their professional attires such as gowns and wigs by the security forces.

These events organized by Anglophone Cameroonians to show their defiance to the francophone-dominated central government and the response of the government through brutal force led to the open declaration of independence on 1st October 2017. In typical fashion, the government responded, and a reportedly 122 Anglophone Cameroonians who were celebrating the declaration of independence in the region were killed by government security forces (BBC Africa 2017; International Crisis Group 2017). The Centre for Human Rights and Democracy in Africa (2018) documents that Anglophone Cameroonians were labeled "dogs" and that the military resorted to arbitrary arrests including people who were conducting church services. Moreover, CHRDA reports that the security forces broke into people's homes and shot young men on their feet. This entry argues that it is these violations of universal human rights and freedoms by the government that prompted the call to arms since 2017 of the Anglophone regions as a means of self-defense against the indiscriminate torture, murder, arson of villages, and rape of women and young girls. While the Anglophone militias also attacked and killed 22 government forces in 2018, the conflict was declared formal confrontation from 30th November 2017 (International Crisis Group 2018).

Since the new phase of the conflict began in 2017, rebels in Anglophone regions continue to engage military forces, and both sides have been accused of committing serious crimes against civilians. These include the closure of schools in Anglophone regions, burning down of villages, and killing of both civilians and military forces. According to a report by the International Crisis Group (2019), the conflict has already claimed more than 3,000 human lives and led to the displacement of approximately half a million people in Cameroon and another 40,000 who have been compelled to flee to neighboring Nigeria. Moreover, over 700,000 children have been denied the right to access education due to either closure of schools or through imposed school boycotts. The need for more urgent humanitarian assistance has since increased significantly in the region.

On 20th August 2019, the government sentenced ten leading leaders of the separatist Anglophone movements to life in prison and imposed a lock down for any strike forcing an indefinite closure of schools in the region. Several new armed groups such as the Ambaland Forces, the Vipers, the Tigers, Ambazonia Defence Forces, and the Southern Cameroonians Defence Forces have emerged to counter government military forces. Increasingly, these groups have become more organized and have started acquiring advanced weapons. Moreover, they have adopted new warfare tactics such as kidnapping for ransom and targeting civilians that are suspected to be supporting the Francophone government.

The African Development Bank (AFDB 2019) has also raised concerns regarding the impact of the conflict that continues to deteriorate further. The economy of Cameroon is facing slow growth compared to the other states in the continent. More specifically, economic activities have dropped as more farmers are abandoning their homes for safer places in the southwest and northwest regions that are responsible for the production of 60% of all the Cocoa produced annually. These sorts of negative production trends are expected to continue as long as finding a solution for the conflict continues to remain evasive. Besides cocoa, other sectors of the economy dependent on production from the Anglophone region such as oil, timber, and palm exports are likely to continue experiencing negative growth in production. Global Risk (2019) puts the number of planned infrastructure construction projects numbering over 500 at risk of being delayed indefinitely.

Role of Social Media in the Anglophone Conflict

The internet has not only changed the way we relate to people today and conduct our businesses, but rather it has evolved to become a key component in how conflicts and wars are waged today. According to Ngange and Tchewo (2017), the proliferation of mobile phone technology has greatly impacted on information gathering and dissemination. Allan (2013) argues that this has enabled ordinary citizens to hijack the traditional role of journalist, as they are now able to spontaneously report incidents as they happen through the many social media platforms available today.

The use of social media has become a key component in the Anglophone conflict. This is because most Anglophone Cameroonians both at home and abroad have used social media to advance political discussions regarding the conflict; discuss the historical contexts of the conflict; name different phases of the conflicts such as “the coffin revolution”; expose human rights violations and ongoing violence; call for international intervention; and, the government response to the conflict. Platforms such as Facebook have seen the establishment of several groups attracting thousands of members on the Anglophone conflict.

Social media has also provided a platform through which the Anglophone diaspora based in countries such as Germany, England, South Africa, USA, and Belgium have launched group discussions that have influenced and led millions of Anglophone Cameroonians into obedience or disobedience of the central government. Many of the online activists continue to call for secession and retaliation against the government security forces whom they accuse of genocide against the Anglophones. Moreover, the diaspora groups have been using social media platforms to galvanize other Anglophone Cameroonians to support the armed separatists using financial donations through campaigns such as “Adopt a Freedom Fighter” for a monthly minimum of $75 or the “Feed the Nchang Shoe Boys” (WACC 2019).

The impact of social media in the conflict is recognized by the central government of Cameroon that, in light of the graphic social media posts that documented various acts of violence, decided to completely cut off internet access in Anglophone regions to curb the spread of information for periods over 3 months. This entry argues that even though the government attempted to curb the spread of information through shutting down the internet, such policies in the long run prove ineffective. This is because limiting access to social media does not prevent those in the diaspora as well as those in Francophone areas from posting any information they desire. Secondly, such policies have negative economic impacts for business that are dependent on internet for transactional purposes. Thirdly, Cameroon being a signatory to the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and other several conventions acted against its sovereign commitment to protect human rights and freedoms.

While the extent to which social media is influencing the conflict is not yet comprehensive enough and requires further research, this entry observes that social media platforms such as Facebook, WhatsApp, Twitter, and YouTube have been exploited to amplify violence. The failure by the state to ensure justice for those that have been documented perpetrating violence against civilians, the state, and separatist groups has facilitated the emergence of a culture of retaliatory violence and thereby fuelling insecurity and conflict in the region. However, faced with an autocratic regime in Cameroon, social media remains the most effective avenue through which acts of violence, social exclusion, and economic marginalization can be documented by the Anglophones as well as for attracting international attention to the plight of the region.

Response by International Community

The international atmosphere in the last decade and a half has been one characterized by uncertainty. While leading global powers have continued to be preoccupied by the pursuit of national security interests, there has been a shift in domestic politics. Far-right and far-left parties have emerged and foreign policies of countries to a large extent have shifted significantly to one that is focused on national instead of collective global peace and security. Moreover, the decade has also witnessed other massive security issues such as the Syrian conflict that displaced more than five million, South Sudan civil conflict, the threat of ISIS, and Boko Haram and Al-Shaabab terrorist groups. The nature of these conflicts that claimed hundreds of thousands of lives therefore sidelines other conflicts such as the Anglophone conflict that has been ongoing for several decades leading to minimal international attention until the conflict began escalating in 2017.

Due to the fact that this conflict has a colonial background, members of the Anglophone diaspora in the UK have often petitioned the British government to take a lead in resolving the conflict due to its status as a former colonial power of the region and purposely a guarantor of peace and security to the Anglophone Cameroonians. However, according to a briefing report to the House of Commons (2019), successive administrations in the UK have called for dialogue but stayed away from providing a stand on the ideal institutional arrangement that can address the concerns of both Anglophone and Francophone Cameroon. While the UK has claimed its willingness to mediate in the conflict, they have insisted that the invitation has to come from the government of Cameroon. When the UK’s Minister for Africa visited Cameroon between 14th and 16th February 2018 after the reelection of Paul Biya, he said:

The UK congratulates President Paul Biya on his reelection. We remain deeply concerned about the deteriorating situation in the Anglophone regions, which continue to suffer from high levels of violence and human rights abuses perpetrated by both security forces and armed separatists.

The UK calls on the Government of Cameroon to now take urgent action to address the crisis in the Anglophone regions. We hope that President Biya will reach out to all sections of Cameroonian society and work to build confidence and trust. It is crucial for all parties to engage in a peaceful and structured process leading to constitutional reforms, as previously set out by the President, and avoid excessive use of force.

The UK is concerned at the worsening humanitarian situation in the Anglophone regions and the impact this is having on the lives of ordinary people. We call on all parties to grant full and unhindered humanitarian access to the affected population. The UK will continue to work alongside the international community to encourage and support efforts to resolve the Anglophone crisis. It is vital that all parties now work together to secure a peaceful future for all Cameroonians. (UK Government 2018).

The United States has also increasingly issued out public statements including condemning the government of Cameroon for alleged “targeted killings” and violation of human rights and freedoms of the people in Anglophone Cameroon. Additionally, the US Ambassador to Cameroon condemned extreme violence by the separatists (Reuters, 18th May 2018). In 2019, the United States that has been providing support to the Cameroonian government in the fight against Boko Haram Terrorist group announced the cancellation of the military aid amounting to $17 million (New York Times, 7th February 2019). Additionally, the US Assistant Secretary of State for African Affairs Tibor Nagy made calls for the release of political prisoners and urged both the separatists and the government to find an amicable solution to the conflict.

Other countries such as Canada and Germany have also condemned the separatists and security forces for use of violence and called for dialogue. The German national assembly (Bundestag) has held several discussions with some deputies calling for the suspension of economic ties should there be further violations of human rights and freedoms of Anglophone regions (German Parliament, 27 June 2018). France which has a stronger clout on the Cameroon government and perhaps has been supporting the government’s approach has also advocated for a political solution and encouraged the convention of Anglophone General Conference. However, according to Crisis Group (2018), France privately supports decentralization (federalism) as the political solution to the Anglophone conflict. Moreover, France presents itself as a protector to the Cameroonian government against pressure from the international community, and this has enabled it to acquire some concessions such as the release of the 289 Anglophone detainees in November 2018 (Crisis Group 2019).

On the multilateral front, the United Nations has stressed the need for both the government and the separatists to ensure that there is uninterrupted access to regions that are in need of humanitarian assistance, and that both sides come to an amicable agreement that will bring to a stop the ongoing conflict. Notably, the Anglophone conflict is yet to be given the adequate attention by the international body. Efforts by the Netherlands and Norway to introduce it as an agenda in the Security Council has often faced challenges failing to garner the minimum votes needed (9/15). China, Russia, France, Ethiopia, Equatorial Guinea, and Cote d’Ivoire voted against it (Crisis Group, June 2018). The African Union has not so far put adequate pressure on Cameroon for the resolution of the conflict that is worsening further and has remained rather discreet. The African Commission of Human and People’s Rights has only issued statements condemning the government and separatist groups for the human rights violations without any concrete measures to follow-up. Egypt, which holds the chairmanship of the African Union, has reiterated that it is not the responsibility of the African Union to be engaged in the internal affairs of states. The European Union on the other hand despite being the key trading partner and contributor of foreign aid has been unable to mediate in the conflict decisively. Nonetheless, the community has taken measures including a vote by the European parliament in April 2019 calling for the release of political detainees and the opposition leader Maurice Kamto and that a peaceful solution to the conflict be pursued (European Parliament, 18 April 2019).

Summary

In conclusion, the continued delays in resolving the conflict has already cost thousands of human lives, displaced hundreds of thousands, slowed economic growth, and likely to increase instability in the region. The window for resolving the conflict is narrowing, and this allows the status quo to consolidate their positions and hard-line stances toward the conflict. This will continue to affect the larger Central African region that links up with the insecure Sahel corridor in West Africa where Boko Haram operates alongside other jihadist terrorist organizations.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination

References

- AFDB (2019) Africa's macroeconomic performance and prospects. African Development Bank. Accessed from https://www.afdb.org/fileadmin/uploads/afdb/Documents/Publications/2019AEO/AEO_2019-EN.pdf
- Allan, S. (2013). Citizen witnessing: Revisioning journalism in times of crisis. London: Polity.
- Anyangwe, C. (2014). A country decolonised becomes coloniser: Republique du cameroun's colonial occupation of the southern cameroons (Ambazonia). In Fonkem Achankeng F. (Ed.), British Southern Cameroons: Nationalism & Conflict in Postcolonial Africa (pp. 1–11). Victoria BC: FriesenPress.
- Bayart, J. F. (1973). One-party government and political development in Cameroun. African Affairs, 72(287), 125–144.
- BBC Africa. (2017). Deaths in Cameroon Independence protests. October 2. Retrieved from <https://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-41461007>
- Chereji, R. C., & Lohkoko, E. A. (2012). Cameroon: The Anglophone problem. Conflict Studies Quarterly, 1, 3–23.
- Crisis Group interviews, French diplomats, Yaoundé and Paris, March and May 2018.
- Delancey, M. W. (1974). Changes in social attitudes and political knowledge among migrants to plantations in West Cameroon. Bloomington.
- Deng, F. M. (1996). Anatomy of conflicts in Africa. In Between development and destruction (pp. 219–236). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Duffield, M. (2014). Global governance and the new wars: The merging of development and security. London: Zed Books.
- Dupraz, Y. (2019). French and british colonial legacies in education: Evidence from the partition of Cameroon. The Journal of Economic History, 79(3), 628–668.
- Ebune, J. B. (1992). The growth of political parties in southern Cameroons, 1916–1960. Cameroon: CEPER.
- European parliament resolution of 18 April 2019 on Cameroon (2019/2691 (RSP)), 18 April 2019.
- Eyoh, D. (2004). Contesting local citizenship: Liberalization and the politic of difference in Cameroon. Ethnicity and Democracy in Africa, 96–112.
- Fanso, V. G. (1999). Anglophone and francophone nationalisms in Cameroon. The Round Table, 88(350), 281–296.
- Fanso, V. G. (2017). History explains why Cameroon is at war with itself over language and culture. The Conversation. Accessed from <https://theconversation.com/history-explains-why-cameroon-is-at-war-with-itself-over-language-and-culture-85401>
- Friedrichsmeyer, S., Lennox, S., & Zantop, S. (Eds.). (1998). The imperialist imagination: German colonialism and its legacy. University of Michigan Press.
- Gardinier, D. E. (1978). Richard A. Joseph. Radical Nationalism in Cameroun: Social Origins of the UPC Rebellion (Oxford Studies in African Affairs). Oxford: Clarendon Press. 1977. Pp. x, 383. $34.50.
- Global Risk. Cameroon's Anglophone Problem Grows into an Armed Conflict. Retrieved from <https://www.a2globalrisk.com/analysis/sub-saharan-africa/cameroon-s-Anglophone-problem-grows-into-an-armed-conflict>. on 26 October 2019.
- Gwaibi, W. N. (2018). The electoral cycle and grassroots realities in Cameroon: The omnipresent, overbearing and contested political elite. In Election Studies. IntechOpen.
- International Crisis Group (2017) Cameroon's Worsening Anglophone Crisis Calls for Strong Measures. ICG Briefing No. 130. Accessed from <https://www.crisisgroup.org/africa/central-africa/cameroon/130-cameroon-worsening-anglophone-crisis-calls-strong-measures>
- International Crisis Group (2018). Cameroon: The proposed Anglophone general conference deserves national and international support. Accessed from <https://www>

- crisisgroup.org/africa/central-africa/cameroon/cameroun-la-conference-generale-anglophone-merite-un-soutien-national-et-international
- International Crisis Group (2019). A Household Name in Cameroon. ICG Report. Accessed from <https://www.crisisgroup.org/africa/centralafrica/cameroon/household-name-cameroon>
- Jones, D. H. (1965). Victor T. Le Vine: The Cameroons from mandate to independence xvi, 329 pp. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1964. $7.50. (English agents: Cambridge University Press. 60s.). Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, 28(3), 689–690.
- Kacowicz, A. M. (1997). ‘Negative’ international peace and domestic conflicts, West Africa, 1957–96. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 35(3), 367–385.
- Kaldor, M. (2005). Old wars, cold wars, new wars, and the war on terror. International Politics, 42(4), 491–498.
- Konings, P. J. J. (1997). Agro-industry and regionalism in the south West Province of Cameroon during the national economic and political crisis. ICASSRT Monograph, ASC, 17.
- Konings, P. (2005). The Anglophone Cameroon-Nigeria boundary: opportunities and conflicts. African Affairs, 104(415), 275–301.
- Konings, P., & Nyamnjoh, F. B. (1997). The anglophone problem in Cameroon. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 35(2), 207–229.
- Ladson-Billings, G. (1995). Toward a theory of culturally relevant pedagogy. American Educational Research Journal, 32(3), 465–491. <https://doi.org/10.3102/00028312032003465>.
- Mehler, A. (2014). Why federalism did not lead to secession in Cameroon. Ethnopolitics, 13(1), 48–66.
- New York Times. U.S. Reduces Military Aid to Cameroon Over Human Rights Abuses. Retrieved from <https://www.nytimes.com/2019/02/07/world/africa/cameroon-military-abuses-united-states-aid.html>. Accessed on 26 October 2019.
- Nfor, N. N. (2000). A memorandum presented to H.E. Kofi Annan, Secretary General of the United Nations by the constituent assembly of the Federal Republic of Southern Cameroons regarding the restoration of the independence and sovereignty of the Federal Republic of Southern Cameroons (formerly the UN trust territory of the British Southern Cameroons), Buea, May.
- Ngange, K., & Tchewo, M. (2017). ICT use in teaching, research and outreach in the University of Buea, Cameroon. In Social media: Culture and identity. Lanham: Lexington Books.
- Ngho, V. J. (1987). Cameroon, 1884–1985: A hundred years of history. Yaounde, Cameroon: Navi-Group Publications.
- Nkwi, P. N., & Nyamnjoh, F. B. (Eds.). (2011). Regional Balance and National Integration in Cameroon: lessons learned and the uncertain future (Vol. 1). African Books Collective.
- Nyadera, I. N. (2018). South Sudan conflict from 2013 to 2018: Rethinking the causes, situation and solutions. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 18(2), 59–86.
- Nyadera, I. N., & Bincof, M. O. (2019). Human security, terrorism, and counterterrorism: Boko haram and the Taliban. International Journal on World Peace, 36(1).
- Reader, A. (2009). Peace studies and conflict resolution in Nigeria. Ibadan: Spectrum Books.
- Reuters. (2019, 3 June). ‘Cameroon’s only oil refinery halted, four units damaged after fire’ The Thomson Reuters Trust. Retrieved from <https://www.reuters.com/article/cameroon-refinery/camerouns-only-oil-refinery-halted-four-units-damaged-after-fire-idUSL8N23A2L7>
- Takougang, J. (1993). Politics: the demise of Biya’s New Deal in Cameroon, 1982–1992. Africa Insight, 23(2), 91–101.
- Tembon, E. W. (2018). Crisis in the Republic of Cameroon: An overview of the Anglophone crisis, 2016–2018. Cameroon Association for Bible Translation and Literacy Facilitator Platform for Impact.
- Tiewa, K., & Vubo, E. Y. (2015). Celebrating Unity and Debating Unity in Cameroon’s 2010. Independence Jubilees, the “Cinquantenaire”. Cahiers d’études africaines, (218), 331–358.
- United Kingdom Government. (2018). Minister for Africa urges restraint and dialogue in Cameroon. Retrieved from <https://www.gov.uk/government/news/minister-for-africa-urges-restraint-and-dialogue-in-cameroon>
- Voice of Africa. (2018, 26 May). English speaking activists in Cameroon given jail sentences. Retrieved from <https://www.voanews.com/africa/english-speaking-activists-cameroon-given-jail-sentences>
- World Association for Christian Communication (WACC). Media and conflict in Cameroon today. Retrieved from <http://www.waccglobal.org/articles/media-and-conflict-in-cameroon-today> on 26 October 2019.

Capitalist Peace

- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations

Carl von Clausewitz

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Ceasefire

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Census Politics in Deeply Divided Societies

Laurence Cooley School of Government, University of Birmingham, Birmingham, UK

Definition

Population censuses are operations conducted by states to count and collect statistical information on all persons living in a given territory. Typically undertaken once every 10 years, censuses play a number of important roles in the facilitation of the administration of a state, including in the allocation of funding to regional governments and the delimitation of electoral districts. They also provide information that is used for the planning of infrastructure and service provision, and form the “backbone” of national statistical systems, allowing for the construction of sample frames that ensure that surveys are representative.

In deeply divided societies, the census can be the site of significant mobilization or contestation. The categories of ethnicity, race, nationality, religion, or language that are employed in censuses confer recognition on groups and may contribute to the construction of identities. Since the resources and political power available to groups can in many post-conflict contexts depend on population shares, the census becomes a key institution in intergroup relations or conflict. In extreme cases, censuses may be boycotted or their results contested by majority or minority groups. While they are national exercises, the content and conduct of censuses are guided by international principles and guidelines. In many developing and post-conflict states, donor agencies and international organizations provide financial and technical support to censuses, which are necessary elements of state-building processes.

Introduction

Censuses are a key source of data for academics in a broad range of social sciences, but they have also been the subject of research by historians, anthropologists, and political scientists – among others – who have sought to understand the social and political dynamics of processes of census-taking. Much of this research has focused on the role that the inclusion of questions about ethnicity and race in censuses has played in the social construction of ethnic and racial identities, and this research is particularly relevant to the context of census-taking in deeply divided societies. In such contexts, the census is often the subject of political mobilization, which is motivated by both instrumental and symbolic factors.

In the following discussion, after a brief discussion of the history of purposes of census-taking, the chapter outlines five key issues relevant to censuses in deeply divided societies. First, it provides an overview of debates about the role of censuses in the construction of ethnic and other group identities. It then considers instrumental and symbolic motives for political mobilization around the census, focusing specifically on the influence of power-sharing institutions and questions of group recognition. The chapter then moves the focus away from census-taking as a national exercise by considering the role of international actors in governing the conduct of, and supporting, censuses. The survey of key issues rounds out by highlighting an aspect of the census in post-conflict societies that has so far received little scholarly attention: its role in processes of state-building.

Historical Background

The emergence of the periodic population census as it would be recognized today dates to the late eighteenth century. Prior to this, censuses had been taken since ancient times, but they tended only to count adult men, and did so for assessing military strength or for purposes of taxation (Anderson 2015). It was only with the emergence of the modern state that whole-population counts became common, with European states conducting them both at home and in their colonies. The regular enumeration of national populations became more common into the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, and population censuses are now undertaken in some form by the vast majority of states.

These censuses are typically undertaken once every 10 years, although some states do so at shorter intervals. At its most basic, the census aims to result in the production of a reliable measure of the size of the country's total population on a given date. National censuses vary in the depth of socioeconomic information that they collect. At a minimum, census forms ask for information about sex, age, and other basic demographic characteristics. They typically also ask questions about occupation, educational status, and economic activity. Individual answers to census questions are treated confidentially, but cross-tabulations of the aggregated results are published, and anonymized data is made available to researchers following the processing of the census forms.

As well as being valuable for the planning of government policy and for research in its own right, census data is also used to provide the sampling frame for surveys that take place between census dates. In order for these surveys to be representative of the total population or of specific subgroups within it, knowledge of the characteristics of the total population is required, and this can only be acquired through a census of some form. Census data also serves administrative functions, such as the determination and adjustment of electoral district boundaries.

In some states, traditional censuses based on periodic enumeration of the population have been replaced with register-based censuses or the combination of data from administrative and statistical sources (Baffour et al. 2013). Countries that have made or are making this transition tend to be highly developed, with high-quality administrative data on their populations, however, and in most developing and many developed countries, a traditional census remains the preferred option.

Key Issues

Censuses and Identity Construction

Lieberman and Singh (2017) find that the majority of states enumerate at least one “ethnic”

cleavage (which they define to include identities based on race, ethnicity, tribe, language, religion, caste, or indigeneity) in their national census. Their analysis suggests that in the 2000s, around two thirds of states enumerated at least one cleavage, with the proportion being highest in sub-Saharan Africa.

Research on the census, particularly in colonial settings, has advanced the idea that when census-takers include questions about ethnicity or race, rather than simply enumerating preexisting identities, they often contribute to process of social construction of those identities. Benedict Anderson, for instance, drawing on Hirschman's (1987) work on censuses of present-day Malaysia and its colonial predecessors, argues that the identities enumerated by Dutch census-takers, “imagined by the (confusedly) classifying mind of the colonial state, still awaited a reification which imperial administrative penetration would soon make possible” (1991: 165). James C. Scott, meanwhile, argues that “categories that may have begun as the artificial inventions of cadastral surveyors, census takers, judges, or policy officers can end by becoming categories that organize people's daily experience precisely because they are embedded in state-created institutions that structure that experience” (1998: 82–83).

The role of the census in identity construction cannot be reduced simply to the imposition (intentionally or otherwise) of identities by the state, however (Urla 1993). Censuses also provide an opportunity for ethnic entrepreneurs to have their preferred identity categories recognized, either through influencing the design of the classification system employed by statistical agencies or through attempting to shape how citizens respond to questions about their identity. Cohn (1987: 250) cites the example of a leaflet distributed in Lahore in 1931, instructing members of the Arya Samaj movement how they should respond to the religion, sect, caste, race, and language questions of the British colonial census. In his study of censuses in the post-Yugoslav states, meanwhile, Bieber argues that “the census constitutes a site where the state, citizens, and groups representing majorities and minorities negotiate national identities” (2015: 873). Lieberman and Singh's (2017) analysis suggests that enumeration of identity categories in the census increases the salience of those identities, and is associated with the onset of ethnic conflict – although they caution against drawing policy recommendations from this association.

Rights and Power Sharing

As Kertzer and Arel note, “[s]ince census politics is expressed in numbers, the pursuit of entitlement translates into a contest for achieving the ‘right’ numbers” (2002: 30). As a result, in societies that are already deeply politically divided along national, ethnic, racial, religious, or linguistic lines, the census can often resemble an election (Horowitz 1985: 196). In such contexts, there is a clear instrumental rationale for group mobilization around the census, since entitlements are often attached to population shares. This is most obviously the case in societies that are governed by power-sharing or “consociational” political institutions. As Visoka and Gjevori note, “[t]he power-sharing nature of post-conflict and divided societies makes censuses an important measure for arranging the political representation of minorities in institutions and consequently signifies the political influence of each ethnic group” (2013: 484).

The most obvious case illustrating the links between the census and power sharing is the Lebanese one. Lebanon’s National Pact of 1943 established a system of consociational power sharing, whereby Christians and Muslims would be represented in government, parliament, and the civil service in a ratio of six to five, based on the results of the 1932 census (Maktabi 1999). The 1989 Taif Agreement, which ended the Lebanese Civil War, modified this Christian-Muslim ratio to 1:1, but it is widely understood that the Muslim population of the country now significantly exceeds the Christian population. However, the implications that any new census would have for the power-sharing formula mean that Lebanon is one of the few states in the world not to conduct a periodic population count – the 1932 census remaining the last to be undertaken (Faour 2007). While the Lebanese example might be an extreme one, concerns over the implications of updated statistics on the ethnic and regional composition of the population have also resulted in delays to census-taking in other states, such as Pakistan (Weiss 1999).

A.J. Christopher highlights a link between population shares and political representation existing in another case: that of Mauritius prior to the 1983 census. The country’s post-independence constitution, in addition to the 62 constituency seats, reserved eight parliamentary seats for four communities – Hindus, Muslim, Sino-Mauritian, and the remaining “General Population” – in proportion to their population shares from the census. According to Christopher, “[i]nvariably the linking of the census to the constitutional representation of ethnic groups in Parliament involved its politicization,” and when a new government was elected in 1982, promising to forge a common national identity, the community question was removed from the census and the constitution was amended so that the 1972 census would be retained as the basis for communal representation (1992: 59).

The literature has also demonstrated that actual or perceived links between population shares and representation in power-sharing institutions can result in mobilization campaigns around the census. In Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Dayton Agreement that ended the Bosnian war in 1995 introduced a constitution establishing a system of power sharing that guarantees representation of three constitutionally recognized “constituent peoples” – Bosniaks, Serbs, and Croats – and devolved significant power to two federal entities. The country’s first census since the end of the war was held in 2013, and in many ways resembled an election. Politicians and civil society organizations associated with each of the three constituent peoples engaged in campaigns to encourage their constituents to answer questions on ethnicity, religion and language in a coherent, structured way, to maximize their share in the population statistics (Bieber 2015). These campaigns were motivated in part by concerns that if a significant proportion of the population opted out of ethnic identification, then the guaranteed representation of the three groups through consociational power sharing might be imperiled. Civic groups, meanwhile, campaigned in favor of rejecting ethnic identification and instead adopting a common “Bosnian” identity – in part as a strategy to generate pressure for constitutional reforms that would emphasize individual rather than group rights (Cooley 2019). Ethnic entrepreneurs also encouraged members of the diaspora still owning property in the country to return to be counted in the census, in order to further boost group population numbers. Officials and politicians in the Republika Srpska entity have highlighted the presence of nonresidents in the census as a reason for their rejection of the census results published by the state-level statistics agency.

Censuses are also linked to thresholds for the realization of certain forms of group rights, such as the recognition of language rights at the national or local level. In Macedonia, for example, according to the decentralization provisions introduced by the Ohrid Framework Agreement of 2001, minority languages are recognized where they are spoken by at least 20% of a local population. The census therefore has consequences for the provision of services, such as the delivery of education in minority languages. As a result, the taking of censuses in the country has become highly politicized, and indeed the 2011 census was abandoned due to political disagreements after enumeration had started. As in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the question of whether to enumerate Macedonian citizens living overseas has been a consistent point of contention (Daskalovski 2013).

Controversy about the census in deeply divided societies does not always center on the questions they ask about identity. The relative population shares of the regions that make up a state (which might correlate with identity group distribution where those groups are spatially concentrated) can also be the source of contention. The Comprehensive Peace Agreement agreed in Sudan in 2005 specified that the two parties to the agreement would be allocated set proportions of seats in the country’s parliament, but that representation of the North and South would be revised in light of the results of a population census, which was subsequently held in 2008. The census was also to be used to determine wealth sharing. As a result, it was highly contentious, with the Government of Southern Sudan rejecting the results (Santschi 2008). The link between regional population shares and political representation and resource sharing has also been the cause of significant contention and allegations of statistical manipulation in successive censuses of Nigeria (Ahonsi 1988; Aluko 1965; Mimiko 2006).

Questions of Recognition

Census politics is driven not only by instrumental but also symbolic concerns. As Bieber notes, censuses serve to rank identities and “if censuses enumerate a limited number of categories, inclusion or exclusion bestows a distinct value on an identity” (2015: 876). The 2009 Kenyan census, for instance, was the first to include a category specifically for Nubians under the tribe question. Nubians had previously been enumerated under broader, “other” type headings, and the addition of a specific code for them was viewed as an important form of recognition. Representatives of some other groups, previously enumerated as “others” or included as part of large, umbrella tribal groupings, threatened to boycott the census should they not be granted their own codes (Balaton-Chrimes 2011).

The symbolic importance of group enumeration is related not only to recognition through the inclusion of specific identity categories but also group size as measured by the census. As Bieber notes, even where the entitlements that flow from population shares are not legally binding, as in the case of rights and power sharing discussed above, “numerical strength is crucial for making claims and symbolic entitlement” (2015: 888). The 2013 Bosnian census, for example, was the first to include a category labeled “Bosniak” and ethnic entrepreneurs stressed the importance of members of this group identifying as such, in part to emphasize ownership of the state (Cooley 2019).

In Myanmar, meanwhile, the government backtracked on promises made to donors who were funding the 2014 census that people would be free to self-identify in response to the question on ethnicity, preventing the Rohingya population from doing so in order to placate Rakhine extremists who had threatened to boycott the census should the Rohingya be recognized (International Crisis Group 2014). As a result, Rohingya were forced to choose between identifying as Bengali (the state's preferred term, which carries with it connotations that they are recent immigrants from Bangladesh) or not being enumerated at all (Ferguson 2015).

Censuses have also been the subject of boycotts not because the state fails to recognize a particular group but because that group does not recognize the authority or legitimacy of the state and therefore rejects its right to conduct a census. This was the case with the call for Serbs in Kosovo to boycott its census of 2011, for instance (Visoka and Gjevori 2013: 488–490). In Nigeria, meanwhile, a Biafran separatist movement called on Igbo in the south east of the country to boycott the 2006 census, on the grounds that the territory was not properly part of Nigeria but should be an independent state (Onuoha 2011: 413).

International Aspects

While censuses are undertaken by national governments, their content and conduct are governed by international principles and guidelines – in particular the United Nations principles and recommendations for population and housing censuses (United Nations 2017). These principles and recommendations divide census topics into core and non-core. Core topics include basic demographic information such as sex, age, and place of birth, whereas topics that are often contentious in deeply divided societies, such as religion, language, and ethnicity are designated as additional topics, meaning that their inclusion should be assessed based on local suitability and resources. The principles and recommendations stress that ethno-cultural characteristics are subjective and that questions about these topics, where they are asked, should allow for free and open declaration by respondents. These international guidelines are complemented by region-specific guidance produced by organizations such as the UN Economic Commission for Africa. Within the European Union, Eurostat provides detailed guidelines aimed at harmonizing collection of data across the member states (Alastalo 2018), which have agreed on a set of core topics to be included in all national censuses.

In many post-conflict and developing states, censuses also attract significant international financial and technical support from international organizations and individual donor states (see, for example, Bradford Smith 2016; Brandt and De Herdt 2019). During the 2010 census round (which ran from 2005 to 2014), the UN agency responsible for supporting countries in the holding of censuses, the UN Population Fund (UNFPA), spent a total of US$301.7 million on census support. Approximately 35% of this total came from UNFPA core funds, with 65% provided by donors (UNFPA 2016: 19, 57) which also provide their own bilateral support. In providing technical and financial support for censuses during this round, donors recognized their importance for making international comparisons and measuring progress against the Millennium Development Goals (Baffour et al. 2013: 416). The nature of the successor Sustainable Development Goals arguably further increases the need for reliable data on development progress.

Role in State-Building

In post-conflict contexts, international support for reestablishing the capacity of the state to undertake censuses is also often necessary for the planning of reconstruction and preparing for the holding of elections (Goodhand 2008: 238; Reilly 2016: 82). To date, little academic research has been conducted into the role of census support in processes of internationally sponsored post-conflict state-building. Further research on the politics of the census might usefully consider its role in the liberal peacebuilding agenda, which has prioritized the building and strengthening of state institutions and the holding of elections as key to ensuring sustainable peace.

Some literature does focus on the domestic state-building functions of the census. Leibler and Breslau (2005), for instance, show how the 1948 census performed a crucial role in the construction of the Israeli state, and Busse (2015: 76) points out the parallels between this and the Palestinian case, where the Palestinian Bureau of Statistics was formed by the Palestinian Authority quickly after the first of the Oslo Accords in 1993. The Israeli case is particularly interesting since it combined two functions that are usually separate: the enumeration of the population and the registration of citizens. Since the census was conducted under conditions of curfew and anyone absent from home was not be registered, the combined enumeration/registration process served to exclude Palestinian Arabs from citizenship of the new state (Leibler and Breslau 2005). While the contexts of the cases are very different, some useful insights might be drawn from this literature to shed light on the potentially exclusionary aspects of more recent, internationally sponsored censuses, such as the highly problematic 2014 Myanmar enumeration.

Summary

The role played by census enumeration of ethnic or other group categories in the social construction of identities is now relatively well documented in the scholarly literature. However, other aspects of the politics of the census in deeply divided societies have not received sustained and systematic attention. Several studies point to the relationship between political representation and rights and mobilization around the census as an important one, but there is scope for more comparative research that is able to support more generalizable conclusions on this relationship. Further research might investigate how institutions of conflict management that rely on population thresholds for the granting of group rights impact on the politics of the census, for instance. The role of the census in strategies of internationally sponsored state-building and liberal peacebuilding, meanwhile, has been almost entirely neglected by scholars and presents a clear opportunity for further research.

Cross-References

- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Post-Conflict Elections

References

- Ahonsi, B. A. (1988). Deliberate falsification and census data in Nigeria. African Affairs, 87(349), 553–562. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordjournals.afraf.a098090>.
- Alastalo, M. (2018). Eurostat: Making Europe commensurate and comparable. In R. Heiskala & J. Aro (Eds.), Policy design in the European Union: An empire of shopkeepers in the making? (pp. 87–110). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-319-64849-1_5.
- Aluko, S. A. (1965). How many Nigerians? An analysis of Nigeria's census problems, 1901–63. Journal of Modern African Studies, 3(3), 371–392. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0022278X00006170>.
- Anderson, B. (1991). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism (Rev. ed.). London: Verso.
- Anderson, M. (2015). Censuses: History and methods. In J. D. Wright (Ed.), International encyclopedia of the social and behavioral sciences (2nd ed., pp. 302–307). Amsterdam: Elsevier. <https://doi.org/10.1016/B978-0-08-097086-8.41007-X>.
- Baffour, B., King, T., & Valente, P. (2013). The modern census: Evolution, examples and evaluation. International Statistical Review, 81(3), 405–425. <https://doi.org/10.1111/insr.12036>.
- Balaton-Chrimes, S. (2011). Counting as citizens: Recognition of the Nubians in the 2009 Kenyan census. Ethnopolitics, 10(2), 205–218. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2011.570983>.
- Bieber, F. (2015). The construction of national identity and its challenges in post-Yugoslav censuses. Social Science Quarterly, 96(3), 873–903. <https://doi.org/10.1111/ssqu.12195>.
- Bradford Smith, K. (2016). Counting people in a conflict zone. Significance, 13(2), 38–41. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1740-9713.2016.00900.x>.
- Brandt, C. O., & De Herdt, T. (2019). On the political economy of data collection: Lessons from the unaccomplished population census (Democratic Republic of the Congo, 2006–2018). Secure Livelihoods Research Consortium, Overseas Development Institute. <https://securelivelihoods.org/wp-content/uploads/DRC-census-working-paper-fina-online.pdf>. Accessed 19 June 2019.
- Busse, J. (2015). The biopolitics of statistics and census in Palestine. International Political Sociology, 9(1), 70–89. <https://doi.org/10.1111/ips.12077>.
- Christopher, A. J. (1992). Ethnicity, community and the census in Mauritius, 1830–1990. The Geographical Journal, 158(1), 57–64.
- Cohn, B. S. (1987). The census, social structure and objectification in South Asia. In B. S. Cohn (Ed.), An anthropologist among the historians and other essays (pp. 224–254). Delhi: Oxford University Press.
- Cooley, L. (2019). To be a Bosniak or to be a citizen? Bosnia and Herzegovina's 2013 census as an election.

- Nations and Nationalism*, 25(3), 1065–1086. <https://doi.org/10.1111/nana.12500>.
- Daskalovski, Z. (2013). Census taking and inter-ethnic relations in Macedonia. Southeast European and Black Sea Studies, 13(3), 365–379. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14683857.2013.812773>.
- Faour, M. A. (2007). Religion, demography, and politics in Lebanon. Middle Eastern Studies, 43(6), 909–921. <https://doi.org/10.1080/00263200701568279>.
- Ferguson, J. F. (2015). Who's counting? Ethnicity, belonging, and the national census in Burma/Myanmar. Bijdragen tot de Taal-, Land- en Volkenkunde, 171(1), 1–28. <https://doi.org/10.1163/22134379-17101022>.
- Goodhand, J. (2008). War, peace and the places in between: Why borderlands are central. In M. Pugh, N. Cooper, & M. Turner (Eds.), Whose peace? Critical perspectives on the political economy of peacebuilding (pp. 225–244). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan. https://doi.org/10.1057/9780230228740_14.
- Hirschman, C. (1987). The meaning and measurement of ethnicity in Malaysia: An analysis of census classifications. Journal of Asian Studies, 46(3), 555–582. <https://doi.org/10.2307/2056899>.
- Horowitz, D. L. (1985). Ethnic groups in conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- International Crisis Group. (2014). Counting the costs: Myanmar's problematic census. International Crisis Group Asia Briefing 144. <https://www.crisisgroup.org/asia/south-east-asia/myanmar/counting-costs-myanmar-s-problematic-census>. Accessed 19 June 2019.
- Kertzer, D. I., & Arel, D. (2002). Censuses, identity formation, and the struggle for political power. In D. I. Kertzer & D. Arel (Eds.), Census and identity: The politics of race, ethnicity, and language in national censuses (pp. 1–42). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1017/CBO9780511606045.002>.
- Leibler, A., & Breslau, D. (2005). The uncoun- ted: Citizenship and exclusion in the Israeli census of 1948. Ethnic & Racial Studies, 28(5), 880–902. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870500158919>.
- Lieberman, E. S., & Singh, P. (2017). Census enumeration and group conflict: A global analysis of the consequences of counting. World Politics, 69(1), 1–53. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0043887116000198>.
- Maktabi, R. (1999). The Lebanese census of 1932 revisited. Who are the Lebanese? British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, 26(2), 219–241. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13530199908705684>.
- Mimiko, F. (2006). Census in Nigeria: The politics and the imperative of depoliticization. African and Asian Studies, 5(1), 1–21. <https://doi.org/10.1163/156920906775768273>.
- Onuoha, G. (2011). Contesting the space: The 'New Biafra' and ethno-territorial separatism in south-eastern Nigeria. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 17(4), 402–422. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13537113.2011.622646>.
- Reilly, B. (2016). Timing and sequencing in post-conflict elections. In A. Langer & G. K. Brown (Eds.), Building sustainable peace: Timing and sequencing of post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding (pp. 72–86). Oxford: Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/acprof:oso/9780198757276.003.0005>.
- Santschi, M. (2008). Briefing: Counting 'New Sudan'. African Affairs, 107(429), 631–640. <https://doi.org/10.1093/afraf/adn058>.
- Scott, J. C. (1998). Seeing like a state: How certain schemes to improve the human condition have failed. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- UNFPA. (2016). Evaluation of UNFPA support to population and housing census data to inform decision-making and policy formulation 2005–2014. United Nations Population Fund Evaluation Office. <https://www.unfpa.org/admin-resource/evaluation-unfpa-support-population-and-housing-census-data-inform-decision-making>. Accessed 19 June 2019.
- United Nations. (2017). Principles and recommendations for population and housing censuses, revision 3. United Nations Statistics Division. https://unstats.un.org/unsd/publication/seriesM/Series_M67Rev3en.pdf. Accessed 19 June 2019.
- Urla, J. (1993). Cultural politics in an age of statistics: Numbers, nations, and the making of Basque identity. American Ethnologist, 20(4), 818–843. <https://www.jstor.org/stable/646233?seq=1>.
- Visoka, G., & Gjevari, E. (2013). Census politics and ethnicity in the Western Balkans. East European Politics, 29(4), 479–498. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21599165.2013.819349>.
- Weiss, A. M. (1999). Much ado about counting: The conflict over holding a census in Pakistan. Asian Survey, 39(4), 679–693. <https://doi.org/10.2307/3021245>.

Chile

- Civil Society and State Violence in South America

China

- Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

Cicero

- Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Civic Values

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
-

Civil Resistance

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine
-

Civil Resistance (see Nonviolence)

- ▶ Search for Peace, the
-

Civil Resistance for Peace and Conflict Management, Role of

Mikael Baaz¹, Mona Lilja², Michael Schulz² and Stellan Vinthagen³

¹Department of Law, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

²School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

³Department of Sociology, University of Massachusetts, Amherst, MA, USA

Description

This chapter seeks to add to previous conceptualizations of “resistance” within peacebuilding by exploring the following question: Which claims must be secured in order to provide a solid theoretical base for further research on resistance and peacebuilding processes? Drawing on different research perspectives – in particular, social movement studies and everyday resistance research – we seek to advance a new theoretical framework for understanding civil or peaceful forms of resistance and how it impacts on conflicts and peacebuilding processes. The label of this theoretical elaboration is the “ABC-framework”; that is, (i) avoidance, (ii) breaking, and (iii) constructive resistance. It is argued that the ABC of resistance helps us to see how resistance actively engages dominant power, as well as direct and structural violence through a combination of avoidance of devastating repression and control, breaking free from its domination and dependence, while constructing self-governed nonviolent alternatives, subjectivities, and communities.

Introduction

Without a theory of resistance(s), IR’s disciplinary power will be condemned to repeat and unable to achieve its early mandate to investigate the causes of war and the creation of peace. (Richmond 2011, p. 248)

There is an increased awareness of the importance that resistance plays in relation to peace, peacebuilding, and conflict transformation processes (Duffield 2001; Hughes et al. 2015; Iñiguez de Heredia 2014; Mac Ginty 2014; Richmond and Mac Ginty 2014; Richmond 2010, 2011). It is clear that the concept of resistance has become central to the critique of liberal interventions within the field of peace and conflict studies. Researchers’ approach to resistance within this field has resulted in more elaborate studies of peacebuilding. Nevertheless, the formulations of local agency have been criticized as simplified and for lacking contextualization. For example, according to David Chandler (2013, p. 32), focusing on the “local” and “hidden agency” has not created any genuine understanding of the limits to liberal peace, nor has it provided any emancipatory alternative.

One reason for the critique is that resistance has primarily been conceptualized as a response to top-down or external “peace-building interventions.” Thus, interesting dynamics of peacebuilding processes remain obscured, while much research employs quite a limited understanding of resistance.

Another take on resistance within the peacebuilding literature is the theorization on “spoilors.” Spoilers can be seen as actors who are ready to use any means, including the use of arms, to prevent the implementation of a peace process (Newman and Richmond 2006; Stedman et al. 2002). Such resistance can be identified as an obstacle to fulfilling expectations and hopes of the broader public and grassroots activists in the peacebuilding process.

This chapter is not limited to resistance practices that come as a response to liberal peace interventions and its aim is not to elaborate further on spoiler resistance. Instead, our discussion takes a broader stance by suggesting a framework of resistance that embraces resistance practices that exist simultaneously and are performative of and intertwined with other forms of resistance. Such combinations of resistance can, we argue, constitute a basis for understanding peacebuilding processes in contexts of violence or domination. By this, the chapter responds to the call of Oliver Richmond (2011, p. 422) to locate “. . . resistance . . . aimed towards local forms of agency and their international effects.”

Below follows an exploration of how civil resistance is practiced, and how we can theoretically understand and define these practices in relation to peacebuilding. The exploration is synthetic in nature and draws on different research perspectives – besides the peace research that is partly discussed above – we also make use of social movement studies and everyday resistance research in order to advance a new theoretical framework – the “ABC-framework” – for understanding civil resistance and, by extension, how it impacts on conflicts and peacebuilding processes.

Conceptualizing Civil Resistance

Since its inception in the 1980s, the study of “everyday resistance” (Scott 1990) has flourished yet remained focused on individuals, informal small-scale groupings and dispersed forms of resistance (as “infrapolitics,” which is Scott’s alternative concept). Meanwhile, the popular field of “social movement” studies has maintained a focus on collective mobilizations, often by limiting studies to “movement organizations,” public “episodes,” and various kinds of “campaigns.” In regard to more organized forms of resistance, the most ambitious and recognized attempt to create a unified framework in regard to political struggles is the scholarship of “contentious politics” (McAdam et al. 2001). Still, this “unifying” framework does not even mention “everyday resistance” and excludes acts by small groups of individuals. This makes sense since “collective action” is often used by scholars as an alternative concept to social movements.

The above indicates that there is a tendency for scholars to address either more large-scale and organized forms of collective resistance (civil society, social movements, revolutions and so forth), or to embrace small-scale, informal and individualized forms of resistance practices (everyday, local and dispersed).

This is not necessarily a problem in itself. Every field needs to focus on certain things. However, the problem begins when there is a relative silence or crowding out of forms of resistance that fall in-between or constitute connections and processes bridging the “individually” and the collectively organized forms. In addition, researchers in both of these established strands equate resistance so strongly with “opposition” that most studies fully overlook when power relations are undermined by less dramatic resistance that builds new and alternative social relations (Koefoed 2017).

This chapter suggests, in order to pinpoint how resistance can contribute to peacebuilding, that more needs to be added to previous research within the field. For example, individual resistance, which is not hidden or avoiding – and therefore does not fit neatly into what is conventionally seen as “everyday resistance” – must be recognized. In a similar way, larger movements of dissent that fly under the radar and avoid all attention – such as those that are hidden on the internet, and therefore do not fit neatly into what is conventionally seen as “social movements” – must also be acknowledged. And particularly, when we look for how resistance can contribute to peacebuilding, resistance that produces alternatives rather than being in opposition, must additionally be embraced within a broader framework of analysis. One example is the peace communities, like San Jose de Apartado, that maintained a neutral position between guerillas and the army in Colombia during the civil war. Such resistance should be considered constructive rather than non-cooperative; that is, the kind of resistance that are breaking of norms, rules, laws, regulations, and order, typically in public, confrontative ways. Furthermore, the overlaps and links between and scaling up and down of different forms of resistance must be further highlighted in order to figure out how creative combinations can contribute to undermining violent regimes, discourses and actors, while transforming communities towards more of a just peace.

Considering the above, we would like to suggest a new categorization of resistance, one that will help scholars to analyze a broad range of forms of resistance, their interlinkages and open up the opportunity for an analysis on how they contribute to peacebuilding. It is a tentative framework that is expected to require refinements and adjustments for different localities given that resistance is always contextually dependent. At this point, the framework might be mainly useful for illuminating different patterns in post-war contexts.

The ABC-Framework

In this section we further elaborate on the concept of resistance, starting from the question: Which claims must be secured in order to provide a solid theoretical base for further research on resistance and peace-building processes? The chapter argues, first of all, that in order to capture the complexity of resistance, space must be made for more forms of it and the linkages that occur between them. We would like to name this basic categorization the ABC-framework; that is, avoidance, breaking and constructive resistance. Below are examples of how these three civil resistances categories are linked to peace and conflict management.

Avoidance Resistance

Historically, studies of resistance have gone through similar stages as the studies of power. Although power was initially studied in its most explicit forms, during the 1970s more subtle, symbolic and dispersed forms of power were increasingly acknowledged. Similarly, the earlier one-sided focus on more obvious and dramatic forms of resistance have been firmly supplemented through a recognition of more subtle and diffuse articulations of resistance (Scott 1989, 1990). One important concept in this regard is “everyday resistance.” The key characteristic of everyday resistance is the “pervasive use of disguise,” through either “the concealment of anonymity of the resister,” in which “the personal (not the class) identity of the protesters” (or the act itself) is kept secret (Scott 1989, p. 54). Thus, either “a clear message [is] delivered by a disguised messenger, [or] an ambiguous message is delivered by clearly identified messengers” (Scott 1989, pp. 54–55).

The founder of the concept of everyday resistance, James C. Scott, highlights the complicity of resistance by displaying how various forms of domination limit resistance and make it take the form of being hidden and avoiding. Everyday resistance is, then, essentially resistance that is quiet, dispersed, disguised or otherwise seemingly invisible. It is a form of resistance that exploited people use in order to both survive and undermine repressive domination; especially in contexts where rebellion is too risky.

Scott fundamentally transformed our understanding of “politics” by making the ordinary life of subaltern subjects part of political affairs. He also directly played an inspirational role for the international establishment of “subaltern studies” as a distinct school that reformulated a “history from below” of India and South Asia (see, e.g., Kelly 1992, p. 297; Ludden 2002, pp. 7–11; Sivaramakrishnan 2005), and he still inspires numerous empirical studies on everyday resistance (Sivaramakrishnan 2005) with general applications (see, e.g., Johansson and Vinthagen 2020; Smith and Grijns 1997), on how covert resistance transforms into overt forms, (e.g., Adnan 2007) or on its effectiveness (e.g., Korovkin 2000).

In liberal peace debates, the concept of everyday resistance has, as indicated above, served as a means to reveal new aspects of peace-building processes. By drawing primarily on theories of Michel De Certeau and Scott, the concept of everyday resistance has become central to the critique of liberal interventions. Still, as argued by some, the elaborations of the concept of resistance remain limited within this research strand. Among others, in seeking to move beyond the simplifications of this “local turn,” Marta Iñiguez de Heredia (2018) argues that: “Scott’s point was not to create a different realm of politics but to show that both formal and informal forms of resistance were part of the same context and operated under the same structures, just through different means.” Iñiguez de Heredia rightly emphasizes how resistance, irrespective of the form that it takes, is constructed within the context of where it plays out.

In a similar vein, studies of everyday resistance have contributed to the understanding of resistance, but they have also limited scholars’ views by showing very little interest in the theorizing of movements that use avoidance. Here, it is suggested that “avoidance” resistance must not necessarily be seen as “informal,” “individual,” or “everyday.” “Avoidance” resistance can appear as an organized collective practice, even on a grand-scale. One prominent historical example of this is the primary form of revolt against chattel slavery in the Americas: The multitude of Maroon communities formed by runaway slaves in South America and the Caribbean from the sixteenth century up until the end of slavery (Lockley 2015; Nevius 2020; Price 2018). Runaway slaves (“maroons”) created their own communities in secluded territories (jungles, swamps, or mountains), ranging from tiny bands to autonomous towns and even states, some surviving only briefly before recapture, while others sustained themselves for generations (Bilby 2001; Price 1996). Although their avoidance of enslavement begun in dispersed and nonorganized forms, based on individuals or small groups, it amounted to a mass phenomenon. This opened up space for the building up of self-governed and semifree communities, with its own justice system, food production, set of rights, and formed a basis for collectively organized resistance against recapture and punishments (Bilby 2001; Lockley 2015). This is quite remarkable if we acknowledge that this was done without a common language, in diverse groups that only shared a desperation for survival, situated in a foreign continent, relegated to the worst territories, without resources or powerful protection anywhere. Yet, some communities became strong enough to constitute a threat to the surrounding slave society, making treaties possible that recognized their autonomy (Bilby 2001; Nevius 2020). One of the biggest “quilombos” (maroon communities) in Brazil, Palmares, had more than 10,000 inhabitants and survived for nearly 100 years before it was crushed by a series of Portuguese military invasions (Price 2018). Similar communities played a key role in the revolution in Haiti 1791–1804 (which thus formed the first maroon Nation State) and the extraordinary resilience of Jamaican rebellions who were never defeated, as well as other organized resistance among Black communities against slavery in the Western hemisphere (Bilby 2001; Lockley 2015). Remarkably, today there are even remaining autonomous maroon towns, in, for example, Jamaica and Surinam, and in Brazil. In toto, we have today more than 2000 officially certified communities around the world (Bilby 2001; Leite 2015).

These Maroon communities show how avoidance on a mass scale is an effective form of resistance to the structural violence of slavery, and how this avoidance resistance formed the basis for other forms of resistance (both “breaking” and “constructive” resistance, forms we will expand on below).

Another example of resistance through avoidance is the mass emigration of one million professionals from Eastern Europe in 1989, which facilitated the fall of the Berlin Wall and became a drain of resources for these dictatorships, and as such played a role in the undermining of repressive domination (Larrabee 1992; Pfaff and Kim 2003). There is also the avoidance resistance against the direct violence of war-making (Lyall 2016), exemplified through the individual, yet massive, desertion from the Confederate army during the American Civil War (1861–1865), which according to Scott had a decisive impact on the war capacity of the Southern States (Reid and White 1985; Scott 1989, pp. 42–43).

In these examples we see a mass mobilization of avoidance resistance, and there might be some merits into classifying them as “everyday resistance”; but if so, they are not accurately described as “individual” or “non-organized,” but should rather be understood as dispersed “mass waves” and networks. The Confederate soldiers, for example, made no organized mutiny, but deserted individually on a mass scale, numbering some 200,000. To be hidden and yet still be a movement is no contradiction – especially nowadays. The (perceived) anonymity of Internet use makes it possible to pose as someone else or to construct new identities, at the same time as the advanced communication network makes the coordination of gigantic numbers of people possible (e.g., the multi-editing of texts through Wiki-technology, see, e.g., the biggest encyclopedia in the world: www.wikipedia.org).

Therefore, we would like to suggest that mass-based resistance also can be hidden and find ways to avoid power. This means that the line that is often drawn between individual and collective forms of resistance must be questioned and new forms of resistance explored. One thing, among others, that should be embraced is that avoidance as resistance, which is hidden and shuns different power expressions, can be individually dispersed as well as collectively organized. Thus, covert and hidden forms of resistance should not always be counted as “everyday resistance,” or seen as “small-scaled.”

Breaking Resistance

The notion of resistance as “avoidance” must be complemented with another conceptualization of dissent; that is, power relation “breaking” resistance (Vinthagen 2005, 2015, pp. 165–205). Breaking resistance operates according to a very different logic than avoidance resistance and publicly challenges power directly. This resistance might be articulated as protests, strikes, civil disobedience, objections to direct orders and road blockades, or factory occupations, consumer boycotts, etc. The “power breaking” here indicates how a power relation is – temporarily, locally, or potentially – ruptured by someone who perform a subordinated position through some kind of public refusal to do what is ordered or expected of them (Vinthagen 2015). Here, rules, laws, or orders that are normally obeyed or accepted are challenged. Resistance of this kind, as indicated previously, has mostly been discussed within the widespread field of “contentious politics” or social movement studies, but also within the emerging field of “nonviolent action” studies or studies of “civil resistance” (Chenoweth and Stephan 2011; Sharp 1973; Vinthagen 2015), fields that have maintained a focus on collective mobilizations.

Nonviolent action or civil resistance studies is a field that is especially useful for peacebuilding efforts since it is primarily oriented towards a critique of, tactics against, and alternatives to violence (as part of power or resistance), through its emphasis on resistance as “nonviolent,” or “civil,” and the democratization or overthrowing of authoritarian regimes or militarized dictatorships (for overviews of the literature on this topic, including those authors that go beyond democratization of regimes, see Vinthagen 2015).

Contentious politics, which is an outgrowth from social movement studies, present a more general framework of analysis for resistance (including violence as a means). The leading researchers in this field are Charles Tilly, Doug McAdam, and Sidney Tarrow (McAdam et al. 2001; Tilly and Tarrow 2007). In essence, they claim the importance of movements’ dynamic interaction with other actors in society. They argue that movements are but one form of possible contention, and that it is rather the key components; “mechanisms” and “processes,” within interactions of contention that decide what dynamic develops. Their research approach, which was introduced in 2001 and further developed in Contentious Politics (Tilly and Tarrow 2006), has spurred a lot of debate.

The contentious politics framework claims that most political undertakings are routinely applied conventional acts (reading newspapers, registering, filing documents, etc.), while some forms of politics are contentious (involving movements, but also war, revolutions or terrorism). Contentious politics comes in two versions. “Contained contention” happens when struggles are structured by the given rules of the existing system in, for example, courts of law, political debates, or contesting elections. “Transgressive” contention arises when new actors, new claims or new methods are used; that is, forms of politics that challenge conventional routines, norms and discourses. Since such contention between several actors happens in specific contexts and involves challenges to given political rules, it develops a relational dynamic interaction that becomes complex. According to the authors in this strand, the actual forms of contention and their dynamics are a result of certain general mechanisms and processes, which are hard to predict and not possible to capture through statistical models. Instead of focusing on war or movements, per se, they argue we need to understand the variations of possible combinations of mechanisms and processes. Thus, through detailed studies of event histories and episodes of contentious dynamics we can detect patterns, which will help us to see how forms of resistance matter in particular contexts.

While the conceptualization of contentious politics provides sophisticated analytical tools and a novel theoretical framework, it, as with the theorization of the “everyday” literature, continues to ignore significant forms of resistance. “Contentious politics” excludes acts by small groups of individuals from what they count as “events,” and explicitly limits the scope to forms of contention that display “public, collective interaction” (McAdam et al. 2001, p. 4). It seems clear that the resistance of individuals only makes sense within “contentious politics” when it is organized within collectives, either as leaders, organizers or participants in collectively organized events.

In contrast, in this chapter we argue that contentious politics can be both individualized and collectivized, which is something that the fields of nonviolent action and civil resistance have convincingly shown (e.g., Sharp 1973; Vinthagen 2015). If “contentious politics” is understood as the being in opposition, in a public and non-cooperative style, then individual or small-scale resistance should also be included. Individual resistance can certainly sometimes be extraordinary, and is not necessarily “everyday” or avoiding in its expression. One example of individual, dispersed, yet dramatically contentious resistance is the Buddhist monks burning themselves to death in Tibet as a protest against Chinese occupation. These self-immolations have made the Chinese government accuse the Dalai Lama of “terrorism in disguise,” after he led prayers for those who set fire to themselves. This kind of individual contentious politics must be included into a theoretical framework of resistance, conflict and peacebuilding.

Thus, individual, small-scaled or dispersed forms of contentious resistance acts, which impact on conflict patterns or peace-building attempts, do not fit the conventional understandings of “everyday resistance” (as they are contentious) or “social movements” (as they are small-scale or individual). Some of these dispersed forms of resistance might be viewed as “violent” (although they are unarmed), as for example self-immolations, property destruction, looting or riots, and do also not easily fit within the framework of “civil resistance.” In this chapter, we propose that rigid field delimitations are a mistake that emanates from narrow categorizations that exclude significant and creative forms of resistance. It seems clear that the core concept of “social movements” – as well as “everyday resistance,” “contentious politics,” and “civil resistance” – does not capture the particular logic of this kind of public and order-challenging resistance, which is labeled here as “breaking resistance.” Here, breaking resistance is viewed as a category that includes both individualized and collectively organized forms of challenges to power. It captures the logic of its resistance, when (individual, small groups of or movements of) activists engage in contentious politics: They publicly (attempt to) break a relation with dominant power. That is how tactics ranging from protests and disobedience, to strikes and boycotts become resistance.

Constructive Resistance

Above, it has been argued that current categorizations of resistance must be broadened and consider both individual and collective resistance in terms of “avoidance” and “breaking.” In this section, we introduce our third category of the ABC-framework. By further investigating the constructive mode of resistance, this section aims to contribute to previous debates about resistance that have flourished within international relations (IR) and social movement studies more generally and in peace and conflict studies in particular.

From this perspective, resistance is not only public and hidden disobedience against institutions, practices, or actors, but sometimes it also constructs new institutions, identities, discourses, communities, or practices, such as underground universities, alternative currencies, or judicial tribunals. Here, resistance is not mainly against something, but rather a matter of building new institutions, systems, discourses, or identities. Majken Jul Sørensen (2016, p. 57) writes that “surprisingly little” has been written about: “initiatives which not only criticize, protest, object, and undermine what is considered undesirable and wrong, but simultaneously acquire, create, built, cultivate and experiment with what people need in the present moment, or what they would like to see replacing dominant structures or power relations.” This indicates that even though there has been an abundant production of critical literature on mobilizations, the issue of how resistance connects to the building of alternatives still needs further elaboration (Armstrong et al. 2003; Eschle and Maiguashca 2007; Koefoed 2017).

Constructive resistance takes place: “as subaltern practices that might undermine different modes and aspects of power in their enactments, performances and constructions of ‘alternatives’” (Koefoed 2017, p. 43; cf. Sørensen 2016). This can involve the construction of unorthodox institutions, movements, “nowtopias” or the enactments of non-capitalist alternative societies, or it can denote resistance that aims to produce discourses “otherwise” and it thereby negotiates subject positions and lifestyles. Constructive resistance is a form of dissent that come to “produce and structure subjectivities, ways of life, desires and bodies, by destabilizing, displacing or replacing such production” (Lilja and Vinthagen 2018, p. 212).

In previous studies, the concept that is the most reminiscent of “constructive resistance” involves the (collective) activities of “prefigurative politics,” which is discussed in some social movement literature. However, the conceptualization of constructive resistance here moves beyond definitions where prefiguration appears as “the conflation of movement means and ends, [the] enactment of the ultimate values of an ideal society within the very means of struggle for that society” (Maeckelbergh 2011a, b; cf. van de Sande 2013).

Constructive resistance is to be seen as a broader category than “prefigurative politics,” as it not only involves movements’ enactment of what is considered to be an ideal society, but also the construction of subversive norms, practices and subject-positions that are part of communities’ attempt to undermine prevailing domination. By this broader approach, constructive forms of resistance – which bring about “subversive knowledge,” “counter-history,” or “knowledge otherwise” – should be acknowledged (cf. Foucault 1990; Koefoed 2017; Lilja and Vinthagen 2007, 2014, 2018; Mignolo 2011; Sørensen 2016; Vinthagen 2005).

In addition, while the resistance part is somewhat implicit, it is not equally central to prefiguration (Koefoed 2018, pp. 102–105). For Simon Springer, it is even emphasized that prefiguration is not a “grand gesture of defiance, but . . . instead the prefiguration of alternative worlds” (Springer 2014, pp. 408, 412). It is agreed here, in line with Minoo Koefoed (2018, p. 103), that the concept of prefigurative politics does not clearly relate to (1) the concept of power, (2) the undermining of power, and (3) the performing of a subaltern position, all of which is key to the understanding of resistance. The special thing here about the concept of “constructive resistance” is that it is not just about the creation of an alternative; rather, it is about constructing an alternative as a response to existing power relations, as a creative means of resistance.

Moreover, the complex character of constructive resistance is also recognized here and it is acknowledged that many practices of this form of resistance contain both constructive and non-constructive elements, and these might work together to undermine systems of domination. Sometimes, as Sørensen (2016) shows in her mapping of a whole range of different empirical examples, constructive resistance is relatively “more” constructive or oppositional, and at other times it is “less”; as such there is a sliding scale in this world of resistance where the building of new social facts and relations challenge existing power relations and their materialized institutions.

The above indicates that resistance must not explicitly be against something (although always somehow related to the undermining of power relations); rather, resistance can be productive of new lifestyles, ways of living, departments, etc. To probe these aspects of resistance means that one must carry out the same moves with resistance as Michel Foucault did with power; one must acknowledge how it produces discourses, subject-positions, as well as institutions. If power can be productive, why not resistance? Thus, this chapter suggests that the phenomenon of “constructive resistance” should be added to the resistance formulations of avoidance of power and breaking of power.

One example of this kind of resistance was revealed in interviews that were carried out by the authors in Japan in 2013 and 2014. The respondents suggested that Japanese civil society organizations must establish trustworthy narratives about poverty, militarism, pesticides and the climate change threat in order to make their recipients understand, embrace and act upon these issues. Among other things, when narrating “poverty,” they argued that it is essential for the organizations to use signs (images, videos, descriptions) that are seen as corresponding to, composing or depicting the real, thereby creating a “reality effect,” while simultaneously evoking emotional reactions. These strategies prevail as resistance that produces and promotes new truths and makes constructive use of different representations. This kind of constructive resistance can be a matter of producing ongoing small-scale differences that might look trivial, but sometimes have major impacts (cf. Lilja 2021, forthcoming; Sørensen 2016).

Concluding Discussion

Decades of rigorous and inspiring scholarship on dissent have provided a solid base from where one can advance some reformulations of the “types” of resistance. This chapter has first and foremost broadened existing categories, while also suggesting a third form of resisting: constructive resistance, one that is of particular interest for peacebuilding. By using these ABC-categories, one can see that the conceptual line that is often drawn between individual and collective forms of resistance must be dissolved and new forms of resistance explored in the collective/individual nexus. With a refined categorization of civil resistance practices, one is better equipped to analyze and understand how, when and why different practices are applied, and only then we are equipped to explore what roles they might play for peacebuilding.

The form of resistance that emerges in different “peace” and “conflict” contexts depends upon why and in which setting the dissent is provoked. Previous research has emphasized the strong relationship between the character of resistance and of power (Baaz et al. 2017). However, not only power but also contextual factors impact upon how the resistance is played out (cf. Coleman Montesinos and Tucker 2015). The type of power (or violence), together with local discourses, subject positions, and other types of resistance, inform how resistance is formulated and employed (Baaz et al. 2017; Lilja and Vinthagen 2018). In other words, the specifics of the context, and the type of peace intervention, will be important in relation to which resistance practices may occur, and what role they play for peacebuilding.

Moreover, the framework of the three analytically distinct categories also makes it possible to understand how different forms of resistance mix, combine and fuse in different ways. The different kinds of resistance in the ABC-framework might provoke each other, but they can also be deployed to a different degree, or in combinations, during longer political struggles. For example, in Cambodia, the Boeung Kak Lake conflict has become a high-profile case of collective, and often gendered, resistance to forced eviction (Brickell 2014). The Boeung Kak Lake movement, which struggles for land-rights, uses different types of resistance, which seemingly support each other. On the one hand, the movement constructs and spreads information, both locally and internationally, about how the land-evictions are illegal. This constructive resistance, in turn, mobilizes new activists and provides them with new motivations to join the struggle. This can be illustrated by the quote of a female activist, who stated: “I am happy because I helped society and other communities to make them strong and share knowledge so we can stand up together and I feel that I have contributed to society” (Woman activist quoted in LICADHO 2014, p. 3). This kind of constructive resistance supported other, more non-cooperative forms of resistance, such as sit-ins in front of the parliament and the non-performance of gendered subject-positions also in the family, which are a contentious expression of breaking resistance. In order to succeed with more manifested forms of dissent, the Boeung Kak Lake movement also employed more avoiding maneuvers, such as the spreading of disinformation as a form of avoidance resistance. The resistance practices display how a multitude of scattered patterns of resistance, together, compose the land-rights movement in Cambodia (Baaz et al. 2021, forthcoming).

Fundamentally, the renewed categorization of resistances (in the plural) is a way of trying to accommodate a continuously creative and disruptive empirical reality of resistance, conflicts, and peacebuilding. With this ABC categorization, we aim to show how resistance actively engages dominant power, as well as direct and structural violence through a combination of avoidance of devastating repression and control, breaking free from its domination and dependence, while constructing self-governed nonviolent alternatives, subjectivities, and communities. Something that seems to be vital for anyone interested in peacebuilding.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Adnan, S. (2007). Departures from everyday resistance and flexible strategies of domination: The making and unmaking of a poor peasant mobilization in Bangladesh. Journal of Agrarian Change, 7(2), 183–224.
- Armstrong, D., Farrell, T., & Maiguashca, B. (2003). Governance and resistance in world politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Baaz, M., Lilja, M., Schulz, M., & Vinthagen, S. (2017). Researching resistance and social change: A critical approach to theory and practice. New York: Rowman and Littlefield International.
- Baaz, M., Lilja, M., Schulz, M., & Vinthagen, S. (2021, forthcoming). Civic resistance and democracy in Asia: A comparative study. Oxford: Routledge.
- Bilby, K. M. (2001). Maroon autonomy in Jamaica. Cultural Survival. <https://www.culturalsurvival.org/publications/cultural-survival-quarterly/maroon-autonomy-jamaica>. Accessed 19 Oct 2020.
- Brickell, K. (2014). “The whole world is watching”: Intimate geopolitics of forced eviction and women’s activism in Cambodia. Annals of the Association of American Geographers, 104(6), 1256–1272.
- Chandler, D. (2013). Peacebuilding and the politics of nonlinearity: Rethinking “hidden” agency and “resistance”. Peacebuilding, 1(1), 17–32. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2013.756256>.
- Chenoweth, E., & Stephan, M. J. (2011). Why civil resistance works. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Coleman Montesinos, L., & Tucker, K. (2015). Situating global resistance: Between discipline and dissent. London: Routledge.
- Duffield, M. (2001). Global governance and the new wars. The merging of development and security. London: Zed Books.
- Eschle, C., & Maiguashca, B. (2007). Rethinking globalised resistance: Feminist activism and critical theorising in international relations. The British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 9(2), 284–301.
- Foucault, M. (1990). The order of things: An archeology of the human sciences. New York: Vintage Books.
- Hughes, C., Öjendal, J., & Schierenbeck, I. (2015). The struggle versus the song – The local turn in peacebuilding: An introduction. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 817–824.
- Iñiguez de Heredia, M. (2014). Resistance and challenges to liberal peace processes. Millennium, 42(2), 515–525.
- Iñiguez de Heredia, M. (2018). The conspicuous absence of class and privilege in the study of resistance in peacebuilding contexts. International Peacekeeping, 25(3), 325–348.
- Johansson, A., & Vinthagen, S. (2020). Conceptualizing everyday resistance: A transdisciplinary approach. New York: Routledge.
- Kelly, R. D. G. (1992). An archaeology of resistance. American Quarterly, 44(2), 292–298.
- Koefoed, M. (2017). Constructive resistance in northern Kurdistan: Exploring the peace, development and

- resistance nexus. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 12(3), 39–53.
- Koefoed, M. (2018). The art of enacting the impossible: A conceptual, empirical, and methodological exploration of constructive resistance by the Kurdish Movement in Turkey. Ph.D. thesis, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg.
- Korovkin, T. (2000). Weak weapons, strong weapons? Hidden resistance and political protest in rural Ecuador. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 27(3), 1–29.
- Larrabee, F. S. (1992). Down and out in Warsaw and Budapest: Eastern Europe and East–West migration. International Security, 16(4), 5–33.
- Leite, I. B. (2015). The Brazilian quilombo: “Race,” community and land in space and time. The Journal of Peasant Studies, 42(6), 1225–1240. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03066150.2015.1016919>.
- LICADHO. (2014). “Good wives” women land campaigners and the impact of human rights activism. Phnom Penh: LICADHO. http://www.licadho-cambodia.org/collection/24/good_wives_women_land_campaigners/
- Lilja, M. (2021, forthcoming). Constructive resistance: Repetitions, emotions and time. New York: Rowman and Littlefield International.
- Lilja, M., & Vinthagen, S. (2007). Resistance. In G. L. Anderson & K. G. Herr (Eds.), Encyclopaedia of activism and social justice. London: Sage.
- Lilja, M., & Vinthagen, S. (2014). Sovereign power, disciplinary power and biopower: Resisting what power with what resistance. Journal of Political Power, 7(1), 107–126.
- Lilja, M., & Vinthagen, S. (2018). Dispersed resistance: Unpacking the spectrum and properties of glaring and everyday resistance. Journal of Political Power, 11(2), 211–229.
- Lockley, T. (2015). Runaway slave colonies in the Atlantic world. In Oxford research encyclopedia of Latin American history. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ludden, D. (Ed.). (2002). Reading subaltern studies: Critical history, contested meaning and globalization of South Asia. London: Anthem Press.
- Lyll, J. (2016). Why armies break: Explaining mass desertion in conventional war. Political Science. <https://doi.org/10.2139/SSRN.2524561>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Maeckelbergh, M. (2011a). The road to democracy: The political legacy of “1968”. International Review of Social History, 56(2), 301–332.
- Maeckelbergh, M. (2011b). Doing is believing: Prefiguration as strategic practice in the alterglobalization movement. Social Movement Studies, 10(1), 1–20.
- McAdam, D., Tarrow, S., & Tilly, C. (2001). Dynamics of contention. Cambridge: The Press Syndicate of the University of Cambridge.
- Mignolo, W. D. (2011). Epistemic disobedience and the decolonial option: A manifesto. Transmodernity, 1(1), 44–66.
- Nevius, M. P. (2020). New histories of marronage in the Anglo-Atlantic world and early North America. History Compass. <https://doi.org/10.1111/hic3.12613>.
- Newman, E., & Richmond, O. P. (Eds.). (2006). Challenges to peacebuilding: Managing spoilers during conflict resolution. Tokyo/New York/Paris: United Nations University Press.
- Pfaff, S., & Kim, H. (2003). Exit-voice dynamics in collective action: An analysis of emigration and protest in the East German revolution. American Journal of Sociology, 109(2), 401–444.
- Price, R. (1996). Maroon societies: Rebel slave communities in the Americas. The Johns Hopkins University Press; 3rd edition.
- Price, R. (2018). Maroons and their communities in the Americas. Politika, 1–18. <https://www.politika.io/en/notice/maroons-and-their-communities-in-the-americas>. Accessed 19 Oct 2020.
- Reid, B. H., & White, J. (1985). “A mob of stragglers and cowards”: Desertion from the union and confederate armies, 1861–65. Journal of Strategic Studies, 8(1), 64–77.
- Richmond, O. P. (2010). Resistance and the post-liberal peace. Millennium, 38(3), 665–692.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). Critical agency, resistance and a post-colonial civil society. Cooperation and Conflict, 46(4), 419–440.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Where now for the critique of the liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 50(2), 171–189.
- Scott, J. C. (1989). Everyday forms of resistance. Copenhagen Papers, 4, 33–62.
- Scott, J. C. (1990). Domination and the arts of resistance: Hidden transcripts. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Sharp, G. (1973). The politics of nonviolent action: Parts one, two and three. Boston: Porter Sargent Publishers, Extending Horizons Books.
- Sivaramakrishnan, K. (2005). Some intellectual genealogies for the concept of everyday resistance. American Anthropologist, 107(3), 346–355.
- Smith, I., & Grijns, M. (1997). Unjuk Rasa or conscious protest? Resistance strategies of Indonesian women workers. Bulletin of Concerned Asian Scholars, 29(4), 13–22.
- Sørensen, M. J. (2016). Constructive resistance: Conceptualising and mapping the terrain. Journal of Resistance Studies, 2(1), 49–78.
- Springer, S. (2014). Human geography without hierarchy. Progress in Human Geography, 38(3), 402–419.
- Stedman, S. J., Rothchild, D., & Cousens, E. M. (Eds.). (2002). Ending civil wars. The implementation of peace agreements. Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Tilly, C., & Tarrow, S. (2006). Contentious politics. Boulder/London: Paradigm Publishers.
- Tilly, C., & Tarrow, S. (2007). Contentious politics. London: Paradigm.
- Van de Sande, M. (2013). The prefigurative politics of Tahir Square. Res Publica, 19, 223–239.

- Vinshagen, S. (2005). Icke våldsaktion: En social praktik av motstånd och konstruktion [Nonviolent action: A social practice of resistance and construction] (PhD dissertation). Department of Peace and Development Research (PADRIGU), University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg.
- Vinshagen, S. (2015). How civil resistance works: A theory of nonviolent action. London: ZED Books.

Civil Society

- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

Civil Society and Peacebuilding: Critical Review

Yaser Alashqar
International Peace Studies, Trinity College
Dublin, the University of Dublin, Dublin, Ireland

Definition

This entry provides a critical review of civil society's relationship with peacebuilding. It assesses both aspects concerning the negative and positive contributions of civil society to peacebuilding and conflict-torn societies. Drawing on extensive research and supporting examples, the analysis suggests clearly that civil society actors and organizations have the power to support peacebuilding processes. However, as this study also indicates, civil society players can play a negative role by contributing to conflict and undermining peacebuilding prospects. In addition, this entry ends with key observations at the practice and research level in the area of civil society peacebuilding. These key observations highlight significant issues, including (a) the lack of agreed civil society concepts and the contradictory frameworks of civil society resistance and liberal civil society; (b) the contention of peacebuilding definitions in theory and practice; (c) the increasing policy recognition of the important role of civil society local actors in conflict and peacebuilding processes; (d) the growing dilemmas in engaging with conflict situations and armed groups by civil society organizations; and (e) the centrality of the negative and positive roles of civil society in understanding the relationship between civil society and peacebuilding. This entry proposes a serious consideration of these policy and research observations within the broader context of conceptualizing and improving the practice of civil society peacebuilding.

Introduction

The purpose of this entry is to critically review and assess civil society's relationship with peacebuilding. Informed by extensive research and a wide range of supporting examples, the entry places a special emphasis on conflict-torn societies and the positive contributions of civil society to peacebuilding processes. To present a more critical perspective, the discussions also provide a critique of civil society's negative role in conflict and peacebuilding. Following this key analysis, the entry concludes with key observations at the practice and research level in the wider field of civil society peacebuilding. These significant observations should be taken into consideration within the broader context of understanding and improving the practice of civil society peacebuilding.

It is important to note that this entry does not address the conceptual and practical approach of liberal peace. This approach prioritizes liberalization in the economic and political spheres and building Western market-oriented democracies as a formula for resolving national conflicts in non-Western societies. The critical aspect of liberal peace, including its civil society and international components, has extensively been debated and critiqued in the literature by leading scholars in the field of peacebuilding and politics (Paris, 2004) (Chandler & Sabaratnam, 2011). The application of liberal peace through the civil society arena in international conflict contexts such as Palestine has also been examined in separate studies (Alashqar, 2018).

This entry is structured in four sections. The first section conceptualizes the key terms of civil society and peacebuilding. The second section evaluates the positive role of civil society in peacebuilding. The third section highlights the negative impact of civil society on conflict and peacebuilding processes. The fourth section presents some concluding remarks for practice and research in the field of civil society peacebuilding. The final section summarizes the main arguments discussed in this entry. The key terms of civil society and peacebuilding are explored and conceptualized in the next section below.

Conceptual Notes: Civil Society and Peacebuilding

Civil society represents generally informal organizations, local actors and communities, grassroots groups, voluntary associations, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). In recent decades, these types of groups have often been characterized as civil society organizations (CSOs). On the other hand, international organizations are governed by formal treaties and include international governmental organizations (IGOs), such as the European Union and the United Nations, and international nongovernmental organizations (INGOs) that seek to address issues of public concern including human rights, healthcare, armed conflict, and poverty. Connections and cooperation among national CSOs, IGOs, and INGOs have also developed (Abidin, 2016). However, the modern understanding of the civil society sphere excludes established political parties, state actors, and commercial interests (Seckinelgin, 2002). The emergence of formal and national CSOs has been recognized in recent decades, and it reflects an ongoing process of institutionalizing civil society structures in different parts of the world with active support from international organizations and governments.

According to Thomas Grothers and William Barndt, the rise of CSOs has been attributed to a number of political, economic, and geographical factors since the 1990s. First, the global movement toward democracy and active citizenship has opened up the space for civil society actors in formerly war-torn countries and dictatorial countries around the world. Second, in the USA and Western Europe, public weariness with exhausted party systems sparked a great interest in civil society as an important means of social renewal. Third, especially in developing countries, privatization and market reforms have presented civil society with the opportunity to step in and involve itself as some governments pulled back their reach and influence. Thus, the founding of voluntary organizations and the culture of service provision has been critical in the development of today's civil society. Fourth, the information revolution, globalization, and the Internet provided new tools for establishing connections and empowering citizens throughout the world. Finally, the lower cost of transportation and the relative absence of borders in certain geographical areas (e.g., the European Union) contributed positively to the development of recent civil association and regional projects (Crothers & Barndt, 1999).

Although a clear and agreed concept of civil society is still lacking, the status and the role of social structures became strongly recognized in recent decades. Therefore, scholarly and official attention has turned to this nongovernmental sector and its potential role in supporting peacebuilding in conflict-torn societies. In this context, according to Johan Galtung (Galtung, 1996), peacebuilding initiatives should seek to address acts of direct violence such as assaults and killing, and support trauma recovery, healing, and community dialogue. Most importantly, structural causes of oppression and inequality, as well as experiences of indirect violence at the institutional and societal level, should be dealt with in conflict situations. Ultimately, as Galtung points out, achieving these complex tasks facilitates the emergence of positive peace in divided societies. Peacebuilding can also take on more inclusive roles. Nick Lewer illustrates further:

As well as dealing with the immediate effects of war such as destruction of property and the killing and wounding of soldiers and civilians, peacebuilding can open up questions of social justice, economic exploitation, political oppression, gender and race discrimination and abuse of human rights. (Lewer, 1999)

Michael Barnett adds eloquently that peacebuilding is “designed to create a positive peace, to eliminate the root causes of conflict” and to “allow states and societies to develop stable expectations of peaceful change” (Barnett et al., 2007). Thus, peacebuilding should continue to represent a “multidimensional activity” which is achieved by “nonviolent methods such as processes of conflict resolution, mediation and negotiation” (Atack, 2005). Jonathan Goodhand indicates further that comprehensive peacebuilding integrates strategies for “working around conflict,” “working in conflict,” and “working on conflict.” In other words, engagement in peacebuilding can entail conflict reduction measures, work to address its causes and effects, and promote conflict prevention as parallel efforts (Goodhand, 2006). Therefore, peacebuilding initiatives can occur before, alongside, or even in the absence of formal conflict resolution efforts and political settlement (Cousens et al., 2001). Drawing on these conceptual understandings of civil society and peacebuilding, the next section examines the positive role of CSOs in peacebuilding.

Role of Civil Society in Peacebuilding

The Carnegie UK Trust Report emphasizes strongly the connection between the involvement of civil society and combating challenges of violence, discrimination, and social justice. Researchers suggest that in the Report, a basic strength of informal organizations is their capacity to help make a positive change through which values and outcomes such as “nonviolence, non-discrimination, democracy, mutuality and social justice are nurtured and achieved; and as a means by which public dilemmas are resolved in ways that are just, effective and democratic” (CarnegieUKTrust, 2007).

Not only do CSOs enjoy the capacity to encourage a culture of positive peace and understanding in conflict environments, but they are also capable of making a meaningful contribution to societies emerging out of political and violent conflicts. These are situations in which members of concerned communities have suffered and survived horrific violence and traumas. In such circumstances, civil society initiatives can help to reconstruct the social fabric of society, the broken trust, as well as the psychological damage that has been caused by the violence. Beatrice Pouligny argues that civil associations and citizens groups are central players in specifically transforming hostilities and conflicts and in nourishing new values of cooperation and rights in war-torn communities. Most importantly, they could support the local state to reestablish law and order. As she puts it:

Local civil societies, through monitoring and lobbying activists, may push the local state into fulfilling its responsibility for implementing the rule of law. They are often seen to carry the best hopes for a genuine democratic counterweight to the power-brokers, economic exploiters and warlords who tend to predominate in conflict-ridden weak or failed states, and may even capture electoral processes. (Pouligny, 2005)

Furthermore, while informal groups give expression and direction to the social, political, spiritual, and cultural needs of society members, it is crucial to understand that civil society is far more than public-benefit organizations. Thus, NGOs and CSOs with technical and professional skills “can play an important role in providing services, promoting change and working with conflict” (Barnes, 2005). Furthermore, civil society in conflict contexts combines particularly three significant powers: the power of resistance, the power of exposing oppression, and also the power of persuasion (Barnes, 2006). These distinguished advantages place civil society players in a unique position to lead various positive initiatives during violent conflict and after it has been transformed. In this context, Catherine Barnes points out:

[CSOs] play roles at every point in the development of conflict and its resolution: from surfacing situations of injustice to preventing violence, from creating conditions conducive to peace talks to mediating a settlement and working to ensure it is consolidated, from setting a global policy agenda to healing war scarred psyches. (Barnes, 2006)

Moreover, David Bloomfield illustrates that the significance of bottom-up endeavors in conflict-torn societies exists in their ability to encourage interactions and societal participation through which grievances and terms of future coexistence are defined and negotiated. The opposite top-down official approach, he points out, is “exactly the realm where the pragmatists, the political thinkers and the realists try to see what needs to be done to build civic trust, to achieve political reconciliation, democratic reciprocity.” His conclusion is that civil society “should be also the interface where the two realms meet and could be co-ordinated and interwoven” (Bloomfield, 2006). Similarly, emphasizing this vital connection, in Partners in Peace: Discourses and Practices of Civil Society Peacebuilding, Mathijs Van Leeuwen clarifies that what distinguishes CSOs in conflict situations is their “comparative advantage of local knowledge and contextual understandings of barriers and opportunities” to making and sustaining peace at the local and national level. Also, unlike international organizations, they have an “inherent understanding” of the future postconflict context and associated challenges. In practice, according to Leeuwen, this has placed national agencies central to any effective efforts at transforming conflict and, confirmed the contributions of civil society to peacebuilding in conflict and postconflict situations (Leeuwen, 2009).

Assessing how civil society groups have supported efforts and activities aimed at building peace in 65 cases including the Balkans, Northern Ireland, Rwanda, Georgia, Kenya, Colombia, Lebanon, Israel/Palestine, and Guatemala, Paul Van Tongeren and his fellow researchers conclude that CSOs are able to create “safe spaces” where groups and individuals can join forces to engage in dialogue and help change their societies “based on justice and the rule of law” (Verhoeven et al., 2005). More importantly, one of their major findings is that this informal sector opens up possibilities and facilitates greater participation and involvement in the quest for sustainable and positive peace beyond the traditional notion of political activism. Thus, artists, teachers, students, young people, labor union members, academics, environmentalists, journalists, and religious leaders are all afforded opportunities for confronting injustice and promoting peacebuilding through civil society interactions (Verhoeven et al., 2005).

Moreover, through information campaigns, public opinion polls, advocacy, and lobbying, civil society players connect the population to the “official mediation process” in conflict contexts. Therefore, there is now a “general acceptance that national actors should play the leading role in peacebuilding and that the role of outsiders should be limited to support” (Paffenholz, 2010). In their 2010 study of localized approaches to peacebuilding, Abdul Aziz Said and Nathan Funk have attempted to define further the insider-outsider relationship in the context of civil society peacebuilding. They suggest that international organizations and actors can enhance local efforts aimed at peacebuilding through: (a) playing a mediating role between national projects and international resources, such as allocation of funding and sharing information; (b) redirecting the focus of the global media on local processes; (c) providing access to international conferences where opportunities of sharing expertise can be created; and (d) helping local partners to link and network with larger groups and audiences beyond their immediate conflict environment (Abdul Aziz & Nathan, 2010).

Local CSOs and community groups also make significant contributions to peacebuilding in various but related areas. These include, for instance, establishing alternative media, monitoring elections and democratic processes in society, providing peace education, organizing interreligious dialogue, and facilitating youth leadership. Furthermore, leading initiatives for disarmament and political processes, promoting arts, music, and films to counter cultures of violence and conflict, strengthening peace constituencies, offering support to marginalized groups of refugees and women, lobbying for human rights and protection of civilians in war times, documenting war crimes, dealing with trauma, and providing psychosocial support for conflict victims are recognized as important contributions to peacebuilding (Fischer, 2006). In her evaluation of the role of civil society especially in war-torn societies, Martina Fischer believes that international support and partnership with CSOs working on the ground is a key factor for addressing the peacebuilding challenges in societies torn by conflict and violence. Fischer elaborates further:

In war times, [local] NGOs contribute to maintaining or improving relationships by fostering action across conflict lines and ethnic divides through informal exchanges and joint projects. . . . International NGOs, political foundations and local communities have created partnerships with, and support programmes for, groups and individuals in conflict-torn societies in order to enable conflict transformation and peacebuilding. Many NGOs work to lobby, monitor and influence the policy of governments and international organizations. . . . Aiming to raise public awareness of the needs of war-torn societies. (Fischer, 2006)

Given these comparative strengths, civil society actors make a positive difference in conflict situations by facilitating a “direct representation” of combatants and victims. In this context, through informal contacts and meetings, CSOs can function as a mediating body for this significant representation, and for clear communication of grievances and conflicting claims to wider communities and groups beyond their immediate borders (Shaw, 1996). Similarly, Luc Reyhler considers the role of civil society players in the field to be critically important in relation to representations. He maintains that their presence in conflict environments does not only constitute available expertise, but they are also able to act as “field-diplomats.” This is through setting up early warning systems for rising conflicts, advocacy for the victims of violence, supporting existing peace structures, and bringing different groups together for dialogues (Paffenholz & Reyhler, 2001).

Undertaking all these complex and risky tasks in conflict situations requires CSOs to possess certain abilities and advantages to influence conflict dynamics and make a positive impact. CSOs have the ability to: (a) operate without being constrained by limiting mandates of foreign policy agendas; (b) gain access to areas inaccessible to official leaders; (c) engage in dialogue with several parties without losing their credibility; (d) deal directly with grassroots communities; (e) work in confidentiality without media coverage and scrutiny; and (f) take risks and effectively network given their long-standing relationships and connections (Fischer, 2006).

The engagement of civil society in peacebuilding efforts has been also receiving further attention within the theory and practice of sustainable peace as suggested by John Paul Lederach. His theory is based on interconnecting official and grassroots levels to facilitate and sustain peacebuilding activities. Lederach suggests three levels for leadership that can equally coordinate and support peacebuilding efforts in divided societies (Lederach, 1997). These are senior government leaders (military personal, politicians, and diplomats), middle-range leaders (academics, peace and civil society practitioners, faith representatives, and CSOs), and local leadership (grassroots activists, Indigenous constituencies, refugee camp leaders, and peace and humanitarian workers). Lederach has developed these emergent themes further by prioritizing Indigenous agency and its crucial role in building positive and sustainable peace (Abdul Aziz & Nathan, 2010).

Civil society can make further contributions to promote peacebuilding and transform violent conflict situations by taking on diverse tasks of national organizations in the context of armed conflicts and comprehensive peacebuilding processes. In particular, NGOs can be divided into three categories according to the type of peacebuilding intervention they wish to be engaged in and their expertise and resources allow. The three categories are the following: (a) direct intervention, that is, delivery of assistance and aid, direct implementation of projects without working through intermediary organizations; (b) capacity building, that is, developing the capacity of individuals or contact organizations to sustain the effects of projects and long-term programs of peacebuilding; and (c) advocacy, that is, influencing and lobbying policy-makers and decision-makers to engender and support changes at the macrolevel (Goodhand, 2006).

Drawing on extensive research and supporting examples, the previous discussions suggested that the positive role of CSOs in peacebuilding is diverse and multiple, interconnected, and as complex as conflict itself. However, civil society actors and organizations can impact negatively on conflict situations and peacebuilding processes. This critical and negative role is examined in the next section.

Critique of Civil Society Role in Peacebuilding

One of the significant points that should be made in this critique is that civil society actors have themselves undermined democratic processes as an alternative to conflict in some cases. For example, the undemocratic actions and policies of INGOs enhanced exclusive associations in some African states and ignored the ethnic organizations that constitute the most vital part of civil society in many parts of Africa. Not only they did not support wider participation, plural identities, and acceptance, as civil society players are assumed to do, but they also portrayed rejection, exclusion, and political bias. Hence, the end result is that “the failure to promote democracy in Africa has stemmed partially from a failure to recognize and accept social realities” (Harpviken & Kjllman, 2010).

In some cases, informal organizations also participate in promoting acts of direct and indirect violence instead of supporting peacebuilding. For example, following the war in 1999 in Serbia, the Serbian government worked to build “parallel structures” within the sectors of health, education, and public services to enhance its own interests and presence in Kosovo. According to Gezim Visoka, these civil society structures have contributed to violence and attacks against non-Serb citizens and constituted a “significant obstacle to the representation and participation of Serbs in Kosovar institutions” (Visoka, 2012).

The abuse of the civil society sector and its potentials by the military and authoritarian state for its own interests has also been observed in other experiences. In the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, the Israeli military government encouraged the creation of Hamas’ Islamist social and grassroots institutions in Gaza. The goal of this policy was concerned with weakening the strength of the more nationalist and secular Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO/Fatah) and facilitating an internal conflict among the major national forces in the Palestinian context (Augustus, 1996). With the current factional divisions and the absence of political unity in the Palestinian situation, it is clear that this colonial policy has produced fruitful outcomes for Israel. In addition, certain sections of civil society in the Middle East lend their support to the authoritarian state and its abusive exercise of power. In this context, authoritarianism and oppression of citizens are enhanced by civil society elements (Augustus, 1996).

Furthermore, CSOs are generally assumed to automatically support positive change in situations of conflict and peacebuilding. This is not a completely valid claim. The reason is that civil society groups can commit to peacebuilding initiatives as well as prolonging conflict situations, which have had a long history and claimed the lives of many people. Raffaele Marchetti and Nathalie Tocci argue that while significant attention has been devoted to civil society and its role in preventing and resolving conflict, little efforts are made in the literature to examine the connection between CSOs and conflict escalation. They suggest that some of the methods utilized for civil society peacebuilding, such as media and public campaigns, monitoring activities, mass gatherings, and dialogue, can also be critically employed by civil society actors for destructive purposes: to sustain the conflict and maintain the state quo in societies suffering from division and violence. Most importantly, in some contexts, civil society actors have also delayed peaceful resolutions and obstructed endeavors aimed at negotiating a political and just settlement to long-running disputes. For this particular reason, Marchetti and Tocci propose that organizations who advocate the continuation of conflict and oppression should be called “conflict society organizations” (CoSOs) instead of CSOs. They elaborate further and provide current examples:

At times these [civil society] activities can contribute to the management and settlement of conflicts. Yet on other occasions they may constrain the scope for government manoeuvring, reducing the prospects for compromise. The lobbying efforts of the American Israeli Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) as a third party (i.e. US) CoSO on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, or the Armenian Diaspora in France and the US regarding the Turkish-Armenian relations are notable cases in point. (Marchetti & Tocci, 2009)

Similarly, civil society actors sometimes play a negative role in worsening conflicts and causing harm in local communities, instead of helping to facilitate peacebuilding. For instance, aid assistance managed and provided by informal groups can be used to do harm rather than good. This includes favoring recipients, unfair distribution, releasing funds for war through humanitarian assistance and delivery, and damaging local markets. Therefore, as Mary Anderson points out, despite their best efforts to maintain “non-partisanship” in terms of the warring parties, representatives of peace and humanitarian NGOs in the field still influence “intergroup connectors and dividers by either worsening dividers or ignoring/undermining connectors” (Anderson, 2001).

Funding and tensions between CSOs are also critical issues that must be acknowledged when discussing the negative role of civil society. The fierce competition for funding can in some cases result in a “disconnect between the peacebuilding initiatives and conflict context.” Moreover, because of the constant pressure and need for project funds, an NGO culture has emerged which is opportunistic and driven by a “project mentality” (Barnes, 2006). In addition, some CSOs change their performance and goals in conflict and peacebuilding contexts depending on the requirements of donors, and therefore they often lack independence because they are often either state or donor-driven (Fischer, 2006).

It is equally important to be aware of the role of CSOs in deepening organizational disputes in conflict-torn societies. Civil society relations are not always peaceful, and a lack of unity generally between CSOs is still a constraint on implementation. This results in organizational conflicts which divert the social energy and commitment of activists and local groups to peacebuilding. Thus, there is a persistent concern about the lack of democratic controls and checks in the civil society sector (Fischer, 2006). Commenting on conflicts and tensions within the sphere of civil society and the implications involved, Hizkias Assefa points out:

Civil society is a microcosm of the overall society and mirrors all the divisions and fault lines in the community. Therefore, it is inevitable that civil society actors have their own biases and loyalties. They may lack the objectivity and distance to undertake the reconciler roles... Civil society actors themselves might need a reconciliation process before they can play reconciler roles. (Assefa, 2005)

Thus, while these civil society conflicts may not lead into anarchy and violence, there is a clear recognition that they do constantly bring about a degree of social disharmony in society (Foley & Edwards, 1996). In this context, some observers continue to argue that since conflicts within CSOs are inevitable, the presence of a strong functioning state is essential in managing and regulating this associational realm and its promising as well as harmful potentials (Mennell, 1995).

Final observations should be made at the practice and research level in the area of civil society peacebuilding. First, while extensive research has been carried out to understand better the concept of civil society, clear and agreed definitions are still lacking. Contradictory approaches toward understanding the arena and practice of civil society still exist. In particular, there are those who still believe that countering state power and confronting repression in the context of seeking political change and social justice requires active engagement and politicized struggles by the masses, civil society organizations, and the intellectuals of the society (Gramsci, 1978). Challenging governments in national and political crises is key in this philosophy. This represents the school of civil society resistance, which has roots in Antonio Gramsci's political writings and understandings. The Gramscian philosophy of political resistance and mass mobilization through grassroots struggles inspired many activists and intellectuals around the world. It has also contributed to academic debates and the politicization of cultures and civil society activism (Harris, 1992).

On the other hand, there are still intellectual and liberal groups who believe in the idea of building a civil society for debate, association, and “civil behaviour,” – a “good society” that can meet the current realities of market, globalization, and democracy (Edwards & Hulme, 1992). These different understandings of civil society and its functions continue to obscure the term and practice of civil society. However, the crucial recognition of these contradictory frameworks of civil society helps us to better interpret the changing relationships between citizens and state, and the shifting dimensions of the broader institutional landscape at local, national, and global levels (Lewis, 2004).

Second, another important observation at the theoretical level is that any attempt to clearly define the role of civil society in peacebuilding is also problematic and challenging. This is because the essential meaning of peacebuilding is contentious in both theory and practice, and cultural understandings make it difficult to conceptualize. Also, the liberal peace theory makes it more elusive to distinguish other concepts of peacebuilding and civil society. In addition, a critical issue in this debate is that scholars and practitioners face a serious deficit of theories about the concept of civil society peacebuilding (Paffenholz, 2010). These challenges are important to acknowledge because they place real constraints on defining and conceptualizing the role of civil society in peacebuilding processes.

Third, at the policy level, a further observation is that the role of CSOs and local actors in peace processes is gaining further legitimacy and recognition in policy circles because of the evolving complexities of both conflicts and peace processes. In other words, while state officials are well-positioned at times to facilitate political change and power-sharing agreements between former adversaries, there is a growing recognition that if we seek to support peacebuilding and generate public support to make peace agreements stand in exceptionally fragile situations, civil society and community organizations must be at the heart of these efforts. Recent experiences have also demonstrated that state-oriented conflict resolution approaches have major weaknesses, including the way in which root causes of conflict are overlooked. There is also the narrow, hierarchical focus on conflict leaders in mediation processes which may negatively facilitate exclusion and alienation of significant local players and their constituencies (Jacobsen et al., 2000).

Furthermore, the shift from conflict resolution to conflict prevention has created a greater policy recognition of informal actors in transforming conflict and building sustainable peace. Two outcomes have emerged as a result of this policy development. These are as follows: (a) the acknowledgment that CSOs are able to make a significant contribution toward managing and preventing future conflicts; and (b) formal peace processes cannot fully succeed without the participation of local players (Leeuwen, 2009). This growing connection between policy and practice in the area of civil society peacebuilding should be strengthened by establishing further cooperation between CSOs, IGOs, and INGOs at the national and international level. It should also be informed by the central role of CSOs and local actors in addressing the structural causes of conflict and the wider issues of direct and indirect violence, equality, and human rights.

Fourth, another important observation in the area of policy and practice is concerned with the dilemmas that arise among CSOs in working with conflict. These dilemmas are recognized in the evolving nature of distance and international politics. Distance is a key challenge for civil society engagement in international contexts of conflict and peacebuilding. The disconnection with remote civil wars and conflicts is problematic. Information regarding these distant situations is mediated by a third party, which is normally the media. Depending on how partial and honest media sources are, this can either increase or decrease the distance. Also, at the heart of this issue is the question of responsibility. For many people and national governments, being open to other political and social problems may involve taking a degree of responsibility and responding to the conflicts. In this regard, Martin Shaw stresses that distance does not only exist but it also evolves with complexity and according to political and media reactions to international crises. Therefore, it either strengthens or weakens the response of INGOs to external conflicts. Shaw illustrates:

Distance, psychological or even geographical, is not a straight forward question. Distance is complex and relative and is constantly established, undermined and negotiated in our responses [to conflict and violent situations]. . . .Media coverage of global crises both creates and undermines a variety of forms of distancing. (Shaw, 1996)

The relationship between civil society peacebuilding and international politics in the context of the US “war on terror” presents another dilemma. There are serious consequences and substantial risks for civil society engagement with perpetrators of violence and nonstate armed organizations. This is because of fears about granting legitimacy to armed groups and perhaps giving them a voice. The majority of governments and state agencies are wary of contacts with non-state armed actors and have attempted to avoid them since the September 2001 attacks in the USA. As a result of representing and engaging with combatants, CSOs will be targeted on the grounds of “assisting terrorists,” and being “complicit with terrorism” (Clapham, 2009). In this situation, obtaining funds and attracting international donors may prove extremely difficult. Therefore, there is now understanding among civil society groups that involving “non-state actors needs a degree of political sophistication if one is to avoid the ‘terrorist tag’” (Clapham, 2009). Taken together, these two dilemmas in relation to distance and international politics require further attention at the research and policy level. Thus, a better awareness of such dilemmas facilitates civil society peacebuilding and helps to bridge the gap between external peaceful societies and war-torn countries.

Finally, based on the previous analysis and critical review of civil society’s relationship with peacebuilding, a concluding observation at the research and policy level is concerned with the centrality of understanding the negative and positive roles of civil society in peacebuilding. While there is credible evidence in relation to the positive contributions that CSOs have made, and can make in peacebuilding and conflict situations as illustrated above, there are documented cases of the negative contributions of civil society to conflict and peacebuilding. Taken together, these negative examples and roles suggest clearly that the capacity of civil society to always make a positive contribution to peacebuilding should not be romanticized or exaggerated. In fact, as analyzed previously, civil society actors have the potential to play a negative role in peacebuilding and conflict contexts. Therefore, at the theoretical and policy level, these conflictual and negative elements should be studied and analyzed further with the purpose of understanding their deeper impacts on peacebuilding prospects. In addition, policy-makers should support civil society initiatives that enhance peacebuilding, and refrain from legitimizing the actions of civil society that contribute to conflict.

Summary

This entry has critically reviewed and examined civil society’s relationship with peacebuilding based on research and supporting examples. Drawing on the conceptual understandings of civil society and peacebuilding, this entry placed a special emphasis on conflict-torn societies and the positive role of civil society in peacebuilding. As the discussions demonstrated, the positive contributions civil society to peacebuilding processes in conflict situations include the following: elections monitoring; peace education; interreligious dialogue; international cooperation, protection of civilians in war times; documentation of war crimes; trauma recovery; representations of victims and combatants, grassroots participation in peacebuilding; humanitarian assistance; and capacity building and advocacy. To provide a more critical perspective, the analysis critiqued the role of CSO in peacebuilding and identified the negative contributions of civil society to conflict and peacebuilding processes. These negative contributions have involved:

undermining democracy; contributing to direct and indirect violence; participating in colonial and authoritarian policies; prolonging conflicts and obstructing their resolution; causing harm in local communities through the unequal allocation of aid and resources; and weakening the peacebuilding agenda by competing for funding and deepening organizational conflicts.

Informed by this critical review and assessment of civil society's relationship with peacebuilding, this chapter concluded with key observations at the policy and research level in the wider area of civil society peacebuilding. These significant observations have successfully established the following: First, clear and agreed definitions of civil society are still lacking within the contradictory frameworks of civil society resistance and liberal civil society. Second, defining the role of civil society in peacebuilding is problematic and challenging since the essential meaning of peacebuilding is contentious in both theory and practice. Third, the role of civil society and local actors is gaining further legitimacy and recognition in policy circles because of the complexities of both conflicts and peace processes, and also the shift from conflict resolution to conflict prevention. Fourth, CSOs are confronting growing dilemmas in engaging with conflict situations and armed groups in the context of distance and international politics. Finally, the negative and positive roles of civil society should remain central to the understanding of the theory of CSOs and their practical engagement in peacebuilding. This entry proposed taking these key observations into consideration within the broader context of conceptualizing and improving the practice of civil society peacebuilding.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America
- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Security–Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

References

- Abdul Aziz, S., & Nathan, F. C. (2010). Localizing peace: An agenda for sustainable peacebuilding. Peace and Conflict Studies Journal, 17(1), 112–134.
- Abidin, S. Z. (2016, December 30th). International organisations. Retrieved from E- International Relations: <https://www.e-ir.info/2016/12/30/international-organisations/>
- Alashqar, Y. (2018). The politics of social structures in the Palestinian case: From National Resistance to Depoliticization and liberalization. Social Sciences, 7(4), 69.
- Anderson, M. (2001). Do no harm: Enhancing local capacities for peace. In L. Reyhner & T. Paffenholz (Eds.), Peacebuilding: A field guide (p. 258). London: Lynne Rienner.
- Assefa, H. (2005). Reconciliation: Challenges, responses, and the role of civil society. In P. V. Tongeren, M. Brenk, M. Hellema, & J. Verhoeven (Eds.), People building peace: Successful stories of civil society (p. 642). London: Lynne Rienner.
- Atack, I. (2005). The ethics of peace and war. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University.
- Augustus, R. N. (1996). Civil society in the middle east. New York: Leiden.
- Barnes, C. (2005). Weaving the web: Civil society roles in working with conflict and building peace. In M. Brenk, M. Hellema, J. Verhoeven, & P. V. Tongeren (Eds.), People building peace: Successful stories of civil society (pp. 7–8). London: Lynne Rienner.
- Barnes, C. (2006). Agents for change: Civil society roles in preventing war & building peace. Amsterdam: The European Centre for Conflict Prevention.
- Barnett, M., O'Donnell, K., & Sitea, L. (2007). Peacebuilding: What is in a name? Global Governance, 13(1), 35–58.
- Bloomfield, D. (2006). On good terms: Clarifying reconciliation. Berlin: Berghof Research Centre for Constructive Conflict Management.
- CarnegieUKTrust. (2007). Futures for civil society. London: Carnegie UK Trust.
- Chandler, D., & Sabaratnam, M. (2011). A liberal peace: Problems and practices of peacebuilding. London: Zed Books.
- Clapham, A. (2009). Non-state actors. In V. Chetail (Ed.), Post-conflict peacebuilding: A lexicon (p. 208). Oxford: Oxford University.
- Cousens, E. M., Chetan, K., & Wermester, K. (2001). Peacebuilding as politics: Cultivating peace in fragile societies. London: Lynne Rienner.
- Crothers, T., & Barndt, W. (1999). Civil society. Foreign Policy, 10(3), 1–2.
- Edwards, M., & Hulme, D. (1992). Making a difference: NGOs and development in a changing world. London: Earthscan.
- Fischer, M. (2006). Civil society in conflict transformation: Ambivalence, potentials and challenges. Berlin: Berghof Research Centre for Constructive Conflict Management.

- Foley, M., & Edwards, B. (1996). The paradox of civil society. Journal of Democracy, 7(3), 5.
- Galtung, J. (1996). Peace by peaceful means: Peace and conflict, development and civilisation. Oslo: The Peace Research Institute Oslo.
- Goodhand, J. (2006). Aiding peace? The role of NGOs in armed conflict. Rugby-Warwickshire: Schumacher Centre for Technology and Development.
- Gramsci, A. (1978). Prison notebook: Selections of political writings 1921–1926. London: Lawrence and Wishart.
- Harpviken, K., & Kjllman, K. (2010). Civil society and the state. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society and peacebuilding: A critical assessment (p. 35). London: Lynne Rienner.
- Harris, D. (1992). From class to the politics of pleasure: The effects of Gramscianism on cultural studies. London: Routledge.
- Jacobsen, B., Frithjof, K., & Jacobsen, C. (2000). Beyond mediation: Towards more holistic approaches to peacebuilding and peace actor empowerment. In C. Jacobsen & J. Galtung (Eds.), Searching for peace: The road to transcend (p. 241). London: Pluto Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Leeuwen, M. V. (2009). Partners in Peace: Discourses and practices of civil society peacebuilding. Ashgate.
- Lewer, N. (1999). International non-government Organizations and peacebuilding: Perspectives from peace studies and conflict resolution. Bradford: Department of Peace Studies of Bradford University.
- Lewis, D. (2004). Old and new civil societies? Reflections on NGOs, state and democracy in Bangladesh. Journal des Anthropologues, 93–121.
- Marchetti, R., & Tocci, N. (2009). Conflict society: Understanding the role of civil Society in Conflict. Global Change, Peace & Security, 21(2), 201–217.
- Mennell, S. (1995). Civilization and decivilization: Civil society and violence. Dublin: University College Dublin.
- Paffenholz, T. (2010). Civil society and peacebuilding: A critical assessment. London: Lynne Rienner.
- Paffenholz, T., & Reyhler, L. (2001). Peacebuilding: A field guide. London: Lynne Rienner.
- Paris, R. (2004). At War's end: Building peace after civil conflict. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Poulligny, B. (2005). Civil society and post-conflict peacebuilding: Ambiguities of international Programmes aimed at building new societies. Security Dialogue, 36(4), 495–510.
- Seckinelgin, H. (2002). Civil society as a metaphor for Western liberalism. London: London School of Economics and Political Science.
- Shaw, M. (1996). Civil society and media in global crises. New York: Wellington House.
- Verhoeven, J., Wake, J., & Tongeren, P. V. (2005). People building peace: Key messages and essential findings. In P. VanTongeren, M. Brenk, M. Hellema, &

- J. Verhoeven (Eds.), People building peace: Successful stories of civil society (p. 84). London.
- Visoka, G. (2012). The obstacles to sustainable peace and democracy in post-Independence Kosovo. In M. Darweish & C. Rank (Eds.), Peacebuilding and reconciliation: Contemporary themes and challenges (p. 36). London: Pluto Press.

Civil Society and State Violence in South America

- Marcos Alan Ferreira¹ and Evellin C. da Silva²
¹Department of International Relations, Federal University of Paraiba (UFPB), Joao Pessoa, Brazil
²Graduate Program – Public Management and International Cooperation (PGPCI), Federal University of Paraiba (UFPB), João Pessoa, Brazil

Synonyms

Argentina; Brazil; Chile; Human rights advocacy; Military dictatorships; State repression

Definition

This entry examines state violence in South America, and how civil society reacts to this phenomenon, especially in the recent decades since the military dictatorships. The systematic state violence during military dictatorships from the 1960s to 1990s devastated the social fabric, leading to approximately 40,000 deaths and disappearances and 100,000 tortured people (Loveman 2011), including political leaders who would later become presidents in their countries like Dilma Rousseff (Brazil, 2011–2016) and José Mujica (Uruguay, 2010–2015). This period triggered social challenges, like the normalization of violence by police even under democratic rule, the negligence towards the prison system, and a limited transitional justice after military rule. To deal with these challenges that affect the building of lasting peace in South America, since the 1960s the civil society has responded to blatant human rights violations in a path to overcoming inequalities and respect the memory of victims. In addition to the discussions presented in the entries ► “Peace and Conflict in Brazil” and ► “Violent Conflicts in South America,” this entry focuses on the state violence and civil society responses in Argentina, Brazil, and Chile. To start, the entry explains the historical background of military dictatorships in South America. The section following shows its legacies to the society divided in two subsections focusing on the search for truth and justice by civil society, and the normalization of violence by state institutions.

South America and State Violence: The Military Dictatorships from the 1960s to 1980s

The Cold War period (1947–1991) was not restricted to space and arms race between two superpowers in different ideological extremes. Despite not having engaged in a direct conflict, the USA and the Soviet Union disputed political, economic, and ideological influence by interfering and promoting regional conflicts (Gesteira 2014). Previously under leadership mostly by populist right-wing administrations, South America has historically closer diplomatic and economic relations with the USA. However, the increase of political power of leftist movements, as demonstrated by the Cuban Revolution (1959) and the election of Salvador Allende in Chile (1970), led Washington to incite right-wing military dictatorships with the support of local elites and companies with economic interests in the region (see Costa and Silva 2018; Sales and Martins Filho 2018; Huneeus and Undurraga 2021).

Thus, military regimes in the 1960s and 1970s were also inserted in the global economic momentum. Political upheavals had direct political, economic, and operational participation by corporations with strong participation in Latin America (such as Volkswagen, Ford, and Ultra-gás) (Costa and Silva 2018). Since its early years, the coups combined the alliance with the USA between corporations and local elites but also received substantial criticisms from popular mobilizations led by civil society in a search for maintaining their labor rights, land reform, and wealth distribution.

It was in this global setting that several military coups in South America emerged, such as seen in Brazil (1964), Argentina (1966), Chile (1973), and Bolivia (1966) (Fernandes and Morett 2018). The upheavals bring a significant increase in political violence in South America through military dictatorships that aimed to combat the “enemy” that threatened capitalist regimes, that is, communism. Soon the new dictators started to promulgate new constitutions that would assure them unlimited powers commanding the country and a free pass to kill and torture civilians not supporting the regime.

It is important to mention that these dictatorships coordinated actions to combat movements defending democracy and resisting the regimes. The so-called Operation Condor, possibly designated by Colonel Manuel Contreras, head of DINA (Chilean National Intelligence Directorate), was a covert operation that began to chase individuals linked to the opposition throughout South America, claiming the need to respond harshly to the alliance of the left-wing politicians in South America (Quadrat 2002, p. 168).

In 1975 the intelligence representatives of the South American dictatorships met in Chile at the invitation of Pinochet’s government. They decided that Chile would be the headquarters of the operation, in addition to creating a database of leftist militants. Although the need number of deaths directly connected to Operation Condor is highly disputed because of its covert nature,

Human rights groups in the region have estimated that Condor commandos “disappeared” hundreds of persons in cross-border operations: some 132 Uruguayans (127 in Argentina, 3 in Chile, and 2 in Paraguay), 72 Bolivians (36 in Chile, 36 in Argentina), 119 Chileans, 51 Paraguayans (in Argentina), 16 Brazilians (9 in Argentina and 7 in Chile), and at least 12 Argentines in Brazil (...). These figures are likely underestimated; in the Paraguayan Archives of Terror in 1996, I saw thousands of photos and fichas of persons, many of various Latin American (and some European) nationalities, on the prisoner and suspect lists of security forces of several South American countries, some dating from 1974, and some 200 persons passed through Automotores Orletti, the key Condor detention center in Argentina (McSherry 2002, p. 39).

The Condor operation worked until the late 1980s. In its history, also with support from companies such as Aerolíneas Argentinas and LAN Chile (Quadrat 2002, p. 170; see also Huneeus and Undurraga 2021), left-wing sympathizers and opponents to the military were at risk even outside the region, as was seen in the attacks against Bernardo Leighton (former vice president of Chile) and his wife Ana Fresno in Rome in 1975 (Quadrat 2002). As a painful legacy, the operation enabled the internationalization of human rights violations in South America, adding to the other legacies that still affect South American peace to this day.

Following it is explained the military dictatorships in Brazil, Argentina, and Chile. Although the states approaching to violence and repression are similar in the persecution of opposition and leftist movements, each country has had a different trajectory. In the case of Brazil, a series of military presidents and a new constitution led the country and its repression. In Argentina, on the other hand, the violence was even more brutal, led by military juntas until 1983. In Chile, the violence was driven by a centralized regime conducted by General Augusto Pinochet, in a long dictatorship that ended only in the early 1990s.

Military Dictatorship in Brazil

Brazil was the first South American country to have a military coup among the three countries here examined. Since its inauguration, the deposed president, João Goulart, was not celebrated by economic and military sectors due to his intentions to promote structural reforms, the so-called Reformas de Base (Reforms from the Ground), in areas like education, rural lands, and urban, among others. In support of an imminent coup d'état, the USA mobilized its navy in March 1964 in the so-called Operation Brother Sam. However, the support was not necessary when the Brazilian military seized power on April 1, 1964, without resistance from the Goulart government, which preferred to retreat in the face of a possible civil war (Fernandes and Morett 2018). Although the expectation was for a brief period to appoint a civilian president aligned with the interests of the USA and the economic elites, actually the military dictatorial regime lasted 21 years (Gesteira 2014).

The military junta and its successors (all of them generals from the Brazilian army) established Atos Institucionais (Institutional Acts, or AI), which were decrees to reinforce regime's rules. In the first AI, extraordinary powers were conferred to the executive, which included the removal of elective mandates and suspension of political rights of any citizen under some conditions (Hur and Lacerda Júnior 2017). Following this, AI-2 (1965) extinguished political parties; AI-3 (1966) appointed indirect elections for governors to Brazilian states; and AI-4 (1966) called the National Congress to vote on the 1967 Constitution that institutionalized the dictatorship in Brazil. Although other AIs were later sanctioned, the most important was AI-5 (1968), which suspended all individual guarantees and the political rights of citizens. AI-5 made manifest intense persecution of any individual that the military sees as part of subversive movements (Crestani 2011). Also, in the period is seen the acceleration of economic opening to foreign capital through economic policies for the establishment of multinationals (Costa and Silva 2018).

After administration of General Humberto de Alencar Castelo Branco, General Arthur da Costa e Silva, and a short period of a military junta, in October 1969 General Emílio Médici was designated as president (Neves and Liebel 2015). Médici ruled until 1974 in the most violent years of the dictatorship. His mandate was marked by urban and rural insurgent movements which were repressed with strong violence as a way to eliminate communist "threats." In Médici's government, prisons, assassinations, disappearances, and cases of torture were accentuated (Sales and Martins Filho 2018).

In 1974, General Ernesto Geisel became the president and promised a "slow, gradual and secure” political opening, but an economic crisis brought difficulties to put in motion democratization. In 1979, João Batista Figueiredo continued to focus in the political opening initiated by Geisel, under strong pressure from civil society asking in 1984 for “Diretas Já” (motto demanding direct elections for presidential succession). The dictatorial period ended in 1985 with the election of the civilian Tancredo Neves by the Congress (Castro 2008), but it was only in 1989 that Brazil could democratically elect its president again.

Military Dictatorship in Argentina

Another case of a violent military dictatorship in South America was in Argentina. In the 1960s the country faced an effervescent feminist movement by active groups for the creation of social reforms, but these social demands were interrupted with the military coup in 1966. The dictatorship in Argentina began as a result of the “Argentine Revolution” movement that removed President Arturo Illia from power (Capelato 2006). Through the document “Acta de la Revolución Argentina” (Records of Argentinian Revolution) it was defined that Lieutenant General Juan Carlos Onganía would assume the presidency. After a brief civilian period (1973–1976), the Military Junta composed by General Juan Rafael Videla, Admiral Emilio Massera, and Brigadier Orlando Agosti inaugurated a permanent and brutal dictatorship in Argentina (Koike 2013). The dictatorship was conducted by successive military juntas that ended only in 1983, a year after the failure of the Malvinas War against Great Britain which resulted in more than 900 deaths, the vast majority of Argentine officials.

The Argentine military coup was the sixth coup against a constitutionally elected government, as other countries in South America such as Bolivia, Paraguay, Brazil, Chile, and Uruguay were already under a dictatorship. Despite being similar political movements, Argentina was one of the most brutal cases of dictatorship in the region with 30,000 “missing” people who were kidnapped, killed, and tortured by the authorities (Rodríguez 2009). Also, the government officials engaged also in children trafficking, in which babies from pregnant women arrested and tortured by the regime were adopted by couples identified with military regime (Koike 2013). As a result of this brutality, the Argentine military regime is often regarded as a historical case of state terrorism (Bayer 2010).

Military Dictatorship in Chile

In the case of Chile, the military coup begins on September 11, 1973, against President Salvador Allende. As in the case of Brazil, Allende was the elected president, but when he put into practice measures of socialization of the economy and agrarian reform, he caused great dissatisfaction on the part of the country’s elite (Neto 2017). Allende’s inevitable downfall was then the result of actions on the part of the Chilean right wing and also US support. The official responsible for the Chilean presidency after the coup was General Augusto Pinochet, who persisted in power until 1990 (Neira 2010).

As soon as the military came to power, it started killing more than 3,000 left-wing activists and ordinary citizens opposing the regime in a way to eliminate any ideological propaganda and sympathy to Allende’s administration (Loveman 2011). The National Stadium was known to serve as an open prison, receiving thousands of people provisionally arrested for summary judgment. In the following years, the military regime worked strongly to control the media, the political organizations, and other institutions, leaving no space for the development of civil society (Errázuriz 2009). The regime finally ends in 1990, after the “no” wins in a plebiscite asking if Pinochet could have more 7 years in the presidency. This historical episode is represented in the movie No (Larraín 2012).

Civil Society and the Legacies of State-Sponsored Violence

The military dictatorships in countries like Argentina, Brazil, and Chile triggered side effects to the domestic peace. Among these negative effects are the normalization of violence by the state institutions (including the abandonment of the prison system that allowed the development of complex criminal organizations). Also, we can notice as a civil society response the search for justice and truth in face of human rights violations during the dictatorships (while in some cases with limited punishment for perpetrators, especially in Brazil). Other legacies are extensively explored in literature, like the mismanagement of the public budget which resulted in the rise of inequality (Oliveira 1995; Souza 2016). Below we focus our analysis on the transition to democracy and the responses from civil society to reach a more peaceful society.

The Search for Justice and Truth in Face of Human Right Violations

After the dictatorships, the search for truth and justice predominated in South American countries, with a focus on reparation for the victims, the reconstruction of their memory, the reform of institutions, and the adoption of policies for the restoration of political and social rights (Río 2014). In this regard, the human rights agenda in countries like Argentina and Chile after dictatorships had repercussions even on the international and regional regimes on human rights (see Ramanzini and Gomide Junior 2020). Responses to violations committed in these countries have influenced international human rights organizations to expand their monitoring activities and seek to investigate in detail the crimes of that period in Latin American countries (Cavallaro and Brewer 2008).

Argentina began its transitional justice 5 days after re-democratization. In 1983, civilian president-elect Raul Alfonsín established a truth commission to examine the atrocities committed by the dictatorship. The CONADEP (Argentina's National Commission on Disappeared People) was created "to investigate disappearances and other human rights abuses by the military dictatorship" (Zysman 2017, p. 92). Initially, civil society institutions showed disbelief with CONADEP and preferred not to participate actively, but the pressure and cooperation of these organizations were key to CONADEP's success. Social organizations like Madres de la Plaza de Mayo (Mothers of Mayo's Square) and Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo (Grandmothers of Mayo's Square) collaborated actively. Also, other very active organizations were Centro de Estudios Legales y Sociales (CELS – Center for Social and Legal Studies); Servicio de Paz y Justicia (SERPAJ, or Service for Peace and Justice); Family Members of Detained and Disappeared for Political Reasons; and the Ecumenical Movement for Human Rights.

At the end was released the report Nunca Más (Never More), regarded as a positive example of truth commissions able to create a "justice cascade." In its 50,000 pages – later published in a shorter book with 324 pages – is recorded the forced disappearance of 8961 persons from 1976 to 1983, although the actual number could be higher, given that human rights organizations currently estimate 30,000 persons (CONADEP 1985). The report also presented the regime's secret places of detention and torture. Finally, the report was key to collect data on the conviction of military junta members and top officials. In 1985, 14 former members of the military regime were convicted by civil courts in Buenos Aires, which also led to the investigations and prosecution of many other officials connected with state terrorism (Zysman 2017).

In addition to the widespread sexual violence against women imprisoned by the regime (Koike 2013), the Argentine military dictatorship also was accused of children trafficking, in which children were kidnapped at the time their parents were arrested or murdered (Barreto 2018). These children were adopted by supporters of the dictatorship, but in the period of re-democratization, the mothers demanded the right to identity and parenthood. Here it is important to mention the role of feminist activism like the Madres de la Plaza de Mayo and Abuelas de Plaza de Mayo organizations, which gained ground with the strong performance of mothers who demanded that the government should answer criminally about the disappearance of their children and grandchildren kidnapped or imprisoned during the dictatorship. These groups are still very active in search of the memory of their children.

In the case of Chile, a "slow but steady progress on criminal justice" (Correa 2017, June 6) can be noticed after military rule. In the following months after the end of Pinochet's dictatorship the first steps to transitional justice were seen. In April 1990, President Patricio Aylwin issued the Supreme Decree No. 355, officially creating the National Commission for Truth and Reconciliation, which led to investigations later published in the so-called Rettig Report.

Under the leadership of Raúl Rettig, a former diplomat before the dictatorship period, the Rettig Report dealt with the cases of just over 3000 individual victims (Baxter 2005). The initiative was the first step to bring justice after the dictatorship. Since then, "between 1995 and mid-2020, 476 final judgments have been handed in criminal (400) and civil (76) cases relating to human rights violations committed during Pinochet's dictatorship" (Lessa 2021, p. 184).

After the Rettig Commission efforts,

Chile's second phase of promoting truth, justice, and reconciliation occurred largely in the national and international legal arenas during the mid-to the late 1990s. Much of the impetus for judicial involvement came from strong international pressure that called for criminal accountability for human rights abuses in Chile. The ultimate expression of this was the London arrest and a Spanish judge's extradition attempts of Pinochet in 1998 to try him for human rights violations perpetrated against Spanish citizens during his regime. Pinochet eventually was released, but the 16 months he spent in detention again renewed a debate about redressing the human rights abuses of the Pinochet regime (Baxter 2005, p. 123).

The arrest of Pinochet also reignited human rights movements in Chile. Can here be highlighted the movement Funa, which has a strategy to make demonstrations in front of homes of militaries involved with Pinochet's regime. Many of Funa's members are the children of tortured, killed, or disappeared parents during the military regime (Baxter 2005). Recently, the union of diverse social movements – especially young university students – put pressure on the government to create a plebiscite for a new constitution, since the current one is the same as it was during the military dictatorship. The referendum occurred in October 2020, in which 78% of the population expressed the desire for a new constitution, which should be discussed and written from 2021 onwards (McGowan 2020, Oct 26).

Also, it is important to highlight the key role of indigenous peoples in response to Chilean state violence. Since 1990 the Mapuche people are actively organized in the Council of All Lands (Aukiñ WallMapu Ngülam, hereafter AWNg). AWNg's struggle is focused not only on the post-dictatorship context but also on the historical repair of Spanish colonization that has helped to conduct state violence and is active for more than four centuries. Therefore, the focus is on territorial recognition, in addition to the state's reparations for the violence suffered in Pinochet's regime (Boccaro 2002).

In the case of Brazil, the search for truth and justice did not progress at the same pace as seen in Argentina and Chile. In 1979 the Amnesty Law (#6683/1979) was approved – a controversial legislation that allowed the safe return of 2000 exiles, but which did not include all the demands from civil society to punish the regime's human rights violators (Mezarobba 2010). The Amnesty Law, created during the dictatorship, exempted the military from their crimes, making it difficult to punish the regime's torturers and murderers in the following decades.

In an attempt to support the elucidation of the truth, the action promoted by progressive religious institutions in Brazil was key. Between 1979 and 1985, three religious leaders – Archbishop Evaristo Arns, the rabbi Henry Sobel, and the presbyterian priest Jaime Wright – documented Brazilian state repression and human rights violations with the support of the World Council of Churches. After examining 707 processes of the Brazilian Supreme Military Court, the results are published in the book Brasil: Nunca Mais! (Brazil: Never More!), a publication deemed as the first initiative of Brazilian civil society to bring the truth about the regime (see Arns 1985).

More than two decades later, a Truth Commission was created in 2011 by President Dilma Rousseff (first female Brazilian president, also arrested and tortured by the military regime between 1970 and 1972) to obtain information about what happened during this period (Crestani 2011). According to Human Rights Watch (2009), the Brazilian military regime was responsible for more than 50,000 people detained in the dictatorship, and 10,000 requested exile. Besides, archives of the military justice system in Brazil describe 1,918 reports of torture only between 1964 and 1979 (HRW 2009). It was difficult to obtain data on the dead and missing, as well as the torture, practiced against women, the LGBTQIA+ population, indigenous people, Blacks, and peasants. However, it was the first time that some victims were able to express the inhuman acts that occurred. Crimes such as kidnapping, torture, sexual violence, forced abortions, and the use of live animals and insects in torture practices against men and women were also revealed (Teles 2015).

Normalization of Violence by State Apparatus: Effects on Public Security and Prison System

One of the most harmful effects of the military dictatorship was the legacy of normalizing violence, even under a constitutionally democratic regime. Despite the civil society responses to the violence carried out by the military, there is a practice of indiscriminate use of force in the police forces and the prison system. Thus, the effect of this normalization can be seen in two dimensions: one, in the police violence that annually impacts thousands of South Americans, and two, in the abandonment of the prison system, leading to the development of criminal organizations.

Although societies have reformed and new laws have looked to guarantee the promotion of human rights and the rule of law, the police have remained with a structure distant from society and a hierarchy similar to the military. In Chile, despite their attempt in recent years to get closer to the community in a policing model in cooperation with civil society (Oviedo 2007), the Carabineros (Chilean military police) have been accused of human rights violations at different times since the end of the dictatorship (Mason 2012), especially against social movements and indigenous people (see Fuentes 2005). More recently, in the protests and mobilizations for a new constitution in 2019, numerous cases of strong repression against mobilized youth have been reported (Pallacios-Valladares 2020).

In Argentina, where the police are not fully militarized like in Chile and Brazil, a decrease in deaths and violent acts perpetrated by police forces can be seen in recent years (see CELS 2021). However, in the metropolitan area of Buenos Aires, the highest concentration of deaths is seen. It is also noted that police violence, in general, is concentrated in deprived areas, which has generated civil society movements, especially led by youth, demanding equal treatment and end of prejudice against the poor population (Plaza Schaefer 2018).

Among the three countries examined in this entry, the case of Brazil is the most worrying in terms of police violence and its effects. There are two police institutions in each state of the federation: the civil police, responsible for investigating crimes in general, and the military, responsible for repression and fighting crime. It is not uncommon for the latter to use its violence apparatus of violence to do justice with its own hands, to persecute minorities, and to marginalize poor neighborhoods in the cities. In other words, it is a police that serves especially the elites and has little concern for its primary function of maintaining democratic order. Thus, relations between police and citizens in Brazil are still characterized in many contexts by distrust, abuse of power, and the lack of criteria for the use of force, producing high rates of police lethality and victimization. The democratic transition guaranteed political rights and the electoral process, but it did not guarantee civil rights for all citizens and the reform of police institutions. Legal control of violence remained below an acceptable level and the main obstacles were not addressed. Serious human rights violations persist [...] (Azevedo and Nascimento 2016, p. 654).

The cases of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile are an example of how “military dictatorships militarize their police forces, which presents a dilemma regarding democratization for the leadership that follows them” (Frantz 2019, p. 415). Consequently, as developed in the entry ► “Peace and Conflict in Brazil,” this violence has generated thousands of annual deaths and warlike scenarios in places like Rio de Janeiro and suburbs of cities like Fortaleza, Recife, among others. The effect of police violence brings as a side effect the disbelief of the rule of law, allowing a gain in legitimacy for criminal organizations that operate on the margins of the state (Ferreira and Richmond 2021; Ferreira 2021).

Another dimension of the normalization of post-dictatorship violence can be seen in the Brazilian prison system. Although it was not a novelty of the military regime, the conditions of Brazilian prisons violate several basic human rights, such as lack of basic sanitation, access to health, and minimum standards of quality of food. It is not an exaggeration to say that there is deliberate negligence of the state towards its prison population, allowing the strengthening of criminal organizations within the penitentiaries. These organizations offer the basics in a chaotic setting: an informal order and self-help between criminals.

In the late 1970s, the interaction between political prisoners trained in guerrilla tactics and ordinary prisoners allowed the emergence of prisoner movements in defense of better prison conditions. The effect of this interaction would be seen shortly afterward. First, with the creation of Comando Vermelho, a group based in Rio de Janeiro that soon moves from advocacy for better conditions in prisons to a complex organization focused on drug trafficking in South American borders.

Similar groups would emerge years later, such as the PCC – Primeiro Comando da Capital (First Command of the Capital) in 1993, nowadays at the same time the main criminal group in South America (controlling the entire productive chain of marijuana and cocaine from Paraguay and distributed to the world through Brazilian ports) and a hegemonic group in dozens of prisons establishing internal rules and a unique system of informal governance (Villa et al. 2021). The level of organization of PCC is today near to a mafia – or a proto-mafia – which makes the group a security concern not only to Brazil but also to Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, and Bolivia (Sampó and Ferreira 2020).

State violence and criminal governance combined are creating blockages to peace formation in South America in the last decades. In this regard, “criminal actors’ penetration of legitimacy and governance has significant impacts on civil society and its processes of peace formation,” in which two blockages emerge: one, “the governance structure is not directed towards the improvement of live conditions in areas of high structural violence, and also reproduces this violence” and, two, “the criminal organizations’ legitimacy is a result of the negative state presence and lack of public policies in historically deprived zones” (Ferreira and Richmond 2021, p. 17) which makes the construction of citizenship much more difficult.

Facing this challenge to peace, as Ferreira and Richmond (2021) suggest, “the local agency has potentially the competencies, knowledge, and attitudes to begin dealing with this scenario in discursive terms” (p. 18), as seen in the agency of organizations like Rio de Paz and Redes da Maré in their efforts to promote a safer environment in the favelas of Rio de Janeiro and to denounce the normalization of violence. However, “its power and capacity to effect structural change, end criminal violence, economic injustice, and paramilitary or state activity is negligible in direct terms” (Ferreira and Richmond 2021, p. 18), which highlights the importance of support to the local agency from actors and donors focused on a peacebuilding agenda, looking beyond a state-centric approach that favors mostly regular armed conflicts.

Summary

South America’s history is permeated by state violence, but also by responses from civil society. As demonstrated in another entry in this encyclopedia (see ► “Violent Conflicts in South America”), both the violence of the colonial and the post-colonial state were challenged by popular movements. However, as we explored in this entry, the recent period of military dictatorships experienced in the 1960s to 1980s had a different impact on the region. During this period, we can notice the extensive use of violence by state forces that should be focused exclusively on the defense of sovereignty. Against their people and their constitution, the armed forces of Chile, Brazil, and Argentina led governments guided by the defense of the economic interests of multinationals and the local elite (including the armed forces themselves), while harshly repressing the opposition and popular movements.

One of the positive effects of the dictatorship was the emergence of civil society in search of truth and justice. After an estimated 40,000 killed civilians and thousands more tortured, South America experienced a period of democratic transition in the 1980s and 1990s. Demands for memory and justice emerged in addition to public reparation for numerous human rights violations. Argentina was the country that made the most progress in its transitional justice, especially due to the strong pressure from civil society. For its part, Chile also made important steps with the Rettig Commission, although at a less intense pace than its neighboring country. Brazil, on the other hand, created its amnesty law and had relevant initiatives by organized civil society, such as Brasil Nunca Mais, but among the three countries, it is the one that had its truth commission much later, only in 2011.

The violence of the dictatorship also had harmful side effects for South American societies. Among them are the normalization of police violence and in prisons, which led to increased responses outside the law, such as the strengthening of criminal organizations. In this context, the search for peace in South America cannot be examined solely by relying on the state as an entity that defends the constitution. In a region with a tragic history of dictatorships and state violence, a strong and active civil society is central to the construction of more peaceful societies and guided by the rule of law.

Cross-References

- ▶ Peace and Conflict in Brazil
- ▶ Violent Conflicts in South America

References

- Arns, P. E. (1985). Brasil, nunca mais. Vozes.
- Azevedo, R. G. d., & Nascimento, A. A. d. (2016). Desafios da reforma das polícias no Brasil:

- Permanência autoritária e perspectivas de mudança. Civitas – Revista de Ciências Sociais, 16(4), 653–672. <https://doi.org/10.15448/1984-7289.2016.4.24402>.
- Barreto, A. F. A. L. (2018). Sombras da Memória: Histórias de violações dos Direitos Humanos durante as ditaduras civis-militares no Cone Sul. Interfaces Científicas – Humanas e Sociais, 27(2), 77–90.
- Baxter, V. (2005). Civil society promotion of truth, justice, and reconciliation in Chile: Villa Grimaldi. Peace & Change, 30(1), 120–136.
- Bayer, O. (2010). El terrorismo de Estado en la Argentina: apuntes sobre su historia y sus consecuencias. Buenos Aires: Instituto Espacio para la Memoria.
- Boccaro, G. (2002). The Mapuche people in post-dictatorship Chile. Études rurales, 163–164, 283–303. <https://doi.org/10.4000/etudesrurales.7984>.
- Capelato, M. H. (2006). Memória da Ditadura Militar Argentina: Um desafio para a história. Clio – Revista de Pesquisa Histórica, 24, 61–81.
- Castro, C. (2008). Comemorando a “revolução” de 1964: a memória histórica dos militares brasileiros. In C. Fico, M. M. Ferreira, M. P. Araujo, & S. V. Quadrat (Orgs.), Ditadura e Democracia na América Latina: Balanço Histórico e Perspectivas (pp. 119–142). FGV Editora: Rio de Janeiro.
- Cavallaro, J. L., & Brewer, S. E. (2008). Never again? The legacy of the argentine and Chilean dictatorships for the global human rights regime. The Journal of Interdisciplinary History, 39(2), 233–244.
- CELS – Centro de Estudios Legales y Sociales. (2021). CELS Violencia Policial. Retrieved: <https://violencia.policia.org.ar/> Accessed 12 Mar 2021.
- CONADEP (Argentina’s National Commission on Disappeared People). (1985). Nunca mas (never again): A report by Argentina’s National Commission on disappeared people. London: Faber & Faber/Index on Censorship.
- Correa, C. (2017, June 6). Two judgments in Chile mark progress in prosecuting state agents for enforced disappearances. The International Center for Transitional Justice, June 6, 2017. Retrieved <https://www.ictj.org/news/judgments-chile-progress-prosecuting-state-disappearances>
- Costa, A. d. S. M. d., & Silva, M. A. d. C. (2018). Empresas, violação dos direitos humanos e ditadura civil-militar brasileira: a perspectiva da Comissão Nacional da Verdade. Organizações & Sociedade, 25(84), 15–29. <https://doi.org/10.1590/1984-9240841>.
- Crestani, L. d. A. (2011). O Surgimento do Inimigo Interno: Ditadura Militar no Brasil (1964 a 1985). Revista História em Reflexão, 5(9), 1–16.
- Errázuriz, L. H. (2009). Dictadura Militar em Chile: Antecedentes del golpe estético-cultural. Latin American Research Review, 44(2), 136–157.
- Fernandes, H. R., & Morett, M. T. (2018). As ditaduras militares da América Latina e o fenômeno do fascismo: uma análise comparativa. Revista Mundo Livre, 4(2), 29–47.

- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2021). Governance by violent non-state actors as a challenge to sustainable peace in Brazil. In Decolonising conflicts, security, peace, gender, environment and development in the anthropocene (pp. 521–537). Cham: Springer.
- Ferreira, M. A., & Richmond, O. P. (2021). Blockages to peace formation in Latin America: The role of criminal governance. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 15(2), 161–180. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2021.1878337>.
- Frantz, E. (2019). The legacy of military dictatorship: Explaining violent crime in democracies. International Political Science Review, 40(3), 404–418. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512118769079>.
- Fuentes, C. (2005). Contesting the iron fist: Advocacy networks and police violence in democratic Argentina and Chile. Routledge.
- Gesteira, L. A. M. G. (2014). A Guerra Fria e as Ditaduras Militares na América do Sul. Scientia Plena, 10(12), 1–20.
- HRW-Human Rights Watch. (2009). Brazil: Prosecute dictatorship-era abuses. HRW. <https://www.hrw.org/news/2009/04/14/brazil-prosecute-dictatorship-era-abuses>. Accessed 01 Mar 2021.
- Huneus, C., & Undurraga, T. (2021). Authoritarian rule and economic groups in Chile: A case of winner-takes-all politics. In Big business and dictatorships in Latin America (pp. 91–125). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hur, D. U., & Lacerda Júnior, F. (2017). Ditadura e Insurgência na América Latina: Psicologia da Libertação e Resistência Armada. Psicologia: Ciência e Profissão, 37 (spe), 28–43. <https://doi.org/10.1590/1982-3703020002017>.
- Koike, M. L. (2013). O Sequestro de crianças pela ditadura militar argentina e a atuação das Avós da Praça de Maio pelo direito à verdade (jurídica e biológica) e à memória. Revista Gênero & Direito, 1, 1–24.
- Larraín, P. (Director) (2012). No [film]. Sony Pictures.
- Lessa, F. (2021). Remnants of truth: The Role of archives in human rights trials for operation condor. Latin American Research Review, 56(1), 183–199. <https://doi.org/10.25222/larr.769>.
- Loveman, B. (2011). Military government in Latin America, 1959–1990. Oxford University Press.
- Mason, A. (2012). Violence, criminal defamation, and censorship laws: Threatening freedom of expression in Chile and Ecuador. Law and Business Review of the Americas, 18(3), 369–400.
- McGowan, C. (2020, Oct 26). Celebrations as Chile votes by huge majority to scrap Pinochet-era constitution, The Guardian. Retrieved <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2020/oct/26/chile-vote-scrap-pinochet-constitution>. Accessed 17 Mar 2021.
- McSherry, J. P. (2002). Tracking the origins of a state terror network: Operation condor. Latin American Perspectives, 29(1), 38–60.
- Mezarobba, G. (2010). Entre Reparaciones, Medias Verdades e Impunidade: La difícil Ruptura con el Legado de la Dictadura en Brasil. SUR – Revista Internacional de Derechos Humanos, 7(13), 7–25.
- Neira, K. F. (2010). Breve Análisis de La Jurisprudencia Chilena, em relación a las graves violaciones a los derechos humanos cometidos durante la dictadura militar. Estudios Constitucionales, 8(1), 467–488.
- Neto, W. D. (2017). A redemocratização chilena: entre a constituição e a memória. Revista Latino-Americana de História, 6(17), 60–75.
- Neves, O. P., & Liebel, V. (2015). Os Regimes Militares no Brasil e na América do Sul – Historiografia e Perspectivas. Revista Eletrônica da ANPHLAC, 18, 56–86.
- Oliveira, F. A. (1995). Autoritarismo e Crise Fiscal no Brasil (1964–1984). São Paulo: HUCITEC.
- Oviedo, E. (2007). Modernización policial: el caso de Carabineros de Chile. URVIO, Revista Latinoamericana de Estudios de Seguridad, 2, 71–84.
- Palacios-Valladares, I. (2020). Chile 2019: las protestas de octubre y el movimiento estudiantil; coyuntura histórica de cambio? Revista de Ciencia Política (Santiago), (AHEAD).
- Plaza Schaefer, V. (2018). ¿Por qué tu gorra sí y la mía no? Los procesos de construcción de identidad en jóvenes organizados contra la violencia policial. Revista Crítica Penal y Poder, 14, 55–75.
- Quadrat, S. V. (2002). Operação Condor: o “Mercosul” do terror. Estudos Ibero-Americanos, 28(1), 167–182.
- Ramanzini, I. G. G., & Gomide Junior, N. (2020). Participação Social em Regimes de Direitos Humanos estudo comparativo entre Sistema Interamericano de Direitos Humanos e Instituto de Políticas Públicas em Direitos Humanos do Mercosul. Revista Brasileira de Políticas Públicas e Internacionais, 5(2), 60–78. <https://doi.org/10.22478/ufpb.2525-5584.2020v5n2.51871>.
- Rio, A. D. (2014). Dictadura, democracia y justicia transicional en Brasil: trayectoria y legados del Supremo Tribunal Federal. Dados, 57(4), 1169–1201.
- Rodríguez, L. G. (2009). La Historia que debía enseñarse durante la última ditadura militar em Argentina (1976–1983). Antíteses, 2(3), 227–256.
- Sales, C. M. R., & Martins Filho, J. R. (2018). The economist and human rights violations in Brazil during the military dictatorship. Contexto Internacional, 40(2), 203–227.
- Sampó, C., & Ferreira, M. A. (2020). De la fragmentación de las estructuras criminales a una proto-mafia: un análisis del Primeiro Comando da Capital (PCC) en Sudamérica. Revista de Estudios en Seguridad Internacional, 6(2), 101–115. <https://doi.org/10.18847/1.12.6>.
- Souza, P. H. G. F. (2016). A desigualdade vista do topo: a concentração de renda entre os ricos no Brasil, 1926–2013. 2016. Ph.D thesis in Sociology, Universidade de Brasília/UnB, Brasília. Disponível em: http://repositorio.unb.br/bitstream/10482/22005/1/2016_PedroHerculanoGuimar%C3%A3esFerreiradeSouza.pdf

- Teles, M. A. A. (2015). Violações dos Direitos Humanos das mulheres na ditadura. Estudos Feministas, 23(3), 1001–1022.
- Villa, R. D., de Macedo Braga, C., & Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2021). Violent nonstate actors and the emergence of hybrid governance in South America. Latin American Research Review, 56(1), 36–49. <https://doi.org/10.25222/larr.756>.
- Zysman, Q. D. (2017). Punishment, democracy and transitional justice in Argentina (1983–2015). International Journal for Crime, Justice and Social Democracy, 6(1), 88–102. <https://doi.org/10.5204/ijcsd.v6i1.378>.

Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation

Sara Hellmüller

Centre on Conflict, Development and Peacebuilding, Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, Geneva, Switzerland

Keywords

Inclusion · Peacemaking · Mediation · Civil Society

Definition

Inclusivity is defined in the UN Guidance for Effective Mediation as “extent and manner in which the views and needs of conflict parties and other stakeholders are represented and integrated into the process and outcome of a mediation effort” (United Nations 2012) (see chapters “► Mediation,” “► Peace Agreements,” “► Private Peacemaking and Dialogic Approach to Mediation”)¹. Among these other stakeholders, civil society has attracted particular attention (Anderlini 2007; Paffenholz 2014; Wanis-St. John and Kew 2008). This includes a wide range of actors such as non-governmental organizations (NGOs), women’s groups, business actors, victims’ groups, local leaders, and youth (see chapters “► Social Capital and Peace,” “► Peace Infrastructures”). They are seen as complementing the conflict parties, being the armed political elite, at the negotiation table². While initial research has mostly focused on the link between inclusion or exclusion on the one hand and the effectiveness of peace processes on the other hand, scholars have recently provided insights on the rationales and operationalization of inclusion. Yet, important gaps remain regarding the context, timing, and management of inclusion as well as understanding inclusion from the perspective of civil society actors. This entry first defines the terms civil society and inclusion. It then provides an overview of current debates around civil society inclusion and finally shares some suggestions for future directions of research.

Concepts and Background

Civil Society

The concept of civil society is closely linked to the political system of liberal democracy (Hellmüller 2020b). Originally introduced by Western political philosophers, such as Thomas Hobbes, John Locke, and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, to signal a shift away from the state of nature, civil society became a key component of democratization theories by authors, such as Jürgen Habermas (1992) or Robert Putnam (2000), who considered it as a main pillar of a functioning democracy. In practice, the roles played by civil society actors against authoritarian regimes in Latin America in the 1960s and Eastern Europe in the 1980s underlined their function as an important counterweight to the state (Fine 1997, p. 9; Kopecký and Mudde 2003, p. 1). At the same time, civil society’s role increased in the framework of the neoliberal political environment in the West in the 1980s and 1990s when the declining welfare state left space for non-governmental actors to fill (Edwards 2009; Fischer 2011, p. 290).

¹The two terms of inclusion and inclusivity are often used interchangeably. In what follows, the term inclusivity is used to refer to the norm, while inclusion is used to refer to the activity of including actors in a mediation process.

²See Hellmüller 2020b for an overview of the role of civil society in peacemaking and peacebuilding.

As mentioned in Hellmüller (2020b), political scientists usually refer to three elements when defining civil society. First, they refer to its voluntary and collective nature, as civil society actors freely work together to achieve common objectives (Belloni 2008; Fischer 2011; Jessop et al. 2007; Nilsson 2012; Orjuela 2003; Pouligny 2005; Spurk 2010; Walzer 1998). Second, they define civil society as distinct from the state, as it is neither created by the state nor part of the state's governing institutions (Belloni 2008; Fischer 2011; Jessop et al. 2007; Nilsson 2012; Orjuela 2003; Pouligny 2005; Spurk 2010; Wanis-St. John and Kew 2008). Third, they clearly distinguish civil society actors from political parties, as they do not aim to capture the state or to attract the population's favor (Diamond 1999; Nilsson 2012; Spurk 2010; Wanis-St. John and Kew 2008).

When analyzing civil society outside of the context of a liberal democratic state, as it is usually the case in conflict contexts where the entire political dispensation is being questioned and rediscussed, three nuances need to be added to this definition (Hellmüller 2020b). First, while civil society action always contains a voluntary element, ethnic and religious bonds may be more strongly linked to civil action in conflict contexts (Marchetti and Tocci 2009, pp. 203–204). It is thus crucial to include activism based on shared identities in the definition of civil society as it makes up an important part of collective action in many conflict contexts. Second, while the difference to state institutions remains a definitional element of civil society, non-state actors often take up governing functions in conflict contexts in case state institutions are no longer fully operational. Thus, the distinction between the sphere of state and non-state governance may be blurred in these contexts as activities may more strongly overlap (Fischer 2011, p. 305; Kopecký and Mudde 2003, pp. 5–8; Marchetti and Tocci 2009, p. 203). Third, although the separation from formal political parties remains an important element, identities are multiple, and armed conflicts often lead to increased politicization of the population on the one hand and competition for positions in the new political dispensation of the country on the other hand (Hellmüller 2018, p. 130; Spurk 2010, pp. 8–9). Thus, civil society actions may be closely intertwined with political parties' behavior in conflict contexts.

These nuances point to the diversity of civil society actors. To avoid that pre-existing definitions derange the empirical analysis of how civil society is defined within a given social system, an approach that explores inductively who self-identifies or is identified by others as civil society is needed (Hellmüller 2020b). This helps to avoid two pitfalls: homogenization and essentialization. The first relates to the fact that civil society is sometimes referred to as a homogeneous entity without accounting for the variety of actors that are part of it (Anheier and Nuno 2002, p. 191). The second concerns the assignment of fixed characteristics to the term, which creates strict boundaries of who is considered civil society and who is not without accounting for contextual and temporal differences. In sum, it is important to acknowledge the diversity of civil society actors (Fischer 2011; Paffenholz 2010; Pouligny 2005). Their activities converge around different values, which are not always peace-promoting, but can also be conflict-inducing (Fischer 2011; Nilsson 2012; Orjuela 2003; Pouligny 2005). Indeed, civil society actors reflect the specificities of a given society, including its conflict lines (Hellmüller 2018; Zanker 2018). The civil society sphere is thus not necessarily inclusive and can be a space for exclusion and internal conflicts (Brühl 2010). Moreover, while many civil society actors engage in peacebuilding activities, they also work in other fields ranging from humanitarian and development issues, human rights promotion, and monitoring to social service delivery, and local governance issues. These activities are sometimes formalized in NGOs and at other times more loosely coordinated in associations or initiatives.

Inclusion

Scholars and practitioners have come to consider civil society inclusion as an important factor to correct an earlier focus on the political armed elite in mediation processes. The uptake of inclusion as a central policy objective is intimately linked to a change in the context of peacemaking. With the end of the Cold War, intrastate conflicts became more common (Bellamy and Williams 2004, pp. 3–4; Gleditsch 2009, p. 595). Lederach (2006, p. 13) locates the difference between intrastate wars and the previously dominant interstate wars in the “immediacy of the experience” since the former reach the doorstep of the civilian population as they witness and experience killings, rapes, and abductions. Indeed, in a context of localized warfare, conflict lines penetrate the whole society and the distinction between combatants and civilians becomes blurred (Kaldor 2006; Kalyvas 2001; Lake and Rothchild 1996; Mack 2002; Wallensteen and Axell 1993). This means that “the enemy is not halfway around the globe; the enemy lives only a village away, or in some instances next door” (Lederach 2006, p. 13). Based on this changed nature of warfare, the approach shifted from merely attempting to managing conflicts toward substantively transforming them by seeking to address their root causes. This change came with an increased realization that exclusive deals at the national level were not sufficient to bring lasting peace and that more efforts were needed to extend peace mediation processes beyond the political and military elites. To do so, Lederach (1995) proposed the so-called middle-out approach with a key role assigned to mid-level civil society actors that interact with both top-level military and political leaders as well as actors at the local level. Civil society actors thus became considered an important intermediary between the narrow peace process and the broader population.

Policy documents reflected this change. Most importantly, the UN Guidance on Effective Mediation, which lists eight fundamentals for effective mediation and thereby presented for the first time the professional standards of mediation, includes inclusivity as one of them (United Nations 2012). It says that “civil society actors can play a critical role in increasing the legitimacy of a peace process and are potentially important allies” (United Nations 2012, p. 11). Regional organizations followed suit and also included inclusivity as a core principle in their guidance documents on mediation (e.g., African Union 2014; European External Action Service 2012; OSCE 2014). Likewise, international NGOs and think-tanks supporting mediation processes integrated inclusion in their strategies (e.g., European Institute of Peace,³ United States Institute of Peace,⁴ Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue,⁵ Conflict Management Initiative⁶). Moreover, mediators often refer to inclusivity when designing their processes and justify themselves or refer to later processes if they feel that they are not inclusive enough. Therefore, while the modalities of who is included and excluded at which stage of a mediation process remain debated, inclusivity has become part of the normative framework of mediation as mediators usually do not argue against the norm in general (Hellmüller 2019, 2020a).

Current Debates and Research on Civil Society Inclusion

Most scholarly attention has been given to the question of how civil society inclusion relates to mediation success (Bell and O'Rourke 2007; Belloni 2001; Orjuela 2003). Nilsson (2012) shows civil society actors' positive contributions to peace processes by demonstrating a correlation between their participation and the durability of the ensuing peace. The assumption about a positive impact of civil society inclusion is related to at least three functions they can play. First, they can serve as intermediary between the process and the broader public by not only bringing context knowledge to the attention of the mediator but also informing the population about the discussions and hence increasing the transparency of the negotiations. Second, they can hold the parties accountable by putting pressure on them to refrain from stalling tactics and to engage genuinely in the negotiations. Third, they can be an example of compromise and bridge-building as they usually come from a wide political spectrum. By meeting each other, they send an important signal and ³ See <http://www.eip.org/en/about-us/mission>.

⁴ See <https://www.usip.org/about/strategic-plan>.

⁵ See <https://www.hdcentre.org/activities/inclusion-in-peace-processes/>.

⁶ See <http://cmi.fi/our-work/regions-and-themes/>.

contribute to reorienting society toward peace (see for instance Barnes 2002; Bell and O'Rourke 2007; Hellmüller 2019; Jessop et al. 2007; Nilsson 2012; Wanis-St. John and Kew 2008). At the same time, scholars also point to the fact that civil society inclusion can render a peace process less effective as it adds to its complexity. Two sets of reasons are given. First, authors argue that exclusionary talks are necessary to achieve breakthroughs in negotiations as a lower number of people more easily finds consensus. Thus, civil society participation risks delaying an agreement (Cunningham 2013; Kanol 2015; Nilsson 2012, p. 247; Raiffa 2004; Wanis-St. John 2006; Wanis-St. John and Kew 2008, pp. 13, 21–23). Second, scholars also point to the fact that the political nature of negotiations may require confidential talks so that conflict parties can explore concessions and test possible compromises. Yet, the involvement of civil society may render the process too public to allow for such a protected space (McClintock and Nahimana 2008). Therefore, current discussions mainly revolve around the impact of civil society inclusion on the effectiveness of the peace process presenting a trade-off between sustainability and efficiency. The first line of argumentation claims that inclusion helps to end violence in a more durable way and should therefore be prioritized even if it may take longer to reach an agreement. The second strand argues that inclusion delays the finding of an agreement and should therefore be postponed to a later stage of a peace process as stopping the violence is the main priority of mediators.

While the understanding of the relation between inclusion and mediation success is crucial, several authors underline the need to move beyond the inclusion-exclusion binary to analyze the underlying rationales of inclusion as well as its operationalization (Paffenholz 2014; Zanker 2018). This means to no longer solely ask if inclusion is important or not but to inquire into the questions of why it is important and how it can be implemented. Regarding the underlying rationales, scholars have analyzed both the pragmatic and normative motivations for inclusion, thereby putting decisions for or against inclusion in context (Hellmüller 2019; Lanz 2011; Zanker 2018).

Hirblinger and Landau (2020) examine the rationales that underline how the included actors, such as civil society, are framed in research, policy, and practice. Bell (2019) points to some of the challenges to inclusion in terms of actors' competing rationales by showing how development actors, peacebuilding actors, and human rights promoters differently understand the term. Mendes (2020) takes an innovative approach by analyzing inclusion through the lens of representation and thus looks specifically at one rationale of inclusion. Finally, Cuhadar (2020) provides a better understanding of the rationales against exclusion by studying the reasons, actors, and ways of resistance to including more actors in peace processes. Related to the operationalization of inclusion, Paffenholz (2014) presents nine models of inclusion ranging from direction representation, observation at the negotiation table, consultative forums, less formalized consultations, inclusive post-agreement mechanisms, high-level civil society initiatives, public participation, public decision-making, to mass action. She thereby sheds light on the different design options for inclusive processes. By presenting alternatives to direct participation, she adds nuances to the trade-off between sustainability and efficiency. For instance, the stated risk of rendering a process more complex may decrease if civil society actors are given an observer, rather than a direct participation role. Other authors have added insights on specific forms of inclusion. Bell and O'Rourke (2007) analyze consultative mechanisms, Dudouet (2017) and Nilsson et al. (2020) inquire into how civil resistance and mass action influence peacemaking, while Amaral (2019) examines the use of referendums in peace processes.

Future Directions

The above shows that the literature is providing new insights on civil society inclusion in peace mediation. However, three lines of inquiry remain open for further research. The first relates to the context and timing of inclusion. While many scholars have analyzed the impact of inclusion on mediation success, as mentioned above, the question of how the context and timing influence this equation has been largely ignored (Hellmüller and Zahar 2018b). Yet, contextual factors, such as the nature of state institutions, the nature of society, and the internationalization of a conflict as well as conflict-related factors, such as conflict type, duration, and intensity influence the state of civil society in a given conflict and the contributions it can make to a peace process (Hellmüller and Zahar 2018b). At the same time, during an ongoing mediation process, there are several phases in which inclusion may be more or less adequate. At times, exclusionary and secretive talks are used in order to build confidence, to allow parties to participate that can politically not afford to be seen as engaging, and to test ideas without the attention of the broader public (McClintock and Nahimana 2008; Wanis-St. John 2006). Thus, research should provide more disaggregated findings on how different context factors as well as mediation phases influence the impact inclusion has on the effectiveness of a peace process.

A second research avenue relates to how the concrete management of civil society inclusion, in terms of the daily activities and decision-making, influences its impact on mediation success. While civil society participation arguably has an important symbolic impact in that it creates momentum for finding a political over a military solution, bringing civil society actors to peace talks will not per se increase or decrease their effectiveness. Several authors and policy-makers have already pointed out that including civil society actors is not enough to make peace processes more sustainable but that the key lies in relevant inclusion (Hellmüller and Zahar 2018a; Mendes 2020; Paffenholz et al. 2016). Indeed, badly managed inclusion is likely to leave civil society actors frustrated and thus to decrease the perceived legitimacy of a peace process, which in the end may also negatively affect its effectiveness. Moreover, the way inclusion is managed also influences its impact on the actors themselves. If inclusion is reduced to a headcount exercise, it risks further fragmenting civil society actors according to existing conflict lines. Thus, scholars should provide more insights of what relevant inclusion means and how it can be operationalized.

This leads to a third, and arguably the most important, avenue for further research. When writing about inclusion, it is noteworthy that most authors provide insights from the perspective of international actors and their rationales and operationalization of inclusion. What remains blatantly missing are the views and voices of civil society actors included or excluded from peace processes.⁷ In-depth empirical studies on how civil society actors perceive and view inclusion and how these perceptions relate to international approaches and design options are thus urgently needed. In the end, it seems that not only peace mediation needs more inclusion but also research on it.

Cross-References

- ▶ Mediation
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Social Capital and Peace

References

- African Union. (2014). African union mediation support handbook. Umhlanga Rocks: African Centre for the Constructive Resolution of Disputes (ACCORD).
- Amaral, J. (2019). Making peace with referendums: Cyprus and Northern Ireland. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Anheier, H., & Nuno, T. (2002). Organisational forms of global civil society: Implications of going global. In H. Anheier, M. Glasius, & M. Kaldor (Eds.), Global civil society (pp. 191–216). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Barnes, C. (Ed.) (2002). Owning the process: Public participation in peacemaking. London: Accord.
- Bell, C. (2019). New inclusion project: Building inclusive settlements. In A. Carl (Ed.), Navigating inclusion in peace processes (Vol. 28, pp. 11–17). London: Accord.
- Bell, C., & O'Rourke, C. (2007). The people's peace? Peace agreements, civil society, and participatory democracy. International Political Science Review, 28(3), 293–324.

⁷Zanker (2018) and Hellmüller (2020a) are exceptions.

- Bellamy, A. J., & Williams, P. (2004). Introduction: Thinking anew about peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 11(1), 1–15.
- Belloni, R. (2001). Civil society and peacebuilding in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Journal of Peace Research, 38(2), 163–180.
- Belloni, R. (2008). Civil society in war-to-democracy transitions. In A. K. Jarstad & T. D. Sisk (Eds.), From war to democracy: Dilemmas of peacebuilding (pp. 182–210). Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.
- Bühl, T. (2010). Representing the people? NGOs in international negotiations. In J. Steffek & K. Hahn (Eds.), Evaluating transnational NGOs: Legitimacy, accountability, representation (pp. 181–199). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cuhadar, E. (2020). Understanding resistance to inclusive peace processes. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Cunningham, D. E. (2013). Who should be at the table? Veto players and peace processes in civil war. Penn State Journal of Law & International Affairs, 2(1), 38–47.
- Diamond, L. (1999). Developing democracy: Toward consolidation. Washington, DC: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Dudouet, V. (2017). Powering to peace: Integrated civil resistance and peacebuilding strategies. Washington, DC: International Center on Non-Violent Conflict.
- Edwards, M. (2009). Civil society. Cambridge, MA: Polity.
- European External Action Service. (2012). Transitional justice in the context of peace mediation. Factsheet - EEAS mediation support project - knowledge product. Brussels: European External Action Service.
- Fine, R. (1997). Civil society theory, enlightenment and critique. Democratization, 4(1), 7–28.
- Fischer, M. (2011). Civil society in conflict transformation: Strengths and limitations. In B. Austin, M. Fischer, & H. J. Giessmann (Eds.), Advancing conflict transformation. The Berghof handbook II (pp. 287–314). Opladen/Framington Hills: Barbara Budrich Publishers.
- Gleditsch, K. S. (2009). The spread of civil war. In J. Bercovitch, V. Kremenyuk, & W. I. Zartman (Eds.), The SAGE handbook of conflict resolution (pp. 595–612). London: SAGE.
- Habermas, J. (1992). Zur Rolle von Zivilgesellschaft und politischer Öffentlichkeit. In J. Habermas (Ed.), Faktizität und Geltung: Beiträge zur Diskurstheorie des Rechts und des demokratischen Rechtsstaats (pp. 399–467). Frankfurt a.M.: Suhrkamp.
- Hellmüller, S. (2018). Partners for peace: The interaction between local and international peacebuilding actors. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hellmüller, S. (2019). Beyond buzzwords: Civil society inclusion in mediation. In H.-W. Jeong (Ed.), Conflict management and transformation: Theory and practice (pp. 47–63). Maryland: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Hellmüller, S. (2020a). Meaning-making in peace-making: The inclusion norm at the interplay between the United Nations and Civil Society in the Syrian Peace Process. Swiss Political Science Review, 26(4), online first.
- Hellmüller, S. (2020b). The role of civil society actors in peacemaking and peacebuilding. In F. Osler Hampson, A. Özerdem, & J. Kent (Eds.), Routledge handbook of peace, security and development (pp. 407–419). Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- Hellmüller, S., & Zahar, M.-J. (2018a). Against the odds: Civil society in the intra-Syrian talks. New York: International Peace Institute.
- Hellmüller, S., & Zahar, M.-J. (2018b). Context matters: Theorizing the relation between the context of armed conflicts and the inclusion of civil society in peace processes. Paper presented at the Annual Conference of the International Studies Association, San Francisco.
- Hirblinger, A. T., & Landau, D. M. (2020). Daring to differ: Strategies of inclusion in peacemaking. Security Dialogue, 51(4), 305–322.
- Jessop, M., Aljets, D., & Chacko, B. (2007). The ripe moment for civil society. International Negotiation, 13(1), 93–109.
- Kaldor, M. (2006). New and old wars: Organized violence in a global era. Oxford: Polity Press.
- Kalyvas, S. N. (2001). 'New' and 'Old' civil wars: A valid distinction? World Politics, 54(1), 99–118.
- Kanol, D. (2015). Civil society at the negotiation table: Legitimacy beliefs and durable peace. Peace and Conflict Studies, 22(1), 4–17.
- Kopecký, P., & Mudde, C. (2003). Rethinking civil society. Democratization, 10(3), 1–14.
- Lake, D., & Rothchild, D. (1996). The international spread of ethnic conflict: Fear, diffusion, and escalation. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Lanz, D. (2011). Who gets a seat at the table? A framework for understanding the dynamics of inclusion and exclusion in peace negotiations. International Negotiation, 16(2), 275–295.
- Lederach, J. P. (1995). Preparing for peace: Conflict transformation across cultures. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (2006). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies (7th print. ed.). Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Mack, A. (2002). Civil war: Academic research and the policy community. Journal of Peace Research, 39(5), 515–525.
- Marchetti, R., & Tocci, N. (2009). Conflict society: Understanding the role of civil society in conflict. Global Change, Peace & Security, 21(2), 201–217.
- McClintock, E., & Nahimana, T. (2008). Managing the tension between inclusionary and exclusionary processes: Building peace in Burundi. International Negotiation, 13(1), 73–79.
- Mendes, I. (2020). Inclusion and political representation in peace negotiations: The case of the Colombian victims' delegations. Journal of Politics in Latin America, 11(3), 272–297.
- Nilsson, D. (2012). Anchoring the peace: Civil society actors in peace accords and durable peace. International Interactions, 38(2), 243–266.

- Nilsson, D., Svensson, I., Magalhães Teixeira, B., Martínez Lorenzo, L., & Ruus, A. (2020). In the streets and at the table: Civil society coordination during peace negotiations. International Negotiation, 25(2), 225–251.
- Orjuela, C. (2003). Building peace in Sri Lanka: A role for civil society? Journal of Peace Research, 40(2), 195–212.
- OSCE. (2014). Mediation and dialogue facilitation in the OSCE: Reference guide. Vienna: Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe.
- Paffenholz, T. (2010). Civil society and peacebuilding. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society and peacebuilding (pp. 43–64). Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Paffenholz, T. (2014). Civil society and peace negotiations: Beyond the inclusion–exclusion dichotomy. Negotiation Journal, 30(1), 69–91.
- Paffenholz, T., Ross, N., Dixon, S., Schluchter, A.-L., & True, J. (2016). Making women count - not just counting women: Assessing women's inclusion and influence on peace negotiations. Geneva: Inclusive Peace & Transition Initiative.
- Pouligny, B. (2005). Civil society and post-conflict peacebuilding: Ambiguities of international programmes aimed at building ‘new’ societies. Security Dialogue, 36(4), 495–510.
- Putnam, R. D. (2000). Bowling alone: The collapse and revival of American community. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- Raiffa, H. (2004). Negotiation analysis. Cambridge: Belknap.
- Spurk, C. (2010). Understanding civil society. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society and peacebuilding (pp. 3–28). Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- United Nations. (2012). UN guidance for effective mediation. New York: United Nations.
- Wallensteen, P., & Axell, K. (1993). Armed conflict at the end of the cold war, 1989 – 1992. Journal of Peace Research, 30(3), 331–346.
- Walzer, M. (1998). Towards a global civil society. Providence/Oxford: Berghahn Books.
- Wanis-St. John, A. (2006). Back-Channel negotiation: International bargaining in the shadows. Negotiation Journal, 22(2), 119–144.
- Wanis-St. John, A., & Kew, D. (2008). Civil society and peace negotiations: Confronting exclusion. International Negotiation, 13(1), 11–36.
- Zanker, F. (2018). Legitimacy in peacebuilding. Rethinking civil society involvement in peace negotiations. Abingdon: Routledge.

Civil Society Organizations (CSOs)

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Civil War

- ▶ Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis
- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Mozambique
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Luka Biong D. Kuol
 Africa Center for Strategic Studies (ACSS),
 National Defense University, WA, USA
 Peace Research Institute Oslo, Oslo, Norway
 University of Juba, Juba, South Sudan

Synonyms

Civil war; Diversity; Institutions; Peace; Political Islam; Social contract; South Sudan; Sudan; System of government

Definition

This article revisits debate about the root causes of civil wars with the aim of providing a coherent framework for addressing such drivers and building sustainable peace. It is argued in this article that the civil war is better explained by the absence of resilient social contract rather than the dominant theoretical perspectives that attribute causation of civil wars to grievances or greed. The resilient social contract framework with its three postulated drivers is used in this article to provide a better diagnosis of civil wars and mechanisms for nurturing enduring peace. Sudan and South Sudan that have been susceptible since their independence to recurrent civil wars provide good cases for testing the social contract framework. This entry argues that the ruling elites in both countries have adopted unitary autocratic system of government that failed to forge a social contract that builds trust between citizens and governments and among citizens as well as failing to address the core conflict issues. The pathway for sustainable peace in the two Sudans is to forge a new resilient social contract that addresses the core conflict issues through inclusive and responsive political settlements and social contract-making mechanisms, inclusive and effective institutions and expanding and deepening social cohesion.

Introduction

There is no doubt that civil wars will continue to pose continuous threat to human lives and livelihoods, particularly in Africa. In 2018, Africa experienced about 21 civil wars that is the highest number of civil conflicts since 1946 (Rustad and Bakken 2019). Besides their persistent recurrence, the nature and dynamics of civil conflicts have been changing. While most of violent conflicts are largely within the states in Africa, peaceful civilian protests, riots, and uprising are increasingly supplanting the normal armed conflicts. The violent conflicts are not only in rise but have become the main drivers of the increased vulnerability, food insecurity, and recent resurgent of famines in Africa. In the case of the Horn of Africa, the overall economic cost of conflict was estimated to be 18.29% economic growth rate of per capita from 1990 to 2010 and lost between $4757.24 and $8777.96 in gross domestic product (GDP) per capita between 1990 and 2007 [Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) 2011, p. 98].

Given its persistence, understanding the root causes of civil war will continue to pose a challenge in terms of conceptualization and theorization of its genesis but also in terms of appropriate policy direction and intervention to prevent its occurrence and build sustainable peace. This article is an attempt to provide better understanding of root causes of civil wars and possible pathways to building sustainable peace. The main argument in this article is that the causation of civil wars is better explained by the absence of resilient social contract than the dominant arguments of grievance and greed. The entry is organized into four sections including this introduction section that is followed by a section on core conceptual and theoretical framework for understanding and addressing civil war. The resilient social contract framework is applied in section three to the cases of Sudan and South Sudan to provide empirical examples of better understanding of recurrent civil wars. The conclusion section captures thought-provoking and key ideas to take away in understanding and addressing civil wars.

Understanding Conflict: Social Contract Framework

The concept of civil war is widely used but rarely defined. This entry uses the definition of civil war provided by Gersovitz and Kriger (2013, pp. 160–161) as “a politically organized, large-scale, sustained, physically violent conflict that occurs within a country principally among large/numerically important groups of its inhabitants or citizens over the monopoly of physical force within the country.” With this definition, the term “civil war” will be used interchangeably with civil conflict or violent conflict throughout this entry. The search for understanding the phenomenon of civil war has attracted various disciplines to provide their analysis that often suffers conceptually from their monodisciplinary approach. Some scholars consider religion or ethnicity as a prime driver of civil war (Huntington 1996), while some economists largely attributed the causation of civil wars to greed (Collier and Hoeffler 2002).

The political scientists such as Gurr (1970) have a long-standing position of attributing the cause of civil conflict to relative deprivation and grievances. Generally, two competing theoretical perspectives, greed and grievance, have directed the debate about causation of civil war. There is now growing empirical evidence that unequivocally shows violent conflicts are largely caused by grievances (UNECA 2011). These grievances are symptoms of governance deficit and inability of public institutions to discharge the core functions of the state to deliver public goods and to strengthen its legitimacy by building trust with citizens and among citizens through social contract (UNECA 2011, p. 1).

However, there is a debate of whether such governance deficit is caused by the type of government in terms of “power sources” or system of government in terms of “power structure.” While the two concepts are reinforcing in determining the quality of governance and its manifestation, most civil war causation studies have focused on types (Ireland and Gartner 2001) rather than systems of government. This has largely undermined the central role played by power distribution and its management within government institutions. Some nation-states in Africa such as Sudan and South Sudan (Kuol 2019a, b) that are at war with their citizens have adopted systems of government that produced public institutions that failed to adhere to the social covenant at their independence of living together in peace.

This gap in the literature of civil war causation made some scholars to move debate beyond grievances and greed and argued instead that civil war is a manifestation of dearth or revocation of social contract (Murshed 2009, p. 31; Cuesta and Murshed 2008). In the case of Africa, it is argued that the recurrent civil wars may be better explained by the unfinished social contract-making process in countries that are at war from within (Kuol 2020). Despite its recognition in the causation of civil wars, the concept of social contract lacks appropriate definition and operationalization into a framework to better analyze and address civil wars. McCandless (2018, p. 48) provides a comprehensive definition of the concept as “a dynamic national agreement between state and society, including different groups in society, on how to live together, and notably, around how power is distributed and exercised.” This definition identifies three pillars of social contract, namely: national agreement that distributes power; institutions that exercise and manage power; and peaceful coexistence and social cohesion as outcomes of how power is allocated, exercised, and managed. The definition also captures well the centrality of a self-motivated national covenant on peaceful coexistence, trust, and social cohesion between state and citizens and among and between citizens that is largely shaped by how power is distributed and managed. The definition has also underscored that the peaceful coexistence or lack of it within nation-states is largely shaped by “power structure” rather than by “power sources” alone. Also this definition refers not only to a structure of governance, but it implicitly recognizes the importance of institutions that exercised power to preserve and nurture social contract.

On the basis of this definition, McCandless (2018, p. 48) attempts to operationalize the concept of social contract by offering a heuristic resilient national social contract framework to better understand and address violent conflict through the following three postulated drivers: Political settlements and social contract-making mechanisms are increasingly inclusive and responsive to “core conflict issues”; institutions (formal, customary, and informal) are increasingly effective and inclusive and have broadly shared outcomes that meet societal expectations and enhance state legitimacy; and social cohesion is broadening and deepening, with formal and informal ties and interactions binding society horizontally and vertically. The two Sudans have been experiencing recurrent civil wars since their independence in 1956 and 2011, respectively, and providing interesting case for testing the social contract framework (see McCandless 2018). As the aim of this article is to understand the causation of the recurrent civil wars in two Sudans, this framework provides the appropriate tool for the analysis and understanding of the drivers of the recurrent civil wars.

The Case of Two Sudans: Why Recurrent Civil Wars?

In testing the utility of heuristic resilient national social contract framework (McCandless 2018), the focus will be on the first two postulated drivers of how power is allocated, exercised, and managed to address the core conflict issues such as diversity. The selection of diversity as a core conflict issue to be assessed is that the management of diversity poses a real challenge for peaceful coexistence and social cohesion not only in Africa but also in developed industrialized countries. There is a wealth of evidence that shows the virtues of diversity in development and peacebuilding. The nexus between diversity and economic growth on one hand and between diversity and improved performance on the other hand has, respectively, been observed at macro-level in developed countries and in organizations at the micro-level (Chigudu 2018). Therefore, diversity by itself is not a problem, but the way it is managed by the state is the core problem.

Despite these virtues of diversity, there is persistent recurrence of diversity-related civil wars in Africa. Many studies have attributed the genesis of such violent conflict to various factors including colonial legacy, creation of artificial states through unnatural process that led to unstable nations-states in Africa (Deng 2008). Some argued that the countries that are at war with their citizens got their independence before nations were formed through an inclusive social contract-making process (Bob 1990). The post-colonial African political leaders became more interested in maintaining the colonial systems of the government that they inherited instead of forging new social contract to contain the threat of disunity and fragmentation (Laremont 2002). Instead of recognizing ethnic diversity as a virtue, many post-independence ruling elites in Africa detested ethnic diversity and tried instead to supplant it by building divisive national identities that contributed to more civil conflicts (Deng 2005).

The post-independence ruling elites in Sudan and South Sudan are not an exception in the mismanagement of diversity. The management of ethnic diversity is one of the issues that shaped and continues to shape the dynamics of peace and conflict in the two Sudans. If such diversity is not carefully managed, it could be a liability or even a curse (Deng 2005; Jok 2011, p. 3). There is a growing consensus in the literature that a decentralized federal system of self-rule government, despite some of its drawbacks, is the best way of managing diversity (Radon and Logan 2014, pp. 152–153; Kuol 2018). It is shown in this article that the post-independence ruling elites of the two Sudans have failed to adopt a system of government to harness the virtues of diversity but opted instead to transform ethnic diversity to become a source of violent conflict.

The Sudan: Unitary and Autocratic Arabo-Islamic Hegemony System

The Occurrence and Cost of Civil Wars

Since its independence in 1956, Sudan has been in war with itself. This started with its first civil war (1955–1972), followed by second civil war (1983–2005), then the war in the region of Darfur (2003 to present) and war in regions of Southern Kordofan and Blue Nile (2011 to present). Sudan wasted most of its years after its independence in fighting rather than building the nation and that resulted in the overall economic cost of 52.53% economic growth per capita from 1990 to 2010 (UNECA 2011). This cost is almost three times higher than the average cost of the Horn of Africa, and it could even be far higher if the economic costs of the first and second civil wars were included.

The first Sudan civil war (1955–1972) resulted in a death toll of 500,000 and recurrent famines in the 1960s (Johnson 1989; Deng 1999). The second civil war (1983–2005) caused the death toll of about 2 million, 420,000 refugees, and over 4 million displaced in Southern Sudan (UNECA 2011). Deng (2002) estimates the excess death toll from the 1998 Bahr el Ghazal famine to be about 70,000. Also the violent conflict in Darfur produced a death toll of about 300,000, 1.5 million displaced, and crude death rate of the 1984–1985 famine to about 40 per thousand (Qugnivet 2006; De Waal 1989).

The Colonial Legacy: The Missed Opportunity for Federal System

The Anglo-Egyptian regime that conquered Sudan in 1898 adopted a system of government that recognized ethnic diversity and indigenous traditional institutions as basis for its exercise of power. In Southern Sudan, the new regime adopted indirect rule that was based on traditional self-rule through “native administration” by using indigenous customs and beliefs and local laws (Johnson 2011). The regime later on adopted the Southern Sudan Policy of 1930 that incorporated the native administration with the aim of protecting the people of Southern Sudan from slavery, Islamization, and Arabization from northern Sudan and to promote good governance (Henderson 1939, p. 165).

During this period of British colonial administration (1898–1956), Sudan enjoyed relative peace largely because of the system of government that embraced diversity and exercised power through indigenous traditional institutions. Despite its success in maintaining the rule of law and stability, the new regime neglected development in Southern Sudan while focusing its development efforts in northern Sudan. This created uneven development between northern and Southern Sudan and planted the seed of social, economic, and political disparities.

The Southern Sudan elites demanded from the British colonial administration during the negotiation for independence of Sudan in the early 1950s for its “Southern Policy” to continue and to prepare them to join East Africa instead of being annexed to northern Sudan. The northern Sudanese elites who were negotiating for the independence of Sudan with British colonial rule rejected this demand. This led Southern Sudan elites to demand federalism instead of “Southern Policy” as the only system of government that would ensure their self-rule, preserve unity in diversity, and effective way of subduing call for secession in the post-independence Sudan. Instead of accepting this demand for federalism, the independence negotiating team of the northern Sudan elites cautiously accepted this demand and promised to give it due consideration after the independence in 1956 (Alier 1990).

The British colonial rulers who negotiated the independence of Sudan with the northern Sudan elites failed to consider and recognize this fair demand by Southern Sudan elites for federalism in the post-independence Sudan. The rejection of federal system resulted in the emergence of new state that was forcefully and artificially created without appropriate arrangements for a system of government that would manage religious and ethnic diversity of the post-independence Sudan. It is argued that the first Sudan civil war that erupted in 1955 in Southern Sudan and before the independence of Sudan was primarily triggered by the decision of the British colonial authorities for falsely forging the united Sudan without a system of government that would ensure their self-rule and it made the south absolutely and relatively disadvantaged in the post-independence Sudan (Deng 1995).

The Post-Independence Sudan: Accentuating Unitary Arabo-Islamic Hegemony System

The new post-independence Sudanese ruling elites did not only reject the demand for federal system but it also considered it as treason and adopted instead Arab-Islamic identity as the only way to create a homogenous society in the Sudan. The new rulers of Sudan abhorred diversity and embarked on building a united Sudan with Arabo-Islamism as the sole determinant for national unity and citizenship. They saw the religious and cultural diversity of the country as a curse and a threat to unity and Arabo-Islamic hegemony and strove to eliminate such diversity (Khalid 1990). It is argued that this system of government based on Arabo-Islamic hegemony has haunted and continues to haunt Sudan with the recurrent diversity-related conflicts (Deng 2005).

In Southern Sudan, the new rulers of Sudan consistently focused on dismantling the colonial Southern Sudan Policy, which was based on traditional systems of government, and replacing it with Arabization and Islamization policy. Well-established religious, cultural, and educational norms in Southern Sudan were eroded during the early years of independence as a number of steps were taken to Islamize and Arabize cultural life and the system of government in Southern Sudan (Alier 1990). This new policy of Arabization and Islamization of Sudan caused enormous disruption in the traditional system of government embraced by the British colonial rule and contributed to the eruption of the first civil war in Southern Sudan in 1955.

The independence of Sudan was not celebrated by southerners, but it was considered instead as a mere changing of faces of colonial power from the British to Arabized northerners (Deng 1995, p. 13). The new Sudanese ruling elites did not only neglect Southern Sudan in the post-independence national government but they virtually put the administration of Southern Sudan in the hands of northern Sudanese. After independence, the new civil servants of Southern Sudan administration became overwhelmingly “northern,” with southerners occupying less than 10% of the total senior positions (Oduho and Deng 1962, p. 18).

Equally, the post-independence systems of government were never stable due to frequent changes of “power sources,” ranging from secular to socialist to Islamic regimes. While the system of government in the post-independence Sudan remained largely unitary, the policy choice of devolving powers took the form of either decentralization or de-concentration of powers. Immediately after independence in 1956, the new northern ruling elites adopted a deconcentrated system of power transfer from the central government to local governments to maintain law and collect revenue on behalf of the central authorities.

This deconcentrated system of government continued until the socialist regime took power through coup in 1969. The new regime maintained a unitary system but adopted a decentralized system by devolving authority from the central government to local governments in the provinces. This new regime also declared the policy of unity in diversity and recognized the right of the people of Southern Sudan to have their own self-rule. This policy resulted in ending the first civil war (1955–1972) and signing of the Addis Ababa Peace Agreement in 1972 that granted self-rule and regional autonomy to the people of Southern Sudan. The provisions of this agreement were incorporated into the national constitution with the constitutionally devolved authority to the autonomous regional government of Southern Sudan, which exercised legislative and executive authority and with a system of decentralized local government. During this period of decentralized unitary system, Sudan and Southern Sudan enjoyed relative peace.

The Emergence of Political Islam

With the discovery of oil in Southern Sudan in the early 1980s, the socialist regime redrew the border between northern and Southern Sudan by carving out the areas of oilfields to be part of northern Sudan and that caused tensions between central government and regional government of Southern Sudan. This tension forced the central government to abrogate the 1972 Peace Agreement and dismantled the autonomous regional government by dividing Southern Sudan region into weaker three sub-regions. This annulment of the 1972 Peace Agreement was followed by the regime declaring Sudan as Islamic state by adopting Islamic laws. This decision was seen as part of the political survival efforts of the socialist regime to appease the Islamic political forces such as National Islamic Front (NIF) that posed increased threat to its political power. These factors contributed to the eruption of the second civil war in 1983 that was led by the Sudan People’s Liberation Movement (SPLM) that called for a secular Sudan and unity in diversity.

Despite these political survival efforts, the regime was ousted in 1985 through popular uprising that was followed by a brief period of transitional government and elected civilian government. This elected government was overthrown in 1989 through a coup orchestrated by the NIF that renamed itself later as National Congress Party (NCP) that adopted a very conservative and alien brand of political Islam. During the 1990s, the NCP adopted autocratic unitary system of government and stepped up Islamization of Sudan by enforcing Sharia law and using social and political means to mold society into an Islamic state [International Crisis Group (ICG) 2002, p. 94].

As Islamic regime became weak with intensified civil war in Southern Sudan, and other peripheral and marginalized regions of Sudan and with increased pressure from regional and international community, the regime had no choice but to sign the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) in 2005 with its ideological rival, the SPLM. The CPA that ended 21 years of civil war was a compromise between the two competing types of government, namely, the Islamic state and secular state. Also the CPA recognized and affirmed the diversity of Sudan as a virtue and adopted a decentralized federal system.

The CPA granted the people of Southern Sudan not only autonomous self-rule government but also the right of self-determination to decide their political future through a referendum to be conducted in January 2011. The people of the border area of Abyei were given in the CPA an autonomous self-rule administration and the right of self-determination. The war-affected people of Nuba Mountains and Blue Nile were granted in the CPA special autonomous self-rule and popular consultation to assess how the CPA met their political aspirations and self-rule at the end of the interim period in 2011.

Prior to the independence of Southern Sudan in July 2011, fighting broke out in Sudan, starting in Abyei area in May 2008 and May 2011 (Kuol 2014), Nuba Mountains in June 2011, and Blue Nile in September 2011 due to the refusal of the Islamic regime to conduct referendum in Abyei, the rigged elections in Nuba Mountains, and failure to conduct popular consultation in Blue Nile and Nuba Mountains. As such the Islamic regime failed and missed the opportunity to implement the CPA that provided mechanisms and system of government for managing diversity and addressing the root causes of the diversity-related conflicts in Sudan.

South Sudan: The Autocratic Unitary System

The Occurrence and Cost of Civil War

As per the provisions of the CPA, the people of Southern Sudan voted overwhelmingly to secede from Sudan through internationally supervised referendum, and it became an independent country in July 2011. Since its independence, South Sudan slid in 2013 into first civil war in less than 3 years (2013–2015) and then second civil war (2016 to present) when the ruling elites failed to implement the peace agreement that they signed in 2015. The first and second civil wars in South Sudan (2013–now) has caused massive forced displacement of almost 4.2 million people including 2.2 million in neighboring countries and with nearly 6 out of 10 people experiencing severely food insecure or famine.

It is estimated about 400,000 have died as a result of civil war with half of the dead were killed in fighting and other half died from disease, hunger, and other causes exacerbated by violent conflict (Checchi et al. 2018). Also about 41% of people surveyed in South Sudan showed symptoms of post-trauma disorder that are comparable to the levels of countries that experienced genocide such as Cambodia and Rwanda (UNDP 2015). The economic cost of these civil wars to South Sudan could be as high as US$ 158 billion; the costs to the regional neighbors could rise to nearly US$ 57 billion, while the cost to international community in terms of peacekeeping and humanitarian assistance could rise to nearly US$ 30 billion (Brekenridge 2015).

Transition to Statehood: Exclusive Constitution-Making Process

The overwhelming decision of the people of South Sudan to secede from Sudan came as a result of the failure of the ruling northern elites to make unity attractive and to transform diversity to become a driver for development, unity, and social cohesion. Although the CPA obligated the parties to work together in making the option of unity attractive to the people of South Sudan, the attractiveness of secession prevailed for both parties (Kuol 2020). The NCP feared unity might endanger its political Islam agenda, while the SPLM abandoned its “New Sudan” agenda of united secular Sudan after the death of its leader, Dr. John Garang, and embraced secession as critical for winning its political base in South Sudan (Kuol 2020, p. 64). The international community also saw secession as the only way for managing the cultural differences and attaining and sustaining peace in the two partitioned states, and nurtured this option (Kalpakian 2017, p. 4).

The 2005 Interim Constitution of Southern Sudan (ICSS) that incorporated the provisions of the CPA affirmed the decentralized federalism system in the post-independence South Sudan. The ICSS made it clear that if the outcome of the referendum on self-determination favored secession, the decentralized federal system established during the period of CPA would continue in the independent South Sudan. As the people of Southern Sudan were preparing for the transition to statehood after the referendum, all Southern Sudan Political Parties (ASSPP) agreed on a national roadmap (Akol 2011). This roadmap provides inclusive process for a constitutional review of the 2005 ICSS and drafting of the 2011 Transitional Constitution of South Sudan (TCSS) for the independent state.

Contrary to these commitments in the roadmap and constitution, the President of Southern Sudan unilaterally and without consulting other political parties decided to appoint a Constitutional Review Committee to review the 2005 ICSS and draft TCSS (ibid.). The members of this committee were mainly from the Sudan People's Liberation Movement (SPLM), the ruling political party, with a two-thirds majority and that caused other political parties to withdraw in protest from the work of the committee. The 2011 TCSS was approved by the cabinet and passed by the parliament that was controlled by the SPLM.

The constitution-making process for the transition to statehood was exclusively carried out by the SPLM with limited participation of other political parties and stakeholders. This critical constitution-making exercise was a missed opportunity for nation building, as it would have contributed to the unity of people of the new nation. This constitutional-making process to statehood was flawed and marked a bad start for building national ownership and forging a new social contract and made the new state of South Sudan to be founded on a constitution that lacks legitimacy and buy-in from key stakeholders (Jok 2011).

Instead of affirming the decentralized federal system as provided for in the 2005 ICSS, the ruling elites approved the post-independence 2011 TCSS that adopted instead a centralized and autocratic unitary system of government. This system of government was not only a unitary system but it has also given excessive powers to the president such as dismissal of elected state governors, dissolution of elected state parliament, and dismissal of senior judges without due process of law and that undermine the checks and balances (Kuoil 2020).

This exclusive process of constitution-making and adoption of unitary system of government without checks and balances marked the beginning of the failure of the post-independence ruling elites of South Sudan to embrace diversity. This made the new state susceptible to ethnic-related violent conflict, as it happened with the eruption of civil war in 2013. This transitional process created a widespread sense of exclusion that is reminiscent of the feeling of exclusion that made the people of South Sudan want to leave Sudan (Jok 2011, p. 5). The post-independence ruling elites in South Sudan have followed the footpaths of the post-independence northern Sudanese ruling elites by rejecting the federal system and establishing instead autocratic unitary system (Kuoil 2020).

The First Civil War: Governance-Deficit and Weak Institutions

The civil war that erupted in South Sudan in 2013 and in less than 3 years of its independence raises fundamental question of what went wrong. Although many factors have been cited as the brute causes, the governance-deficit as manifested in destructive dynamics of neopatrimonial governance may explain better the causation of violent conflict in 2013 (De Waal 2014; Kuoil 2020). This governance-deficit is reflected in the power struggle and internal demand for the democratization within the ruling party. The SPLM as the ruling political party undertook after the independence of South Sudan a process of reviewing its 2008 constitution and drafting new 2013 constitution. The process of drafting new constitution caused a division within the SPLM, between those who demanded for change and democratization and those who wanted to maintain the militaristic and undemocratic structure of the party with excessive powers given to the chairperson of the party without check and balance mechanisms. Some of the contentious issues included the mode of voting (raising hands or secret ballot) and tenure of the office of the chairperson of the party.

This demand for democratic governance came into fruition when the chairman of the party and president of the country exercised his new constitutional powers in 2011 TCSS and without internal party consultation sacked in July 2013 the entire cabinet including his vice president and senior leaders of the SPLM and replaced them with a new cabinet (Johnson 2014; Kuol 2020). The new cabinet excluded senior members of the SPLM who demanded for democratic reform and replaced them with new members who were argued to be a circle of close advisers and confidants drawn mainly from the president's own community, some not even members of the SPLM, and others with suspiciously close ties to the ruling National Congress Party (NCP) regime in Sudan (Johnson 2014, p. 302).

This decision of excluding in the new cabinet the senior members of the SPLM who demanded for democratization resulted in more division in the ruling party, and it caused as well vigorous suppression of freedom of speech and public debate. The disgruntled senior members of the SPLM started accusing their chairman of thwarting the efforts of transforming the SPLM from a liberation movement into a broad-based and democratic political party. This power struggle within the SPLM resulted in the eruption of violent conflict in Juba, the capital city of South Sudan in December 2013. This caused the arrest of some of these dismissed members of the SPLM including the secretary general of the party under the alleged coup and with the former deputy chairman of the party and vice president fleeing the capital and formed his armed movement against the government in Juba.

This division within the ruling party would have not deteriorated into a national crisis if there were strong institutions, particularly in the security sector such as the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA), the former military wing of the SPLM, and the post-independence national army. Besides the division within the SPLM, there was a parallel division within the SPLA (Johnson 2014) that was less of a national army but amalgamation of ethnically affiliated forces mainly dominated by Dinka and Nuer with allegiance and loyalty, respectively, to their tribal leaders, Salva Kiir, the president, and Riek Machar, the former vice president (Kuol 2020). Given weak and fragile institutions and lack of professionalism in the security sector, the crisis within the SPLM in December 2013 caused the national army and other law enforcement agencies such as the police to disintegrate along ethnic lines in fighting the civil war.

Summary

The phenomenon of civil war will continue to exist but with new and changing dynamics that would require a better conceptualization and analysis for effective mechanisms for managing it. The review of the existing approaches to the analysis of civil war shows gaps. These gaps made some scholars (Murshed 2009; Cuesta and Murshed 2008) to argue to move beyond the two competing theoretical perspectives, greed and grievance, which have directed the debate about the causation of civil war. While there is a consensus that the causation of civil war is attributed to grievance rather than greed, grievance is a symptom and a manifestation of governance-deficit that may explain better the causation of civil war.

The entry emphasizes the centrality of the system of government and social contract-making in understanding the drivers of the recurrent civil wars in the two Sudans. The case of the two Sudans shows that the social contract-making is still a work in progress in Africa and that necessitates a review of the current systems of government as a basis for forging a new social contract that would put African countries at war with their citizens on a solid path for sustainable peace and stability. Despite the depressing trend of recurrent civil wars in the two Sudans, there are opportunities for the two countries to reverse such trend. For example, the 2018 South Sudan Peace Agreement provides a golden opportunity for forging a new social contract and constitution-making process that would embrace decentralized federal system. In Sudan, the popular uprising that ended the 30 years of misruling by NCP provides an unprecedented opportunity for adopting a new constitution and social contract that would move the country away from unitary autocratic political Islam system to a decentralized federal system that would achieve the revolutionary slogans of uprising; freedom, peace, and justice.

References

- Akol, L. (2011). Critique of the draft Transitional Constitution of the Republic of South Sudan. Sudan Tribune, April 30.
- Alier, A. (1990). Southern Sudan: Too many agreements dishonoured. Exeter: Ithaca Press.
- Bob, A. (1990). Islam, the state and politics in the Sudan. Northeast African Studies, 12(2), 201–220.
- Breckenridge, A. (2015). South Sudan: The cost of war. London: Frontiers Economics.
- Checchi, F., Testa, A., Warsame, A., Quach, L., & Burns, R. (2018). South Sudan: Estimates of crisis-attributable mortality. London: London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine.
- Chigudu, D. (2018). Strength in diversity: An opportunity for Africa's development. Cogent Social Sciences, 4, 1–5.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2002). On the incidence of civil war in Africa. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 46(1), 13–28.
- Cuesta, J., & Murshed, S. (2008). The Micro-foundations of Social Contracts, Civil Conflicts and International Peace-Making (Research Working Paper 8). Brighton: MICROCON.
- De Waal, A. (1989). Famine that kills: Darfur, Sudan, 1984–1985. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- De Waal, A. (2014). When Kleptocracy becomes insolvent: Brute causes of the civil war in South Sudan. African Affairs, 113(452), 347–369.
- Deng, F. (1995). War of visions: Conflict of identities in the Sudan. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Deng, L. (1999). Famine in the Sudan: Causes, preparedness and response: A political, social and economic analysis of the 1998 Bahr el Ghazal Famine (IDS Discussion Paper 369). Brighton: Institute of Development Studies, Sussex University.
- Deng, L. (2002). The Sudan famine of 1998: Unfolding of the global dimension. IDS Bulletin, 33, 4.
- Deng, L. (2005). The challenge of cultural, ethnic and religious diversity in the peace building and constitution-making in the post-conflict Sudan. Journal of Civil Wars, 7(3), 258–269.
- Deng, F. (2008). Identity, diversity, and constitutionalism in Africa. Washington D.C.: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Gersovitz, M., & Kriger, N. (2013). What is a civil war? A critical review of its definition and (econometric) consequences. The World Bank Research Observer, 28(2), 159–190.
- Gurr, T. (Ed.). (1970). Why Men Rebel. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Henderson, K. (1939). A note on the migration of the messiria tribe into South-West Kordofan. Sudan Notes and Records, 22, 49.
- Huntington, S. (1996). The clash of civilizations and the remaking of world order. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- ICG. (2002). God, oil and country: Changing the logic of war in Sudan. Brussels: International Crisis Group (ICG) Press.
- Ireland, M., & Gartner, S. (2001). Time to fight: government type and conflict initiation in parliamentary systems. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 45(5), 547–568.
- Johnson, D. (1989). Political ecology in the upper Nile. The Journal of African History, 30, 3.
- Johnson, D. (2011). The root causes of Sudan's civil wars: Peace or truce. Suffolk: James Currey.
- Johnson, D. (2014). Briefing: The crisis in South Sudan. African Affairs, 113(451), 300–309.
- Jok, J. (2011). Diversity, Unity, and Nation Building in South Sudan (Special Report 287). Washington: US Institute of Peace.
- Kalpakistan, J. (2017). Peace agreements in a near-permanent civil war: Learning from Sudan and South Sudan. South African Journal of International Affairs, 24(1), 1–19.
- Khalid, M. (1990). The government they deserve: The role of the elite in Sudan's political evolution. London: Kegan Paul.
- Kuol, L. (2014). Political violence and the emergence of the dispute over Abyei, Sudan, 1950–1983. Journal of Eastern Africa Studies, 8(4), 1–17.
- Kuol, L. (2018). Book review: The root causes of Sudan's civil wars: Old wars and new wars by Douglas Johnson. African Conflict and Peacebuilding Review, 8(2), 98–101.
- Kuol, L. (2019a). Federalism-decentralization-peace Nexus in South Sudan. In L. Kuol & S. Logan (Eds.), The struggle for South Sudan: Challenges of security and state formation. London: I.B. TAURIS.
- Kuol, L. (2019b). When ethnic diversity becomes a curse in Africa: The tale of two Sudans. Journal of Diplomacy and International Relations, XXI(1), 15–35.
- Kuol, L. (2020). South Sudan: The elusive quest for a resilient social contract. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 14(1), 64–83.
- Laremont, R. (2002). The causes of war and the consequences of peacekeeping in Africa. Portsmouth: Heinemann.
- McCandless, E. (2018). Forging resilient social contracts for peace: Towards a needed re-conceptualisation of the social contract (Working Paper). Witwatersrand University.
- Murshed, S. (2009). Conflict as the absence of contract. The Economics of Peace and Security, 4(1), 31–38.
- Oduho, J., & Deng, W. (1962). The problem of the southern Sudan. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Qugnivert, N. (2006). The report of the international commission of inquiry on Darfur: The question of genocide. Human Rights Review, 7(4), 38–68.
- Radon, J., & Logan, S. (2014). South Sudan: Governance arrangements, war, and peace. International Affairs, 68(1), 149–167.
- Rustad, S., & Bakken, I. (2019). Conflict Trends in Africa, 1989–2018 (Conflict Trends, 6). Oslo: PRIO.
- UNDP. (2015). Search for a new beginning: Perceptions of truth, justice, reconciliation and healing in South Sudan. Juba: United Nations Development Program (UNDP).
- UNECA. (2011). Diversity Management in Africa: Findings from the African peer review mechanism and a framework for analysis and policy-making. Addis: United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA).

Civilian and Military Missions and Operations

- ▶ European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The

Class

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Climate Change

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Co-existence

- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

Cohesion

- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Cold War

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Collateral

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions

Antonio de Aguiar Patriota
Embassy of Brazil, Cairo, Egypt

Definition

Collective security is a concept that acquired universal acceptance with the entry into force of the United Nations Charter. The maintenance of international peace and security as foreseen in the UN system of sovereign states is outlined in Chapters VI, on the pacific settlement of disputes, and Chapter VII, on action with respect to breaches to peace and acts of aggression. Collective security presupposes an advanced commitment to uphold the inadmissibility of the use of force in international relations, unless authorized by the Security Council or as a measure of self-defense. The exercise of a collective responsibility through international interventions is associated with the debate on the responsibility to protect (R2P) civilians threatened by mass atrocities. A consensus on R2P was reached at the 2005 UN summit, which contemplated collective action when national authorities fail to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing, and crimes against humanity. R2P was put to the test in Libya, when Resolution 1973 (2011) authorized all necessary measures to protect its civilian population. As a result of differences over the conception and implementation of this decision, the 2005 consensus has become mired in controversy. In Iraq and Libya, military interventions have generated more problems than solutions. The inability of the Security Council to reconcile its mandate with contemporary challenges in Libya, Syria, and elsewhere calls for a renewed effort to reach an understanding on when and how the international community should intervene militarily, be it on the basis of collective security concerns or in response to a commonly shared notion of collective responsibility.

Collective security, as an antidote against international anarchy, is linked to the emergence of a system of sovereign states in Europe, which replaced the aspiration toward universal empire that lasted until the 1648 Peace of Westphalia. Collective responsibility, as it refers to interventions for humanitarian purposes that are not strictly related to the maintenance of international security, is an idea that has acquired relevance in the context of recent debates on a responsibility to protect civilians in situations of peril. Intervention involves a deliberate decision to override sovereignty through military action. Not all interventions are undertaken in compliance with multilaterally agreed parameters established through international law. Sovereignty refers to a supreme political authority within a territorial community, coupled with the notion of the absence of an external superior authority, and constitutes, to this day, a cornerstone of the interstate system.

Collective security has acquired legal status through multilateral institutions, as they developed after the two world wars of the XX century. The first formulation of a universally applicable system of collective security was contained in the Covenant of the League of Nations. A more lasting expression of the concept was enshrined in the United Nations Charter and remains in force today.

Although alliances are sometimes described as instruments of collective security, this is not how the term was originally conceived. Henry Kissinger reminds us in diplomacy that “traditional alliances were directed against specific threats and defined precise obligations for specific groups of countries linked by shared national interests or mutual security concerns” (Kissinger 1994, p. 247). By contrast, collective security is designed to respond to any threat to peace. It represents an advanced commitment by the community of nations to enforce certain agreed strictures, as regards the inadmissibility of the use of force in international relations.

The adoption of the UN Charter on October 24, 1945, represents a landmark in the history of collective security. The maintenance of international peace and security as foreseen in the UN system is outlined in Chapters VI and VII of the Charter. Under Chapter VI, member states commit to seek solutions by peaceful means, mainly by negotiation, conciliation, mediation, and arbitration. If peaceful means prove to be ineffective and a dispute escalates into armed conflict, Chapter VII provides the basis for enforcement measures to restore peace. Enforcement measures can be nonmilitary in nature, such as arms embargoes and economic sanctions, or, as a last resort, may involve the use of force. Such coercive measures require explicit authorization by the Security Council. Article 51, on self-defense, represents the only exception to the prohibition on the use of force.

Both the logic of isolation, inherent to sanctions, and that of intervention, which underpins enforcement, constitute a departure from the notion of a sovereign equality of states. In this respect, Article 2.7 of the UN Charter stipulates that the principle of nonintervention in the internal matters of states will not prejudice the application of coercive measures under Chapter VII.

Although the concept of collective security, as multilaterally articulated, has been a tenet of international relations for over 100 years, no predictable operative system for enforcement measures was installed either by the League of Nations or the United Nations. In practice the Security Council, as master of its own procedures, has determined the scope and the means for the application of Chapter VII measures over the past 75 years.

Enforcement has been outsourced to a variety of actors. The arrangements foreseen in the Charter, which would have provided the organization with the means to intervene militarily, were never concluded due to the tensions of the Cold War. Following the demise of the Soviet Union, attempts were made to revive a dormant Military Staff Committee for that purpose, to no avail. An opportunity presented itself in the 1990s as the response of the international community to the invasion of Kuwait by Iraq revived interest in the full utilization of the possibilities offered by collective security, originally foreseen in the UN Charter.

The aftermath of the first Gulf War in 1991, coupled with the end of the Cold War, created the conditions, on January 31, 1992, for the first meeting of the UN Security Council at summit level. The final document of that summit pointed toward a new platform for coercive action, by including references to the fight against terrorism and the nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction as triggers for collective security measures. However, these indications did not amount to a new paradigm, capable of reconciling different strains of realism and idealism present in the debates at the time (United Nations 1992).

In the eyes of some, the so-called unipolar moment had cleared the path for the United States to lay down the rules of world order and enforce them unilaterally. Others, including non-governmental organizations such as Médecins Sans Frontières, considered that the unanimous support associated with the military liberation of Kuwait had paved the way for placing collective security at the service of a moral conscience in world affairs.

A certain amount of innovation through Security Council resolutions was ensued, with an impact both on the objectives of enforcement measures as well as on the means to enforce them. Examples of the first are the establishment of tribunals to judge those identified as responsible for mass atrocities in Bosnia and Rwanda. Meanwhile peacekeeping operations, originally conceived by member states as impartial and non-belligerent, became entangled in situations of so-called mission creep, in which they were perceived as taking sides. These attempts at collective reactions to security challenges in the Balkans and elsewhere generated precedents that had the cumulative effect of reorienting discussions on agreed parameters for coercive action. Moreover, the challenges posed by ensuring the full dismantling of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction programs resulted in a range of responses that shaped subsequent debates on international peace and security and still influence attitudes to this day.

In 1991 the Security Council adopted the most draconian disarmament and sanctions regime in UN history to ensure that Saddam Hussein would cease to pose a regional and global threat. UN Security Council Resolution 687, establishing the terms of the Gulf War cease-fire, demanded that Iraq "unconditionally accept, under international supervision, the destruction, removal or rendering harmless of its weapons of mass destruction, ballistic missiles with a range of over 150 kilometers, and related production facilities and equipment." Cooperation between Baghdad and various inspection teams was never fully satisfactory and gave way to repeated standoffs. The option of resorting to military force to ensure compliance with Resolution 687, however, never met with a consensus among the permanent members of the Security Council (United Nations Security Council Resolution 687 (1991)).

One of the systemic problems such an option raised was the thorny question of selectivity. If noncompliance with Security Council resolutions were to elicit enforcement measures, why ignore other situations of questionable compliance? Divisions in the Council did not discourage authorities in the United States from resorting to limited unilateral interventions such as operation "Desert Fox" in 1998. As the impasse between UN inspectors and Saddam Hussein's defiance persisted, however, the tragic September 11 terrorist attacks on the United States would play a decisive role in altering Washington's security concerns. The initial military responses against the Taliban in Afghanistan, on the basis of a right to self-defense, met with the solidarity and unanimous approval of Council members. The same did not apply to the perceived threat posed by Iraq.

The Anglo-American invasion of Iraq in March 2003 brought an end to the attempts by the United Nations to secure its disarmament, consistent with the terms negotiated at the end of the first Gulf War. The large-scale unilateral military intervention, undertaken without Security Council authorization, represented in itself a considerable challenge to the established collective security philosophy of the Charter. The situation only became more problematic when it was revealed that Iraq did not possess weapons of mass destruction. With the benefit of hindsight, it is possible to contend that the disarmament of Iraq had been secured through UN inspections, without the need for enforcement action, and in conformity with Security Council resolutions. It is also possible to sustain that it would have been particularly damaging for the legitimacy and credibility of the United Nations, had a war fought on false premises been authorized by the Security Council.

The precedent for evoking a collective responsibility to intervene forcibly in the face of humanitarian emergencies can be traced to UN Security Council Resolution 688, which authorized the provision of assistance to the Kurds, in northern Iraq, in the spring of 1991 (United Nations Security Council resolution 688 (1991)). Subsequently a succession of peace and security challenges in a variety of scenarios – including Rwanda, the Balkans, and East Timor – led UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan to place the notion of intervention itself within a broader context than the one originally prescribed by the drafters of the Charter.

Kofi Annan describes in his memoirs, “Interventions” 2012, how he came to challenge conventional views on national sovereignty (Annan 2012). According to his narrative, through the trials of UN peacekeeping from Somalia to Rwanda and Bosnia, he arrived at the conclusion that intervention, under Chapter VII, need not respond exclusively to threats to international peace and security. As he reflected on a future of effective and legitimate collective security for the XXI century, he set out the case for humanitarian intervention as a lesser evil than inaction in the face of massacres or extreme oppression of innocent civilians.

A dilemma facing the United Nations was thereby laid bare: was the defense of the primacy of the Security Council in matters of peace and security as established by the Charter compatible with passivity in the face of ethnic cleansing or genocide? At the behest of Kofi Annan in the year 2000, Canadian Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy assembled an independent International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty (ICIS) to try to respond to this dilemma. The Commission met under the co-chairmanship of Gareth Evans of Australia and Mohamed Sahnoun of Algeria and produced a report that reframed this discussion by introducing the notion of a “responsibility to protect.” (International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty (2001)).

In his opening speech to the 58th session of the General Assembly on September 2003, Kofi Annan expressed his concern with the deep divisions among the membership as regards the nature of international challenges in the realm of peace and security and the role played by enforcement measures to confront them (Annan 2003). He announced the convening of a High-Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Changes to provide the organization with a collective security agenda for the XXI century. The panel circulated a report on December 2004 that dedicated an entire chapter to collective security and the use of force. The text underlined the importance of the legitimacy and the legality of coercive measures. But it also admitted that the UN Charter was not “as clear as it could be when it comes to saving lives within countries in situations of mass atrocity” (UN High-Level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Changes 2004).

When UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan presented his own report entitled “In Larger Freedom” on March 2005, he stated that “we must embrace the responsibility to protect, and, when necessary, we must act on it” (Annan 2005, p. 36). The ground was thus prepared for the inclusion in the 2005 UN World Summit Outcome of a section on the responsibility to protect populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing, and crimes against humanity. Paragraph 139 thereof would start by encouraging the protection of civilians (PoC) in situations of conflict through peaceful means.

The UN membership, however, did not refrain from stating its preparedness to take collective action, including under Chapter VII, should peaceful means be inadequate in situations where “national authorities are manifestly failing to protect their populations from genocide, war crimes, ethnic cleansing and crimes against humanity” (United Nations General Assembly Resolution 60/1. 2005 World Summit Outcome 2005). It is worth noting that gross violations of human rights were not included in this list. But a new international consensus regarding sovereignty and intervention seemed to be in the offing, under the acronym R2P.

A methodological proposal for implementing R2P was presented on January 2009 by Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon. It involved a three pillar approach, ranging from support for efforts deployed by states themselves to consensual cooperation in the provision of humanitarian assistance and finally through collective action in situations where a state manifestly fails to protect civilians in the four cases mentioned in the outcome document of the 2005 World Summit (Ban 2009). In 2010 a new report by the UN Secretary-General on Early Warning, Assessment and the Responsibility to Protect placed emphasis on strategies of prevention, in part as a way to address growing concerns regarding the multiple risks inherent to enforcement measures (UN Secretary 2010).

These conceptual discussions would soon be submitted to a concrete test as the so-called “Arab spring” manifestations in Tunisia and Egypt captured international attention between the end of 2010 and the first months of 2011. In the case of Libya, it was felt that the widespread and systematic attacks by the government against the civilian population could amount to crimes against humanity, as stated in the preamble to Resolution 1970, adopted by consensus in February 2011. This resolution included a referral of the situation in Libya to the International Criminal Court, in addition to imposing an arms embargo, a travel ban, and an asset freeze (UN Security Council Resolution 1970 (2011)).

The following weeks, however, would witness increasingly polarized debates, as the toughest reaction contemplated in the R2P lexicon came up for consideration. At first, discussions centered on the creation of a no-fly zone, applicable to all parties in the Libyan conflict, as requested by the Arab League. While such a measure represented an escalation in the response to the crisis, it fell short of a full-fledged intervention. When the US delegation proposed the inclusion of the code word “all necessary measures” to protect civilians, in a draft that started by deploring the failure of Libyan authorities to comply with Resolution 1970, the consensus observed only 3 weeks before it quickly turned into bitter division.

On one side were those who viewed an intervention as the necessary response to the violent repression by Muammar Gaddafi against unarmed civilians, as he confronted growing opposition to his authoritarian rule. According to this view, Libya offered a clear example of the manifest incapacity of a government to discharge its responsibilities in protecting its own people. This position, however, met with skepticism on the part of those who either feared that military intervention would further exacerbate tensions in Libya – with negative consequences for civilians themselves – or suspected that political agendas unrelated to the plight of civilians may lurk behind the invoked humanitarian impulse. The shadow cast by Iraq persisted as a reminder of how the widespread instability resulting from a military intervention can dramatically outweigh its imagined benefits.

Rather than opening a window for diplomacy to ensure compliance with its terms, Resolution 1970 seemed to have generated “a barely disguised urge to intervene” in some member states, as pointed out by the former Ambassador of India to the United Nations, Hardeep Puri, in his book Perilous Interventions (Puri 2016, p. 202). The fact that the US government sought authorization from the UN Security Council for enforcement action seemed to reflect US President Obama’s personal opposition to the unilateral Iraq invasion of 2003. Notwithstanding that experience, and in spite of the misgivings expressed by Council members from all regional groups, the US delegation with support from France and the United Kingdom decided that a no-fly zone was insufficient and the time had come to act militarily.

Resolution 1973 was adopted by ten votes in favor and five abstentions, on the part of Brazil, China, Germany, India, and Russia (UN Security Council Resolution 1973 (2011)). Although no vetoes or negative votes were cast, the division among Council members should not be underestimated. Moreover, even countries that voted in the favor of the resolution had serious doubts regarding the wisdom of the proposed strategy, as South Africa would clarify in due course. As events unfolded, over the course of 2011, not only did the Libyan authorities fail to meet their obligations, but violations of Security Council prescriptions were also committed by the proponents of Resolution 1973: weapons were supplied indiscriminately, and the no-fly zone was implemented only against the Tripoli regime. In a unilateral interpretation of the authorization to apply all necessary means to protect civilians, NATO military operations only ceased after Gaddafi was killed.

It is worth pointing out that the concept of protection of civilians had been used in the context of peacekeeping operations before the emergence of R2P. Resolutions under Chapter VII of the UN Charter were adopted authorizing peacekeeping missions to protect civilians in several locations, including Darfur and Cote d'Ivoire, without giving rise to major controversy. By contrast, the Libyan case, considered a first experiment with intervention within the R2P framework, became tainted by a host of questions regarding the real motivation behind the military action.

Even without questioning the good faith of those who believed Resolution 1973 provided the correct platform to protect civilians and bring peace to Libya, the unraveling of the country and the ensuing instability, which soon propagated itself to the entire Sahel region, bring to the fore the issue of the unintended consequences wrought by military action. In other words, an intervention that created more problems than it solved, while rendering life more dangerous for civilians across several nations, had clearly not met its objectives and became politically and morally questionable.

In the tense diplomatic environment resulting from the implementation of resolution 1973, Brazil decided to introduce a set of considerations on how to ensure that multilateral responses to challenges such as the ones posed by Libya did not make matters worse. A paper, circulated to the Security Council membership on November 11, 2011, by the Brazilian Permanent Representative, began by acknowledging the human and political cost of the collective failure to act in a timely manner to prevent atrocities such as the 1994 genocide in Rwanda. In line with the reasoning that gave rise to R2P, it admitted that "there may be situations in which the international community might contemplate military action to prevent humanitarian catastrophes." (UN General Assembly – Security Council 2011).

However it also pointed out that the world was suffering the painful consequences of interventions that had aggravated existing conflicts, allowed terrorism to spread, and increased the vulnerability of civilians. The perception among member states that R2P could be misused for regime change was explicitly mentioned. In conclusion, the paper suggested that, as it exercises its responsibility to protect, the international community should also demonstrate a high degree of "responsibility while protecting." A set of prescriptions was put forward, from an emphasis on prevention to the development of Security Council procedures "to monitor and assess the manner in which resolutions are interpreted and implemented." A new acronym, RwP, was thus added to ongoing exchanges, as these thoughts came to be considered a desirable ingredient in the search for a synthesis between collective responsibility and collective security in interventions.

UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon would react positively in January 2012 by stating that "we all agree on the need for responsibility while protecting. In that spirit I very much welcome the Brazilian initiative to open a dialogue on these matters" (Ban 2012) while addressing the Stanley Foundation Conference on the Responsibility to Protect. Gareth Evans, one of the intellectual originators of R2P, would position himself along similar lines in an article, published a few days later, that starts by establishing that “The Western powers dismissiveness during the Libyan campaign did bruise them – and those bruises will have to heal before any consensus can be expected on tough responses to such situations in the future” (Evans 2012). And as he refers to RWP, Evans concludes that “the better news is that a way forward has opened up” (Evans 2012).

He may have been overly optimistic. The sad reality is that the world has not become a safer place as a consequence of military interventions, whether unilaterally orchestrated and carried out, as in Iraq, or multilaterally conceived and executed by a military alliance, as in Libya. In systemic terms, they have increased the level of mistrust among key actors within the international community, thereby limiting the scope for constructive diplomacy and responsible collective action. Syria has been a particularly tragic victim of such systemic breakdown. As a former Special Representative of the Secretary-General, Youssef Mahmoud points out: “while many states may not have measured up to their people’s democratic aspirations, ill-advised military interventions by global and regional powers have made our world less secure and ushered more uncertain and perilous times for us all” (Mahmoud 2016).

Are we to conclude that current ideas on collective security and collective responsibility are inadequate in themselves? Or should the international community at large, or individual states, be blamed for a manifest inability to translate the provisions of the UN Charter and the 2005 consensus on R2P into interventions that promote improved stability? It should be noted that both the UN Charter and the agreed language on the responsibility to protect contemplate intervention as a last resort. The RWP proposal, in turn, has added the essential point that under no circumstance can the use of force generate more harm than it was authorized to prevent. No doubt, neither the exercise of collective security nor of collective responsibility is served by military adventurism.

Enhanced multilateral cooperation for the promotion of international peace and security can be achieved within the course laid out by the UN Charter as well as by new notions on the exercise of our collective responsibility in the face of mass atrocities. In theory a multipolar world, such as the one that is emerging, could be more conducive than a unipolar or bipolar geopolitical distribution of power to a renewed adherence to the letter and spirit of international agreements. If no individual nation can singlehandedly impose its will and determine outcomes militarily in today’s world, it follows that unilateralism becomes particularly dangerous, as it encourages disregard toward international obligations by all. The deleterious anarchical results of a surge in unilateralism, in a multipolar world, are not difficult to imagine.

A collective reaffirmation by member states of their commitment to multilateralism is the most responsible way forward. This will necessarily involve a correct understanding of the limits to what military intervention can accomplish and a readiness to learn the right lessons from past experience. Adjustments will be necessary, including a reform of the Security Council capable of conferring enhanced legitimacy to its decisions. There should also be scope for conceptual refinement. Perhaps collective responsibility should be operationalized exclusively within a Chapter VI framework. In turn, military intervention, for reasons that may include the protection of civilians, would automatically fall under a revised Chapter VII, with stricter procedures for monitoring compliance with Security Council mandates and observance of international humanitarian law.

The challenge that presents itself to the international community in the wake of Iraq, Libya, and Syria is perhaps best summarized by the wise words of a former President of the International Court of Justice, Mohamed Bedjaoui:

The task is to subject the use of force to ever more rigorous discipline, to confirm and develop the rules which fortify just recourse to it, eliminate the practices which lead it astray and to endow such recourse with the respect and recognition it inevitably arouses when it serves to found order upon justice. (Bedjaoui 1993)

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Protection of Civilians

- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Annan, K. (2003). Address to the 58th general assembly of the United Nations. New York: United Nations. Available on <https://www.un.org/webcast/ga/58/statements/sg2eng030923.htm>. Accessed on 18th March 2020.
- Annan, K. (2005). In larger freedom: Towards development, security and human rights for all. New York: United Nations. Document A/59/2005, March 21st 2005. Available on <https://undocs.org/A/59/2005>. Accessed on March 18th 2020.
- Ban, K.-m. (2009). Implementing the responsibility to protect. New York: United Nations. Document A/63/677, January 19th 2009.
- Ban, K.-m. (2012). Address to Stanley Foundation conference on the responsibility to protect. Nova York: United Nations. Available on <https://www.un.org/sg/en/content/sg/speeches/2012-01-18/address-stanley-foundation-conference-responsibility-protect>. Accessed on March 16 2020.
- Bedjaoui, M. (1993). The New World order and the security council: Testing the legality of its acts (p. 6). Dordrecht: Martinus Nijhoff Publisher.
- Evans, G. (2012). Responsibility While Protecting. Project Syndicate (worldwide distribution), 27th January 2012.
- International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty. (2001). The responsibility to protect. Ottawa: International Development Research Centre. Available on <http://responsibilitytoprotect.org/ICISS%20Report.pdf>. Accessed on 18 March 2020.
- Kissinger, H. (1994). Diplomacy. New York: Simon & Schuster.
- Mahmoud, Y. (2016). Afterword: Imperfect states, borderless ills and restive citizenry. In PURI, Hardeep Singh. Perilous interventions: The security council and the politics of chaos (pp. 203–210). New Delhi: HarperCollins Publishers.
- Puri, H. S. (2016). Perilous interventions: The security council and the politics of chaos. New Delhi: HarperCollins Publishers.
- UN General Assembly – Security Council. (2011). Letter dated 9 November 2011 from the Permanent Representative of Brazil to United Nations addressed to the Secretary General. New York: United Nations. Document A/66/551 – S/2011/701. Available on <https://undocs.org/A/66/551>. Accessed on 29 March 2020.
- UN High level panel of experts on Threats, Challenges and Changes. (2004). A more secure world: Our shared responsibility report of the secretary-General's high-level panel on threats, challenges and change. New York: United Nations. Available on https://www.un.org/en/events/pastevents/a_more_secure_world.shtml. Accessed on 18 March 2020.
- UN Resolution 60/1. (2005). World Summit outcome. New York: United Nations. Document A/RES/60/1.
- UN Secretary-General report on early warning, assessment and the responsibility to protect. (2010). United Nations. New York. Available on <https://www.un.org/ruleoflaw/blog/document/report-of-the-secretary-general-early-warning-assessment-and-the-responsibility-to-protect/>. Accessed on 18 March 2020.
- UN Security Council Resolution 1970. (2011). United Nations, New York. Available on https://www.undocs.org/S/RES/1970%20\(2011\)). Accessed on 19 March 2020.
- UN Security Council Resolution 1973. (2011). United Nations. New York. 2011. Available on https://www.undocs.org/S/RES/1973%20\(2011\)). Accessed on 19 March 2020.
- United Nations. (1992). Chapter 28. Decision of 31 January 1992 (3046th meeting of the Security Council). The responsibility of the Security Council in the maintenance of international peace and security. In Repertoire of the practice of the security council (pp 813–822). New York. <https://www.un.org/securitycouncil/content/repertoire/structure>. Accessed on 18th March 2020.
- United Nations Security Council Resolution 687. (1991). United Nations, New York. Available on <http://unscre.com/en/resolutions/doc/687>. Accessed on 19 March 2020.
- United Nations Security Council resolution 688. (1991). United Nations, New York. Available on <http://unscre.com/en/resolutions/doc/688>. Accessed on 19 March 2020.

Further Reading

- Annan, K. (2012). Interventions – A life in war and peace. New York: The Penguin Press.
- Patriota, A. d. A. (1997). O Conselho de Segurança após a Guerra do Golfo: a articulação de um novo paradigma de segurança coletiva. In Tese ao XXXIII Curso de Altos Estudos do Instituto Rio Branco (2nd ed.). Brasília: Fundação Alexandre de Gusmão, 2010.

Colombia

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Josefina Echavarría Alvarez¹, Elise Ditta², Juanita Esguerra-Rezk^{2,3} and Patrick
McQuestion²

¹Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies,
Peace Accords Matrix Program, Colombian
Implementation Barometer Initiative, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

²Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, Keough School of Global Affairs, University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, IN, USA

³Peace and Development Research, School of Global Studies, Gothenburg University, Gothenburg, Sweden

Synonyms

Colombia; Comparative peace research; Monitoring and evaluation; Peace agreement design; Peace agreement implementation; Peacebuilding

Description

In 2016, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia – People’s Army (FARC-EP) guerrilla movement and the Government of Colombia signed the “Final Agreement to End the Conflict and Build a Sustainable and Lasting Peace” aiming to comprehensively address the causes and effects of the armed confrontation that lasted for more than five decades. This entry briefly contextualizes the Final Agreement’s negotiations and approval process and describes its unique characteristics, such as the territorial approach, gender and ethnic intersectionality, and structural interdependency. It also provides a summary of the six chapters structuring the agreement text, which include comprehensive rural reform, political participation, end of the armed conflict, illicit drugs, transitional justice for victims, and implementation monitoring and verification. The final section provides an assessment of the first years of implementation.

Introduction

In December 2016, Colombia’s National Government, led by President Juan Manuel Santos (2010–2018), signed a comprehensive peace agreement with the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia – People’s Army (FARC-EP), putting an end to Latin America’s oldest guerrilla movement. With more than 300 pages, the “Final Agreement to End the Conflict and Build a Sustainable and Lasting Peace” (Final Agreement, hereafter) commits the signatory parties to alleviating vital socioeconomic and security issues, including rural reforms to improve the accessibility and use of land, as well as demobilization and reincorporation of ex-combatant troops to civilian life. Additional pillars of the agreement include transitional justice mechanisms, political participation measures, and a holistic solution to the problem of illegal drugs.

Peace negotiations extended over 4 years and took place primarily in Havana, Cuba. The governments of Cuba and Norway acted as guarantors, while Venezuela and Chile accompanied the process as facilitators. At the center of the negotiations were the victims of the armed conflict: approximately 8 million people, among them 4 million internally displaced persons (IDP) and 30,000 persons who had been kidnapped (CNMH 2013). A subcommittee for gender issues was formed, which reviewed the whole agreement in order to assure affirmative measures for advancing the rights of women as well as LGBTI and other sexually diverse persons. In addition to this emphasis on gender rights, a subcommittee on ethnic diversity evaluated the commitments in light of cultural and geographic particularities. Thirdly, negotiators used a “territorial peace” strategy to frame the writing of the agreement.

Territorial peace is a form of peacebuilding characterized by collective construction from the bottom-up, involving local and national governments, private and business sectors, organizations and communities, the Church, educational institutions, and individual citizens (Bautista 2015; Cairo et al. 2018). It emphasizes the areas most affected by the armed conflict and acts as a bridge for dialogues between the capital city and rural areas. For the Final Agreement, negotiators intentionally utilized territorial peace to instigate profound positive transformations after the decades-long conflict.

Despite these efforts to make the peace agreement amenable to all Colombians, political and public discussions in the country about the benefits or drawbacks of the peace agreement were highly polarized. Polarization for and against the peace agreement reached its apex when the agreement was subject to a popular referendum on October 2, 2016. The “NO” vote won, forcing the government and negotiators in Havana to open a 6-week-long dialogue with the critics of the peace agreement to review the text in light of their demands.

Once the text was revised, the Final Agreement was submitted to Colombian Congress for approval on November 30, 2016, marking December 1 as the first day of implementation. Since that moment, many of the agreement’s commitments have been met, as reported by official monitors such as the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, who is charged with providing technical support for monitoring as well (Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies 2018, 2019, 2020).

The following sections offer more background on the Colombian peace process, describe in detail the contents of the Final Agreement, and provide an initial assessment of implementation since December 2016. Gender, ethnic, and territorial peace approaches frame the six chapters of the Final Agreement, namely, comprehensive rural reform, political participation, end of the conflict, solution to illegal drug-related activities, victims of the armed conflict, and monitoring and verification. Lastly, an assessment of the first 3 years of implementation of the Final Agreement indicates that while demobilization has been largely successful and elements of transitional justice have been activated, important land reforms and socioeconomic initiatives present ongoing challenges for implementation.

Background

The history and relations between the Colombian Government and illegally armed groups, such as the FARC-EP guerrillas, contain important precedents that inform the negotiations and text of the 2016 Final Agreement. During the 1990s and early 2000s, multiple presidential administrations engaged in negotiations, demobilization, and peace processes with a range of illegally armed groups, such as the M-19 guerrillas at the beginning of the 1990s and the United Self-Defense (AUC) paramilitary forces between 2003 and 2006. These procedures provided Colombian governments and society with heuristic experiences in disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration of former combatants. Additionally, before and during these processes, a large number of human rights organizations, peace community strongholds, and peace zones survived and thrived with the support of the transnational networks and partners (Hancock and Mitchell 2007; Mouly and Hernández 2019; Bueno 2017; Lederach and Lederach 2014; Echavarría et al. 2019).

One of the key institutional precedents borne out of previous negotiations was the National Commission for Reparation and Reconciliation (CNRR), created by the Peace and Justice Law (Law 975/2005), which later became the National Center for Historical Memory (CNMH) in 2010. The CNMH has provided the public with relevant transitional justice research in the form of documentaries and written reports. The pedagogical character of their research has contributed to raising awareness about the consequences of civil war and the centrality of the victims of armed violence (CNMH 2013).

Previous governments had engaged with the FARC-EP in peace negotiations as well. During the Presidency of Andrés Pastrana (1998–2002), the FARC-EP guerrilla and government forces created a large demilitarized zone in the Southern region of Colombia called El Caguán, for the purposes of negotiating demobilization of the armed group. Three years later, negotiations for a ceasefire had floundered, and the government accused guerrilla forces of negotiating in bad faith (Echavarría 2010). Although no peace agreement was signed, the Caguán experience provided future negotiation teams with more clarity on communication norms and other lessons, such as setting a narrow and stable agenda of conversations from the beginning (Arias 2016). On the other hand, El Caguán was detrimental for building trust between the guerrillas and Colombian society. Years later, public opinion makers and political movements in Colombia would make parallels between El Caguán and the Havana negotiations, accusing the guerrillas of negotiating in bad faith their intention to demobilize, utilizing the process to distract attention from their operations, and allowing them to build reinforcements, gain new allies, and generate resources for continuing the armed conflict (Gómez-Suárez 2017; Hernández 2019).

The international community has studied experiences in Colombia and in other places around the world, preparing states and organizations to serve as key supporters of negotiating parties, especially during moments of distress (Jaramillo 2016; Santos 2019). Best practices and insights derived from other intrastate peace agreements in the United Kingdom, El Salvador, South Africa, and Angola, for instance, were utilized explicitly by negotiators and mediators in Havana (Arias 2016; Hernández 2019). Following insights from international experiences, civil society groups were included in the negotiations and in the process of peacebuilding itself, making citizen participation one of the most distinctive features of the Final Agreement.

Negotiating Table and Major Issue Areas

Negotiations began secretly in February 2012. In August of the same year, President Juan Manuel Santos announced in television broadcasts that the government and FARC-EP delegations were preparing public peace negotiations. Although the beginning of the process was announced in Oslo, Norway, the primary location chosen for the negotiations was Havana, Cuba, where the parties would meet over the course of 4 years. Under the slogan “Nothing is agreed, until everything is agreed,” President Santos framed the contours of the negotiations. The government and FARC-EP negotiating teams agreed on a fixed agenda, centered on six themes that would later become the chapters of the Final Agreement. Victims were at the heart of political, economic, and social transformations envisioned in the negotiations. Negotiators invited victims to Havana to inform and assist the design of commitments related to transitional justice. Moreover, civil society forums and groups were invited to actively participate in the negotiations as a means of assuring popular support for the agreements and creating conditions for territorial peacebuilding.

Throughout the 4 years of consultative negotiations, drafts of the agreement’s chapters were released to the public for the purposes of transparency. Those designing the accord incorporated gender, ethnic, and territorial approaches to commitments in all major issue areas in order to guarantee the rights of marginalized groups especially affected by the armed conflict. Although each chapter centers on a particular theme, they are interdependent – that is, the success of initiatives in one chapter often depends on the success of initiatives in other chapters. The following paragraphs provide summaries of the six chapters as they appear in the 2016 Final Agreement.

Chapter 1. A New Countryside: Comprehensive Rural Reform

Comprehensive Rural Reform (RRI) requires structural transformations in land management and investment for the purposes of improving socioeconomic conditions in rural areas and reverting historical inequities and marginalization that have fueled the armed conflict in Colombia. In order to eradicate rural poverty and improve the well-being of rural populations, RRI incorporates three main components: land access and use, Development Plans with a Territorial Focus (PDET), and National Plans for Comprehensive Rural Reform.

The first component includes commitments to democratize land access, especially for vulnerable communities such as ethnic groups and rural women. It creates a Land Fund for the distribution of 3 million hectares over 12 years, as well as special subsidies and credit lines to purchase land. Other measures include a Mass Formalization Plan for small- and medium-sized properties, mechanisms to resolve land ownership and use disputes, the creation of a new agrarian jurisdiction, and the multipurpose cadaster (or land survey) to update the information on rural properties. The accord also includes a few commitments related to the closure of the agricultural frontier and the protection of special environmental areas.

The second components of RRI are the PDETs, whose purpose is to provide consolidated investment for the regions most affected by the armed conflict. In conjunction with territorial authorities, participatory forums in the territories will guarantee that community priorities are reflected in Action Plans for Regional Transformation (PATR). In addition, this component stipulates that local communities are to participate in the execution of small infrastructure projects and exercise oversight.

Finally, the third component of RRI is National Plans for improving access to public goods and services in rural areas. With the objective of overcoming poverty in rural areas, plans center on improving infrastructure, irrigation, healthcare, education, and housing, among other issues. They also include stimulus packages for agricultural production initiatives and technical assistance for cooperative economies, credits for income generation activities, as well as measures to formalize the labor market. Many of the initiatives contained in these plans are prioritized in PDET municipalities.

Overall, the RRI acknowledges the core role of small-scale family-run, community-based, and campesino economies in the development of the Colombian countryside. The protection and affirmative measures for women and ethnic communities in this process are also highlighted in this chapter, given the disproportionate impacts of violence they have suffered. These provisions included in this chapter are envisioned as key for territorial transformation and social inclusion that will revert structural issues underlying the armed conflict, especially of those who have existed on the fringes of development and have been most affected by the armed conflict.

Chapter 2. Political Participation: Democracy for Peacebuilding

The agreement's second chapter is guided by basic principles of democratic pluralism and social justice within the context of demobilization and reconciliation. This chapter contains a wide range of topics, from protecting and empowering women, to providing organizational support for political parties, to modernizing electoral systems. It is organized into three main subsections: rights and security measures for political associations, mechanisms for participation, and democracy promotion.

The chapter's first subsection contains legislative and structural measures for improving political rights and security guarantees. First, a special commission of political parties and social organizations is to design a political opposition statute for congressional approval. In line with Article 112 of the Constitution, this statute should provide a regulatory framework for parties to oppose political agendas and for social organizations to express dissidence towards government policies. Second, the government is to create a Comprehensive Security System for Political Participation (SISEP) which includes an early warning system for monitoring perceived risks to human rights defenders and social movement leaders in rural territories.

The second subsection identifies specific mechanisms for enhancing democratic participation. First, it commits the government to drafting legislation guaranteeing free association and social movement rights, as well as peaceful mobilization and protest. Secondly, it outlines civic engagement initiatives for oversight and access to information, participatory budgeting, as well as community access radio, television, and other media. Thirdly, this subsection calls for a national-level Dialogue Council for recommending participatory legislation standards, national- and territorial-level Reconciliation and Coexistence Councils for training in nonviolent dialogue, and Territorial Planning Councils for participatory budgeting and development plans.

Finally, the third subsection promotes democratic participation at all levels of government. It includes specific measures for party formalization and financing, voter registration and access to polls, electoral transparency and reform, democracy training initiatives, as well as a cable channel for parties and movements to engage in peaceful, nondiscriminatory exchange of ideas. It also calls for the creation of 16 special transitional peace districts (CTEP) allowing affected territories to have national-level representation in congress, as well as a transversal focus guaranteeing women equal representation in organizations, parties, councils, and programs.

Chapter 3. Ceasefire, Definitive End of Bilateral Hostilities, and Demobilization

The third chapter creates the security conditions to allow for the implementation of the other chapters in the accord. More specifically, it contains a series of measures to assure a bilateral ceasefire, demobilization of FARC-EP, and laying down of arms. The chapter also details reintegration and security measures for FARC-EP ex-combatants and creates mechanisms to address criminal organizations more generally.

The first section of Chapter 3 defines the terms for a bilateral ceasefire and definitive end to the hostilities between the Colombian Armed Forces (including both the Military and National Police) and the FARC-EP. It also outlines the process of ex-combatant relocation into temporary cantonment zones. As stipulated in the agreement, this process is to be supervised by a Tripartite Monitoring and Verification Mechanism made up of the National Government, FARC-EP representatives, and an unarmed United Nations political mission.

This chapter also contains details regarding the political and economic reintegration of FARC-EP members into civilian life. For political integration, this section contains measures for the FARC-EP organization to transition into a political party, guaranteeing them access to resources as well as five seats in both the Colombian House and Senate during two congressional sessions starting on July 20, 2018.

In terms of social and economic reintegration, the third chapter details a registration and accreditation procedure for FARC-EP ex-combatants. It states that the national government will provide a one-time “normalization” allowance for FARC-EP ex-combatants and monthly subsidies for 24 months, along with appropriate healthcare, education, and job training resources. In addition, FARC-EP ex-combatants are to receive funds to implement collective or individual livelihood projects.

Finally, Chapter 3 includes security provisions for FARC-EP members as well as initiatives to combat criminal organizations that attack human rights advocates, social movements, or political associations. In order to do this, the agreement calls for the government to create specialized institutions and security programs, including new divisions in the Attorney General’s Office and National Police, a National Security Guarantees Commission, a Comprehensive Security System for Political Participation (SISEP) to protect FARC-EP ex-combatants and other vulnerable political actors, as well as new community protection plans.

Chapter 4. Solution to the Illicit Drugs Problem

The fourth chapter contains measures to prevent the cultivation of illicit use crops as well as the production and sale of illicit drugs which have fueled and financed the Colombian armed conflict for decades. This chapter contains comprehensive responses to these issues, such as a national plan for voluntary crop substitution, assistance for drug users, and strategies against organized crime involved in drug trafficking.

In order to generate voluntary crop substitution among farmers, the agreement introduces a National Comprehensive Program for the Substitution of Crops Used for Illicit Purposes (PNIS). This program requires a planning process to create collective livelihood solutions that will later be compiled into comprehensive community-based and municipal plans for substitution and alternative agrarian development. In this sense, PNIS is complementary to RRI (Chapter 1) in that the solution to the problem of illicit drugs requires overcoming rural poverty. Additionally, the prioritized PDET territories overlap with many of those affected by illicit use crops, meaning both initiatives must be coordinated. Finally, to support small-scale farmers, this chapter also commits to special judicial treatment for those who are or have been involved in the cultivation of illicit use crops.

Chapter 4 also includes commitments related to public health and drug use prevention. It calls for the government to establish a National Program for Comprehensive Intervention on Illicit Drug Use as a high-level body charged with coordinating and overseeing a countrywide participatory review process of current policies addressing drug use. With the aim of improving treatment and rehabilitation care given to drug users, this chapter also contains a National Assistance System for Illicit Drug Users, including a special emphasis on gender issues.

Lastly, the fourth chapter incorporates commitments aimed at reducing the production and sale of narcotics. With regard to criminal policy, the government commits to strengthening the capacity of judicial institutions for investigation, prosecution, and punishment of crimes associated with illicit drug production and trafficking. As part of the commitment to stepping up the fight against organized crime, the chapter contains a strategy to seize assets from those convicted of drug trafficking, money laundering, and corruption.

Chapter 5. Agreement Regarding the Victims of the Conflict: Comprehensive System for Truth, Justice, Reparations, and Non-recurrence

The Comprehensive System for Truth, Justice, Reparations, and Non-Recurrence (SIVJRNR) contains both judicial mechanisms to investigate and sanction crimes committed in the context of the armed conflict and extrajudicial measures designed to clarify related events, search for people who have disappeared, and assure reparations for victims.

The SIVJRNR creates a judicial body called the Special Jurisdiction for Peace (JEP). This body receives and reviews requests from FARC-EP ex-combatants and members of the military and police forces applying for amnesty or pardon for an action committed during the armed conflict. In exchange for complete and honest testimony of their actions, applicants will receive amnesty or abbreviated sanctions, which may include reparations for their victims. If testimonies are proven to be incomplete, the JEP will investigate the evidence surrounding these cases and submit the individual to an adversarial trial.

The SIVJRNR also contains the Truth, Coexistence, and Non-Recurrence Commission, an extrajudicial body made up of eleven magistrates charged with procuring testimonies from victims and perpetrators of the armed conflict. These testimonies will be compiled in a final report for the clarification of the truth around the armed conflict.

In order to collect information on the dimensions of armed conflict victims, the SIVJRNR creates the Unit for the Search for Persons Deemed as Missing in the context of the armed conflict. This extrajudicial body will coordinate with existing search efforts to establish the universe of people disappeared during the armed conflict and, when possible, assure the dignified return of remains to family members of the disappeared.

Finally, Chapter 5 includes reparations and non-repetition measures. Reparations initiatives are based in large part on the existing system for Victims Reparations created in Colombia before the signing of the Final Accord. These measures include collective reparations, individual and collective land restitution programs, and psychosocial care, among others. Included as well are guarantees for non-repetition of the armed conflict, which include provisions for updating the National Human Rights Plan and for providing increasing protections for human rights leaders.

Chapter 6. Implementation, Verification, and Public Endorsement

The sixth and final chapter of the Final Agreement includes fundamental safeguards and monitoring measures for implementation of the accords. Its main contents include a joint Government – FARC-EP “Follow-up, Promotion, and Verification Commission” (CSIVI), an Ethnic Chapter designed to provide guarantees for indigenous peoples during implementation, and an international verification and accompaniment component. In addition to these features, the sixth chapter includes communication and dissemination tools for promotion of the Agreement, as well as a referendum clause, subjecting the agreement to modification if necessary.

The primary monitoring mechanism for the Agreement is the CSIVI, a bilateral entity providing oversight, coordinated action, and verification. Internally made up of three representatives from the national government and three representatives of the FARC-EP, the CSIVI is the official site for conflict resolution at all stages of implementation. In order to facilitate the first 12 months of implementation, the CSIVI is to support priority legislation related to amnesty, transitory constitutional provisions, paramilitary organization dismantling, as well as victims and land restitution. Additionally, for the purposes of assisting policymaking decisions and transparency over time, the CSIVI is tasked with designing a comprehensive Implementation Framework Plan (PMI) that includes policy indicators and accord timelines to be revised annually.

A second major monitoring initiative in the sixth chapter is the Ethnic Chapter, which introduces international human rights conventions and specific measures to protect indigenous groups once the agreement is underway. In order to address the legacy of colonialism, discrimination, land dispossession, and armed violence affecting indigenous peoples in Colombia, this section calls for informed consultation procedures for each point of the agreement, with guaranteed representation of ethnic groups in land reforms, security and reincorporation procedures, as well as implementation monitoring.

Finally, among the major implementation mechanisms of the sixth chapter are the international verification and accompaniment components for the Final Agreement. These international components are designed to provide objective and transparent technical and material support for implementation. The international verification component is composed of two notables whose primary objective is to gather evidence from local organizations, as well as two major Colombian think tanks (CINEP and CERAC) and the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies, which should draft and submit periodic verification reports to the international notables. With regard to international accompaniment, the negotiating parties solicit 23 foreign governments and organizations to provide technical and material resources as well as objective periodic assessments of implementation for each major accord theme.

Referendum and Congressional Approval

Shortly after announcing the peace talks in 2012, President Santos decided that the ratification of the peace agreement required a plebiscite or referendum by popular vote. The announcement of the referendum towards the end of the negotiations initiated a political battle that occurred in parallel to the Havana peace talks (Echavarría and Hamed 2016).

Led by former President Uribe, critics of the Havana negotiations cast doubt on the real intentions of the FARC-EP to demobilize. Opposition to the affirmative gender considerations in the agreement was also virulent. Former Ombudsman Alejandro Ordoñez accused the negotiation teams in Havana of supporting a “gender ideology,” by which he meant a sexual revolution that undermined the heteronormative ideal of the family (Gómez-Suárez 2017). Evangelical Churches were instrumental in strengthening a public discourse that considered the peace agreement an affront to traditional religious teaching and good morals (Daşlı et al. 2018).

Despite the conservative tone among those who disapproved of the peace agreement, the “NO” movement was not monolithic. Diverse claims and demands were made in opposition to the agreement. For instance, some cited the absence of a complete inventory of the wealth and assets accrued by the guerrillas through illegal means not limited to the illicit drug trade. Others, such as victim associations, found the transitional justice system inadequate for attending reparation and reconciliation needs (Gómez-Suárez 2016). The criticisms were directed as much to the peace agreement as towards President Santos himself, who registered one of the lowest popularity rates in Latin America (Echavarría et al. 2019). Furthermore, investigations have alleged that the manager of the “NO” campaign, Juan Carlos Vélez, propagated fake news in order to discredit the peace agreement (Gómez-Suárez 2017).

Those campaigning for the “YES” vote in the referendum were also heterogeneous. Those in favor of the agreement included Santos supporters but also a large number of social organizations advocating victims’ rights, LGBTQI groups, pacifists, as well as religious groups that interpreted the peace agreement as aligned with the moral teachings of the Church (Hernández 2019). The pedagogy required by the “YES” campaign to not only socialize but create ownership among the general population around the agreement, however, exceeded their capacity. The length of the text and an ineffective communications strategy failed in convincing the majority of the population (Gómez-Suárez 2017; Echavarría and Cremin 2019).

Divisions and polarization became evident when on Sunday, October 2, 2016, rejection of the peace agreement won by a slim margin over approval of the agreement, with a total of 50% versus 49%, respectively (Alvarez-Vanegas et al. 2016). After the initial shock of the news subsided, the movement in support of the agreement mobilized thousands of people around the country and globally. In a public announcement that may have won him the Nobel Peace Prize, President Santos and the government’s negotiation team invited the leaders of the “NO” movement to put their criticisms in writing and accompany negotiators in Havana (Echavarría and Hamed 2016). Over 6 weeks, negotiators and critics revised the controversial sections of the text, until finally, on November 24, 2016, a revised text was presented to the public and approved in Congress. Despite consensus among the opposition and congress around the final version of the agreement, similar levels of polarization have continued into the implementation phase.

Conclusion, Implementation, and Peacebuilding

Just as the design of the Final Agreement involved extensive negotiations and polarization, implementation requires coordination and trade-offs

among key stakeholders. For citizens, effects of the Final Agreement are felt in varying degrees of immediacy; for politicians, the agreement may represent a political boon or burden; and for technicians and evaluators, monitoring and evidence of the provisions are subject to different methodologies. Despite obstacles in implementation (Kroc Institute 2019), the agreement itself provides a new framework for building peace at the regional level, enriched by the local peacebuilding efforts that existed before 2016 and informing efforts that will continue afterwards.

Given its 15-year implementation period, the agreement requires planning procedures that assure commitments are kept over time. For these purposes, the Implementation Framework Plan translates the agreement’s commitments into public policy, with strategic and monitoring tasks that may improve continuity during presidential and congressional transitions. Nevertheless, securing resources and cooperation from domestic and international actors going forward is an evolving process, with multiple arenas and contested discussions around how implementation will be funded over time (Contraloría 2017).

Alongside these discussions, the agreement’s provisions have been implemented at varying rates. For example, demobilization and disarmament have occurred relatively rapidly in the first 2 years of implementation (United Nations 2017), while programs related to social reform are projected to take more than 10 years according to government planning documents (Departamento Nacional de Planeación 2018). Although this is in line with trends in other contexts, the proportion of non-security-related provisions in the Colombian Agreement is very high (about 90%), meaning that implementation will be characterized by the territorial nature of many commitments (Joshi et al. 2015). The future of implementation will require balancing regional development and civic participation initiatives while assuring progress in demobilization and reincorporation is not lost.

Despite relatively successful demobilization, security issues remain a major concern for human rights defenders and former combatants, threatening implementation of the agreement.

Various armed groups continue operations in Colombia and in some cases block territorial commitments from being fulfilled (Fundación Ideas para la Paz 2018). This phenomenon is not unique to Colombia – many countries with comprehensive peace agreements have seen violence committed by dissident groups after the signing of a peace accord (Darby 2001). Implementation itself, though, may help to address dissidence to some degree. Studies show that levels of recruitment to dissident groups increase where there is a generalized perception that the government is not fulfilling its implementation commitments (Darby 2001). In addition, empirical investigations indicate that countries reaching higher levels of implementation have a lower probability of conflicts with other armed groups in the future (Quinn et al. 2019).

The Colombian Peace Agreement has established new standards for comprehensive gender, ethnic, and territorial measures, setting high expectations for implementation as well. By achieving a comprehensive and timely implementation, Colombia will be able to demonstrate that it is an example not only in terms of peace negotiations but also in implementation, transformation, and peacebuilding.

Summary

In 2016, the Government of Colombia and the FARC-EP guerrilla signed the “Final Agreement to End the Conflict and Build a Sustainable and Lasting Peace” (Final Accord), resolving to conclude their decades-long violent confrontation, address the structural conditions that precipitated the conflict and ameliorate its damaging impact on society. Key lessons from past negotiations with guerrilla movements and paramilitary groups – such as a fixed agenda for negotiation and international facilitation and guarantors – were crucial for the success of the peace talks in Havana, Cuba. The Final Accord was drafted over a period of 4 years, and it incorporates unique approaches for addressing gender, ethnic, and territorial dimensions of the armed conflict, an example of intersectional peacebuilding. With over 300 pages of text and hundreds of individual commitments, the Accord is organized into six chapters: comprehensive rural reform, political participation, end of the armed conflict, illicit drugs, transitional justice for victims, and implementation, monitoring, and verification. While each chapter contributes holistic solutions to entrenched socioeconomic, political, and legal problems underlying the history of violence in Colombia, translating these commitments into practice has been a challenging exercise in coordination among governmental agencies, civil society organizations, and international actors. Multi-party monitoring and verification mechanisms accompanying the Accord have gathered evidence showing that, in the first 3 years of implementation, demobilization has largely succeeded and elements of transitional justice have begun; however, important land reforms and socio-economic commitments will require additional concerted effort from the Colombian government and civil society, along with the support from the international community in the mid- and long term.

Cross-References

- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Álvarez-Vanegas, E., Garzón-Vergara, J.C., & Bernal, J. L. (2016). Voting for peace: Understanding the victory of “no”. Wilson Center, Latin American Program and Fundación Ideas para la Paz (FIP). https://www.wilsoncenter.org/sites/default/files/media/documents/article/voting_for_peace_wwc-fip_final_english.pdf
- Álvarez-Vanegas, E., Pardo Calderón, D., & Cajiao Vélez, A. (2018). Trayectorias y dinámicas territoriales de las disidencias de las FARC. Fundación Ideas para la Paz. http://ideaspaz.org/media/website/FIP_Disidencias_Final.pdf

- Arias, G. (2016). Contexto Histórico: Lecciones Aprendidas para la Paz, en Diplomado Paz a la Acción. Escuela Superior de Administración Pública.
- Bautista, D. (2015). Paz Territorial. Escuela Superior de Administración Pública ESAP.
- Bueno, M. A. (2017). Políticas públicas de reconciliación: Un reto posible en la construcción y la sostenibilidad de la paz en Colombia. Análisis Político 90, Universidad Nacional de Colombia.
- Cairo, H., et al. (2018). 'Territorial peace': The emergence of a concept in Colombia's peace negotiations. Geopolitics, 23(2). <https://doi.org/10.1080/14650045.2018.1425110>.
- CNMH (Centro Nacional de Memoria Histórica). (2013). ¡Basta ya! Colombia: Memorias de guerra y dignidad. Centro Nacional de Memoria Histórica. <http://www.centrodememoriahistorica.gov.co/descargas/informes2013/bastaYa/basta-ya-colombia-memorias-de-guerra-y-dignidad-2016.pdf>
- Contraloría General de la República. (2017). Ejecución de los recursos y cumplimiento de las metas del Componente para la Paz del Plan Plurianual de Inversiones. <https://www.contraloria.gov.co/documentos/20181/787219/Ejecuci%C3%B3n+de+los+recursos+y+el+cumplimiento+de+las+metas+del+componente+para+la+Paz+del+Plan+Plurianual+de+Inversiones-2017.pdf/bcf7cbb8-e623-4d3d-a6e4-aac1d519c0b3>
- Darby, J. (2001). The effects of violence on peace processes. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Daşlı, G., et al. (2018). Peace and gender: The Colombian peace process. Ankara: Research Center for Peace, Democracy and Alternative Politics.
- Departamento Nacional de Planeación. (2018). Plan Marco de Implementación del Acuerdo Final para la terminación del conflicto y la construcción de una paz estable y duradera. https://colaboracion.dnp.gov.co/CDT/Conpes/Econ%C3%B3micos/3932_Anexo%20B_Plan%20Marco%20de%20Implementaci%C3%B3n%20\(PMI\).pdf.pdf)
- Echavarría, J. (2010). Insecurity in Colombia: Writing political identities in the democratic security policy. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Echavarría, J., & Cremin, H. (2019). Education for territorial peace in Colombia: What role for transnational peace? Journal of Peace Education, 16(3). <https://doi.org/10.1080/17400201.2019.1697068>.
- Echavarría, J., & Hamed, A. (2016). Nein zum Referendum, Ja zum Frieden. Tiroler Tageszeitung.
- Echavarría, J., Molden, B., & Harnoncourt, J. (2019). Wahlen und Weichenstellungen in Lateinamerika 2018: Eine länderspezifische Analyse. Vienna: University of Vienna and Austrian Latin American Institut – LAI.
- Gómez-Suárez, A. (2016). El Triunfo del No: La Paradoja Emocional Detrás del Plebiscito. Bogotá: Ícono.
- Gómez-Suárez, A. (2017). Peace process pedagogy: Lessons from the no-vote victory in the Colombian peace referendum. Comparative Education, 53(3). <https://doi.org/10.1080/03050068.2017.1334425>.
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. (Eds.). (2007). Zones of peace. Bloomfield: Kumarian Press.
- Hernández, E. (2019). Del limbo al acuerdo final de paz. El proceso de paz entre el Gobierno Santos y las Farc-EP. Bucaramanga: Universidad Autónoma de Bucaramanga.
- Jaramillo, S. (2016). Prólogo: La Imaginación para la Paz. In La Imaginación Moral, Lederach, J.P. Semana Libros.
- Joshi, M., Quinn, J. M., & Regan, P. M. (2015). Annualized implementation data on intrastate comprehensive peace accords, 1989–2012. Journal of Peace Research, 52(4), 551–562.
- Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies. (2018). Segundo Informe sobre el Estado Efectivo de Implementación del Acuerdo de Paz en Colombia. Diciembre 2016 – mayo 2018. https://kroc.nd.edu/assets/284864/informe_2_instituto_kroc_final_with_logos.pdf
- Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies. (2019). State of implementation of the Colombian final accord: December 2016–April 2019. Executive Summary. https://kroc.nd.edu/assets/333274/executive_summary_colombia_print_single_2_pdf
- Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies. (2020). Tres años después de la firma del Acuerdo Final de Colombia: Hacia la transformación territorial. Informe cuatro. Diciembre 2018–Noviembre 2019. <http://peaceaccords.nd.edu/wp-content/uploads/2020/06/200630-Informe-4-final.pdf>
- Lederach, J. P., & Lederach, A. J. (2014). Cuando la Sangra y los Huesos Claman: Travesías por el paisaje sonoro de la curación y la reconciliación. Gernika-Lumo: Asociación de Investigación por la Paz Gernika Gogoratzu.
- Mouly, C., & Hernández, E. (Eds.). (2019). Civil resistance and violent conflict in Latin America. Mobilizing for rights. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Quinn, J., Joshi, M., & Melander, E. (2019). One dyadic peace leads to another? Conflict systems, terminations, and net reduction in fighting groups. International Studies Quarterly, 63(4), 863–875.
- Santos, J. M. (2019). La Batalla por la Paz: El largo camino para acabar el Conflicto con la guerrilla más Antigua del Mundo. Bogotá: Editorial Planeta.
- United Nations. (2017). Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Mission in Colombia. https://colombia.unmissions.org/sites/default/files/last_sg_report_on_the_un_mission_in_colombia_eng_0.pdf

Colonialism

► Post-Conflict Timor-Leste

Colonization

- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

Commemoration

- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice

Commemorations

- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

Common Security and Defence Policy

- ▶ European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The

Communitarian Peacebuilding

- ▶ Local Peacebuilding

Community Self-Protection

- ▶ Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Community-Based Organizations

- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding

Comparative Peace Research

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016

Complex Adaptive Systems

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Complexity

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Complexity Thinking

- ▶ Resilience and Peace

Compromise

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations

Paul F. Diehl
University of Texas-Dallas, Richardson,
TX, USA

Synonyms

Peace observation; Peacebuilding; Peacekeeping; Statebuilding

Description/Definition

Peace operations have changed significantly over time, reflecting new challenges and initiatives to address threats to international peace and security. This essay traces the evolution of peace operation concepts, primarily from peace observation to peacekeeping to peacebuilding. This progression occurs from the early years of the League of Nations to contemporary times. For each concept, there is a specification of the key conceptual components and the variations (e.g., “robust” peacekeeping) within the same category. As changes occur, how the new concepts differ from, and how they are similar to, their predecessors are identified. The reasons for the modifications are covered, and these include innovations in strategy, new security contexts, and changing political realities in the organizations deploying the peace operations.

Introduction

Over time, there have been a variety of terms or labels to describe peace operations: peacekeeping, peace observation, peacebuilding, “robust” peacekeeping, and statebuilding to name but a few of the most common ones. Some of these are used interchangeably, and more often lumped under the rubric of peacekeeping, implying that they are all the same. This is misleading. In fact, the different terms used reflect some fundamental differences even as they share commonalities. The change in terminology is not merely semantical and reflects the evolution of how international organizations and other agents have responded to threats to international peace and security over the last century.

This essay addresses the changes in terminology for peace operations over time. For each of the key terms, there is an analysis of the central components that make up the concept and some discussion of how they differ from their predecessors and some of the reasons for those changes. Note, however, that the analysis below might imply a linear transformation from one conceptualization and associated practice to another. This is not the case. Even as there have been shifts, for example, from peacekeeping to peacebuilding, the newer concept and practice incorporated elements of its predecessor. Furthermore, some older concepts persisted independently, in whole or in part, even as the modal practice reflected new conceptions of peace operations.

Peace Observation

Peace observation has its roots in the early twentieth century, corresponding with the creation of the League of Nations. Wainhouse (1966) lays out the conceptual elements of peace observation in the period following World War I. As is the case with later concepts of related ideas, peace observation is designed to “deter, discourage, prevent, or terminate threatened or actual hostilities” (1966: 2). This is a negative peace orientation (the absence of violence), as most conceptions of positive peace were largely unknown at the time (for a longer history, see Diehl 1994).

Peace observation stands in contrast to later kinds of peace operations in terms of composition. Observation teams initially did not consist of military units or soldiers, but rather individuals and staff appointed by international organization – the Secretary-General of the United Nations after 1945. As Wainhouse (1966) notes, the observer “team” could be a single individual assisted by a small staff. Thus, the size of the operation is not designed to have an impact on its effectiveness.

What do peace observation operations do? As the name suggests, the primary purpose is informational. Early peace observation efforts focused on fact-finding. For example, the Aaland Islands dispute between Sweden and Finland was the first instance under the League in which observers were dispatched in 1920 to gather information and make recommendations (which were ultimately accepted) on how to resolve the conflict. Article 12 of the League of Nations Covenant specifically mentions “enquiry” as an approach to peace as does Article 33 of the United Nations Charter. Fact-finding is also consistent with the conflict management efforts by regional organizations.

Even as fact-finding might be the core element of peace observation, it is not the only one in practice. As Wainhouse (1966) notes, there is great flexibility in how it is applied. Peace observation operations can and have included associated efforts at conciliation, mediation, and adjudication of disputes. Accordingly, the concept and practice can incorporate conflict resolution as well as conflict management. In a dispute between Poland and Germany over Upper Silesia, observers were sent to supervise a plebiscite in 1921 for the population living in the area. This foreshadows some future election supervision missions, outside of and under the rubric of peacekeeping, in later decades.

Peace observation includes some aspects that differentiate it from subsequent peacekeeping in terms of the principles of conduct. The operations involved considerably fewer and non-military personnel than would be the case under peacekeeping. Nevertheless, this evolved somewhat over time as national military forces were introduced to some operations and in the case of an operation sent to a dispute between Poland and Lithuania, the force numbered 1500. Peace observation did not operate strictly under the principle of host state consent, although cooperation among the disputants was expected and usually obtained. Neither was peace observation initially committed to staffing from states that had no political or strategic interest in the dispute; European states supplied observers to operations within that continent, even as their home states had deep political interests in the outcomes of the process. Nevertheless, the League observation operation in the Saar (internationally administered territory in the 1920s and 1930s) produced a series of recommendations from its commander, General John Brind, including one that personnel be drawn only from states without an interest in the conflict. The Saar operation also reflected the philosophy that use of military force would be minimal (only in self-defense) in monitoring a given area. In these ways, peace observation evolved in the direction of the fundamental pillars of peacekeeping (see discussion of “holy trinity” below) and thus cannot be considered a static concept.

Peace observation was practiced under the League of Nations and several Latin American organizations (e.g., Organization of American States, Inter-American Peace Committee). The United Nations continued peace observation in its early years, sending observers to Greece, Palestine, and other locations in the aftermath of World War II. Some of these efforts (e.g., the UN Truce Supervision Organization – UNTSO) are regarded as peacekeeping operations (and indeed the UN itself classifies these as such) as they had observation functions and many personnel were unarmed.

The term peace observation has largely, although not completely, fallen into disuse as other forms of peace operations assumed some of the functions. In addition, some of the initial elements of peace observation such as fact-finding are now handled by UN staff or special representatives appointed by the Secretary-General. Plebiscites, the focus on early peace observations, are relatively rare in contemporary times, but election supervision is common and carried out under the aegis of peacekeeping forces or international observers from various international organizations and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

Peacekeeping

Peacekeeping is often used as a blanket term for many kinds of peace operations, but it actually represents a distinct form; largely synonymous with peacekeeping are other phrases such as “Cold War peacekeeping,” “traditional peacekeeping,” and “old peacekeeping.” What are the defining features of peacekeeping and what makes it distinct from peace observation and peacebuilding? What accounts for the conceptual and practical shifts?

Before addressing these questions, one similarity remains: peacekeeping is designed to promote negative peace. That is, its purpose is to prevent the renewal of violence, and broader concerns with justice and other values are not part of its core. The conflict management focus is the priority, and, at best, it is hoped that conflict resolution might occur in the managed environment created by the deployed peacekeeping operation. Despite the common purpose toward negative peace, peace operations underwent a conceptual shift as peacekeeping replaced peace observation.

In the Cold War context, the simplified form of peace observation became an anachronism. Threats to international peace and security were no longer minor territorial disagreements with little chance of expansion or escalation. Rather they were often the product of rivalries tied to the superpowers. Some of these had already escalated to war or had the great potential for escalation (e.g., Arab-Israeli conflict) and could have expanded significantly with outside intervention (e.g., Cyprus conflict). An observer team would not be sufficient to deter or prevent conflict, and any recommendations would not likely be accepted by the polarized UN Security Council. A new kind of peace operation would be necessary, even as some elements of peace observation remained.

Collective security provisions, including the use of military force, are provided for in the UN Charter, but Security Council stalemate meant that they would not reach fruition. The Suez Crisis in 1956 and the threat of war between Israel, Egypt, United Kingdom, and France provided a challenge for a new strategy different than peace observation and collective security. That came in the form of peacekeeping, a concept and approach that is largely credited to UN Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjöld and Canadian Foreign Minister Lester Pearson. Peacekeeping is notably different in several ways from observation and collective security. Peacekeepers were now soldiers from national armies rather than international civil servants as was characteristic of early peace observation missions. Most significantly, they did not merely monitor a given situation, but they were designed to be an interposition or buffer force between disputants. Furthermore, their role was not to make recommendations on how a conflict might be resolved, but rather to stabilize the situation so that separate diplomatic efforts might occur. Although peacekeeping was in some sense a military operation, it was quite different from a traditional one. Most obviously, peacekeeping forces were lightly armed rather than equipped with advanced weaponry, and peacekeeping forces numbered in the several thousands at most rather than hundred thousands or more national armies. The major difference was the so-called holy trinity that defined peacekeeping operations.

The three core elements of the “holy trinity” concerned consent, impartiality, and minimum use of force (Bellamy et al. 2010). Consent meant that the host state(s) had to grant legal permission for a peace force to be deployed on its territory; cooperation from other states in the conflict, even if not hosting troops, was also needed. Thus, Egypt gave approval for the United Nations Emergency Force (UNEF I) to be stationed in the Sinai after the Suez Crisis but later withdrew consent (and the peacekeeping force evacuated) prior to the Arab-Israeli 1967 war.

The principle of impartiality refers to the carrying out of mandate provisions in an evenhanded fashion. In practice, this might favor one actor over another, such as stopping the fighting when one side is losing, but peacekeepers ensure that the operation does not discriminate by doing a lesser job vis-à-vis one actor versus another. Peacekeepers also don’t affect the military balance of forces so that one side or the other is inherently advantaged as would be the case with a traditional military intervention. Impartiality is accomplished not only by mandate and soldier behavior but also by force composition. In contrast to early peace observation operations, states with clear national interests (neighbors, some major powers) were barred from contributing forces to the operation. The final part of the trinity is that peacekeepers use minimum levels of military force; traditionally, this was facilitated by only allowing use of force in self-defense. Such a restriction on the rules of engagement was consistent with the small and lightly armed force that constituted a peacekeeping operation.

The concept of peacekeeping presumed a new logic for preventing the renewal of conflict. Some of this stemmed from the context in which operations were deployed. Peace observation operations were more preventative, sent before serious armed conflict had occurred. Peacekeeping was typically sent to conflicts following a cease-fire agreement; that is, some significant violence has already occurred, but the parties had agreed to a halt in fighting in conjunction with the peacekeeping deployment. Peacekeepers still operated on the basis of legitimacy that comes from international sanctioning, as the operation could not physically stop a determined combatant from restarting the war. The design and the empirical success of peacekeeping is predicated on logics other military compellence. As an interposition force, Fortna (2008) contends that peacekeepers make attacks more difficult, take away the element of surprise, and raise the international costs of aggression. Accepting peacekeepers can mitigate the security dilemma, signal mutual intentions for a peaceful resolution, and lessen the likelihood of accidents or minor engagements that could escalate.

Peacekeeping during the Cold War era generally followed these principles. Because of restrictive views of national sovereignty and Security Council political divisions, there were few peace operations authorized, and most were confined to interstate conflicts, for example, two operations (UNEF I and II) involved troops separating Israeli and Egyptian forces. New challenges to international peace and security, as well as changing political dynamics, have led peacekeeping to evolve into peacebuilding, even as the core mission of peacekeeping to limit violence has remained.

Peacebuilding

The end of the Cold War and thereafter mark some dramatic shifts in the way the international community conceptualized peace operations. One can think of this as an evolutionary process and one marked by less consensus than earlier formulations. The source of this transformation to what we now refer to as peacebuilding was a function of several influences. The prospect of interstate war significantly diminished, and thus the conventional model of peacekeeping no longer reflected the kinds of threats to peace and security that the international community faced. The rise of civil or internal conflicts increased in the early 1990s, although this alone too does account for the change in the kinds of peace operations conducted; civil wars were not new, but the UN and other international organizations were now more willing to intervene in such conflicts with peace operations than in prior eras (Balas et al. 2012). There was also an increase in peace agreements to civil wars, in which the disputants requested peace operation assistance. This resulted in a reformulation of peace operation characteristics as well as what they were called upon to do.

A useful place to begin for detailing the peacebuilding concept is the definition laid out by UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali in his seminal An Agenda for Peace (1995). Peacebuilding is defined as “action to identify and support structures which will strengthen and solidify peace in order to avoid a relapse into conflict.” There is still the primary concern for negative peace, and all conceptions accept this as an end, if not primary, goal. There is some disagreement, however, over what other elements should be part of peace building. Among many peacebuilding notions is a concern with removing the root causes of conflict rather than merely discouraging or preventing the violent engagement of the disputants. Minimalist conceptions expect conflict to occur, but desire to manage it peacefully. In contrast, the maximalist strategy promotes not merely management, but conflict resolution – that is, eliminating the “willingness” of parties to use violence. The various missions described below on what constitutes peacebuilding vary accordingly.

Peacebuilding also reflects the change in the context of peace operations. It is envisioned to occur in civil conflicts, rather than interstate ones; indeed, over 90% of post-Cold War operations were deployed to conflicts with an exclusive or significant civil conflict component (e.g., Congo). Traditional peacekeeping was usually sent to conflicts following a cease-fire, but prior to conflict settlement. Peacebuilding was increasingly sent to conflicts following a peace agreement and therefore its roles adapted accordingly (e.g., Sierra Leone conflict). There were also instances in which peacebuilders encountered situations (e.g., Bosnian War) during ongoing fighting and therefore prior to an effective cease-fire.

Over time, peacebuilding has evolved to be further away from peacekeeping, most notably in the ways that it has modified the holy trinity. Consent concerns were comparatively easy in the context of interstate conflicts between two recognized government authorities. In the civil conflicts, who should give consent was less clear. Post-conflict situations often left competing actors exercising control over different parts of the country. In some cases of failed states (e.g., Somalia), there was no government authority to grant consent. Norms of sovereignty also evolved such that the international community was more willing to intervene in conflicts even with the opposition of the host government. Peacebuilding operations still preferred the cooperation of the warring parties, but consent was no longer an absolute requirement.

Impartiality was also subject to modification. UN resolutions prior to the authorization of peace operations in civil wars often now reflect biases in favor of the government or rebels in the conflict (Benson and Tucker 2019). This has downstream consequences for the kinds of peace mandates that are chosen. Some of the operations and associated missions also appear to favor overtly certain sides in a conflict (e.g., supporting the government in Mali against militant groups). This is not to say that impartiality has been abandoned (goals such as protecting civilians are impartial ones), but rather some elements of peacebuilding now relax that requirement.

Similar to the loosening of the other two elements of the holy trinity, the minimum use of force is no longer absolute. Since 1999, UN resolutions authorizing peace operations are done so under Chapter VII of the UN Charter to use military force (Howard and Dayal 2018). Peacebuilding operations have also become larger in terms of troop size with more advanced weaponry, a far cry from the unarmed observers in the infancy of peace operations. The rules of engagement have also changed, transforming some operations into what is referred to as “robust peacekeeping,” which involves the use of military force, often permitting offensive rather than solely defensive actions with the consent of host state or major parties in the conflict. The UN distinguishes this from “peace enforcement” which is an authorized use of strategic rather than tactical use of military force and does not necessarily require consent. In either case, peacebuilding can now involve considerably more military actions than traditional peacekeeping.

As peacebuilding is more complex, there is more divergence on its essential conceptual and operational components. Jenkins (2013) classifies the divergence in the meanings of peacebuilding along four dimensions; within and across these categories, it is possible to understand the range of definitions used for the term. Peacebuilding practice reflects such a range.

The first dimension concerns the timing of peacebuilding. Although there are conceptions of preventive deployments and actions, peacebuilding in practice is almost always following conflict; hence, the term post-conflict peacebuilding is redundant for some. In the period following a settlement, there is a range of activities that are designed for short- versus longer-term effects at inhibiting conflict renewal. Some elements such as delivering humanitarian aid are more short term, whereas others are designed for longer term, such as promoting economic development and establishing the rule of law.

The goals of peacebuilding, the second dimension, have been open to more debate and criticism. The central goal of preventing conflict, noted above, did not change but the instrumental means of achieving it did. The so-called “liberal” peacebuilding model became the dominant one. In this conception, the rebuilding of states in the model of the West was the desirable end state and the one that was thought to ensure peace. Most notably, this is predicated on strengthening central state authority, and many of the activities noted next (e.g., strengthening rule of law, local security) were consistent with that goal; these are often referred to as “statebuilding,” which can be considered a subgroup of peacebuilding focusing on security. The liberal elements were evident in the strategies of promoting democratization and early elections as well as free market reforms, often at the expense of economic stability and other values. The liberal model also relied on Western conceptions of human rights. This orientation privileges outside values and orientations as opposed to local organizations, needs, and logic (Autesserre 2014).

The other two dimensions of divergence – activities and agents of peacebuilding, respectively – are interconnected. Traditional peacekeeping was conceived as an activity carried out by soldiers, with limited support from the UN or other staff. Peacebuilding involves a broader set of actors, now encompassing other international organizations (e.g., World Bank), NGOs, and potentially state actors (Alger 2007). How one thinks about peacebuilding is related to which actors should be involved in what activities. The agents themselves have parochial ideas of what constitutes peacebuilding. In a survey of 24 organizations involved in peacebuilding, Barnett et al. (2007: 53) conclude that “organizations are likely to adopt a meaning of peacebuilding that is consistent with their already existing mandates, worldviews, and organizational interests.” Accordingly, the UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO) focuses primarily on the traditional peacekeeping aspect, whereas human rights organizations conceive of it in terms of protecting civilians and other human rights concerns. The World Bank is focused on post-conflict reconstruction, whereas the US Department of State sees peacebuilding largely in terms of stabilization.

The activity dimension of peacebuilding also represents variation. Diehl and Druckman (2018) identified 11 different missions that peace operations might perform (e.g., election supervision, protecting threatened population, promoting the rule of law). Looking at all UN operations since the end of World War II, they conclude that there is no single or even sets of profiles for peacebuilding or indeed peace operations in general; that is, there might be different conceptions of peacebuilding, but in practice there are many different combinations of activities that fall under the peacebuilding rubric. Nevertheless, they do report two relevant patterns for our understanding of peacebuilding. First, almost 80% of UN operations include the cease-fire monitoring mission, indicating the traditional peacekeeping remains part of peacebuilding. Second, the number of missions mandated or performed by UN operations went from an average of 2.11 missions in the Cold War period (operations initially authorized before 1991) to 4.88 in post-Cold War operations (authorized in 1991 and thereafter) (Diehl and Druckman 2018). Thus, peacebuilding means performing more missions than before, even as there is not a unified collection of activities that is consistent across operations.

Despite the diversity in practice, Barnett et al. (2007) offer a typology of peacebuilding activities, sorting them into three categories: stability creation, restoration of state institutions, and addressing the socioeconomic dimensions of conflict. These are often carried out in sequence. First are security activities, such as disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR) of combatants, designed to stabilize the situation and prevent renewal of violence. Second, and thereafter, priority is given to statebuilding in the form of rebuilding infrastructure and institutions, including the rule of law. The third category of activities has long-term goals achieved with long-term processes; encouraging economic development, respect for human rights, and building civil society are among the goals. As one moves from the first set of activities to the third, the role of the peace operation diminishes (or even disappears), and actions are assumed by other actions, such as NGOs and international organizations.

In 2016, the United Nations (2016) embedded the concept of “sustainable peace” within its definition of peacebuilding. Specifically, sustaining peace “. . .should be broadly understood as a goal and a process to build a common vision of a society, ensuring that the needs of all segments of the population are taken into account, which encompasses activities aimed at preventing the outbreak, escalation, continuation and recurrence of conflict, addressing root causes, assisting parties to conflict to end hostilities, ensuring national reconciliation, and moving towards recovery, reconstruction and development. . .” Thus, the UN retains the immediate security goals of preventing armed conflict but also emphasizes the long-term necessity of promoting positive peace. Although this raises some very difficult challenges, the ambitions and activities of contemporary peacebuilding stand in stark contrast to those of peace observation and reflect the tremendous conceptual and operational evolution that peace operations have undergone in a century.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine

References

- Alger, C. (2007). There are peacebuilding tasks for everybody. International Studies Review, 9(3), 534–554.
- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Balas, A., Owsiak, A., & Diehl, P. F. (2012). Demanding peace: The impact of prevailing conflict on the shift from peacekeeping to peacebuilding. Peace & Change, 37(2), 195–226.
- Barnett, M., Kim, H., O'Donnell, M., & Sitea, L. (2007). Peacebuilding: What is in a name? Global Governance, 13(1), 35–58.
- Bellamy, A. J., Williams, P., & Griffin, S. (2010). Understanding peacekeeping (2nd ed.). Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Benson, M., & Tucker, C. (2019). UNbiased: UNSC resolutions in civil wars. Annual meeting of the International Studies Association, Toronto.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1995). An agenda for peace (2nd ed.). New York: United Nations.
- Diehl, P. F. (1994). International peacekeeping. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Diehl, P. F., & Druckman, D. (2018). Multiple peacekeeping missions: Analyzing the interdependence of peace operation missions and outcomes. International Peacekeeping, 25(1), 28–51.
- Fortna, V. P. (2008). Does peacekeeping work? Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Howard, L. M., & Dayal, A. K. (2018). The use of force in UN peacekeeping. International Organization, 72(1), 71–103.
- Jenkins, R. (2013). Peacebuilding: From concept to commission. London: Routledge.
- United Nations. (2016). Report of the Advisory Group of Experts on the Review of the Peacebuilding Architecture, Challenge of Sustaining Peace (A/69/968 – S/2015/490).
- Wainhouse, D. W. (1966). International peace observation. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.

Conciliation

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Conciliation (see Reconciliation)

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Conflict

- ▶ Cameroon and the Anglophone Crisis
- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Conflict and Hunger

Caitriona Dowd
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Famine; Starvation; War crimes

Definition

Conflict and hunger are closely linked. Throughout history, conflict actors have leveraged food and targeted food systems as a tactic in war. More broadly, community, household and individual food security can be undermined directly and indirectly by violent conflict. Recent trends indicate that conflict is the main driver of global food crises, while researchers are also paying increasing attention to the impact of hunger as a cause of violent conflict. However, while closely connected, the precise relationship between conflict and hunger varies greatly: not all violent conflicts result in the same severity of hunger; and no conflict affects food security uniformly across territories, communities, or even within households. Variation in the nature of violent conflicts and food systems and the interrelationship between the two determine the scale of conflict-driven food crises. This chapter considers the relationships between conflict and hunger, before turning to the strategies employed by peace and conflict actors to prevent, address and, in some cases, leverage these.

Introduction

‘Hunger’ – also referred to as undernourishment and food deprivation – refers to a condition in which a person’s dietary energy consumption is inadequate (FAO 2008, p. 2) and is typically a consequence of food insecurity. Food security is a multidimensional concept that depends on:

- Availability: food is produced to a required level.
- Accessibility: food is affordable, infrastructure exists to transport it to market, etc.
- Utilisation: food can be absorbed effectively, which is often determined by dietary, feeding and food preparation practices.
- Stability: predictability and reliability in each of the other conditions. (FAO 2006)

This multidimensionality is important, because it means that disruption to any one of these conditions by conflict – directly or indirectly – undermines food security.

From a global perspective, it is clear that both violent conflict and severe food insecurity are increasing. By almost any metric, the world is more insecure in 2020 than it was a decade ago.

Violent conflict is becoming both more prevalent and more complex. Today’s conflicts are often lower intensity in terms of casualty numbers but are highly fragmented, multi-actor, protracted crises (Pettersson et al. 2019; see “► Peace Measuring Approaches”). At the same time, hunger is growing. After decades of global progress in reducing hunger worldwide, this trend reversed in 2015 (FAO et al. 2019, p. 6). By 2019, an estimated 135 million people suffered from acute hunger (FSIN 2020).

Critically, growing insecurity and acute food crises are interlinked. Conflict and insecurity is the largest single driver of severe food insecurity worldwide and the main driver for almost 60% of people in food crisis (FSIN 2020). On average, the proportion of hungry people is almost three times as high in countries in conflict and protracted crisis than in other low-income contexts (FAO 2016, p. 14). The most severe food crises are also currently all concentrated in conflict-affected contexts, including four where the UN declared an imminent risk of famine in 2017: Yemen, South Sudan, Somalia and northeast Nigeria (United Nations 2017).

Almost all conflicts have an impact on some dimension of food security. Productive land can be destroyed and livestock killed, and people are often forced to flee their homes, abandoning fields, herds, storage facilities and inputs. Less directly, conflict can also disrupt markets, limit transport and long-distance trade and delay or severely restrict humanitarian access to populations in crisis. Lastly, wider societal transformation can take place as a result of conflict, and its impacts on food security and food systems affect hunger within the household, extended family and wider community. Over time, scholarship has increasingly recognised the multifaceted political, economic and social dimensions of food crises (Rangasami 1985). In so doing, research has systematically challenged the sometimes implicit assertion that hunger is an inevitable consequence of conflict or related crises (de Waal 2018).

This is also reflected in a parallel development in research, one that recognises that conflict’s precise impacts on hunger are highly context-specific. Conflicts and food systems vary enormously across contexts, and the ways individuals, households and communities interact with both are also extremely diverse. Fundamentally, not all conflicts result in the same severity of hunger, nor is food insecurity produced through the same political, economic, or social mechanisms in different contexts. In the course of the same conflict, the impact over time, across territory and even within the same communities and households varies greatly, often conditioned by the precise dynamics of violence, the nature of food and market systems, the social dynamics that determine access to and control over those systems, and their interplay. A recent “revolution” in the collection of microlevel conflict data has taken place alongside significant advances in the collection and dissemination of finely disaggregated food security and nutrition data, contributing to improvements in the understanding of precise patterns and dynamics (Brück and d’Errico 2019, p. 169). In much the same way that the more granular study of the patterns and dynamics of conflict has revealed that war and are not mutually exclusive states, microlevel food security data reveals that hunger and starvation can co-exist with surplus food availability for a given location. (Brück and d’Errico 2019, p. 169; Koren forthcoming).

This discussion synthesises recent evidence from this growing field of research, considering both the ways in which conflict has been identified as a leading cause of hunger, and hunger has increasingly been explored as a driver of conflict. Lastly, it turns to the responses of peace and conflict actors in specific hunger- and conflict-affected contexts and on the global stage.

Conflict Causes Hunger

There is robust evidence that conflict causes hunger. In a cross-national, large-n study, Gates et al. (2012, p. 1717) find that a median intensity conflict increases the percentage of undernourished people in a country by 3.3% or in real terms, by approximately 300,000 people in a country with a population of 10 million. Beyond the immediate shock, several studies have found that the impacts of conflict on food security and nutrition outcome are long-term, potentially irreversible and inter-generational, affecting populations’ health outcomes long after the cessation of conflict (Akresh et al. 2012; Currie and Vogl 2013). In spite of methodological challenges in how we measure conflict’s precise impacts on food security, separate from other considerations – such as income, state capacity and so on – that might drive both conflict and hunger (Martin-Shields and Stojetz 2019), there is nevertheless strong documentation of the devastating consequences of violent conflict for food security.

The use of food as a weapon of war is the most direct way conflict causes hunger (Messer and Cohen 2011). Throughout history, there have been numerous notable examples of conflict actors deliberately leveraging food in times of war, resulting in food shortage. Evidence of the use of siege warfare to restrict food and ensure shortage has been documented in antiquity (Garnsey 1993) and in more recent contexts from the “scorched earth” tactics of the US Civil War to the siege of Leningrad in the Second World War and the starvation of civilians in the Nigerian civil war in the 1960s (Lander and Vetharaniam Richards 2019, p. 678). More recently, legal and policy experts have maintained similar practices are being employed by conflict actors in Yemen, South Sudan and Syria (Starvation Accountability 2019).

But the starvation of civilians as a weapon of war, devastating as it is, is one of the several dimensions of conflict’s impacts on food security more widely. Beyond these deliberate strategies, broader impacts of conflict on hunger can also be seen. These include disruption to agricultural production through displacement; the destruction of productive land or re-orientation of productive land for non-agricultural use; and disruption to markets or market access (Messer et al. 1998). Conflict can also limit or entirely prevent humanitarian actors from reaching populations in need through generalised insecurity or attacks on humanitarian actors that result in suspension or full withdrawal of relief supplies (e.g., South Sudan NGO Forum 2018).

At the same time, scholarship emphasises that vulnerability to poverty is not synonymous with vulnerability to violence (Justino 2009). In some contexts, wealth and assets – far from protecting individuals or buffering the impact of conflict shocks – may increase the risk of being targeted. For this reason, even where conflict does not directly result in the destruction of agricultural land, for example, households may choose to scale-down production in an effort to minimise risk (e.g., Paul et al. 2015) or adapt their livelihood strategies in ways that have long-term implications for resilience and future food security (Lecoutere et al. 2009). These dynamics are often compounded by the fact that agriculture is the mainstay of the economy in many conflict-affected contexts. In South Sudan, for example, where a long-running civil war has contributed to severe food insecurity, 95% of the population depend directly on agriculture (Elver 2017).

Less direct pathways, such as through disruption of support systems and mutual solidarity in conflict, can also severely undermine food security in certain circumstances (Rangasami 1985; Biong Deng 2010). Community ties are a key component of informal social safety nets. Because of this, the impact of crisis on the contraction of social obligations can have a devastating impact on mutual support and, through this, food security (de Waal 2018). Depending on the context, those already on the margins of social networks, such as the elderly, widowed, or people living with a disability or with a condition that may be stigmatised, can suffer disproportionately (Maxwell et al. 2017).

Given women and girls often carry particular responsibilities in relation to food collection, preparation and distribution within the household, and experience conflict differently from men and boys, the gendered impacts of conflict on each of the above dimensions of food insecurity are critical. Specific gendered practices which may emerge, or be exacerbated, in conflict, include men and boys in the household receiving more, better or earlier food than women and girls; increased levels of intimate partner violence in a context of wider social strain; and gendered violence through strategies like child marriage (Dowd 2018).

Recent years have seen a particular investment by humanitarian actors and donors in building the resilience of crisis-affected communities (see European Commission 2015; United Nations 2018). The aim of many of these initiatives is to reduce the impact of shocks and stressors, including violent conflict, on household and community-level food security, and support better and faster recovery. While robust evidence from initiatives in this field is still being generated, a key outcome to date mirrors the greater emphasis on granular data collection on conflict and food insecurity more widely: even within communities exhibiting relatively stable aggregative levels of food security, household food security varies greatly in response to shocks and stressors and is highly dynamic (Sturge et al. 2017, p. 26). A key area for future research, therefore, centres on understanding why some individuals, households and communities can better anticipate, adapt to and recover from conflict shocks and stressors than others, and to what extent this capacity can be effectively supported at scale by humanitarian and development actors.

Hunger Can Cause Conflict

The inverse relationship, between hunger and conflict, has also been a focus of growing research. Hunger has been identified as a contributing cause of conflict in a range of diverse contexts (Messer et al. 2001), typically associating limited food availability or accessibility with rising dissatisfaction and consequent social unrest. At the aggregate level, some scholars have linked resource scarcity with population growth and predicted a rise in violence (e.g., Homer-Dixon 1999). However, there is limited evidence of this coming to pass, and even less that this is linked to hunger specifically.

Food price volatility is a particular focus of research in this field, as both conflict and poverty become more concentrated in urban areas. There is some documentation of widespread unrest and rioting linked to food price volatility (Messer 2009). Other research has found that the impact of higher food prices in food-producing areas lowers some forms of local conflict – such as conflict over control of territory – and raises others – including that over appropriating productive output (McGuirk and Burke 2017). Similarly, through the mechanism of international food aid contributing to an increased likelihood of conflict, some scholarship suggests an indirect relationship between food crises and conflict (Nunn and Qian 2014).

However, there is ongoing debate regarding the endogeneity of the hunger-conflict nexus (Martin-Shields and Stojetz 2019). The relationship can be particularly challenging to specify, as both the occurrence of conflict and the distribution of hunger within and across populations can have shared roots in historical and contemporary practices of political, economic, social marginalisation and exclusion (Cohen and Pinstup-Andersen 1999). Overall, there is still limited robust evidence of hunger specifically driving large-scale conflict and insecurity and far greater consensus on its interaction with wider social, political and economic factors as a contributor to insecurity. At the same time, critics have argued that efforts to cast hunger, or the wider poverty in which it typically occurs, as a cause of conflict, risk securitising populations in crisis. In doing so, these approaches may centre militaristic, security responses over and above development approaches that frame the right to food as an entitlement and governance issue (e.g., Alcock 2009; McConnon 2016; see “► Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding”).

Peace and Conflict Actors Respond

Research that focuses on the consequences of conflict for hunger, and vice versa, can appear at times to abstract these processes, such that peace and conflict actors’ specific actions are obscured. In understanding the mechanisms through which conflict and hunger are interlinked, and how these are addressed, resolved or sustained by policy and military responses, the actions of specific peace and conflict actors require attention.

Economically, while conflict’s impact on hunger is typically framed in terms of its detrimental effect on wellbeing and development, it is important to note that some actors profit from conflict-driven hunger. War economies can be structured around sophisticated systems for hoarding and profiting from scarce food and the hunger it produces (e.g., Keen 1994, 1998) or the systematic predation and requisitioning of food supplies by armed actors (e.g., de Waal 1993; de Soysa et al. 1999; Pinaud 2014), including the diversion of food aid (e.g., McVeigh 2019). On the other hand, less coordinated and more opportunistic acts, such as looting of food warehouses (Mac Ginty 2004), can also be tied to wider instability in conflict.

Politically, some actors strategically leverage food systems, agricultural policy and food aid as strategic components of foreign policy. Sanctions or other restrictions on agricultural or food trade or aid either during active conflict, or in wider relations with adversaries, can also have a devastating effect on food security (DeRose et al. 1998). Related counterterrorism measures, which may be intended to restrict the actions of armed actors, can have secondary impacts on food security by limiting or preventing effective humanitarian response and access (e.g., Maxwell and Fitzpatrick 2012; Menkhous 2012). On the other hand, bilateral aid can also be leveraged as part of wider foreign policy, with the stated intention of relieving hunger. The US ‘Food for Peace’ initiative, for example, explicitly links international food assistance with both foreign policy and security (Wallerstein 1980).

At a global level, member states have developed a set of diplomatic and policy measures that seek to address the links between conflict and hunger. Humanitarian interventions or calls for action under the Responsibility to Protect (R2P) principle have referenced starvation in their justification (e.g., ICISS 2001, pp. 33, 69; van Voorhout 2014; see “► R2P and Prevention”). At the UN Security Council, country-specific resolutions on contexts as diverse as Bosnia and Herzegovina, Somalia and Syria have identified starvation of civilians as a concern for the Security Council. With a wider global focus, in May 2018, the Security Council unanimously passed Resolution 2417, specifically on conflict-induced food insecurity. Resolution 2417 explicitly reiterates the prohibition on the starvation of civilians in war and firmly establishes food crises as not only a humanitarian and development concern, but also a pressing security concern firmly within the remit of the Security Council (Zappalà 2019).

A related set of responses concern states' recourse to international law as both a deterrent and as a means of pursuing accountability for starvation crimes and the violation of the right to food. In 1977, the Additional Protocols of the Geneva Conventions explicitly prohibited the deliberate starvation of civilians as a method of warfare. The Rome Statute first recognised starvation as a war crime in international armed conflicts in 2002, but it was not until 2019 that an amendment was passed criminalising starvation of civilians in non-international armed conflicts as well (Jordash et al. 2019; World Peace Foundation 2019).

Although these advances, both at the Security Council and in the field of international law, represent important milestones in enshrining the prohibition of starvation of civilians in conflict, and lay groundwork for future potential prosecutions, it remains to be seen whether the political will to implement and enforce these provisions will follow.

Summary

Conflict and hunger are closely interlinked, with conflict and insecurity identified as the key driver of severe hunger for almost three out of five people in food crisis today. However, neither conflict nor hunger is an inevitable outcome of the other. Conflicts vary enormously in their scale, intensity and specific interactions with food and market systems, producing highly differentiated impacts on food security across and within territories, communities and even households. At the same time, hunger is neither a direct nor automatic driver of violent conflict: the strongest evidence and consensus of this relationship concerns localised unrest and insecurity, with far less agreement on the role of hunger in driving large-scale conflict. Mirroring this diversity, peace and conflict actors respond to both the obstacles and, for some, opportunities presented by conflict and hunger in different ways. Systematic predation of food supplies, the politicisation of food aid and profiteering in food crises are all documented alongside successive advancements in international law intended to prevent, and deliver accountability for, starvation as a method of war. Progress in reversing current trends in conflict-driven hunger will ultimately depend on advances at every level: responses at the household, community and national levels that are adapted to this diversity in conflict dynamics, livelihoods and resilience; and a shift in the political balance at the global level towards adherence to and enforcement of these key provisions of international law.

Cross-References

- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches
- ▶ R2P and Prevention
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

References

- Akresh, R., Bhalotra, S., Leone, M., & Okonkwo Osili, U. (2012). War and stature: Growing up during the Nigerian Civil War. American Economic Review: Papers & Proceedings, 102(3), 273–277.
- Alcock, R. (2009). Speaking food: A discourse analytic study of food security. School of Sociology, Politics and International Studies, University of Bristol. <http://www.bristol.ac.uk/media-library/sites/spais/migrated/documents/alcock0709.pdf>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- Biong Deng, L. (2010). Social capital and civil war: The Dinka communities in Sudan's civil war. African Affairs, 109(435), 231–250.
- Brück, T., & d'Errico, M. (2019). Food security and violent conflict: Introduction to the special issue. World Development, 117, 167–171.
- Cohen, M. J., & Pinstrup-Andersen, P. (1999). Food security and conflict. Social Research, 66(1), 375–416.
- Currie, J., & Vogl, T. (2013). Early-life health and adult circumstance in developing countries. Annual Review of Economics, 5, 1–36.
- de Soysa, I., Gleditsch, N. P., Gibson, M., & Sollenberg, M. (1999). To cultivate peace: Agriculture in a world of conflict. Environmental Change and Security Program report, no. 5.
- de Waal, A. (1993). War and famine in Africa. IDS Bulletin, 24(4), 33–40.

- de Waal, A. (2018). Mass starvation: The history and future of famine. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- DeRose, L., Messer, E., & Millman, S. (1998). Who's hungry? And how do we know? Food shortage, poverty and deprivation. New York: United Nations University Press.
- Dowd, C. (2018). Conflict and hunger: The lived experience of conflict and food insecurity in South Sudan. Dublin: Concern Worldwide.
- Elver, H. (2017). Interim report of the Special Rapporteur on the right to food. UN General Assembly Report A/72/188.
- European Commission. (2015). EU resilience compendium: Saving lives and improving livelihoods. DG ECHO – Humanitarian Aid and Civil Protection. <https://www.preventionweb.net/publications/view/43373>. Accessed 20 April 2020.
- Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO). (2006). Food security. FAO policy brief, June 2006, Issue 2. www.fao.org/fileadmin/templates/faoitally/documents/pdf/pdf-Food_Security_Concept_Note.pdf. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO). (2008). An introduction to basic concepts of food security. Food security information for action: Practical guides. www.fao.org/3/a-al936e.pdf. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO). (2016). Peace and food security: Investing in resilience to sustain rural livelihoods amid conflict. www.fao.org/emergencies/resources/documents/resources-detail/en/c/405395/. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Food and Agriculture Organization of the United Nations (FAO), International Fund for Agricultural Development (IFAD), UNICEF, World Food Programme (WFP), and World Health Organization (WHO). (2019). The state of food security and nutrition in the world: Safeguarding against economic slowdowns and downturns. <http://www.fao.org/3/ca5162en/ca5162en.pdf>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- Food Security Information Network (FSIN). (2020). Global report on food crises 2020. <https://www.fsinplatform.org/global-report-food-crises-2020>. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Garnsey, P. (1993). Famine and food supply in the Graeco-Roman world: Responses to risk and crisis. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gates, S., Hegre, H., Mokliev, H., & Strand, H. (2012). Development consequences of armed conflict. World Development, 40(9), 1713–1722.
- Homer-Dixon, T. (1999). Environment, scarcity and violence. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty (ICISS). (2001). The responsibility to protect. Ottawa: International Development Research Center.
- Jordash, W., Murdoch, C., & Holmes, J. (2019). Strategies for prosecuting mass starvation. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 17, 849–879.
- Justino, P. (2009). Poverty and violent conflict: A micro-level perspective on the causes and duration of warfare. Journal of Peace Research, 46(3), 315–333.
- Keen, D. (1994). The benefits of famine: A political economy of famine and relief in southwestern Sudan, 1983–89. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Keen, D. (1998). The economic benefits of civil war. Adelphi Papers, 38(320), 15–22.
- Koren, O. (forthcoming). Food resources and strategic conflict. Journal of Conflict Resolution. Epub ahead of print. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022002719833160>.
- Lander, B., & Vetharaniam Richards, R. (2019). Addressing hunger and starvation in situations of armed conflict: Laying the foundations for peace. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 17, 675–698.
- Lecoutere, E., Vlassenroot, K., & Raeymaekers, T. (2009). Conflict, institutional changes and food insecurity in eastern D. R. Congo. Afrika Focus, 22(2), 41–63.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2004). Looting in the context of violent conflict: A conceptualisation and typology. Third World Quarterly, 25(5), 857–870.
- Martin-Shields, C. P., & Stojetz, W. (2019). Food security and conflict: Empirical challenges and future opportunities for research and policy making on food security and conflict. World Development, 119, 150–164.
- Maxwell, D., & Fitzpatrick, M. (2012). The 2011 Somalia famine: Context, causes, and complications. Food Security, 1(1), 5–12.
- Maxwell, D., Stites, E., Robillard, C., & Wagner, M. (2017). Conflict and resilience: A synthesis of Feinstein International Center work. Boston: Feinstein International Center.
- McConnon, E. (2016). Risk and the security-development nexus: The policies of the US, the UK and Canada. London: Palgrave.
- McGuirk, E. & Burke, M. (2017). The economic origins of conflict in Africa. Stanford Center for International Development, Working paper no. 594.
- McVeigh, K. (2019). Yemen's Houthi rebels accused of diverting food aid from hungry. The Guardian. 17 June 2019. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2019/jun/17/yemens-houthi-rebels-accused-of-diverting-food-aid-from-hungry>. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Menkhaus, K. (2012). No access: Critical bottlenecks in the 2011 Somali famine. Global Food Security, 1(1), 29–35.
- Messer, E. (2009). Rising food prices, social mobilizations and violence: Conceptual issues in understanding responding to the connections linking hunger and conflict. Annals of Anthropological Practice, 31(1), 12–22.
- Messer, E., & Cohen, M. J. (2011). Understanding and responding to the links between conflict and hunger. Development in Practice, 21(4–5), 481–487.
- Messer, E., Cohen, M. J., & D'Costa, J. (1998). Food from peace: Breaking the links between conflict and hunger. Washington, DC: IFPRI.
- Messer, E., Cohen, M. J., & Marchione, T. (2001). Conflict: A cause and effect of hunger. Environmental Change and Security Program report, no. 7.

- Nunn, N., & Qian, N. (2014). US food aid and civil conflict. American Economic Review, 104(6), 1630–1666.
- Paul, S., Shonchoy, A. S., & Dabalén, A. (2015). Food crop diversification as a risk mitigating strategy during conflict: Evidence from Cote d'Ivoire. Institute of Developing Economies Discussion paper, no. 496.
- Pettersson, T., Högladh, S., & Öberg, M. (2019). Organized violence, 1989–2018 and peace agreements. Journal of Peace Research, 56(4), 589–603.
- Pinaud, C. (2014). South Sudan: Civil war, predation and the making of a military aristocracy. African Affairs, 113(451), 192–211.
- Rangasami, A. (1985). "Failure of exchange entitlements" theory of famine: A response. Economic and Political Weekly, 10(42), 1797–1801.
- South Sudan NGO Forum. (2018). The South Sudan NGO Forum strongly condemns the violent attacks against humanitarian aid agencies in Maban. Press release, 30 July 2018. <https://reliefweb.int/report/south-sudan/south-sudan-ngo-forum-strongly-condemns-violent-attacks-against-humanitarian-aid>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- Starvation Accountability. (2019). The crime of starvation and methods of prosecution and accountability. Accountability for mass starvation, policy paper no. 1. <https://starvationaccountability.org/wp-content/uploads/2019/06/Legal-Paper-Starvation.pdf>. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- Sturge, G., Mallett, R., Hagen-Zanker, J., & Slater, R. (2017). Tracking livelihoods, service delivery and governance: Survey findings from the Secure Livelihoods Research Consortium. <https://securelivelihoods.org/publication/tracking-livelihoods-service-delivery-and-governance-panel-survey-findings-from-the-secure-livelihoods-research-consortium/?resourceid=465?resourceid=462>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- United Nations. (2017). UN aid chief urges global action as starvation, famine loom for 20 million across four countries. UN News, 10 March 2017. www.news.un.org/en/story/2017/03/553152-un-aid-chief-urges-global-action-starvation-famine-loom-20-million-across-four. Accessed 25 Mar 2020.
- United Nations. (2018). Analytical framework on risk and resilience. <https://www.unsystem.org/content/analytical-framework-risk-and-resilience>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- van Voorhout, J. (2014). Starvation as a weapon of war in Syria: Prosecution and an R2P intervention. 22 August 2014. <https://www.thehagueinstituteforglobaljustice.org/latest-insights/latest-insights/commentary/starvation-as-a-weapon-of-war-in-syria-prosecution-and-an-r2p-intervention/>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- Wallerstein, M. B. (1980). Food for war, food for peace: United States food aid in a global context. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- World Peace Foundation. (2019). Starvation: Vital amendment to the Rome Statute unanimously passes. 6 December 2019. <https://sites.tufts.edu/reinventingpeace/2019/12/06/starvation-vital-amendment-to-the-rome-statute-unanimously-passes/>. Accessed 20 Apr 2020.
- Zappalà, S. (2019). Conflict related hunger, 'starvation crimes' and UN Security Council Resolution 2417 (2018). Journal of International Criminal Justice, 17, 881–906.

Conflict Fieldwork

Brendan Ciarán Browne
Trinity College, Dublin, Ireland

Definition

Fieldwork that takes place against the backdrop of "conflict" carries with it many challenges and responsibilities and thus requires careful consideration. The difficulties associated with issues such as access and maintaining the primacy of guiding ethical principles in the fieldwork process take on greater significance when the site of inquiry is defined through its relationship to conflict. This chapter situates four key themes that the author considers of paramount importance when conducting a period of "conflict" fieldwork, namely, researcher positionality, the issue of time, maximizing the principle of "do no harm," and reclaiming ownership over impact. In so doing, the chapter seeks to encourage careful reflection from individuals and/or institutions which choose to include periods of time spent engaged in "conflict" research to ensure that greater attention is given to issues that are hitherto undervalued. The chapter concludes that ultimately fieldwork is a must for those interested in gaining a deeper and more nuanced understanding of the issues that are central to any conflict; however, the potential impact it can have on both the researched and researcher should be carefully evaluated.

Introduction

Those who have chosen to engage in fieldwork in areas of conflict or instability will inevitably have spent time, privately or publicly, ruminating on the experience, critiquing mistakes, considering regrets, and reflecting on ways of “doing” it better. Shaffir and Stebbins (1991, p. 1) in their seminal work, Experiencing Fieldwork, have suggested that “Fieldwork must certainly rank with the more disagreeable activities that humanity has fashioned for itself. It is usually inconvenient. . . sometimes physically uncomfortable, frequently embarrassing, and to a degree, always tense.” When that fieldwork takes place against the backdrop of violent conflict, whether sustained or sporadic, the challenges are amplified, with issues relating to, inter alia, safety, ethics, positionality, and time, placed under deeper scrutiny.

The author’s first experience of doing “conflict fieldwork,” broadly defined, was in 2011 when engaged in doctoral research in the West Bank, Palestine, at a time when the “Arab Spring” uprisings were attempting to (re)shape the geopolitics of the Middle East, with the impact on Palestine far from certain. Armed with a rucksack, a night’s accommodation, a stack of unanswered emails, the “go ahead” from a university ethics committee, and a lamentable dose of naivety, the author sought to navigate a complex and fluid environment in pursuit of qualitative “data” to unpack the manner in which public commemorations across the region were being designed and manipulated by political elites. Since then, reflexively considering the craft of conducting research in areas that are characterized by violent conflict and publishing these reflections has been somewhat of a recurrent mode of academic practice, mainly in an effort to situate ongoing experiences (having worked in/on Palestine ever since) within a voluminous and expanding body of academic work. Far from engaging in academic navel-gazing, the intention has always been to use a privileged pedagogical platform to encourage others to greater critique their own rationale for doing “conflict fieldwork” (broadly defined) with a view to stimulating conversation and ensuring that others are better prepared than the author was.

Sluka (1990) has previously argued that research encompassing periods of time spent on fieldwork in unstable or volatile regions has largely been avoided due to the exaggeration of associated dangers, coupled with the relative paucity of information available to guide those wishing to become engaged in the process. However, since his own pioneering work in Belfast, Northern Ireland, during the height of “the troubles,” a cursory glance at the “conflict fieldwork” genre to emerge since would suggest that researchers from across the disciplinary spectrum are choosing to conduct fieldwork in volatile settings, rather than musing on issues from afar. Crucially, those who do are more willing than ever to reflect critically on myriad issues that have occurred. Whereas such experiences were often unhelpfully shrouded in secrecy for fear of academic rebuke, the rapid increase in publication of personal reflection (Browne 2013; Browne and Moffett 2014; Cronin-Furman and Lake 2018) indicates that such reluctance to do so is being shunned.

In an increasingly warring and uncertain world, the need for research pertaining to conflict and violence and its impact on those who suffer most shows little sign of abating. When considered alongside the rapid neoliberalization of the modern-day university and the demands placed on researchers to ensure their work is “pioneering,” “impactful,” and “international,” those who focus on issues of conflict and violence are increasingly pushed to consider generating moments of “encounter” through work that involves an element of fieldwork, regardless of their preparedness or their capacity for doing so. Knott (2019, p. 5) has further argued that “There can also be a cache attached to dangerous research, and a fetishization of danger, in particular among graduate students who are incentivized to do more to stand out from their peers.” Such a need to differentiate, particularly among those whose primary focus is on researching violent conflict, shows little sign of abating as the academic job market continues to shrink. Moreover, as Cronin-Furman and Lake (2018, p. 611) have eloquently surmised:

Academics are rewarded professionally for first-hand insight and experience of the socio-political contexts that they are studying. With limited budgets and competitive tenure and promotion processes, environments that permit sensational or large-impact projects, which can be completed quickly and at low cost, make appealing research sites

Research sites that encompass a period of time spent in areas defined as “conflict zones” would seemingly appear to match this description. However, what has previously been referenced to as a growing “fetishism” for such work (Browne and McBride 2015) brings with it significant challenges and opens up charges of bad research practice. And while fervently maintaining the position that fieldwork is a must for those who seek to truly understand the lived experience of those for whom conflict and violence are the norm, in order to ensure that the maxim of “do no harm” is afforded more than lip-service, greater appreciation of issues including researcher positionality, power dynamics, ethical responsibility, and participant safety must occur before a decision to embark upon such “fieldwork” is reached. As Dr. Robin Luckham, in his opening salvo to Experiences in Researching Conflict & Violence, notes:

Those who investigate violence must come to terms with the harm violence inflicts on bodies, identities, communities and social relationships. They should also reckon with the possibility that social inquiry itself can unleash powerful emotions, disturb fragile compromises and even bring tangible harm to those who participate. (Rivas and Browne 2018, p. x)

Here, the aim is to reflect on several issues pertaining to “doing” conflict fieldwork and to draw attention to the attendant difficulties, challenges, and responsibilities therein. While hoping to avoid a crippling dose of “jargon disease,” terminologies will be unpacked with reference to a burgeoning literature that speaks to issues concerning ethics, positionality, and researcher responsibility. These issues will be considered alongside personal reflections and the work of others who have engaged in “conflict fieldwork.” Critically, it is important to note that how these reflections are considered will differ greatly depending on a number of factors. Thus, readers will benefit in situating the voice of the author, from the outset, as being one of privilege (an issue considered in more detail below) – a white, European, middle-class, cis-gender, able-bodied man in secure employment. Resultantly these reflections cannot (nor should they) generate a sense of universal applicability. They are personal reflections, situated alongside other scholarly contributions, on issues that the author considers worthy of greater appreciation when contemplating a period of “conflict fieldwork.” In addition, in speaking to an informed audience, there is no intention to generate a checklist of fieldwork “do” or “don’ts,” not least because every “conflict fieldwork” site differs greatly and seeking universality in terms of “best practice” is fruitless. Thus, the chapter ruminates on some of the more critical aspects of “doing” fieldwork in sites of conflict that the author has experienced while being in a number of conflict/transitional settings. The primary themes pertaining to the discussion below include positionality, sensitivity to unbalanced power dynamics, the importance of time spent, and reclaiming the concept of “impact.”

What Is “Conflict Fieldwork?”

Seeking a universal definition of what may constitute “conflict fieldwork” is a daunting task. The diverse range of international literature that transcends disciplinary boundaries, examining issues relating to the mechanics of “conflict fieldwork” and the reflections of those who consider themselves to be “conflict researchers,” when held at once, helps to set definitional parameters (see, e.g., Sriram et al. 2009; Kovats-Bernat 2002; Nilan 2002; Williams et al. 1992; Bell 2013; Sluka 1990; Nordstrom et al. 1995). Kovats-Bernat (2002) in reference to work conducted in Port-au-Prince, Haiti, chose the term “dangerous fields” rather than “conflict fieldwork” per se to define the location of his research. Others, such as researchers Alberti and Jenne (2019, p. 43), have opted to use the language of “challenging contexts,” noting that this includes “not only dangerous places where political violence is acute but also localities where researcher mobility is restricted by other variables, such as high crime rates, for instance.” They go on to argue that “Challenging contexts are also present where access is difficult in logistical terms,” with polarized political parties, far-right groups, etc., offered as examples.

In addition, terminologies such as “contexts of state fragility” (Cronin-Furman and Lake 2018, p. 611) have been used to define the spaces in which “conflict fieldwork” takes place. Therefore, if we accept the multifaceted definitions above, “conflict fieldwork,” however defined, need not be restricted to that which takes place in spaces where inter- and intrastate conflict, war, or ethnic violence is the norm. Rather than become obsessive in attempts to settle upon workable definitions, of greater merit is the deconstruction of what the literature considers to be the most critical aspects of “doing” conflict fieldwork. This is particularly the case when one accepts that:

Research fields characterized by ethnic conflict are highly politicized and may thus become ‘mine-fields’, necessitating thorough and continuous reflection on the researchers’ relationship to the field. Associated with this is the sense of unpredictability that characterizes the field and that forces researchers to navigate even more carefully. (Gerharz 2017, p. 2)

Referencing the work of Malejacq and Mukhopadhyay (2016), Knott (2019, p. 144) further notes the challenging nature of the “conflict fieldwork” environment in that it involves a diverse range of actors that span a “complex spectrum of violence, from victims, through combatants to perpetrators, whose competing perspectives and interests the researcher has to balance.” Thus, “conflict fieldwork” can include that which takes place in relatively sanitized spaces, but which involves a tapestry of actors who may be in conflict with one another and who can become potential research participants. For the purposes of the present context, the most accessible interpretation of “conflict fieldwork” is that which takes place in violent spaces defined by periods of sustained armed conflict and involving violent confrontation between inter- and intrastate actors. However, rather than becoming embroiled in the never-ending need for definitional certainty, what is worth emphasizing is the fact that choosing to engage in “conflict fieldwork” necessitates careful consideration of a wide range of potential risks and associated harms, not solely to those who inform the work that is being conducted (although, of course this is a priority), but also harm to the researcher themselves (a hitherto underappreciated aspect of “doing” conflict fieldwork).

At this important juncture, it is worth noting that greater acceptance should be given to the view that not every “good” research proposal that includes a “conflict fieldwork” component necessarily ought to be carried out. If, upon balance, it appears that the logistical and ethical challenges associated with engaging in “conflict fieldwork” are significant, and that these then in turn outweigh the purported benefits for the communities for whom the research will ultimately be relevant, it is incumbent on researchers to be honest and transparent about the rationale for being a physical presence in what are fragile environments. “Conflict fieldwork” therefore requires constant, in-depth, and honest reflection of the aims and outcomes to be achieved beyond simply providing moments of intrigue or encounter for those keen on racking up air miles or collecting “exotic” visa stamps.

On the Issue of Positionality

Appreciating the impact – inadvertent or not – of one’s very presence in any given research site, particularly that which is characterized by persistent exposure to sustained levels of conflict, ought to be considered one of the paramount concerns when reflecting upon the decision to engage in “conflict fieldwork.” Issues such as, inter alia, gender, race, age, social class, religion, and how they impact upon the site of enquiry and help to (re)define the parameters of the relationship that develops between the researcher and those who inform their study are area that requires constant reappraisal as the research is ongoing (Kapoor 2004; Ortbals and Rincker 2009). Indeed, as Gerharz (2017, p. 2) has argued:

The challenge for researchers is to navigate the field by adjusting their position according to the ever-changing environment. What does this mean when we enter fields characterized by protracted conflict, where mutual mistrust, deep polarization, stereotyping, and exclusion shape society, more often than not along ethnic boundaries? Positioning becomes a much more intricate venture because it implies not only that our relatedness in the field might determine our perspectives on the others and vice versa, but also that it might affect our findings.

This issue is particularly acute when the global north/south dichotomy is distinctly pronounced. In such instances, researchers who engage in “conflict fieldwork” should pay particular attention to the “presentation of self” (Goffman 1959) with the attendant need to be continually reassessing the issue of researcher positionality within a fluid and evolving research environment, such as in areas defined by violent conflict. Sensitivity to positions of privilege, it is hoped, can help foster better, more meaningful researcher-researched relationships. In addition, greater awareness and appreciation of one’s researcher privilege can aid in mitigating the methodological challenges that are often prohibitive when engaging in periods of “conflict fieldwork.” Browne and McBride (2015) have argued that, in this sense, appreciation of one’s own position can aid the bona fides of the researcher, which in turn can help to foster greater access to a broader base of respondents and generate more meaningful data sets. Therefore, the “art” of positioning when engaging in “conflict fieldwork” is an active process, one that involves continuous reflective practice on the part of researchers (Shinozaki 2012). While such a conclusion may seem self-explanatory, Chereni (2014, p. 2) notes that:

...The manner in which the researchers’ identities and positionalities unfold during fieldwork interactions has attracted little attention in social science scholarship. Consequently, existing fieldwork accounts provide few opportunities for sharing insights as to how researchers can potentially negotiate, enact and perform multiple identities during the relational space of fieldwork in order to facilitate access to data.

On the Importance of Time

In determining the importance of time in any proposal, particularly one that encompasses a period of “conflict fieldwork,” there are two specific issues that stand out. First is the question of deciding upon the appropriate time in which to schedule a period of “conflict fieldwork,” and the second is that of deciding upon the duration of time one ought to spend engaged in the process. As noted above, questions can always be raised, depending on the site of inquiry and the nature of the work to be carried out, as to whether or not there is ever an appropriate time in which to embark upon a period of “conflict fieldwork.” However, researchers proposing “conflict fieldwork” should ultimately pay particular attention to assessing their own usefulness in being physically present in a given space, one defined by volatility and uncertainty, if they are of limited practical use to those impacted on the ground. In other words, when a conflict appears at its most intense, there is a stark difference between the erstwhile (and perhaps unskilled) “conflict fieldworker” and, for example, the humanitarian worker or conflict reporter. Ultimately, as with many of the issues raised in this chapter, there is no clear answer to this conundrum, other than to suggest that it should engender careful reflection and a weighing up of appropriateness of one’s physical presence in any chosen field versus a desire for gathering research data firsthand. Yet, such a view would be moot if the research in question is examining, for example, the immediate impact of conflict or violence on a specific population, or analysis of the weaponry being deployed during a conflict. The appropriate timing of the researcher’s presence in the field of inquiry may therefore be easy to determine. Thus, to summarize: any timing decision requires careful evaluation from afar, and decisions taken must not be determined, as is often the case, by project timelines submitted during the drafting process of grant applications.

A second issue pertaining to time concerns the amount of physical time spent present in a specific site of inquiry by those engaged in the “conflict fieldwork” process. Those who have been defined as the “over-researched” (Sukarieh and Tannock 2013), including vulnerable communities living in areas defined by violent conflict, have expressed frustration with constant and temporal exposure to researchers from university attaches, those who engage in often intrusive and insensitive extracting of personal reflections on their lived experience, without taking meaningful time in which to generate a relationship. Anthropologists and sociologists will be accustomed to long periods of ethnographic study, involving deep immersion in “conflict fieldwork.” Other disciplines place less emphasis on “conflict fieldwork” that prioritize sustained periods of time spent in the data collection process. While the period of time spent engaged in “conflict fieldwork” is dependent on myriad factors, including methodological preference of the researcher, capacity for the researcher to be absent from home for long periods of time, and relief from other university tasks, it would be hard to argue against the view that longer periods of time spent in the field of inquiry will, at least on paper, aid in the likelihood of generating better, and more meaningful, researcher-researched relationships. Reflecting on the author’s own work with vulnerable communities living in Palestine and Northern Ireland, those living at the sharp edge of conflict often expressed skepticism of researchers they perceived to be “parachuting in” to conduct “conflict fieldwork” for short and determined periods of time. Browne and McBride (2015) therefore highlight that in order to generate bona fides in areas that are often hard to access – areas referred to as “politically sensitive” – researchers should spend more time “hanging out” (Geertz 1973) rather than immediately diving into the extractive research process. In their specific case, this “hanging out” required engaging in extracurricular activities (i.e., those activities that were not directly linked to the research) so as to break down barriers between researcher-researched and to “normalize” encounters. This sensitivity to time will thus help to ensure the generation of meaningful researcher-researched relationships and ultimately reduce power imbalances.

“Do No Harm”

As Fluehr-Lobban has suggested, it is nigh on impossible for researchers, or indeed their institutions, to predict, and therefore prevent, harm that may come to participants and researchers who engage in periods of “conflict fieldwork,” given the fluid nature of these fields of inquiry. That being said, the core principle that informs all research studies must remain the maxim of “do no harm,” one that assumes even greater significance when the work in question involves a period of time engaged in “conflict fieldwork.” Those who have ever opted for a period of “conflict fieldwork” in their research design will be well versed, and potentially frustrated by, the language of university ethics committees or institutional review boards. There exists an extensive, interdisciplinary literature on ethical practice, which focuses on issues such as data security, data storage, confidentiality, and access. Often the language of this literature, and the language of the ethics committee boardroom, can appear blunt or detached, miles away from the reality of “doing” conflict fieldwork. There is thus a disconnect that can exist between thinking ethically and acting ethically, and this difference is often one that comes into direct collision in areas where “conflict fieldwork” takes place. The extent to which there exists a “hierarchy of concern,” i.e., whether it is the researcher, the researched, or the integrity of the institution which ultimately informs the decisions of the ethics committees/review boards is open to debate. However, “conflict fieldwork,” with its ever-evolving and fluid nature, can often result in the blurring of the lines of ethical practice, when the research is in full flow. This hitherto underappreciated aspect of doing “conflict fieldwork” is explained by Cronin-Furman and Lake (2018, p. 611), who have noted that:

Contexts of state fragility or violent conflict constitute permissive environments in which researchers can find themselves (usually unintentionally) skirting the edges of what would be considered responsible research practice elsewhere. Their incentive structures, as well as those of their research subjects and local partners, generate potentially exploitative dynamics.

Similarly, “conflict fieldwork” presents myriad instances, whereby researchers are faced with moral conundrums in “real time,” necessitating quick, “on the feet” thinking. In areas devastated by violent conflict, with the existence of multiple layers of victim, with diverse needs, researchers can find themselves gaining access to a wide variety of potentially vulnerable respondents. Subsequently, less experienced researchers may inadvertently become in the position, whereby they engage highly vulnerable victims, intentionally or not, as participants in their research study, without appropriate due diligence. Given that aftercare for respondents is unlikely to be available in areas devastated by conflict, it is not unreasonable to question the appropriateness of engaging in any work that presents itself in a serendipitous way, if the necessary follow-up support and provisions have not been already factored in. As Cronin-Furman and Lake (2018, p. 607) eloquently summarize:

Qualitative researchers may find requests to interview victims or perpetrators of wartime violence granted with ease. Experimenters can coerce under-resourced NGOs to pursue interventions at odds with their organizational mandates. We posit that conflict contexts can constitute permissive environments in which researchers can engage in conduct that would be considered deeply problematic at home.

While there is a need to constantly be aware of one's ethical responsibilities when engaged in periods of "conflict fieldwork," Knott (2019, p. 140) has drawn attention to the fact that, leaving the field of inquiry, does not necessarily discharge one's ethical responsibility. Ethical issues often emerge as sites of inquiry evolve, which in turn requires the researcher to engage in a constant evaluation and reappraisal of the ethical soundness of their work. All of which leads to a return to the point offered above, not all "good" ideas necessarily make for "good," or in this case, "ethically sound" research projects.

Reclaiming "Impact"

As the institutional buzzword of the day in terms of the "value" that is placed upon our research, "impact" is increasingly driving researchers, including for the purposes of this chapter, "conflict fieldworkers" to factor into their research, fieldwork that engages with conflict affected communities, firsthand. And while not departing from the position adopted from the outset, namely, that such work is fruitful, necessary, and generative, it is vital that those who "do" such work reclaim the true meaning of the word "impact." Doing "conflict fieldwork" can have a profoundly negative impact on the well-being – physical and mental – of those who choose to do so, an issue that remains under-researched and thus underappreciated. While we correctly point to the critical importance of ensuring that all harm to participants in any study is fully negated (where possible), of equal importance should be ensuring that researchers themselves are afforded equal protection against the harms that such work can bring about. To this end, greater support should be offered from research institutions, those who ultimately benefit from the value of the work produced, to ensure that they uphold their duty of care to the "fieldworker." International NGOs, including organs of the United Nations, recognize the deleterious impact of "being in the field" and factor in periods of "R&R" to ensure the well-being of staff. Research institutions, including universities, would do well to establish networks of support to ensure that those returning from periods of time spent on "conflict fieldwork" are able to cope with the processing of what can be, at times, traumatic experiences.

Summary

This brief examination of a number of key themes surrounding "conflict fieldwork" has sought to, firstly, define "conflict fieldwork," before discussing the critical importance of appreciating researcher positionality, to reflect critically on the importance of time, and to highlight the primacy of the "do no harm" principle. In so doing, it has situated the discussion around these key themes alongside emergent literature, in an effort to highlight wider thinking around the subject matter. While not wishing to diminish in any way the importance of "doing" fieldwork that takes place against the backdrop of conflict or instability, it has been the intention of the author to ask those who do to think more critically about their rationale for doing so, by being more attuned to their position of privilege and more sensitive to potential elements of bad practice that may have crept into their craft. "Conflict fieldwork" is a privilege, but one that carries with it great responsibility. As Brewer (2016, p. 2) has argued, research engagement in areas considered to be "dangerous fields" requires adaptability, and thus the greatest trait to be learned is that of researcher flexibility, rather than blind conformity to ethical codes. Ultimately it is the researcher's capacity for being adaptable and sensitive to their presence in "conflict" environments that will be of most value when navigating periods of fieldwork in unstable or violent spaces.

Cross-References

- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Reflexivity in the Study of Security and Conflict

References

- Alberti, C., & Jenne, N. (2019). Getting prepared to be prepared: How interpersonal skills aid fieldwork in challenging contexts. Qualitative Sociological Review, 15(3), 42–62.
- Bell, K. (2013). Doing qualitative fieldwork in Cuba: Social research in politically sensitive locations. International Journal of Social Research Methodology, 16(2), 109–124.
- Brewer, J. D. (2016). The ethics of ethical debates in peace and conflict research: Notes towards the development of a research covenant. Methodological Innovations, 9, 1–11.
- Browne, B. (2013). Recording the personal: The benefits in maintaining research diaries for documenting the emotional and practical challenges of fieldwork in unfamiliar settings. International Journal of Qualitative Methods, 12, 420–435.
- Browne, B., & McBride, R. (2015). Politically sensitive encounters: Ethnography, access and the benefits of "hanging out". Qualitative Sociological Review, 11(1), 34–48.
- Browne, B., & Moffett, L. (2014). Finding your feet in the field: Critical reflections of early career researchers on field research in transitional societies. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 6(2), 223–237.
- Chereni, A. (2014). Positionality and collaboration during fieldwork: Insights from research with co-nationals living abroad. Forum: Qualitative Social Research, 15(3), Article 11.
- Cronin-Furman, K., & Lake, M. (2018). Ethics abroad: Fieldwork in fragile and violent contexts. Political Science & Politics, 51(3), 607–614.
- Geertz, C. (1973). The interpretation of cultures. New York: Basic Books.
- Gerharz, E. (2017). Navigating unpredictable sites: Methodological implications of positioning during and after fieldwork in conflict societies. Social Analysis, 61(3), 1–18.
- Goffman, E. (1959). The presentation of self in everyday life. Garden City: Doubleday.
- Kapoor, I. (2004). Hyper-self-reflexive development? Spivak on representing the Third World "Other". Third World Quarterly, 25(4), 627–647.
- Knott, E. (2019). Beyond the field: Ethics after fieldwork in politically dynamic contexts. Perspectives on Politics, 17(1), 140–153.
- Kovats-Bernat, J. C. (2002). Negotiating dangerous fields: Pragmatic strategies for fieldwork amid violence and terror. American Anthropologist, 104(1), 208–222.
- Malejacq, R., & Mukhopadhyay, D. (2016). The "tribal politics" of field research: A reflection on power and partiality in 21st-century warzones. Perspectives on Politics, 14(4), 1011–1028.
- Nordstrom, C., Antonius, C. G., & Robben, M. (Eds.). (1995). Fieldwork under fire: Contemporary studies of violence and survival. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Nilan, P. (2002). Dangerous fieldwork're-examined: the question of researcher subject position. Qualitative Research, 2(3), pp 363–386.
- Ortbals, C. D., & Rincker, M. E. (2009). Fieldwork, identities, and intersectionality: Negotiating gender, race, class, religion, nationality, and age in the research field abroad. Political Science & Politics, 42(2), 287–290.
- Rivas, A. M., & Browne, B. C. (eds.) (2018). Experiences in researching conflict and violence: Fieldwork interrupted. Policy Press.
- Shaffir, W. B., & Stebbins, R. A. (Eds.). (1991). Experiencing fieldwork: An inside view of qualitative research. London: Sage.
- Shinozaki, K. (2012). Transnational dynamics in researching migrants: Self-reflexivity and boundary-drawing in fieldwork. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 35(10), 1810–1827.
- Sluka, J. A. (1990). Participant observation in violent social contexts. Human Organization, 49(2), 114–126.
- Sriram, C. L., et al. (2009). Surviving field research: Working in violent and difficult situations. London: Routledge.
- Sukarieh, M., & Tannock, S. (2013). On the problem of over-researched communities: The case of the Shatila Palestinian refugee camp in Lebanon. Sociology, 47(3), 494–508.
- Williams, T., Dunlap, E., Johnson, B. D., & Hamid, A. (1992). Personal safety in dangerous places. Journal of Contemporary Ethnography, 21(3), 343–374.

Conflict in Sri Lanka

- ▶ Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka

Conflict Research

- ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research

Conflict Resolution

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Peace Journalism
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia
- ▶ Yemen Conflict

Conflict Sensitive Journalism

- ▶ Peace Journalism

Conflict Transformation

- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

Orli Fridman
Faculty of Media and Communications (FMK),
Singidunum University, Belgrade, Serbia
School for International Training (SIT), Belgrade, Serbia

Synonyms

Alternative commemorations; Calendars; Contested pasts; Counter memory; Memory;
Memory activism

Description

This entry discusses the role of memory studies in the analysis of societies in and after conflict and in the study of processes of peacebuilding and peace formation (Richmond 2013) from below. It addresses the following questions: What are the ways in which the social organization of memory shape processes of post-conflict remembrance? What are the modes in which communities and groups preserve and remember the past, commemorate it, deny, or obliterate it? What is the role of memory activists and alternative commemorative events in processes of reconciliation? By discussing the dynamics of memory work and memory activism, and the tensions between state-sponsored and alternative counter-memories, this entry underlines the importance of the study of spaces of memory as an arena of political struggles. Memory regimes and mnemonic actors, state calendars, and commemorative events are all part of the social organization of memory, which shapes the politics of memory in and after conflict.

Introduction

In the aftermath of conflict, war, repressive authoritarian rule, or mass atrocities, while violence may have ended, and armed conflict may have ceased, conflicts over narratives and representations of the past often endure. The past then becomes a contested sphere, as social disputes may arise over memories, their social legitimization, and claims to “truth” (Jelin 2003). Once memories become the object of conflicts and struggles, even of “civil wars of memory” (Kuljić 2009), they involve various actors as they generate meanings of the past framed by the power relations in which their actions are embedded (Jelin 2003).

Around the globe, modes of remembering and forgetting after conflict have been a fertile ground for research. Different models for societies to deal with their violent pasts are at the heart of numerous contemporary studies and debates. The interlinked dynamics of remembering and forgetting (Zerubavel 1995; Connerton 1989, 2009) can be traced in many cases, societies, and practices. To name only a few: from to the post-dictatorship Spanish pact of forgetting (Aguilar and Ramirez-Barat 2017), to politics of regret as in the case of Germany (Olick 2007), or to cultural amnesia regarding the history of slavery in the United States (Howard Ross 2018).

Maurice Halbwachs (1877–1945), the founding father of the field of memory studies, articulated in his landmark 1925 work On Collective Memory a number of underlying concepts concerning the collective dimensions of memory. These concepts are central to peace and conflict studies scholars' mnemonic explorations of the social shapes of the past. Memory, for Halbwachs, is first of all a matter of how minds work together in society (Olick et al. 2011). His sociological analysis links society to the individual precisely through memory (Aguilar 2002), giving the term "collective memory" unprecedented theoretical weight (Olick et al. 2011). Memory therefore is not just individual, nor is it just a binding activity for groups; it is their cultural inheritance, whether actively or passively maintained (as quoted in Olick 2007). As according to Halbwachs:

While the collective memory endures and draws strength from its base in a coherent body of people, it is individuals as group members who remember. There are as many collective memories as there are groups and institutions in a society. It is, of course individuals who remember, not groups or institutions, but these individuals, being located in a specific group context, draw on that context to remember or recreate the past. Hence, every collective memory requires the support of a group delimited in space and time. (Halbwachs 1992)

As such, the forms memory takes vary according to (its) social organization and to the groups to which any individual belongs (Olick et al. 2011). Equally significant is Halbwachs' assertion that memory is framed in the present as much as in the past and is variable rather than constant (Ibid.). Thus, the analysis of collective memories of past mass atrocities or injustices, of conflict and wars, and the study of commemorative rituals constructed around them are all crucial for deepening the theoretical and empirical discussions in critical inquiries in peace and conflict studies.

The aim of this entry is to bring to the fore the role of social memory studies in the analysis of societies in and after conflict and in the study of processes of peacebuilding and peace formation (Richmond 2013) from below. It addresses the following questions: What are the ways in which the social organization of memory shape processes of post-conflict remembrance? What are the modes in which communities (and not only individuals) preserve and remember the past, commemorate it, deny, or obliterate it? What is the role of memory activists and alternative commemorative events in processes of reconciliation? By discussing the dynamics of memory work and memory activism, and the tensions between state-sponsored and alternative counter-memories in what unfolds, this entry underlines the importance of the study of spaces of memory as an arena of political struggles. Memory regimes and mnemonic actors, state calendars, and commemorative events are all part of the social organization of memory, which shapes the politics of memory (Kubik and Bernhard 2014) in and after conflict.

Calendars, Commemorative Events, and Mnemonic Battles

The second half of the twentieth century was marked by the appearance of a growing body of literature that explored the social construction of collective memory and the role of commemorative rituals and narratives in contemporary social life and their impact on the political sphere (Zerubavel 1995). What is often referred to as the "memory boom" (Winter 2001) raised fundamental questions for the field of memory studies: How do members of society remember? How is the meaning of the past constructed? Although Halbwachs pointed at the fluidity of collective memory, as memory scholar Yael Zerubavel noted, he did not address the question of how memory is transformed. According to her, "the concept of commemoration emerges as central to our understanding of the dynamic of memory change” (Zerubavel 1995). Through commemorative rituals, such as the celebration of a communal festival, the participation in a memorial service, or the observance of a holiday, “groups create, articulate, and negotiate their shared memories of particular events” (Ibid.). It is the recurrence of commemorative performances and mnemonic rituals that contributes to an overall sense of continuity of collective memory. Thus, understanding commemoration is one way to gain insight into how societies deal with their violent past(s) or, even more broadly, with difficult pasts involving disputes, tensions, and conflict or trauma (Vinitzky-Seroussi 2009).

Commemoration, according to Schwartz (2001), is the tangible public presentation and articulation of collective memory and may include written texts (e.g., poems and eulogies), music (e.g., anthems and inspirational songs), icons, monuments, shrines, naming practices (e.g., streets), history books, museums, and mnemonic rituals. Each act of commemoration reproduces a commemorative narrative, a story about a particular past that provides a moral message for group members. Each commemoration reconstructs a specific segment of the past and is therefore fragmentary in nature. Yet, these commemorations together contribute to the formation of a master commemorative narrative that structures the collective memory (Zerubavel 1995). The master commemorative narrative focuses on the group’s distinct social identity, its historical development, and the formation of the nation. Hence, the power of collective memory does not lie in its accurate, systematic mapping of the past but in establishing basic images that articulate and reinforce a particular ideological stance in the present.

Another central element in the examination of the sociology of memory, and of commemorations of contested or difficult pasts, is the existence of social timeline(s) as constructed by mnemonic communities such as families, ethnic groups, and nations (Zerubavel 2003a, b; Irwin-Zarecka 1994). Examining calendars as “sites” of memory (Nora 1989) allows us to better grasp what such processes of the social organization of memory in fact entail, in particular as it relates to the study of commemorative holidays and rituals. In his analysis of national calendars, Eviatar Zerubavel traced the institutionalization of commemorative holidays, which help establish an annual cycle of remembrance. According to him, “our social environments affect not only what we remember but also when we remember it” (Zerubavel 2003a). Such mnemonic “editing” of the group’s past may also imply mnemonic obliterations of entire populations, groups, or events (Zerubavel 2003b). This act of editing is crucial to the study of the shaping of memory in postwar societies and in processes of post-conflict transformation. In the aftermath of conflict, contested narratives, and memories about past perpetrators or victims, dates of victory and defeat, of mass war crimes and atrocities, can be marked on or omitted from the calendar.

As such, two forms of commemoration of difficult pasts include (1) multivocal commemoration (Wagner-Pacifici and Schwartz 1991, as quoted in Vinitzky-Seroussi 2009), likely to emerge in a consensual political culture, and (2) fragmented commemoration, likely to develop in a conflictual political setting (Vinitzky-Seroussi 2009). In cases as the latter, the commemoration of the past becomes a contested territory in which groups engaging in political conflict promote competing views of the past in order to gain control over the political center (Zerubavel 1995). The past is then openly contested, as rival parties (rival mnemonic communities) may engage in a conflict over its interpretation. Such mnemonic battles (Zerubavel 1995, 2003b) may involve entire groups and are often fought in public forums.

Memory Activism and Hashtag Memory Activism: Alternative Calendars and Alternative Commemorative Events

Spaces of disputes over the past, as discussed above, generate not only conflicts but also counter-memories and alternative calendars, which are here examined and discussed through the framework of memory activism. Counter-memory is essentially oppositional and stands in hostile and subversive relation to collective memory (Zerubavel 1995). In this contested arena of competing views of the past, the emergence of alternative commemorative events and the creation of alternative calendars become vibrant fields for analysis (Fridman 2015). In the aftermath of conflict, memory activists engage in memory work, as they challenge hegemonic and state-sponsored memory and interpretation of the past – that is, the work of those who are “actively involved in the processes of symbolic transformation and elaboration of meanings of the past: human beings who ‘labor’ on and with memories of the past” (Jelin 2003). Often conceived in terms of a struggle “against oblivion” (Ibid.), against silence and denial, the demand is to remember as much as to remind, so as not to repeat.

Memory activism is activism oriented toward the past. It is a knowledge-based effort for consciousness-raising and political change undertaken outside the channels of the state (Gutman 2017). While the political motivation behind memory-activist initiatives may vary, this entry considers the works of memory activists aiming to advance peace and reconciliation. It underlines the work and mnemonic practices of memory activists in producing alternative and counter-memories and alternative knowledge of contested pasts in the context of critical peace and conflict studies.

This corresponds with discussions on the “local turn” and the focus on the local, which stands at the heart of the ongoing critique of the liberal peace project (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Richmond 2006). The study of “everyday peace” and “bottom-up peace” recognizes the agency and significance of actors at the sub-state level (Mac Ginty and Firchow 2016). Similarly, the study of alternative commemorative events as established and practiced by memory activists draws our attention to bottom-up actions, outside the channels of the state, and to the agency of actors engaged in the reinterpretation of the past as they put forward their mnemonic demands, especially in societies marked by denial and silencing of the past.

Memory activists use mnemonic practices and cultural repertoires as means for political ends (Gutman 2017). Through local initiatives activists may discuss memories portrayed differently by the state and insist on commemorating crimes or atrocities that are otherwise erased. Various practices can be traced, from alternative commemorative events to the establishment of alternative commemorative rituals from the demand for a monument to be built or a plaque to be placed, to the production of educational materials to inform the public about the history of a difficult past. Such commemorative claims are often found in onsite actions, in places of past atrocities, in sites where mass crimes were committed or where concentration camps were established.

Onsite actions may be complemented by the use of online social platforms for commemoration. In recent years, in light of the “connective turn” in the digital age in memory studies (Hoskins 2018), new research has revealed the growth of online activism (Lievrouw 2011; Bennett and Segerberg 2012) and in particular online commemorations and online memory activism (Fridman and Ristić forthcoming; Fridman 2019). Tracing mnemonic practices such as hashtag memory activism allows us to focus on the ways in which technological change and innovation have nuanced, enriched, or otherwise affected remembrance. Hashtag memory activism refers to the online commemoration of a contested past on social media that entails the use of hashtags as a mnemonic practice. Hashtag memory activism can be employed as a mnemonic tactic that enables the creation of alternative platforms for remembrance, with the aim of sharing and disseminating alternative knowledge about a contested past among societies in and after conflict (Fridman 2019). New mnemonic rituals appear alongside older and more established ones, as commemorations expand beyond the local, to the transnational and online spheres of memory work (Watson and Chen 2016; Fridman and Ristić forthcoming; Tirosh 2018). As such, novel online memory affordances may contribute to establishing a culture of just memory that takes into consideration memory ethics and promotes the “duty to remember” the stories of the oppressed and marginalized (Margalit 2002; Ricoeur 1999 as quoted in Tirosh 2018).

Remembering the Wars of the 1990s: The Case of Serbia and the Post-Yugoslav Region

More than two decades after the beginning of the wars of the breakup of Yugoslavia (the wars of the 1990s), new memory regimes are in place in all the post-Yugoslav successor states. The order of memories in all the states that have emerged from the former Yugoslavia has been successfully narrowed, nationalized, and even purified (Kuljić 2009). Memory abuses were a common practice among politicians and intellectuals during the 1990s and continued to flourish in the decades that followed. Scholarly analyses and academic research have examined processes of remembering and forgetting the wars of the 1990s, of states of silence, denial, and responsibility-taking among victims and perpetrators of these conflicts as well as among their descendants (see Gordy 2013; Duhaček 2010; Kuljić 2008; Moll 2013; Plamberger 2016; Visoka 2016).

The wars of the 1990s are only a segment of a number of other issues in the region subject to conflicts over memories in recent decades. As such, the Second World War, the narrative of the people's liberation, the antifascist struggle, and the victory of the partisans, which were all part of the founding myths and the main source of legitimacy for post-Second World War Yugoslavia, are among the themes and issues being re-narrated, negated, and adjusted to fit new(er) narrative frameworks (Đureinović 2018). Processes of historical revisionism that began in the 1980s have continued well after the 1990s through rehabilitation processes enabled by new memory regimes and memory laws. In Serbia after 2000, "the battle for the truth about the Second World War is being fought on the level of most state institutions as well as in text books" (Stojanović 2011). As such, the socialist era turned out to be the ideal victim of the new interpretation of history in Serbia (Ibid.).

More broadly and as related to the memories of the wars of the 1990s, in the aftermath of socialist Yugoslavia, newly created state structures engaged in the trivialization of war crimes. Such processes conceptualized these incomprehensible crimes as necessary defense and at the same time relativized, trivialized, and slowly sent them into oblivion (Kuljić 2009). The Yugoslav master commemorative narrative was replaced in each of the successor states with new national master commemorative narratives aimed at strengthening national identities. Instead of the former Yugoslav calendar, the new states' calendars were successfully narrowed and nationalized and indicated most of all the mnemonic editing and the obliteration of any critical perspectives toward the existence of Yugoslavia, the reasons and ways it came to its end, and the excessive use of violence and the perpetration of crimes during the wars in Croatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and Kosovo. These mnemonic editing have shaped and continue to shape the collective memories and narratives of the wars of the 1990s. Even more so, they have hindered postwar reconciliation. New generations born after the wars have little access to critical knowledge about the 1990s, as they are subject to national and nationalistic mnemonic socializations that include mostly silence and denial of past wrongdoings. As noted by the Belgrade-based historian Dubravka Stojanović:

A number of steps were taken, which undoubtedly demonstrated to the public that the change was not just political but literally speaking, historical. From the change of street names, demolition of monuments to socialist heroes, to the change of state holidays and the ways in which past events were commemorated. (Stojanović 2011)

The new calendar of the Republic of Serbia reflects these trends as the ongoing social organization of memory continues to evolve yet remains fragmented. Post-Yugoslav, post-Milošević Serbia opted to place ideas, events, and symbols from the nineteenth century at the center of its new identity, discourses, calendar, and value systems (Petrović 2013). The Yugoslav master commemorative narrative was replaced with a new Serbian master commemorative narrative, intended to strengthen Serbian national identity. Almost none of the events of the wars of the breakup of Yugoslavia are marked on the official state calendar. Primarily, it is the memory of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) bombing and Serbian victimhood that are marked on the calendar and have been commemorated in official state-sponsored events since 2015. Other events, especially those concerning war crimes from this period, are buried under heavy silence. Anti-war groups have been attempting to break this silence since their inception in the early 1990s as the wars began. Likewise, memory activists have addressed this silence in their work after the ousting of Milošević in October 2000.

Memory activism in Serbia has emerged as a continuation of the anti-war activism of the 1990s through the post-2000 peace activism of the Women in Black. It can be traced through the analysis of rituals of annual alternative commemorations of crimes committed in the 1990s. The formation of alternative commemorative events established by the Women in Black, the first generation of memory activists in Serbia, joined by individuals and members of other groups, challenges the dominant representation of the wars of the breakup of Yugoslavia in Serbia (Fridman 2015, 2018). Following a decade of feminist activism against nationalism, militarism, and war, and against the regime of Slobodan Milošević (Papić 2002; Dević 1997; Fridman 2011), anti-war civil society groups in Serbia enhanced their engagement with the battle of interpretations of the recent wars.

The Women in Black activists, joined by activists from other civil society groups such as the Humanitarian Law Center (HLC), the Center for Cultural Decontamination (CZKD), the Helsinki Committee, the Youth Initiative for Human Rights (YIHR), and others, formed an alternative civic calendar through the commemoration of events and dates related to the wars of the 1990s. The main event and main alternative commemorative ritual have manifested itself in the July 10 annual commemoration of the victims of Srebrenica, in Belgrade (Fridman 2015), while other war events too have been commemorated over the years. To mention only a few, from the commemoration of the beginning of the siege of Sarajevo in 1992 on April 6, to the commemoration of the day of the end of the siege on Vukovar in 1991, on November 18. Street action in the form of silent vigils, widely practiced already in the 1990s, commemorates and raises awareness of the innocent victims of the wars, regardless of their ethnicity, raising questions of responsibility, as part of their demand for peace and justice. Such street actions are well documented (Simić and Daly 2011; Fridman 2011, 2015) and were handed on to the next generation of memory activists, who came of age or were born after the conflicts, as a commemorative legacy.

As such, the legacies of the wars of the 1990s are at the heart of the civic engagement of the second generation of memory activists. Just like the activists of the first generation, they take part in alternative commemorative events as well as in the production of alternative knowledge and education of young people about their recent histories otherwise silenced in the public sphere. The prevailing representation and memories of the 1990s among young people in Serbia today are limited to the 1999 NATO bombing and then, more broadly, to the image of the 1990s as “abnormal years” (Fridman and Hercigonja 2017). The challenge of engaging with alternative knowledge about the wars of the 1990s stems from what Ivana Spasić (2002) articulated in her analysis of the politics of everyday life in Serbia: “Serbian responsibility in initiating the wars in former Yugoslavia is only sporadically identified; war crimes are still too often something that ‘has to be proven’ or ‘was done by all sides’.”

It is therefore imperative to study the generational shifts in memory activism while attending not only to mnemonic rituals and practices but also to mnemonic articulations and claims. In this case, the framing of the argumentation has changed, from “Not in My Name,” the Women in Black slogan since the early 1990s, to “Too Young to Remember, Determined Never to Forget” (Premladi da se sećamo, odlučni da nikada ne zaboravimo), the slogan of the younger generation of activists from the Youth Initiative for Human Rights (YIHR) (Fridman 2018). The YIHR alternative calendar, which they internally referred to as the bloody calendar (Krvavi kalendar), consists of dates of alternative commemorative events, some of which have been established already by the Women in Black, and others that they have added subsequently, such as the commemoration of the 1995 Kapija massacre in Tuzla, Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the 1999 Suva Reka massacre in Kosovo.

In their innovations, the second generation of memory activists has also added some new mnemonic practices to the silent vigils. Online commemorations and hashtag memory activism mark such innovative engagement. A number of hashtags have been prominent in the analysis of new mnemonic claims put forward by the activists. To name a few: #sedamhiljada (seven thousand), as related to the call for the commemoration of the 20th anniversary of the Srebrenica massacre, eventually banned by Belgrade authorities; #nisunasiheroji (not our heroes), as related to the demand of young memory activists in Serbia and in the region to treat returning ICTY convicts as war criminals rather than war heroes; and #whitearmbandday (#danbjelihtraka), an online transnational commemoration of crimes committed in Prijedor and the demand for a monument and the right to memory. The analysis of these new mnemonic practices and online commemorations allows for the examination of the circulation of memory from local to regional and transnational memory activism (Fridman and Ristić, forthcoming). They claim their struggle to be not only a national one but a regional one by using the same message and the same hashtag, in both online and onsite actions, throughout the post-Yugoslav region. As such, activists from other successor states of the former Yugoslavia often join forces, as a region of memory, in their actions onsite as well as online. Such cooperation among memory activists holds the potential for future processes of reconciliation and peacebuilding from below.

Summary

The study of commemorative events and memory politics in societies emerging from conflict and war contributes to a deeper understanding of processes of peace formation and peacebuilding from below. The analysis of mnemonic practices put forward by memory activists, and of the establishment of alternative commemorative events (onsite and online), as well as alternative calendars, offers an analytical framework for the examination and understanding of processes of dealing with difficult pasts, as bottom-up processes, encompassing peacebuilding from below. Memory activism as a branch of peace activism centers around the agency of memory activists in forming commemorative platforms, as manifested in commemorative rituals in societies in and after conflict. As the empirical evidence in this entry shows, this framework offers definitions and tools, useful for critical inquiries in peace and conflict studies.

References

- Aguilar, P. (2002). Memory and amnesia: The role of the Spanish Civil War in the transition to democracy. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Aguilar, P., & Ramirez-Barat, C. (2017). Amnesty and reparations without truth or justice in Spain. In N. Wouters (Ed.), Transitional justice and memory in Europe (1945–2013) (pp. 199–258). Cambridge, MA: Intersentia.
- Bennett, W. L., & Segerberg, A. (2012). The logic of connective action: Digital media and the personalization of contentious politics. Information, Communication & Society, 15(5), 739–768.
- Connerton, P. (1989). How societies remember. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Connerton, P. (2009). How modernity forgets. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Dević, A. (1997). Anti-war initiatives and the un-making of civic identities in the former Yugoslavia republics. Journal of Historical Sociology, 10(2), 119–156.
- Duhaček, D. (2010). Breme Našeg Doba: Odgovornost I rasuđivanje u delu Hane Arent (The burden of our time: Responsibility and reasoning in Hannah Arendt). Belgrade: Circulus.
- Đureinović, J. (2018). (Trans)national Memories of the Common Past in the Post-Yugoslav Space. In S. Berger & C. Tekin (Eds.), History and belonging: Representations of the past in contemporary European politics (pp. 106–121). New York: Berghahn.
- Fridman, O. (2011). It was like fighting a war with our own people: Anti-war Activism in Serbia during the 1990s. Nationalities Papers, 39, 507–522.
- Fridman, O. (2015). Alternative calendars and memory work in Serbia: Anti-war activism after Milošević. Memory Studies, 8, 212–226.
- Fridman, O. (2018). “Too young to remember determined not to forget”: Memory activists engaging with

- returning ICTY convicts. International Criminal Justice Review, 28, 423–437.
- Fridman, O. (2019). ‘Hashtag memory activism’: Online commemorations and online memory activism. A paper presented at the international conference: CEEISA-ISA 2019, Belgrade 17–19 June.
- Fridman, O., & Hercigonja, S. (2017). Protiv Nenormalnog: An analysis of the #protivdiktature. Protests in the context of memory politics of the 1990s in Serbia. Contemporary Southeastern Europe, 4, 12–25.
- Fridman, O., & Ristić, K. (forthcoming). Online transnational memory activism and commemoration: The case of the white armband day. In A. Sierp & J. Wüstenberg (Eds.), Agency in transnational memory politics. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Gordy, E. (2013). Guilt, responsibility, and denial. The past at stake in post-Milošević Serbia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Gutman, Y. (2017). Memory activism: Reimagining the past for the future in Israel-Palestine. Nashville: Vanderbilt University Press.
- Halbwachs, M. (1992). On collective memory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hoskins, A. (2018). The Restless Past: an introduction to digital memory and media. In Digital Memory Studies: Media Pasts in Transition, edited by Andrew Hoskins, 1–24. New York: Routledge, Taylor & Francis Group.
- Howard Ross, M. (2018). Slavery in the North: Forgetting history and recovering memory. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Irwin-Zarecka, I. (1994). Frames of remembrance: The dynamics of collective memory. New Brunswick: Transaction.
- Jelin, E. (2003). State repression and the labors of memory. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Kubik, J., & Bernhard, M. (2014). A theory of the politics of memory. In M. Bernhard & J. Kubik (Eds.), Twenty years after communism. The politics of memory and commemoration (pp. 7–34). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kuljić, T. (2008). Istorijske, političke i herojske generacije: Načrt okvira i primena (Historical, political and heroic generations: Draft framework and application). Filozofija i Društvo, 1, 69–106.
- Kuljić, T. (2009). Remembering crimes – Proposal and reactions. In D. Vujadinović & V. Goati (Eds.), Between authoritarianism and democracy (Serbia at the political crossroads) (Vol. III, pp. 197–212). Belgrade: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung and Centar for Democratic Transition.
- Lievrouw, L. A. (2011). Alternative and activist new media (Digital media and society series). Cambridge, UK/ Malden: Polity.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Firchow, P. (2016). Top-down and bottom-up narratives of peace and conflict. Politics, 36(3), 308–323.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Moll, N. (2013). Fragmented memories in a fragmented country: Memory competition and political identity-building in today’s Bosnia and Herzegovina. Nationalities Papers, 41(6), 910–935.
- Nora, P. (1989). Between memory and history: Les Lieux de Mémoire. Representations, 26, 7–24.
- Olick, J. K. (2007). The politics of regret: On historical memory and historical responsibility. New York: Routledge.
- Olick, J., Vinitzky-Seroussi, V., & Levy, D. (2011). Introduction. In J. Olick, V. Vinitzky-Seroussi, & D. Levy (Eds.), The collective memory reader (pp. 3–62). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Papić, Ž. (2002). Europe after 1989: Ethnic wars, the fascistization of civil society and body politics in Serbia. In G. Griffin & R. Braidotti (Eds.), Thinking differently: A reader in European Women’s Studies (pp. 127–144). London/New York: Zed Books.
- Petrović, T. (2013). Serbia’s Quest for a Usable Past. Available at: <http://www.iwm.at/read-listen-watch/transit-online/serbias-quest-for-a-usable-past/>.
- Plamberger, M. (2016). How generations remember: Conflicting histories and shared memories in post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Richmond, O. P. (2006). The problem of peace: Understanding the liberal peace. Conflict, Security and Development, 6(3), 291–314.
- Richmond, O. P. (2013). Failed statebuilding versus peace formation. Cooperation and Conflict, 38(3), 378–400.
- Schwartz, B. (2001). Commemorative objects. In N. Smelser & P. Baltes (Eds.), International encyclopedia of the social and behavioral sciences (pp. 2267–2272). Amsterdam: Elsevier.
- Simić, O., & Daly, K. (2011). “One Pair of Shoe, One Life”: Steps towards accountability for genocide in Srebrenica. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 5, 1–15.
- Spasić, I. (2002). Overcoming the past. Politics and everyday life in Serbia after Milošević. Paper presented at the international conference “Études balkaniques: état des savoirs et pistes de recherche”, Paris.
- Stojanović, D. (2011). Revisions of the Second World War history in Serbia. In S. P. Ramet & O. Listhaug (Eds.), Serbia and the Serbs in World War Two (pp. 247–264). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tirosh, N. (2018). iNakba, mobile memory and society’s memory. Mobile Media and Communication, 6(3), 350–366.
- Vinitzky-Seroussi, V. (2009). Yitzhak Rabin’s assassination and the dilemmas of commemoration. Albany: SUNY Press.
- Visoka, G. (2016). Arrested truth: Transitional justice and the politics of remembrance in Kosovo. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 8(1), 62–80.
- Watson, B. R., & Chen, M. S. (2016). @TodayIn1963: Commemorative journalism, digital collective remembering, and the March on Washington. Journalism Studies, 17(8), 1010–1029.

- Winter, J. (2001). The generation of memory: Reflections on the “Memory Boom” in contemporary historical studies. Canadian Military History, 10(3), 57–66.
- Zerubavel, Y. (1995). Recovered roots: Collective memory and the making of Israeli National Tradition. Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Zerubavel, E. (2003a). Calendars and history: A comparative study of the social organization of national memory. In J. Olick (Ed.), States of memory: Continuities, conflicts, and transformations in national retrospection (pp. 315–337). Durham: Duke University.
- Zerubavel, E. (2003b). Time maps: Collective memory and the social shape of the past. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press.

Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security

Filip Ejdus
Faculty of Political Science, University of Belgrade, Belgrade, Serbia

Synonyms

Freedom from anxiety; Security of being; Security of the self

Definition/Description

Ontological security denotes the ability of actors to maintain their biographical continuity and a healthy sense of self. It is maintained through routines and stable relationships with significant others. When actors are ontologically secure, they do not pose fundamental questions related to existence, finitude, autobiography, and relations. This allows them to maintain cognitive control of their environment, go on with daily life, and have a sense of purposeful agency. Ontological security is unmade by critical situations, unpredictable events that catch actors off guard and rupture their routines. As a result of crises, actors cannot sustain their narratives about the self and others, which is generating debilitating anxiety. Although the concept of ontological security was coined by psychologists and initially developed by sociologists, it has also travelled to International Relations (IR) where scholars have used to make sense of world politics, including peace and conflict.

Introduction

Ontological security is a basic need of actors for predictability of social order, stable relationships with others, and ability to maintain the narrative of the self. Ontological security is maintained through routines of daily life. When actors are ontologically secure, they have trust in the continuity of their social and material environments, ability to maintain a stable narrative of the self and others, and a sense of purposeful agency in the world. Over the past two decades, ontological security research in IR has grown considerably, and this chapter cannot do justice to the entirety of this research agenda (see also Mitzen and Larson 2017). The primary focus of this chapter is on how the pursuit of ontological security, by individual and collective actors, shapes conflict dynamics and peace processes. The chapter first gives a brief overview of the broader field of ontological security studies followed by a discussion of its central insights on peace and conflict.

Ontological Security Studies: Origins, Concepts, and Debates

The concept of ontological security was coined by psychiatrist Ronald David Laing (Laing 2010 [1960]) and was further developed in social-psychology (Erikson 1968). For R.D. Laing, an ontologically secure individual has a “sense of his presence in the world as a real, alive, whole, and, in a temporal sense, a continuous person” (Laing 2010: 39). On the contrary, an ontologically insecure person lacks this sense of internal or external permanence and is haunted by anxiety of engulfment, implosion, and petrification (Ibid: 39–65). According to Anthony Giddens, who imported the concept into sociology, ontological security is a “confidence that most human beings have in the continuity of their self-identity and in the constancy of the surrounding social and material environments of action” (Giddens 1991: 92).

To be ontologically secure, in his view, is to possess at the level of practical knowledge answers to fundamental questions of human existence. These questions concern the nature of existence, the finitude of human life, the experience of others, and the continuity of self-identity (Giddens 1991: 55). Habits of daily life and routinization of relationships with significant others emotionally inoculate agents from existential anxieties about the indeterminacy of human existence. As ontological security is maintained through habits and routines of daily life, ontological security is challenged, in Giddens' view, by the speed and breadth of change characteristic for high modernity (Giddens 1990, 1991).

The concept of ontological security was imported into IR in the 1990s (Wendt 1994; Huysmans 1998; McSweeney 1999) and soon after that theoretically and empirically developed into a budding research agenda (Kinnvall 2004, 2006; Mitzen 2006a; Steele 2008). Alexander Wendt made one of the earliest attempts to turn ontological security into an IR idiom (Wendt 1994). He argued that all states, as corporate actors, have four basic interests or motivations: (1) physical security defined as "differentiation from other actors"; (2) ontological security or "predictability in relationships to the world, which creates a desire for stable social identities"; (3) recognition; and (4) development (Ibid: 385).

The central assumption of ontological security studies has been the distinction between physical and ontological security. While physical security is denoting freedom from threats to physical integrity, ontological security is about maintaining stable self-other relationships (Huysmans 1998: 242). Physical security or "security as survival" is about freedom from fear of dangerous objects. Ontological security or "security as being" is about freedom from anxiety, which stems from the vulnerability of the self (Giddens 1991: 43–44; Rumelili 2015: 200). While fear and anxiety can come together, states often fend off anxieties by stabilizing their relationships with others, including their rivals or enemies (Huysmans 1998, 242, Mitzen 2006a). As a consequence, ontological security seeking can bring calm to agents but can also lead to antagonism and conflict with others.

Ontological security in world politics is maintained through routines with significant others. These can be both cooperative routines such as diplomacy, special relationships, alliances, or security integration, and in this case, the pursuit of ontological security contributes to peace. However, ontological security can also be maintained through conflictual routines such as extremist violence, protracted conflicts, erection of security barriers, anti-migration policies, counter-secessionist violence, or denial of historical crimes. When this is the case, the pursuit of ontological security can be a driver of securitization, conflict, and war.

Ontological security is unmade by critical situations, unpredictable events that affect a large number of individuals, catch state agents off-guard, and disrupt their self-identities (Steele 2008: 12). Collective actors such as social groups, states (or a group of states) become ontologically insecure when critical situations rupture their routines hence overwhelming their discourse with fundamental questions (Ejdus 2018, 2020). As actors are unable to "bracket out" these questions, they burst into the public sphere hence piercing agents' protective cocoon resulting in anxiety, self-doubt, shame, guilt, and other incapacitating emotions resulting in a loss of purposeful agency.

Theoretical debates within ontological security studies have revolved around three questions. The first one is about the unit of analysis and the question of who is the ontological seeking entity. Some authors scale up the analysis and treat collective actors such as states (Wendt 1994, 1999; Mitzen 2006a; Steele 2008; Rumelili 2015; Subotić 2016, Ejdus 2018, 2020), alliances (Greve 2018), supranational organizations (Della Sala 2017), or bureaucracies (Steele 2017). Other scholars, although agreeing that collectives provide a framework for individual ontological security (Marlow 2002), keep the individual as the key unit of analysis (Abulof 2015; Krolkowski 2008; Kinnvall 2006; Roe 2008; Croft 2012a, b). To them, the individual is the only actor who is seeking ontological security and should therefore be the focus of analysis.

The second debate is about agency/structure, and it boils down to the question of where the sources of ontological (in)security lie (Zarakol 2010). Some scholars zoom on ontological (in) security stemming from agents' social relationships (Mitzen 2006a). Building on relational sociology, Pratt takes this a step further and argues that a referent in ontological security is not the self but the social arrangement (Pratt 2017). Others focus on the introspective construction of biographical continuity through what Steele terms "the dialectics of the Self" (Steele 2008; 50; Ejodus 2020). The third group of scholars strike a middle ground and study social and introspective aspects of ontological insecurity as mutually constitutive (Zarakol 2010; 8; Kinnvall 2004).

The third debate has been about the relationship between ontological security and modernity. According to Anthony Giddens, the need for ontological security is a condition created by high modernity, a world "replete with risks and dangers" in which crisis is not merely an interruption but "a more or less continuous state of affairs" (Giddens 1991: 12). Some authors, drawing on Giddens, posit that the pursuit of ontological security in world politics is a feature of radical transformations brought about by contemporary processes such as globalization (Kinnvall 2004). Others, such as Zarakol, construe ontological security as a universal and trans-historic need of the individual and collective agents alike (Zarakol 2017). Historically, therefore, the modern state is only one among many institutional sources of ontological security. Ontological security providing polities varied through history and either relied on the predominance of secular or religious authority or merged the two.

In addition to these internal debates, ontological security studies in IR have also been subjected to a number of external critiques. In his more recent work, Richard Ned Lebow takes issue with an assumption, underpinning in his view much of the ontological security literature in IR, that collectives have one dominant identity narrative (Lebow 2016: 22–44). He also contests that ontological security is one of the primary goals of individuals and/or states (Ibid: 29). Another prominent critique was penned by Chris Rossdale, who posits that by focusing on stability of self-identity narratives as a desired goal of actors, ontological security studies obscure and marginalize forms of progressive subjectivity which resists closure such as, for example, queer figurations or anti-militarist movements (Rossdale 2015). Similarly, Berenskoetter argues that ontological security literature is "trapped in the conservative bias" because it cannot account for emancipatory agency (Berenskoetter 2020).

Ontological Security and Conflict

The question of why states wage war has been one of the key issues preoccupying IR scholars (Waltz 1959). While realists focus on survival instincts of states, ontological security scholars stress that honor, self-esteem, and a healthy sense of self can be powerful a motivation to engage in war. As Lebow points out in his reading of Thucydides' Peloponnesian War, "[t]he Spartan decision for war was not motivated by concern for physical security but by ontological security: the need to defend Spartan values and identity" (Lebow 2008: 180). Similarly, Steele shows that neutral Belgium did not reject the German ultimatum in June 1914 to protect its cold-calculated material interests but rather to preserve its honor as a neutral state. By doing so, Belgium put its physical survival in harm's way for the sake of ontological security (Steele 2008).

The ontological security perspective can also provide a different take on why conflicts endure. Realists argue that security dilemmas are so persistent because of uncertainty in others' intentions (Herz 1950). Mitzen turns this argument around and posits that security dilemmas persist, because they are a source of certainty as states become attached to violent routines that drive security dilemmas hence stabilizing their identities (Mitzen 2006a). If states have a healthy basic trust, they will be able to reflect, learn, and eventually break free from the violent routines.

However, if they have a rigid basic trust, they might be permanently attached to routines that provide ontological security, despite their obvious physical harm, and hence locked in protracted conflicts.

The conflicts are exceptionally durable when the very master narrative about the conflict has become so ingrained in the national self that it survives despite partial desecuritizations. A case in point is the Arab-Israeli conflict which has over the past decades only partially desecuritized thanks to the series of peace agreements on the one side (with Egypt in 1979, with Jordan in 1994). The process was partial not only because the core Israeli-Palestinian conflict has not been solved but also because the wider conflict has expanded by including new securitizations such as the Iranian threat (Lupovici 2019). Another often studied case is Serbia and its perseverant opposition to Kosovo's independence, which was declared unilaterally in 2008. Serbia's counter-secessionist policy, primarily motivated by ontological rather than physical security needs, has been an obstacle to the normalization of relationships between Belgrade and Pristina (Ejdus and Subotić 2014; Subotić 2016; Ejdus 2018, 2020).

The pursuit of ontological security also drives the behavior of international organizations to engage as peace and security actors. Steele, for instance, has made a strong case that NATO intervened in Kosovo in 1999 to avoid shame over past inactions during genocides in Rwanda and Bosnia and Herzegovina (Steele 2008: 114–148). Cupać broadens this argument and posits that virtually all NATO's post-Cold War out-of-area interventions are attempts to fend off existential anxiety brought about by the disappearance of the Soviet threat as the foundational raison d'être of the Alliance (Cupać 2012). In other words, NATO's interventions in Afghanistan, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, Horn of Africa, and Libya have all been deployed not to protect the material interests of the Alliance but rather as a part of its soul searching. Similarly, Mälksoo explains the recent turn of both NATO and the EU towards the issues of hybrid warfare, resilience, and strategic communication as a strategy of turning growing anxieties over the vulnerability of the West into manageable and knowable threats (Mälksoo 2018).

The concept of ontological security has also been employed to make sense of contemporary geopolitical conflicts. Guzzini explains the post-Cold War "return of geopolitics" in Europe as an ontological security-driven replacement of post-ideological uncertainty ushered in by the end of bipolarity with the symbolic order well-known in the old continent (Guzzini 2012). While the EU had long resisted this geopolitical turn as a dangerous relic of a bygone era, it has recently adopted an increasingly geopolitical posture. Browning explains this policy return to historically known coordinates of geopolitical action as an attempt of the EU to calm anxieties generated by an increasingly assertive and self-confident Russia (Browning 2018a).

On the other hand, Russia's behavior has also been explained as being motivated by ontological rather than physical security needs. After a decade of failed and humiliating attempts to emulate the West in the 1990s, Russia under Putin is fending off its anxieties by engineering a hostile West into the constitutive part of Russia's identity (Hansen 2016). Achurina and Della Sala have depicted these two interlocking and mutually reinforcing anxieties as yet another example of an ontological security dilemma (Akchurina and Della Sala 2018). A case has also been made that other geopolitical conflicts, including the one between the USA and China over the South China Sea (Heritage and Lee 2020) and the one between China and Japan over the Senkaku Islands (Hwang and Frettingham 2018; Suzuki 2019) are also motivated by ontological security concerns.

Several scholars have used ontological security lenses to investigate terrorism. By disrupting the binaries of friend/enemy, inside/outside, civilian/military, etc., as Zarakol points out, terrorism undermines the ontological security of the Westphalian state (Zarakol 2011: 2315). One case in point is the 2013 Boston Marathon bombing. In contrast to 9/11, which was orchestrated by a foreign enemy, the Boston attack was home-grown. In other words, "strangers, both inside and outside of society," conducted it (Huysmans 1998: 241). As such, this attack endangered not only physical but also ontological security in the USA. By deciding to process the surviving attacker as a fully fledged citizen rather than an enemy combatant, the USA recovered its biographical continuity of a liberal society ruptured by 9/11 and its aftermath (Combes 2016: 13). Chan provides another example in his study of the Malaysian countering violent extremism strategy (Chan 2020). The rising numbers of Malaysians who joined ISIS ontologically challenged this predominantly Muslim state. To placate its anxiety, Malaysia undermined a counter-narrative strategy that interpreted the foreign fighters not as enemies but as correctable citizens who were misled into the wrong interpretation of Islam (Ibid: 8).

Finally, ontological security lenses open up a new avenue to study securitization more broadly. As we know from post-structural scholarship, physical securitization constructs objects of fear and provides stability of self/other narratives (Neumann 1999). Consequently, the question of “who we are” is inseparable from the question “whom we fear” (Campbell 1998: 73). Securitization of a social group constructs objects of fear, but it also provides a sense of identity for the endangered self. One case in point was the securitization of the British Muslims in the aftermath of 9/11 and 7/7 attacks, which made this community insecure but also provided a sense of stability for the redefined “new British Self” (Croft 2012b: 201).

Ontological Security and Peace

Conflict resolution improves physical security, but it can also bring about ontological insecurity. Desecuritization, or the process of the unmaking of objects of fear, indeed fosters peacebuilding. However, desecuritization’s unintended consequence may be what Rumelili calls “peace anxiety,” a state of unease stemming from the ideational destabilization created by conflict resolution (Rumelili 2015). The implosion of the Soviet Union, for example, brought an end to the Cold War but created a “crisis of representation” in the USA, which embarked on a quest for a new antagonist (Campbell 1998). The 9/11 attacks and the ensuing Global War on Terrorism provided a replacement for the Soviet threat hence temporarily solving the representation crisis and stabilizing the US sense of self in the post-Cold War era.

An often studied case of “peace anxieties” is the peacebuilding process in the Northern Ireland, where the 1998 Good Friday Agreement brought to an end the longstanding armed conflict between Protestant unionists who wanted to stay inside the UK and Catholic nationalists who aimed to secede and join the Republic of Ireland. Since then, the advent of a more inclusive mode of politics has challenged the ontological insecurity of those who anchored their identities in the previously dominant friend-enemy ideology. However, it also destabilized those who endorsed the fragile civility as it continues to be undermined by lurking animosities (Cash 2017; also Kay 2012; Mitchell 2015).

In the aftermath of wars, states seeking recognition and a healthy sense of self are often unable to come to terms with their past crimes or crimes committed against their countries, which can undermine peacebuilding efforts. As a result, they securitize specific collective memories, a process whereby “our” version of history is seen as being under existential threat by “their” interpretation of the past. This process of “mnemonical securitization” leads to security dilemmas and eventual relapse into conflict (Mälksoo 2015). Zarakol studied ontological-security driven Turkey’s denial of the Armenian genocide or Japan’s unease to acknowledge its atrocities in World War Two (Zarakol 2010, 2011). States victimized during wars also tend to securitize their war memories, which can hamper reconciliation and breed security dilemmas, as is the case with the use of patriotic education about the War of Resistance against Japan (Gustafsson 2014).

The end of the Cold War generated ontological insecurity for post-communist states in Europe. All of a sudden, they were not only on the new path of becoming Western but also overwhelmed with feelings of inferiority vis-à-vis the West. To deal with this inferiority complex, they forged new state narratives and redefined their formative collective memories. Part of this process across post-communist countries, as Subotić argues, was a redefinition of the Holocaust remembrance in which fascist crimes became communist ones practically overnight (Subotić 2018, 2019). Furthermore, international institutions involved in peacebuilding also engage in ontological security-driven memory politics. As Lea David has shown in Bosnia and Herzegovina's case, the international community, embodied in institutions such as the EU and the Office of the High Representative (OHR), securitized its interpretation of the war (1992–1995). This interpretation revolves around three essentialized categories of participants in the Bosnian War: victims, perpetrators, and bystanders. The international community did this for the sake of its own biographical continuity as a humanitarian intervener. Its hegemonic memory politics, however, has only cemented the grossly simplifying clear-cut division of all the parties into either victims or perpetrators and deepened ethnic divisions in the country (David 2019).

One way to overcome this situation when desecuritization of enemy constructs leads to anxiety is to change self-identity narratives (Rumelili 2015: 21). One case in point is Finland's evolving policy towards Russia over Karelia. This region, where the legends of Kalevala originated, was construed as the cradle of the Finnish nation since the nineteenth century (Browning and Joenniemi 2015). In World War Two, Finland lost the territory to the Soviet Union, which was a source of its ontological insecurity throughout the Cold War. However, Finland gradually came to terms with the loss of the territory as its post-Cold War identity evolved away from the nineteenth-century attachment to ethno-territorial claims towards the post-national conception in tune with the process of European integration (Ibid: 163–167).

Another example is West Germany, mirrored by the European Community writ large. In the aftermath of World War Two, it obtained a new sense of ontological security by turning its past into the most significant other (Rumelili 2018; also Wæver 1996). Moreover, post-war Western Germany renegotiated its identity as a civilian power devoted to multilateralism, cooperation, trade, and strictly defensive posture of its armed forces firmly wedded to NATO (Berenskoetter and Giegerich 2010: 411; also Eberle and Handl 2020).

Ontological security is maintained through the routinization of relationships with significant others, not only enemies but also friends. Berenskoetter and Giegerich argue that as states need belonging and recognition, they obtain a healthy sense of self by making friends (Berenskoetter and Giegerich 2010: 422; see also Berenskoetter 2007). Accordingly, special relationships between states are also driven primarily by ontological security rather than material benefits. One case in point is the German-Israeli special relationship after the World War Two, characterized by the former's responsibility for the latter's security due to its role in the Holocaust (Oppermann and Hansel 2019). Moreover, Israel has managed over the years to exploit the German guilt by negotiating favorable deals, including the ones on reparations and arms sales, despite Germany's more significant economic and political clout (Ibid: 87).

Similarly, Chacko has used the ontological security perspective to make sense of recent attempts to forge a special relationship between the USA and India (Chacko 2014). In his view, the American discourse on the "rise of India" and US efforts to build a special relationship with the rising democratic power in Asia, alleviates some of the anxieties in Washington about the "rise of China." However, India's self-understanding as a restrained and peaceful power and its postcolonial mistrust of Western hegemony have made, in Chacko's view, the US efforts less likely to succeed.

In addition to consolidating friendly bilateral relations, ontological security also motivates states to engage in multilateral institutions around shared visions of international order (Berenskoetter and Giegerich 2010: 422). One example of how international institutions provide ontological security to its member states is the West's democratic security community embodied in NATO and the EU (Berenskoetter and Giegerich 2010; Greve 2018). Security-community building has not only fostered a sense of collective identity, as the previous constructivist scholarship had assumed (Adler and Barnett 1998). It also pertains to the ontological security of its members by providing or depriving recognition of their distinctiveness (Greve 2017).

The EU is an exceptionally well-researched case of an international institution that can be a source of ontological security but also anxiety for its member states (Kinnvall et al. 2018). The EU is a source of a calm and healthy sense of self as an entity with a distinct self-identity as a post-national civilian power devoted to multilateralism and rules-based order (Mitzen 2006b) with its own set of foundational myths and narratives (Della Sala 2018) and ontological security-driven policies such as the European Neighborhood Policy (Johansson-Nogués 2018). However, it is also an “anxious security community” (Mitzen 2018) whose ontological security has been undermined by a succession of crisis most recently over migration (Della Sala 2017) or Brexit (Browning 2018b).

Finally, research has shown that authoritarian states also engage in regional cooperation to maintain their biographical continuity. Russia, for example, invests in the Eurasian Economic Union not only to gain particular material benefits but also to calm anxieties brought about by the collapse of the Soviet Union and to settle an identity question of “Russia’s place in the world” (Russo and Stoddard 2018). From the Moscow’s point of view, Eurasia is the Russian World and its sphere of interest (Akchurina and Della Sala 2018; see Kazharski 2020).

Summary

Over the past two decades, ontological security studies have grown into a novel research agenda lying at the intersection of IR, sociology, and psychology. The basic premise behind this growing body of knowledge is the distinction between physical security as “freedom from fear” and ontological security as “freedom from anxiety.” The concept of ontological security has been employed not only to critique the existing approaches in IR and security studies but also to develop a set of new theoretical assumptions and use them to provide novel explanations of empirical puzzles. These insights have two fundamental implications for peace and conflict studies. First, by removing the objects of fear, peacebuilding processes improve physical security. However, they can also heighten anxiety as they also deconstruct enemy images which can be a source of self-identity and a glue that binds communities together. Second, by constructing objects of fear, securitization and conflict undermine physical security but they may also generate ontological security for parties whose healthy sense of self hinges on enemy images. Therefore, to be fully sustainable, peacebuilding and conflict resolution should also address ontological security concerns and engage in the reconstruction of identities of parties involved.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts

References

- Abulof, U. (2015). The mortality and morality of nations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Adler, E., & Barnett, M. (Eds.) (1998). Security communities, Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Akchurina, V., & Della Sala, V. (2018). Russia, Europe and the ontological security dilemma: Narrating the emerging Eurasian space. Europe-Asia Studies, 70(10), 1638–1655.
- Berenskoetter, F. (2007). Friends, there are no friends? An intimate reframing of the international. Millennium, 35(3), 647–676.
- Berenskoetter, F. (2020). Anxiety, time, and agency. International Theory. (forthcoming).
- Berenskoetter, F., & Giegerich, B. (2010). From NATO to ESDP: A social constructivist analysis of German strategic adjustment after the end of the Cold War. Security Studies, 19(3), 407–452.
- Browning, C. S. (2018a). Geostrategies, geopolitics and ontological security in the Eastern neighbourhood: The European Union and the ‘new Cold War’. Political Geography, 62, 106–115.

- Browning, C. S. (2018b). Brexit, existential anxiety and ontological (in) security. European Security, 27(3), 336–355.
- Browning, C. S., & Joenniemi, P. (2015). The ontological significance of Karelia: Finland's reconciliation with losing the promised land. In B. Rumelili (Ed.), Conflict resolution and ontological security: Peace anxieties (pp. 168–185). London: Routledge.
- Campbell, D. (1998 [1992]). Writing security: United States foreign policy and the politics of identity. Minnesota: University of Minnesota Press.
- Cash, J. (2017). The dilemmas of ontological insecurity in a postcolonising Northern Ireland. Postcolonial Studies, 20(3), 387–410.
- Chacko, P. (2014). A new “special relationship”?: Power transitions, ontological security, and India–US relations. International Studies Perspectives, 15(3), 329–346.
- Chan, N. (2020). In moderation of ‘strangers’: Terrorism, ontological (in) security and counter-narratives in Malaysia. Critical Studies on Security, 8(1), 28–45.
- Combes, M. R. (2016). Encountering the stranger: Ontological security and the Boston Marathon bombing. Cooperation and Conflict, 52(1), 126–143.
- Croft, S. (2012a). Constructing ontological insecurity: The securitization of Britain's Muslims. Contemporary Security Policy, 33(2), 219–235.
- Croft, S. (2012b). Securitizing Islam: Identity and the search for security. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cupać, J. (2012). Ontological security of international organizations: NATO's post-cold war identity crisis and “out-of-area” interventions. Синтезис-часопис за хуманистичке науке и друштвено стварност, 4(1), 19–43.
- David, L. (2019). Policing memory in Bosnia: Ontological security and International Administration of Memorialization Policies. International Journal of Politics, Culture, and Society, 32(2), 211–225.
- Della Sala, V. (2017). Homeland security: Territorial myths and ontological security in the European Union. Journal of European Integration, 39(5), 545–558.
- Della Sala, V. (2018). Narrating Europe: The EU's ontological security dilemma. European Security, 27(3), 266–279.
- Eberle, J., & Handl, V. (2020). Ontological security, civilian power, and German foreign policy toward Russia. Foreign Policy Analysis, 16(1), 41–58.
- Ejdus, F. (2018). Critical situations, fundamental questions and ontological insecurity in world politics. Journal of International Relations and Development, 21(4), 883–908.
- Ejdus, F. (2020). Crisis and ontological insecurity: Serbia's anxiety over Kosovo's secession. London: Palgrave.
- Ejdus, F., & Subotić, J. (2014). Kosovo as Serbia's sacred space: Governmentality, pastoral power, and sacralization of territories. In G. Ognjenović & J. Ozelić (Eds.), Politicization of religion, the power of symbolism: The case of former Yugoslavia and its successor states (pp. 159–184). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Erikson, H. E. (1968). Identity: Youth and crisis. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Giddens, A. (1990). The consequences of modernity. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Giddens, A. (1991). Modernity and self-identity. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Greve, P. (2018). Ontological security, the struggle for recognition, and the maintenance of security communities. Journal of International Relations and Development, 21(4), 858–882.
- Gustafsson, K. (2014). Memory politics and ontological security in Sino-Japanese relations. Asian Studies Review, 38(1), 71–86.
- Guzzini, S. (Ed.). (2012). The return of geopolitics in Europe? Social mechanisms and foreign policy identity crises. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hansen, F. S. (2016). Russia's relations with the West: ontological security through conflict. Contemporary Politics, 22(3), 359–375.
- Heritage, A., & Lee, P. K. (2020). Order, contestation and ontological security-seeking in the South China Sea. London: Palgrave.
- Herz, J. (1950). Idealist internationalism and the security dilemma. World Politics, 2(2), 157–180.
- Huysmans, J. (1998). Security! What do you mean? From concept to thick signifier. European Journal of International Relations, 4(2), 226–255.
- Hwang, Y., & Frettingham, E. (2018). Ontological security and the disputes over the Senkaku/Diaoyu Islands in the East China Sea. In V. Teo & H. Satoh (Eds.), Japan's island troubles with China and Korea (pp. 41–67). London: Routledge.
- Johansson-Nogués, E. (2018). The EU's ontological (in) security: Stabilizing the ENP area... and the EU-self? Cooperation and Conflict, 53(4), 528–544.
- Kay, S. (2012). Ontological security and peace-building in Northern Ireland. Contemporary Security Policy, 33(2), 236–263.
- Kazharski, A. (2020). Civilizations as ontological security? Stories of the Russian trauma. Problems of Post-Communism, 67(1), 24–36.
- Kinnvall, C. (2004). Globalization and religious nationalism: Self, identity, and the search for ontological security. Political Psychology, 25(5), 741–767.
- Kinnvall, C. (2006). Globalization and religious nationalism in India. New York: Routledge.
- Kinnvall, C., Manners, I., & Mitzen, J. (2018). Introduction to 2018 special issue of European security: Ontological (in) security in the European Union. European Security, 27(3), 249–265.
- Krolikowski, A. (2008). State personhood in ontological security theories of international relations and Chinese nationalism: A Sceptical view. The Chinese Journal of International Politics, 2(1), 109–133.
- Laing, R. D. (1990 [1960]). The divided self: An existential study in sanity and madness. London: Penguin Books.

- Lebow, R. N. (2008). A cultural theory of international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lebow, R. N. (2016). National identities and international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lupovici, A. (2019). Ontological security and the continuation of the Arab–Israeli conflict. In I. Bramsen, R. Poder, & O. Wæver (Eds.), Resolving international conflict: Dynamics of escalation, continuation and transformation (pp. 215–228). London: Routledge.
- Mälksoo, M. (2015). “Memory must be defended”: Beyond the politics of mnemonic security. Security Dialogue, 46(3), 221–237.
- Mälksoo, M. (2018). Countering hybrid warfare as ontological security management: The emerging practices of the EU and NATO. European Security, 27(3), 374–392.
- Marlow, J. (2002). Governmentality, ontological security and ideational stability: Preliminary observations on the manner, ritual and logic of a particular art of government. Journal of Political Ideologies, 7(2), 241–259.
- McSweeney, B. (1999). Security, identity and interests: A sociology of international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mitchell, A. (2015). Ontological (in) security and violent peace in Northern Ireland. In B. Rumelili (Ed.), Conflict resolution and ontological security: Peace anxieties (pp. 113–130). London: Routledge.
- Mitzen, J. (2006a). Ontological security in world politics: State identity and the security dilemma. European Journal of International Relations, 12(3), 341–370.
- Mitzen, J. (2006b). Anchoring Europe’s civilizing identity: Habits, capabilities and ontological security. Journal of European Public Policy, 13(2), 270–285.
- Mitzen, J. (2018). Anxious community: EU as (in) security community. European Security, 27(3), 393–413.
- Mitzen, J., & Larson, K. (2017). Ontological security and foreign policy. Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics.
- Neumann, I. B. (1999). Uses of the other: The east in European identity formation. Minnesota: University of Minnesota Press.
- Oppermann, K., & Hansel, M. (2019). The ontological security of special relationships: The case of Germany’s relations with Israel. European Journal of International Security, 4(1), 79–100.
- Pratt, S. F. (2017). A relational view of ontological security in international relations. International Studies Quarterly, 61(1), 78–85.
- Roe, P. (2008). The value of positive security. Review of International Studies, 34(4), 777–794.
- Rossdale, C. (2015). Enclosing critique: The limits of ontological security. International Political Sociology, 9(4), 369–386.
- Rumelili, B. (2015). Conflict resolution and ontological security: Peace anxieties. London: Routledge.
- Rumelili, B. (2018). Breaking with Europe’s pasts: memory, reconciliation, and ontological (In)security. European Security, 27(3), 280–295.
- Russo, A., Stoddard, E. (2018). Why do Authoritarian leaders do regionalism? Ontological Security and Eurasian Regional Cooperation. The International Spectator, 53(3), 20–37.
- Steele, J. B. (2008). Ontological security in international relations: Self-identity and the IR state. New York: Routledge.
- Steele, J. B. (2017). Organizational processes and ontological (in) security: Torture, the CIA and the United States. Cooperation and Conflict, 52(1), 69–89.
- Subotić, J. (2016). Narrative, ontological security, and foreign policy change. Foreign Policy Analysis, 12(4), 610–627.
- Subotić, J. (2018). Political memory, ontological security, and holocaust remembrance in post-communist Europe. European Security, 27(3), 296–313.
- Subotić, J. (2019). Yellow star, Red Star: Holocaust Remembrance after Communism. Cornell University Press.
- Suzuki, S. (2019). Japanese revisionists and the ‘Korea threat’: Insights from ontological security. Cambridge Review of International Affairs, 32(3), 303–321.
- Wæver, O. (1996). European security identities. Journal of Common Market Studies, 34(1), 103–132.
- Waltz, K. (1959). Man, the state and war: A theoretical analysis. New York/London: Columbia University Press.
- Wendt, A. (1994). Collective identity formation and the international state. American Political Sciences Review, 88(2), 384–396.
- Zarakol, A. (2010). Ontological (in) security and state denial of historical crimes: Turkey and Japan. International Relations, 24(1), 3–23.
- Zarakol, A. (2011). What makes terrorism modern? Terrorism, legitimacy, and the international system. Review of International Studies, 37(5), 2311–2336.
- Zarakol, A. (2017). States and ontological security: A historical rethinking. Cooperation and Conflict, 52(1), 48–68.

Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Mary Hope Schwoebel¹ and Erin McCandless²
¹Nova Southeastern University, Fort Lauderdale, FL, USA

²School of Governance, University of Witwatersrand, Johannesburg, South Africa

Synonyms

Climate change; Conflict; Emergencies; Humanitarian assistance; Natural disasters; Resilience; Risk reduction; Triple nexus

Definition/Description

Scholarly, policy, and practitioner efforts to understand the nexus between conflicts and natural disasters and to seek integrated ways to address them abound. As both conflicts and natural disasters have been increasing in intensity and frequency worldwide, awareness has grown about the devastating and unsustainable human and financial costs. Increasing inequalities between and within countries exacerbate these consequences for those who can least afford them. This entry examines the various manifestations of the relationship between conflict and disaster, and the ways in which they intersect and interact.

Introduction

Worldwide, violent conflict is ubiquitous in terms of both numbers of conflicts and intensity of conflicts. Generally, it is more protracted, more intractable, and is driving some 80% of humanitarian response (Oxfam 2019, drawing on Uppsala Data Conflict Program). Displacement (including refugees and internally displaced) grew from 43.3 million in 2009 to 70.8 million in 2018, with some 85% of displaced people residing in the global South (UN Refugee Agency 2020). There is a growing convergence between conflict and fragile contexts, and poverty, where predictions are that by 2035, 85% of the world's extremely poor people will be living in these areas (OECD 2016).

To add further complexity, climate change is recognized as a “threat multiplier” as it impacts food security and livelihoods, human health, the habitability of coastal regions (where 80% of the world's population resides), and transboundary water resources. It also increases the frequency and intensity of many types of natural hazards. Further, climate change and other forms of disaster are fueling migration and increasing fragility in countries worldwide. They are also converging with numerous other risks (including conflict, displacement, economic crises, pandemics, and growing inequality) (Busby 2020).

The impacts of conflicts and disasters are greater for poor and marginalized communities and households, highlighting and reinforcing disparities. This is true even in more developed and relatively stable countries. Risks and vulnerabilities, on the one hand, and capacities and sources of resilience, on the other, are products of political and economic factors that affect access to material resources and information, social networks, and knowledge and skills. Around the world, Covid-19 has disproportionately impacted the poor and marginalized communities. Today's conflicts result in greater loss of life for civilians than combatants, and in disasters worldwide, women die four times more than men (Enarson 2018) and are at greater risk of sexual assault, domestic violence, displacement, being trafficked, and other threats to their security and well-being.

Over the past 40 years, a number of efforts have sought to understand the nexus between disaster and conflict and the implications for policy and practice. In the 1980s, awareness of the overlaps and gaps in assistance in conflicts and disasters resulted in the Linking Relief, Rehabilitation and Development (LRRD) agenda, aimed at harmonizing humanitarian assistance in conflicts and disasters. A decade later, attention to the fact that humanitarian assistance often undermined, or did not effectively support development, resulted in a related agenda – the Relief to Development Continuum. In the early 2000s, work around the nexus has focused attention toward reducing vulnerabilities through disaster risk reduction approaches and developing capacities through building the resilience of institutions, communities, and households. Most recently, these approaches have evolved beyond reconstruction following conflicts and disasters, toward the need to “build back better” with an eye toward preventing future crises – both conflict and disasters.

A key challenge for policy and practice in addressing the conflict-disaster nexus comes with the varied perspectives, principles, approaches, and priorities of the different praxis communities focusing on disaster management/humanitarian aid community, development and conflict/ peacebuilding. For example, international development practice (notably the UN) tends to work directly with governments and focus on building national capacity. In many conflict contexts, however, the state may be perceived as part and parcel of the problem, therefore organizations prefer to work with civil society actors. Humanitarian workers by focusing on the short-term objective of saving lives, sometimes undermine efforts by development organizations to achieve sustainability. Finally, international organizations tend to engage in bureaucratic stove piping, so that often even within a single organization there is little information sharing or coordination between the different departments (Brookings Institution 2010).

The past two decades have produced a growing body of scholarship focusing on the nexus between disaster and conflict, and there is a growing policy consensus about the institutional and operational imperative to harmonize approaches and shift from response and recovery toward sustainability, prevention, and preparedness.

Concepts

“Disasters” are not natural. However, hazards can be natural or they can be man-made. Natural hazards occur from physical phenomena caused either by rapid or slow onset events which can be geophysical, hydrological, climatological, meteorological, or biological. Technological or man-made hazards (complex emergencies/conflicts, famine, displacement, and industrial accidents) are events that are caused by humans and occur in or close to human settlements (HPG 2014). Disasters occur when natural hazards meet social, political, and economic conditions that create risks and vulnerabilities to societies, communities, and households. Disasters, therefore, are social phenomena (Enarson and Morrow 1998). The UN defines natural disasters as “the consequences of events triggered by natural hazards that overwhelm local response capacity and seriously affect the social and economic development of a region” (IASC 2011). This by definition links disaster with capacity to respond – and naturally links to the notion of fragility where institutions, structures, and social systems are challenged to respond effectively (IA 2015, p. 1).

Protracted, intractable conflicts generally persist over long periods of time with spirals of high intensity and low-intensity violence, and they are caused by deep-seated threats to the identity of different racial, ethnic, religious, partisan, and/or other groups in society. They are usually, but not always, the result of long-term marginalization and inequality, and the accompanying vulnerabilities and risks in the face of disasters and conflicts. The concept of Complex Humanitarian Emergency (CHE), in use since the 1990s, refers to the simultaneous crises of violent conflict and disasters, such as droughts, floods, and other natural hazards, and in contexts characterized by inaccessibility and insecurity (Schwoebel 1998).

Conflict-Disaster Nexus

Scholars, policy makers, and practitioners are in agreement that while there may not be a causal link between disaster and conflict and fragility, there are mutually reinforcing interactions. There is an interdependence of natural hazards and risks and vulnerabilities that have supported the approaches of risk reduction and fostering resilience to address conflict and disaster congruently (IA 2015; GFDRR 2015).

Conflict and Fragility Contributing to Disasters

Conflicts increase the possibility that natural hazards become disasters for a variety of reasons. Specifically, conflict increases vulnerability and risk by undermining the capacity of governments, civil society, communities, and households to prevent, prepare for, respond to, and recover from disasters. Conflicts tend to displace populations into areas that are exposed to natural hazards. Populations experiencing conflict have often already depleted their social and economic resources, and their physical and psychological health may already be precarious. In addition, governments have in most cases stretched their resources and capacities to provide social services and security. At the same time, some individuals, groups, and states benefit materially from conflicts at the expense of other groups. The new and/or increased vulnerability of populations contribute to natural hazards becoming disasters (ODI 2013, p. 16). ADD SOURCES

Disasters Contributing to Conflict and Fragility

Disasters tend to contribute to conflict in various ways. They create conditions for fragility by undermining livelihoods, destroying institutions and infrastructure, placing tremendous strains on resources, and increasing competition for them. In short, they increase vulnerability – notably for those already vulnerable. Disasters fuel displacement and overstress fragile institutions – all of which can fuel grievances and undermine or erode the social contract (IA 2015).

Disasters can exacerbate both manifest and latent conflict. In every complex situation, numerous interactions exist, with disasters decreasing some conflict drivers while increasing others. Disasters can increase grievance by contributing to resource scarcity or by contributing to greater inequality as populations are differently affected. Grievances can also increase with the unequal distribution of humanitarian aid or unequal preventive and preparedness measures (ODI 2013; Homer Dixon and Blitt 1998; Olson and Gawronski 2003). Poor prevention, preparation, and responses to natural disasters can also fuel conflict by undermining government legitimacy and eroding the social contract between government and affected populations.

Disasters can contribute directly to conflict by creating political and/or economic opportunities for criminal and armed groups, or by advancing military objectives as troops are moved to support disaster response in conflict areas (ODI 2013, p. 10; IA 2015). Disasters can also cause people to join armed groups for economic reasons when their livelihoods have been destroyed (ODI 2013, p. 10; IA 2015).

Disaster Management as Contributor to Conflict

Decisions made by interveners at any phase of the disaster management cycle can unintentionally contribute to conflict or generate new conflicts. The commonly employed phases are response, recovery, prevention, or preparedness, although there are as many variations as there are to the conflict management or conflict transformation cycle (Coetzee and Niekerk 2012).

Grievances tend to grow around resource scarcity and/or resource distribution, and the response of governments and international actors – where there is a real or perceived lack of fairness in the allocation of emergency aid (ODI 2013; Homer Dixon and Blitt 1998; Olson and Gawronski 2003). In ongoing conflicts, inequitable emergency aid can throw tinder on the flames of protracted conflicts. Inappropriate responses can increase vulnerabilities, exacerbate inequalities, undermine capacities, and/or unintentionally do harm, sometimes motivating people to resort to violence. The tyranny of the urgent often means that interveners do not take the time to understand the context sufficiently to be conflict-sensitive, and this can contribute to instability (International Alert 2015). Humanitarian assistance can inadvertently contribute to the conflict in the short term, the long term, or both, by not consciously factoring an awareness of what is driving conflict into the design and implementation of their work.

Disaster management tends to assume a functional state-society “social contract.” While this is the case in some fragile states, it is often not the case in conflict contexts, in which some individuals and groups may be denied social services and disaster assistance before and after disasters, due to their identities vis-a-vis the conflict. In addition, governments can also exacerbate postdisaster suffering by inhibiting aid on security grounds or appropriating humanitarian aid to support conflict objectives. Some governments and some nonstate actors refuse, delay, or complicate international help, fearing it will undermine sovereignty. Finally, humanitarian aid sometimes exacerbates conflicts when governments and/or nonstate actors appropriate it to further their war efforts.

Risk Reduction, Resilience, and the Triple Nexus

While risk reduction has been integral to thinking about disaster management for decades, conflict and fragility practitioners have also engaged the concept in recent years. The concepts of risk reduction and resilience have arisen over the last two decades as a bridging focus of the disaster-conflict nexus. The hope is that building resilience of actors and systems will reduce risk. More recently, the nexus has expanded; peacebuilding has won its seat at the table in what is now referred to as the humanitarian- development- peacebuilding (HDP) “triple nexus” (Fanning and Fullwood-Thomas 2019).

Building on the history of humanitarian-development nexus, and the reinforcement of this through the movement for a “New Way of Working” (OCHA 2017) between relevant actors as agreed at the 2017 World Humanitarian Summit, in his 2016 inaugural speech the UN Secretary General António Guterres brought peace intentionally into the nexus (ICVA 2017). He underscored that “humanitarian response, sustainable development and sustaining peace are three sides of the same triangle” – that need to be brought together at the start of crisis to “support affected communities, address structural and economic impacts and help prevent a new spiral of fragility and instability.” The triple nexus gained operational traction in 2019 when the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development adopted a Recommendation on the Humanitarian-Development-Peace Nexus (OECD 2019).

Resilience is associated with the capacities of stakeholders at all levels to respond to, and adapt and recover from, shocks and stressors related to conflict, security, and crisis. While humanitarian assistance providers tend to focus on the more minimalist goals of resilience – “absorption” and “adaptation” – peacebuilders tend to gravitate toward the maximalist “transformation,” which involves capacity to “anticipate risk, respond creatively to conflict and crisis, and foster social, economic and political change in ways that may contribute to transforming the root causes of conflict” (McCandless and Simpson 2015, p. 3). While criticisms of resilience often suggest it can place a burden on vulnerable communities to be stronger in the face of transnational threats that could be prevented, the transformative lens counters these critiques. Resilience has also turned attention toward the capacities that exist and need to be supported within societies that are situated within complex adaptive social systems (Ibid., p.4), which is central to considerations of capacity development and the sustainability of recovery and transformation efforts (Chandler 2014).

Rising awareness of the complexity and protracted nature of conflict and the intersections with disasters has led to the idea of the Humanitarian-Development-Peace (HDP) “triple nexus.” This nexus seeks to reduce the risks and vulnerabilities of people before, during, and after crisis (Oxfam 2019). It also emphasizes the need to “build back better,” by building and strengthening the resilience and sustainable communities and institutions, by addressing the sources of risk and vulnerability, and by focusing on prevention and preparedness. This nexus focus reinforces the varyingly unmet commitments to coherence and coordination of international and national policy makers and practitioners. It seeks to go farther than past efforts focused on programming, to change how aid is planned and financed. It will require reconceptualizing interventions, fundamental institutional changes, and the political will to collaborate in new ways across sectors and levels.

Empirical Examples

Examples illustrating the conflict-disaster nexus are numerous and diverse. While the climate-change-driven disaster-conflict causality continues to be studied, the case of Syria illustrates troubling areas of concern in relation to slow onset disaster spurred by climate change, and aggravated by unsustainable development. Syria experienced severe drought and displacement in its northeast region (its breadbasket) from 2006 to 2011. This was preceded and worsened by a long legacy of resource mismanagement, where government subsidies to farmers for water-intensive produce were granted and withdrawn, as inefficient and unsustainable irrigation techniques were promoted. As prices for agricultural inputs soared, a massive loss of livelihood drove farming communities to migrate to overcrowded cities. More than one million food-insecure people and rising urban unemployment ensued, as the government failed to respond to the crisis, and rural discontent brewed (IA 2015, p. 2).

A massive earthquake in the Indian Ocean off the coast of Aceh in December 2004 triggered a series of tsunamis that reverberated from East Africa to SE Asia, and some 230,000 lost lives in 14 countries (Bauman et al. 2007). Following the tsunami in Sri Lanka and Aceh, Indonesia, the two countries, experiencing protracted internal conflicts at the time, have often been compared to illustrate how disaster can contribute to conflict on the one hand, and peace on the other.

In Sri Lanka, when the tsunami hit, the peace process was stalled, though the rebel Tamil Tigers (LTTE) held a strong position in their war with the government. Fearing that the LTTE would benefit from increased aid, the Sinhalese-dominated government blocked opportunities for the Tamil areas to receive aid, fuelling (legitimate) perceptions around disproportionate and discriminatory aid delivery. In addition, there were already conflict-displaced persons camps due to the conflict. International tsunami aid provided assistance only to the disaster-displaced camps. This too generated resentment. The combination fueled animosities between communities, and violent conflict reignited in 2006, leading to the government's victory against the LTTE in 2009.

Aceh, on the other hand, fared differently, despite that this is where the worst devastation took place. And the region was already a victim of severe uneven development, resource extraction that benefitted elites in the capital (in Java) rather than locals (in Sumatra), and intractable conflict. The response to the crisis was unprecedented initially involving international actors. Many viewed the extent of the crisis and the inflow of aid as an opportunity to “build back better” and, simultaneously, to end the 30 years conflict and begin a peace process (HPG 2013, 6; IA 2015, 4). The influx of aid money also offered incentive to the Free Aceh Movement or Gerakan Aceh Merdeka (GAM) rebel combatants – a chance to return to civilian life with associated economic opportunities (Bauman et al. 2007). In addition, the huge international presence shined a light on the role of the central government in the conflict, with its attendant human rights violations. This was an embarrassment to the government, thus motivating them to engage in the peace process. The Memorandum of Understanding negotiated by the International Organization of Migration signed by government and rebel leaders in 2005 explicitly recognized the parties' conviction that a peaceful settlement would facilitate the sustainable rebuilding of Aceh.

COVID 19, now the most serious global pandemic the world has witnessed since the Spanish flu of 1918–1920, is revealing the fault lines of countries affected by conflict and fragility. Many of these countries already suffer from high levels of poverty and inequality. Patterns have been identified around authoritarian measures, abuses of emergency powers, and efforts to squash dissent and control populations, as well as perpetuate leaders' time in power – all of which is affecting the social cohesion of populations (OHCHR, Sheerin 2020; McCandless and Miller 2020).

It is now acknowledged that efforts to “flatten the curve” of COVID-19, focusing on lockdowns and social distancing, disproportionately and harmfully affect the vulnerable – not just within countries but across them. Conflict-affected and fragile states, particularly those in active war, but equally those with high levels of poverty and inequality and, related, hosting high-density living areas for their own citizens, displaced, and refugees, are especially at risk. In conflict-affected and fragile settings, institutions are often extremely weak, and health systems are poorly functioning, or they have been destroyed in war (Monnier and Mayar 2020).

In Yemen, the pandemic is devastating a country that experienced more than 5 years of relentless warfare that has destroyed most of the country's medical infrastructure. Categorized by the UN as one of the most severe humanitarian crises in the world, at least 80% of the population is reliant upon aid, and with high levels of poverty and malnutrition, deadly diseases become rampant (UN News 2019). World leaders, led by the UN Secretary General Antonio Gutierrez, have called for a global ceasefire during the pandemic (UN News 2020). While some humanitarian ceasefires are taking place in some parts of the country, fierce fighting continues in others, fueling further displacement. The potential for such ceasefires to manifest lasting peace outcomes, in Yemen and elsewhere, depends on multiple factors and remains to be seen.

Conclusion

The empirical examples illustrate that the relationship between disasters and conflicts, while not causal, is intersectional, multidirectional, and compounding. Yemen, already one of the poorest countries in the world, is caught in an intractable war that has led to a devastating humanitarian crisis – all of which creates vulnerabilities that have contributed to its being severely impacted by COVID 19. Long-simmering low-intensity conflict in Syria was exacerbated by climate change-driven drought and unsustainable development policies leading to displacement and high-intensity conflict. The tsunami affected two conflict-riven countries – Aceh, Indonesia and Sri Lanka – but with differing results, contributing to peace in the former and aggravating conflict in the latter. With more frequent and severe natural hazards and an increasingly war-torn world, understanding the nexus of conflict and disaster, and identifying more efficient and effective ways to foster risk reduction and resilience, is critical.

The triple nexus, which adds peace to the humanitarian development nexus, offers promise for prevention and sustainability as it aims to address root causes. It embraces the challenge of viewing crises as opportunities for transformational change. It promotes “building back better” instead of reproducing the structures and systems that led to disaster and conflict in the first place, offering promise. “The rush to reconstruct ‘normalcy’ is difficult to resist but is manifestly a false start, as it is these routine political, economic, social, and gender arrangements that put people in harm’s way. Disasters can reflect and promote the status quo, or, alternatively, realize a new vision of the future, which creatively integrates post-disaster rehabilitation, vulnerability and risk reduction, and sustainable development goals” (Enarson 2018).

Aid interventions at the nexus of conflict and disasters have moved from the short-term responses of relief and recovery, to the medium-term responses of prevention and preparedness, and the long-term approaches of risk reduction and resilience; yet, these are still primarily technical approaches. Rarely do these approaches hold promise for transformative prevention by addressing the root causes of both disasters and conflicts. In both contexts, as well as at their intersection, long-term prevention means addressing the political-economic root causes of vulnerability in both rich and poor countries, i.e., the unequal distribution of power and resources between groups, and the social, cultural, political, and economic root causes of climate change.

Cross-References

- ▶ Intractable Conflict
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

References

- Bauman, P., Ayalew, M., & Paul, G. (2007). Beyond disaster: A comparative analysis of tsunami interventions in Sri Lanka and Indonesia/Aceh. Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 3(3), 6–21. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2007.144966985627>.
- Busby, J. (2020). It’s time we think beyond ‘threat multiplier’ to address climate and security. New Security Beat. <https://www.newsecuritybeat.org/2020/01/its-time-threat-multiplier-address-climate-security/>
- Chandler, D. (2014). Beyond neoliberalism: Resilience, the new art of governing complexity. Resilience, 2(1), 47–63. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21693293.2013.878544>.
- Coetzee, C., & Niekerk, D. V. (2012). Tracking the evolution of the disaster management cycle: A general system

- theory approach. Jambá: Journal of Disaster Risk Studies, 4(1), a54. <https://doi.org/10.4102/jamba.v4i1.54>.
- Enarson, E. (2018). Women confronting natural disaster: From vulnerability to resilience. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Press.
- Enarson, E., & Morrow, B. H. (Eds.). (1998). The gendered terrain of disaster: Through women's eyes. Westport: Praeger Press.
- Fanning, E., & Fullwood-Thomas, J. (2019). The humanitarian-development-peace nexus: What does it mean for multi-mandated organizations? Oxfam International. https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/dp-humanitarian-development-peace-nexus-260619-en_0.pdf
- Ferris, Elizabeth. (2010). Conflict, Disasters, and Human Rights: Tracing the Connections. Brookings Institution Washington, D.C.
- Global Facility for Disaster Reduction and Recovery (GFDRR). (2015). Disasters, conflict and fragility: A joint agenda. <https://www.gfdr.org/sites/default/files/publication/Disasters%2C%20Conflict%20%26%20Fragility.pdf>
- Homer-Dixon, T., & Blitt, J. (Eds.) (1998). Ecoviolence: links among environment, population and security. New York: Rowman and Littlefield Publishers, Inc.
- Humanitarian Policy Group (2013). Disaster as Opportunity? Building Back Better in Aceh, Myanmar and Haiti. HPG Working Paper. ODI; London. Available at <https://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=&cad=rja&uact=8&ved=2ahUKewiTwppbbzcfpAhUjZxUIHXLcDWoQFjAAegQIBB&url=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.odi.org%2Fsites%2Fodi.org.uk%2Ffiles%2Fodi-assets%2Fpublications-opinion-files%2F8693.pdf&usg=AOvVaw2rLds0ISDhDx0BmtJfugx6>
- Humanitarian Policy Group (2014). Conflict, climate change and politics: Why a technocratic approach fails the resilience challenge? Levine, S. Harris, K. and Fan, L. Working Paper. ODI; London. Available at <https://reliefweb.int/report/world/conflict-climate-change-and-politics-why-techno-centric-approach-fails-resilience>
- Inter-Agency Standing Committee (IASC). (2011). Operational guidelines on human rights and natural disasters. Washington, DC: Brookings-Bern Project on Internal Displacement. https://www.ohchr.org/Documents/Issues/IDPersons/OperationalGuidelines_IDP.pdf
- International Alert (IA). (2015). Compounding risk: Disasters, fragility and conflict. Policy brief. London: International Alert. https://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=&cad=rja&uact=8&ved=2ahUKewiZ_MPZ1MfpAhVUt3EKHaETCoAQFjABegQIBhAB&url=https%3A%2F%2Freliefweb.int%2Fsites%2Freliefweb.int%2Ffiles%2Fresources%2FClimateChange_DisastersFragilityConflict_EN_2015.pdf&usg=AOvVaw2jiH6hotvbjGPUuPrC3So9
- International Council of Voluntary Agencies (ICVA). (2017). The "New way of working examined." https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/NewWayOf%20Working_Explained.pdf
- McCandless, E., & Miller, D. (2020). What South Africa needs to forge a resilient social contract for COVID-19. The Conversation. <https://theconversation.com/what-south-africa-needs-to-forge-a-resilient-social-compact-for-covid-19-138171>
- McCandless, E., & Simpson, G. (2015). Assessing resilience for peacebuilding: A discussion document: Executive summary. Geneva: Interpeace. International Organization for Peacebuilding. <http://www.interpeace.org/resource/assessing-resilience-for-peacebuilding-executive-summary-of-discussion/>.
- Monnier, C., & Mayar, H. (2020). Making sure peace isn't a casualty of COVID-19 in fragile states. World Politics Review. <https://www.worldpoliticsreview.com/articles/28734/making-sure-peace-isn-t-a-casualty-of-covid-19-in-fragile-states>
- Olson, R., & Gawronski, V. (2003). Disasters as critical junctures? Managua, Nicaragua 1972 and Mexico City 1985. International Journal of Mass Emergencies and Disasters 21(1), 5–35.
- Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2016). States of fragility 2016: Understanding violence. Paris: OECD Publishing. <https://doi.org/10.1787/9789264267213-en>.
- Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). (2019). DAC recommendation on the humanitarian-development-Peace Nexus. <https://legalinstruments.oecd.org/public/doc/643/643.en.pdf>
- Overseas Development Institute (2013). When disasters and conflicts collide: Improving links between disaster resilience and conflict prevention. ODI: London. Available at <https://www.google.com/url?sa=t&rct=j&q=&esrc=s&source=web&cd=&cad=rja&uact=8&ved=2ahUKewiQm8a-y8fpAhVtTBUIHSt-CqcQFjAAegQIARAB&url=https%3A%2F%2Fwww.odi.org%2Fpublications%2F7257-disasters-conflicts-collide-improving-links-between-disaster-resilience-conflict-prevention&usg=AOvVaw26JoTvNXNuGSYFq3V3H0Pm>
- Oxfam. (2019). The Humanitarian-Development-Peace Nexus: What does it mean for multi-mandated organizations? Oxfam Discussion paper. https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/dp-humanitarian-development-peace-nexus-260619-en_0.pdf
- Schwoebel, M. H. (1998). Stay in your own lane: The military and NGOs in complex humanitarian emergencies. Security Dialogue, 29(2), 255–256. Oslo, Norway.
- Sheerin, C. (2020). COVID-19: A tool in the hands of Europe's authoritarians. Ifex. <https://ifex.org/covid-19-a-tool-in-the-hands-of-europes-authoritarians/>
- The UN Refugee Agency. (2020). Figures at a glance. <https://www.unhcr.org/figures-at-a-glance.html>
- UN News. (2019, February 14). Humanitarian crisis in Yemen remains worst in world, warns UN. <https://news.un.org/en/story/2019/02/1032811>

UN News. (2020, March 23). Covid-19: UN chief calls for global ceasefire to focus on 'the true fight of our lives'. <https://news.un.org/en/story/2020/03/1059972>

United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA). (2017). New Ways of Working. <https://agendaforhumanity.org/sites/default/files/20170228%20NWOW%2013%20high%20res.pdf>

Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict

Cera Murtagh and Runa Annasdotter Neely
Villanova University, Villanova, PA, USA

Conflicts of De Facto States

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Conflicts of Unrecognized States

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Consequences

- ▶ Peacebuilding Consequences
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Consociation

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict

Consociational Democracy

- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The

Synonyms

Conflict resolution; Consociation; Gender; Inclusion; Minorities; Peacebuilding; Power-sharing

Definition/Description

This chapter assesses consociational power-sharing as a mechanism to achieve both peace and democracy after conflict. In so doing, it explores the tensions that can arise in the practice of consociation between these twin purposes: conflict resolution and governance. The chapter presents the core theories of consociationalism and charts their development since the model was first conceptualized by Arend Lijphart in the 1960s. It presents the scholarly debates and controversies that surround the model in both theory and practice, including the extent to which it can foster integration in politics and society following conflict and its capacity to achieve broader inclusion beyond ethno-national groups, such as pertaining to gender. Finally, the chapter applies these arguments through comparative analysis of empirical case studies where consociation has been implemented, including Northern Ireland, North Macedonia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Burundi.

Introduction

In the field of peace and conflict, consociation is treated as a tool of conflict resolution on the one hand and a model for governing deeply divided societies on the other. In effect, it holds both functions (Noel 2005, p. ix). Consociation essentially constitutes an agreement between parties to a conflict to end hostilities and share political power. With respect to the first of these purposes, peacebuilding, it boasts some success. Indeed, post-Cold War, consociational power-sharing has become the “model of choice” in international peacebuilding (Byrne and McCulloch 2012, p. 576), implemented in peace agreements from Northern Ireland to Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo to Burundi, Iraq to Sudan. Yet, what of the second purpose: democratic governance? How has it fared in maintaining not just peace, but stability and democracy – or, even, “positive peace” (Galtung 1976)? Its performance on this score is not so easily measured and exceedingly more controversial. Indeed, some have argued that these twin functions – peace and governance – lie in tension with one another. The Dayton Peace Agreement that drew to a close the 1992–95 war in Bosnia and Herzegovina is often ironically considered an effective deal to end a brutal conflict, but a poor one to run a country thereafter (Keil and Kudlenko 2015, p. 471). This chapter will explore these tensions and critically assess consociational power-sharing as a mechanism for peace and post-conflict democracy. It will begin by unpacking the concept of consociationalism and its associated theories. It will thus present the scholarly debates surrounding the model. Finally, the chapter will assess these arguments through comparative analysis of empirical case studies of consociational states in different parts of the world.

Consociational Theory

The debate about democracy in deeply divided societies has run through political science since John Stuart Mill’s contention that democratic institutions require a country to have a level of national homogeneity (Mill 1861, p. 296). For Dutch political scientist Arend Lijphart, however, on the contrary, democracy is possible in a fragmented society – via consociational democracy (1977, p. 1). First theorized by Lijphart in the 1960s (1969), consociational democracy is a model for governing divided societies based on the principle of accommodating difference. It works by recognizing the principal groups that exist in society and including the elite representatives of each group in a “power-sharing” government. Lijphart developed the concept of consociation in his seminal work Democracy in Plural Societies (1977) with reference to the historical Western European cases of Belgium, Netherlands, Switzerland, and Austria. His starting point was that in a divided society where fundamental political consensus is absent – not least concerning the legitimacy of the state – democracy cannot take the form of majoritarian rule with simple first-past-the-post elections. While the politics of “normal” societies can take the form of a “winner takes all” game, whereby a minimum winning coalition governs with the expectation that government and opposition will alternate over time – such as the Westminster model – in a divided society there can be no such assumption (Lijphart 1969, p. 30; Lijphart 1977, pp. 26–29); such a system would inevitably produce permanent majorities and minorities (Lijphart 1977, p. 28; Lijphart 1984, p. 22). To avoid undemocratic and unstable outcomes therefore, minorities require special protection within the political system. The model which can provide these guarantees, Lijphart argues, is “consociational democracy” (Lijphart 1969, 1977). Applied to conflict resolution, the logic of consociation is that in order for peace to be sustainable, it must be underpinned by democratic institutions that command legitimacy (Noel 2005, p. x). Founded on the principle of inclusion, of all groups to the conflict, it addresses a core underlying cause of conflict: exclusion.

Consociation is not a specific set of institutions, but rather a model that comprises four basic conditions: a grand coalition government comprising all significant groups; a mutual veto to protect groups’ vital interests; proportionality in group representation in public office and resources; and, segmental autonomy (Lijphart 1977, p. 25). Of these conditions, Lijphart (1977) stipulates grand coalition as the most important and defining one, which can assume the form of a governing coalition comprising members of the chief parties representing each of the salient groups in society in a parliamentary system or mechanisms such as sharing top positions of president, prime minister and speaker in a presidential system (pp. 31, 35). The mutual veto provides an additional guarantee that minority rights will not be overridden by requiring a concurrent majority of each group on certain issues (Lijphart 1977, p. 37). The proportionality principle, meanwhile, ensures that each salient group is represented proportionally in public administration and resource allocation (Lijphart 1977, p. 38). This condition more or less assumes the presence of communal political parties that aggregate and represent group interests (Reilly 2006, p. 815). Finally, segmental autonomy allows for an element of self-rule for the group in areas of its own exclusive concern. This autonomy may be territorial, when segmental cleavages coincide with regional boundaries, as in federal arrangements (Lijphart 1977, p. 43), or non-territorial, such as autonomy in the realms of culture and education. A number of conditions have been identified as conducive to the success of consociation, including a balance of power in which groups are roughly equal in size; a relatively small country; some cross-cutting cleavages between the separate groups; some “overarching loyalties” among elites; the presence of parties which represent the main groups; and a tradition of elite accommodation (Lijphart 1977, pp. 55, 75, 81, 83, 99; Guelke 2012; Wolff 2003, p. 31).

John McGarry and Brendan O’Leary are the most prominent proponents of consociational democracy in contemporary political science. Having long advocated the model as a political solution to the Northern Ireland conflict, prior to and following its adoption through the 1998 Good Friday Agreement (McGarry and O’Leary 2006a, b, 2009), the scholars have significantly developed consociational theory and explored its application to other conflict zones, including Iraq and Cyprus (McGarry and O’Leary 2007; O’Leary 2012; McGarry 2017b; McGarry, 2021). McGarry and O’Leary (2009) present an ardent case for the model’s efficacy for the case of Northern Ireland, on the grounds of stability, fairness, and democracy (pp. 48–83). The scholars present themselves as “revisionist consociationalists,” putting forward a number of modifications to Lijphart’s model on the basis of the empirical evidence. These include the need to account for the role of external actors in consociational settlements (such as the Republic of Ireland in the Northern Ireland conflict); recognizing the complexity of settlements; and the need to include provisions beyond the core institutions, such as agreements on prisoner release and police reform; the merits of the preferential electoral system of Single Transferable Vote (STV) proportional representation over the party list system as advocated by Lijphart; and recognition of the fact that grand coalition is not an essential condition of consociation (McGarry and O’Leary 2006a, p. 47, 58, 59, 61).

A number of scholars have further noted modifications necessary to consociational theory in light of the model’s real-world application. Guelke (2012), for example, observes that while in the past consociationalism was a model adopted internally by states to proactively hold themselves together, it has increasingly become a tool of external intervention imposed on conflict zones as a means of holding the state together, in the hope that a spirit of accommodation will develop post hoc. In this sense, Bell (2015, p. 12), McEvoy (2015), and McCulloch and McEvoy (2018) have underlined the importance of international actors in consociational settlements and in the operation of consociational systems. Indeed, Keil (2013) refers to post-war Bosnia and Herzegovina’s power-sharing system, discussed below, as an “internationally administered” multinational federation (p. 4).

Theoretical Innovations

In line with evolutions in its real-world usage, consociational theory has evolved considerably since its conception in the 1960s. Most notably, a typology has been developed to distinguish between two ideal types: predetermined or corporate consociation, and self-determined or liberal consociation (Lijphart 1991; McGarry and O’Leary 2006b, 2007, 2009; McCrudden and O’Leary 2013; McCulloch 2014a, b; Nagle 2011; Wolff 2010). This differentiation is based on whether the groups in society to share political power are given, in the peace agreement or constitution, as in corporate consociation, or decided through the political process, as in liberal consociation (McCulloch 2014a, p. 501; McCulloch 2014b, p. 18). In more recent consociational theory a clear normative preference has emerged for the liberal form of power-sharing (McCulloch 2014a, p. 501; Wolff 2010, p. 7). In this sense, Lijphart (1991) distinguishes between “pre-determined” power-sharing in which the groups among whom power is shared are predefined in the constitution or other agreement, and “self-determined” power-sharing, in which these groups are determined through the democratic process proportional representation elections (pp. 67–69). In the latter system, “segments” are “. . . allowed to, and even encouraged, to emerge spontaneously – and hence to define themselves instead of being pre-defined” (Lijphart 1991, p. 68). Lijphart presents self-determined power-sharing as more democratic, in terms of inclusion and liberalism, as well as more flexible and dynamic, and hence durable. The model is less likely to produce exclusion of groups and individuals not represented in the political system and to marginalize smaller minorities (Lijphart 1991, pp. 71–72). Nor does it impose any identity on individuals, granting equal opportunities to groups other than those represented in the power-sharing system, including those that explicitly reject segmental categorization (Lijphart 1991, pp. 72–73). Self-determined power-sharing is also more adaptable to demographic shifts over time (Lijphart 1991, p. 73).

Coining the terms liberal and corporate consociation, McGarry and O’Leary (2007) likewise advocate the self-determined liberal variant over its pre-determined corporate alternative. While corporate consociation accommodates groups based on ascriptive criteria and assumes these groups to be relatively internally homogeneous with fixed external boundaries, liberal consociation recognizes whatever salient identity emerges organically in society, through free and fair elections. The scholars present the model as more liberally democratic, not forcing identities on individuals and hence striking a balance between group rights and individual rights (McGarry and O’Leary 2007, p. 675). Unlike its corporate counterpart, in this sense, liberal power-sharing does not privilege those identities recognized in the political system over those that are not, nor over shared, inter or trans group identities (McGarry and O’Leary 2007, p. 675). Indeed, McGarry (2017c, p. 282) contends that it is even more likely to create political space for the latter identities than conventional majoritarian systems of executive formation. Being more flexible in adapting to shifts in demographics and identity over time, liberal power-sharing is also likely to be more stable and robust (McGarry and O’Leary 2007, p. 691). Nagle (2011) similarly argues that in excluding groups and individuals, corporate consociations are more likely to sow the seeds of future conflict and instability (pp. 166–167).

Corporate power-sharing features mechanisms like separate electoral rolls for communities, seats reserved for group representatives prior to elections (Nagle 2011, pp. 166–167). Liberal power-sharing, alternatively, leaves the question of who will share power largely in the hands of voters (McCulloch 2014a, p. 503). It may include rules like low thresholds for representatives to be eligible for cabinet positions, selecting cabinet members based on performance in elections and indirect veto rights (McCulloch 2014a, p. 503; McCulloch 2014b, p. 19). Human rights provisions, for both groups and individuals, also usually form a feature of liberal consociation (Wolff 2010).

While a preference for liberal over corporate forms of power-sharing is evident in the scholarship, in practice the majority of power-sharing systems adopted are corporate in nature. McCulloch (2014a) attributes this disjuncture to the context in which such deals are made, at the end of a conflict, when insecurity is high and elites are more likely to seek maximal guarantees for their group (p. 510). By the above criteria, power-sharing systems in Bosnia, Belgium, Burundi, South Tyrol, and Lebanon have been classed as corporate while those in Iraq, Malaysia, and Afghanistan have been labeled liberal. A number of further cases exhibit a “hybrid” form of power-sharing, combining corporate and liberal elements, including North Macedonia, Kenya, Switzerland, and Northern Ireland (McCulloch 2014a, p. 505). Indeed, in practice, many cases represent a mix of corporate and liberal features and even liberal arrangements can be subject to ethnicization, as further elaborated below.

Consociationalism and Its Critics

Consociationalism has been promoted as a leading institutional model for managing ethnically divided societies and enhancing peaceful political participation, as demonstrated. Nonetheless, consociational power-sharing has been subjected to critique and anti-consociational arguments are heated and widespread.

A first line of criticism deployed against the model is that consociationalism entrenches the power of ethnic-elites and deepens divisions within a post-conflict society by crystallizing the ethnic divide (Farry 2009). Critics argue that consociationalism promotes ethnic politics by protecting the power of ethno-national elites whose interests are institutionalized through power-sharing, vetoes and segmental autonomy (Aitken 2007); that is, in seeking to promote representative and democratic institutions, consociationalism may instead risk institutionalizing division. Consociationalism, it is further charged, provides little incentive for ethno-national elites to reach beyond their core and cooperate with other ethnic groups (Horowitz 2001). Instead, politicians continue to mobilize on an ethnic basis and thereby risk perpetuating ethnic division and politicize ethnic group divisions (Taylor 2006).

Another common objection to consociationalism is that it is prone to dysfunction. Critics accuse the model of failing its task of providing stable and functioning institutions; leading more often to political deadlock and an immobilized political system (Haddad 2009; Wilford 2009; Horowitz 2014). As Horowitz (2014) puts it: “consociational dispensation allows each participating group to block the claims and demands of other groups” (p. 12). Thus, when one or more ethnic groups view certain policies as endangering their communities’ interest, this policy is vetoed which may result in an inability to achieve legislative action. This type of stalemate is evident in the case of Lebanon, where governments have struggled to form, leaving the country without government for extended periods of time (including two and a half of the 13 years from 2005–2018) (The Economist 2018).

Indeed, when functioning, political deadlock has left the legislature unable to pass important policies, leading to the collapse of the unity government in 2011 (Nagle 2016).

Meanwhile, McCulloch suggests that “it hardly matters whether an institution is functional if it cannot be agreed” (McCulloch 2017, p. 8). Indeed, some scholars address the so-called “adoption problem” of consociationalism, that is, under what conditions can consociationalism be adopted? (Horowitz 2014). Horowitz (2014) argues that because of the divergent preferences of majority and minority groups in a divided society, it is difficult to obtain unanimity about the proper form of power-sharing arrangement. A related critique extends the adoption problem to the concept of “adoptability” (McGarry 2017a). While the adoption problem refers to consociational institutions being “put in place” (McGarry 2017a, p. 513), “adoptability” refers to the likelihood of consociational institutions being accepted by the main ethnic groups. McEvoy and Aboultaif (2020) conceptualize “weak adoptability” as “occurring when one or more groups have less than majority support for the deal” (2020, p. 4). Weak adoptability may create serious problems for implementation. In the case of Iraq, weak adoptability impacted power-sharing in a number of ways, not least by undermining the potential for cooperation. Kurds and Sunnis were politically marginalized during the constitution-drafting process in 2005, which provided space for Shiite elites to take control of the state (McEvoy and Aboultaif 2020). The lack of inter-communal cooperation led to increasing conflict and institutional dysfunction which was “borne out in the ratcheting up of contestation over several aspects of the constitution” (McEvoy and Aboultaif 2020, p. 13).

What’s more, Spears (2000) notes that “power-sharing agreements are difficult to arrive at, even more difficult to implement, and even when implemented, such agreements rarely stand the test of time” (p. 106). The point being that even if the problem of adaptability is overcome, critics underline that consociations risk becoming “entrenched as time passes, making it difficult to move to a more ‘normal’ (i.e. majoritarian) politics” (Agarin and McCulloch 2020, p. 6). Referring to the problem as the “exit dilemma,” the idea is that “consociational institutions, once established, are sticky” (Horowitz 2014, p. 12) and that “it remains unclear how to initiate the transition to another political agreement without jeopardizing the gains of peace and stability” (McCulloch 2017, p. 4). Indeed, in a recent volume McCulloch and Keil discern three main tacks of debate about the efficacy of consociation: adoptability, functionality and ‘end-ability’ (McCulloch 2021, pp.2–3; Keil & McCulloch 2021, pp. 258–269).

Consociationalism may be a leading model for inclusion of ethno-political minorities, yet critics draw attention to its tendency to exclude identities and issues beyond the ethno-divide (Stojanović 2018; Agarin and McCulloch 2020). This central dilemma within consociationalism has been conceptualized as power-sharing’s “exclusion amid inclusion” dilemma (EAI): by prioritizing the main ethnic groups of a conflict, consociationalism indirectly excludes “Others” from the political sphere (Agarin et al. 2018). The catchall term “Others” is often used to describe citizens who do not identify with any of the main ethnic groups, including, but not limited to, women, sexual minorities, and ethnic or racial minorities. A particularly pertinent case of consociationalism’s exclusionary nature is that of Bosnia and Herzegovina, in which individuals who do not identify with one of the three “constituent peoples” – Bosniaks, Croats, and Serbs – or who do identify as such but reside in the entity for which these representatives are not designated, cannot run for the Presidency or become a member of the upper house of Parliament in which positions are reserved for these three groups (Milanovic 2010). By overlooking the diverse identities within a divided society and by failing to recognize cross-cutting cultural and social identities, it has been argued that consociationalism “risks implementing a very narrow conception of inclusion” (Agarin et al. 2018).

More recently, feminist scholarship has highlighted the problem of consociationalism’s gender blindness (Byrne and McCulloch 2012; Kennedy et al. 2016; Mackay and Murtagh 2019; McCulloch 2020). Some scholars argue that fundamental aspects of a conflict are left unresolved if the country fails to recognize salient identities other than ethno-national (Pierson and Thomson 2018). Though women are often excluded from peace negotiations, gender scholars argue that the inclusion of women in peace building is not just a “tool to encourage gender equality, but one fundamental to achieve peace” (Pierson and Thomson 2018, p. 103). This was particularly pertinent during the peace negotiations in Dayton to end the Bosnian War where not a single female representative of any of the conflict parties was present at the peace talks (Byrne and McCulloch 2012). As consociational peace agreements emphasize ethno-national identities, women can find themselves marginalized in the aftermath of conflict. As Deiana (2016) notes “women’s claims are repeatedly sidelined in favour of matters which are deemed of more vital interest in the quest for ‘peace’” (p. 109). Thus, in an insecure post-conflict environment, women who try to organize as political groups are often seen as a threat to both the power-sharing institutions and to ethno-national identities (Byrne and McCulloch 2012). Kennedy et al. (2016) conclude that “Consociationalism, in its lack of a full understanding of the gendered nature of conflict, does not fully address the inequalities and problems that need attention in a post- conflict setting and works to reinstate gendered processes of exclusion” (p. 630).

Some feminist scholars have pointed to fundamental contradictions between consociationalism and feminism at the theoretical level (Byrne and McCulloch 2012). Disjunctures have been observed in each perspective’s conception of identity (fixed in the case of consociation versus fluid in the case of feminism), the level of analysis with which each is concerned (elite versus grassroots), its primary normative concern (peace versus justice), and its conception of power (zero-sum versus positive sum) (Byrne and McCulloch 2017, p. 253; Mackay and Murtagh 2019). Nevertheless, attention has also been drawn to areas of potential overlap between consociation and feminism, not least their concern for the representation of underrepresented groups and democratic inclusion of difference (Rebouche and Fearson 2005, 163). Scholars like Bell (2015) have even pointed to potential opportunities that power-sharing can render for gender equality, such as the implementation of gender quotas alongside ethnic quotas (Bell 2015). Indeed, Bell and McNicholl (2019) show a positive correlation between power-sharing institutions and the inclusion of such provisions for gender equality in peace agreements. In this way, Bell (2015) challenges the mantra that consociation is categorically “bad for women” and makes the pragmatic case for feminists to engage with the model.

Consociationalism in Practice

A brief overview of empirical consociational cases demonstrates some of the promises and limitations sketched out above. Real-world experience reveals the different forms that power-sharing can take, but also the greater fuzziness of the distinction between liberal and corporate types in reality. It also shows the problems with which the model is associated and some of the ways in which these issues might be addressed. This section provides not a comprehensive review of consociational cases, but an empirical illustration of some of consociation’s dynamics, as outlined in theory.

While corporate and liberal consociation constitute ideal types in theory, they manifest in more complex ways in practice. Corporate consociation can be seen in cases such as Bosnia, Burundi, and Lebanon. After the 1992–95 war in Bosnia, which left an estimated 100,000 people dead and 2.2 million displaced, US-led mediation facilitated a power-sharing deal. The 1995 Dayton Peace Agreement (DPA) designed, first and foremost, to end the violent conflict, but also to establish a blueprint for governance post-war (Bieber 2005). While effective in the immediate objective of violence cessation, the DPA prescribed a rigid form of corporate consociational power-sharing. The constitution, contained in an annex to the Agreement, established three “constituent” peoples – Bosniaks, Croats and Serbs (Bieber 2005). It mandated a three-member presidency to be shared, on a rotating basis, between representatives of these three predetermined constituencies (McCulloch 2014a). Furthermore, seats in the upper house of the state parliament were reserved for representatives of each group (Bieber 2006). Dayton created a highly decentralized state made up of two sub-state federal entities: the Serb-majority Serb Republic (Republika Srpska) and the mixed Bosnian-Croat Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina (FBiH), each of which was granted considerable territorial autonomy (Keil 2013). Power-sharing in BiH proceeds on an ethnic and territorial basis (Keil 2013, pp. 95–96), both directly between the three constituent peoples and indirectly via the entities. In this way, the three groups are apportioned various powers of self-government, extensive veto rights and proportional representation with ethnic quotas in place to guarantee representation at all levels of government (Belloni 2004). BiH also demonstrates the central role external actors can play in power-sharing (McEvoy and McCulloch 2018). The DPA established a central role for international actors in the state’s governance, most notably through the Office of the High Representative. The High Representative holds considerable legislative and executive powers, further bolstered in 1997, including the ability to impose laws and dismiss domestic political representatives (Bieber 2006, pp. 83–84). In this sense, BiH has been characterized as something of an internal protectorate (Kartsonaki 2016, pp. 502–503).

Burundi constitutes another notable example of corporate consociation, in which the constitution mandates power sharing between the main ethnic segments: Hutus and Tutsis as well as the Twa minority (which constitute 85%, 14%, and 1% of the population respectively) (McCulloch 2014a). The 2000 Arusha Accords which aimed to end a civil war fought between Hutu and Tutsi forces that began in 1993 gave way to a new constitution in 2005 that implemented a highly ethnicized power-sharing agreement. Under this deal, election candidates must designate as Hutu, Tutsi, or Twa and the government and National Assembly must include 60% Hutu and 40% Tutsi, while the national defense forces and the Senate must be split equally between the two ethnic groups (Sullivan 2005; Lemarchand 2007). Furthermore, the two Vice Presidents must come from different ethnic groups (Vandeginste 2017). Yet, while power-sharing proceeds on a largely corporate, ethnic basis, rules are in place to prevent the formation of mono-ethnic parties. Parties are required to produce multiethnic electoral lists, whereby for every three candidates only two can be from the same group, failing which, a process of co-optation is triggered (McCulloch 2014b, p. 55). Furthermore, a 2003 law mandates that party memberships cannot be composed of more than 75% of one group, effectively requiring parties to be multi-ethnic to participate (Raffoul 2020, p. 11).

Lebanon likewise follows the corporate model. The country adopted certain power-sharing arrangements after the country gained independence in 1943, bringing an end to the French Mandate, before these structures ultimately collapsed and a civil war broke out in 1975 (Nagle 2016). The Ta'if Accord (1989) ended the war and restored consociationalism, attempting to address previous power-sharing failures (Nagle 2018). As part of a system of "confessionalism" a rigidly corporate consociational regime was imposed whereby the presidency is reserved for a Maronite Christian representative, while the posts of Prime Minister and Speaker of parliament are reserved for Sunni and Shiite representatives respectively (Haddad 2009). In order to ensure proportional representation, quotas are applied to cabinet, parliament, security forces, banking sectors, judiciary, and public administration (Bogaards 2017, p. 152; Seaver 2000).

Evidence from these power-sharing systems bears out some of the concerns outlined about corporate consociation. In Bosnia, the rigid form of consociationalism has been heavily criticized for its democratic failures, accused of institutionalizing division, dysfunction, and political stalemate. Indeed, its reform has been continuously on the agenda and pressed by the international community since the years proceeding Dayton. Bosnia's veto system, for example, has been heavily criticized for creating impasse in legislation, efficient governance, and progress. Indeed, in the 2006–10 legislative period it has been estimated that only 30% of planned legislation was adopted (Bahtić-Kunrath 2011, p. 899; McCulloch 2014a, p. 507). The Dayton system also clearly illustrates the EAI dilemma, in which electoral rules exclude nonethnic minorities and risk further entrenching ethnic division (Keil and Bieber 2009). Indeed, the European Court of Human Rights has now ruled on three occasions (in 2009, 2014 and 2016) against the state of Bosnia and Herzegovina for the discrimination of these electoral rules against "others" (Stojanović 2018).

In Burundi, amid efforts to accommodate ethnic differences through power-sharing, the country has been marked by deep dysfunction, one-party dominance, and clientelism (McCulloch 2014a; Vandeginste 2017). The country has been engulfed in a deep political crisis since 2015, when the late President Pierre Nkurunziza announced his intentions to run for a third term, in contravention of the constitution. The move sparked widespread protests and political violence with hundreds of thousands of political leaders, activists, and civilians forced into exile (Féron 2020), giving way to a period of authoritarian rule that has seen significant human rights abuses and humanitarian crises (Human Rights Watch 2019).

Meanwhile, in Lebanon, ethnic divisions have arguably increased since the signing of the Ta'if Accords (Haddad 2009). Tensions have been exacerbated as Syria has gained increasing control over the Lebanese government, placing proxies in leading political positions (Nagle 2016) and granting veto powers to pro-Syrian majorities (Haddad 2009). Indeed, the country has for decades been beset by severe dysfunction (Nagle 2016). In October 2019, mass protests accusing the government of corruption and mismanagement swept across the country resulting in the resignation of Prime Minister Saad Hariri and continued political and economic crisis (Hubbard and Saad 2020). Current crisis aside, Lebanon's rigid quota rules also raise the EAI dilemma, denying actors beyond the prescribed ethnic groups recognition and positions of power in state institutions. These rules arguably socialize voters to a system of ethnic representation (Howard 2012), in which Sunni citizens are represented by Sunni representatives, Shiite by Shiite, etc. Nagle (2018), furthermore, raises the far-reaching human rights implications of Lebanon's consociational system. Segmental autonomy, central to the state's consociational system, has seen "morality" issues devolved to religious leaders via 15 personal status laws which work to legitimize the oppression of women and sexual minorities (Nagle 2018, p. 1376). Deets and Skulte-Ouais (2020) also demonstrate something of a blockage in this system for civic movements and parties. Although civic movements have been on the rise in recent years amidst the protests and mass public frustration with the system, this growth failed to translate into significant civic electoral representation at the 2018 general election where the most important civic party Kulluna Watani only won a single seat (Deets and Skulte-Ouais 2020, p. 2).

More liberal forms of power-sharing are embodied by systems including Northern Ireland, North Macedonia (formerly the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia), and Kosovo. In Macedonia, the country's independence from the former Yugoslavia in 1991 gave way to nearly a decade of severe interethnic tensions between the state's Macedonian and Albanian communities (Reka 2008). With intense mediation from international actors, the Ohrid Framework Agreement (OFA) was signed in 2001, bringing an end to an armed conflict between the ethnic Albanian National Liberation Army and the Macedonian security forces (Bieber 2005). While the OFA does not introduce formal consociational requirements, the Agreement led to constitutional provisions that include crucial elements of power-sharing (Bieber 2005). The constitution does not reference specific ethnic groups (Reka 2008), and largely consists of liberal consociational components. It advances the protection of non-majority communities, mainly via the double-majority voting principle, whereby majority support is needed from the minority community, on issues vital to minority communities (McEvoy 2015). Further, the majority vote functions as an "indirect veto" (McEvoy 2015). Veto rights are "restrictive," rather than "permissive," in McCulloch's classification, only open for use in certain areas of decision making (McCulloch 2018, 741). Nevertheless, some corporate elements feature in this largely liberal system, including the Committee for Inter-Community Relations, which is made up of predetermined ethnic groups and designed to consider issues relevant for intercommunity relations and enable institutional dialogue among these different groups (Lyon 2012; McCulloch 2014a).

In Northern Ireland the 1998 Good Friday Agreement (GFA) was likewise largely based on liberal consociational principles. After some 30 years of conflict, the GFA established a devolved Northern Ireland Assembly and Executive where power would be shared by the main parties, as elected by the people: effectively, unionist and nationalist, though unspecified in the Agreement. In contrast to corporate consociation, the groups to share power are not predetermined, but decided by the electorate (McGarry and O'Leary 2009). Members of the Northern Ireland Assembly are elected under a proportional representation (PR) system through the Single Transferable Vote (STV) (McGarry and O'Leary 2009). Yet, while the GFA is largely liberal in nature, some corporate elements are present. For example, upon entrance to the Assembly the members are required to designate their national affiliation as "unionist," "nationalist," or "other" (McCulloch 2014a). Corporate components are further guaranteed through certain "key votes" in the Assembly which require either "parallel consent" – concurrent majorities among designated unionists and nationalists – or "weighted majority" – the support of at least 60% of members, including minimum 40% among nationalists and 40% among unionists (McCulloch 2014a). Notably, in these votes, the votes of "others" do not count on an equal basis (Evans and Tonge 2001, p. 115). Such votes can also be triggered by a "petition of concern" signed by 30 members – an effective community veto. In terms of executive power-sharing, the GFA establishes a First Minister and the Deputy First Minister who bear equal power. Since 2006 the co-premiers have been elected by the largest parties within the largest and second largest designations in the Assembly (unionist, nationalist or other) (McEvoy 2015) – likely for the foreseeable future to ensure a unionist and nationalist in the top positions. The remainder of the ministerial posts is allocated in proportion to their strength in the Assembly through the d’Hondt method (O’Leary 2013). To accommodate communal autonomy, certain cultural, linguistic, and educational protections are granted by the GFA (O’Leary 1999), such as proportional public funding for Protestant and Catholic schools (Fontana 2017).

In Kosovo, some 8 years after the 1998–99 war between ethnic Albanian forces and government forces of the rump Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Serbia and Montenegro), the UN Office of the Special Envoy for Kosovo (UNOSEK) proposed a comprehensive proposal for the Kosovo Status Settlement (Baliqi 2018). The 2007 proposal contained some power-sharing arrangements that were later incorporated in the new Constitution of Kosovo, adopted in 2008, when Kosovo unilaterally declared its independence (Baliqi 2018). However, Bieber notes that the institutional mechanisms in Kosovo “...are primarily conceived as elements of minority rights’ protection rather than as a power-sharing arrangement per se” (2005, p. 99). Despite not following a rigid power-sharing arrangement, some consociational components are present. Representation is guaranteed through strict quotas where ten seats in the Assembly are reserved for the Serb minority, and ten for other minorities (Fort 2018). In order to benefit from the reserved seat, each party or candidate must declare their ethnicity prior to the election (Bieber 2005). While the Kosovo Constitution rejected formal territorial autonomy, a high degree of autonomy is granted at the local level in areas such as healthcare and education (Keil and Bieber 2009). Furthermore, the 2013 Brussels Agreement between Kosovo and Serbia granted considerable autonomy to the Serb minority (Landau 2017, pp. 448, pp. 453). Like BiH, the system entailed significant international involvement through UNOSEK, and subsequently the European Union Rule of Law Mission in Kosovo (EULEX), established in 2007.

Comparison of liberal and corporate consociational systems proves problematic, given the number of variables at play in each case, and the fact that these ideal types do not exist so distinctly in practice. Yet, in the more liberal forms of power-sharing we can observe some evidence of the greater flexibility and inclusion advocated by proponents. Northern Ireland has seen significant progress towards peace and stability since 1998, not least in policing reform, through which the majority Protestant force in place during the conflict, the Royal Ulster Constabulary, was replaced by the Police Service of Northern Ireland in 2001, with an affirmative action recruitment policy to achieve more equal representation of Catholics in the force. Decommissioning of paramilitary weapons was also completed in 2005, while contentious policing and justice powers were transferred from London to the devolved administration in 2010 (O’Leary 2019, 24). Civic parties, beyond the main nationalist and unionist groupings, have also grown in number, size, and relevance since the signing of the peace agreement (Murtagh 2020). These “other” parties won 11 out of 90 seats in the Northern Ireland Assembly in the 2017 election and, since 1998, have increased their share of first preference votes from 8.2% to 13.2% (ark.ac.uk). Indeed, under the d’Hondt system, non-aligned parties, such as the Alliance, may take seats in the Executive, and have done so on several occasions since 2010 (Mitchell 2018). They may even assume the posts of First and Deputy First Minister, should they grow in size in the Assembly to such a level (McGarry and O’Leary 2009). Meanwhile, in North Macedonia a new civic alternative party Levica formed in 2016 against the backdrop of a political crisis (Piacentini 2019, 273). Furthermore, ethnic Macedonian party, the Social Democratic Union of Macedonia (SDSM), has since 2016 begun to directly appeal beyond its ethnic voter base to Albanian voters (Piacentini 2019, 277).

Yet, these liberal systems also demonstrate limitations with respect to stability, democracy, ethnic inclusion, and, indeed, broader inclusion. Shortcomings in the inclusion of ethnic minorities have been highlighted in North Macedonia and Kosovo. In North Macedonia, Bieber argues that while the more liberal veto rules outlined may be seen as an advantage in terms of efficient governance – preventing “. . . blockage of the entire decision-making process. . .” (2005, p. 97) – they also limit minority communities’ political impact on important issues such as economic policy and infrastructure. Furthermore, in Kosovo, although the Constitution guarantees representation for minority communities in all public bodies and enterprises, these minorities remain underrepresented in public life (Bieber 2013). Studies show that, as of 2013, only 2% of employees at publicly owned enterprises were of non-majority community background and less than 7% of non-majority communities were represented in government institutions, despite the constitution mandating that at least 10% of position at central level are to be reserved for non-majority groups (The Office for Community Affairs 2013).

In Northern Ireland, despite the aforementioned progress, the power-sharing institutions have been beset by periodical instability, dysfunction, and polarization, necessitating a number of subsequent settlements and revisions, most notably the 2006 St Andrews Agreement. The institutions have been effectively suspended on five occasions, including two prolonged periods of non-functioning from 2002–2007 and 2017–2020. As shown, the system also features distinct corporate elements and these have been accused of marginalizing actors outside the nationalist-unionist frame, including civic parties and movements (Murtagh 2020). Furthermore, other identities and issues, including gender and LGBTQ rights, have arguably been subordinated to the ethno-national cleavage, with marriage equality and abortion rights only extended to Northern Ireland in 2019, and as a result of direct legislation from the UK Parliament during a period of power-sharing absence (Hayes and Nagle 2019; Thomson 2019).

How might the democratic deficits of consociation, such as the EAI dilemma, be addressed? In spite of these limitations, space has been carved out in consociational systems for other actors, identities and issues, beyond the ethno-national divide, in various ways, in some cases, through provisions implemented post-agreement. On the issue of gender inclusion, for example, in their large-scale analysis of peace agreements using the PA-X database, Bell and McNicholl (2019) have demonstrated a correlation between power-sharing and several measures of gender inclusion. References to gender equality are about five times more likely to occur in a power-sharing agreement than an agreement that does not contain power-sharing provisions, while provisions for gender quotas are more than seven times more likely in power-sharing agreements (p. 9). Looking to cases at the liberal end of the consociational spectrum, in both North Macedonia and Kosovo gender quotas operate alongside minority quotas. In North Macedonia candidate quotas are in place to ensure that at least 40% of electoral lists must be of the less represented gender, with requirements for equal distribution in the list rankings (IDEA 2020). Kosovo goes even further: not only must 30% of electoral candidates be women, but 30% of seats in the Assembly are reserved for women (Potter 2018). Northern Ireland’s GFA was primarily framed in terms of national identity, yet it did contain provisions on gender, equality and nondiscrimination (Rebouche and Fearson 2005). The agreement did not mandate legislative gender quotas and until recently, women’s descriptive and substantive representation had been notably poor (Galligan 2013). Nevertheless, the former has increased dramatically since 2016, with women’s representation in the Northern Ireland Assembly reaching the 30% mark in 2017 and three of the five main parties led by women (Roberts 2017).

Indeed, even in rigidly corporate systems some space has been rendered for broader inclusion, beyond ethno-national groups. In terms of gender, Bosnia’s DPA does not include any reference to gender representation (Rebouche and Fearson 2005), yet, since its implementation several initiatives have been taken to advance gender equality, including the 2003 Law on Gender Equality, which mandated gender quotas, requiring political parties’ candidate lists to comprise at least one third men and women (Rebouche and Fearson 2005) and the establishment of a government agency for Gender Equality in 2004 (Mackay and Murtagh 2019). Meanwhile, in Burundi, the constitution mandates that at least one-third of the members of the National Assembly are women (Lemarchand 2007). Nevertheless, while these gender provisions have improved women's parliamentary representation descriptively in these cases – their physical and numerical presence – advances in women's substantive representation – their power within governments, legislatures, and parties to shape political outcomes – have proven more elusive. Byrne and McCulloch (2012) show that political culture in Burundi remains highly patriarchal and women have been observed to have had limited influence in the state's political institutions and ability to shape policy (Mackay and Murtagh 2019, p. 33). Similarly, in Bosnia, in spite of quota rules in place, parties remain highly centralized and patriarchal and women's substantive power has been severely constrained (Byrne and McCulloch 2012). Thus, when it comes to gender equality under power-sharing, a gap can emerge between paper and practice, where legacies of violent conflict and political cultures based on ethno-national representation can compromise the realization of institutional provisions (Mackay and Murtagh 2019).

Summary

This chapter has examined the theory and practice of consociationalism. It set out by exploring the concept of consociation, as first developed by Arend Lijphart as a model for managing conflict and division in society through democratic institutions. It traced the development of the model since Lijphart's theorization and highlighted new theoretical considerations, such as the role of international actors and the distinction between liberal and corporate consociation, that have added new important dimensions to the power-sharing model. Surveying the literature, this chapter thus identified the core merits of this model, as well as its key limitations and unintended consequences. In turn, the chapter applied these debates to real-world cases to illustrate how consociation manifests in practice, including in its more corporate and more liberal guises, and how these strengths and weaknesses bear out. In this way, the chapter exposed some of the gaps between consociationalism's theoretical objectives and its empirical realization. By addressing key critiques, such as the risk of institutionalizing division, dysfunction and deadlock, and "exclusion amid inclusion," this chapter has demonstrated some key empirical challenges of consociationalism.

In attempting to evaluate consociational power-sharing, a core difficulty is determining the criteria by which we should measure success. Particularly critical is the question of whether we are judging the model on its ability to create the conditions for sustainable peace – in the minimal sense of nonviolence – or on the more ambitious goal of creating conditions for efficient, fair and just governance. As the evidence presented above has indicated, consociation's performance in relation to the first purpose is more clear-cut and favorable in comparison to its faring on the second purpose. Yet, in assessing consociation's record on democracy, one's expectations must be tempered in light of the recent experience of conflict. This is not to suggest that outcomes short of democratic should be accepted or legitimized, but that the distance traveled from a state of violent conflict must be acknowledged and the potential alternatives borne in mind. Nevertheless, what is also clear is that any binary choice between stable peace and functional, just democracy in post-conflict places is a false one. Consociational power-sharing is necessary under certain conditions of communal division and conflict to avoid vastly unequal outcomes and collapse into political violence. Squaring the model with the principles of broader inclusion, justice and equality is no small challenge. Yet, as shown, there are means through which power-sharing can be made more inclusive. Indeed, this is imperative to the future of power-sharing. Inclusive power-sharing is a developing research agenda in consociational scholarship and one that has the potential to inform more just practice of power-sharing and outcomes that embody more positive and sustainable peace.

Cross-References

- ▶ Census Politics in Deeply Divided Societies
- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women’s Organizations in Post-conflict Contexts

References

Agarin, T., & McCulloch, A. (2020). How power-sharing includes and excludes non-dominant communities: Introduction to the special issue. International Political Science Review, 41(1), 3–14.

Agarin, T., McCulloch, A., & Murtagh, C. (2018). Others in deeply divided societies: A research agenda. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(3), 299–310.

Aitken, R. (2007). Cementing divisions?: An assessment of the impact of international interventions and peace-building policies on ethnic identities and divisions. Policy Studies, 28(3), 247–267.

Bahtić-Kunrath, B. (2011). Of veto players and entity-voting: Institutional gridlock in the Bosnian reform process. Nationalities Papers, 39(6), 899–923.

Baliqi, B. (2018). Promoting multi-ethnicity or maintaining a divided society: Dilemmas of power-sharing in Kosovo. Journal on Ethnopolitics & Minority Issues in Europe, 17(1), 49–71.

Bell, C. (2015). Unsettling bargains? Power-sharing and the inclusion of women in peace negotiations. Political Settlements Research Programme. Edinburgh: University of Edinburgh.

Bell, C., & McNicholl, K. (2019). Principled pragmatism and the inclusion project’: Implementing a gender perspective in peace agreements. Feminists@law, 9(1), 1–51.

Belloni, R. (2004). Peacebuilding and consociational electoral engineering in Bosnia and Herzegovina. International Peacekeeping, 11(2), 334–353.

Bieber, F. (2005). Power sharing after Yugoslavia: Functionality and dysfunctionality of power-sharing institutions in post-war Bosnia, Macedonia, and Kosovo. In S. Noel (Ed.), From power sharing to democracy: Post-conflict institutions in ethnically divided societies. Studies in nationalism and ethnic conflict (pp. 85–103). Montreal/Kingston: McGill-Queens University Press.

Bieber, F. (2006). Post-war Bosnia: Ethnicity, inequality and public sector governance. Hampshire: Palgrave.

Bieber, F. (2013). Power sharing and democracy in South-east Europe. Taiwan Journal of Democracy, Special Issue, 129–148.

Bogaards, M. (2017). Lebanon: how civil war transformed consociationalism. In McCulloch, A. and McGarry, J.

(eds) Power-Sharing: Empirical and Normative Challenges. London: Routledge.

Byrne, S., & McCulloch, A. (2012). Gender, representation and power-sharing in post-conflict institutions. International Peacekeeping, 19(5), 565–580.

Byrne, S., & McCulloch, A. (2017). Gendering power-sharing. In A. McCulloch & J. McGarry (Eds.), Power-sharing: Empirical and normative challenges. London: Routledge.

Deets, S., & Skulte-Ouass, J. (2020). Breaking into a consociational system: Civic parties in Lebanon’s 2018 parliamentary election. Ethnopolitics. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2020.1761655>.

Deiana, M. A. (2016). To settle for a gendered peace? Spaces for feminist grassroots mobilization in Northern Ireland and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Citizenship Studies, 20(1), 99–114.

Evans, J. A., & Tonge, J. (2001). Northern Ireland’s third tradition(s): That Alliance party surveyed. Journal of Elections, Public Opinion & Parties, 11(1), 104–118.

Farry, S. (2009). Consociationalism and the creation of a shared future for Northern Ireland. In R. Taylor (Ed.), Consociational theory: McGarry and O’Leary and the Northern Ireland conflict (pp. 203–226). Oxon: Routledge.

Féron, É. (2020). Reinventing conflict prevention? Women and the prevention of the reemergence of conflict in Burundi. Conflict Resolution Quarterly, 37(3), 239–252.

Fontana, G. (2017). Education policy and power-sharing in post-conflict societies: Lebanon, Northern Ireland, and Macedonia. London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Fort, E. (2018). From power-sharing arrangements to identity building: The case of Kosovo Serbs in Kosovo. Ethnopolitics, 17(5), 503–518.

Galligan, Y. (2013). Gender and politics in Northern Ireland: The representation gap revisited. Irish Political Studies, 28(3), 413–433.

Galtung, J. (1976). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, Peacemaking and peacebuilding. In J. Galtung (Ed.), Essays in peace research (2nd ed., pp. 282–304). Copenhagen: Ejlers.

Guelke, A. (2012). Politics in deeply divided societies. Cambridge: Polity Press.

Haddad, S. (2009). Lebanon: From consociationalism to conciliation. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 15(3–4), 398–416.

Hayes, B., & Nagle, J. (2019). Ethnonationalism and attitudes towards same-sex marriage and abortion in Northern Ireland. International Political Science Review, 40(4), 455–469.

Horowitz, D. (2001). The Northern Ireland agreement: Clear consociational, and risky. In J. McGarry (Ed.), Northern Ireland and the divided world: Post agreement Northern Ireland in comparative perspective. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Horowitz, D. (2014). Ethnic power sharing: Three big problems. Journal of Democracy, 25(2), 5–20.

- Howard, L. M. (2012). The Ethnocracy trap. Journal of Democracy, 23(4), 155–169.
- Hubbard, B., & Saad, H. (2020, June 11). Lebanon's currency plunges, and protesters surge into streets. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2020/06/11/world/middleeast/lebanon-protests.html>
- Human Rights Watch. (2019). Burundi: Events of 2018. <https://www.hrw.org/world-report/2019/country-chapters/burundi#>. Accessed 20 July 2020.
- International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (IDEA). (2020). Gender quotas database: North Macedonia, Republic of. <https://www.idea.int/data-tools/data/gender-quotas/country-view/207/35>. Accessed 21 July 2020.
- Kartsonaki, A. (2016). Twenty years after Dayton: Bosnia-Herzegovina (still) stable and explosive. Civil Wars, 18(4), 488–516.
- Keil, S. (2013). Multinational federalism in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Surrey: Ashgate.
- Keil, S., & Bieber, F. (2009). Power-sharing revisited: Lessons learned in the Balkans? Review of Central and East European Law, 34(4), 337–360.
- Keil, S., & Kudlenko, A. (2015). Bosnia and Herzegovina 20 years after Dayton: Complexity born of paradoxes. International Peacekeeping, 22(5), 471–489.
- Keil, S., & McCulloch, A. (2021). Conclusion: The Past, Present and Future of Power-Sharing in Europe. In S. Keil & A. McCulloch (Eds), Power-Sharing in Europe: Past Practice, Present Cases and Future Directions (pp. 1–18) Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kennedy, R., Pierson, C., & Thomson, J. (2016). Challenging identity hierarchies: Gender and consociational power-sharing. The British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 18(3), 618–633.
- Landau, D. (2017). The quest for legitimacy in independent Kosovo: The unfulfilled promise of diversity and minority rights. Nationalities Papers, 45(3), 442–463.
- Lemarchand, R. (2007). Consociationalism and power sharing in Africa: Rwanda, Burundi, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo. African Affairs, 106(422), 1–20.
- Lijphart, A. (1969). Consociational democracy. In A. Lijphart (Ed.), Thinking about democracy: Power-sharing and majority rule in theory and practice. London: Routledge. 2008.
- Lijphart, A. (1977). Democracy in plural societies: a comparative exploration. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.
- Lijphart, A. (1984). Democracies: Patterns of majoritarian and consensus government in twenty-one countries. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Lijphart, A. (1991). Self-determination versus pre-determination of ethnic minorities in power sharing systems. In A. Lijphart (Ed.), Thinking about democracy: Power-sharing and majority rule in theory and practice (pp. 66–74). London: Routledge. 2008.
- Lyon, A. (2012). Between the integration and accommodation of ethnic difference: Decentralization in the republic of Macedonia. Journal of Ethnopolitics and Minority Issues in Europe, 11(3), 80–103.
- Mackay, F., & Murtagh, C. (2019). New institutions, new gender rules? A feminist institutionalist lens on women and power-sharing. Feminists@law, 9(1), 1–54.
- McCrudden, C., & O'Leary, B. (2013). Courts and consociations, or how human rights courts may destabilize power-sharing settlements. The European Journal of International Law, 24(2), 477–501.
- McCulloch, A. (2014a). Consociational settlements in deeply divided societies: The Liberal-corporate distinction. Democratization, 21(3), 501–518.
- McCulloch, A. (2014b). Power-sharing and political stability in deeply divided societies. London/New York: Routledge.
- McCulloch, A. (2017). Pathways from power-sharing. Civil Wars, 19(4), 405–424.
- McCulloch, A. (2018). The use and abuse of veto rights in power-sharing systems: Northern Ireland's petition of concern in comparative perspective. Government and Opposition, 53(4), 735–756.
- McCulloch, A. (2020). Power-sharing: A gender intervention. International Political Science Review, 41(1), 44–57.
- McCulloch, A. (2021). Introduction: Power-Sharing in Europe - From Adoptability to End-Ability. In S. Keil & A. McCulloch (Eds), Power-Sharing in Europe: Past Practice, Present Cases and Future Directions (pp. 1–18) Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- McCulloch, A., & McEvoy, J. (2018). The international mediation of power-sharing settlements. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(4), 467–485.
- McEvoy, J. (2015). Power-sharing executives: Governing in Bosnia, Macedonia and Northern Ireland. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- McEvoy, J., & Aboultaif, E. W. (2020). Power-sharing challenges: From weak adoptability to dysfunction in Iraq. Ethnopolitics, 1–20. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2020.1739363>.
- McGarry, J. (2017a). Centripetalism, consociationalism and Cyprus: The 'adoptability' question. Political Studies, 65(2), 512–529.
- McGarry, J. (2017b). Centripetalism, consociationalism and Cyprus: The adoptability question. In A. McCulloch & J. McGarry (Eds.), Power-sharing: Empirical and normative challenges. London: Routledge.
- McGarry, J. (2017c). Conclusion: What explains the performance of power-sharing settlements? In A. McCulloch & J. McGarry (Eds.), Power-sharing: empirical and normative challenges. London: Routledge.
- McGarry, J. (2021) Why has Cyprus been a Consociational Cemetery? In S. Keil & A. McCulloch (Eds), Power-Sharing in Europe: Past Practice, Present Cases and Future Directions (pp. 1-18) Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.

- McGarry, J., & O'Leary, B. (2006a). Consociational theory, Northern Ireland's conflict and its agreement. Part 1. What Consociationalists can learn from Northern Ireland. Government and Opposition, 41(1), 43–63.
- McGarry, J., & O'Leary, B. (2006b). Consociational theory, Northern Ireland's conflict, and its agreement 2. What critics of consociation can learn from Northern Ireland. Government and Opposition, 41(2), 249–277.
- McGarry, J., & O'Leary, B. (2007). Iraq's constitution of 2005: Liberal consociation as political prescription. International Journal of Constitutional Law, 5(4), 670–698.
- McGarry, J., & O'Leary, B. (2009). Power shared after the deaths of thousands. In R. Taylor (Ed.), Consociational theory: McGarry and O'Leary and the Northern Ireland conflict (pp. 40–110). Oxon: Routledge.
- Milanovic, M. (2010). Sejdić & Finci V. Bosnia and Herzegovina. The American Journal of International Law, 104(4), 636–641.
- Mill, J. S. (1861). Considerations on representative government (2nd ed.). London: Parker & Bourn.
- Mitchell, D. (2018). Non-nationalist politics in a bi-national consociation: The case of the Alliance Party of Northern Ireland. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(3), 336–347.
- Murtagh, C. (2020). The plight of civic parties in divided societies. International Political Science Review, 41(1), 73–88.
- Nagle, J. (2011). Plying nostrums or exporting peace models? An examination of the contradictions between the northern Irish peace process and international peacebuilding. Democracy and Security, 7, 160–183.
- Nagle, J. (2016). Between entrenchment, reform and transformation: Ethnicity and Lebanon's Consociational democracy. Democratization, 23(7), 1144–1161.
- Nagle, J. (2018). Beyond ethnic entrenchment and amelioration: An analysis of non-sectarian social movements and Lebanon's Consociationalism. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 41(7), 1370–1389.
- Noel, S. (2005). Introduction. In S. Noel (Ed.), From power sharing to democracy: Post-conflict institutions in ethnically divided societies (pp. ix–xiii). Quebec: McGill.
- O'Leary, B. (1999). The nature of the agreement. Fordham International Law Journal, 22(4), 1628–1667.
- O'Leary, B. (2012). The federalization of Iraq and the break-up of Sudan: The Leonard Schapiro lecture. Government and Opposition, 47(4), 481–516.
- O'Leary, B. (2013). Power sharing in deeply divided places: An Advocate's introduction. In J. McEvoy & B. O'Leary (Eds.), Power sharing in deeply divided places (pp. 1–64). Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- O'Leary, B. (2019). A treatise on Northern Ireland (Vol. III). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Piacentini, A. (2019). "Trying to fit in": Multiethnic parties, ethnoclientelism, and power-sharing in Bosnia and Herzegovina and Macedonia. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 25(3), 273–291.
- Pierson, C., & Thomson, J. (2018). Allies or opponents? Power-sharing, civil society, and gender. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(1), 100–115.
- Potter, M. (2018). Measuring inclusion in political life: A framework for analysis. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(3), 324–335.
- Raffoul, A. W. (2020). The politics of association: Power-sharing and the depoliticization of ethnicity in post-war Burundi. Ethnopolitics, 19(1), 1–18. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2018.1519933>.
- Rebouche, R., & Fearson, K. (2005). Overlapping identities: Power sharing and women's rights. In I. O'Flynn & D. Russell (Eds.), Power sharing: New challenges for divided societies (pp. 155–171). London: Pluto Press.
- Reilly, B. (2006). Political engineering and party politics in conflict-prone societies. Democratization, 13(5), 811–827.
- Reka, A. (2008). The Ohrid agreement: The travails of inter-ethnic relations in Macedonia. Human Rights Review, 9(1), 55–69.
- Roberts, D. (2017). 'Mum-of-two, 40': But women rise to the top in Northern Irish politics', Democratic Audit. <https://www.democraticaudit.com/2017/04/11/mum-of-two-40-but-women-rise-to-the-top-in-northern-irish-politics/>. Accessed 20 July 2020.
- Seaver, B. M. (2000). The regional sources of power-sharing failure: The case of Lebanon. Political Science Quarterly, 115(2), 247–271.
- Spears, I. S. (2000). Understanding inclusive peace agreements in Africa: The problems of sharing power. Third World Quarterly, 21(1), 105–118.
- Stojanović, N. (2018). Political marginalization of 'others' in consociational regimes. Zeitschrift für Vergleichende Politikwissenschaft, 12(2), 341–364.
- Sullivan, D. P. (2005). The missing pillars: A look at the failure of peace in Burundi through the lens of Arend Lijphart's theory of consociational democracy. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 43(1), 75–95.
- Taylor, R. (2006). The Belfast agreement and the politics of consociationalism: A critique. The Political Quarterly, 77(2), 217–226.
- The Economist. (2018, December 21). Why Lebanon struggles to form governments. <https://www.economist.com/the-economist-explains/2018/12/21/why-lebanon-struggles-to-form-governments>. Accessed 22 July 2020.
- The Office for Community Affairs. (2013). Assessment on the employment of members of non-majority Communities in the Kosovo Civil service And publicly owned enterprises. Office of the Prime Minister. http://www.zck-ks.net/repository/docs/Assessment_on_Employment.pdf
- Thomson, J. (2019). Northern Ireland has been forced to change its abortion law – here's how it happened. The Conversation, October 22. <https://theconversation.com/>

northern-ireland-has-been-forced-to-change-its-abortion-law-heres-how-it-happened-125256. Accessed 20 July 2020.

Vandeginste, S. (2017). Power-sharing in Burundi: An enduring miracle? In A. McCulloch & J. McGarry (Eds.), Power-sharing: empirical and normative challenges. London: Routledge.

Wilford, R. (2009). Consociational government: inside the Northern Ireland executive. In R. Taylor (Ed.), Consociational theory: McGarry and O'Leary and the Northern Ireland conflict (pp. 227–251). Oxon: Routledge.

Wolff, S. (2003). Disputed territories: The transnational dynamics of ethnic conflict settlement. New York: Berghahn Books.

Wolff, S. (2010). Building democratic states after conflict: Institutional design revisited. International Studies Review, 12, 128–141.

Websites

<http://www.ark.ac.uk/elections/fa17.htm>

Constructive Journalism

- ▶ Peace Journalism

Contested Cities

- ▶ Divided Cities

Contested Pasts

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

Contract Embellishment

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Counter Memory

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts

Counterterrorism

- ▶ Kenya's War on Terror
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Craft

- ▶ Textile-Making as Research Method

Crafts = Politics

- ▶ Textiles Making Peace

Crafts Visual Materials

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

Crimes Against Humanity

- ▶ R2P and Prevention

Critical Approaches

- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace

Critical Peace Research

- ▶ Street Art and Peace

Critical Perspectives

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

Critical Theories

► Feminist Peace Research

Critical Theory

► Emancipatory Peace

Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia

Birgit Bräuchler
Monash University, Melbourne, VIC, Australia

Introduction

This contribution provides empirical evidence for a conceptual chapter in this Encyclopedia, entitled ► “Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research”. The conceptual chapter argues for a broader understanding of peacebuilding as something growing from within and a long-term endeavor that does not stop once violence ended and (a superficial) “peace” has been established, without looking into issues of broader structural violence that often underlie the outbreak of physical violence. This contribution takes an anthropologically informed look at mainly local efforts to restore social relations and reintegrate society after mass violence in Maluku, Eastern Indonesia. Based on two decades of multisited and multi-temporal fieldwork, it analyzes a multiscalar peace process and explains why outside interventions are often not adopted or welcome or fail to create sustainable peace and how local mechanisms, their renegotiation or invention are much more powerful as they resonate with the affected people’s lifeworlds and identities and thus enable them to embody the peace process. A long-term engagement with a particular region in Indonesia allows the author to provide insights into the longevity of such dynamics that transformed into broader struggles for social justice and to argue that in societies that underwent communal mass violence, the ideational divide only gradually dissolves, with minor incidents threatening to retrigger large-scale violence. This requires continuous investment in relationship-building and the proactive mobilization for peace that necessarily needs to be grounded in local societal dynamics and go beyond any fix-termed interventions.

This chapter first introduces the ethnographic setting and the conflict context. It then analyzes the cultural mobilization for peace in Maluku and its various challenges, thus informing and contributing to critical discussions on the local and cultural turns in peace and conflict studies as outlined in the conceptual chapter. In a next step, the chapter explores new spaces opened up for creative peacebuilding in Maluku that strive for a broader transformative social justice, enriched with specific examples from the area. It closes with a summary and some concluding reflections.

Conflict Context

The step-down of the authoritarian Suharto regime in 1998 was followed by various violent conflicts in different parts of Indonesia, with the Maluku conflict in Eastern Indonesia being one of the most protracted and bloodiest (1999–2004). Until the outbreak of mass violence, the Moluccan archipelago with an approximately half Christian, half Muslim population was praised for interreligious harmony in a majority Muslim country. (“Moluccan” or “Moluccas” and the Indonesian version “Maluku” are used interchangeably throughout this chapter.). The violence resulted in thousands of deaths, hundreds of thousands displaced people, and an ideologically and physically segregated society. The destruction of houses of worship, the involvement of radical jihadists from Java, and strategically spread rumors turned religion into the main dividing line. This, however, disregards the complexity of conflict dynamics and the less visible structural violence that was crucial for the emergence of the fighting, such as economic inequalities, the politicization of religion, the government’s transmigration programs leading to demographic imbalances, the taking sides of security forces, and colonial and neo-colonial exploitation of natural resources and traditional alliance systems.

The Indonesian government did not allow for any outside military intervention or the deployment of UN peace forces in Maluku and was not willing to set up any well-established tools of transitional justice such as truth commissions (TCs) and law enforcement. It shifted the blame on the local population and set on increasing deployments of troops (some of them exacerbating the violence by taking sides) and implemented a civil emergency status in Maluku Province from 2000 until 2003. Right after its imposition, three villages were razed to the ground. During a conversation with the author in 2008, Ot Lawalata, head of the National Commission on Human Rights in Maluku at the time, came up with several reasons why law enforcement was difficult if not impossible (Bräuchler 2015, pp. 88–89): the enormous brain drain of legal sources during the mass violence, the neglect of formal law during the civil state of emergency, and the prevailing of collective perpetrators. Often victims did not dare to accuse the police or the military or to name perpetrators, either due to trauma or because they were worried about the fate of their families, still having to live with a neighbor perpetrator in the future. Christians on the islands of Kesui and Teor, for instance, did speak out about forced mass conversions, but did not get any legal support. Others do not want to reopen old wounds and therefore refrain from giving witness, as Lawalata added, or had no access to the formal justice system. Not trying to argue that all this should be taken as an excuse to bury the past or that masterminds behind the violence should not be brought to court, there is still doubt whether the enforcement of law on a broad scale or a TC would have been a solution to bring about peace and reconciliation in a place, where a major part of the population has been involved in the conflict one way or the other, thus blurring or dissolving the boundaries between victims and perpetrators. Various NGOs were founded during the conflict in order to provide advocacy and in 2005, the UNDP in cooperation with the government and universities in Yogyakarta and Ambon established a team for an Access to Justice Assessment (Littik et al. 2005a, b, c, d). As a member jurist entrusted to the author, it produced hardly any concrete results. Despite the failure of formal law, Trisasonko (2003, pp. 93–94) still considers law enforcement important to enable the reestablishment of morality and solidarity in Moluccan society and to prevent future acts of revenge. For the moment, however, informal justice actors needed to take over such as religious leaders, traditional village heads, adat elders, or the traditional village parliaments that are meant to (re)enact customary law in Indonesia's decentralization era – with adat being a term for traditions and customary law.

There were hundreds of initiatives by a multitude of actors that attempted to provide emergency relief and offer programs, trainings, and workshops for different target groups to facilitate the rebuilding of bridges between the two religious communities (for an overview see Bräuchler 2015, chapter 3). There were initiatives by dozens of UN and other international organizations and NGOs, the Moluccan diaspora, the provincial government, academics, the media, local civil society, religious and adat organizations and leaders, and common people on the ground. The number of local NGOs rose from a handful before the conflict to more than 400, with each one of them wanting to get a share from national and international funding (compare the downsides of a NGO workshoping culture for peace in Liberia in Fuest 2010). Most of them vanished again once mass violence ended or even before, when the international community was not willing any longer to fund projects addressing religious difference.

Peace programs set up, organized, or supported by international organizations also faced criticism, such as a lack of coherence of and coordination between international agencies or INGOs and the government (Brown et al. 2005, p. 61). In addition, the selectivity of programs created inequalities not only within villages and between villages, but also between islands, Ambon, the island that hosts Maluku's capital, Ambon City, being the center of (I)NGO activity. With few exceptions, there was usually no time to really grapple with local traditional concepts, often imposing a Western notion of, for example, reconciliation, democracy, and peace or unreflectedly adopting local concepts without considering their diverse interpretations and the consequences for cultural outsiders. International and local organizations also seemed to create something like a workshop culture that, rather counterproductively, fostered passivity, raised exaggerated expectancy, and prevented the multiplication effect of workshops that were sometimes seen as mere entertainment or something one had to attend; results and findings were often not socialized among the co-villagers. For a long time, such peace efforts were without apparent success, many were conducted without the support or even against the will of the Moluccan majority, and many considered to be elitist and counterproductive.

In contrast to the central government, the provincial and district governments tried to open-up space for gatherings and reconciliation events, but to not much avail. Only in 2002, after months of preparations underground by religious leaders and other civil society actors, did peace talks in Malino (Sulawesi), supported by the Moluccan governor and Jakarta ministers Jusuf Kalla and Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono, result in a peace agreement that put at least an official end to the violence. Results were mixed: there was strong resistance, in particular among fundamentalist Islamic groups (see, e.g., Attaminy et al. 2002); the civil state of emergency was not lifted; the agreement put an end to mass violence, but was followed by occasional “terrorist acts” until 2004; the independent fact finding team that had been actioned after Malino never revealed “the truth” it found; no masterminds were brought to court; and corruption was common in the way villages were reconstructed and refugees were treated. More generally, the government took no measures to prevent, but rather fostered the territorial segregation of the two religious communities, which is extremely counterproductive to the reestablishment of social relations that need to be reenacted in daily life. By many Moluccans, the Malino agreement was seen as an elitist exercise, but still considered to be important as a starting point for a broader peace process and as proof that the central government finally took problems in Maluku seriously (Bräuchler 2015, pp. 90–93).

After Malino, the government kept on organizing peace safaris, interreligious visits, peace concerts, or the installation of a Peace Gong in Ambon City in 2009. Common people were not allowed to enter the square during the installation ceremony, which made it look like yet another elitist approach and a waste of money. According to the governor at the time, K.A. Ralahalu (2006, pp. 50–62), economic development, good leadership and governance, transparency, and good public service are crucial to reestablish people’s trust in the government. This also included the promotion of a politics of (religious) balance (politik berimbang), both with regard to filling the government bureaucracy and public offices (Pieris 2004, p. 78; Tomagola et al. 2008, p. 27).

From the very beginning of the conflict, there were voices from various strands of society reminding people of Moluccan traditions of brotherhood (basudara in Ambonese Malay) that were in place long before world religions had arrived in the area. The failure of many of the above listed measures, taken together with the disastrous effects of the instrumentalization of religion, drove people in Maluku to restrengthen, revive, and reconstruct culture and traditions as the common ground for reconciliation. They developed a narrative that blames outside provocateurs guilty of the unrests – something Mac Ginty (2014, p. 557) might call “blame deferral” – and countered this by developing a unifying Moluccan identity. As argued in more detail elsewhere, it was “the cultural dimension of peace” (Bräuchler 2015) that provided for the most efficient way for Moluccans to embody and sustainably engage in reconciliation. Cases like this very much informed a turn towards culture in peace and conflict studies more generally, as outlined in the author’s conceptual chapter in this Encyclopedia (see ► “Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research”) (see also Bräuchler 2018).

Cultural Mobilization for Peace

Reflecting on the catastrophic effects of the instrumentalization of religion on their daily lives, the unreliability of the security forces and the ineffectiveness or lack of government initiatives confirmed people in Maluku in their efforts to search for solutions within their own cultural setting. This rendered peacebuilding more sustainable, but also fostered exclusionary dynamics as outlined in the following section.

However, complex the actor landscape was, and no matter how many peace workshops were held by (I)NGOs, Moluccans claim that peace came about naturally, through local initiatives and traditional reconciliation mechanisms. In some cases this even resulted in a competition with each one claiming their initiative to be the key to peace. What people seem to embrace and remember, is what they themselves could easily identify with, what they could integrate into their everyday lives, and what helped them to return to their daily routines, thus embodying reconciliation and peace (see also various contributions in Millar 2018). The Moluccan conflict took place at the same time when laws on decentralization and local autonomy were passed in Indonesia in 1999 and implemented from 2001 onwards. The laws were trying to undo some of the past wrongs, among others unification policies that had oppressed local political structures and traditional governance. On the one hand, the violence massively delayed the new laws' implementation in Maluku. On the other hand, this new legal framework, together with an increasingly powerful global indigenous rights movement, so to speak legitimized the Moluccan efforts to restore peace through the revival of traditions. Traditions were considered to be neutral ground that both sides could identify with and that were integral parts of every Moluccan's daily life (besides religion), including traditional alliance systems that tie villages together irrespective of their religious affiliation (e.g., pela or uli) and traditional leadership (e.g., raja) (see, e.g., Bräuchler 2009a, c, 2011, 2015) – traditions that go beyond short-sighted peace interventions that only superficially engage with the local.

Many organizations and stakeholders involved in the broader peace process were sympathetic to such narratives. Ex-governor Ralahalu was convinced that outsiders used the conflict to break up the Moluccan adat federation. In its strategic planning post-Malino, the provincial government officially promoted the empowering of culture as the right path to peace. It put emphasis on the Moluccan siwalima and pela philosophies in its programs and was keen on supporting ceremonies celebrating alliance systems and traditional leadership and supporting the set-up of a pan-Moluccan raja council as an effective interface between government and village people. (Siwalima philosophy implies that Moluccan society is made up of two parts, siwa (nine) and lima (five), that are both needed for and integral to a functioning society.). To (re)attract tourists and investors, Ralahalu catered for the publication of books and booklets that promote the successful implementation of regional autonomy as part of the reconciliation process and praise the beauty of the islands and their cultural and economic richness. According to Ralahalu (2006, p. xi, xxx), it was not religion but poverty, unemployment, and a declining national spirit that were at the root of the violence. In these publications, the revitalization of culture is depicted as social capital for development, with an emphasis on harmonious elements of Moluccan culture such as mutual help, respect for the ancestors, and harmonious living with the environment (Pemerintah Daerah Provinsi Maluku 2004; Ralahalu 2006). In their efforts to find more sustainable solutions to the conflict and foster social reintegration, the few international organizations that stayed on after mass violence had subsided, such as the Japan International Cooperation Agency (JICA) and the UNDP, also started to link up to this trend and organized workshops on local wisdom and peace or culture festivals or initiated education programs based on Moluccan brotherhood philosophy. Reputable local NGOs with established programs in the field of human and cultural rights advocacy also supported the trend to restrengthen, revitalize, or reconstruct local traditions to meet postconflict requirements and empower Moluccans. Even the Interfaith Council established in 2004 for the promotion of interreligious exchange and understanding put great emphasis on the cultural dimension of reconciliation as an important means to consolidate peace and an essential foundation for the more general restoration of Moluccan society (Bräuchler 2014).

What is important to keep in mind is that people that have been entrenched in communal violence can usually not wait for outsiders to bring peace or have other preferences. They need to get back to their daily routines for survival and often the former enemy is very much part of this (Brewer et al. 2018; Mac Ginty 2014). Truth-telling “does not necessarily have the healing and liberating effects that proponents of transitional justice, coming from a Western cultural background, take for granted” (Boege 2019, p. 155, fn 81). Truth is not necessarily part of local efforts to restore social relations and daily routines as fingers would be pointing too close to home where neighbors have been fighting neighbors, as was the case in Maluku (Braithwaite et al. 2010; Bräuchler 2015). This shall certainly not imply that it is not important to search for and convict any masterminds behind the violence.

In response to the frequent failure of an international transitional justice toolkit (Bräuchler 2009b, p. 3), traditional justice was increasingly considered as a means to foster reconciliation. Traditional justice is not only “the lived reality of most people in developing countries, especially in rural areas” (Ubink and Rooij 2011, p. 2), but also often the only kind of justice mechanism left in the aftermath of genocide (e.g., Rwanda), repressive regimes (e.g., Uganda), in newly emerging states (e.g., East Timor), or after communal violence (e.g., Maluku). In contrast to mainstream transitional justice, the focus is not on prosecution and punishment, but on the restoration of social relations, societal reintegration, and “forward-looking distributive justice concerned with the socioeconomic needs of victims and their communities” (Boege 2019, p. 155). What is crucial in settings where tradition figures so prominently in peacebuilding is the extent to which local traditional structures, mechanisms, and norms are still intact and local actors and leaders are able to resist or subvert the liberal peace (Mac Ginty 2010, p. 402). This is an important issue in Maluku, both within the revival for peace efforts and for the implementation of decentralization, as both tend to ignore the disastrous effects that colonial and neo-colonial policies had on local “traditions” and what new “traditions” this generated. However, in such contexts, the question is not primarily whether certain cultural elements have actually been invented or introduced from the outside in the (colonial) past (see e.g., Brigg 2008, pp. 35–39; Burns 2004), but whether and for what reason they are important to current negotiation processes.

The turn to tradition and culture presents many new challenges for local and international communities involved in peacebuilding – challenges that arise from the intrinsic nature of traditional justice mechanisms, but also from selection, adaptation, and social engineering processes involved, from the instrumentalization of “tradition” by insiders and outsiders, and from misinterpretations of ‘the local’ by the international peace and development discourse (Bräuchler and Naucke 2017, p. 430). In the following, some of these challenges will be addressed.

Some Challenges of the Turn to Culture

Analyzing the micropolitics of such an extremely charged social landscape (Theidon 2006, p. 436; 2007, p. 97) also involves uncovering local power structures and hierarchies and thus identifying the limits of the local-local’s reconciliatory potential (Bräuchler 2015, pp. 32–33). (Richmond (2011, p. 14) put forward the term “local-local” that suggests a deeper understanding of the local, to differentiate it from the international peace industry’s artificial concept of civil society and the local. For a critique, see Bräuchler’s conceptual chapter in this Encyclopedia (see ► “Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research”). A focus on culture, no matter whether by outside or internal actors, often leads to its homogenization, with a focus on selected elements that have the potential to provide an integrative identity and mobilize former enemies to reconcile. Heterogeneity, social inequalities, and exclusion are often ignored or put aside (Leeuwen et al. 2019, p. 20; Lottholz 2017, p. 16). What also needs to be kept in mind is that decentralization laws often push local communities to essentialize their culture to fulfill the criteria that entitle them to claim their right to autonomy. In Maluku, the revival of tradition was crucial in restoring social relations between former conflict parties, but it also triggered new or strengthened existing inequalities, not between the state and local people, but within the local context. A major issue is how adat (or its revival) can reintegrate an increasingly heterogeneous population. Many migrants (or their ancestors) hail from Buton in Sulawesi, a neighboring province of Maluku. Some of them had settled in Maluku several generations ago, but are still not considered citizens in adat terms (von Benda-Beckmann and Benda-Beckmann 2007, p. 23); they have no access to adat offices and, after the conflict, they were largely excluded from reconciliation processes. During the conflict, thousands of Butonese had to flee, with many returning once mass violence ceased and many finding the land they had worked on reoccupied by Moluccans (Adam 2009). As markets were destroyed and the economy in Maluku collapsed, many migrants in and around Ambon City also lost their means of subsistence (for more details see Bräuchler 2010, 2017a). This mismatch needs urgent attention. However, simply deconstructing and unmasking the essentialization and exclusionary effects of the revival of peace would overlook the broader political inequalities and gaps that triggered those identity politics in the first place and does not provide for a better understanding of such cultural claim-making (Trochimchuk 2011). Such concerns have only been partly included into broader efforts in Maluku to create a pan-Moluccan identity for the better integration of the diverse Moluccan society as key to the anticipation of future mass violence. Acknowledging such difficulties and challenges in bottom-up peacebuilding (McEvoy and McGregor 2008, pp. 9–10) and critically engaging with them is a first step in acknowledging that local agency is crucial for reconciliation and sustainable peace. As scholars and activists in Maluku stress, the shortcomings of existing adat law should not become an excuse to not foster its revitalization and refunctionalization (Tim Peneliti Pusat Kajian Konstitusi 2005–10; Titahelu 2005).

Generally, local academics and peace activists in Maluku are aware that a mere return to the past will not do as that past is contested and colonial powers and Indonesian governments have done a good job in destroying any overarching sociopolitical structures in the area. As in the Solomon Islands, the revival of tradition are future-oriented (often political) acts that are “rooted . . . in shared historical experiences and ongoing political realities” (Akin 2013, p. 343) and that forward custom (or culture or adat) as a symbol of unity that helps to restore sociality and make diverse local societies join hands to fight colonial intruders, central governments, or other outside forces that triggered conflict (cf. Steur 2014). Various local actors in Maluku have suggested social engineering as a solution to the various dilemmas of the revival for peace (Bräuchler 2017b). To cope with the mass violence and reintegrate the whole of Moluccan society, it needed the scaling up of traditional justice institutions, including the strengthening and extension of traditional alliance systems and the creation of a pan-Moluccan raja council. Peace activists and academics are aware of the evolving character of adat. They take social engineering as a means to manage diversity and create a shared reality and collective representation for the whole (increasingly heterogeneous) population (Pariela and Soumokil 2003); to adapt and reinterpret local institutions to meet the requirements of a postconflict society and democratic representation, without losing identity and cultural heritage (Ajawaila 2005); or to empower the local population and even out drawbacks of customary law, such as the dominance of adat elites (Tim Peneliti Pusat Kajian Konstitusi 2005–10, pp. 194–196, 216; Titahelu 2005, pp. 44–45). These people are aware, for instance, that an unreflected revival of old traditions or feudal structures could foster exclusivism and exacerbate conflicts rather than solve them. Traditions to be revived are thus carefully and strategically selected and adapted, with some suggesting to extend the pela system so that it not only establishes strong interreligious ties between villages, but also between different ethnic groups, such as the Ambonese and the Butonese. Some of the Butonese whom the author spoke to actually think highly of cultural systems like pela that resonate with their own cultural values, which could become an important entry point. As Ratuva (2003, p. 150) emphasized for Fiji, traditional models must not be imposed, but need to be negotiated between the different ethnic groups in order to work in such contexts. Similarly, Niklas Luhmann (1975) warned of putting the focus of legal procedures on finding true decisions, which fosters the illusionary idea of a truth independent of current powerholders (19–20); the aim is rather “legitimation by procedure” (197) that involves all affected people in the decision-making process. The diversity of voices and competing agendas in such settings should be taken as an important asset as they evidence that “community-based peace-work constitutes an important space for discussing visions on peace, justice and social transformation” (Leeuwen et al. 2019, p. 20). And here again, the idea is not to annihilate or depoliticize difference, but to try to understand difference and its continuous (re)construction (Brigg 2018, p. 2, 6).

It is important to keep in mind that such negotiations are part of everyday life, not only the result of extraordinary violence. Everyone who has followed an adat ceremony or ritual and the intensive internal discussions going on during preparation and follow-up can testify that adat is constantly contested from within and outside and the result of continuous negotiation processes, dynamics that keep adat alive and allow for its adaptation to changing circumstances. Such dynamics have further intensified in the Moluccan peace and decentralization processes and require critical reflection on established and emerging “social engineers,” their motivations and their specific embedding in the local context. It also needs critical reflection on how national political frameworks and regional politics have to be adapted to challenges at the local level. The revival of peace shall not become an excuse to delegate all responsibility to local communities. The government needs to support physical and moral reconstruction, but also the economic empowerment of people. As the coordinator of the repatriation ceremony of a group of refugees in Maluku warned, adat is important and necessary to enable collective reconciliation, but it cannot prevent individual feelings of revenge or injustice coming to the surface again, for instance, due to unequal compensation after the conflict, unsolved land issues, or continuing economic and political injustices (Bräuchler 2009c, pp. 111–112). This also implies that peacebuilding needs to be seen as long-term efforts that not only strive for the end of violence and reconciliation, but for a broader social justice.

Creative Peacebuilding and Social Justice

Music and singing has returned . . . Songs are written, songs are sung. The story of the orang basudara is the story of friends singing songs to the heavens, singing songs to the blue sea, accompanied by waves dancing along the sands, singing about the coconut, clove and nutmeg trees, singing about mother, singing about young women, and singing about the peaceful coexistence of basudara. (Manuputty 2017, p. 296)

For Moluccans, it was important to restore social relations across religious boundaries as soon as possible due to their importance for all sectors of everyday life in villages and urban areas, from kinship ties and social life more generally, the economy, media, to education and politics. However, tensions at times still run high and many schoolchildren still go to separate schools (according to their religion). This is as much part of Moluccans’ everyday reality as the many efforts to maintain peace, in particular in Ambon City. Peace is still fragile and it needs constant efforts to not let minor incidents escalate and maintain awareness that peace can neither be imposed from the outside, nor come on its own, but needs continuous work. Moluccans need to cope with this “not as something extra-ordinary, but as part of everyday life” (Berents 2015, p. 194). Understandably, the government is keen to rebuild Maluku’s economy, but it should do so in a sustainable way that does not reproduce or create new inequalities and continue structural violence. In cases like Maluku, reconciliation needs to be conceptualized in a broader sense and it needs longer-term perspectives that go beyond fixed-term notions of peacebuilding. It needs a focus on “more future-oriented aspects of justice (focusing on empowerment) [that] can enhance and reinforce the possibility of peace and non-occurrence of violence” (Szablewska and Bradley 2015, p. 283). Given that even Galtung’s (1969) notion of positive peace is formulated negatively as the absence of structural violence, we need to complement this with more positive approaches that put more emphasis on local agency. To foster positive change, we need to focus on both structures and collective and individual protagonists’ agency.

As Berents (2015, p. 195) argues, the “everyday is not merely ‘repetitive’ or ‘unconscious’, but holds the potential for solidarity, resistance and creativity . . . and . . . for small (but potentially radical) change,” which is very much due to the physical presence of people and their embodiment of the everyday, of relationships and everyday efforts for peace. Here, peace “is necessarily located, not only within and through the bodies of marginalised people, but in and through the terrains they occupy” (Berents 2015, p. 195). To pick an example that is relevant to the Moluccan case and that speaks to the introductory quote of this chapter section, arts-based peacebuilding is increasingly recognized as an effective tool to involve people affected by mass violence in transitional justice processes (Rush and Simic 2014). It opens space for identity groups to share cultural experiences, raise awareness about past suffering and, in Maluku, a joint adat, and engage in creative projects (Zelizer 2003). Through a variety of art forms that resonate with tradition, with youth culture, or both, one can better address the emotional legacies of war, provide talk about peace legitimacy on the ground, and give voice to those who are usually excluded from official peace talks (Premaratna and Bleiker 2016, pp. 82–83).

Young people were crucial in translating the peace project into a broader transformation process for social justice. Influential peace activists in Ambon City specifically reached out for the youth in their efforts to foster interreligious dialogue and open up space for communication. This is part of a larger thriving youth culture developing in “post-conflict” Maluku that is using arts as creative means to engage with Moluccan traditions and the past, restore, build, or strengthen social relations and address continuing social injustices such as land grabbing or the overexploitation of natural resources through investors and governments at the expense of, for instance, indigenous people, and the lack of official spaces for dialogue. Such commitment and joining of hands took peacebuilding in Maluku to the next level and helped to socialize young people into everyday practices of peacebuilding (see also Brewer et al. 2018, p. 251). Such engagement does not necessarily need to be labeled “peacebuilding” (Pruitt 2011, p. 215), which is important as the author has encountered a certain fatigue among young people in Ambon City when their engagement and projects are only supported under such labels. It resulted in long-term engagement (as opposed to fixed-term interventions) that was responsive to the broader social and political context (McLeod et al. 2014, p. 37) and initiated transformation through performative justice (Bräuchler 2019). It is an argument for the normalization of peacebuilding or everyday peace and for the role of creativity and arts within these processes.

Many of today’s youth in Maluku were born during or after the violence. They have no memory of it and no memory of what it was like before the conflict when Muslim and Christian children played together across religious affiliations. They inherited stories of conflict and war and grew up in segregated environments. There is an urgent need to open up space and opportunities for young people to get together, intermingle with the older generation, and engage in the restoration of the Moluccan tradition of brother- and sisterhood and a struggle for broader social justice (Bräuchler 2019, p. 212). As one of the youth activists told the author, he and his friends aim to provoke Moluccans to peace through creativity. Such creative engagement in Maluku includes musical styles such as hip-hop, poetry, painting, graffiti, theatre, film-making, and photography. Contemporary art forms draw on traditional arts such as kapata, a traditional rhyming form and ritualistic oral tradition in Maluku; with their lyrics, texts, and narratives, they criticize, for instance, the falling into oblivion of adat – one of the reasons why violence was long-lasting – or exploitative investment projects as a continuation of social inequality and injustice. Through such performances, artists and their audiences reclaim public spaces and turn them into performative sites of local struggle, resistance, the resignification of meaning, and the expression of collective feelings (Hobson 2006; Jamal and Hales 2016; Siddique et al. 2014). Such sites offer a stage for voices and experiences of marginalized people, for dialogue about past and ongoing violence, related social inequalities, and collective memory, and for an artistic engagement with the future and for social change (McLeod et al. 2014, p. 40; Shefik 2018, p. 333; Simic 2015, p. 253). Due to such potential, an increasing number of arts projects are designed for peacebuilding interventions more generally such as music therapy for children, joint folk arts exhibitions, or multicultural art workshops. These initiatives need to be carefully analyzed to prevent the arts becoming yet another investment strategy and tool of outside interveners (Bergh and Sloboda 2010, p. 6; Siddique et al. 2014, p. 127; Zelizer 2003, p. 10). Short-term projects can have positive effects, but they are less likely to produce sustainable outcomes; long-term personal and social change only happens when people actively participate on all levels in musical engagement that is embedded in their everyday lives (Bergh and Sloboda 2010, pp. 11–12). By engaging in “performative justice” Moluccan peace activists, artists and audiences can enact and embody such struggles in daily life and in public space (Bräuchler 2019). It makes “justice” accessible for the public through the arts’ “aesthetic appeal and the possible participatory nature” (Premaratna 2018, p. 2) and makes people engage with it, thus raising awareness (locally, but also nationally and internationally through strategic media use and networks), exerting pressure on the government and other influential groups and individuals, and envisioning another shared future.

Summary

This chapter could only provide snippets of a much larger picture. The idea was to present and analyze some key ideas of ongoing dynamics of peacebuilding, reconciliation, and creative transformation in Maluku and link that to broader discourses in peace studies. Based on extended stretches of multisited and multitemporal fieldwork over two decades, the author was able to outline the longevity and the different phases and dimensions in the Moluccan peace process that all relate to each other, build on each other, and cannot be understood in isolation. The chapter tracked some of the unfolding spaces of creative peacebuilding in Maluku and analyzed their transformative potential. The rootedness of such engagement in people’s everyday lives and in local culture, values and societal dynamics, enables Moluccans to embody peace through their daily experiences. All this substantiates the need to conceptualize peacebuilding in a broader sense, to engage in longer-term research on peace processes to understand the intricacies and dynamics of societies that were affected by mass violence and try to find ways to restore and embody peaceful relations in everyday life, and to further promote a cultural turn in peace and conflict studies. It is an argument for trying to both develop and understand “peace from within” (see ► “Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research”, this Encyclopedia).

Cross-References

- Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research

References

- Adam, J. (2009). The problem of going home: Land management, displacement, and reconciliation in Ambon. In B. Bräuchler (Ed.), Reconciling Indonesia: Grassroots agency for peace (pp. 138–154). London/New York: Routledge.
- Ajawaila, J. W. (2005). Dinamika Budaya Orang Maluku. In Lembaga Kebudayaan Daerah Maluku (Ed.), Maluku Menyambut Masa Depan (pp. 159–179). Ambon: Lembaga Kebudayaan Daerah Maluku.
- Akin, D. K. (2013). Colonialism, Maasina rule, and the origins of Malaitan kastom. Honolulu: University of Hawai’i Press.

- Attaminy, M., Hardianto, D., & Misbah. (2002). "Kami Menolak Tegas Kesepakatan Malino": Wawancara Drs. Muhammad Attaminy, MAg. Sabili, 2(18), 62–64.
- Berents, H. (2015). An embodied everyday peace in the midst of violence. Peacebuilding, 3(2), 186–199.
- Bergh, A., & Sloboda, J. (2010). Music and art in conflict transformation: A review. Music and Arts in Action, 2(2), 2–17.
- Boege, V. (2019). Reconciliations (Melanesian style) and transitional justice. Global Change, Peace & Security, 31(2), 139–157.
- Braithwaite, J., Braithwaite, V., Cookson, M., & Dunn, L. (2010). Anomie and violence: Non-truth and reconciliation in Indonesian peacebuilding. Canberra: ANU E Press.
- Bräuchler, B. (2009a). Cultural solutions to religious conflicts? The revival of tradition in the Moluccas, Eastern Indonesia. Asian Journal of Social Science, 37(6), 872–891.
- Bräuchler, B. (2009b). Introduction: Reconciling Indonesia. In B. Bräuchler (Ed.), Reconciling Indonesia: Grassroots agency for peace (pp. 3–33). London/New York: Routledge.
- Bräuchler, B. (2009c). Mobilising culture and tradition for peace: Reconciliation in the Moluccas. In B. Bräuchler (Ed.), Reconciling Indonesia: Grassroots agency for peace (pp. 97–118). London/New York: Routledge.
- Bräuchler, B. (2010). The revival dilemma: Reflections on human rights, self-determination and legal pluralism in eastern Indonesia. Journal of Legal Pluralism and Unofficial Law, 42(62), 1–42.
- Bräuchler, B. (2011). Kings on stage: Local leadership in the post-Suharto Moluccas. Asian Journal of Social Science, 39(2), 196–218.
- Bräuchler, B. (2014). Modes of interreligious coexistence and civility in Maluku. In V. Gottowik (Ed.), Dynamics of religion in Southeast Asia (pp. 193–215). Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Bräuchler, B. (2015). The cultural dimension of peace. Decentralization and reconciliation in Indonesia. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bräuchler, B. (2017a). Changing patterns of mobility, citizenship and belonging in Indonesia. Social Identities, 23(4), 446–461.
- Bräuchler, B. (2017b). Social engineering the local for peace. Social Anthropology, 25(4), 437–453.
- Bräuchler, B. (2018). The cultural turn in peace research: Prospects and challenges. Peacebuilding, 6(1), 17–33.
- Bräuchler, B. (2019). From transitional to performative justice: Peace activism in the aftermath of communal violence. Global Change, Peace & Security, 31(2), 201–220.
- Bräuchler, B., & Naucke, P. (2017). Peacebuilding and conceptualisations of the local. Social Anthropology, 25(4), 422–436.
- Brewer, J. D., Hayes, B. C., Teeney, F., Dudgeon, K., Mueller-Hirth, N., & Wijesinghe, S. L. (2018). The sociology of everyday life peacebuilding. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brigg, M. (2008). The new politics of conflict resolution. Responding to difference. Hampshire/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brigg, M. (2018). Relational and essential: Theorizing difference for peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2018.1482078>.
- Brown, G., Wilson, C., & Hadi, S. (2005). Peace and development analysis in Maluku and North Maluku. Overcoming violent conflict (Vol. 4). Jakarta: CPRU-UNDP.
- Burns, P. (2004). The Leiden legacy: Concepts of law in Indonesia. Leiden: KITLV Press.
- Fuest, V. (2010). Contested inclusions: Pitfalls of NGO peace-building activities in Liberia. Africa Spectrum, 45(2), 3–33.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(1), 167–191.
- Hobson, K. (2006). Enacting environmental justice in Singapore: Performative justice and the green volunteer network. Geoforum, 37, 671–681.
- Jamal, T., & Hales, R. (2016). Performative justice: New directions in environmental and social justice. Geoforum, 76, 176–180.
- Leeuwen, M. Van, Nindorera, J., Nzweve, J.-L. K., & Corbijn, C. (2019). The 'local turn' and notions of conflict and peacebuilding – Reflections on local peace committees in Burundi and eastern DR Congo. Peacebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1633760>.
- Littik, S. A. M., Baadila, E., Pattimahu, M. B., Toule, E. R. M., Lasol, O., Anwar, A., & Samal, Z. (2005a). Access to justice assessment Maluku Province. Phase I – Mapping report. Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura, Pusat Studi Pedesaan dan Kawasan Universitas Gajah Mada, Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Nasional (BAPPENAS), United Nations Development Program (UNDP).
- Littik, S. A. M., Baadila, E., Pattimahu, M. B., Toule, E. R. M., Lasol, O., Anwar, A., & Samal, Z. (2005b). Access to justice assessment Maluku Province. Phase II. Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura, Pusat Studi Pedesaan dan Kawasan Universitas Gajah Mada, Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Nasional (BAPPENAS), United Nations Development Program (UNDP).
- Littik, S. A. M., Baadila, E., Pattimahu, M. B., Toule, E. R. M., Lasol, O., Anwar, A., & Samal, Z. (2005c). Access to justice assessment Maluku Province. Phase III. Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura, Pusat Studi Pedesaan dan Kawasan Universitas Gajah Mada, Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Nasional (BAPPENAS), United Nations Development Program (UNDP).
- Littik, S. A. M., Baadila, E., Pattimahu, M. B., Toule, E. R. M., Lasol, O., Anwar, A., & Samal, Z. (2005d). Access to justice assessment Maluku Province. Site selection report. Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura, Pusat Studi Pedesaan dan Kawasan

- Universitas Gajah Mada, Badan Perencanaan Pembangunan Nasional (BAPPENAS), United Nations Development Program (UNDP).
- Lottholz, P. (2017). Critiquing anthropological imagination in peace and conflict studies: From empiricist positivism to a dialogical approach in ethnographic peace research. International Peacekeeping, 1–23. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2017.1350576>.
- Luhmann, N. (1975). Legitimation durch Verfahren (2nd ed.). Darmstadt: Luchterhand.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41, 391–412.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Manuputty, J. (2017). Gandong'ee, Let's sing! In J. Manuputty, Z. Salampessy, I. Ali-Fauzi, & I. Rafsadi (Eds.), Basudara stories of peace from Maluku. Working together for reconciliation (pp. 292–296). Clayton: Monash University Publishing.
- McEvoy, K., & McGregor, L. (2008). Transitional justice from below: An agenda for research, policy and praxis. In K. McEvoy & L. McGregor (Eds.), Transitional justice from below: Grassroots activism and the struggle for change (pp. 1–13). Oxford/Portland: Hart.
- McLeod, L., Dimitrijevic, J., & Rakocevic, B. (2014). Artistic activism, public debate and temporal complexities: Fighting for transitional justice in Serbia. In P. D. Rush & O. Simic (Eds.), The arts of transitional justice. Culture, activism, and memory after atrocity (pp. 25–42). New York: Springer.
- Millar, G. (Ed.). (2018). Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Pariela, T. D., & Soumokil, T. (2003). Konflik dan Dampaknya Serta Upaya-upaya Rekonsiliasi. Ambon: Penelitian Kerusuhan, Laporan Akhir, Universitas Pattimura.
- Pemerintah Daerah Provinsi Maluku. (2004). Rencana Strategis (RENSTRA) Provinsi Maluku Tahun 2003–2008. Ambon: Pemerintah Daerah Provinsi Maluku.
- Pieris, J. (2004). Tragedi Maluku: Sebuah Krisis Peradaban – Analisis Kritis Aspek Politik, Ekonomi, Sosial-Budaya dan Keamanan. Jakarta: Yayasan Obor Indonesia.
- Premaratna, N. (2018). Theatre for peacebuilding: Transforming narratives of structural violence. Peacebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2018.1491278>.
- Premaratna, N., & Bleiker, R. (2016). Arts and theatre for peacebuilding. In O. P. Richmond, S. Pogodda, & J. Ramovi'c (Eds.), The Palgrave handbook of disciplinary and regional approaches to peace (pp. 82–94). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Pruitt, L. J. (2011). Music, youth, and peacebuilding in Northern Ireland. Global Change, Peace and Security, 23(2), 207–222.
- Ralahalu, K. A. (2006). Otonomi Daerah Di Tengah Konflik: Merancang Success Story Implementasi Otonomi Daerah di Provinsi Maluku. Ambon: Media Otda.
- Ratuva, S. (2003). Re-inventing the cultural wheel: Re-conceptualizing restorative justice and peace building in ethnically divided Fiji. In S. Dinnen (Ed.), A kind of mending: Restorative justice in the Pacific Islands (pp. 149–163). Canberra: Pandanus Books.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-Liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Rush, P. D., & Simic, O. (Eds.). (2014). The arts of transitional justice. Culture, activism, and memory after atrocity (Springer Series in Transitional Justice). New York: Springer.
- Shefik, S. (2018). Reimagining transitional justice through participatory art. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 12, 314–333.
- Siddique, N., Marifat, H., & Kouvo, S. (2014). Culture, theatre and justice: Examples from Afghanistan. In P. D. Rush & O. Simic (Eds.), The arts of transitional justice. Culture, activism, and memory after atrocity (pp. 113–134). New York: Springer.
- Simic, O. (2015). Stories we tell: Documentary theater, performance, and justice in transition. In L. Stan & N. Nedelsky (Eds.), Post-communist transitional justice. Lessons from twenty-five years of experience (pp. 252–275). Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- Steur, L. (2014). Indigeneity and precariousness: Ontological criticism or dialectical force? FocaalBlog, July 17. <http://www.focaalblog.com/2014/07/17/indigeneity-and-precariousness-ontological-criticism-or-dialectical-force-by-luisa-steur>. Accessed 6 Sept 2015.
- Szablewska, N., & Bradley, C. (2015). Social justice within transitional justice: The case of human trafficking and sex-work in Cambodia and Myanmar. In N. Szablewska & S.-D. Bachmann (Eds.), Current issues in transitional justice. Towards a more holistic approach (pp. 261–287). Cham: Springer.
- Theidon, K. (2006). The micropolitics of reconciliation in postwar Peru. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 50(3), 433–457.
- Theidon, K. (2007). Intimate enemies: Reconciling the present in post-war communities in Ayacucho, Peru. In B. Pouligny, S. Chesterman, & A. Schnabel (Eds.), After mass crime: Rebuilding states and communities (pp. 97–121). Tokyo/New York: United Nations University Press.
- Tim Peneliti Pusat Kajian Konstitusi. (2005–10). Laporan Penelitian Sistem Pemerintahan Adat di Kabupaten Maluku Tenggara. Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura.
- Titahelu, R. Z. (2005). Hukum Adat Maluku Dalam Konteks Pluralisme Hukum: Implikasi Terhadap Manajemen Sumber Daya Alam Maluku (Pidato Pengukuhan, 13 Agustus 2005). Ambon: Fakultas Hukum Universitas Pattimura.

- Tomagola, T. A., Lay, C., Marantika, L., Palijama, R., Pentury, R., & Madubun, Y. (2008). Format Ulang Birokrasi Kota Ambon (ed: Eddy, O. S. H.). Makassar: Innawa.
- Trisasongko, D. (2003). To you I belong. In I. Malik, M. Pattinaja, S. Putuhena, T. Yakob, et al. (Eds.), Breaking the violence with compassion: BAKUBAE (pp. 89–95). Jakarta: Civil Society Alliance for Democracy (YAPPIKA).
- Trochimchuk, S. (2011). Cultural negotiations: Examining multiculturalism and the limits of anti-essentialism. Waterloo: Canadian Political Science Association. <http://www.cpsa-acsp.ca/papers-2011/Trochimchuk.pdf>. Accessed 6 June 2013.
- Ubink, J., & van Rooij, B. (2011). Towards customary legal empowerment: An introduction. International Development Law Organization (IDLO). <http://www.idlo.int/>. Accessed 2 Nov 2011.
- von Benda-Beckmann, F., & von Benda-Beckmann, K. (2007). Social security between past and future: Introduction. In F. von Benda-Beckmann & K. von Benda-Beckmann (Eds.), Social security between past and future: Ambonese networks of care and support (pp. 1–24). Münster: LIT.
- Zelizer, C. (2003). The role of artistic processes in peace-building in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Peace and Conflict Studies, 10(2), Article 4.

Culture and Conflict Resolution

Kevin Avruch

School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution,
George Mason University, Fairfax, VA, USA

Introduction

At its simplest, culture refers to socially inherited and learned ways of living shared by persons as members of social groups. “Groups” differ greatly in scale – from a family or clan to a nation-state – and overlap and intersect. Thus, for any one person, culture is never singular or monolithic. Persons “carry” multiple cultures, which overlap, intersect, and sometimes exist in tension with each other. Elements of culture, “cultural markers” such as customs, language, religion, race, ethnicity, or social class, are important sources of social identity, anchoring personal identity (psychological coherence and security), and demarcating boundaries of group membership (Tajfel and Turner 1986).

Culture is connected to conflict, and conflict resolution, in four main ways. To some extent these call forth different approaches to analysis and different strategies for conflict resolution. Firstly, “socially inherited and learned ways of living” are not universal or identical across all societies or social groups, nor are they often perceived as equally legitimate, and the denial of legitimacy is one source of conflict. Secondly, social conflict is often expressed in the idiom of identity, around which individuals are motivated and groups mobilize. As this develops, identity-based groups contest with one another over resources, divergent interests, or deeply held values and beliefs (Korostelina 2007). Thirdly, communicational styles are to some extent patterned or shaped by culture, and cultural differences, especially sharp ones, can act as impedance to communication, affecting everything from relatively superficial etiquette to dynamics of negotiation and the mutual intelligibility of the parties’ key narratives about themselves – history and memory.

A fourth way in which culture and conflict are related happens when conflict becomes perduring, protracted, and deeply rooted in the fabric of social relations, economy, and the psychological lives of persons. This is likely to happen if the conflict, enduring through time, featured episodes of intense or mass violence, whose effects, transcending generations, are seared into historical narrative and individuals’ psyches (Volkan 1997).

Defining Culture

A more technical and analytically precise definition of culture than diffuse “ways of living” is called for:

“Culture consists of the derivatives of experience, more or less organized, learned or created by the individuals of a population, including those images or encodements and their interpretations (meanings) transmitted from past generations, from contemporaries, or formed by individuals themselves” (Schwartz 1992:324).

This definition, retaining the idea of social learning and inheritance, refines “ways of living” to make culture reflect individual experience in and of the world. More than passive social robots who inherit and learn, it grants to individuals the possibility of themselves creating culture out of lived experience, granting them agency. It orients culture toward cognition, perception (images), and interpretation – toward symbols and their meanings. To this cognitive-symbolic understanding of culture, two refinements are called for. Firstly, it is now understood that cognition is not separate from affect, emotions (Dalglish and Power 2015). Affective patterning is culturally constituted, and figures importantly in social conflict, particularly if violence and individual trauma are associated. Secondly, the collection – some sort of “system” – of images, perceptions, symbols, and interpretations, are not uniformly distributed in the population. Because individuals may be members of different social groups or collectivities (based on religion, language, ethnicity, class, and so on), and because each group is a potential “container” for some sort of culture, any complex society is likely to be “multicultural.” For example, an essential belief in one religious community, a proscription against eating pork or drinking alcohol, may be absent in another. Indeed, such differences serve as important boundary-maintaining mechanisms. In this way, culture is socially distributed in a population. Moreover, not all cognitions, symbols, or beliefs are internalized by individuals with the same affect or intensity. Even among members of a religious group, who share the understanding that pork or alcohol are forbidden, not everyone (always) abstains. Culture, in this way, is psychologically distributed in a population. This variance in beliefs (and behavior) can lead to intragroup conflict, as, for example, non-conforming coreligionists who can be excused of impiety, heterodoxy, or worse. What recognizing the social and psychological distributedness of culture means is that culture is never monolithic or homogenous. Recognizing its derivation from lived experience and individuals’ agency implies culture is never changeless or timeless. These are misunderstandings of culture that are important to avoid (Avruch 1998).

There are four things to take away from the more technical definition of culture:

- In providing cognitive, affective, and symbolic frameworks for individuals, culture importantly shapes meaning and perception, up to and including “the way the world is.”
- In shaping meaning culture affects communication. This is most obvious with respect to language communities – speakers of mutually unintelligible languages will be severely handicapped in their ability to communicate, lacking an intermediary: a translator. (But “communication” means more than interlinguisticity.) This has implications for the practice of conflict resolution in “intercultural” settings.
- Culture is more or less shared – relatively more (though never perfectly) within linguistic/cognitive/perceptual communities or groups, relatively less (or barely at all) outside and between them.
- While fundamentally based on notions of sharedness, culture importantly points us to difference, to specific localities and collectivities in space and time, to situation, and to context. Such difference may exist within the microsociality of a family, given generational dynamics, and between the large-scale socialities of language, class, religion, or race.

Not so much a part of Schwartz’s technical definition but crucial for understanding social conflict is that culture provides a rich reservoir or archive of symbols, customs, metaphors, and presuppositions about “the way the world is,” which are available for absorption in the making of social identity and group solidarity (Ross 2007): “They eat pork and we don’t.”

History

Although the academic study of culture enjoys a long history in anthropology, and some other social sciences, when conceived as the study of difference, it came to Peace and Conflict relatively late (Ramsbotham et al. 2016). Like gender, another source of difference, the idea of culture did not much figure in the academic disciplines or epistemologies that dominated earlier research in conflict and conflict resolution. International Relations was focused mainly on nation-states in an amoral (yet dangerous) international system. “The state” was conceived as a unitary actor, seeking to maximize its own security. The key variable defining difference among states was relative power. Power was conceived as the means to guarantee security, through outright domination or power-based alliances. Analyses of conflict from Economics substituted the individual for the state as the unitary actor, operating in an amoral market, seeking to maximize utility/profit. Game-theoretic approaches added rigor to modeling economic behavior, but by its nature these operated within formal and strictly delimited conceptions of “rules of the game.” Cultural analysis (and the study of history) teaches us, by contrast, that rules are subject to change “mid-game” – or that players coming from different cultures may not substantially share the same rules-of-the-game to begin with. For these reasons, while important for understanding bargaining and carried into analyses of higher-level negotiation, these game-theoretic or formalistic approaches “lost” culture – change, context, and difference – almost entirely (Schelling 1960; Raiffa 1982).

By the 1990s, Peace and Conflict opened up to other disciplines and epistemologies. Anthropologists brought culture into consideration (Avruch et al. 1991; Fry and Bjorkqvist 1997), and scholars and practitioners who worked in other cultural settings or came from outside Western Europe or North America began to work in the field (Abu-Nimer 2003; Lederach 1995). Conceptions of culture have broadened to highlight notions of difference and the contributions of indigenous knowledge to the field (Brigg 2008).

Intercultural Conflict and Conflict Resolution

One approach to elucidating how individuals from different cultures may bring different conceptions of rules-of-the game is illustrated by scholars such as Hall (1977), who distinguished “high context” from “low context” patterning of communicational styles. Low context communicators encode meaning in unadorned and straightforward messaging: what you hear is what you get. High context communicators “bury” meaning in paralinguistic channels, such as tone, gesture, or allusion. In cultures where the preservation of “face” in encounters with others is important, high context communication predominates. When high context meets low context not only is meaning imperfectly communicated but the affect surrounding the encounter can damage the relationship. Low context may strike high context as arrogant and rude, devoid of social graces, and lacking in respect. High context comes across to low context as trafficking in ambiguity and indirection, at worse duplicitous, devious, and untrustworthy. If communication breaks down in the wake of a damaged relationship, the high context Other can be deemed “inscrutable.”

Another well-researched distinction is that between “individualist” vs. “collectivist” cultures (Triandis 1982). Individuals with a collectivist orientation are often high context communicators, concerned with preserving “face” and “smooth” relationships with others. Hofstede (1980) described other important dimensions of cultural patterning, contrasting cultures on dimensions of power distance (the degree of inequality in a social system, the importance of hierarchy); assertiveness vs. compliance; avoidance of uncertainty (or comfort with ambiguity – strong to weak); and orientation toward time (long term vs. short term).

The implication of all this is that when individuals from the same constellation of cultural patterning encounter each other, expectations of appropriate behavior and intentionality are consonant and communication can take place (whatever the outcome) relatively unimpeded. When parties from polar-opposite styles meet, in conflict or in negotiation aimed to resolve the conflict, layers of dissonance not only impede comprehension but the tenor or tone of the relationship itself can be compromised by the development of mutual disdain or distrust. Raymond Cohen (1997) has described this in detail in the context of diplomatic and other high-level negotiation. The effects documented here are especially striking, since cosmopolitan and elite negotiators are presumably more immune to the effects of differing cultural styles than are “common folk.” Cohen argues they are not. One’s “native” cultures (socially inherited and learned early on) are deeply embedded.

Conflict Resolution and Cultural Difference

In moving from the analysis of conflict to the practice of conflict resolution, from theory to practice, a great deal of attention has been paid to the role of third-party intervention in the form of mediators, facilitators, leaders of dialogue, or problem-solving workshops. This is because in deep-rooted or intractable conflicts the parties themselves are unable to manage – counter-escalatory spirals, prevent or ameliorate violence – or resolve it. Negotiations break down or can never get started. A third party may be called on to act as intermediary, buffer, face-saver, and repository of enough “working trust” to get communication (re) started. Such third parties may come from within the opposing parties or groups, as respected elders or religious figures, but sometimes come from outside. The opposing parties may come from within the same culture or from different cultures. Indeed, such differences may be one of the reasons the negotiations have been unsuccessful. If the third parties are themselves “cultural outsiders,” then added layers of complexity are present. How do culturally outsider intervenors work in these situations – and how do they do so ethically (Avruch 2012)?

This is a question long faced by ethnographers working to understand cultures not their own, and to some extent the conflict resolution practitioner as cultural outsider needs to adopt “an ethnographic sensibility.” Avoid common misconceptions: Cultures are not fixed, monolithic, homogenous, immutable, deterministic of behavior, or uniformly distributed among groups or persons. Knowledge of such gross-grained distinctions as high/low context, etc., is a starting point, but it must be seasoned with a focus on situated individuals, persons localized in setting, time, and space (Avruch and Black 1993). Context matters.

The work and practice of John Paul Lederach (1995) exemplifies this sensitivity to context. When acting as a third party in a cultural setting not his own, Lederach contrasts a prescriptive approach, where the third party acts as an outside expert who brings conflict resolution theory and skills to the role, to an elicitive one, and where the third party works with the cultural others to “mine” indigenous knowledge and skills: their understanding of what the conflict is about, and what existing, “traditional,” ways there are to resolve or manage it. Different situations may call for a different mix and result in a form of practice attentive to “the local” and characterized by assimilation and hybridity (Richmond 2011). Close attention to local definitions of “peace” can be found in current research investigating notions of “everyday indicators of peace” (EPIs). The lesson there is that indicators are often “hyper-local,” differing among culturally similar communities even in the same country, which may have experienced different levels of violence or trauma, which in turn governs different indicators for what, locally, “peace” is Fircchow (2018).

When one works as an outsider and third party, the focus on culture is about attention to context and communication. The ethics of such practice presupposes self-awareness and apposite humility. Whatever the depth of cultural knowledge the outsider possesses, the really indispensable thing is self-knowledge.

Violence and the Culture of Intractable Conflicts: Conflict as a Cultural System

Scholars in Peace and Conflict studies have identified a range of conflicts they call “intractable” (Azar 1990; Coleman 2000; Kriesberg et al. 1989). These are typically long-lasting, “passed down” through generations; have resisted efforts at resolution; and involve deeply held beliefs about core values deemed “nonnegotiable.” They are usually expressed in the idiom of social (and thus personal) identity (race, language, religion, ethnicity), and are sometimes perceived by individuals as existential conflicts necessary to protect or preserve these identities. They are also usually characterized by histories of violence, often mutually inflicted. The “victims” of one episode are sometimes the victimizers or perpetrators, of another.

Culture plays a role here, particularly with respect to justifying violence against others. Galtung writes about “cultural violence,” defined as “those aspects of culture, the symbolic sphere of our existence – exemplified by religion and ideology, language and art . . . that can be used to justify or legitimize direct or structural violence” (Galtung 1990:291). More generally, intractable conflicts, over time, develop an entire cultural “edifice” that is self-sustaining, a culture of conflict. Bar-Tal defines this comprehensively as consisting of a “shared system of beliefs, values, emotions, symbols, norms, cultural products, institutions, and patterns of behavior. . . that reflects the conflict conditions and provide explanations, justifications, and objectives for the maintenance of the conflict” (Bar-Tal 2019:186). Other scholars have focused on the “systems” part of Bar-Tal’s definition. They argue that intractable conflicts come to be organized into complex and emergent, “dynamical systems” that are self-sustaining and reinforcing, sometimes distant from the original triggers (over incompatible goals or resource competition) that launched them. In dynamical systems terms, conflict resolution may entail the disruption or decentering of the strong conflict “attractors” in favor of more peaceful, or at least more benign, attractors usually inherent in the system (though weakly so) as well (Vallacher et al. 2010). In these approaches, “culture” as local context is refigured to a higher order concept, in effect “absorbed” into the dynamics of the conflict system, such that the system itself has become the defining and dominating context of the conflict.

Conclusion

Understanding culture is important for Peace and Conflict studies for the following reasons:

- Culture frames the contexts in which conflict occurs by indicating, among other things, what sorts of resources are subjects for competition or objects of dispute, often by postulating their high value or relative scarcity (honor, purity, capital, profits, etc.).
- Culture stipulates rules, sometimes precise but usually less so, for how conflicts should be pursued, including how to begin and when and how to end them.
- Culture provides individuals with cognitive, affective, perceptual, and symbolic frameworks for interpreting the behavior and motives of others and themselves.
- Culture affects communication.
- Culture links individual and collective identities, providing symbols (some of them deeply invested with emotion) that connect individuals to others “like them” while at the same time separating those individuals from “unlike others.” Culture defines social markers for constituting boundaries between collectivities (social groups). In this way culture gets implicated in ethnic, religious, nationalist, or other communal, “identity conflicts.”
- At the highest level of abstraction, in the case of protracted and intractable conflicts, culture becomes absorbed into the dynamics of the conflict system, such that one can speak of a “culture of conflict” (radically opposed to a “culture of peace”) and “conflict as a cultural system.”

Cross-References

- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Negotiation

References

- Abu-Nimer, M. (2003). Nonviolence and peace building in Islam: Theory and practice. Gainesville: University Press of Florida.
- Avruch, K. (1998). Culture and conflict resolution. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Avruch, K. (2012). Context and pretext in conflict resolution: Culture, identity, Power and practice. London and New York: Paradigm Publishers/Routledge.

- Avruch, K., & Black, P. W. (1993). Conflict resolution in intercultural settings: Problems and prospects. In D. Sandole & H. van der Merwe (Eds.), Conflict resolution theory and practice (pp. 131–145). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Avruch, K., Black, P. W., & Scimecca, J. (Eds.). (1991). Conflict resolution: Cross-cultural perspectives. Westport: Greenwood Press/Praeger.
- Azar, E. (1990). The management of protracted social conflict. Aldershot: Hampshire England.
- Bar-Tal, D. (2019). The challenges of social and political psychology in pursuit of peace. Peace and Conflict: Journal of Peace Psychology, 25(3), 182–197.
- Brigg, M. (2008). The new politics of conflict resolution: Responding to difference. Basingstoke/Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cohen, R. (1997). Negotiating across cultures (rev. ed.). Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Coleman, P. (2000). Intractable conflict. In M. Deutsch & P. Coleman (Eds.), Handbook of conflict resolution: Theory and practice (pp. 428–450). San Francisco: Jossey Bass.
- Dalglish, T., & Power, M. (2015). Cognition and emotion: From order to disorder. New York/London: Psychology Press.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Fry, D., & Bjorkvist, K. (1997). Cultural variation in conflict resolution: Alternatives to violence. Mahwah: Erlbaum.
- Galtung, J. (1990). Cultural violence. Journal of Peace Research, 27(3), 291–305.
- Hall, E. T. (1977). Beyond culture. New York: Anchor Books.
- Hosf스테, G. (1980). Culture's consequences: International differences in work related values. Beverly Hill: Sage.
- Korostelina, K. (2007). Social identity and conflict: Structures, dynamics and implications. Basingstoke/Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kriesberg, L., Northrop, T., & Thorson, S. (1989). Intractable conflicts and their transformation. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1995). Preparing for peace: Conflict transformation across cultures. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Raiffa, H. (1982). The art & science of negotiation. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Ramsbotham, O., Woodhouse, T., & Miall, H. (Eds.). (2016). Contemporary conflict resolution (4th ed.). Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London/New York: Routledge.
- Ross, M. H. (2007). Cultural contestation in ethnic conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Schelling, T. (1960). The strategy of conflict. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- Schwartz, T. (1992). Anthropology and psychology: An unrequited relationship. In T. Schwartz, G. White, & C. Lutz (Eds.), New directions in psychological anthropology. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tajfel, H., & Turner, J. C. (1986). The social identity theory of intergroups behavior. In S. Worshel & W. Austin (Eds.), Psychology of intergroup relations. Chicago: Nelson Hall.
- Triandis, H. (1982). The analysis of subjective culture. New York: Wiley.
- Vallacher, R., Coleman, P., Nowak, A., & Bui-Wrzosinska, L. (2010). Rethinking intractable conflict: The perspective of dynamical systems. American Psychologist, 65(4), 262–278.
- Volkan, V. (1997). Bloodlines: From ethnic pride to ethnic terrorism. New York: Basic Books.

Further Reading

- Brigg, M., & Bleiker, R. (Eds.). (2011). Mediating across difference. Honolulu: University of Hawaii Press.
- Chew, P. (Ed.). (2001). The conflict and culture reader. New York: New York University Press.
- Eller, J. D. (2000). From culture to ethnicity to conflict. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Stearns, P. (2014). Peace in world history. New York/London: Routledge.

Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research

Birgit Bräuchler

Monash University, Melbourne, VIC, Australia

Introduction

Twenty-five years ago, Leslie Sponsel (1994) has convincingly argued for the mutual relevance of anthropology and peace studies. Given the local turn in peace and conflict studies and increasing efforts to locally root peace interventions, that connection becomes ever more relevant. This transformation process within the peace studies field requires closer attention to culture as a specifier of the local or as a context that greatly influences how concepts such as conflict, reconciliation, justice, and peace are locally defined, perceived, adopted, rejected, or not in place at all (Bräuchler 2015). There is an increasing awareness and willingness within international relations (IR) – one of the dominant disciplines in peace and conflict studies – to embrace and include ethnographic methods into its peace research and intervention procedures (e.g., Mac Ginty 2010a; Millar 2014b; Richmond 2018b). However, simplified conceptualizations or instrumentalization of culture and the alienation of anthropological methods as new tools that help the peace industry to allegedly anchor their interventions in local realities turn out to be rather counterproductive. What the author has provocatively called a “cultural turn in peace research” (Bräuchler 2018b) was not meant to promote yet another turn in the field of peace studies and work but was an argument for the importance of cultural contextualization and mechanisms in all stages on the road to peace: from violence and efforts to end it, the restoration of social relations and the return to everyday routines, to addressing the structural violence underlying the conflict and struggles for broader social justice.

It is important to note from the outset that the idea is not to promote culture as the key to success as the complexity of contemporary conflict settings requires multiple perspectives and approaches and the joining of hands of multiple stakeholders, mediators, and disciplines. But culture needs to be considered as an important ingredient of all phases on the long journey from a situation that leads to violence to the tedious processes of paving the way to reconciliation and peace. Culture further specifies the local turn but also goes beyond narrow conceptualizations of “the local” as any culture – be it the culture of an ethnic community, the international peace industry, or youth culture – is relational and dynamic; culture is constantly under negotiation influenced by local, regional, national, and international levels. The chapter argues for a broader understanding of peacebuilding as something growing from within and a long-term endeavor that does not stop once violence ended and (a superficial) “peace” has been established, without looking into issues of broader structural violence that often underlie the outbreak of physical violence. Whereas this chapter puts forward theoretical and conceptual reflections on the turn toward culture, another chapter on ► “Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia” in the case studies section of this Encyclopedia provides the empirical material to substantiate the argument in this chapter through an anthropologically informed look at mainly local efforts to restore social relations and reintegrate society after mass violence in Eastern Indonesia.

This chapter first provides a brief overview and discussion of the local and cultural turns in peace and conflict studies. It puts forward some definitions, explains key concepts used in this chapter, and identifies gaps in the critical peace literature. In a next step, it outlines the relevance of an anthropological approach in peace and conflict studies. The chapter closes with a brief summary and some concluding reflections.

The Local and Cultural Turns in Peace and Conflict Studies

The cultural turn implies the increasing importance peace studies as well as national and international peace organizations attribute to “culture,” “the local,” and “local ownership” for peacebuilding – which is the result of an envisaged paradigm shift within the field that has only half-heartedly and to a very limited extent been implemented so far (Bräuchler 2018b). Due to the frequent failure of the liberal peace paradigm that promotes democratization, law enforcement, and a liberal market for peace (e.g., Chandler 2010; Donais and Knorr 2013; Fanthorpe 2005), critical peace scholars pushed for a local turn and the idea that culture and local agency are key for sustainable peace (Lederach 1997). This can now be considered common ground in peace research (see, e.g., Debiel et al. 2016; Hughes et al. 2015; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Schierenbeck 2015) but has not been able yet to seriously undermine the predominant liberal peace paradigm and change the field’s mind-set, which puts modeling over in-depth studies of empirical realities (Gleditsch et al. 2014; Lottholz 2017, p. 3; Millar 2018d, p. 4; Paffenholz 2015). “Local ownership,” “participation,” and “traditional justice” have become keywords but are often not more than empty talk, with continuing interventionist talk that local civil society needs to be saved from its own incapacity (Richmond 2011, p. 94). In the end, these terms are inventions by the international development aid industry that serve to make agencies or businesses feel and look good (Gardner and Lewis 2015, p. 151) and to legitimize their interventions (Chopra and Hohe 2004; Mac Ginty 2010b). Being “local” has become a political resource and a subject of contestation (Donais 2009, p. 759; Kappler 2015, p. 882).

Such missing engagement with the complexities and dynamics of the local and culture is partly due to missing research and information on local sociocultural structures, lack of time for longer-term engagement and research, ethnographic realities on the ground rarely matching the abstract categories or normative dimensions of international peace paradigms, but also local notions of participation and governance that seem to be at odds with (democratic) ideas brought in from the outside (Bräuchler 2015, p. 37, 2018b, p. 18–21, 2019b). That lack of engagement with local complexity is highly counterproductive, given the heterogeneity of and the variety of interests and actors within the local, who are not always able or willing to participate and can also resist or reappropriate external initiatives (Debiel and Rinck 2016, p. 246; Hughes et al. 2015, p. 820). Rather than taking local agency seriously, such interventions often simply co-opt the local; essentialize, homogenize, or idealize culture; and are highly selective and mostly ignorant of broader historical, political, and sociocultural contexts (see, e.g., Anderl 2016; Bräuchler and Naucke 2017; Hirblinger and Simons 2015; Richmond 2009). Local initiatives and actors are usually seen as part of larger international intervention and aid programs, with peace and conflict scholars focusing on the interplay of the international and the local (see, e.g., Donais and Knorr 2013; Wanis-St. John 2013). Local people affected by mass violence thus continue to be reduced to victims or troublemakers, rather than active peacemakers with their own resources and cultural competence to draw on.

Responses to the Criticism of the Local Turn

Critical peace scholars have taken great effort to deal with the critique of the local turn. They came up with concepts such as the local-local as opposed to the international peace industry’s artificial concept of the local (Richmond 2011, p. 14) or apply established anthropological or social sciences concepts such as the everyday (Certeau 1984), hybridity (Bhabha 1995) or friction (Tsing 2005) to the peacebuilding discourse, trying to conceptually grasp the dynamics of peace processes on the ground (Björkdahl et al. 2016; Mac Ginty 2010b, 2014), with mixed results. The notion of hybrid peace was criticized as yet another excuse to soak up the local into hegemonic outside interventions to make them more efficient (e.g., Millar 2014a; Richmond 2015), thus ignoring the fact that peacebuilding that takes hybridity seriously does not produce quick outcomes (Kreikemeyer 2018). The local-local was dismissed as an illusionary attempt to grasp the “authentic” local that further essentializes the local and boundaries between locals and interveners (Finkenbusch 2016). And Brewer (2018, p. 211) and colleagues expose everyday life peacebuilding as conceived within the discipline of IR as being “reduced to the idea of local spaces and local practices” as opposed to the everyday in local people’s lives transcending all physical spaces.

As proposed by Galtung (1969) five decades ago, it is important to choose a broader perspective toward peacebuilding that not only includes the ending of violence and dealing with its immediate aftermath but also looks into less visible forms of violence that continue those structures and power relations that were, at least partly, responsible for the outbreak of violence. Ignoring the complexity of the local, universalist and interventionist approaches, however, rather reproduce power hierarchies and do little, if nothing to counter structural violence (Richmond 2018a, p. 11, 2018b, p. 227); they essentially fail in locally anchoring a peace they aim to introduce from the outside. The local is still identified and defined externally, with interventionist “participatory” models preventing the inclusion of everyday local agency in all stages of the peace process (Julian et al. 2019). Such failure is detrimental as it is often everyday routines and needs that drive former enemies to reconcile for survival, for instance, through food exchange, the crossing of each other's territories, the reunification of families, or the restoration of working relations (see, e.g., Bräuchler 2015, p. 105–107; Nordstrom 1997, p. 98–99). All conflict and peace efforts take place within the context of people's everyday lives, and it is through everyday practices that peace and reconciliation need to be embodied if they want to be successful (for an empirical case study, see Bräuchler's chapter on the Moluccan conflict in the case studies section of this Encyclopedia, (for an empirical case study, see ► “Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia”).

The simplification and essentialization of culture and the local in peace interventions are in sharp contrast to changing conceptualizations within anthropology. At least since Fredrik Barth's Ethnic Groups and Boundaries (1969), anthropologists have moved away from an essentialist notion of culture and put the relational aspect of collective identities to the fore. In focus are no longer the outlining and description of difference but the analysis of processes of differentiation (Gupta and Ferguson 1992, p. 16) and contextualization with regard to power relations, global processes, practices, and political histories (Ortner 1995, p. 174). This is particularly interesting for peace research that shall look at negotiation processes between formerly warring parties but also between those affected by the conflict and outside interventionists. Contemporary anthropologists conceptualize culture as something that is processual and dynamic, constantly in the making, renegotiated and contested, from within and outside, but that is not random. In a similar vein has “locality” been reconceptualized in anthropology as a culturally constructed concept that can imply physically demarcated space as well as clusters of interactions and fields of relations that involve the local and the global (Gupta and Ferguson 1992, p. 8; Hastrup and Olwig 1997). The local constitutes a concrete context of practical appropriation, interpretation, and transformation of sociocultural discourses, ideas, and practices that have their roots in global, regional, and local interests, traditions, and actors. So neither culture nor the local are essential givens (Bräuchler and Naucke 2017; Halbmayr and Karl 2012). Such moving away from fixed categories and separateness challenges “mainstream quantitative social science practice” (Brigg 2008, p. 48) and makes peace scholars even more hesitant to engage with it (see also Brigg 2010). To anticipate unwanted outcomes of a misconceptualized cultural turn also requires critical reflections on earlier manifestations of the cultural turn in anthropology and conflict and peace studies, in which culture and/or anthropological research have been instrumentalized and manipulated for the sake of colonialism, nation-building, “culturally sensitive” conflict resolution, genocide, and the war on terror (Bräuchler 2018b).

The Relevance of an Anthropological Approach

As mass violence and conflicts are often the outcome of structures of violence, societal transformations from conflict to peace, including the restoration of social relations and justice, are no isolated phenomena, neither in space nor in time, but multi-scalar processes. It is anthropology's role to promote an open and reflected notion and understanding of the local, tradition, and culture; raise awareness of their historicity, ambiguity, contestedness, flexibility, and their embeddedness in relational webs that go far beyond the specific conflict; and try to track the intricacies and dynamics of the transformation from conflict to peace and social justice through ethnographic field work (Bräuchler 2015, p. 182).

Despite long-lasting inclinations to ignore or be blind to cultural diversity, a cultural turn slowly starts taking effect in IR and peace studies (Bräuchler 2018b; Millar 2018a, p. 263; Valbjørn 2008). A few critical peace scholars recently started promoting anthropology as an important partner in peace research (e.g., Mac Ginty 2015; Millar 2018b; Richmond 2018a, b), which opens up important venues for interdisciplinary dialogue and collaboration that are crucial to deal with the complexities of conflict and peace. Richmond (2018b, p. 221, 230) asked for the involvement of anthropology as the discipline “rescuing peacebuilding from neoliberal epistemological frameworks” and preventing mainstream IR’s projects “from verging into hegemonic illegitimacy,” and Millar has explored options of ethnographic peace research (e.g., Millar 2014b, 2018b). Being recent initiatives, they do not go far enough yet, which can put the emancipatory potential of the anthropological enterprise at risk. They either take anthropology as an auxiliary science (Finlay 2015); deal with the local only as part of larger international efforts and thus bracket out local peacemaking initiatives and local social engineering processes (Bräuchler 2018a, p. 23); or they reduce anthropology to the ethnographic method as yet another tool for the peace industry (Millar 2014b, p. 6) for data collection. The latter implies “an empiricist positivism for which anthropological research had been criticized on various occasions in the discipline’s controversial legacy” and that is supposed to confirm a universalist ontology, refine theories, and “make peacebuilding practices more effective” (Lottholz 2017, p. 6, 3). In that context, ethnography often simply implies working qualitatively (Millar 2018c, p. 6) or is reduced to fieldwork or participant observation and is made to adhere “to the protocols of positivist methodology” (Ingold 2014, p. 386–387, 384). Such reductionism also overlooks the interpretational skills required for thick description (Geertz 1993) – the interpretative observation and description of culturally contextualized social behavior – that can only be learned together with anthropological theory and concepts. Being out there is not intrinsically ethnographic, but it is rather the interpretation and judgment of these encounters that is based on “a retrospective conversion of the learning, remembering and note-taking” (Ingold 2014, p. 386). In that sense, theory, empirical detail, and methodology go hand in hand with each other (Bräuchler 2018a, p. 24; Ingold 2014, p. 393).

Whereas ethnography in these recent debates within IR seems to be seen as “a solution to the crisis of representation, as a way out of radical reflexivity and moral incertitude and a way into policy-relevant knowledge, cultural anthropology has come to accept critical ethnography as the brainchild of its disciplinary uncertainties” (Vrasti 2008, p. 296–297) and representation as an ongoing process that is constantly negotiated and challenged from within and outside. Accordingly, peace researchers have to learn how to bear uncertainty and how to hold “open an uncomfortable space, rather than trying to bring about an inevitably superficial and weak conformity to abstract principles formulated elsewhere” (Brown 2013, p. 143). In addition, anthropological research can also highlight the creativity and resolution finding ability of local actors, as shown in the author’s empirical chapter (for an empirical case study, see ► “Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia”), that should be recognized, respected, and supported through complementary peacebuilding – without reducing the local to yet another tool in the peace industry and without ignoring the share of local actors in the conflicts and the problems, limitations, or contradictions they face (Bräuchler and Naucke 2017, p. 428). Ethnographic research and anthropological conceptualizations can exactly do that, to reflect a “non-unitary and always dialogical, polyphonic and controversial” reality and complexity, and “not try to condense it” (Lottholz 2017, p. 11). What can also be learned from anthropology is the flexible (though not random) adaptation of methodology to rapidly changing fields and worlds, which requires multi-sited (Marcus 1995), multi-temporal (Dalsgaard 2013), and multi-scalar (Xiang 2013) field research, to grasp the complexities and dynamics of evolving peacescapes and their embeddedness in broader political changes (Bräuchler 2015: Introduction).

Issues of language and translation are rarely discussed in such appropriation of anthropological methods, with few exceptions (e.g., Millar 2018c, p. 10). As Mac Ginty (2016, p. 193) noted, the lack of language skills and knowledge of local codes of behavior or “epistemological limitations,” on top of security restrictions, makes it extremely difficult for outsiders to get access to the local. But these outsiders have nonetheless the (material) power to define the local and thus seek to legitimize their interventions (Mac Ginty 2016, p. 197–198). It is for such reasons that the anthropological project and ethnographic research need to be long-term: to negotiate access, establish relationships of trust, and acknowledge local agency and the co-production of knowledge. The local and the cultural turns require another timeframe and the adoption of other concepts and principles that anthropology had developed a long while ago and that have recently been reinvented in peace studies, including the importance of context, the emic perspective, the researcher's self-reflectivity, relational identity concepts, and representational issues (see, e.g., Hirblinger and Simons 2015, p. 422; Kappler 2015, p. 876; Mac Ginty 2015, p. 848–852; Millar 2014b, p. 8; Schierenbeck 2015, p. 1031–1032).

Another important step forward is to dismiss the idea of anthropology and ethnographic research as apolitical and as resistant to the idea of social change and advocacy, which seems to prevail even among promoters of an ethnographic turn within IR (e.g., Millar 2018c; Richmond 2018b). Ethnographic research, just like culture, is always political. It is certainly true that many anthropologists have “developed a deep ambivalence towards policy and practice” “as a result of its association with colonialism, and its instrumentalization during wartime” (Millar 2018c, p. 7–8), and other reasons (Bräuchler 2018b). It is probably also true that many anthropologists are hesitant to be co-opted by a normative field such as IR. However, it is not true that anthropologists depict “the everyday as if it were in some way disassociated from the regressive or progressive possibilities of power, institutions, rights and needs-oriented policymakers” (Richmond 2018b, p. 229), that they “verge(s) on the purely descriptive” (230), or that they even only see “agency as if there were no structure with which it could tactically engage” (232). This chapter, the author's empirical studies, and other works by past and contemporary anthropologists can disprove this (On a side note, this author does believe that not all research should actually be policy-oriented but that anthropologists also need to engage in long-term basic research that, nonetheless, is never apolitical). Anthropological research has always been highly political, just like the local agency that it is engaging with, looking at both structure and practice (Bräuchler 2020, see, e.g., Pierre Bourdieu's work). At least since Sol Tax's (1975) advancement of “action anthropology,” there is a strong tendency within anthropology to engage in research that does have an impact on the lived reality of people they work with, among others through engaging with policymaking, advocacy, or activism. The last decades, in particular after the writing culture debate that questioned the supposed claim to representation of ethnographies and put forward the idea of the co-production of ethnographic knowledge by researchers and research subjects and a strong need for reflection on the benefits of ethnographic work (Clifford and Marcus 1986), have seen a proliferation of various approaches: from action anthropology (Tax 1975) and activist research (Sillitoe 2015) to advocacy anthropology (Ballard and Banks 2003), engaged and engaging anthropology (Baer 2012; Beck and Maida 2013; Eriksen 2006; Sillitoe 2015), practicing and public anthropology (Borofsky 2000; Brondo 2010), or anthropological engagements within the fields of development, aid, health, and others (Strang 2009) and the promotion of collective and indigenous human rights. What also needs to be better reflected on is that it is not only outside interveners essentializing, harmonizing, or instrumentalizing culture, as illustrated in the empirical case study (for an empirical case study, see ► “Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia”) but also by local people for strategic reasons, so-called spokespersons, or intermediaries trying to mediate between the inside and the outside. This is yet another highly political issue with lots of potential to influence future policymaking. Culture is a strategic resource of a variety of actors whose background and individual motivations need to be taken into account and explored through critical ethnographic research (Bräuchler 2015, p. 37).

Summary and Concluding Reflections

This chapter argued for a broader notion of peacebuilding and a longer-term perspective in research on peace processes that provide a very different picture than if one would only look at a single phase individually and in isolation (Bräuchler 2019a). The requirement of a long-term engagement, unfortunately, is opposed to most funding policies. When international donors see the “post-conflict” peacebuilding phase over, funding sources for transitional justice initiatives usually dry up, which “sits uncomfortably with timescales for communities dealing with legacies of past violence and injustice that often cross multiple generations over decades and centuries” (Kent 2019, p. 195–196). The chapter is also an argument for the rootedness of peace processes and related dynamics and developments in people’s everyday experiences, cultures, and lives – an argument for an embodied peace. It is an argument for trying to both develop and understand peace from within and for interdisciplinary dialogue and collaboration, in particular between anthropology and IR, to acknowledge the complexity of the “ethnographic turn” within peace studies and respond to the shortcomings of its present implementation. Such dialogue and collaboration can enable a conceptual and methodological reorientation in peace and conflict studies and the provision of contextual knowledge that is required to grasp local notions of security and peace and to understand local reconciliation dynamics and their interlinkage with outside interventions. Despite possible shortcomings, advancements like the ones by Mac Ginty, Richmond, and Millar are welcome and should really put pressure on both sides to engage in more in-depth conceptual discussions and “to spur . . . methodological debates” (Millar 2018c, p. 17). IR needs to open up for collaboration and new concepts and learn from lessons learned from previous cultural turns and from the long-term anthropological engagement with “the local,” culture, and “the everyday.” Anthropologists need to think about how to more proactively enter the field of peace studies, how to make their work more accessible, and how to adapt their methodology in order to “keep pace with an operational context” of the peace industry (Chopra and Hohe 2004, p. 298), without compromising on its core principles. Anthropological research is no panacea for conflict and war but needs to become a requisite part of any peace work and research.

Cross-Reference

- ▶ Cultural Mobilization for Peace in Indonesia

References

- Anderl, F. (2016). The myth of the local. How international organizations localize norms rhetorically. The Review of International Organizations, 11(2), 197–218.
- Baer, H. A. (2012). Engaged anthropology in 2011: A view from the antipodes in a turbulent era. American Anthropologist, 114(2), 217–226.
- Ballard, C., & Banks, G. (2003). Resource wars: The anthropology of mining. Annual Review of Anthropology, 32, 287–313.
- Barth, F. (Ed.). (1969). Ethnic groups and boundaries. The social organization of culture difference. Bergen-Oslo: Universitetsforlaget.
- Beck, S., & Maida, C. A. (2013). Toward engaged anthropology. New York: Berghahn.
- Bhabha, H. K. (1995). The post-colonial studies reader. In B. Ashcroft, G. Griffiths, & H. Tiffin (Eds.), Cultural diversity and cultural differences (reprint 2001) (pp. 206–209). London/New York: Routledge.
- Björkdahl, A., Höglund, K., Millar, G., van der Lijn, J., & Verkoren, W. (Eds.). (2016). Peacebuilding and friction. Global and local encounters in post conflict-societies. London/New York: Routledge.
- Borofsky, R. (2000). Public anthropology. Where to? What next? Anthropology Newsletter, 41(5), 9–10.
- Bräuchler, B. (2015). The cultural dimension of peace. Decentralization and reconciliation in Indonesia. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bräuchler, B. (2018a). Contextualizing ethnographic peace research. In G. Millar (Ed.), Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions (pp. 21–42). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bräuchler, B. (2018b). The cultural turn in peace research: Prospects and challenges. Peacebuilding, 6(1), 17–33.
- Bräuchler, B. (2019a). From transitional to performative justice: Peace activism in the aftermath of communal violence. Global Change, Peace & Security, 31(2), 201–220.
- Bräuchler, B. (2019b). Local peacebuilding after communal violence. In S. Ratuva (Ed.), Global handbook of ethnicity (pp. 1445–1464). London: Palgrave Macmillan. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-981-13-0242-8_110-1.

- Bräuchler, B. (2020). Peacebuilding and resistance: Inequality, empowerment, refusal. In J. Kustermans, T. Sauer, & B. Segaert (Eds.), A requiem for peacebuilding? (forthcoming). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bräuchler, B., & Naucke, P. (2017). Peacebuilding and conceptualisations of the local. Social Anthropology, 25(4), 422–436.
- Brewer, J. D., Hayes, B. C., Teeney, F., Dudgeon, K., Mueller-Hirth, N., & Wijesinghe, S. L. (2018). The sociology of everyday life peacebuilding. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brigg, M. (2008). The new politics of conflict resolution. Responding to difference. Hampshire/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brigg, M. (2010). Culture: Challenges and possibilities. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding. Critical developments and approaches (pp. 329–346). Hampshire/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brondo, K. V. (2010). Practicing anthropology in a time of crisis: 2009 year in review. American Anthropologist, 112(2), 208–218.
- Brown, M. A. (2013). Anthropology and peacebuilding. In R. Mac Ginty (Ed.), Routledge handbook of peacebuilding (pp. 132–146). London/New York: Routledge.
- de Certeau, M. (1984). The practice of everyday life. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Chandler, D. (2010). The uncritical critique of ‘liberal peace’. Review of International Studies, 36(S1), 137–155.
- Chopra, J., & Hohe, T. (2004). Participatory intervention. Global Governance, 10, 289–305.
- Clifford, J., & Marcus, G. E. (Eds.). (1986). Writing culture: The poetics and politics of ethnography. Berkeley/Los Angeles/London: University of California Press.
- Dalsgaard, S. (2013). The field as a temporal entity and the challenges of the contemporary. Social Anthropology, 21(2), 213–225.
- Debiel, T., & Rinck, P. (2016). Rethinking the local in peacebuilding. Moving away from the liberal/post-liberal divide. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneckener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 240–256). London: Routledge.
- Debiel, T., Held, T., & Schneckener, U. (Eds.). (2016). Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation. London: Routledge.
- Donais, T. (2009). Haiti and the dilemmas of local ownership. International Journal, 64(3), 753–773.
- Donais, T., & Knorr, A. C. (2013). Peacebuilding from below vs. the liberal peace: The case of Haiti. Canadian Journal of Development Studies/Revue canadienne d'études du développement, 34(1), 54–69.
- Eriksen, T. H. (2006). Engaging anthropology. The case for a public presence. Berg: Oxford.
- Fanthorpe, R. (2005). On the limits of liberal peace: Chiefs and democratic decentralization in post-war Sierra Leone. African Affairs, 105(418), 27–49.
- Finkenbusch, P. (2016). ‘Post-liberal’ peacebuilding and the crisis of international authority. Peacebuilding, 4(3), 247–261.
- Finlay, A. (2015). Liberal intervention, anthropology and the ethnicity machine. Peacebuilding, 3(3), 224–237.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(1), 167–191.
- Gardner, K., & Lewis, D. (2015). Anthropology and development. Challenges for the twenty-first century. Pluto: London.
- Geertz, C. (1993). The interpretation of cultures. London: Fontana Press.
- Gleditsch, N. P., Nordkvelle, J., & Strand, H. (2014). Peace research – Just the study of war? Journal of Peace Research, 51(2), 145–158.
- Gupta, A., & Ferguson, J. (1992). Beyond “culture”: Space, identity, and the politics of difference. Cultural Anthropology, 7(1), 6–23.
- Halbmayer, E., & Karl, S. (2012). Einleitung: Heterogenität des (Post-)Konflikts. Erinnerter Gewalt und multiple Friktionen in Lateinamerika. In E. Halbmayer & S. Karl (Eds.), Die Erinnerter Gewalt: Post-konfliktdynamiken in Lateinamerika (pp. 7–27). Bielefeld: Transcript.
- Hastrup, K., & Olwig, K. F. (1997). Introduction. In K. F. Olwig & K. Hastrup (Eds.), Siting culture: The shifting anthropological object (pp. 1–14). London/New York: Routledge.
- Hirblinger, A., & Simons, C. (2015). The good, the bad, and the powerful: Representations of the ‘local’ in peacebuilding. Security Dialogue, 46(5), 422–439.
- Hughes, C., Öjendalb, J., & Schierenbeck, I. (2015). The struggle versus the song – The local turn in peacebuilding: An introduction. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 817–824.
- Ingold, T. (2014). That’s enough about ethnography! HAU: Journal of Ethnographic Theory, 4(1), 383–395.
- Julian, R., de Guevara, B. B., & Redhead, R. (2019). From expert to experiential knowledge: Exploring the inclusion of local experiences in understanding violence in conflict. Peacebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1594572>.
- Kappler, S. (2015). The dynamic local: Delocalisation and (re-)localisation in the search for peacebuilding identity. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 875–889.
- Kent, L. (2019). Transitional justice and the spaces of memory activism in Timor-Leste and Aceh. Global Change, Peace & Security, 31(2), 81–199.
- Kreikemeyer, A. (2018). Hybridity revisited. Zum Stellenwert von Hybriditätsperspektiven in der Friedensforschung. Zeitschrift für Friedens- und Konfliktforschung, 7(2), 287–315.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington: United States Institute of Peace Press.

- Lottholz, P. (2017). Critiquing anthropological imagination in peace and conflict studies: From empiricist positivism to a dialogical approach in ethnographic peace research. International Peacekeeping, 1–26. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2017.1350576>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010a). Gilding the lily? International support for indigenous and traditional peacebuilding. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding. Critical developments and approaches (pp. 347–366). Hampshire/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010b). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41, 391–412.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2016). What do we mean when we use the term ‘local’? Imagining and framing the local and the international in relation to peace and order. In T. Debiel, T. Held, & U. Schneekener (Eds.), Peacebuilding in crisis. Rethinking paradigms and practices of transnational cooperation (pp. 193–209). London/New York: Routledge.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 43(5), 763–783.
- Marcus, G. E. (1995). Ethnography in/of the world system: The emergence of multi-sited ethnography. Annual Review of Anthropology, 24, 95–117.
- Millar, G. (2014a). Disaggregating hybridity: Why hybrid institutions do not produce predictable experiences of peace. Journal of Peace Research, 51(4), 501–514.
- Millar, G. (2014b). An ethnographic approach to peacebuilding. London/New York: Routledge.
- Millar, G. (2018a). Conclusion: The constructive tension of interdisciplinary endeavours. In G. Millar (Ed.), Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions (pp. 253–271). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Millar, G. (Ed.). (2018b). Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Millar, G. (2018c). Ethnographic peace research: The underappreciated benefits of long-term fieldwork. International Peacekeeping, 1–24. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2017.1421860>.
- Millar, G. (2018d). Introduction: The key strengths of ethnographic peace research. In G. Millar (Ed.), Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions (pp. 1–19). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Nordstrom, C. (1997). The eye of the storm: From war to peace – Examples from Sri Lanka and Mozambique. In D. P. Fry & K. Björkqvist (Eds.), Cultural variation in conflict resolution: Alternatives to violence (pp. 91–103). Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates.
- Ortner, S. B. (1995). Resistance and the problem of ethnographic refusal. Comparative Studies in Society and History, 37(1), 173–193.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). Becoming liberal, unbecoming liberalism: Liberal-local hybridity via the everyday as a response to the paradoxes of liberal peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 3(3), 324–344.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2015). The dilemmas of a hybrid peace: Negative or positive? Cooperation and Conflict, 50(1), 50–68.
- Richmond, O. P. (2018a). Peace and the formation of political order. International Peacekeeping, 1–26. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2018.1511374>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2018b). Rescuing peacebuilding? Anthropology and peace formation. Global Society, 32(2), 221–239.
- Schierenbeck, I. (2015). Beyond the local turn divide: Lessons learnt, relearnt and unlearnt. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 1023–1032.
- Sillitoe, P. (Ed.). (2015). Indigenous studies and engaged anthropology: The collaborative moment. Farnham: Ashgate Publishing Limited.
- Sponsel, L. E. (1994). The mutual relevance of anthropology and peace studies. In L. E. Sponsel & T. Gregor (Eds.), The anthropology of peace and nonviolence (pp. 1–36). Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Strang, V. (2009). What anthropologists do. Oxford/New York: Berg.
- Tax, S. (1975). Action anthropology. Current Anthropology, 16(4), 514–517.
- Tsing, A. (2005). Friction: An ethnography of global connection. Princeton/Oxford: Princeton University Press.
- Valbjørn, M. (2008). Before, during and after the cultural turn: A ‘Baedeker’ to IR’s cultural journey. International Review of Sociology, 18(1), 55–82.
- Vrasti, W. (2008). The strange case of ethnography and international relations. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 37(2), 279–301.
- Wanis-St. John, A. (2013). Indigenous peacebuilding. In R. Mac Ginty (Ed.), Routledge handbook of peacebuilding (pp. 360–374). London/New York: Routledge.
- Xiang, B. (2013). Multi-scalar ethnography: An approach for critical engagement with migration and social change. Ethnography, 14(3), 282–299.

Custom

► Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Cyber Conflict

Dafina Buçaj
Loyola Law School, LMU, Los Angeles,
CA, USA

Synonyms

Cyber warfare; International humanitarian law; ius ad bellum; ius in bello; Self-defense

Definition/Description

The development of cyber capabilities among state and non-state actors, as well as the increase of cyber dependency has made cyber conflict a plausible reality and no longer a hypothetical example. There is a general agreement among scholars and states that the traditional concept of conflict as set out in the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocol remains the same and is applicable to any new technological weapons and thus also applicable to cyberspace. However, the sophistication of cyber capabilities of states and the amplification of power of non-state actors in cyberspace have shifted the paradigms and blurred the lines of the clear delineation between international and non-international armed conflict and when the use of cyber capabilities triggers a conflict. As such the article will aim to provide some insight on when the use of cyber weapons by state actors can result in a conflict if the requisite cyber operation reaches the threshold of an armed attack. Given the technical capacities of some non-state actors to conduct dangerous cyber operations that can amount to armed attacks, the question arises if these attacks can trigger a conflict and how that conflict would be classified and lastly how do the Laws of Armed Conflict (LOAC) apply to cyber conflict particularly with regard to non-state actors and non-international armed conflicts.

Introduction

The technological developments in the recent years have resulted in an interconnectedness and cyber dependency like no time before, making the use of the Internet part of the daily life of billions of peoples across the world. As such issues related to the use of cyberspace have been subject of concern and discussion among states and scholars. It has been noted, however, that cyberspace is not a space at all (Graham 2011). Cyberspace is a multifaceted technology of interconnections composed of three layers: the virtual space of the electronic pathways and resident data including the Internet; the physical lawyer of computer systems, electronics, network cables, processors, controllers, and supporting infrastructure; and the people who are located under the authority of one or more states (US DoD 2010; Schreier 2015; Pri Metrica 2018). Cyberspace is therefore a man-made technology that connects people with one another as well as with other technologies, its impact is best shown by examples of computer-controlled power plants, computer-operated flight and airport control systems, and the massive popularity of online banking, both for private individuals and international companies (Kulesza 2009).

This interconnectedness of critical infrastructure like power, electricity, and financial systems with one another using cyberspace has resulted in easy, faster, and smarter services. Nowadays individuals can complete transactions across the world within a matter of seconds without having to be there physically. Unfortunately, one of the side effects of the development of the cyber domain is the increase, diversification, and sophistication of cyber threats. These cyber threats are manifested through different forms of activities that employ cyber capabilities aimed at achieving objectives in or through the use of cyberspace, and are referred to as cyber operations (Schmitt 2014a, b). Some are more lenient in the harm caused, i.e., cyber exploitation, a form of unauthorized access to computer or networks with the aim of collecting or stealing information but without deleting or corrupting it or causing damage to the system accessed (Roscini 2015; Lin 2010). Whereas other forms such as cyber-crime, cyberattacks, and cyber warfare can have more severe consequences, the latter fall within the scope of interest of this paper. Some of the most popular forms of cyber weapons used in conducting cyber operations are denial-of-service (“DoS”) attacks, distributed denial-of-service (“DDoS”) attacks, the use of different malicious programs, and logic bombs (Roberts 2014). Although to this date there has not been a cyber operation that has resulted in such damage, there is no doubt that they are capable of shutting down nuclear centrifuges, air defense systems, electrical grids, derailing trains, or disrupting electricity supply and therefore pose a serious threat to national security (Hathaway et al. 2012; Couzigou 2018). Moreover, this shows that cyber operations are not restricted only within the virtual domain and can have effect on the physical space, thus implicating state sovereignty issues.

Though there has not been any public acknowledgment of the use of cyber operations with such high level of potential destruction, there are indications that the number of states developing such cyber capabilities is increasing (ICRC Report 2019), with approximately 140 nations that currently have active cyber weapons development programs (Schaap 2009). In addition, there is an increased threat of non-state actors possessing cyber capabilities that if used can cause severe damage. Recent events have demonstrated that non-state actors, with or without the sponsoring of affiliated states, have conducted numerous cyber operations ranging from purely ideological (i.e., attack on Estonia 2007), in support of a military conflict (i.e., Georgia 2008, Ukraine 2014), or as part of it (attacks by Hezbollah and Hamas), or in an autonomous manner (i.e., the attacks by Anonymous in 2012) (Ducheine 2015). However, there is a lot of confusion particularly with respect to the activities of non-state actors in the context of cyberspace since international law in general does not specifically regulate behavior of non-state actors leaving a lot of questions unanswered. The notorious distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks on Estonia in 2007 accelerated much of the scholarly interest in identifying the legal framework governing computer network operations (Henriksen 2015; Tikk et al. 2010). While there is no longer any serious debate as to whether international law applies to transborder cyber operations, the international community has been unable to achieve consensus on the precise application of many international law principles and rules that govern them (Schmitt 2017). One of the more serious attempts to do so has been the initiative of NATO in drafting of the Tallinn Manual 2.0 on the International Law Applicable to Cyber Operations, as a “comprehensive analysis of how existing international law applies to cyberspace” (Tallinn Manual 2.0, 2017) preceded by the first version in 2013. The Manual, although only a compendium of rules and accompanying commentary, was intended by the drafters to be a useful starting point for analysis of operations in cyberspace (Schmitt 2017).

The Traditional Concept of Conflict and Challenges Imposed by the Use of New Cyber Weapons

In order to determine when the use of cyber weapons triggers a conflict, one must initially understand the traditional concept of conflict as it has been defined throughout centuries in customary international norms and codified in treaty law. It should be noted that in earlier literature, conflicts were mostly referred to as “war” which as set forth in the definition by Lassa Oppenheim was considered a contention solely between states through their armed forces (1906). Nowadays the term conflict is preferred over the term war since it is wider in scope (UK Ministry of Defence). In defining conflict, we turn to the Geneva Conventions and Additional Protocols which offer clear definitions of conflict and its delineation in international armed conflict and non-international or internal armed conflict. The Geneva Conventions codified the distinction between international and internal armed conflict. As regards the international armed conflict, the common Articles 2 and 3 which are the same for all four conventions provide that “the present Convention shall apply to all cases of declared war or of any other armed conflict which may arise between two or more of the High Contracting Parties, even if the state of war is not recognized by one of them” (Geneva Conventions), and only minimum humanitarian protection is extended to internal armed conflicts (UK Ministry of Defence). The Additional Protocols I and II which were adopted in 1977 introduced changes, the most relevant of which are the ones set out in the Protocol II which stipulate that the Additional Protocol and hence the Law of Armed Conflict are applicable in the situations where there is an armed conflict of an internal nature between the governmental forces of one contracting party on one hand and dissident armed forces or other organized groups under a responsible command on the hand (Protocol II 1977). One additional requirement that has been considered to complicate matters particularly when attempting to apply it to cyberspace is the requirement that the organized armed groups must be in control of territory to enable them to conduct operations and to implement the protocol (Schmitt 2013; UK Ministry of Defence 2010).

Therefore, in order to be considered an international conflict, there are two main criteria that must be met: the conflict must be between states and, the cyber operation or attack must reach the threshold of an armed attack. While in the ‘physical’ world it is easy to determine when the two criteria are met, the use of cyberspace, due to its borderless nature and the anonymity possibilities it offers, has made it more difficult to identify and attribute the actions to a State and determine when a cyberattack is considered an armed attack in absence of physical damages. In addition, the amplification of power of non-state actors has challenged the application of the traditional concepts of international and non-international armed conflict. The reality that non-state actors can mount transborder attacks on a different territory from where they are located, begs the question whether and when non-state actors can conduct attacks that amount to armed attacks and how does the law of armed conflict apply to these new forms of cyber organized groups who are armed with computers and networks.

Can the Use of Cyber Weapons Trigger an International Armed Conflict?

Article 2(4) of the UN Charter famously provides that “all Members of the United Nations shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations” (Charter of the United Nations 1945). This indicates that there is a general prohibition from the use of force and there is no doubt that this principle reflects customary international law, as well as reached the status of jus cogens recognized by ICJ in its case law (Nicaragua v. United States of America, Wall Advisory Opinion). Article 51 of the UN Charter, on the other hand, provides that “nothing in the present Charter shall impair the inherent right of individual or collective self-defense if an armed attack occurs against a Member of the United Nations . . .” (Charter of the United Nations 1945, Simma et al. 2013). Self-defense thus clearly constitutes an exception to the general prohibition on the threat and use of force set out in Article 2(4) of the UN Charter of a customary international law character which gives states the lawful right to respond to an attack that meets the threshold of an armed attack (Dev 2015).

It should be noted that use of force and armed attack are standards that serve different normative purposes; thus, it is important to distinguish between them. The use of force standard is employed to determine whether a state has violated Article 2(4) of the UN Charter and its related customary international law prohibition, whereas the notion of “armed attack” is a standard used to determine whether the target state may respond to an act with a use of force without itself violating the prohibition of using force (Tallinn Manual 2.0).

The question as to whether the international law rules on self-defense apply to cyberattacks is much debated, as no explicit international law rules exist specifically applicable to self-defense in cyberspace and these norms predate the advent of cyber operations (Focarelli 2015). It should be noted though that the International Court of Justice (“ICJ”) has stated that Articles 2(4) and 51 of the UN Charter, regarding the prohibition of the use of force and self-defense, respectively, apply to “any use of force, regardless of the weapons employed” (Nuclear Weapons Advisory Opinion 1996). Thus, the fact that these articles were adopted well before the Information Age does not necessarily prevent their application to cyber operations, and the applicability of such rules in the cyber contexts has been confirmed by various states and international organizations (Roscini 2015). The applicability of the self-defense regime was endorsed by the experts in the Tallinn Manual, who agreed that a state may exercise its inherent right to self-defense in case it becomes a target of a cyber operation that rises to the level of an armed attack (Tallinn Manual 2.0, Rule 71). Whether a cyber operation constitutes an armed attack depends on its scale and effects (Tallinn Manual 2.0, Rule 71). Therefore, the first issue addressed below is when does a cyber operation reach the threshold of an armed attack.

When Does a Cyberattack Meet the Threshold of an Armed Attack?

In order to determine when a cyber operation reaches the threshold of an armed attack, one must keep in mind that this discussion refers mainly to cyberattacks, as a form of politically motivated attacks aimed to disrupt, deny, or destroy information located in the computer or computer networks or destroy the computer networks themselves (Hathaway 2012). When such attack is directed toward critical infrastructure, the disrupting effects on computer systems will not only impede them from performing their work, but can also spill into the physical world and cause damages to the infrastructure whose functionality is dependent on such computer system, be that an airport tower control, an electric grid, or a power plant. Thus, other forms of cybercrime or cyber exploitation which do not have the requisite attributes to reach the threshold of use of force or armed attack are excluded from the discussion.

In assessing whether a cyberattack constitutes an armed attack, scholars have employed several approaches: under the instrument-based approach, a cyberattack cannot constitute an armed attack because it lacks the features of the traditional kinetic weapon; according to the target-based approach, an attack can constitute an armed attack if it is directed toward a state’s critical infrastructure; the effect-based approach focuses on the effect of the attack and accordingly a cyber-attack can only amount to an armed attack if the effects are similar to the ones conducted by physical weapons, generally requiring that the attack causes physical damage of property or death; according to the sovereignty-based approach, a cyberattack results in an armed attack if it interferes with the state affairs that fall within its sovereign rights; and lastly the non-kinetic approach which suggests that a non-kinetic cyberattack amounts to an armed attack if it interferes with the rights of the victims to survival in a manner that is equivalent to the activities which are unquestionably considered as armed attacks under the UN Charter (Roberts 2014). However there is no clear answer as to which approach is the rightful one, and this question has been open to a vast discussion by scholars and international institutions who agree in some matters but not all of them.

In general, certain armed attack criteria are clear-cut, such as the fact that armed attacks are transborder in nature and that such qualification requires that the resulting harm or the harm that is intended reaches a certain threshold of severity (Schmitt 2017). The ICJ referred to armed attacks as the gravest forms of the use of force (Nicaragua judgment 1986) regardless of the weapons employed (Nuclear Weapons Advisory Opinion 1996) which indicates that the attack must at least amount to use of force and it is not confined solely to kinetic traditional weapons. Hence one of the key matters is whether the notion of armed attack, because of the term “armed,” necessarily involves the employment of “weapons”; however, it has been maintained that instead the critical factor is whether the effects of cyber operation, regardless of the weapons used, were analogous to those that would result from an action, otherwise qualifying as a kinetic armed attack (Tallinn Manual 2.0). Consequently, there is general agreement that if a cyberattack employs capabilities that cause or are reasonably likely to cause physical damage to property, loss of life or injury of persons in a manner equivalent to kinetic attacks, through the alteration deletion or corruption of software or data, it would fall under the prohibition contained in Article 2(4) of the UN Charter; but there is disagreement whether disruptive cyber operations that do not physically damage them also amount to violation of Article 2(4) (Roscini 2015), thus amounting to an armed attack. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has taken the position that during an armed conflict interpreting the term attack, regardless of it being kinetic or cyber in nature, only to mean an operation that caused death or physical injury, leaving outside this scope a cyber operation that is aimed at making dysfunctional an essential civilian network such as banking or electricity, is a very restrictive interpretation of the notion of attack and would be difficult to reconcile with the purpose of international humanitarian law (ICRC 2019). Scholars maintain a similar view that disruptive cyber operations fall within scope of Article 2(4) when the effect of such disruption is significant enough to affect state security (Roscini 2015) or goes beyond mere inconvenience and cause significant disruption of essential services by rendering ineffective or unusable critical infrastructure that is essential for the conduct of daily life of peoples (Antolin-Jenkins 2005). Accordingly, a cyberattack amounts to an armed attack if the disruptive consequences reach a certain level of severity. Nevertheless, the response based on self-defense must meet the criteria of imminence, necessity, and proportionality; in addition to that as stated by the ICJ in order to meet the criteria of proportionality, it must also meet the requirements of the law of armed conflict, namely, the principles of humanitarian law (Nuclear Weapons Advisory Opinion 1996).

Non-state Actors Mounting Armed Attacks and the Effect on the Classification of Conflict

International law scholars and operational lawyers have struggled over the last decade to accommodate Law of Armed Conflict and the UN Charter system to asymmetric warfare waged by non-state actors, including terrorist groups (Banks 2013). Situations in which a non-state actor conducts harmful cyber operations at the armed attack level of severity, against one state from another state's territory are legally more challenging. If the non-state actors are acting on behalf of a state than the rules of attribution would apply, the issue of whether acts of non-state actors can constitute armed attack absent involvement by a state is controversial. Traditionally, Article 51 and the customary international law of self-defense were characterized as applicable solely to armed attacks undertaken by one state against another, whereas violent acts by non-state actors fell within the law enforcement paradigm. The ICJ seems to have endorsed the view that self-defense is an interstate measure (Wall advisory opinion). Self-defense has also been recognized as a tool against a failure of the state to meet its due diligence obligations to prevent cross-border harmful action by private individuals or groups allegedly amounting to an armed attack for self-defense purposes (Roscini 2010).

However, there is nothing in the language of Article 51 that restricts armed attacks to attacks carried out by or on behalf of states, and it has been contended that the ICJ interpretation on this matter suggests that attribution to the state is only a precondition for the applicability of Article 51 of the UN Charter for resort to use of force against the state from whose territory the attack is launched and does not preclude use of force against the non-state actors (Trapp 2015). In practice several states in the territory of which harm was caused by criminal acts committed by private individuals or groups (rebels or alleged terrorists) from another state, invoked self-defense in cases where such acts were not attributable to this latter state (Focarelli 2015). Moreover, states have consistently asserted the right to respond forcibly to such attacks over many years (Cassese 2001; Moir 2010; Ruys and Verhoeven 2005). For example, the international community characterized the 9/11 attacks by Al Qaeda on the United States as an armed attack triggering the inherent right of self-defense following which, the US congress authorized the President to use all necessary and appropriate force against organizations, or persons he determines either planned, authorized, committed, or aided the terrorist attacks that occurred on September 11, 2001, or states that harbored such organizations or persons (US AUMF 2001). A more recent example is that of the Israeli-Lebanese War in 2006 where most states apparently accepted Israel's contention that self-defense against Hezbollah was permitted, at least when the territorial state proves unable to prevent the attacks and even asks for assistance from the international community, although proportionality was highly questioned (Schmitt 2014a, b; Kammerhofer 2007).

The US operation in Afghanistan mainly targeting Al Qaeda, signaled the beginning of the emerging consensus that considers use of force specifically targeting non-state terrorist actors in response to armed attacks they launch from foreign territory, as a legitimate exercise of the right of self-defense (Trapp 2015). The shift was further reiterated with the approval of Resolution 1368 (2001) and Resolution 1373 (2001) where the UN Security Council affirmed the inherent right to self-defense without specifying whether the source of the armed attack had to be a state (UN SC Res. 1368 2001, UN SC Res. 1373 2001). Some argue that by now, it is reasonably clear and accepted that states enjoy a right to self-defense against attacks by non-state actors (Bethlehem 2012), a view adopted by a number of states led by the US example even with regard to cyberattacks (US DoD 2015). This is also the view supported by the majority of the International Group of Experts in the Tallinn Manual who concluded that state practice has established a right of self-defense in the face of cyber operations at the armed attack level by non-state actors acting without the involvement of a state, such as terrorist or rebel groups (Tallinn Manual 2.0).

As far as the classification of conflict, it should be noted that per the traditional view, the law of armed conflict has been limited to the territory and national airspace of the state in which the conflict is taking place. However, as the concept of self-defense being a legitimate resort against non-state actors residing in the territory of another state evolved, the differentiation between international and internal armed conflict became more blurred.

Some states and commentators now take the view that when defining the type of conflict the determinant factor is the status of the actors and not geography the example of the US conflict with Al-Qaeda shows that a non-international armed conflict may extend beyond the territorial borders of one state (Koh 2010). The use of cyberspace to launch armed attacks by non-state actors residing outside the territory of the target state, raises numerous complex issues regarding the geographical scope of the non-international armed conflict. Even in the context of cyberspace, the characterization of an armed conflict as international has been preserved for whenever there are hostilities which may include or be limited to cyber operations between two or more states, whereas a conflict is characterized as non-international whenever there is protracted armed violence which may include or be limited to cyber operations occurring between governmental armed forces and organized armed groups, or between such groups, under the condition that the confrontation reaches a certain minimum level of intensity and that parties have a minimum degree of organization. However the fact that the attack is conducted from outside the territory of the targeted state party to the conflict does not in itself make it an international conflict (Tallinn Manual 2.0).

While the arguments above focused partially on the definition of armed attack that would give rise to self-defense, it should be emphasized that the existence of an armed conflict goes beyond a one sole attack and requires that certain other preconditions be met such as the intensity of the hostilities and the degree of organization of the parties. These factors are particularly important in determining the existence of a non-international armed conflict using cyber means. In the Tadic case, the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia held that the intensity of hostilities and the degree of organization of the parties are crucial factors; thus a non-international armed conflict exists when there is extended and organized armed violence between armed groups within a state (Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic 1999). As such, the first requirement is met in case of reoccurring attacks for an extended duration and of the required severity, whereas with regard to the second requirement, it is considered that a group is “armed” if it has the capacity of undertaking cyberattacks and meets the requirement of “organized” if it is under an established command structure and can conduct sustained military operations, though the extent of organization does not have to reach the level of a conventional militarily disciplined unit (Prosecutor v. Limaj 2005). This requirement differentiates between two categories of non-state actors, the sporadic groups or entities, who may be acting together at a time but do not work under a degree of command and control and thus would fail to meet the threshold of organization, and organized armed groups. Consequentially, the law of armed conflict distinguishes between the two groups as regards the rights and responsibilities during an armed conflict. Schmitt argues that this classification will be further complicated in the future firstly because cyberattacks have potential to cause massive disruptions to essential providers without causing physical damage and secondly because these attacks can be launched by groups organized entirely online and not in control of physical territory or even by individuals with the required capacities (2013). As such there are already challenges on the application of the law of armed conflict to non-international cyber warfare, some of which are addressed below.

Challenges in Applying LOAC to Non-international Cyber Warfare

As elaborated above the development and the use of the new cyber capabilities to trigger or during armed conflict have posed many challenges to states and scholars. Difficulties in identification and attribution of cyberattacks create challenges particularly when applying LOAC rules to cyber warfare, which is also what makes them particularly relevant in the context of cyberspace. These rules are based on the cardinal principle of distinction which requires that the belligerents distinguish at all times between civilian population as protected category and the legitimate targets such as combatants, as well as distinguish between civilian infrastructure and military objectives (ICRC 2019).

The Tallinn Manual reaffirmed clearly that lawful targets of a cyberattack may be “(a) members of the armed forces; (b) members of organized armed groups; (c) civilians, if and for such time as they take a direct part in hostilities; and (d) in an international armed conflict, participants in a levee en masse” (Tallinn Manual 2.0). Therefore, members of the armed groups who are party to a conflict would be legitimate targets since they fall within the definition of military objectives (Additional Protocol I), though this principle limits membership in organized armed groups to those individuals with “continuous combat functions” (ICRC 2009). The status of other individuals who are not members of the armed groups is dependent on the fact if they participated in the conduct of hostilities, as in principle these individuals are protected by civilian immunity; however, civilians lose their immunity if they participate directly in hostilities (Additional Protocol I). Therefore, in the cyberspace context as well, “civilians are not prohibited from directly participating in cyber operations amounting to hostilities, but forfeit their protection from attacks for such time as they so participate”; they do however retain their civilian status even if they engage in hostilities (Tallinn Manual 2.0). For this purpose, the principle of distinction which requires the parties to the conflict at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants, in both international and non-international armed conflict (Additional Protocol I), is essential in the context of cyberspace. The International Group of Experts agreed that this obligation also requires the parties to distinguish between military objectives and civilian objects despite the fact that Article 13 of Additional Protocol II was originally not meant to extend to civilian objects (ICRC 2015).

Nevertheless while the law is clear, applying these rules in practice is extremely difficult more so due to the fact that this requires not only accurate identification of the actors behind the attacks but also the technical attribution of such attack (Buchan 2016). This is made difficult due to the manner on which the system is designed through TCP/IP protocols and separate delivery of data packets which make it extremely difficult to provide identification for the individual packets (Messerschmidt 2013). The application of the principle of distinction is made even more difficult due to the use of different anonymizing techniques such as Virtual Private Networks (VPNs), Onion Routers or Botnets where the attackers can hack into and corrupt hundreds of computers of civilian individuals around the world and use those computers to conduct the attacks during the hostilities. Under these circumstances in absence of clear visual signs, it would be extremely difficult to distinguish between actors that are participating in hostilities and thus legitimate targets as indicated above and civilians whose computers have been hijacked and used maliciously by organized groups and cannot be subject to attacks under the LOAC rules. As such the use of cyber capabilities that would aim to disable these Botnets and would potentially result in damage to the civilian infrastructure could also be considered to fall within the prohibition of not using weapons that are indiscriminate in nature (ICRC 2019). Moreover during military operations, it is imperative that all measures are undertaken to protect the civilian populations, to avoid or minimize the incidental harm, or disproportionate attacks which may result in the incidental loss of life or the destruction of the objects and infrastructure that is essential for the survival of the population (ICRC 2019).

Similarly, there are several applicable rules under LOAC that may impose difficulties in their application on the cyber context. One of the most challenging rules to this date has been the prohibition of acts of violence whose primary purpose is to spread terror among the civilian population (Additional Protocol I). The use of the Internet has amplified the possibilities of such news or threats reaching thousands if not millions of people with a click of a button. Social media companies are struggling with taking down content that aims to spread terror or promote violence among their users.

In addition one of the questions that has been a subject of discussion is the involvement of private contractors. The International Group of Experts in Tallinn Manual agreed that individual contractors are civilians who may only be targeted based on their direct participation in the hostilities (Tallinn Manual 2.0). There are disagreements whether the contracted private company qualifies as an organized group belonging to a party (ICRC 2009), due to the view the contractual relationship would not be seen as a sufficient basis for regarding the company as belonging to a party; however, those members of the company directly participating in the hostilities may be attacked (Tallinn Manual 2.0). The applicable criteria for qualification of an act as direct participation that are set forth in the ICRC Interpretive Guidance are considered to be applicable in cyberspace as well (ICRC 2009). Nevertheless, a state that sponsors use of force by civilians may be placing those civilians outside the protections they enjoy under the law of armed conflict and may be undermining the principle of distinction between combatants and civilians (US Armed Force, 2010, Garamone 2016). Despite the legal consequences, there are many reasons to think states will be tempted to use civilians in the cyber context. First, civilians may possess technical expertise that governments do not. Second, by using civilians to carry out cyberattacks, states can mask their own involvement (Hathaway 2012). To date, more than once, states have enacted legislation empowering private security companies in the physical world to provide armed services (Ginkel, B. et. 2013). Security is thus – once more – no longer the exclusive domain of state actors (Ducheine). It does seem however that non-state actors continue to have more rights under the ius in bello regime.

Summary

Despite the initial confusion among scholars and states, there is no doubt that the traditional concepts of ius ad bellum and ius in bello still govern the use of force and armed conflict regardless of the changes on the capabilities and means by which operations are conducted. As it has been elaborated above, the traditional concepts of international and non-international armed conflict apply in principle despite the need for more sophisticated interpretations to accommodate for the developments in the world of technology. Nevertheless there are issues with regard to the manner on how some norms apply to the new cyber domains that have sparked controversy among scholars such as the threshold that a cyberattack must reach to amount to an armed attack or the questions surrounding the mounting of armed attacks by non-state actors and the classification of conflict therein. As such while a lot of work has been done, there is yet extensive work to be done to clarify how these norms are applied in the cyberspace context or to adjust the norms in light of the technological developments if it is deemed necessary.

References

- Antolin-Jenkins, V. M. (2005). Defining the parameters of cyberwar operations: Looking for law in all the wrong places? Naval Law Review Naval Law Review, 5, 132–166.
- Banks, W. (2013). The role of counter terrorism law in shaping ad bellum norms for cyber warfare. International Law Studies, 89, 157.
- Bethlehem, D. (2012) ‘Self-defence against an imminent or actual armed attack by non-state actors’, 106 Am. J. Int’l L. 770,
- Buchan, R. (2016). Cyberspace, non-state actors and the obligation to prevent transboundary harm. Journal of Conflict & Security Law, 21(3), 429–453. At 430.
- Cassese, A. (2001). Terrorism is also disrupting some crucial legal categories of international law. European Journal of International Law, 12(5), 993–1001, at 195–8.
- Couzigou, I. (2018). Securing cyber space: The obligation of states to prevent harmful international cyber operations. International Review of Law, Computers & Technology, 32(1), 37–57.
- Dev, P. R. (2015). “Use of force” and “Armed attack” thresholds in cyber conflict: The looming definitional gaps and the growing need for formal U.N. response. Texas International Law Journal, 50(2), 379–399.
- Duchene, P. (2015). The notion of cyber operations. In N. Tsagourias & R. Buchanan (Eds.), Research handbook on international law and cyberspace. Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- Focarelli, C. (2015). Self-defence in cyberspace. In N. Tsagourias & R. Buchanan (Eds.), Research handbook on international law and cyberspace (p. 255). Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- Garamone, J. (2016). Official details DOD cybersecurity environment, AM. Forces Press Serv. (Oct. 20, 2010). Retrieved from: <https://dod.defense.gov/News/Article/Article/810009/us-militarys-cyber-capabilities-provide-strength-challenges-official-says/>. Accessed 10 Dec 2018. See DoD Strategy, supra note 17.
- Ginkel, B., et al. (Eds.). (2013). State or private protection against maritime piracy? A Dutch perspective. The Hague: Clingendael Centre for International Relations.
- Graham, M. (2011) ‘Time machines and virtual portals: The spatialities of the digital divide’, Progress in Development Studies 11(3):211–27
- Hathaway, O. A., et al. (2012). The law of cyber-attack. California Law Review, 100(4), 817–885. <https://doi.org/10.15779/Z38CR6N>.
- Henriksen, A. (2015). Lawful state responses to low-level cyber-attacks. Nordic Journal of International Law, 84, 323, at 324.
- ICRC. (2009). Interpretive guidance on the notion of direct participation in hostilities under international humanitarian law. Retrieved from <https://www.refworld.org/docid/4a670dec2.html>
- ICRC. (2015). International humanitarian law and the challenges of contemporary armed conflicts (Report at 18–19; ICRC, (2016)). Commentary on the First Geneva Convention.
- ICRC (2019) International humanitarian law and cyber operations during armed conflicts. <https://www.icrc.org/en/document/international-humanitarian-law-and-cyber-operations-during-armed-conflicts>
- Kammerhofer, J. (2007). The armed activities case and non-state actors in self-defence law. Leiden Journal of International Law, 20, 89.
- Koh, H. H. (2010). The Obama administration and international law. Address at the annual meeting of the American Society of International Law.
- Kulesza, J. (2009). State responsibility for cyber-attacks on international peace and security. Polish Yearbook of International Law, 29, 139–152.
- Legal consequences of the construction of a wall in the occupied Palestinian Territory*. Advisory Opinion, I. C. J. Reports 2004, p. 136.
- Lin, H. S. (2010). Offensive cyber operations and the use of force. Journal National Security Law & Policy, 4, 64.
- Messerschmidt, J. E. (2013). Hackback: Permitting retaliatory hacking by non-state actors as proportionate countermeasures to transboundary. Columbia Journal of Transnational Law, 52, 275–324.
- Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America). Merits, Judgment. I.C.J. Reports 1986, p. 14.
- Moir, L. (2010). Reappraising the resort to force: International law, jus ad bellum and the war on terror (pp. 25–31). Oxford: Hart Publishing.
- NATO. Statement by the North Atlantic Council (12 September 2001). Retrieved from <https://www.nato.int/docu/pr/2001/p01-124e.htm>. Accessed 20 Dec 2018.
- Nuclear Weapons Advisory Opinion (1996) Legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons. Advisory Opinion, I. C.J. Reports 1996, p. 226.
- Oppenheim, L. (1906). II international law: A treatise 56.

- Pri Metrica. The submarine cable map. Retrieved from <http://www.submarinecablemap.com>. Accessed 4 Dec 2018.
- Prosecutor v. Dusko Tadic (Appeal Judgement)*. IT-94-1-A. International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), 15 July 1999.
- Prosecutor v. Limaj et al. (Trial Judgment)*, IT-03-66-T. International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), 30 November 2005.
- Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I), 8 June 1977 Arts 48 and 52(2).
- Roberts, S. (2014). Cyber wars: Applying conventional laws to war to cyber warfare and non-state actors. Northern Kentucky Law Review, 41(3), 535–572. <https://doi.org/10.1525/sp.2007.54.1.23>.
- Roscini, M. (2010). Worldwide warfare: Jus ad bellum and the use of cyber force. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 14, 85–130.
- Roscini, M. (2015). Cyber operations as a use of force. In N. Tsagourias & R. Buchanan (Eds.), Research handbook on international law and cyberspace (pp. 233–255). Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- Ruys, T., & Verhoeven, S. (2005). Attacks by private actors and the right of self-defense. Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 289, 292–296.
- Schaap, A. J. (2009). Cyber warfare operations: Development and use under international law. Air Force Law Review, 64, 121–134.
- Schmitt, M. N. (2013). Classification of cyber conflict. International Law Studies Series. US Naval War College, 89, 233–251. 237.
- Schmitt, M. N. (2014a). ‘Below the threshold’ cyber operations: The countermeasures response option and international law. Virginia Journal of International Law, 54, 697.
- Schmitt, M. N. (2014b). The law of cyber warfare: Quo Vadis. Stanford Law & Policy Review, 25, 269.
- Schmitt, M. N. (2017). Peacetime cyber responses and wartime cyber operations under international law: An analytical Vade Mecum. Harvard National Security Journal, 8, 242.
- Schreier, F. (2015). On cyberwarfare (pp. 10–14). Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces. Retrieved from <https://www.dcaf.ch/sites/default/files/publications/documents/OnCyberwarfare-Sc hreier.pdf>. Accessed 19 Dec 2018.
- Simma, B., et al. (Eds.). (2013). The charter of the United Nations: A commentary. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Tallinn Manual 2.0 (2017) On the International law applicable to cyber operations. Second edition. Prepared by the international group of experts at the invitation of the NATO cooperative cyber defence centre of excellence. Cambridge: Cambridge University
- Tikk E. et al. (2010) International Cyber Incidents: Legal Considerations, Tallin: NATO CCD COE. pp. 66–89. <https://ccdcoe.org/publications/books/legalconsiderations.pdf>
- Trapp, K. N. (2015). Can non-state actors mount an armed attack. In M. Weller (Ed.), The Oxford handbook of the use of force in international law. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- U.S. Armed Force. (2010). Cyberspace operations: Air force doctrine document 3–12. Retrieved from <http://www.fas.org/irp/doddir/usafafdd3-12.pdf>
- US Department of Defense (US DoD) (2015). Office of the General Counsel, Law of War Manual [DoD manual], para. 16.3.3. Last updated Dec 2016. Retrieved from <https://dod.defense.gov/Portals/1/Documents/pubs/DoD%20Law%20of%20War%20Manual%20-%20June%202015%20Updated%20Dec%202016.pdf?ver=2016-12-13-172036-190>
- UK Ministry of Defence. (2010). The manual of law of armed conflict. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- UN SC Res 1368, Threats to international peace and security caused by terrorist acts. UN Doc. S/RES/1368 (12 September 2001).
- UN SC Res. 1373, UN Doc. S/RES/1373 (28 September 2001).
- United Nations. Charter of the United Nations, 24 October 1945. 1 UNTS XVI. Retrieved from <https://www.refworld.org/docid/3ae6b3930.html>. Accessed: 20 Dec 2018.
- United States Congress, Authorization for Use of Military Force. 50 USC 1541 note.115 STAT. 224 PUBLIC LAW 107–40—SEPT. 18, 2001.
- US Department of Defense (US DoD). (2010) Joint Chiefs of Staff, Joint Publication 1-02, Dictionary of Military & Associated Terms 64 (Nov. 8, 2010). Retrieved from http://www.dtic.mil/doctrine/jel/new_pubs/jp1_02.pdf

Cyber Warfare

► Cyber Conflict

Cypriot Women in Peacebuilding

► Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

Cyprus UNSCR 1325

► Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

D

Dance

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation

DDR

- ▶ Police Reform and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

De Facto State

- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict

Dealing with the Past

- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

Decentralization and Conflict Prevention

Evrin Tan
KU Leuven Public Governance Institute, Leuven, Belgium

Synonyms

Ethnofederalism; Fiscal decentralization; Political decentralization; Secessionism

Definition

Decentralization commonly refers to the release of power and authority from central government to lower tiers of government to make them administratively and financially less dependent on the central government. Decentralization can take up fiscal, administrative, and political forms, it could be arranged symmetrically or asymmetrically at subnational level, and it can occur both in federal and non-federal states. Decentralization is widely endorsed by international organizations and policymakers to mitigate inter-ethnic conflicts and secessionist movements. The idea is that by giving groups and regional authorities the control over their own political, social, and economic affairs, it is possible to undercut the conditions cultivating ethnic conflicts and secessionist tendencies. However, the theoretical and empirical studies fall short to verify if decentralization can indeed prevent conflicts. While some scholars argue that political decentralization or ethnofederalism can prevent conflicts and secessionist challenges, others argue that political decentralization can exacerbate such challenges. The mechanism between decentralization and conflict prevention is complex, and there remains many unknown in this relationship.

Introduction

Decentralization is widely endorsed by international organizations and policymakers to mitigate interethnic conflicts and secessionist movements. The idea is that by giving groups and regional authorities the control over their own political, social, and economic affairs, it is possible to undercut the conditions cultivating ethnic conflicts and secessionist tendencies (Rode et al. 2018; Cederman et al. 2015; Tranchant 2011; Sorens 2009; Brancati 2006; Lustick et al. 2004; Gurr 2000; Kaufman 1996; Lijphart 1996). In particular, political decentralization – the form of decentralization that grants decision-making autonomy to subnational groups and administrations – has been the primary objective of international missions in post-conflict countries such as Bosnia, Kosovo, and Iraq to create the conditions of peaceful transition.

However, a growing body of scholarly work contrarily argue that political decentralization intensifies ethnic conflicts and secessionism by empowering ethnic identities (Kymlicka 1998; Hardgrave 1994; Dikshit 1975), by producing discriminating legislations against ethnically and religiously identified minority groups (Suberu 1994; Lijphart et al. 1993; Horowitz 1991; Nordlinger 1972), and by supplying groups at the regional level with the resources to sustain and even to amplify the ethnic conflicts and secessionist efforts (Jenne et al. 2007; Snyder 2000; Bunce 1999; Leff 1999; Kymlicka 1998; Roeder 1991).

We can find empirical evidence to support both arguments. While political decentralization in Belgium, India, the UK, and Spain has been largely successful in preventing ethnic conflicts and perhaps lessening secessionist tendencies, in countries such as Nigeria, Iraq, Indonesia, and former Yugoslavia, political decentralization enhanced – if not led to – increased ethnic conflicts, secession, and dissolution (Brancati 2006).

The varying outcomes suggest that some underlying factors may be conditional on the success of decentralization policies in conflict prevention. Bermeo (2002) argues that political decentralization works best in wealthy countries, whereas the work of Saideman et al. (2002) suggests that political decentralization is more efficient in autocracies than in democracies. Among democratic countries, Brancati (2006) found that political decentralization does decrease the ethnic conflict and secessionism, but its effects can be undermined by the presence of regional parties. By the same token, Tranchant (2011) argue that decentralization can have a significant impact on reducing ethnic conflicts, but its impact is conditional on the nature and composition of ethnic groups in a specific region. Focusing on the institutional structure of decentralization, Rode et al. (2018) take these arguments further and suggest that more fiscally autonomous regions are indeed more likely to vote for secessionist parties, but their secessionist tendencies are highly dependent on whether fiscal decentralization across regions is based on symmetric or asymmetric arrangements.

It is clear that the mechanism between decentralization and conflict prevention is complex and there remains many unknown in this relationship. Therefore, the aim of this entry is not to explain why decentralization has been successful in preventing conflicts in some countries and not in others but to unpack the core conceptual and theoretical underpinnings that relay decentralization to conflict prevention. Building on the theories of decentralization and empirical evidence from country cases, the following section will address the questions of “how can decentralization prevent conflicts?”, “what do we know about the impact of decentralization on conflict prevention?”, and “which factors are important to estimate the impact of decentralization in preventing conflicts?”

Pathways to Conflict Prevention Through Decentralization

Decentralization commonly refers to the release of power and authority from central government to lower tiers of government to make them administratively and financially less dependent on the central government. Political decentralization, meanwhile, signifies empowering citizens and/or their elected representatives in public decision-making. Political decentralization is often linked to federalism, but it is not exclusive for federal systems. When we look into the empirical cases, three factors appear to be highly relevant in the presumed relationship between decentralization and conflict prevention. These are (1) economic development, (2) accommodation of minority identities, and (3) the institutions of decentralization. Each of these arguments will be further elaborated below.

Economic Development

Economic development has been found as crucial in secessionist demands (Rode et al. 2018; Grossman and Lewis 2014; Sambanis and Milanovic 2014; Sorens 2012; Collier and Hoeffler 2006). Several authors note that economic development may reduce ethnic conflict (Miguel et al. 2004; Fearon and Laitin 2003; Lipset 1963); it can increase the capacity of state to suppress insurgencies (Fearon and Laitin 2003); it can also improve education and social welfare and thus make citizens less susceptible to follow extremist ideologies (Lipset 1963). However, if economic development is uneven across regions and groups, it may increase ethnic conflict and secessionism (Brancati 2006; Anderson 1983; Gellner 1983). The wealthy regions can demand secession to fight against unjust taxation or to reach an equitable tax treatment (Buchanan and Faith 1987). Differences in terms of access and control to natural resources can also affect the attitude toward secessionism (Gehring and Schneider 2016; Sorens 2012; Collier and Hoeffler 2006). In regions with more control over natural resources, citizens' support toward secessionism might increase (Gehring and Schneider 2016).

Hence, controlling the national and subnational economic development appears to be a crucial condition to implement decentralization as a conflict prevention tool. Nonetheless, decentralization itself might have a heterogenous effect on the level of economic development. The empirical studies about the impact of decentralization on economic growth are divided into two groups in terms of their findings. The first group (see Akai and Sakata 2002; Thiessen 2003; Stansel 2005; Iimi 2005) verifies that decentralization has a statistically significant positive impact on economic growth. The second group (see Woller and Phillips 1998; Davoodi and Zou 1998; Zhang and Zou 1998; Xie et al. 1999; Jin and Zou 2005; Baskaran and Feld 2009; Rodriguez-Pose and Ezcurra 2011), on the contrary, rejects the impact of decentralization on economic growth with findings either statistically insignificant or negative under certain conditions. Contradictory outcomes also rest upon the differences in theoretical approaches and methodological designs. On the contrary, several authors argue that the success of decentralization is conditional on the economic development of subnational territories rather than the other way around (Tan 2019; Alonso and Andrews 2019; Lessman 2012). These groups of scholars argue that a certain level of socioeconomic development is imperative for the effective implementation of decentralization policies.

Accommodation of Minority Identities

Ethnic conflicts and secessionist movements can also be stemmed from conflicts over identity and interest, and granting decision-making power to ethnic minorities in a territorially defined area might provide a viable solution (Rode et al. 2018). Accommodation strategies toward secessionist challenges by granting autonomy over fiscal and political decisions can reduce territorially demarcated ethnic conflicts (Bermeo 2002; Horowitz 1985). Such conflicts might be mitigated if minority groups can pass the legislation to protect their identities and cultural heritage and have more control over linguistic and educational policies (Erk and Anderson 2009; Brancati 2006). Bermeo (2002) even highlights that no violent separatist movement has ever succeeded in a federal democracy.

However, accommodation strategies could also signal weakness, reversing or mitigating the potential impact of decentralization on conflict prevention in multiple ways (Sorens 2009). First, Walter (2006) finds that governments that face multiple potential secessionist challenges are more likely to see the spread of secessionist challenges if they compromise with decentralization demands. Yet, an early decentralization before violence broke out might not create such a problem. Second, decentralization could empower indirectly the regional party systems and regional identities (Brancati 2006; Bunce 1999). Brancati (2006) found regional parties increase ethnic conflict and secessionism by reinforcing ethnic and regional identities, producing legislation that favors certain groups over others, and mobilizing groups to engage in ethnic conflict and secessionism. Third, the legislative and bureaucratic structures established by territorial self-governance or enhanced federalism can potentially be used to make secession a viable and legitimate political choice in the future (Rode et al. 2018). Fourth, decentralization does not reduce secession risk if regional minorities fear the central government will abrogate autonomy in the future (Lake and Rothchild 1996). Fifth, regional autonomy could improve the political and military capability of potential secessionist insurgents, encouraging the armed conflicts and secessionist mobilization (Sorens 2009).

In a study comparing the impact of decentralization strategies with or without the recognition of minority status, Basta (2018) found that when central government decentralizes power to minority regions without the recognition of minority national status, they pave the way to a less contentious political dynamic. In this case, support for secessionist parties may grow but remains less widespread in the alternative of decentralizing with symbolic recognition of the minority group. When the extension of territorial autonomy is combined with formal symbolic recognition, it paves the way to open political opposition by a segment of majority political community, rescinding autonomies or lowering the prospect of further decentralization (Sorens 2009), in turn, and stimulates secessionist sentiment among members of the minority community. On the contrary, Tranchant (2011) found that if a minority group has a local majority or concentrated in one region, it is efficiently deterred from using violence, whereas groups lacking a local majority are more likely to increase their initial levels of protest and rebellion in the case of decentralization.

Institutions of Decentralization

With institutions of decentralization, I refer to the sociopolitical organizations, norms, regulations, and operating procedures that shape the structures of decentralization. Several authors noted that the formation of these institutions can be crucial to understand the mechanism between decentralization and conflict prevention (Rode et al. 2018; Sorens 2016; Anderson 2015; Bakke 2015; Lecours 2011; Hale 2004; Anderson 2004).

One body of literature focuses on the impact of intergovernmental fiscal arrangement and fiscal federalism on mitigating secessionist conflicts (see Sorens 2012, 2016; Brancati 2006). The findings of these studies do not suggest that fiscal autonomy impacts the share of secessionist votes but countries with significant secessionist parties to be more likely to decentralize. Brancati (2006) reports that political and fiscal decentralization reduces the secessionist conflicts but empowers the voting base of the secessionist parties, whereas Sorens (2012) does not find any significant relationship between the fiscal devolution and electoral success of secessionist parties. In a later study, looking in the cases with a robust form of fiscal federalism, Sorens (2016) suggests that preventing secession through fiscal federalism may require fiscally deleterious institutions, which can hamstring regional tax collection and permit regional protectionism against goods and labor if challenged by secessionist policies.

Another way of looking at the institutions of decentralization is that whether decentralization is symmetrically or asymmetrically arranged at the subnational level. The former refers to a system where constituting units of a federal system or subnational regional units in a non-federal country have the same constitutional rights and obligations, whereas in the latter some special rights are granted for some subnational units. For instance, Spain is a quintessential case of asymmetric decentralization system in a non-federal state. According to McGarry (2007) and Benedikter (2007), asymmetric arrangements are highly effective to accommodate ethnic secessionist challenges. Lustick et al. (2004) confirm with a simulation study that secessionist challenges can effectively be mitigated by semiautonomous institutions. Sorens (2016) also suggests that selectively decentralizing certain political powers such as education, cultural policies, and environment can be used to mitigate regional secessionist movements.

However, some authors refused the idea of asymmetric decentralization as an effective accommodation strategy for secessionist challenges. Hale (2004) argues that asymmetrical arrangements along ethnic lines are particularly unstable if regions have a single dominant group and concentrated minority groups enjoy unusually high levels of autonomy. The models developed by Congleton (2006) and Zuber (2011) also show that communities with special fiscal autonomy can compete much more effectively than other regions creating a system that is politically unstable. Similarly, Rode et al. (2018) report that asymmetric territorial self-governance seems to cause much stronger incentives to vote for secessionist movements, while the association is small in fiscally more symmetric arrangements.

Last but not the least, the subnational polities in Europe are empowered with the EU integration process, and secessionism has taken a different meaning compared to other parts of the world (Bremberg 2020; Keating 2019; Bauböck 2019). Some scholars argued that the “post-sovereign” political system of the EU (Keating 2001) created the conditions of accommodating subnational identities and group interests under the supranational framework of the EU institutions. However, the cases with Scotland and Catalonia showed that EU institutions did not cease secessionist challenges. The studies show that support for Scottish and Catalan independence has increased throughout the years instead of decreasing (Bremberg 2020). Some authors suggest that the EU has made small states and as such as regional secessionism more “viable” because the EU provides a large market and a common currency as well as enhanced cooperation on foreign and security policy (Bremberg 2020; Laible 2008; Jolly 2007).

Nevertheless, the institutions of the EU have been less than anything but supportive secessionism when secessionism was put as a political strategy by Catalonia and Scotland. The former president of the European Commission, Romano Prodi, stated that any part of an EU member state that becomes an independent state would need to reapply for EU membership (Piris 2017). Given the veto rights of the member states on the EU membership applications, this creates secessionism as a largely unviable strategy. Some scholars have challenged the legal implications of the “Prodi doctrine” arguing if the European integration is treated as part of the federalist reading, then secessionism should be understood “as a move to change the status or affiliation of a territory within a wider constellation of polities” (Bauböck 2019). However, the former European Commission presidents, José Manuel Barroso and Jean-Claude Juncker, have stated on numerous occasions that the “Prodi doctrine” still applies (Bremberg 2020).

Summary

Anderson (2015) states that ethnofederal systems have failed in contexts where no institutional alternatives could possibly have succeeded and, in the majority of cases, ethnofederalism has succeeded where other institutional forms have demonstrably failed. The literature shows that decentralization can prevent violent conflicts, but it is difficult to argue that decentralization puts an end to the secessionist challenges. Decentralization, especially decentralization through ethnic ascriptions, often evolves with the centripetal forces of dissolution even if it can cease hot conflicts. Empirical and theoretical studies shed light on some factors which can help us to better understand the underlying mechanics of the relationship. In this entry, three salient factors, economic development, accommodation of minority identities, and the role of institutions, have been elaborated. However, the current research is far from elucidating this complex relationship, and more empirical research is needed to confirm or reject theoretical expectations.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination

References

- Akai, N., & Sakata, M. (2002). Fiscal decentralization contributes to economic growth: Evidence from state-level cross-section data for the United States. Journal of Urban Economics, 52(1), 93–108.
- Alonso, J. M., & Andrews, R. (2019). Fiscal decentralization and local government efficiency: Does relative deprivation matter? Environment and Planning C: Politics and Space, 37(2), 360–381.
- Anderson, B. (1983). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism. London: Verso.
- Anderson, L. M. (2004). The institutional basis of secessionist politics: Federalism and secession in the United States. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 34(2), 1–18.
- Anderson, L. (2015). Ethnofederalism and the management of ethnic conflict: Assessing the alternatives. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 46(1), 1–24.
- Bakke, K. M. (2015). Decentralization and intrastate struggles. Chechnya, Punjab, and Quebec. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Baskaran, T., & Feld, L. P. (2009). Fiscal decentralization and economic growth in OECD countries: Is there a relationship? (CESifo working paper series no. 2721). Munich: Center for Economic Studies.
- Basta, K. (2018). The state between minority and majority nationalisms: Decentralization, symbolic recognition, and secessionist crisis in Spain and Canada. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 48(1), 51–75.
- Bauböck, R. (2019). A multilevel theory of democratic secession. Ethnopolitics, 18(3), 227–246.
- Benedikter, T. (2007). The world's working regional autonomies. London: Anthem Press.
- Bermeo, N. (2002). The import of institutions. Journal of Democracy, 13(2), 96–110.
- Brancati, D. (2006). Decentralization: Fueling the fire or dampening the flames of ethnic conflict and secession? International Organization, 60(3), 651–658.
- Bremberg, N. (2020). The dream of the nation-state: Is regional secessionism a threat to European integration? In A. Bakardjieva Engelbrekt et al. (Eds.), The European Union and the return of the nation-state (pp. 241–267). Cham: Springer.
- Buchanan, J. M., & Faith, R. L. (1987). Secession and the limits of taxation: Toward a theory of internal exit. The American Economic Review, 77(5), 1023–1031.
- Bunce, V. (1999). Subversive institutions. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Cederman, L., Simon, H., Andreas, S., & Wucherpfennig, J. (2015). Territorial autonomy in the shadow of conflict: Too little, too late? American Political Science Review, 109(2), 354–370.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2006). The political economy of secession. In H. Hannum & E. F. Babbitt (Eds.), Negotiating self-determination (pp. 37–59). Lanham: Lexington Books.
- Congleton, R. D. (2006). Asymmetric federalism and the political economy of decentralization. In E. Ahmad & G. Brosio (Eds.), Handbook of fiscal federalism (pp. 131–153). Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
- Davoodi, H., & Zou, H.-F. (1998). Fiscal decentralization and economic growth: A cross-country study. Journal of Urban Economics, 43(2), 244–257.
- Dikshit, R. D. (1975). The political geography of federalism: An inquiry into the origins and stability. Delhi: Macmillan of India.
- Erk, J., & Anderson, L. M. (2009). The paradox of federalism: Does self-rule accommodate or exacerbate ethnic divisions? Regional and Federal Studies, 19(2), 191–202.
- Fearon, J., & Laitin, D. (2003). Ethnicity, Insurgency, and Civil War. American Political Science Review, 97(1), 75–90.
- Gehring, K., & Schneider, S. A. (2016). Regional resources and democratic secessionism. Working Paper, University of Zurich.
- Gellner, E. (1983). Nations and nationalism. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Grossman, G., & Lewis, J. I. (2014). Administrative unit proliferation. American Political Science Review, 108(1), 196–217.
- Gurr, T. R. (2000). Peoples versus states: Minorities at risk in the new century. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Hale, H. E. (2004). Divided we stand. Institutional sources of ethnofederal state survival and collapse. World Politics, 52(2), 165–193.
- Hardgrave, R., Jr. (1994). India: The dilemmas of diversity. In L. Diamond & M. F. Plattner (Eds.), Nationalism, ethnic conflict and democracy (pp. 71–85). Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Horowitz, D. L. (1985). Ethnic groups in conflict. Berkeley: University of California Press.

- Horowitz, D. L. (1991). A democratic South Africa? Constitutional engineering in a divided society. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Iimi, A. (2005). Decentralization and economic growth revisited: An empirical note. Journal of Urban Economics, 57(3), 449–461.
- Jenne, E. K., Saideman, S. M., & Lowe, W. (2007). Separatism as bargaining posture: The role of leverage in minority radicalization. Journal of Peace Research, 44(5), 52–558.
- Jin, J., & Zou, H. (2005). Fiscal decentralization, revenue and expenditure assignments, and growth in China. Journal of Asian Economics, 16(6), 1047–1064.
- Jolly, S. (2007). The Europhile fringe? Regionalist party support for European integration. European Union Politics, 8(1), 109–130.
- Kaufman, C. (1996). Possible and impossible solutions to ethnic civil wars. International Security, 20(4), 133–175.
- Keating, M. (2001). Plurinational democracy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Keating, M. (2019). Is a Theory of Self-determination Possible?. Ethnopolitics, 18(3), 315–323
- Kymlicka, W. (1998). Is federalism a viable alternative to secessionism? In P. B. Lehning (Ed.), Theories of secessionism (pp. 111–150). New York: Routledge Press.
- Laible, J. (2008). Separatism and sovereignty in the new Europe: Party politics and the meaning of statehood in a supranational context. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Lake, D., & Rothchild, D. (1996). Containing fear. International Security, 21(2), 41–75.
- Lecours, A. (2011). Sub-state nationalism in the western world: Explaining continued appeal. Ethnopolitics, 11(3), 268–286.
- Leff, C. S. (1999). Democratization and disintegration in multi-national states: The breakup of the communist federations. World Politics, 51(2), 205–235.
- Lessman, C. (2012). Regional inequality and decentralization: An empirical analysis. Environment and Planning A, 44, 1363–1388.
- Lijphart, A. (1996). Puzzle of Indian democracy. American Political Science Review, 90(2), 258–268.
- Lijphart, A., Rogowski, R., & Weaver, R. K. (1993). Separation of powers and cleavage management. In R. K. Weaver & B. A. Rockman (Eds.), Do institutions matter? (pp. 302–322). Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Lipset, S. M. (1963). Political man: The social bases of politics. New York: Anchor Books.
- Lustick, I. S., Miodownik, D., & Eidelson, R. J. (2004). Secessionism in multicultural states: Does sharing power prevent or encourage it? American Political Science Review, 98(2), 209–229.
- McGarry, J. (2007). Asymmetry in federations, federacies and unitary states. Ethnopolitics, 6(1), 105–116.
- Miguel, E., Satyanath, S., & Sergenti, E. (2004). Economic shocks and civil conflict: An instrumental variables approach. Journal of Political Economy, 112(4), 725–753.
- Nordlinger, E. (1972). Conflict regulation in divided societies. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Center for International Affairs.
- Piris, J.-C. (2017). Political and legal aspects of recent regional secessionist trends in some EU member states (I). In C. Cloa (Ed.), Secession from a member state and withdrawal from the European Union: Troubled membership (pp. 69–87). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rode, M., Pitlik, H., & Borrella Mas, M. A. (2018). Does fiscal federalism deter or spur secessionist movements? Empirical evidence from Europe. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 48(2), 161–190.
- Rodriguez-Pose, A., & Ezcurra, R. (2011). Is fiscal decentralization harmful for economic growth? Evidence from the OECD countries. Journal of Economic Geography, 11, 619–643.
- Roeder, P. G. (1991). Soviet federalism and ethnic mobilization. World Politics, 43(2), 196–232.
- Saideman, S. M., Lanoue, D., Campenni, M., & Stanton, S. (2002). Democratization, political institutions, and ethnic conflict: A pooled, cross-sectional time series analysis from 1985–1998. Comparative Political Studies, 35(1), 103–129.
- Sambanis, N., & Milanovic, B. (2014). Explaining regional autonomy differences in decentralized countries. Comparative Political Studies, 47(13), 1830–1855.
- Snyder, J. (2000). From voting to violence: Democratization and nationalist conflict. New York: W. W. Norton.
- Sorens, J. P. (2009). The partisan logic of decentralization in Europe. Regional & Federal Studies, 19(2), 255–227.
- Sorens, J. P. (2012). Secessionism. Montreal: McGill-Queen's University Press.
- Sorens, J. P. (2016). Secession risk and fiscal federalism. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 46(1), 25–50.
- Stansel, D. (2005). Local decentralisation and local economic growth: A cross-sectional examination of US metropolitan areas. Journal of Urban Economics, 57(1), 55–72.
- Suberu, R. T. (1994). The travails of federalism in Nigeria. In L. Diamond & M. F. Plattner (Eds.), Nationalism, ethnic conflict and democracy (pp. 56–70). Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Tan, E. (2019). Decentralization and governance capacity: The case of Turkey. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Thiessen, U. (2003). Fiscal decentralisation and economic growth in high-income OECD countries. Fiscal Studies, 24(3), 237–274.
- Tranchant, J.-P. (2011). Decentralization and ethnic conflict: The role of empowerment. Working paper, HAL.
- Walter, B. F. (2006). Building reputation: Why governments fight some separatists but not others. American Journal of Political Science, 50(2), 313–330.
- Woller, G. M., & Phillips, K. (1998). Fiscal decentralization and LDC econometric growth: An empirical investigation. Journal of Development Studies, 34(4), 139–148.

- Xie, D., Zou, H., & Davoodi, H. (1999). Fiscal decentralization and economic growth in the United States. Journal of Urban Economics, 45(2), 228–239.
- Zhang, T., & Zou, H. (1998). Fiscal decentralization, public spending, and economic growth. Journal of Public Economics, 67(2), 221–240.
- Zuber, C. I. (2011). Understanding the multinational game: Toward a theory of asymmetrical federalism. Comparative Political Studies, 44(5), 546–571.

Decolonisation

► International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace

Deconstruction in International Interventions

Vjosa Musliu
 Department of Political Science, Vrije
 Universiteit Brussel (VUB), Brussels, Belgium
 Conflict and Development Research Group,
 Ghent University, Ghent, Belgium

Synonyms

Humanitarian interventions; International interventions; Liberal interventionism; Military interventions; Western interventions

Definition

Deconstruction, or as Derrida calls it “intervention,” “de-totalizes self-enclosed totalities by placing them face to face with their internal differentiation” enabling us to see the partiality of the partial, to show that no absolute reading is possible (Derrida 2005). Even though Derrida himself never dealt with international interventions directly, this entry suggests how his works on deconstruction offer ways for a fundamental critique of international interventions. Concretely, four main ways to use deconstruction for a fundamental critique of international interventions are suggested.

Introduction

The early 1990s witnessed an increase in Western-led interventions deployed abroad by the EU, the UN, the USA, and other international organizations making interventions and international missions the iconic model to end intra- and interstate wars, regime/system changes, ethnic and religious conflicts, etc. Interventions for democracy promotion and/or peacebuilding were spread among others to Namibia, Angola, Mozambique, Rwanda, Sierra Leone, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Guatemala, Cambodia, East Timor, and former Yugoslavia, under the paradigmatic Western-democratic project, focusing primarily on human rights, rule of law, and democracy. The nature, scope, and format of these interventions are still debated on grounds of motives, legitimacy, and geopolitics. The conflicts in Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, and Syria during the past two decades have made international interventions less of an obvious choice. For instance, whereas in 1994, the academic discourse has been adamant about a potential intervention in Somalia (1993) or Rwanda (1994), the academic discourse since the outbreak of the civil war in Syria (2011 onwards) has been adamant over nonintervention in Syria.

How do we explain international interventions with deconstruction? How do we make sense of a switch in narratives pro or against international interventions? This entry explains the notion of deconstruction as conceptualized by Jacques Derrida to analyze international interventions. The works of Derrida have dealt with matters that are inherently political including his critique to Western metaphysics (Derrida 1974), Western democracy (Derrida in Borradori 2003), and the role of Europe in the world (Derrida 1992). An Algerian Jew who developed his intellectual thinking in Paris, Derrida called himself a European philosopher, was genuinely interested in the European logos and wanted to leave a mark in European philosophy. One of the few cases, when Derrida engaged with international interventions, is when he cosigned a letter with Jürgen Habermas in 2003 pledging the nations of Europe to forge their European identity and to formulate a common foreign policy to serve as a counterweight to US global power (Habermas and Derrida 2003). Written in the wake of mass demonstrations around the world against the intervention in Iraq, both philosophers urged the European political community – including the EU – to take responsibility for global peace, international law and justice, and principles that seem to have been abandoned by the US government at that time. Central to this letter is the underlying message of the “responsibility” of the “European memory” that has to be the “locomotive” of change. Even though most of his works were written at a period when international interventions and discussions around them were central in Western/European political philosophy (1930–2004), Derrida is incidentally rather poor in his analysis related to international interventions. Nonetheless, as this entry will argue, deconstruction, as one of his most iconic works, has a lot of potential for a critical interrogation of international interventions.

Deconstruction

Deconstruction, or as Derrida calls it “intervention,” “de-totalizes self-enclosed totalities by placing them face to face with their internal differentiation” enabling us to see the partiality of the partial, to show that no absolute reading is possible (Derrida 2005). In his seminal work, Of Grammatology, Derrida mentions deconstruction not as a demolition but rather as a desegmentation of all significations. Deconstructing, he argues, is a two-step process: first, the reversal and displacement of binary opposites to uncover and interrogate the violent hierarchies imposed on both and second, the general displacement of the system by moving toward the irruptive emergence of a new “concept” – one that could never be included in the previous regime (Derrida 1972). These new concepts are what Derrida, in turn, calls undecidables: “faulty lines in an apparently impregnable text” or points at which the text disrupts itself (idem). The undecidables are never fully present or absent; they rather reside within. In other words, to deconstruct is to interrogate text: concepts, meanings, processes, and events to expose their inherent instability and erasure. The text, in turn, guides deconstruction through what it tries to hide and what it says and also through the symptoms it manifests (Derrida 2005).

A distinctive element in Derrida’s deconstruction is that in all conversations, there’s a hidden patterning of power. For Derrida, power is not the name of something we possess in and of itself; rather it emerges out of social situations. Granted, most poststructuralist works share the same tenet in that they interrogate, de-essentialize, and problematize power relations emanating from text. For instance, Michel Foucault’s genealogies examine historical practices and how power is exercised at various levels through their change and development (Foucault 2001). Jean Baudrillard insists on tracing and problematizing the negation of power in text and how the very negation or simulation of power is a form of power (Baudrillard 1994). What Derrida does with deconstruction is seeking out the binaries – inherent in text – and then overturning and displacing them by finding the “undecidables” that destabilize what seems a coherent text. To that end, Derrida’s deconstruction is a relentless quest for interrogating the partiality of the partial and the assumed common sense and expose their meanings to erasure. By text, Derrida does not only refer to the spoken or the written word. Text includes a wider array of discursive encounters including built space, architecture, body language, and arts, among others.

Deconstruction, along with other works of Derrida, was originally used in literary studies and gradually crept in into humanities and social sciences. Until the late 2000s, the works of Derrida were not a usual suspect in international relations. This constellation has however changed as deconstruction has been widely elaborated in IR (Weldes 1999; Zehfuss 2009; Vaughan-Williams 2015; Campbell 1998), EU foreign policy (Bulley 2009), and even EU external relations (Cebeci 2012; Musliu 2017; Fanoulis and Musliu 2018).

Because it is not a straightforward method, or a methodically defined analytical tool commonly found in political science and international relations, deconstruction has been described and delineated in different forms when used in social sciences. For instance, some insist that deconstruction is essentially political and that it is a method for uncovering the oppressed others beneath phallogocentric discourse (Phiddian 1997). In such optics, deconstruction is used as a hermeneutic of suspicion and as an instrument for unpicking the structures and rhetoric of racism, patriarchy, class, etc. Relatedly, scholars such as Ahn see deconstruction as an act of hospitality, which means the welcoming of the other both in a personal and public level – raising this way sociopolitical questions about refugees, immigrants, foreign languages, etc. (Ahn 2015). Others insist on deconstruction as a powerful conceptual tool for radical social and political critique (Dickens 1990).

Deconstructing International Interventions

This section underlines four main ways to critically analyze international interventions with and through deconstruction. The four are neither exhaustive nor chronological in any way. Rather, they should be read in conversation with one another.

One way is to interrogate the topic of inquiry. Critical in this case are the following questions: How do we delineate interventions? Are they tangible or concrete encounters like airstrikes, military, or humanitarian interventions? What about other non-tangible yet structural forms of interventions from “core” to “periphery”? By exposing “interventions” of its well-defined meaning and putting it under erasure, deconstruction urges us to think of interventions as a larger set of encounters, relations, and infrastructures of market, in addition to humanitarian and military operations, airstrike campaigns, responsibility to protect, embargoes, diplomatic or economic sanctions, structural funds and programs, or combinations of them. Relatedly, what makes interventions “international”? Is there a difference to the “internationality” of the UN, EU, and NATO interventions? Is there a difference between Western-led and international interventions, or are the two synonyms? Is there a difference to international interventions in Kosovo (1999), Iraq (2003), and Libya (2011)?

A second way is to interrogate the genealogy of international interventions. Etymologically, intervention implies an intentional encounter or contact to remedy a crisis. Presumably, after solving the problem, the intervener retreats, and the actors in question revert back to their original stage. Even though this may be the case for certain medical interventions, international interventions (be them economic, financial, military, or otherwise) tend not to be as straightforward. A central question, in this case becomes: when did the international intervention in Iraq in 2003 start? With deconstruction, we are urged to think of the previous interventions and noninterventions in the Middle East throughout history that rendered Iraq into a particular state that can be intervened in 2003 and then again in 2014. In other words, international interventions do not take place upon encounter; rather they are a result of a set of power relations constructed and maintained throughout time. At the same time, international interventions do not end – the intervener does not retreat – at the end of the encounter. Rather than being a separate act, an intervention is a continuation and/or an interruption in a trajectory of a set of relations.

Third and relatedly, intervention suggests an act that is technical, bureaucratic, and by extension, devoid of otherwise inherent ideological and/or political motivations. In the face of interethnic/religious conflicts, international interventions take place against a general pattern, but not against specific cases of conflict. As such, they are presented as historical. The practice of international interventions in and from democracies has indicated that interventions (military, civilian, financial, developmental, or else) come with a set of historical, political, ideological, and civilizational baggage. To that end, we should take the inherent baggage of international intervention as a starting point of an intellectual inquiry through which we should look at power relations, rather than finding in and of itself. For instance, deconstructing Western metaphysics and how they informed Western-led intervention in Kosovo (NATO, UN, and EU since 1999 onwards), it was argued how “democracy, rule of law, and human rights” have become the new holy trinity for Western structures to export around the world (Musliu 2017). In this case, the local Albanians and Serbs in Kosovo are first pathologized as intrinsically conflict-prone and thus unable and unfit to properly solve disputes. As a result, an intervention from a third party becomes not only legitimate but also imperative. Second and by extension, Kosovo is in turn objectified into an experiment site to test “best international and/or European practices” (Musliu 2017).

Finally, in order to critically understand international interventions one needs to unravel the relationship between the intervener and the intervened and the power relations emanating from them. Central in this point is Derrida’s take on deconstruction as a way to tackle binary opposites in Western metaphysics. For him, Western metaphysics are based on the binary opposites of good versus bad, rationality versus spirituality, nature versus culture, etc. These binaries do not have a peaceful coexistence. They are violent hierarchies wherein one always has supremacy over the other. The rhetoric around international interventions by its sponsors (both in policy and academia) is largely based on clear binaries: democracy versus dictatorship, rule of law and order versus chaos and anarchy, civilized versus uncivilized, and sustainable states versus weak states or failed states. In these binaries, the first terms are accorded primacy, whereas the second terms are represented as weaker. International interventions have been called upon, invoked and legitimized in order to transmit the first terms to areas and populations in need. To that end, in the trajectory of Western interventions abroad, we have seen calls to Christianize, civilize, develop, pacify, democratize, and Europeanize others. Areas of conflict – the intervened – have in turn been downgraded into structures in need for intervention.

Summary

Even though Derrida himself never dealt with international interventions directly, in this entry,

I suggested how his works on deconstruction offer ways for a fundamental critique of international interventions. First is interrogating the topic of inquiry and problematizing the nature of international interventions. Are they tangible or concrete encounters like military or humanitarian interventions? What about nonintervention or decisions not to intervene? Second is to interrogate the genealogy of an intervention. The task here is to trace the intervention beyond an official/ceremonial date and to unravel sets of relations and power dimensions that make an international intervention an intelligible act. A third way is to politicize and historicize an act of international intervention and unravel its seemingly technical and bureaucratic act that is contingent (primarily) to decisionmaking or hierarchies in international law. A final way is to problematize who becomes an intelligible intervener and how particular areas, hemispheres, or “peripheries” are rendered as sites for intervention.

Cross-References

- ▶ International Interventions
- ▶ Liberal Interventionism

References

- Ahn, Il-sup (2015). Deconstructing the DMZ: Derrida, Levinas and the phenomenology of peace. 45(2), 205–223.
- Baudrillard, J. (1994). Simulacra and simulation. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Borradori, G. (2003). Philosophy in a time of terror: Dialogues with Jürgen Habermas and Jacques Derrida (1st ed.). London: Routledge.
- Bulley, D. (2009). Ethics as foreign policy: Britain, the EU and the other (1st ed.). London: Routledge.
- Campbell, D. (1998). National deconstruction: Violence, identity and justice in Bosnia (1st ed.). Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Cebeci, M. (2012). European foreign policy research reconsidered: Constructing an ‘ideal power Europe’ through theory? Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 30(20), 563–583.
- Derrida, J. (1972). Positions. London: Chicago University Press.
- Derrida, J. (1974). Of grammatology. Baltimore: John Hopkins University Press.

- Derrida, J. (1992). The other heading: Reflections on today's Europe. Bloomington: Indiana University Press.
- Derrida, J. (2005). Paper machine (1st ed.). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Dickens, D. R. (1990). Deconstruction and Marxist inquiry. Sociological Perspectives, 33(1), 147–158.
- Fanoulis, E., & Musliu, V. (2018). Sovereignty a-venir: Towards a normative understanding of sovereignty. Global Society, 32(1), 70–87.
- Foucault, M. (2001). The order of things. An archaeology of the human sciences. London/New York: Routledge.
- Habermas, J., & Derrida, J. (2003). February 15, or what binds Europeans together: A plea for a common foreign policy, beginning in the core of Europe. Constellations, 10(3), 291.
- Musliu, V. (2017). Multi-ethnic democracy as an autoimmune practice: The case of international missions in Kosovo. British Journal of Politics and International Relations, 19(1), 188–201.
- Phiddian, R. (1997). Are parody and deconstruction secretly the same thing? New Literary History, 28(4), 673–696.
- Vaughan-Williams, Nick (2015). We are not animals!. Humanitarian border security and zoopolitical spaces in Europe. Political Geography, 45, 1–10.
- Weldes, J. (1999). Constructing national interests: The United States and the Cuban missile crisis. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Zehfuss, M. (2009). Jacques Derrida. In J. Edkins & N. Vaughan-Williams (Eds.), Critical theorists and international relations (pp. 137–150). London: Routledge.

Democratic Peace

► Liberal Peace in Peace Operations

Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans

Florian Bieber
Center for Southeast European Studies,
University of Graz, Graz, Austria

Definition

Democratization in the Western Balkans, the countries of former Yugoslavia (Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbia, Montenegro, Kosovo, and North Macedonia) and Albania followed the end of Communism in Central and Eastern Europe but were shaped by the dissolution of Yugoslavia and the absence of Soviet control in the region. Instead, fragile and contested states, and several wars and conflicts during the 1990s delayed and effected democracy across the region. Democracies are still fragile and exposed to fragile statehood, weak institutions, and authoritarianism.

Democracy, Southeastern Europe, former Yugoslavia, Postwar reconstruction, EU Integration

The End of Communism and Wars and Conflicts in the Western Balkans

The countries of former Yugoslavia and Albania have all been affected by varying degrees of conflict during the post-Communist period. The scale of violence and its impact varies, however, greatly. Slovenia only experienced a brief conflict with the Yugoslav army in June–July 1991, with limited effects on society and the institutions. North Macedonia saw an insurrection of the National Liberation Army, an Albanian group, against the state in 2001. The conflict, although not large in scale, re-shaped the institutions of the country and had a more significant impact on the democratization of the country. The civil war in Albania in 1997 was closely linked to collapse of state institutions. Whereas this conflict had no ethnic dimension, it has contributed to the enduring polarization of the political environment.

The most serious conflicts affected Bosnia and Herzegovina (1992–1995), Croatia (1991–1995), and Kosovo (1998–1995), all of which experienced large scale wars, including high death tolls, forced displacement, and war crimes. In particular in Kosovo and Bosnia and Herzegovina, the postwar institutions were the result of the war and the postconflict peace settlements. In Croatia, the war ended in 1995 with a victory of the Croatian army and a brief peaceful integration (until 1997) of Eastern Slavonia into the state. Serbia and Montenegro were subject to NATO aerial bombardment in 1999 and the armed forces, as well as paramilitary and police units, actively participated in the wars in Croatia, Bosnia, and Kosovo and committed serious war crimes in all wars. Serbia and Montenegro were also shaped by the experience of war, as the governments were involved in the war in Croatia and Bosnia and the Kosovo war directly affected both countries (the joint state ended in 2006 when Montenegro declared independence) (Baker 2015; Gagnon 2004).

The period between 1991 and 2001 was shaped by state collapse and war. Democratization during and prior to the conflict was severely curtailed by this context. While multiparty elections have been held in all the countries of former Yugoslavia since 1990 and in Albanian since 1991, during the 1990s, they were mostly not free and fair. Only Slovenia was able to hold fair and competitive elections. Otherwise, the parties that won the first elections in 1990 have been able to retain power for most of the decade. In Serbia and Montenegro, these were former branches of the Yugoslav League of Communists that became the Socialist Party of Serbia (SPS) of Slobodan Milošević and the Democratic Party of Socialists (DPS) in Montenegro, dominated by Milo Djukanović. They ruled with authoritarian control and on a nationalist platform. Similarly, in North Macedonia, the reformed Communists (SDSM) retained power until 1998, however without a strong nationalist agenda. In Bosnia and Herzegovina and Croatia, anti-Communist nationalist parties won elections, often incorporating Communist nomenclature and retaining power through a combination of nationalism and clientelism. The Croat Democratic Union (HDZ) dominated until 2000 in Croatia under the leadership of Franjo Tuđman (Dolenec 2013). Its sister party with the same name has dominated the Croat vote in Bosnia since. The other nationalist parties, the Muslim/Bosniak Party of Democratic Actions (SDA) of Alija Izetbegović and the Serb Democratic Party (SDS) with Radovan Karadžić as the most prominent figures, became the dominant parties within their relative community. The wars brought with them a considerable restriction of civil liberties and democracy. In Croatia and Serbia, the wars led to nationalist polarization, with government critics marginalized and described as traitors. Liberal and moderate opposition parties, such as the Democratic Party in Serbia or the Socialdemocratic Party (SDP) in Croatia, came under considerable pressure by the ruling party and the state. In Bosnia, the war reduced space for political pluralism. In particular the territories held by Bosnian Serb and Croat forces allowed for little political pluralism. In Kosovo, under tight Serbian control until 1999, the emerging Kosovo Albanian political parties, in particular the dominant Democratic League of Kosovo (LDK) led by Ibrahim Rugova, could only operate underground and boycotted all Serbian and Yugoslav elections in the 1990s. Albania experienced the emergence of a two-party system with the moderately reformed Communist party, renamed Socialist Party (SP), dominated by Fatos Nano, in power until 1992 and again after the civil war in 1997/8, and the center-right Democratic Party of Sali Berisha in power between 1992 and 1997, in an increasingly authoritarian fashion.

Postconflict Democratization

Only the end of the wars and conflicts opened space for a second wave of democratization in the late 1990s. In Croatia and Serbia, the incumbents lost power in 2000. Tuđman died and his party was defeated in parliamentary and presidential elections in 2000. This brought to power an opposition coalition dominated by the Social Democratic Party (SDP) and a shift to more pluralist politics, away from the conservative and authoritarian nationalism of the 1990s. In Serbia, Slobodan Milošević was defeated in presidential elections in September 2000, when he failed to concede, strikes and mass protests forced him and his ruling coalition out of office (Bunce and Wolchik 2011). In Albania, Berisha was toppled during the civil war that was triggered by the collapse of pyramid schemes, tacitly endorsed by the ruling party, and the increasing authoritarianism of Berisha. In North Macedonia, the conservative Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization-Party for Macedonian National Unity (VMRO-DPMNE) came to power in 1998. This alternation of power did not democratize the country substantially and Albanians, a large minority, continued to be included in government, but remained marginal in the public and political sphere. In Bosnia, the nationalist parties retained their dominant position, even if a more moderate coalition briefly held power in country in the early 2000s. Challengers were also ethnonational parties, not challenging the highly divided and ethnically polarized party system. In Kosovo, a multiparty system only emerged after the 1999 war during the international protectorate that replaced Serbian rule. The parties emerged either from the peaceful resistance of the 1990s, such as LDK or the Kosovo Liberation Army, the Democratic Party of Kosovo (PDK), and the Alliance for the Future of Kosovo (AAK). The first elections were held in 2001 and also include parties representing the Serb and other minorities.

The region's political systems can be divided into majoritarian parliamentary democracies, based on a relatively centralized system of government, including Croatia, Albania, Montenegro, and Serbia. Bosnia and Herzegovina, Kosovo, and North Macedonia have varying degrees of power-sharing systems and decentralization. The most rigid consociational system is in Bosnia and Herzegovina, based on a weak central government, two entities, the predominantly Serb Republika Srpska and the largely Bosniak and Croat Federation of Bosnia and Herzegovina, which in turn is divided into ten cantons with high level of autonomy, and the autonomous district of Brčko. In addition to territorial decentralization, there are strong features of consociationalism that protect ethnonational interests through quotas and vetoes. North Macedonia and Kosovo also have elements of power-sharing, including limited veto powers, grand government coalitions, and a high level of group rights, but neither have intermediate territorial units. Instead, decentralization took place, empowering municipalities. In the other countries, there are minority parties, sometimes benefiting from special electoral rules, as in Serbia, Croatia, and Montenegro, but these are generally small and marginal, even if at times included in ruling coalition.

In Kosovo and Bosnia, international actors had an important role. Kosovo was a full protectorate until the 2008 declaration of independence with the final authority held by UNMIK, the UN Mission in Kosovo. The parliament and government were granted only limited, if increasing, competences and were subject to international scrutiny. After independence, a transitional international presence continued to wield formal powers over Kosovo's institutions until 2012 (Visoka 2017). In Bosnia, the internationally appointed High Representative and his office were able (since 1997) to dismiss officials and impose key decisions, making Bosnia a de facto protectorate for around decade. This weakened as the international missions scaled down their interventionist approach around 2006 (Bieber 2006). The international missions became integral parts of the political systems with parties campaigning against their presence, such as the Self-Determination Movement in Kosovo, and nationalist parties, such as the Alliance of Independent Socialdemocrats (SNSD) in Bosnia's Republika Srpska.

The Legacies of Conflicts

The legacy of wars has profoundly shaped the democratization of the countries of the Western Balkans. In Kosovo, Bosnia, and North Macedonia, the political system as such is the product of the conflicts, including the different power-sharing mechanisms. In the other countries, democratization has been delayed due to the wars and their impact on the postwar political system and democratization. While the key parties in power during the 1990s and wars lost in Serbia and Croatia in 2000, they remained important political parties. In Croatia, the HDZ returned to power in 2003 (until 2011 returning to power in 2015), whereas in Serbia, the SPS became a junior coalition partner in 2008. The dominant Progressive Party (SNS) emerged in 2008 out of the far-right nationalist Serb Radical Party (SRS) that had been partner to the Milošević regime (Konitzer 2011). The SNS took power in 2012 and increasingly consolidated its position since.

The first postwar decade has been characterized by cautious efforts to confront the past, largely driven by external pressure, in particular through cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). In addition, the political system reformed, establishing independent institutions and in light of the prospect of European integration engaged in legal and institutional transformation. These changes were met with considerable resistance in terms of institutional opposition and nepotism, as well as strong political parties challenging these changes. A high level of political polarization and the contested past has resulted in party systems that are only formally characterized by the conventional European model of political parties. Grand coalitions between center-left and right have been rare, and the ideological differentiation mostly follows difference over the past and the competition for power, rather than differences on economic issues or over the role of the state (Boduszyński 2010).

None of the countries that experienced conflict in the 1990s have been able to establish consolidated democracies. In some cases, there has been considerable democratic backsliding, in particular in Serbia under Aleksandar Vučić's rule since 2012, in North Macedonia under the rule of Nikola Gruevski (2006–2016), and in Republika Srpska under the dominance of Milorad Dodik since 2006. Elsewhere, either one-party dominance, as in Montenegro, or a high level of party polarization and alternation in power, as in Albania, prevented democratic consolidation. State capture characterizes all political systems, with often narrow interest groups, centered on ruling political parties controlling state resources, often illegally, to retain power and control state resources for their own benefit. Formally, the countries have moved towards EU and NATO membership, with Croatia joining the EU in 2013, and Albania, North Macedonia, and Croatia members of NATO. Yet, the Euro Atlantic integration that began in the early 2000s has been slow and has encountered substantial resistance (Bieber 2020).

Summary

Postconflict democratization thus remains fragile in the Western Balkans. While the recurrence of conflict has become unlikely through a series of peace agreements and the close economic and political links with the EU, democracies are fragile and often shaped by both weak institutions and limited commitment to liberal democracy by ruling elites. In addition, the postwar countries of Bosnia and Kosovo are also contested states, where not all citizens accept the existence of the state. In Bosnia, a significant section of Serbs and Croats seek either secession or de-facto self-rule and in Kosovo, many Serbs seek to be part of Serbia. This has weakened democracy. In Bosnia, the continuous polarization over the nature of the state has led to ethnocracy with nondemocratic parties retaining power through evoking the ethnic card. In Kosovo, the unresolved relations with Serbia have held the external consolidation of the country back and restricted its ability to establish its full authority in the territories of the North, populated mostly by Serbs and closely linked to Serbia. Key controversies are the role of power-sharing institutions in delaying or obstructing democratization, the impact of international state- and institution-building, and the role and causes of nationalism (Belloni 2020; Günay and Dzhić 2016).

Thus, while the wars and conflicts in the Western Balkans largely ended at the end of the 1990s, their legacies shape political competition, regional relations, and democratization, mostly in the countries the worst effected by war. This has resulted in the emergence of competitive authoritarian and hybrid regimes, rather than liberal democracies. In addition, postwar power sharing is often contested and reproduces high level of ethnopolitical antagonism (Bieber et al. 2018).

Cross-References

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace after Conflict
- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia
- ▶ United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)

References

- Baker, C. (2015). The Yugoslav wars of the 1990s. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Belloni, R. (2020). The rise and fall of Peacebuilding in the Balkans. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Bieber, F. (2006). Post-war Bosnia. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Bieber, F. (2020). The rise of authoritarianism in the Western Balkans. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Bieber, F., Solska, M., & Taleski, D. (Eds.). (2018). Illiberal and authoritarian tendencies in central, Southeast and Eastern Europe. Bern: Peter Lang.
- Boduszyński, M. (2010). Regime change in the Yugoslav successor states: Divergent paths toward a new Europe. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press.
- Bunce, V. J., & Wolchik, S. L. (2011). Defeating authoritarian leaders in postcommunist countries. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Dolenec, D. (2013). Democratic institutions and authoritarian rule in Southeast Europe. Colchester: ECPR Press.
- Gagnon, V. P., Jr. (2004). The myth of ethnic war: Serbia and Croatia in the 1990s. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Günay, C., & Dzhic, V. (2016). Decoding the authoritarian code: Exercising 'legitimate' power politics through the ruling parties in Turkey, Macedonia and Serbia. Southeast European and Black Sea Studies, 16(4), 529–549.
- Konitzer, A. (2011). Speaking European: Conditionality, public attitudes and pro-European party rhetoric in the Western Balkans. Europe-Asia Studies, 63(10), 1853–1888.
- Visoka, G. (2017). Shaping peace in Kosovo. The politics of peacebuilding and statehood. Basingstoke: Palgrave.

Demographic Dividend

- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict

Demographic Gift

- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict

Demographic Window

- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict

Denial

- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

Development

- ▶ Maoist Conflict in India

Development = Economic Growth

- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus

Developmental Peace

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

Dialogue

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Dženeta Karabegović¹ and Camilla Orjuela²

¹Department of Political Science and Sociology, University of Salzburg, Salzburg, Austria

²School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Synonyms

Migration; Refugees; Transnationalism; Expats; Spoilers; Non-state actors

Definition/Description

Armed conflicts do not only generate migration but are also influenced by migrants. “Diaspora” has emerged as a popular term of self-identification as well as academic analysis. It is widely recognized that diaspora groups and individuals are important actors in global politics, including in relation to armed conflicts and post-conflict reconstruction processes. Diaspora refers broadly to those people who live outside of what they see as their homeland and who continue to be concerned about the developments “back home.” A diaspora is, however, not a static and objective category, but is better understood as a consciousness and set of practices that are mobilized. The desire to engage in homeland politics is often particularly acute when there is insecurity and war there, and when the diaspora itself is a result of forced displacement. The diaspora label embraces a hugely diverse group of people and activities, which can contribute to conflict and peace in many different ways, including within the group itself. Some diaspora groups and individuals provide economic support to armed actors, others return to take up arms themselves, and yet others engage in political campaigns, canvass for human rights, take initiatives towards dialogue, invest in postwar reconstruction, or initiate projects towards transitional justice, reconciliation, and memorialization. In a globalized world, transnational forces such as diasporas are essential to understand if we wish to grasp nuanced dynamics of peace and conflict.

Introduction

Diasporas have become ubiquitous in our societies in the same way as migration (Levitt and Schiller 2006; Levitt and Jaworsky 2007; Bauböck and Faist 2010). A vibrant research agenda on diasporas considers them beyond simple identification, while empirically, individuals continue to be assigned to diasporas for better or worse. Still others consider diaspora belonging as a badge of honor. Political circumstances in home and host countries lead to diaspora actors being victimized, valorized, targeted, or simply ignored. Transnational advocacy movements by and with diaspora actors dominate discussions about peace and conflict processes, including post-conflict reconstruction and transitional justice. The field of diaspora studies remains multidisciplinary and manifold, whether by virtue of definitional discussions, incorporation of diaspora into a multitude of literatures and topics, their role in transnational processes including home and host country influences, and finally, considerations about the role of diaspora in peace and conflict processes.

The aim of this chapter is to provide an overview of the trends and debates around diasporas in peace and conflict literature. Rather than provide an exhaustive examination, we seek to provide a broad perspective, highlighting some of the important developments of this field, present key examples representative of diaspora’s engagement in peace and conflict processes, as well as to chart the potential of diaspora in peace and conflict in the future. The first section explains what diasporas are and showcases briefly how they can be studied and defined. It also establishes their importance in world politics. The sections thereafter focus on different aspects of the peace and conflict process in which diasporas have and continue to play vital roles: we discuss how diaspora actors may fuel homeland conflicts, how they engage in peace work, and the roles they play in postwar reconstruction and reconciliation. We aim to incorporate more classic texts and examples from recent literature within each of these sections in order to highlight the wide range of scholarship focused on this topic. The penultimate section draws attention to how homeland conflicts and repression play out in the diaspora itself. The concluding section provides additional avenues to further explore diasporas in peace and conflict.

Diasporas

The term diaspora is derived from the Greek verb “speirein” which signifies spreading and scattering, dispersing and the preposition dia – from one end to the other. This etymological explanation of what diasporas are provides a worthwhile starting point – that of movement – key to understanding diaspora. While scholars have traditionally understood this movement to be the result of collective trauma, this generally encompasses only those groups who result from forced migration (Safran 1991). Ultimately it also categorizes populations rather than examining them in relation to time, to identities and ideas being formed from within these populations, the potential for contention among them, and the fact that diasporas are not necessarily always tied to a nation state or a bounded group (Sheffer 2006), but experience belonging, and more importantly, mobilize these feelings, in different ways. Diasporas have been increasingly incorporated into research agendas that focused on transnationalism and transnational migration (Vertovec 1999; Faist 2010; Levitt and Schiller 2006; Bauböck and Faist 2010). The interest led Brubaker (2005) to famously criticize the “proliferation” of diaspora to the point the term had become so diluted that it was difficult to use it analytically. This reflects both the continued interest in and challenges of researching diaspora on a multidisciplinary international level.

Moving beyond ideal type categorizations of diaspora, which were often focused on descriptive studies tracing a diaspora’s understanding of its own identity and orientation towards the homeland, diasporas are today understood in somewhat different terms. A social movements perspective (Sokefeld 2006) that recognizes the importance of fluidity among diaspora, including the fact that it is composed of many different individuals that are by no means homogenous, much like any other population, provides a worthwhile lens into examining diaspora mobilization (Feron 2013). This allows for the examination of mobilization processes in terms of transnational advocacy and the analysis of claims made by diasporic agents in the name of the group or in response to particular events or developments, in multiple locations and on multiple levels (Keck and Sikkink 1998; Lyons and Mandaville 2012). The relevance of diaspora actors in world politics and their influence can have different results and can thus be both stabilizing or destabilizing, especially during important points in peace and conflict processes (Smith and Stares 2007; Shain 2002). Thus, understanding how a diaspora identity is mobilized rather than simply considering them as passive groups with connections to multiple localities, becomes key to creating different opportunities for peace processes to develop. At the same time, this perspective also recognizes that diasporas make conflict analysis and frameworks more complicated, especially in settings where the homelands are contested in one way or another (Koinova 2021). Their embeddedness in different states and localities, as well as their transnational nature make diasporas an ever more relevant actor in the study of world politics, in a multitude of potential roles, including as entrepreneurs, brokers, spoilers, and facilitators (Brinkerhoff 2011; Koinova 2021). The following sections will examine some of these in more detail, providing both a review of the existing literature and empirical examples.

Diaspora Involvement in Armed Conflicts

Much of the scholarly and policy discussion on diasporas and conflict has taken its point of departure in a dichotomous understanding of diasporas as either fueling conflicts or contributing to peace. Terrorist attacks in the United States and Europe carried out by individuals with a diasporic background have further fed stereotypes of migrants as security threats and instigators of conflict. Early academic interventions on diasporas and homeland conflicts focused on the ways in which diaspora actors promote polarization and war. Benedict Anderson (1992) made the argument that people in the diaspora become “long-distant nationalists” and that they can afford to take hard-line and uncompromising stances in their homeland conflicts as they do not experience the direct consequences of war. A much-cited study by Collier and Hoeffler found a correlation between the risk of return to war after a peace settlement and the proportion of the population that had migrated to the United States. This was largely due to financial support to armed groups from people in the diaspora who “preserved their own hatreds” even after a peace agreement (Collier and Hoeffler 2001: 10).

One prominent example of a conflict where the diaspora has supported an armed struggle is the 1983–2009 civil war between the separatist Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam (LTTE) and the Sri Lankan government (see Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka). A large, conflict-generated Tamil diaspora provided crucial financial resources to the LTTE, which had a well-developed international network. Diaspora contributions were both voluntary and forced. Apart from direct support to the LTTE's war for an independent Tamil state, the diaspora also provided humanitarian assistance through organizations closely linked to the LTTE (Orjuela 2008). The Irish diaspora in the United States similarly played an active role in supporting the armed struggle of the Irish Republican Army (IRA) for a reunification of Ireland (Charlton 1979), while Somali diaspora remittances have enabled the armament of militant groups in the home country (Horst 2008). In some cases, such as Kosovo in the 1990s, individuals have returned from the diaspora to take up arms (Adamson 2006). More recently, terrorist networks like Al-Qaeda, the Islamic State and Al-Shabab have recruited internationally, including among diaspora members.

Diasporas also mobilize to carry out political work in support of armed struggles. The Sri Lankan Tamil diaspora, for instance, organized mass demonstrations and engaged with policy makers to raise awareness about the plight of the Tamil minority in Sri Lanka and canvass support for the Tamil cause (Orjuela 2008). Such political campaigning and mobilization of protests in the host country can be a feasible way to influence the developments in the homeland through what Keck and Sikkink (1998) have called the boomerang effect, i.e., pressure put on otherwise unresponsive governments through other governments and international players. Moreover, with the expansion of dual citizenship and voting rights for citizens residing abroad, diaspora communities have become important supporters of political leaders in the homeland (Lyons and Mandaville 2012). Their sometimes crucial contributions to election campaigns and to certain leaders' rise to or upholding of power may reinforce homeland cleavages and conflicts while continuing to redefine how transnational citizenship is utilized and reinforced (Brand 2014).

Media – including social media – is another means through which diaspora actors may amplify or fuel conflicts and divides in the homeland. For instance, although Somali diaspora media has provided space for empathy and encouraged humanitarian aid, it has also served to reproduce the dynamics of the conflict by pushing polarization and silencing marginalized groups (Osman 2017). In the beginning of the 1990s, Bosnian and Herzegovinian diaspora actors formed a community online, connecting transnationally to foster diplomacy and reinforce state institutions throughout the war by collecting relevant news items, aggregating information, and connecting individuals (Hasic and Karabegovic 2020). More recently, digital communication technologies have been utilized by diaspora groups in an effort to expose human rights abuses during the ongoing conflict in Syria (Stokke and Wiebelhaus-Brahm 2019; Tenove 2019).

Diasporas and Peacework

The notion of diasporas as war-mongers and security risks have been challenged by scholars and practitioners who emphasize their role in supporting peace. If diaspora actors are important players in the homeland – through their remittances, support to political and armed actors, media production, humanitarian assistance, advocacy work, and mobilization of protests – they can also influence homeland developments in more peaceful ways (Brinkerhoff 2011). One large-N study recently found external support from the diaspora to be positively associated with the adoption of nonviolent tactics by rebel groups. In fact, diaspora support was, according to that study, more crucial than the support by foreign states for instigating shifts towards peaceful tactics (Petrova 2019). Various case studies have illustrated in more detail how diaspora actors can lend support to peacemaking efforts. Irish American organizations and individuals, for instance, played an important role supporting the Northern Ireland peace process that led to the 1998 Good Friday Agreement, through their close connections to power-holders in the United States and their shift from supporting the armed struggle to instead canvassing for a negotiated peace (Cochrane 2007, see The Troubles: The Northern Ireland Conflict). Diaspora actors were also key in bringing together different actors in order to set up the Haitian Truth Commission (Hoogenboom and Quinn 2011).

The peace process between Colombia's government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces (FARC) 2012–2016 illustrates how the diaspora can be activated to take part in peacemaking efforts. Public hearings were held in several European cities in parallel to the negotiations in Habana, and the diaspora organized victim associations and women's groups to provide input to the process. The inclusion of diaspora actors in the peace process, however, also encountered some challenges. These include a sense of mistrust between diaspora communities and local civil society, and the difficulty of establishing procedures to appoint diaspora representatives in formal bodies related to the peace process (Flamtermesky et al. 2019, see Colombian Peace Agreement 2016).

To include not only the warring parties but also civil society representatives in a peace process is considered important for the legitimacy of both the process itself and its outcome (Paffenholz 2014, see also Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation). In a globalized world, relevant civil society actors may not only reside in the war-affected country, but around the globe. How diaspora actors participate in peace processes vary widely, however. In some cases, the warring parties themselves are represented by individuals based in the diaspora, such as in the peace negotiations between Sri Lanka's government and the LTTE in 2002–2003 and in the Aceh-Indonesia peace process of 2005 (Mitsch 2013). The warring parties may also informally or formally consult diaspora members along the way, and diaspora actors in some cases mobilize public demonstrations or engage in advocacy with the aim of influencing and supporting a peaceful resolution of the armed conflict (Baser 2017). Political campaigns by diaspora groups for peace, human rights, and humanitarian efforts are not, however, always perceived by others as peacemaking. What leads to peace, and how, tends to be a question which is fiercely contested during an ongoing conflict, and the long-term effects of diaspora peace efforts – and of the peace process itself – are very difficult to predict. Also after a conflict has ended, peacebuilding efforts continue to be contested. Transitional justice efforts initiated by diaspora actors often take place at multiple levels beyond the homeland with differing results (Koinova and Karabegovic 2019).

The positionality of diaspora groups, as actors residing outside of the country where the war is raging, may give them some advantages as peace-promoting actors, for instance the relative safety to engage in peace activism provided by the host country, and the access some diaspora actors may have to influential state actors and/or international governmental and non-governmental organizations. Moreover, spaces far from the war can be used for dialogue efforts at various levels – between top leaders or persons close to them, or between lower-level leaders or “ordinary people” who harbor prejudices about those from the other side of the conflict divide (see Lyons 2004; Tint et al. 2014; Orjuela 2017). Cultural or sports events for diaspora groups may also provide opportunities for meetings across conflict divides (Karabegovic 2018). Especially young people, who have grown up outside of their parents' homeland may be more ready to engage with the war-affected country in ways that are less influenced by cemented conflict divides. Their embeddedness in (at least) two societies may give them certain advantages as peacebuilding actors (see Youth and Peacebuilding).

Finally, it has been noted that the flourishing diaspora-based media landscape is not only a source of polarization and conflict promotion. Brinkerhoff (2009), in her study of how diaspora communities use the internet, shows how diaspora individuals often use modern communication technology to create organizations and communities that promote hybrid identities, encourage solidarity, and help them integrate in the society where they live. The global reach of digital media implies that initiatives taken in the diaspora to reframe homeland conflicts can contribute to reshaping the view of the conflict also in the homeland. Moreover, the expansion of social media has in some cases challenged established power relations and traditional ideas of who gets to speak about the conflict. For instance, women from South Sudan have made use of social media to become “influencers” who comment on conflict and humanitarian crisis in their home country (Bashri 2017, see Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan).

Postwar Reconstruction and Reconciliation

Scholars working on the migration development nexus (Faist et al. 2011; Brinkerhoff 2012; Geiger and Pecoud 2013) have acknowledged the relevance of public policy approaches especially focused on diasporas that are supposed to fuel development. This has often translated to encouraging diaspora investments in homelands recovering or attempting to rebuild after conflict. Alternatively, mechanisms promoting knowledge transfer are meant to encourage the influx of social remittances between diasporas and local populations, both in an effort to address development issues and to aid in reconstruction processes, as these are often considered to go hand in hand. This literature addresses the question of reconstruction from a largely economic lens. Over the last decade, such initiatives have also been supported by international organizations working with home states that are unwilling or unable to provide and support such programs, all in an effort to translate diaspora engagement into sustainable post-conflict economic recovery. While the mythical return to the homeland remains a lofty idea for many diaspora individuals, such programs have also been rather successful at encouraging return, particularly for individuals willing to start a business or to invest back into their home countries upon returning. Gamlen (2014, 2019) has mapped the increase of diaspora governance by homeland countries over time, demonstrating the homeland states’ recognition of this diaspora potential.

Beyond development in terms of post-conflict reconstruction, the role of diaspora in transitional justice processes, along with other non-state actors, has more recently been incorporated into broader debates (Wiebelhaus-Brahm 2016; Koinova and Karabegovic 2019). The intersection of diaspora and transitional justice scholarship provides scholars and peace practitioners a particular lens through which to study the influence of diaspora mobilization, representing a diversifying trend in transitional justice scholarship of considering different actors. Diasporas have demonstrated their role in memorialization, truth-seeking, and accountability processes, taking part on multiple levels, by mobilizing others in the homeland or the host countries, or lobbying other actors to take appropriate actions (Baser 2017; Koinova and Karabegovic 2017; Orjuela 2018).

This is particularly the case for diaspora members who, by virtue of forced migration due to conflict, find themselves living outside of the borders of their homelands, and present strong grievance claims in relation to their post-conflict homelands related to transitional justice. Research on memorialization processes, focused on both more recent as well as more historical commemoration activities, provides multiple empirical examples of diaspora engagement with homelands such as Armenia, Cambodia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Sri Lanka, and Rwanda. The ways in which diaspora members align themselves to differing homeland narratives, or even create their own diasporic narratives in order to mobilize other members, demonstrate not only the diaspora’s engagement in transitional justice but also the malleability and complexity of reconciliation processes. In the case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, diaspora actors have partnered with actors in multiple localities to forward localized grievance claims as well as larger commemorative processes (Karabegovic 2019; see Transitional Justice in Bosnia and Herzegovina).

Conflicts in New Spaces

The diaspora itself – not only its impact on the homeland – has also become a focus for peace and conflict researchers and practitioners, who recognize that conflicts are continued, reproduced, and/or transformed in places outside the homeland. Literature on “imported” or “transported” conflicts has drawn attention to how conflict dynamics in home countries are paralleled by similar conflict patterns in the diaspora, but also to how conflicts take new forms when played out in new contexts (Féron 2013; Baser 2015a). Supporters of different sides of a homeland conflict sometimes confront each other when organizing demonstrations and counter-demonstrations in public spaces, or when participating in conferences or social media discussions. In some instances, “transported” conflicts have taken the form of vandalism or physical attacks, as has been the case between Turks and Kurds in Europe (Baser 2015b). The continuation of conflict can also be manifested in awkward silences or avoidance of diaspora members belonging to “the other side” (Monahan et al. 2014; Orjuela 2017). A concern for diaspora groups is also how traumatic experiences of conflict may be “inherited” by subsequent generations and affect the well-being also of persons who did not themselves experience violence (Hirsch 2008; Sangalang and Vang 2017).

In the wake of globalization, governments have increasingly reached out to “their” diasporas, attempting to engage them as agents of development and/or well-placed allies in the war they wage (Koinova and Tsourapas 2018). However, the same governments often see diaspora critics, and those in the diaspora who are on the “wrong side” in the conflict, as a threat that needs to be controlled and repressed. It has become increasingly clear that fleeing a country does not always mean that one is on a safe distance from the country’s repressive regime. In fact, authoritarian governments target who they see as “traitors” or “security threats” in the diaspora through a number of repressive tactics, including threats, surveillance, withholding of administrative services and even direct physical assaults or assassinations.

These state attempts aim to control their diaspora populations throughout a number of migration processes, including return policies (Tsourapas 2020). Critics can also be efficiently silenced by threats or attacks against relatives and friends who reside in the home country (Moss 2016; Glasius 2018). Also, non-state groups sometimes attempt to control the diaspora through repressive strategies (Adamson 2020).

As conflicts and oppression extend across borders, peace and conflict researchers need to look not only in, but also beyond, a particular war-affected country when they seek to understand conflict dynamics and peace efforts. Foreign policy and diplomacy scholarship offers the potential for further engagement with diasporas.

Concluding Remarks

As we have demonstrated throughout this chapter, diasporas are involved, engaged, and can be incorporated into every facet of peace and conflict processes. Their influence is contextualized based on their positionalities, their relationship to those in power, and the levels of contention they feel towards peace and conflict related events in their homelands. It would be negligible to consider them as a monolithic actor, or even to consider their role without contextualizing the settings of their homelands and host countries, which are also ever-changing. For certain groups, conflicts become imported to their new homelands, while for others, repression continues regardless of the fact they are abroad. Still others attempt to influence peace and conflict processes at a distance, while others return in an effort to speed up post-conflict reconstruction processes.

Academic work on diaspora has developed exponentially over the last few decades and will likely continue to be shaped both by empirical realities and the explanatory potential they introduce to a variety of peace and conflict related processes including diplomacy, democratization, foreign policy, and statebuilding. At the same time, the engagement of home states in an effort to instrumentalize its diaspora actors in a variety of ways has recently also gained more prominence, especially in authoritarian contexts. Scholarship on the policies of countries of settlement, whether through deradicalization, development, or other means, will likely increase in the near future as these policies become more evident empirically. Thus, the ways in which diaspora act on their agency and utilize it in order to mold homeland and host country processes in the future will only gain both theoretical and comparative perspectives, especially in post-conflict terms. Diaspora engagement with more topical issues in peace and conflict related to socioeconomic justice and natural resource management preservation will largely determine the role of diasporas in peace and conflict in the near future, including collaboration with international organizations and institutions beyond home and host states. Moreover, considering that reconciliation processes are slow, windy, the interest, participation, and influence of diaspora actors from the second and third generation will continue to draw the attention of scholars and policy makers.

References

- Adamson, F. B. (2006). Crossing borders: International migration and national security. International Security, 31(1), 165–199.
- Adamson, F. B. (2020). Non-state authoritarianism and diaspora politics. Global Networks, 20, 150–169. <https://doi.org/10.1111/glob.12246>.
- Anderson, B. (1992). The new world disorder. New Left Review, 193, 3–13.
- Baser, B. (2015a). Diasporas and homeland conflicts: A comparative perspective. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Baser, B. (2015b). Turkish-Kurdish conflict spills over into Europe. The Conversation. <https://theconversation.com/turkish-kurdish-conflict-spills-over-into-europe-47610>
- Baser, B. (2017). Intricacies of engaging diasporas in conflict resolution and transitional justice: The Kurdish diaspora and the peace process in Turkey. Civil Wars, 19(4), 470–494. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2017.1396528>.
- Bashri, M. (2017). Online communities, conflict, and diaspora: The case of south Sudanese women. In O. Ogunyemi (Ed.), Media, diaspora and conflict (pp. 223–234). Cham, Switzerland: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bauböck, R., & Faist, T. (Eds.). (2010). Diaspora and transnationalism: Concepts, theories and methods. Amsterdam: Amsterdam University Press.
- Brand, L. A. (2014). Arab uprisings and the changing frontiers of transnational citizenship: Voting from abroad in political transitions. Political Geography, 41, 54–63. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.polgeo.2013.11.009>.
- Brinkerhoff, J. M. (2009). Digital diasporas: Identity and transnational engagement. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Brinkerhoff, J. M. (2011). Diasporas and conflict societies: Conflict entrepreneurs, competing interests or contributors to stability and development? Conflict, Security & Development, 11(02), 115–143. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2011.572453>.
- Brinkerhoff, J. M. (2012). Creating an enabling environment for diasporas' participation in homeland development. International Migration, 50(1), 75–95.
- Brubaker, R. (2005). The “diaspora” diaspora. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 28, 1–19.
- Charlton, L. (1979). Fund-raising by a group in U.S. called vital to I.R.A. operations, 24 September. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/1979/09/24/archives/fundraising-by-a-group-in-us-called-vital-to-ira-operations.html>. Accessed 30 Nov 2020.
- Cochrane, F. (2007). Irish-America, the end of the IRA's armed struggle and the utility of soft power. Journal of Peace Research, 44, 215–231.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2001). Greed and grievance in civil war (Policy research working paper). Washington, DC: World Bank.
- Faist, T. (2010). Towards transnational studies: World theories, transnationalisation and changing institutions. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 36(10), 1665–1687. <https://doi.org/10.1080/1369183X.2010.489365>.
- Faist, T., Fauser, M., & Kivisto, P. (Eds.). (2011). The migration-development Nexus. London: Palgrave Macmillan UK. <https://doi.org/10.1057/9780230305694>.
- Féron, E. (2013). Diaspora politics. From “long distance nationalism” to autonomization. In D. Halm & Z. Sezgin (Eds.), Migration and organized civil society: Rethinking national policy (pp. 63–78). London: Routledge.
- Flamtermesky, H., Ardila, D., & Charry, J. (2019). Colombian diaspora in the peace process. Accord 28. www.c-r.org/accord/inclusion-peace-processes/colombian-diaspora-peace-process
- Gamlen, A. (2014). Diaspora institutions and diaspora governance. International Migration Review, 48, 180–217. <https://doi.org/10.1111/imre.12136>.
- Gamlen, A. J. (2019). Human geopolitics: States, emigrants, and the rise of diaspora institutions. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Geiger, M., & Pécout, A. (2013). Migration, development and the “migration and development Nexus”: The migration and development Nexus. Population, Space and Place, 19(4), 369–374. <https://doi.org/10.1002/psp.1778>.

- Glasius, M. (2018). Extraterritorial authoritarian practices: A framework. Globalizations, 15(2), 179–197. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14747731.2017.1403781>.
- Hasić, J., & Karabegović, D. (2020). Diaspora as digital diplomatic agents: ‘BOSNET’ and wartime foreign affairs. Migration Letters, 17(1), 103–113. <https://doi.org/10.33182/ml.v17i1.832>.
- Hirsch, M. (2008). The generation of Postmemory. Poetics Today, 29(1), 103–128.
- Hoogenboom, D., & Quinn, J. (2011). Transitional justice and the diaspora: Examining the impact of the Haitian diaspora on the Haitian Truth Commission. International Studies Association (ISA) Annual Convention.
- Horst, C. (2008). The transnational political engagements of refugees: Remittance sending practices amongst somalis in Norway: Analysis. Conflict, Security & Development, 8(3), 317–339. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678800802323340>.
- Karabegović, D. (2018). Aiming for transitional justice? Diaspora mobilisation for youth and education in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 44(8), 1374–1389. <https://doi.org/10.1080/1369183X.2017.1354165>.
- Karabegović, D. (2019). Who chooses to remember? Diaspora participation in memorialization initiatives. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 1–19. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2019.1577473>.
- Keck, M., & Sikkink, K. (1998). Activists beyond borders: Transnational advocacy networks in international politics. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Koinova, M. (2021). Diaspora entrepreneurs and contested states. New product. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Koinova, M., & Karabegović, D. (2017). Diasporas and transitional justice: Transnational activism from local to global levels of engagement. Global Networks, 17(2), 212–233. <https://doi.org/10.1111/glob.12128>.
- Koinova, M., & Karabegović, D. (2019). Causal mechanisms in diaspora mobilizations for transitional justice. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 42(11), 1809–1829. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2019.1624802>.
- Koinova, M., & Tsurapas, G. (2018). How do countries of origin engage migrants and diasporas? Multiple actors and comparative perspectives. International Political Science Review, 39(3), 311–321. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512118755843>.
- Levitt, P., & Jaworsky, B. N. (2007). Transnational migration studies: Past developments and future trends. Annual Review of Sociology, 33(1), 129–156. <https://doi.org/10.1146/annurev.soc.33.040406.131816>.
- Levitt, P., & Schiller, N. G. (2006). Conceptualizing simultaneity: A transnational social field perspective on society. International Migration Review, 38(3), 1002–1039. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1747-7379.2004.tb00227.x>.
- Lyons, T. (2004). Engaging diasporas to promote conflict resolution: Transforming hawks into doves. Washington, DC: Institute for Conflict Analysis and Resolution, George Mason University.
- Lyons, T., & Mandaville, P. G. (Eds.). (2012). Politics from afar: Transnational diasporas and networks. London: Hurst.
- Missbach, A. (2013). The waxing and waning of the Acehnese diaspora’s long-distance politics. Modern Asian Studies, 47(3), 1055–1082.
- Monahan, J., Berns-McGown, R., & Morden, M. (2014). The perception and reality of “imported conflict” in Canada. Toronto: The Mosaic Institute.
- Moss, D. M. (2016). Transnational repression, diaspora mobilization, and the case of the Arab spring. Social Problems, 63(4), 480–498. <https://doi.org/10.1093/socpro/spw019>.
- Orjuela, C. (2008). Distant warriors, distant peace workers? Multiple diaspora roles in Sri Lanka’s violent conflict. Global Networks: A Journal of Transnational Affairs, 8(4), 436–452. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1471-0374.2008.00233.x>.
- Orjuela, C. (2017). Divides and dialogue in the diaspora during Sri Lanka’s civil war. South Asian Diaspora, 9(1), 67–82. <https://doi.org/10.1080/19438192.2016.1236469>.
- Orjuela, C. (2018). Mobilising diasporas for justice. Opportunity structures and the presencing of a violent past. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 44(8), 1357–1373. <https://doi.org/10.1080/1369183X.2017.1354163>.
- Osman, I. (2017). Media, diaspora and the Somali conflict. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Paffenholz, T. (2014). Participation of civil society in peace negotiations. Negotiation Journal, 30, 69–91. <https://doi.org/10.1111/nej.12046>.
- Petrova, M. G. (2019). What matters is who supports you: Diaspora and foreign states as external supporters and militants’ adoption of nonviolence. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 63(9), 2155–2179. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022002719826645>.
- Safran, W. (1991). Diasporas in modern societies: Myths of homeland and return. Diaspora, 1, 83–89.
- Sangalang, C., & Vang, C. (2017). Intergenerational trauma in refugee families: A systematic review. Journal of Immigrant Minority Health, 19, 745–754.
- Shain, Y. (2002). The role of diasporas in conflict perpetuation or resolution. SAIS Review, 22(2), 115–144. <https://doi.org/10.1353/sais.2002.0052>.
- Sheffer, G. (2006). Transnationalism and ethnonational diasporism. Diaspora: A Journal of Transnational Studies, 15(1), 121–145. <https://doi.org/10.1353/dsp.0.0029>.
- Smith, H., & Stares, P. B. (2007). Diasporas in conflict: Peace-makers or peace-wreckers? Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Sokefeld, M. (2006). Mobilizing in transnational space: A social movement approach to the formation of diaspora. Global Networks, 6(3), 265–284. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1471-0374.2006.00144.x>.
- Stokke, E., & Wiebelhaus-Brahm, E. (2019). Syrian diaspora mobilization: Vertical coordination, patronage relations, and the challenges of fragmentation in the - pursuit of transitional justice. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 1–20. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2019.1572909>.

- Tenove, C. (2019). Networking justice: Digitally-enabled engagement in transitional justice by the Syrian diaspora. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 1–20. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01419870.2019.1569702>.
- Tint, B., Chirimwami, V., & Sarkis, C. (2014). Diasporas in dialogue: Lessons from reconciliation efforts in African refugee communities. Conflict Resolution Quarterly, 32(2), 177–202. <https://doi.org/10.1002/crq.21111>.
- Tsourapas, G. (2020). Theorizing state-diaspora relations in the Middle East: Authoritarian emigration states in comparative perspective. Mediterranean Politics, 25(2), 135–159. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13629395.2018.1511299>.
- Vertovec, S. (1999). Conceiving and researching transnationalism. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 22(2), 447–462. <https://doi.org/10.1080/014198799329558>.
- Wiebelhaus-Brahm, E. (2016). Exploring variation in diasporas' engagement with transitional justice processes. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 11(3), 23–36. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2016.1226933>.

Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Heela Najibullah
University of Zurich, Zurich, Switzerland

Definition/Description

This entry offers a general overview of the current Afghan conflict. It explores the different dynamics of the conflict, national, regional, and international. It glances at the proxy nature of the conflict during the cold war, the civil war, and the global war on terrorism. It also examines various political attempts of peacemaking in Afghanistan from National Reconciliation Policy introduced in 1987, the peace agreements in 1990s to end the civil war, the Afghan Peace and Reintegration Program, and the current US-Taliban Agreement, highlighting some of the gaps in the current Afghan peace process from a peace and conflict studies perspective.

Synonyms

Afghanistan; Agreements; Ceasefire; Cold War; Conflict; Jihad; Negotiations; Peace; Terrorism; Transitional Justice; Trauma; UN; War

Introduction

The year 2020 marks 41 years of conflict in Afghanistan. The current Afghan conflict is a by-product of changes in the sociopolitical structures that was exasperated by the Cold War and regional geopolitical rivalries that led to the civil war, Talibanization of the country, and the War on Terror. The birth of the republic in 1973 put an end to the monarchy rule (Dixit 2000). It was the start of national reforms in further modernizing the country that would alienate the religious Islamic groups (Roy 2001). The creation of the Republic also shifted the symmetry of Cold War relationships with the two superpowers, that is, the Soviet Union (USSR) and the United States (USA), plus the regional countries. In 1978, Afghanistan witnessed another coup d'état in which the first President of Afghanistan, Mohammed Daoud Khan was murdered along with his family members and the power was transferred to the leftist groups in Afghanistan (Giustozzi 2000).

The People's Democratic Party of Afghanistan (PDPA) took power and introduced land, education, and cultural reforms that were rebuffed by the people. The Afghan invasion of the Soviet Union further antagonized the common Afghans against the government and made the fertile Jihad grounds expand (Roy 2001, pp. 47–48). It is at this juncture that Afghanistan gets heavily embroiled into the proxy Cold War geopolitics, with USSR supporting the Afghan government and having its troops in the country while the USA supported the government opposition groups named freedom fighters or Mujahideen, based out of Pakistan. The other regional country that hosted Shia and other Jihadi groups in opposition to the government was Iran (Najibullah 2017).

In 1985, with the change of leadership in the USSR, introduction of policies such as Perestroika (Prestroika in literal term means restructuring. In this context, it was referred to a political and economic restructuring initiated by Premier M. Gorbachev) influenced the political course of events in Afghanistan. In 1986, PDPA changed leadership and introduced the National Reconciliation Policy (NRP) to end the eight-year-long conflict and ensure the successful withdrawal of the Soviet troops. Afghanistan first attempt in contemporary peacebuilding is embedded in NRP. The government of Afghanistan cooperated closely with the United Nations in implementing the resolution 45/12 and the 5-point peace plan to find a durable solution to the Afghan conflict (Najibullah 2017, pp. 48–49). However, the plan did not reach fruition and in April 1992, the government fell in the hands of Mujahideen and the civil war broke out throughout Afghanistan (Rubin 1995).

In 1993, a new group by the name of Taliban surfaced in Kandahar which took power in September 1996 and enforced a strict, draconian, Sharia-based rule (Rashid 2002). Post events of 9/11, the link between Taliban, Al-Qaeda, and Pakistan become more apparent to the world (Rubin 2013, p. 352). In 1998, after the Al-Qaeda bombings of US embassies in Tanzania and Kenya, in retaliation, the Clinton administration bombed the Al-Qaeda bases in Afghanistan (Rubin 2013, p. 349). The 9/11 fall of twin towers compelled the US administration to take action, and Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF) was launched on October 7, 2001, as part of the Global War on Terrorism and focused in eliminating Al-Qaeda and Taliban (Ibid, pp. 349–350).

The OEF's two main objectives were significant for Afghanistan: (1) elimination of terror groups responsible for the fall of the twin towers from Afghanistan and ensuring that such attacks are avoided in the future, and (2) regime change, that is, removal of the Taliban government or rule. Two months after the OEF, Germany hosted an International Conference on Afghanistan and established the foundations of the current governing structures and institutions in the country. The Conference hosted prominent Mujahideen groups that the USA had formerly supported in the Cold War to replace the Taliban (Ibid).

Meanwhile, the Taliban leadership found shelter in Pakistan. The Bonn Agreement also encompassed the establishment of the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) that allowed many allied militaries (Allied militaries here refer to the military of countries that allied with the USA in the global war on terrorism) to serve in Afghanistan under the banner of Global War on Terror. The UN Security Council passed resolution 1386 to establish ISAF.

Since 2002, Afghanistan went through institutional and nation-building processes, that is, it has held four national elections, created military and police force, included women into political institutions such as the parliament, exercised freedom of speech, established procedures for economic growth; however, the progress has come with many shortcomings. (The article ► Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity captures the efforts and challenges of post 9/11 in fighting terrorism and building a state.) Peacebuilding instruments such as transitional justice and disarmament demobilization and reintegration (DDR) were undermined (Human Dignity and Transitional Justice emphasizes how transitional justice puts the victims and human being centerstage for they have equal and inherent value, which was not the case in Afghanistan post 2001) after the Bonn Agreement (Hakimi & Suhrke). ISAF's warfare with the Taliban as a "terrorist" group that was enlisted in the UN, creation of Provincial Reconstruction Teams that comprised of both military and civilians across the country, rampant corruption, lack of rule of law at local levels (Wimpelmann 2013), and Pakistan's continued covert support in hosting both Al-Qaeda and the Taliban were factors that contributed to escalating and fueling the conflict until now.

The Afghan Peace Process

Since the start of the conflict in Afghanistan, there have been many trials in bringing peace and finding political stability in the country. One of the first attempts in developing a policy and strategy for reconciliation was at the peak of the Cold War rivalry in Afghanistan. In 1987, the Najibullah administration under the National Reconciliation Policy (NRP) cooperated closely with the UN to find a political solution to the Afghan conflict (Najibullah 2017). In 1992, when the civil war broke out amidst warring Mujahideen factions, peace agreements between the factions were signed in Peshawar and Saudi Arabia but without much success to end the fighting till the Taliban took over in September 1996 (Semple 2009).

Post-2001, (The article ► Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity captures the efforts and challenges of post 9/11 in fighting terrorism and building a state) with the passage of time, it became apparent that ISAF was faced with firm resistance by the Taliban resurgence and that the foreign forces had to re-strategize their engagement in Afghanistan. Campaigns such as winning “hearts and minds” to restructuring modes of operation from ceasing PRT to establishing Resolute Support Mission and allowing Afghans military take charge of the battleground were proving difficult to win the war against the Taliban that was sheltered and supported in neighboring Pakistan.

Reconciliation and peacebuilding gained momentum under the Obama administration after 2009 when there was a recognition in the USA as well as among the allies of war on terror that they will not win the war militarily and hence have to pursue a political route to find a solution to the Afghan conflict (Woodward 2010). In 2010, under President Karzai administration the Afghan government embarked upon the Peace and Reintegration Program.

The goal of the APRP is to promote peace through a political approach. It will encourage regional and international cooperation, will create the political and judicial conditions for peace and reconciliation, and will encourage combatant foot soldiers, commanders and leaders previously siding with armed opposition and extremist groups to renounce violence and terrorism, and to join a constructive process of reintegration and peace. (Najibullah 2011, p. 34)

While the USA and its allies were establishing contacts with the Taliban in 2011 to negotiate, militarily there was a surge in several soldiers to keep the pressure and bring the Taliban groups on the negotiation table. However, by end of 2013, the efforts to meet APRP goals had failed (Graham-Harrison and Robert 2013) and the allied countries shifted focus toward signing bilateral security agreements which led to the 2014 signing of the US-Afghan bilateral security agreement, allowing the USA to maintain bases in Afghanistan, support the Afghan security forces in combat technically and monetarily.

In 2017, the USA established contact in renegotiating with the Taliban (Ackerman 2018) to find a political solution to the ongoing conflict in Afghanistan, recognizing that current presence of the foreign troops is not a sustainable approach. Since September 2018, the US Secretary of State appointed Mr. Zalmay Khalilzad as the special envoy for peace and reconciliation (Hussainkhail 2018), whose mandate has been to strike a deal with the Taliban on four points: (1) withdrawal of foreign troops; (2) guarantee that there will not be any other terrorist attacks from the Afghan soil; (3) ceasefire; and (4) intra-Afghan dialogue (Bijlert and Ruttig 2019). In February 2020, the months of negotiations resulted in the US-Taliban Agreement (State Govt, 2020) that was signed in Doha. Concurrently, the US and the Afghan government made a joint declaration (State Govt, 2020) in bringing peace to Afghanistan. (► Peace Agreement chapter illustrates the different types of agreement and the nature of agreements that exist worldwide; it can be deduced according to this article that the US-Taliban agreement is not a peace agreement for violence and bloodshed has not ceased.) The two documents are correlated in determining the future steps of peacemaking in the country (Thurial B 2020).

Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

The current “Afghan Peace Process” has been unique when it comes to peacemaking. Mr. Khalilzad who is negotiating and mediating with the anti-government groups, in this case, the Taliban is part of the US administration, which is a stakeholder in the Afghan conflict since the Cold War. In other words, the current Afghan Peace Process is initiated by the same superpower that brought about regime change in removing the Taliban post 9/11 and did not support the NRP. The past 20 months of negotiations have not been inclusive or transparent. For example, while the USA has been negotiating with the Taliban, the government of Afghanistan has been left out of the negotiations (Mashal 2019) and not included in the process except briefings by the Special Envoy. The Taliban refused to meet face to face with the Afghan government and insisted that they will talk to the US government representatives. Despite signing the agreement on February 29, 2020, the Taliban still refused to negotiate directly with the Afghan government delegation (Guardian, 2020) in March 2020.

It must be noted that when the negotiations with the Taliban started, one of the four points of the US Special Envoy for Peace and Reconciliation mandate was a ceasefire. However, just before signing the US-Taliban agreement, the terminology changed from ceasefire to reduction in violence (Nikzad 2019) raising speculations for continued bloodshed and further mistrust in the process of peacemaking among the Afghans. Indeed, the bloodshed has continued, and innocent lives are lost, according to the Office of the National Security Council (ONSC), June 2020 has been the deadliest week in 19 years of the conflict since the fall of the Taliban in 2001 (Kabul Now 2020).

Lack of information flow from negotiators to the government officials and from the government to the civil society and common Afghans has created a sense of mistrust around the peace process. When the US-Taliban agreement was signed, the complete document was not made public as the annexes were kept secret (Editorial Board 2020). The process lacks instruments of peacebuilding such as transitional justice, truth commission, role and voices of women and victims of the war, rule of law, human rights including women rights, and national mechanisms and strategy to develop a holistic process that would consider different layers of the conflict from international, regional players to the national. (Please refer to ► Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding for importance of these factors for peacebuilding.)

The Afghan conflict has become a multilayered conflict with a multitude of division lines. The Afghan conflict has a global aspect in which NATO, the USA, and its allies in War on Terrorism are major stakeholders. At the regional level, countries such as Russia, China, Pakistan, Iran, India, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, and UAE interests are in sharp contrast with each other when it comes to Afghanistan (Samad 2020). At the national level, the dividing lines are determined by ethnicity, language, religious groupings of Shia and Sunnis, city versus rural dwellers, and political ideologies and affiliation while the peace process has become yet again an opportunity for obtaining power rather than peace itself.

Since 2001, despite the UN efforts in taking steps toward transitional justice and disarmament, demobilization and reintegration failed to reach fruition because the Afghan leaders were more interested in safeguarding their positions of power than bringing closure to the atrocities of human rights and war crimes since the 1970s. The Afghan Independent Human Rights Commission had written a report on the war crimes and abuse of human rights that were not made public up until today. The amnesty declared in 2007 in the Afghan parliament was the end of pursuing justice in Afghanistan (Hakimi and Suhrke 2013, p. 210). The lack of instruments for transitional justice or victim's presence in the negotiations additionally creates an atmosphere that the peace process will repeat the mistakes of the Bonn Agreement in which distribution of power is the priority (Adili and Hossaini 2020) rather than establishing mechanisms for sustainable reconciliation that could include people's voice and demands especially that of the victims and the most vulnerable groups of the society. (The article on ► Roles of Victims in Peacebuilding highlights how in the past two decades the role of victims has been transformed into active peacebuilders.) Instruments such as reparation, truth, and justice are left to be discussed in intra-Afghan dialogue. The emphasis by international players has been on the withdrawal and reduction of violence, while at the national level for Afghan polity the central focus to move ahead toward Intra-Afghan dialogue is based on rearranging and redistribution of power.

Meanwhile, the bloodshed continues in Afghanistan amidst all warring parties and intergenerational traumas of war loom over the fabric of society. Increased level of crimes in the capital and other cities, illicit drug business, the high number of drug abusers, sexual exploitation of women and children, poverty, and unemployment are all repercussions of a protracted, multidimensional, and multilayered conflict that has gripped the soul of the Afghan society.

Conclusion

The Afghan conflict started as an ideological conflict between Islamic and leftist political groups, both of which were used by the superpowers in the Cold War. The West and Pakistan instrumentalized Jihad as a political tool to defeat the Soviet Union in Afghanistan. However, the conflict during the civil war was redefined along ethnic lines and later during the Taliban, another layer was added that of Shia and Sunni delineation. Since 2001, additional layers of conflict include the divide between city and rural areas and elite versus the common Afghan. Encapsulated like an onion, the national cracks and divisive factors of the past 40 years of conflict are layered with the global and regional realpolitik. The narrative of the Afghan conflict is evolving with time, highlighting that the historical events have been frozen in time as traumas in memory of a war-torn nation that needs years of healing.

Cross-References

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Peace Agreement
- ▶ Roles of Victims in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

References

Ackerman, S. (2018, August 3). Inside the secret Taliban talks to end America's longest war. Daily Beast. <https://www.thedailybeast.com/inside-the-secret-taliban-talks-to-end-americas-longest-war>. Accessed 25 June 2020.

- Adili, A. Y., & Hossaini, K. (2020, April 30). Looking ahead to Intra-Afghan negotiations: A scrutiny of different political groups' plan for peace. Afghan Analyst Network. <https://www.afghanistan-analysts.org/en/reports/war-and-peace/intra-afghan-negotiations-a-look-at-various-afghan-peace-plans/>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Bijlert, M., & Ruttig, T. (2019, August 30). US-Taliban talks: An imminent agreement without peace? Afghan Analyst Network. <https://www.afghanistan-analysts.org/en/reports/war-and-peace/us-taliban-talks-an-imminent-agreement-without-peace/>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Dixit, J. N. (2000). An Afghan Diary: Zahir Shah to Taliban. New Delhi: Konark.
- Editorial Board. (2020, March 10). Trump isn't telling us everything about his deal with the Taliban. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2020/03/10/opinion/afghanistan-taliban-peace-deal.html>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Giustozzi, A. (2000). War politics and society in Afghanistan 1978–1992. Washington, DC: Georgetown University Press.
- Hakimi, A., & Suhrke, A. (2013). A poisonous Chalice: The struggle for human rights and accountability in Afghanistan. Nordic Journal of Human Rights, 31(2), 201–223. <https://www.cmi.no/publications/4801-a-poisonous-chalice>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Hussainkhail, F. (2018, September 22). Khalilzad to facilitate peace process between Govt, Taliban. Tolo News. <https://tolonews.com/afghanistan/khalilzad-facilitate-peace-process-between-govt-and-taliban>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Mashal, M. (2019, January 28). U.S: and Taliban agree in principle to peace framework, Envoy says. The New York Times. <https://www.nytimes.com/2019/01/28/world/asia/taliban-peace-deal-afghanistan.html>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Najibullah, H. (2011). Afghan attempts at peace and reconciliation. New Delhi: Delhi Policy Group.
- Najibullah, Heela. (2017) Reconciliation and Social Healing in Afghanistan: a Transrational and Elicitive Analysis Towards Transformation. Wiesbaden, Germany: Springer.
- Nikzad, K. (2019, December 30). Taliban: No 'ceasefire' but 'reduction of violence'. Tolo News. <https://tolonews.com/afghanistan/taliban-no-ceasefire-reduction-violence>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- ONSC: Taliban kill 291 Afghan forces in deadliest week of 19 years. (2020, June 22). Kabul Now. <https://kabalnow.af/2020/06/onsc-taliban-kill-291-afghan-forces-in-deadliest-week-of-19-years/>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Graham-Harrison, E., & Robert, D. (2013, June 20). US-Taliban Afghanistan peace talks in Qatar cancelled. The Guardian. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2013/jun/20/afghanistan-talks-taliban-qatar-cancelled>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Roy, O. (2001). Islam and resistance in Afghanistan. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rubin, B. (1995). The search for peace in Afghanistan: From buffer state to failed state. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

- Rubin, B. (2013). Afghanistan from the cold war through the war on terror. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Samad, O. (2020, May 29). Afghanistan needs a settlement. Atlantic Council. <https://www.atlanticcouncil.org/blogs/new-atlanticist/afghanistan-needs-a-settlement/>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Semple, M. (2009). Reconciliation in Afghanistan. United States Institute of Peace Press Washington, DC, USA.
- The militant group's refusal represents a setback for US-brokered peace talks. (2020, March 28). Taliban refuses to talk to Afghan government's negotiating team. The Guardian. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2020/mar/28/taliban-refuses-to-talk-to-afghan-governments-negotiating-team>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Thurial, I. B. [@Afghan_Policy]. (2020, March 1). Some quick thoughts and reflections on the US-Taliban Agreement. THREAD [Tweet]. <https://threadreaderapp.com/thread/1234145262316032000.html>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- United States. (2020a). Agreement for bringing peace to Afghanistan between the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan which is not recognized by the United States as a state and knows as the Taliban and the United States of America. <https://www.state.gov/wp-content/uploads/2020/02/Agreement-For-Bringing-Peace-to-Afghanistan-02.29.20.pdf>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- United States. (2020b). Joint declaration between the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan and the United States of America for bringing peace to Afghanistan. <https://www.state.gov/wp-content/uploads/2020/02/02.29.20-US-Afghani-stan-Joint-Declaration.pdf>. Accessed 25 June 2020.
- Wimpelmann, T. (2013). Nexuses of knowledge and power in Afghanistan: the rise and fall of the informal justice assemblage, Central Asian Survey, 32:3, 406–422. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02634937.2013.835200>
- Woodward, B. (2010). Obama's Wars. 1st Simon & Schuster hardcover ed. New York: Simon & Schuster, Print.

Digital Peace

- ▶ Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

Digital Technologies

- ▶ Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

Dignification

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Diplomacy

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Disarmament

- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR)

Walt Kilroy

Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction (IICRR), Dublin City University (DCU), Dublin, Ireland

Definition/Description

Disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR) programs deal with ex-combatants during or after armed conflict, in order to reduce violence and underpin a peace process. They start with individuals voluntarily handing over their arms, followed by some basic demobilization to establish their civilian status. Participants are then offered a choice of returning to education, or (for adults) vocational training so they can establish a livelihood. One of the aims is to reduce the risk of returning to the armed groups which may have provided income, identity, and status. Success is never straightforward (or easy to measure). Reintegration is an open-ended social and economic process, taking place in the community. Some ex-combatants do indeed end up working at what they trained for, benefiting from education, finding a new role, and putting the past behind them. Ex-combatants may face stigma, trauma, and suspicion, especially where communities feel the former fighters are being “rewarded” while civilians miss out. Women face additional stigma, and may not be as well served by DDR. Some do not enroll in order to avoid being identified as an ex-combatant. Specific initiatives for children may involve more psychosocial support and engagement with the community. DDR is just one element in the wider project of moving from war to peace, and interacts with the other parts. It can contribute to the wider peace process, or have a negative impact. Ownership and buy-in are important for success, as reintegration is ultimately a long-term process where ex-combatants and communities are the most important actors.

Introduction

As a cease-fire or settlement of an armed conflict come into view, the question of what would happen with the combatants after war becomes important. They may become spoilers, or a source of instability. They could have a role in reaffirming – or undermining – a peace process, especially when it comes to transitional justice and security sector reform. They may move on to join different armed groups, destabilizing the region as well their own country. Of course, some of the combatants did not join willingly in the first place, or may have been recruited as children. DDR programs have emerged as a set of projects and processes which aim to deal with ex-combatants, in support of the ultimate goal of ensuring that they and their society do not return to armed conflict.

Those designing and funding DDR may primarily be international actors, such as the United Nations and other multilateral bodies, with all the issues of ownership and participation which come with that. “Local” (i.e., national) actors may have clearly defined roles around consultation and implementation, but less power than those who control resources. Some processes, however, involve much greater national ownership and indeed design, such as reintegration in Colombia where details of the program were spelt out in the negotiated peace agreement.

History and Role of DDR

Early examples of DDR include those in Namibia, Mozambique, and Angola in the early 1990s.

Some of the better-known cases (with most of the activities running for several years from 2002) are Liberia, where more than 100,000 fighters joined the program, and its neighbor Sierra Leone. A program in the Democratic Republic of Congo has gone through several phases, as the conflict involving many actors has continued to evolve. There is in fact no guarantee that DDR can secure the peace on its own, even if perfectly run, and it can wax and wane in line with the fortunes of the underlying peace process it is meant to sustain. Like many of the dynamics in conflict and peacebuilding, there is a complex, nonlinear relationship between DDR and the other elements. So many of the factors interact with each other. The causal model is sometimes more like an ecosystem, which requires systems thinking and complexity theory to understand it, rather than a giant piece of clockwork with a mechanistic connection between inputs and outputs. This is one of the reasons why a holistic, integrated approach is required in designing and implementing programs (Berdal and Ucko 2009; Muggah 2006; Colletta and Muggah 2009).

DDR can be placed under the umbrella of peacebuilding, as it is part of the toolbox used to prevent a return to armed conflict, with an idea of reshaping part of a post-war society. Other elements would include security sector reform, resettlement of displaced people, economic reconstruction, rule of law, and governance reforms. The debates over liberal peacebuilding have highlighted the issues of whose political and economic model is used, and the power dynamic when strong international actors set the agenda and control resources. These are reflected in the appropriateness and sustainability of DDR programs with a fast-tracked, top-down approach as opposed to those with a more participatory approach (Dzinesa 2006). Although these things are hard to quantify, there is evidence from Sierra Leone and Liberia that ex-combatants who had a more participatory experience had better outcomes in terms of livelihood, employment, and relationships with the community (Kilroy 2014). It is important to remember that dismissing liberal peacebuilding does not remove the very real challenges, it simply removes some actors from the scene. Combatants will still be faced with questions about how to survive in a post-war society – as will the wider community – whether or not there are any initiatives to facilitate that transition.

DDR can be seen in narrow or broad terms. A narrow approach is focused on immediate security and stabilization (which may be very real concerns). The aim can be caricatured as “get them off the streets and keep them busy.” A broader view takes a longer and more systemic perspective, by considering how DDR relates to social and economic recovery generally. The challenges are real, given that the vocational training may not lead to jobs when the ex-combatants try to make their way in a war-shattered economy. The UN definition of reintegration spells out some of these connections:

Reintegration is the process by which ex-combatants acquire civilian status and gain sustainable employment and income. Reintegration is essentially a social and economic process with an open timeframe, primarily taking place in communities at the local level. It is part of the general development of a country and a national responsibility, and often necessitates long-term external assistance. (UN Secretary-General 2006: p. 8)

Rebuilding Relationships

While the guns and ammunition being handed in are tangible and quantifiable, it is important not to put them at the center of the concept. While they are indeed an important factor, and reducing the number of weapons can change the conflict dynamic, a DDR process never manages to collect all the weapons. This is not in any case a useful measure in itself of a DDR program, as the process is about much more than guns (Subedi 2014). It involves facilitating the remaking of relationships, which is a much larger task, and putting the social contract up for debate in a post-war society (Özderdem 2012; Bowd and Özderdem 2013). Reintegration interacts with other important factors such as identity, stigma, trauma, gender relations, reconciliation, and transitional justice (McMullin 2013; Cutter Patel 2009; Basini 2013; Oppenheim and Söderström 2017). Despite the effort to break the bonds between former commanders and combatants, the relationships between and within these groups can be complex and enduring (Utas 2005, 2012). They range in nature from exploitation to welfare or economic activities, which may in fact offer a better chance of livelihoods than trades for which they received vocational training (Themnér 2012).

Another relevant factor is the role of social capital, involving trust, networks, and norms which help groups to achieve things which they could not do as individuals. DDR is in fact involved in building, transforming, and (sometimes) undermining this social capital, which is itself an essential part of a society’s ability to recover from war and enhance nonviolent ways of dealing with conflict (Leff 2008; Bowd 2011; Nussio and Oppenheim 2014; Kilroy and Basini 2018). One of the ways in which it interacts with social capital is the sense in which ex-combatants enter a “deal” when handing over their weapons: they expect benefits like education or training, and if these are not delivered in line with their expectations, there can be a sense of betrayal. For both communities and ex-combatants, there is a particular window of opportunity when trust can be established or undermined, before conclusions are drawn about how things really work – whatever about the promises (Kreutz and Nussio 2019; Kaplan and Nussio 2015).

Two groups with particular needs have faced different experiences of DDR. Women and men deal with specific challenges during peace and war, and also during reintegration. A gendered analysis is therefore important. Some women face greater stigma, and may avoid the programs in order to avoid being identified as an ex-combatant. Their economic and social opportunities are also different, as are their post-war networks (Coulter 2008; Jennings 2009; Luna 2019; Specht 2006). They have not always been catered for well in DDR, if gender was not fully brought into the planning or consultation. Children, meanwhile, are usually diverted into a parallel program, which is focused on education and engagement with the communities where they will settle. These can be much more substantial in terms of psycho-social support, family tracing, and benefits for the communities which receive them.

Does It Work?

Measuring success for the longer-term outcomes for ex-combatants is difficult, given the number of other variables involved, whatever about assessing the impact on the wider peace process. The limited number of studies have provided mixed results, with little positive impact seen in Sierra Leone according to the measures used (Humphreys and Weinstein 2007). However, significantly better outcomes were seen in Liberia, for those who took part in the program (Pugel 2007). Some of the pressures affecting DDR include the need for a large number of disparate actors, each with their own agendas, capacities, and organizational culture; pressure from donors for early tangible outputs and confidence-building results; corruption and poor administration; and general insecurity, population movement, and limited infrastructure. A significant development has been the growth of professional training courses on different aspects of DDR, and the agreement by a number of UN agencies on a comprehensive set of standards which have been revised and added to since their publication (Integrated Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration Standards (IDDRS) 2006).

Summary

Like any tool, DDR can be used in ways which are more or less appropriate. It does not guarantee a perfect solution, but then ignoring thousands of combatants (many of whom did not choose to join an armed group) does not guarantee solutions either. Ownership and buy-in is important for success, as are coherence with the many other actions and initiatives needed for post-war recovery. Ultimately it is the combatants, the communities, and the society which make reintegration happen or not – a long-term process which DDR programs can facilitate if they are run well.

Cross-References

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016
- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding

- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-building
- ▶ Sierra Leone
- ▶ Social Capital and Peace
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Basini, H. S. A. (2013). Gender mainstreaming unraveled: The case of DDR in Liberia. International Interactions, 39(4), 535–557.
- Berdal, M., & Ucko, D. H. (Eds.). (2009). Reintegrating armed groups after conflict: Politics, violence and transition. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Bowd, R. (2011). Burning the bridges and breaking the bonds: Social capital and its transformative influence in relation to violent conflict. Journal of Conflict Transformation and Security, 1(1), 37–62.
- Bowd, R., & Özerdem, A. (2013). How to assess social reintegration of ex-combatants. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 7(4), 453–475.
- Colletta, N. J., & Muggah, R. (2009). Context matters: Interim stabilisation and second generation approaches to security promotion. Conflict, Security and Development, 9(4), 425–453.
- Coulter, C. (2008). Female fighters in the Sierra Leone war: Challenging the assumptions? Feminist Review, 88, 54–73.
- Cutter Patel, A. (2009). Transitional justice, DDR, and security sector reform. In A. Cutter Patel, P. de Greiff, & L. Waldorf (Eds.), Disarming the past: Transitional justice and excombatants. New York: Social Science Research Council.
- Dzinesa, G. A. (2006). A participatory approach to DDR: Empowering local institutions and abilities. Conflict Trends, 3, 39–43.
- Humphreys, M., & Weinstein, J. M. (2007). Demobilization and reintegration. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 51(4), 531–567.
- Integrated Disarmament, Demobilization and Reintegration Standards (IDDRS). (2006). New York: United Nations (1 August 2006 version). Available from: www.unddr.org. Accessed 2 Sept 2020.
- Jennings, K. M. (2009). The political economy of DDR in Liberia: A gendered critique. Conflict, Security and Development, 9(4), 475–494.
- Kaplan, Oliver, and Nussio, Enzo. (2015). Community counts: The social reintegration of ex-combatants in Colombia. Conflict Management and Peace Science, November.
- Kilroy, W. (2014). Does a more participatory approach to reintegrating ex-combatants lead to better outcomes? Evidence from Sierra Leone and Liberia. Conflict Security and Development, 14(3), 275–308.

- Kilroy, W., & Basini, H. (2018). Social capital made explicit: The role of norms, networks, and trust in reintegrating ex-combatants and peacebuilding in Liberia. International Peacekeeping, 25(3), 349–372.
- Kreutz, J., & Nussio, E. (2019). Destroying trust in government: Effects of a broken pact among Colombian ex-combatants. International Studies Quarterly, 63(4), 1175–1188.
- Leff, J. (2008). The nexus between social capital and reintegration of ex-combatants: A case for Sierra Leone. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 8(1), 9–38.
- Luna, K. C. (2019). Everyday realities of reintegration: Experiences of Maoist ‘verified’ women ex-combatants in the aftermath of war in Nepal. Conflict, Security & Development, 19(5), 453–474.
- McMullin, J. R. (2013). Integration or separation? The stigmatisation of ex-combatants after war. Review of International Studies, 39(2), 385–414.
- Muggah, R. (2006). Emerging from the shadow of war: A critical perspective on DDR and weapons reduction in the post-conflict period. Contemporary Security Policy, 27(1), 190–120.
- Nussio, E., & Oppenheim, B. (2014). Anti-social capital in former members of non-state armed groups: A case study of Colombia. Studies in Conflict and Terrorism, 37(12), 999–1023.
- Oppenheim, B., & Söderström, J. (2017). Citizens by design? Explaining ex-combatant satisfaction with reintegration programming citizens by design? Explaining ex-combatant satisfaction with reintegration programming. The Journal of Development Studies, 54(1), 133–152.
- Özdemir, A. (2012). A re-conceptualisation of ex-combatant reintegration: ‘Social reintegration’ approach. Conflict, Security and Development, 12(1), 51–73.
- Pugel, J. (2007). What the fighters say: A survey of ex-combatants in Liberia, February–March 2006. Monrovia: UNDP Liberia Joint Implementation Unit (JIU).
- Specht, I. (2006). Red shoes: Experiences of girl-combatants in Liberia. Geneva: International Labour Office.
- Subedi, D. B. (2014). Conflict, combatants, and cash: Economic reintegration and livelihoods of ex-combatants in Nepal. World Development, 59, 238–250.
- Themnér, A. (2012). Former mid-level commanders in big man networks. In M. Utas (Ed.), African conflicts and informal power: Big men and networks. London: Zed Books.
- UN Secretary-General. (2006). Disarmament, demobilization and reintegration, Report of the Secretary-General to UN General Assembly, A/60/705, 2 Mar 2006.
- Utas, M. (2005). Building the future: The reintegration and marginalisation of ex-combatant youth in Liberia. In P. Richards (Ed.), No peace, no war: An anthropology of contemporary armed conflicts. Oxford: James Currey.
- Utas, M. (2012). Introduction: Bigmanity and network governance in African conflicts. In M. Utas (Ed.), African conflicts and informal power: Big men and networks. London: Zed Books.

Discrimination

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia

Disintegration

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Dispute Resolution

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Distributive Negotiation

- ▶ Negotiation

Disunity

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Diversity

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Divided Cities

Ivan Gusic
Lund University, Lund, Sweden
Department of Global Political Studies, Malmö
University, Malmö, Sweden

Synonyms

Contested cities; Frontier cities; Polarized cities; Postwar cities

Definition

Divided cities are cities that have recently experienced war, no longer do, but are stuck in transitions to peace because the conflict over their political system and future status continues between the previously warring parties. Notable examples are Belfast (Northern Ireland), Jerusalem (Israel-Palestine), and Nicosia (Cyprus).

Introduction

Divided cities are hardly new war and peace phenomena. Prominent cases like Belfast, Jerusalem, and Nicosia –i.e., cities that have experienced war, no longer do, but are stuck in transitions to peace – are longstanding (Gusic 2019). Yet what is novel about divided cities is that they are increasingly causing problems for people living in them, for the cities themselves, and for the wider war-to-peace transitions they often are central in. This entry has five parts. It first explores why divided cities have become topical, then problematizes the labels used to define them, elaborates on their core conceptual aspects, and reflects upon their potentials and problems. It ends with a summary.

Divided Cities in an Ever-Urbanizing World

Divided cities have become topical for several reasons. One is the rapidly growing centrality of cities. While cities always have been vital to society, they are more central than ever before and growing in importance with an unprecedented speed (Brenner 2014). Cities are economic hubs that drive global growth, stand for disproportionate amounts of GDP output, and link regional economies (Sassen 2002). More than half of humanity lives in cities while the future population growth will be almost exclusively urban, thereby expanding the world's urban population from today's 55% to 68% in 2050 and 85% in 2100 (OECD 2015; United Nations 2019). Cities are also the location of universities and tertiary hospitals, of instruments of governing, of protests and riots, and of progress in arts, politics, and science (Brenner 2014). This trend has made cities highly strategic resources in winning war and securing peace. It is today hard to imagine territorial entities being viable without the materiality of cities – as economic hubs, political centers, and infrastructural nodes – or having legitimacy without the symbolism of cities – as sites of civilization, politics, and culture (Beall et al. 2013; Patel and Burkle 2012). The result is that divided cities have become more important to hold and less acceptable to lose, effectively making Albanian-Serb conflict lines more entrenched in Mitrovica than elsewhere in Kosovo, Belfast the flashpoint of Catholic-Protestant violence in Northern Ireland, and control over Jerusalem an existential issue in Israel-Palestine.

Urbanization of war is another reason why divided cities have become topical. The just-mentioned centrality of cities often leads conflict parties to concentrate war efforts to key urban sites, thereby making cities like Aleppo, Marawi, and Sarajevo major frontiers in wider conflicts (Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011; Graham 2010; Pullan 2011). The economic centrality of cities also makes them vital to war economics, with the ability to fight often dependent on controlling cities (Beall et al. 2013). This economic potency is even more elevated in war as cities often become nodes of criminal activities and entry-points of aid (Hills 2009). Since many contemporary wars are identity-based, cities are also targeted as both symbols of heterogeneous coexistence and actual sites of intergroup mixing (Ristic 2014; Yassin 2010). The predominance of intrastate and asymmetric wars exposes cities even more since urban sites help insurgents level the playing field – e.g., by providing them with illicit revenues or easy refuge amongst civilians (Elfversson et al. 2019). This inability to separate civilians from insurgents additionally makes cities notoriously hard to conquer, effectively making urban warfare entrenched (Beall et al. 2013). It is thus not by accident that Aleppo took so long to fall or that both Mostar and Beirut were divided rather than seized during their respective wars. Urbanization of war has thus made the circumstances in which cities become divided increasingly common.

Divided, Contested, or Postwar Cities?

Cities like Jerusalem, Mostar, and Nicosia belong to the same category of cities because they have experienced war, no longer do, but are stuck in transitions to peace (cf. Bollens 2012; Calame and Charlesworth 2009; Gusic 2019). Yet these cities are often studied under different labels, which makes their conceptual core imprecise, confuses outsiders who may not realize that the same cities are studied, and keeps compatible studies isolated since they study “different” cities. It is therefore important to elaborate on these labels, reflect upon the implications, strengths, and weaknesses of each, but also assert that research under these labels tends to be compatible. Below the most common labels are covered: divided, contested, and postwar.

Divided cities is the most common label used to depict cities such as Jerusalem and Mostar. Its principal advantage is that almost everybody “knows” what is alluded to when one refers to these cities as divided. They were namely divided by the preceding war and still tend to function apart (Björkdahl and Strömbom 2015; Calame and Charlesworth 2009; Carabelli 2018). This directness, however, is also its main disadvantage. The reason is that every city is divided according to some axis, effectively making the term “divided” imprecise since it is unclear both what kind of divisions are alluded to and what kind of cities are singled out (Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011). This disadvantage is made evident by the fact that research on divided cities often focuses on cities without recent experience of war and/or examines divisions according to class or political preference.

The label contested cities is more precise whilst also being commonsensical. Cities such as Sarajevo and Nicosia are contested in terms of how they are to be socio-politically ordered, both regarding the composition of their political systems and regarding which political entities they belong to (Hepburn 2004; Pullan and Baillie 2013; Rokem and Boano 2018). Yet the term “contested” is not without its ambiguities. Cities can be contested without the conflict being about the political system or territorial belonging, like contestation between squatters and property owners or between security forces and criminal organizations. Cities can also be contested without recent experience of war, as made evident by the fact that research on contested cities sometimes includes cities such as Brussels and Montreal.

This problem of imprecision in divided and contested is often amended through the prefix “ethnationally [divided/contested cities]” (see Allegra et al. 2012; Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011) – which both narrows down possible cases and captures common conflict lines. Yet this prefix is problematic. It travels badly since conflict lines do not have to be ethnonational, but can be religious like in Bagdad or ideological like in Berlin during the Cold War. It also fuels simplistic explanations since these cities rarely are ethnationally divided/contested only – e.g., while conflict lines in Belfast do run along a “Catholic-Protestant” axis, class-based and intragroup tensions also exist (Murtagh and Shirlow 2006). This prefix also does little to exclude cities without recent experiences of war.

The label postwar cities is much more precise since it captures the core of what makes these cities stand out: they have experienced war, no longer do, but are stuck in transitions to peace because they continue to be disputed along conflict lines of war (Bou Akar 2018; Gusic 2019; Sawalha 2010). This label thus escapes the problem of both contested and divided as it never focuses on general divisions and contestations only while excluding cities without recent experiences of war. Yet it faces problems of its own, the most substantive of which is that the term “postwar” is not univocally used to depict still ongoing war-to-peace transitions but also settings that are recovering from war without being fundamentally disputed.

These different labels thus differ in precision, implication, and problems. Within the context of war and peace, however, research focusing on these cities tend to be compatible. No matter what label is used, researchers tend to include the same cases whilst focusing on similar research problem(s). For reasons of readability, the reminder of this chapter will use the label “divided cities”, but in doing so it will also refer to research on contested and postwar cities.

The Conceptual Core of Divided Cities

Divided cities have two conceptual “building blocks”: they are cities and they are stuck in war-to-peace transitions. While there is not one undisputed definition of cities, they are often theorized as constituted by (1) heterogeneity, (2) density, and (3) openness and permeability. This means that cities consists of heterogeneous elements of people, institutions, ideas, and so on that exist in unescapable proximity and have access to multiple contact points such as streets and squares in which they can meet. Added to this internal constitution is that cities also are central within their wider contexts (Hall 1999; Lefebvre 1996; Wirth 1964). Cities are additionally often theorized as functioning through (1) mixing, (2) conflict, (3) accommodation, (4) creativity, and (5) fragmentation. This means that cities mix heterogeneous elements together, the result of which is conflict over everything from housing and employment to political direction; mutual accommodation since coexistence in the same city is impossible without it; creation of new identities, innovative services, and hybrid political movements; and fragmentation of city life since the complexity of cities mean that their heterogeneous elements often exist side-by-side rather than together (Amin and Thrift 2002; Hall 1999; Sennett 1991).

The definition of incomplete war-to-peace transitions is not undisputed either. In broad brushstrokes, it nevertheless implies that the political entities in question have experienced war, no longer do, but are yet to transition to peace because the conflict over them continues – i.e., there is no consensus regarding their political system and/or future status while the return to war is not unimaginable (Davenport et al. 2018; Mac Ginty 2006; Wallensteen 2015).

The Common Features of Divided Cities

When combining these two conceptual building blocks, divided cities emerge as cities that have experienced war, no longer do, but are yet to transition to peace because the conflict over their political system and future status continues. This continuation of conflict manifests itself in multiple ways. A prominent feature of divided cities is different forms of parallelism. Institutional parallelism is one example. While its nature and extent differs – stretching from complete separation of Nicosia’s city administration(s) between two competing states (Calame and Charlesworth 2009) to informal parallelism within Mostar’s “united” administration where Bosniaks control the eastern and Croats the western part of the city (Björkdahl and Gusic 2013) – the principal modus operandi are that antagonistic groups try to govern themselves without influence from “the [enemy] other.” The result is everything from overlapping security forces that compete over the same territory to duplication of social services in the sense that they operate in “our” part of the city only – e.g., in Beirut different armed groups constantly struggle over strategic sites while Mostar has two garage disposal services that focus on the eastern or western part of the city. Residential parallelism is also common, meaning that people live in homogenous clusters and have little to no contact with “the other.” These clusters can be scattered across the city with group dominance changing from street to street – like it does in Belfast (Murtagh and Shirlow 2006) – or exist as large blocks – like Albanians who mostly live on the south side of Mitrovica’s Ibar river while Serbs mostly live on the north side (Gusic 2019). Educational parallelism is also prevalent in divided cities. This means that student bodies are segregated, education systems are divided, and curricula are incompatible and biased to the point of propaganda (Hromadžić 2008). Infrastructural parallelism, while less common, also tends to exist in divided cities. It manifests itself in duplication of everything from electricity grids, water supplies, and sewage systems to public transport and roads. This means that while different city parts are technically side-by-side, they function like different cities as electricity outages or water supply problems tend to only affect one side of the city (Calame and Charlesworth 2009; Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011).

Another prevalent feature of divided cities is that people end up living as “intimate enemies” (Bollens 1999, 8). The density and mixing of cities means that stable demarcation lines separating antagonists are much harder to establish in urban settings than elsewhere. The result is that people in divided cities are forced to constantly engage with “the other.” This often leads to clashes, tensions, and violence becoming both routinized and omnipresent in everyday life (Pullan and Baillie 2013). Examples are when stones are thrown at “their” school busses in Belfast for driving through “our” areas or when youth in Mitrovica engage in fights along ethnonational lines on or around the bridges over Ibar. Had the different antagonists in each city not lived so close to one another, these everyday clashes would not have been as frequent.

Divided cities also tend to become securitized. The difficulty to establish stable demarcation lines combined with intimate enmity often means that everything which is “ours” is seen as vulnerable (Bollens 2012). Few parts of divided cities are therefore unaffected by the continuation of conflict; instead almost every square meter – from power plants and major employers to streets and buildings – is claimed and protected through defensive architecture, paramilitary patrols, and everyday intimidation. The few excepted parts that remain “mixed” are in turn attacked because they are either seen as opportunities to get the upper hand by securing more territory and/or symbols of coexistence that undermine arguments for division (Sassen 2013).

The omnipresence of macroconflicts in everyday life is also prevalent. Conflict is in many ways integral to how cities function – without it heterogeneity or creativity would not exist either. Yet divided cities tend to transform everyday conflicts inherent to cities into principled and toxic “us and them” conflicts that cannot be compromised over. This means that seemingly mundane microissues – such as the widening of streets, renovation of water pipes, or business permits – all become about group survival (Silver 2010). Examples include constant struggles over where to locate healthcare facilities or community centers in Belfast, over the number of religious venues in Mostar, and over the construction of residential areas in Jerusalem.

Divided cities lastly tend to become built apart since impenetrable delineation towards “the other side” is seen as instrumental to both protect the in-group and cement city ownership. One common strategy to achieve this is to construct walls, barricades, fences, buffer zones, and checkpoints. An (in)famous example is the Green Line, a demilitarized buffer zone that was created decades ago, still is patrolled by UN peacekeepers, and almost completely separates Greeks and Turks in Nicosia. Belfast’s peacewalls are almost as notorious. Erected in the beginning of war to keep Catholics and Protestants apart, they are today longer and higher than ever and effectively sever the connections between adjacent city areas. This is because people can only go “over there” through gates that are limited in number, usually far away, and irregularly open (Calame and Charlesworth 2009; Murtagh and Shirlow 2006). Yet many other divided cities also have defensive architecture that materially and/or symbolically keeps people separated. Barricades have over the years been erected by Serbs in Mitrovica determined to keep both Albanians and the Kosovar state out (Gusic 2019), Jerusalem is filled with walls and checkpoints intended to protect Israelis and control Palestinians (Rokem and Boano 2018), and Beirut is still dissected by defensive lines between Christians, Shias, and Sunnis between whom renewed war is not unthinkable (Bou Akar 2018).

The Effects on Citizens, the Cities Themselves, and the Wider Conflict Settings

The effects of these common features are often severe. Citizens in divided cities are often exposed to quite high levels of violence, have their rights to healthcare or employment denied, and are unable to access all city parts. Belfast has merely 20% of the Northern Irish population but attracts 40% of its violence. The city is also where dissident paramilitaries have concentrated attacks in the aftermath of the Brexit vote (Gaffikin and Morrissey 2006, 879). The socio-political modus operandi in Mostar is almost entirely ethnonational in nature, meaning that group belonging and loyalty is key for accessing jobs and services while genuine needs, legislated rights, or qualification matter far less. Nicosia in turn is so securitized and built apart that people can only cross to “the other side” by foot and via double checkpoints where ID cards must be shown and access always can be denied (Calame and Charlesworth 2009). Citizens in these cities also tend to live divided and politicized lives with little everyday interaction with “them.” Part of the explanation is that people do not want to interact. Yet part of it is also that noncontact is encouraged while mixing is discouraged in the sense that people can get beaten up if coming “here” as well as excluded if socializing with “them.” Examples include intimidation by the infamous “Bridge Watchers” in Mitrovica and paramilitary activity in Beirut (Bou Akar 2018; Gusic 2019).

Divided cities themselves hardly escape problems either. Division in almost all segments of life means that everything in these cities – like city councils or healthcare systems – is much more ineffective and expensive than necessary (Kliot and Mansfeld 1999). This is illustrated by the fact that Beirut has numerous security services, Mitrovica has two country codes, and Mostar has two (ethnonationally coded) universities. Parallelism, securitization, and defensive architecture also lead divided cities to be much more homogenous, closed, and impermeable while experiencing far less mixing and accommodation. The effect is that these cities become starkly fragmented and paralyzed when it comes to infrastructure projects, economic development, and anti-corruption measures (Silver 2010; Yassin 2010). Divided cities also tend to underperform economically since few companies are willing to accept arbitrary rule of law, deadlocked politics, or reoccurring violence. Parallelism, securitization, and omnipresence of conflict in turn undermine the internal economic dynamics of cities in the sense that people stop trading with “the other side” because of fear, intimidation, or zero-sum politics (Sassen 2013).

The wider contexts of divided cities also tend to be impacted by them. The fact that conflict continues more uninterruptedly and intensely in divided cities means that they often become the primary fault lines of wider conflicts, the major hinders in wider peace processes, and the most volatile flashpoints of renewed violence. Tensions between the different sides can be found across Lebanon, yet the preparations for “the war yet to come” are nevertheless concentrating to frontiers in Beirut (Bou Akar 2018, 8). Illegal settlements, continued violence, refugee return, and the “security barrier” are concrete and everyday problems that affect almost everyone across Israel-Palestine. Yet the right to Jerusalem still constitutes one of the most significant hinders to peace (Bollens 1999). Mitrovica in turn is where violent events have highest potency to generate Kosovo-wide tensions since both Albanians and Serbs see the city as imperative to control (Gusic 2019).

Potentials and Problems of Divided Cities in War and Peace

Some wider key points about divided cities are important to emphasize. The first point is that divided cities lose most of their ability to foster coexistence between previously warring groups. This constructive potential stems from how cities are constituted and function. Aspects such as heterogeneity and mixing are often argued to give cities ability to transcend societal divides, bridge communities, and stimulate coexistence (Amin and Thrift 2002; Lefebvre 1996; Sassen 2013). This also stretches to divided cities, which consist of different previously warring groups that are densely located, have permeability between them, and mix with each other. This can generate reconciliation as people are both able and forced to regularly meet “the other” (Bollens 1999; Gusic 2019). Divided cities also have almost indivisible assets and shared problems – like water supplies, sewer systems, and social services – that are best addressed together. This need for cooperation has the potential to create shared socio-political rule (Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011; Rokem and Boano 2018). The centrality of divided cities lastly means that what happens in them will spread beyond them. If divided cities then happen to stimulate coexistence and shared socio-political rule, these dynamics might have spill-over effects to wider conflict settings (Bollens 2012). War-to-peace transitions, however, tend to undermine the aspects of cities which give them constructive potential (Sassen 2013). People clustering, attending segregated schools, and avoiding “the other” leads divided cities to mostly consist of homogenous parts. Defensive architecture, fear, and securitization in turn undermine permeability and remove contact points in which “the other” can be encountered. Divided cities also tend to undermine mixing and accommodation, both by removing the preconditions of mixing (e.g., heterogeneity or openness and permeability) and by making mixing and accommodation something that is best avoided. The results are that people are much less able to meet each other (Björkdahl and Strömbom 2015; Sassen 2013). The same applies to citywide cooperation. The tendency of all issues to become about the macro-conflict makes almost all compromises with “the other” highly controversial in divided cities. Parallelism also means that there are far less indivisible assets and shared problems in divided cities over which compromise is needed. This weakened ability to both bring people together and create cooperation through shared socio-political rule also has wider effects; instead of becoming models for peaceful coexistence, divided cities often become symbols of how coexistence is impossible (Calame and Charlesworth 2009).

The second point, however, is that divided cities nevertheless retain some ability to foster coexistence between previously warring groups (Bollens 2012; Gusic 2019; Pullan and Baillie 2013). It is hard to make all city parts utterly homogenous as this would require dynamics such as clustering or securitization to be both omnipresent and unopposed. Since this is rarely the case, most divided cities retain some heterogeneity. Openness and permeability are likewise difficult to destroy. While divided cities may lose many contact points, it is hard to close them down completely. Removing the ability to move between what contact points still remain is equally hard since it would require different city parts to become hermetically sealed from each other. Mixing also tends to continue. Mixing in divided cities is undermined both by the removal of its preconditions and by rendering it something best avoided. Yet divided cities always retain some heterogeneity while rarely becoming completely closed down and impermeable. It is moreover all but impossible to convince, threaten, or force everyone to not interact with “them.” The incompleteness of both dynamics means that some people in divided cities still mix (Bollens 2012; Rokem and Boano 2018). This continued existence of heterogeneity, openness and permeability, and mixing – in combination with density (which makes antagonists live close to one another) and fragmentation (which allows progressives to establish a presence there) – makes divided cities able to foster coexistence between previously warring groups. While this rarely is the case, such an outcome does not diminish the potential of divided cities. There are not many “political entities where ‘the other’ can be met with such ease, where people are as heterogeneous, and where cooperation is that common” as in divided cities (Gusic 2019, 263). Jerusalem may be the issue that no one wants to compromise over, yet it still holds and attracts multitudes of different people, making it perhaps the place in Israel-Palestine where mixing is most likely (Rokem and Boano 2018). Kirkuk both concentrates and generates violence. Yet Kirkuk’s density – as well as its disputed status – also means that there are few places in Iraq in which people can and do engage “the other” as much (O’Driscoll 2018). Mostar lastly often lives up to its entrenched reputation. Yet there is parallelly no major city in Bosnia-Herzegovina as heterogeneous as Mostar (Carabelli 2018).

The third point is that continued divisions – especially among “ordinary” people – often have less to do with group-based animosities or post-war struggles than with indirect effects of conflict (Gusic 2019). Built environment is one example. Divided cities are often materially divided through defensive architecture that “made sense” and was supported at the time of construction. Yet since built environment is long-lasting (Massey 2005), the peacewalls in Belfast and the Green Line in Nicosia still continue to separate people, even if the levels of violence that once spurred these walls and this line are long gone (Bollens 2012; Calame and Charlesworth 2009). The routinization of division is another example. Residential clustering, educational segregation, and institutional separation all divide everyday life of people in divided cities – e.g., into north/south in Nicosia or east/west in Jerusalem. Not necessarily because people are actively trying to avoid “the other,” but because it is more convenient to live near family and friends, attend the closest school, and go to the local restaurant. If these aspects of everyday life are located in parallel worlds, which in divided cities they tend to be, division becomes routinized rather than actively pursued (Boal 1996). Another example is commanders-turned-politicians who often retain and/or gain control over employment opportunities or welfare provisions. This creates patron-client relationships between politicians who want to uphold group-based division and citizens who just want to secure everyday socioeconomic survival. The result is that people uphold divisions because they do not want to become unemployed or be denied healthcare, not because they despise “the other” (Gusic 2019).

These observations lead into the final point, which is that once cities become divided they tend to stay divided. The reason in that divisions often are self-reinforcing. An alternative reading of the just mentioned examples is that they are extremely hard to break out from. Belfast’s peacewalls are difficult to move across while the current political situation means their immanent removal is unlikely. The result is that most people are forced to continue living parallel everyday lives since walls cannot be ignored or forgotten (Murtagh and Shirlow 2006). The rather complete division of Greek and Turkish everyday life since 1974 means that noncontact with “them” is the only thing most people in Nicosia have known. The result is that people continue living apart since even if one wants to, engaging with “them” takes more time and effort than most have (Calame and Charlesworth 2009). The almost complete control Mostar’s ethnonational elites have over the employment market in turn means that socioeconomic survival and coexistence with “them” is an unattainable combination for most (Gusic 2019).

Concluding Summary

Divided cities are thus cities that have recently experienced war, no longer do, but are yet to transition to peace because the conflict over their political system and future status continues between the previously warring parties. While principal cases such as Belfast, Jerusalem, or Nicosia are longstanding phenomena within war and peace, rapidly increasing centrality of cities combined with urbanization of war is making divided cities increasingly topical in wider conflicts across the world.

These cities tend to share certain common features due to the continuity of conflict they experience. They often suffer from different forms of parallelism, from heavy securitization, from “intimate enmity” between previous neighbors, from macroconflicts becoming part of everyday life, and from divisive walls, buffer zones, and checkpoints. These commonalities often produce negative effects for citizens who are denied rights and exposed to violence, for cities themselves who often function either parallelly or poorly, and for wider conflict settings whose peace processes often are stalled. One long-term consequence of these commonalities and negative effects is that divided cities lose much of their ability to foster coexistence between people. This constructive potential, however, is never truly lost and often remains an underutilized feature of divided cities.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Allegra, M., Casaglia, A., & Rokem, J. (2012). The political geographies of urban polarization: A critical review of research on divided cities. Geography Compass, 6, 560–574.

- Amin, A., & Thrift, N. (2002). Cities: Reimagining the urban. Malden: Polity.
- Beall, J., Goodfellow, T., & Rodgers, D. (2013). Cities and conflict in fragile states in the developing world. Urban Studies, 50(15), 3065–3083.
- Björkdahl, A., & Gusic, I. (2013). The divided city: A space for frictional peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 1(3), 317–333.
- Björkdahl, A., & Strömbom, L. (2015). Divided cities: Governing diversity. Lund: Nordic Academic Press.
- Boal, F. W. (1996). Integration and division: Sharing and segregating in Belfast. Planning Practice and Research, 11(2), 151–158.
- Bollens, S. A. (1999). Urban peace-building in divided societies: Belfast and Johannesburg. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Bollens, S. A. (2012). City and soul in divided societies. New York: Routledge.
- Bou Akar, H. (2018). For the war yet to come: Planning Beirut's frontiers. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Brenner, N. (2014). Implosions/explosions: Towards a study of planetary urbanization. Berlin: Jovis.
- Calame, J., & Charlesworth, E. (2009). Divided cities: Belfast, Beirut, Jerusalem, Mostar, and Nicosia. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Carabelli, G. (2018). The divided city and the grassroots: The (un)making of ethnic divisions in Mostar. Singapore: Palgrave.
- Davenport, C., Melander, E., & Regan, P. M. (2018). The peace continuum: What it is and how to study it. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Elfversson, E., Gusic, I., & Höglund, K. (2019). The spatiality of violence in postwar cities. Third World Thematics, 4(2–3), 81–93.
- Gaffikin, F., & Morrissey, M. (2006). Planning for peace in contested space. International Journal of Urban and Regional Research, 30(4), 873–893.
- Gaffikin, F., & Morrissey, M. (2011). Planning in divided cities: Collaborative shaping of contested space. Hoboken: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Graham, S. (2010). Cities under siege: The new military urbanism. London: Verso.
- Gusic, I. (2019). Contesting peace in the postwar city: Belfast, Mitrovica and Mostar. Cham: Palgrave.
- Hall, P. (1999). Cities in civilization: Culture, innovation, and urban order. London: Phoenix Giant.
- Hepburn, A. C. (2004). Contested cities in the modern west. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Hills, A. (2009). Policing post-conflict cities. London: Zed Books.
- Hromadžić, A. (2008). Discourses of integration and practices of reunification at the Mostar Gymnasium, Bosnia and Herzegovina. Comparative Education Review, 52(4), 541–563.
- Kliot, N., & Mansfeld, Y. (1999). Case studies of conflict and territorial organization in divided cities. Progress in Planning, 52(3), 167–225.
- Lefebvre, H. (1996). Writings on cities. Cambridge: Blackwell.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2006). No war no peace: The rejuvenation of stalled peace processes and peace accords. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Massey, D. (2005). For space. London: SAGE.
- Murtagh, B., & Shirlow, P. (2006). Belfast: Segregation, violence, and the city. London: Pluto Press.
- O'Driscoll, D. (2018). Conflict in Kirkuk: A comparative perspective of cross-regional self-determination disputes. Ethnopolitics, 17(1), 37–54.
- OECD. (2015). The Metropolitan Century: Understanding Urbanisation and its Consequences, OECD Publishing, Paris, <https://doi.org/10.1787/9789264228733-en>.
- Patel, R. B., & Burkle, F. M. (2012). Rapid urbanization and the growing threat of violence and conflict: A 21st century crisis. Prehospital and Disaster Medicine, 27(2), 194–197.
- Pullan, W. (2011). Frontier urbanism: the periphery at the centre of contested cities. The Journal of Architecture 16(1), 15–35.
- Pullan, W., & Baillie, B. (Eds.). (2013). Locating urban conflicts: Ethnicity, nationalism and the everyday. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ristic, M. (2014). 'Sniper alley': The politics of urban violence in the besieged Sarajevo. Built Environment, 40(3), 342–356.
- Rokem, J., & Boano, C. (2018). Urban geopolitics: Rethinking planning in contested cities. London: Routledge.
- Sassen, S. (2002). Global networks, linked cities. New York: Routledge.
- Sassen, S. (2013). Cities as one site for religion and violence. In M. Juergensmeyer, M. Kitts, & M. K. Jerryson (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of religion and violence. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Sawalha, A. (2010). Reconstructing Beirut: Memory and space in a postwar Arab city. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Sennett, R. (1991). The conscience of the eye: The design and social life of cities. London: Faber & Faber.
- Silver, H. (2010). Divided cities in the Middle East. City & Community, 9(4), 345–357.
- United Nations, Department of Economic and Social Affairs, Population Division. (2019). World Urbanization Prospects 2018: Highlights (ST/ESA/SER.A/421).
- Wallensteen, P. (2015). Quality peace: Peacebuilding, victory and world order. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Wirth, L. (1964). On cities and social life: Selected papers. Chicago: Chicago University Press.
- Yassin, N. (2010). Violent urbanization and homogenisation of space and place: Reconstructing the story of sectarian violence in Beirut. In J. Beall, B. Guha-Khasnobis, & R. Kanbur (Eds.), Urbanization and development: Multi-disciplinary perspectives. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Divided Societies

- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
-

Division

- ▶ Balkanization
 - ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
 - ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
-

DR Congo: Local and International Peacebuilders' Interaction

Sara Hellmüller

Centre on Conflict, Development and Peacebuilding, Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies, Geneva, Switzerland

Keywords

Peacebuilding · Local peace · Democratic Republic of Congo

Introduction¹

The way local and international peacebuilders interact in a given conflict context is a crucial factor for understanding the success or failure of their efforts. However, most scholars have focused on either the local or the international side of the interaction.² Authors focusing on local peacebuilders usually concentrate on civil society and its role in peacebuilding (e.g., Kanol 2010; Paffenholz 2010; Pouligny 2005). They assess different local peace initiatives and show that they can make an important contribution to peace (Call and Cook 2003; Haider 2009; Prendergast and Plumb 2002; Van Tongeren et al. 1999, 2005). However, they do not always provide an in-depth analysis of how these different local efforts interact with international peacebuilding programs. If they do, the focus is often limited to reflections on how international peacebuilders can best support local initiatives and less on how local peacebuilders can contribute to improving international programs (Donais 2012; Hoksbergen 2005). Other authors focus on international peacebuilders. As Call and Cook (2003) state, peace scholars often take for granted to focus on international actors as the latter are assumed to have the lead in addressing conflict-affected contexts. This does not mean that they completely overlook local actors, but they rarely consider local actors as peacebuilders in their own right. Rather they focus on how international peacebuilders interact with the local population more broadly. This risks portraying local actors as “objects” rather than “subjects” of peacebuilding. In contrast to these previous studies, this entry underlines the importance of understanding the interaction between local and international peacebuilders as a central factor influencing the effectiveness of efforts to address armed conflicts. It first defines key terms and provides a review of the literature on local and international peacebuilders. It then presents insights from the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) illustrating the importance of analyzing the interaction between local and international peacebuilders to understand the success or failure of their efforts.

Definitions

Peacebuilding

Galtung (1975) coined the term “peacebuilding” in a groundbreaking essay entitled “Three Approaches to Peace: Peacekeeping, Peacemaking and Peacebuilding” in 1975. Yet, the term only made its entry into policy in 1992, when former UN Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali ¹This entry heavily draws on the book Partners for Peace: The Interaction between Local and International Peacebuilding Actors; see Hellmüller (2018).

²Ibrahim Abdi and Mason (2019) and Van Leeuwen (2009) provide noteworthy exceptions focusing directly on the interaction between local and international peacebuilders.

defined it in his An Agenda for Peace as “action to identify and support structures which will tend to strengthen and solidify peace” (Boutros-Ghali 1992). Since then, peacebuilding has come to involve a wide range of activities such as establishing security, socioeconomic foundations, and a new political framework as well as promoting reconciliation and justice (Barnett et al. 2007, pp. 49–50; Chetail 2009, p. 8; Smith 2004, p. 27).³ International organizations, bilateral donors, and NGOs have integrated these different activities into their policies and programs (Goetschel and Hagmann 2009, p. 56). While international peacebuilding has become prominent in policy-making and practice, in every conflict context, there are manifold local actors who build peace, for instance, by mediating in local conflicts, sensitizing for peaceful values, bringing people together in joint activities, helping communities to engage with the past, or creating local peace structures (Abo Naser et al. 2016; Hellmüller 2018; Mac Ginty 2008b; Van Tongeren et al. 2005). Such local peacebuilding initiatives have attracted increased scholarly interest since the so-called local turn in peace research (Mac Ginty and Richmond) (see ► “Everyday Peace”, ► “Local Peacebuilding”, ► “Peace Infrastructures”).

Local and International Peacebuilders

The categories of local and international peacebuilders are heterogeneous (Belloni 2012, p. 23; Kappler 2015, pp. 875–877; Nagelhus Schia and Karlsrud 2012, p. 16). As Millar (2014, p. 32) puts it, they are “placeholders for what are more complicated collections of actors with varying interests and levels of influence.”⁴ Therefore, the labels “local” and “international”

³Barnett et al. (2007) define peacebuilding along three dimensions: stability creation, restoration of state institutions, and socioeconomic dimensions. Similarly, Chetail (2009) cites security, socioeconomic recovery, and democracy as components of peacebuilding. Smith (2004) adds reconciliation as one of the main activities of peacebuilding.

⁴He refers to the terms “local” and “global,” but his statement is arguably also valid for the categories of “local” and “international.”

do not imply a hermetically distinct and homogeneous nature. Rather, identities are fluid, multiple, and dynamic. This calls for open definitions that leave enough space for context-specific nuances. Against this background, local peacebuilders are defined as actors that engage in peacebuilding and have a majority of national staff, their headquarters is in the conflict context, and they operate at the sub-national level. International peacebuilders are defined as actors that engage in peacebuilding and have at least some expatriates on staff in their country office (most of the time in the higher echelons of the organizational chart), their headquarters is outside of a given conflict context, and they are active in several conflict contexts. In the identification of whether these local and international actors are engaged in peacebuilding, it is advisable to explore whether they are known in the population for pursuing activities that are locally defined as building peace and whether they refer to themselves or are referred to by others as active in these activities. The form they take can vary from a few individuals working together in a loose association to a fully institutionalized and officially registered organization.

State of the Literature: Local and International Peacebuilding

While peacekeeping developed during the Cold War, what became known as international peacebuilding is largely a child of the post-Cold War years. With the unblocking of the UN Security Council, the numbers of UN missions in the world increased markedly. Between 1988 and 1992, 14 new operational missions were set up (Sabaratnam 2011, p. 15). Over roughly the same period of time (1988–1993), the number of peacekeepers in the field increased from 10,000 to an estimated 70,000, and the budget rose from approximately US$ 400,000 in 1990 to US$ 3.7 billion in 1993 (Fetherston and Nordstrom 1995, p. 100). This period was marked by a strong enthusiasm for liberalism. While the bipolar competition during the Cold War had rendered it impossible for the UN or other actors to promote any system as a “model” of domestic governance, this changed with the domination of liberalism (Paris 2004, p. 15). The ultimate objective of international peacebuilding became the promotion of liberal democratic governance (Barnett 2006; Bellamy and Williams 2004; Paris 2004; Richmond 2004b; Zahar 2012; Zaum 2012). Such liberal peacebuilding denotes “the promotion of democracy, market-based economic reforms and a range of other institutions associated with ‘modern’ states as a driving force for building ‘peace’” (Newman et al. 2009, p. 3). The design of UN missions mirrored this liberal approach as they were henceforth mandated to promote democratic elections and market liberalization (Newman et al. 2009; Von Billerbeck 2016). This was exemplified in UN mission deployments to Angola (1988–1991 and 1991–1995), El Salvador (1991–1995), Cambodia (1991–1993), and Mozambique (1992–1994) (Chetail 2009, p. 12; Ottawa 2003, p. 314; Paris 2011, p. 33).

At the same time, state failure came to be considered one of the main reasons for armed conflicts (Newman et al. 2009, p. 9). Threats were no longer seen as coming from powerful, but from “weak” states. Conflict theories increasingly saw state weakness as a cause for the outbreak or continuation of a conflict. Publications such as “Saving Failed States” (Helman and Ratner 1992) or “Coming Anarchy” (Kaplan 1994) contributed to “a belief in a world that was, outside the West, subject to deep disorder and spinning further adrift from the state authority and order of the Cold War era” (Sabaratnam 2011, pp. 17–18). The framing of states as failed implied that the adequate response was to “fix” them by improving their governance capacities (Paris and Sisk 2007, pp. 2–3). Thereby, statebuilding became the main objective of peacebuilding (Donais 2012, p. 23; Jabri 2010, p. 53; Paris and Sisk 2007, pp. 2–3; Roberts 2008, p. 539). This meant that interventions had to become comprehensive as “all aspects of the state, society, and economy [were] to be rebuilt around liberal principles” (Barnett 2006, p. 88). This extension of peacebuilding mandates reached its zenith in the international transitional administrations of Cambodia (1992–1993), Bosnia-Herzegovina (1995–2002), and East Timor (1999–2002) with the UN exercising governmental power (Bellamy 2010, p. 194; Chesterman 2007, p. 5; Zaum 2006, p. 455) (see ► “Post-Conflict Nation-Building”, ► “Post-Conflict Elections”).

With these extended roles of international actors in peacebuilding, the right balance between support and imposition became a key question in policy, practice, and research. Critiques became vocal about a “lack of the local” in international peacebuilding (Donais 2009a, 2012; Mac Ginty 2008a, 2011b; Mac Ginty and Richmond; Richmond 2009; Richmond and Mitchell 2012). They concerned the conceptualization, implementation, and outcomes of international peacebuilding in terms of its interaction with local ideas, contexts, and actors. First, authors questioned the conceptualization of peacebuilding as liberal. They highlighted that international peacebuilding was based on an assumption of liberalism as a universal norm, which does not necessarily hold in each context. As such, these critiques asserted that international peacebuilding was conceptualized without taking into account local definitions of peace (Bellamy 2010, p. 194; Jabri 2010, p. 55; Paris 2002, p. 638; Richmond 2004a, p. 141; Sending 2009, p. 5; Tadjbakhsh 2010, p. 125). The second strand of critiques questioned the implementation of international peacebuilding. They criticized the top-down approach that imposed a template of reforms on host populations, ignored the needs of those it supposedly sought to assist, and overlooked local capacities for peacebuilding. Thus, this second strand of critiques asserted that international peacebuilding was implemented without taking into account local needs and capacities (Begby and Burgess 2009, p. 92; Chandler 2010, p. 1; Mac Ginty 2008a, p. 145). Third, authors criticized international peacebuilding for not reaching its intended outcomes as it left most countries in a situation of “no war, no peace” (Mac Ginty 2006, p. 3) or with a “facade democracy” (Chandler 2010, p. 14). Authors showed that liberalism could be conflict-inducing by opening up societies to competition, legitimizing the very elites who caused the conflict in the first place, and exacerbating economic inequalities. These critiques thus asserted that the outcome of international peacebuilding was more often a fragile elite peace than a locally owned peace (Barnett 2006, p. 89; Bellamy 2004, p. 31, 2010, p. 194; Tadjbakhsh 2010, pp. 124–125; Zahar 2012, p. 76).

In response to these critiques, two concepts were proposed in policy, practice, and research. Among policy-makers and practitioners, the concept of local ownership became central. It denotes the idea that local actors should own peacebuilding initiatives as this will ensure their sustainability (Donais 2012; Pouligny 2009; Reich 2006). Yet, while an important step away from externally imposed peacebuilding programs, the very idea retained a bias toward international actors. This is because the idea that local actors are supposed to own internationally conceived programs still presupposes that international actors retain most decision-making power in the design of programs (Donais 2009b, 2012; Hansen 2008; Pouligny 2009; Reich 2006). If, in turn, local ownership is defined as putting local actors in the driving seat to design and implement peacebuilding programs, the term “ownership” loses its significance, as it would be more aptly called local “leadership” (Hellmüller 2014). In research, the concept of hybridity was introduced to assess the interaction between local and international identities, interests, and actors (Mac Ginty 2010, 2011a, c; Richmond 2012; Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Tadjbakhsh 2011). It had an a priori more symmetric conception of the relationship between local and international actors. On the one hand, it warned against both a romanticization of everything “local” and a vilification of the “international” (Donais 2012; Lidén et al. 2009; Mac Ginty and Richmond). On the other hand, it steered away from portraying local actors as passive recipients of peacebuilding programs, but demonstrated how they actively shaped and reshaped them (Mac Ginty 2011b; Richmond and Mitchell 2012; Zaum 2012). Yet, it did not manage to fully overcome the bias toward international actors. First, authors still analyzed local actors predominantly in their re-action to the “international,” for instance, how they resisted, adapted, or provided alternatives to international programs. This ignored local actions that were not predicated by international ones. Second, while pointing to the fluidity of the terms “local” and “international,” authors often assigned pre-determined attributes to them, supposing the international side to be “liberal” and “powerful” and local actors as a distinct “other” with less power, but “agency” (Heathershaw 2013, pp. 277, 280).

An analysis of the interaction between local and international peacebuilders can help overcome these two issues. First, it puts the focus on peacebuilders on both the local and international sides. Thereby, it does not only assess local peacebuilders in their re-action to international ones, but analyzes their own empirical reality and the actions they undertake in accordance with their own logic. Second, taking the subjective realities of local and international peacebuilders as main object of analysis shows how their perceptions shape their inter-subjective relationship. This allows for a framework in which roles and characteristics of actors are fluid and not pre-determined. An example of such an analysis is given in the following case study of the DRC.

Case Study: Democratic Republic of Congo (1999–2014)⁵

The DRC has been the theater of brutal warfare for almost three decades and has since 1999 hosted one of the biggest peacekeeping missions, the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in Congo (MONUSCO, earlier MONUC). The DRC has attracted vast scholarly interest. Authors have provided historical accounts of the armed conflicts in the DRC (e.g., Clark 2002; Nest et al. 2006; Prunier 2008; Reyntjens 2009; Turner 2007), the national peace process (e.g., ⁵The information is based on 120 in-depth interviews and focus group discussions with a total of 195 persons as well as numerous informal discussions and participant observations carried out between March 2011 and March 2014 in Ituri in northeastern DRC and in the capital city Kinshasa.

Carayannis 2009; Reyntjens 2007; Rogier 2004), and the international response to the war (e.g., Autesserre 2009, 2010; Tull 2009; Vircoulon 2005a). When analyzing the armed conflict in the DRC, several scholarly contributions as well as policy reports place emphasis on the co-production of violence assessing how regional, national, and local conflict issues reinforced each other. This was especially the case in the northeastern province (formally district) of Ituri where escalating violence threatened to put the entire national peace process at risk (Van Woudenberg 2004; Veit 2010; Vircoulon 2005b; Vlassenroot and Raeymaekers 2004). Indeed, the causes of the periodic cycles of violence in Ituri were often not distinctively regional, national, or local, but interconnected at all these levels. This rendered cooperation between local and international peacebuilders crucial, as they had complementary perceptions and priorities.

Perceptions of the Armed Conflict and Peacebuilding Priorities

Local and international peacebuilders perceived the armed conflict in different ways. The perceptions of local peacebuilders in Ituri derived from their own experience as they had lived through the conflict. They were part of the social, political, and economic system that was afflicted by the war, and their perceptions resulted not only from their identity as peacebuilders, but also from their identity as Iturians who had experienced the conflict. Interviewees located the origins of the conflict in a localized land conflict that opposed the two main ethnic groups in the area. They recounted how quickly it spread throughout Ituri and ethnically polarized the entire population. The day a militia group attacked a village, all those who were not part of the militia's ethnic group were killed or fled, and the others often joined the attackers. This experience directly influenced local peacebuilders' definition of peace. They described it in relational terms as social cohesion, defined as reconciliation between ethnic groups and the absence of land conflicts. More concretely, it meant sharing community goods, being on good terms with neighbors, going to the same market, and eating, drinking, talking, and praying together. One important aspect often mentioned, probably because it was so restricted during the war, was that peace meant being able to move freely again and going to the fields and markets without fear of attack or rape. Security was also an important aspect of peace: the security to sleep peacefully, not to be harassed, to be able to conduct activities, and to live without conflicts, militias, and arms. Security was seen as being contingent upon better relations between ethnic groups. Social cohesion was thus perceived as a guarantee of non-recurrence as it provided a structure of mutual assurance that fighting would not erupt again. Therefore, most local peacebuilders implemented programs that aimed at strengthening social cohesion, such as creating local networks, mediating in local conflicts, conducting sensitization activities, involving communities in joint activities, engaging communities with the past, and creating local peacebuilding structures.

International peacebuilders, in turn, had not lived through the conflict and had thus conceptually based, rather than empirically based, perceptions of it. Their priorities were influenced by the theory of "state failure" mentioned above (Dunn 2003, p. 5; Turner 2007, pp. 180–183). The DRC figured prominently in many publications on failed or weak states, and most explanations of the conflict referred to the breakdown of state authority and its impaired sovereignty (Dunn 2003; Von Einsiedel 2005). This framing was mirrored in international priorities because their response to the perceived state failure was to engage in statebuilding by promoting the state's monopoly on the legitimate use of force and its legal-rational authority (De Heredia 2012; Eriksen 2009; Lemarchand 2001). This was reflected in two measures: disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR) and elections. These tools have three main advantages from an international peacebuilder's perspective. First, they provide a standard set of measures for which a toolkit is readily available, as they are implemented in different contexts. Second, they provide clearly measurable and visible milestones in contrast to other peacebuilding activities whose results will only be visible in the long term. Third, they are useful as an exit strategy. DDR aims to restore the state's monopoly on the legitimate use of force after which international actors no longer need to provide security. Elections put in place a supposedly legitimate government that can exert authority.

The Interaction Between Local and International Peacebuilders

The above shows how perceptions differed between local and international peacebuilders in Ituri and how it influenced their peacebuilding priorities: While local peacebuilders focused on social cohesion, international peacebuilders engaged in statebuilding. Both priorities were needed as violence in DRC was co-produced by aspects at the local, national, and regional level. Thus, local and international peacebuilders complemented each other. Yet, their interaction was hampered by divergent perceptions of resources, capacities, and legitimacy.

Regarding resources, the financial resources that international actors usually put into conflict contexts are substantial and allow, for example, for the provision of social services, the holding of elections, the reform of different state sectors, or the conduct of trainings and reintegration programs for ex-combatants. The fact that international actors typically hold the "purse strings" and local actors are on the lookout for donor money is said to give the former substantial power over the latter (Donais 2012, p. 71; Van Brabant 2010, p. 8). International peacebuilders in Ituri defined resources in financial terms and saw local peacebuilders as donor dependent. Many international actors felt that local actors used them as mere channels of funding and that they had developed an attitude of expectations toward them. Local peacebuilders, in turn, did not perceive resources merely in financial terms, but also in the ability to achieve a longer-term impact. They underlined their low start-up costs, as they did not need to import expensive outside expertise, their ability to implement projects without convoluted bureaucratic procedures, and their low infrastructural costs due to their modest offices. In contrast, they mentioned that international actors had much higher costs and spent a lot of money on aspects other than the concrete project activities, such as visibility purposes. Aware of the commonly made accusation that they only worked for peace because it was a lucrative business, many local peacebuilders underlined that they had started implementing peacebuilding programs before international donors had arrived in Ituri. They said that it was a logical redefinition of priorities: If someone had an organization working on development or education, they could not continue their work during the war, so they needed to address peacebuilding issues first.

A second reason for the lack of cooperation between local and international peacebuilders in Ituri was the way they perceived capacities. In particular, they had differing views on what counts as information and what counts as knowledge and, thus, capacity. The Oxford dictionary defines information as "facts provided or learned about something or someone" and knowledge as "awareness or familiarity gained by experience of a fact or situation." Information is factual and thus verifiable or falsifiable. Knowledge is an already verified belief and connects fragments of information. It is thus a capacity, which is the ability to do or understand something. When asked about their capacities, most international peacebuilders mentioned their thematic knowledge on issues related to peacebuilding. At the same time, they portrayed local peacebuilders' context knowledge as information, rather than knowledge. This was illustrated by the fact that when inviting local peacebuilders to share their context knowledge, international actors often talked about "consultations" conducted under the rationale of gathering information. This also implied that local actors were seen as in need of capacity-building to acquire the thematic knowledge held by international actors. As such, knowledge exchange was not portrayed as an experience of mutual learning, but as one actor receiving and the other one providing it. There was, for instance, never a discussion about holding a workshop conducted by local actors for international actors doing capacity-building on the Iturian context. Thus, while international peacebuilders saw local knowledge as useful to guide the implementation of their own programs, their treatment of it as information meant that they rarely used it to define peacebuilding priorities in the first place. Local peacebuilders, in turn, considered what they knew about the context to be knowledge and therefore a capacity that international peacebuilders lacked. They were not generally opposed to receiving capacity-building, but they saw their own needs in the realm of managerial, rather than thematic, capacities. As such, local peacebuilders would have wished for training on financial or human resources management or on strategies to increase their eligibility for international funding.

A third reason for the lack of cooperation between local and international peacebuilders in Ituri was that they had different perceptions of legitimacy. Local and international peacebuilders differed in their definition of the social system within which they evaluated legitimacy. International actors usually referred to the outside social system of donors when talking about both their own and local peacebuilders' legitimacy. With regard to their own legitimacy, the outside orientation led to pressure to show results, as donors needed to be informed about the advancement of the projects they funded (Autesserre 2014, pp. 209–214; Bächtold et al. 2013, p. 6). With regard to local peacebuilders' legitimacy, international actors considered those actors as legitimate who were efficient according to their standards. This meant that they preferred partners who had already worked with international actors in the past, who knew the procedures, and who spoke their language (Verkoren and Van Leeuwen 2014, p. 109). Local peacebuilders, in turn, defined legitimacy with reference to the inside social system. They considered their own legitimacy as deriving from their status as insiders in the communities who knew the local languages, culture, and customs. This inside orientation also influenced the way they perceived international peacebuilders' legitimacy. Like the latter, they based this assessment on efficiency, but defined it mainly in relation to the outcomes of international peacebuilding programs. While generally appreciative of the international presence, local peacebuilders perceived them as reacting slowly due to cumbersome procedures and sometimes doubted the concrete impact they had on the ground. The view that international programs were evaluated against outside standards furthered these impressions. For instance, local peacebuilders criticized the fact that most of the consultants hired to conduct evaluation visits were international, rather than local, actors indicating against whose standards achievements were measured.

Obstacles to Building Sustainable Peace

The above shows how the different perceptions of resources, capacities, and legitimacy influenced the cooperation between local and international peacebuilders in DRC. This had three main consequences that influenced the effectiveness of their peacebuilding efforts.

The first was that international peacebuilders devised their strategies without involving local peacebuilders. This is shown in the fact that they interacted differently with their international than with their local counterparts. International actors often exchanged information more frequently with other international peacebuilders than with local peacebuilders. Indeed, although international organizations in Ituri were functionally different and ranged from humanitarian to peacebuilding to development and human rights organizations, they often created their own forums for interaction (see also Smirl 2008, p. 243). Coordination with local peacebuilders was less tight, as international actors framed it in terms of “capacity-building” or “consultations” and as an act of “good will” from their side instead of an exchange between equal partners. Because of the lack of cooperation and therefore exclusion of local actors in international strategy-making, international peacebuilders neglected the importance of fostering social cohesion in the initial stages of their engagement until 2006. Indeed, with their focus being on statebuilding, they overlooked social cohesion with regard to both reconciliation between ethnic groups and the resolution of land conflicts. Regarding the first, international actors did not substantively complement local reconciliation initiatives in their support to structures at the national level, nor did they further strengthen them at the local level. For instance, the national peace agreement (2002/2003) foresaw a Truth and Reconciliation Commission, but it never functioned and was locally perceived as failure or remained unknown altogether (Davis and Hayner 2009, p. 22). Moreover, despite the fact that the International Criminal Court (ICC) issued its four first arrest warrants on leaders of militias active in Ituri, it did not promote reconciliation at the local level (Borello 2004, p. 30; Davis and Hayner 2009, p. 27). Indeed, there were only a few international programs that directly focused on supporting local reconciliation efforts (Samset and Madore 2006). At the same time, international actors also overlooked land conflicts in the initial years of their engagement (Vircoulon 2010). They framed land conflicts only as a consequence of the war linked to the return of internally displaced persons and refugees, but not as connected to its outbreak. However, the conflicts related to returnees were just one form of land conflicts among many others, such as conflicts around the right of usage and delimitation of lands or property conflicts (Mongo et al. 2009, p. 6; RCN Justice & Démocratie 2009, p. 9). However, these types of land conflicts – although locally perceived as one of the main causes of the conflict – remained largely absent in international peacebuilders' initial strategy.

The second consequence of impaired cooperation was that international peacebuilders included local peacebuilders only in the project implementation phase, which left them very little room for adaptation of international statebuilding programs to local priorities. In that role, local peacebuilders highlighted the local aspects of DDR and elections. Several local peacebuilders acted as implementing partners of international organizations for DDR programs and rendered them more locally relevant in three ways (Rouw and Willems 2010, p. 40). First, they helped include communities thereby reducing skepticism toward international DDR programs, which were often seen as giving disproportional benefits to belligerents. Second, they saw DDR as a long-term process and focused on reintegration, being the aspect that international peacebuilders neglected in the beginning. They criticized the lists of weapons collected and demobilized combatants as success measurements for DDR programs and lobbied for longer DDR programs and a shift of focus away from numbers toward the social processes involved in DDR. Third, local peacebuilders underlined the importance of an approach to security that not only focused on the police and the army, which were sometimes considered as predatory rather than protective actors from a local perspective, but also on community alertness and awareness of local perceptions of security. Regarding elections, local peacebuilders equally played an important role in adapting international projects in the implementation phase. First, they conducted sensitization and information campaigns on voter registration and citizenship to support the national electoral process. Seeking to bring the electoral process closer to the people, they shared information about candidates and sensitized people about the meaning, purpose, and importance of voting. Second, they included customary authority structures in their activities and attempted to build bridges between the customary and the official governance systems. Third, they sought to foster trust between the government and the broader population. For instance, they invited authorities to community gatherings to promote exchanges between them and local communities. This shows that local peacebuilders played an important role in adapting international statebuilding programs. Yet, they were only able to conduct marginal adaptations as they were only involved in the implementation phase and not in strategy-making.

The third consequence of the hampered cooperation was a lack of coordination leading to duplication of efforts. After the elections in 2006 that ended the transitional period, international peacebuilders adapted their focus to include social cohesion. This was due to a realization that social cohesion was needed to prevent the conflict from erupting again and the increased criticism in research and policy on the lack of the local in liberal peacebuilding. While being an important change, international peacebuilders started to intervene directly at the local level by implementing social cohesion projects, rather than addressing its national aspects or working with local peacebuilders on already existing local initiatives. Thereby, they often duplicated and crowded out ongoing local activities. Local peacebuilders recounted that some international actors behaved as if social cohesion activities had not existed before and that they did not value their previous work. For instance, they engaged in land conflict mappings or the creation of local networks that duplicated already ongoing efforts by local peacebuilders. Moreover, the fact that international peacebuilders often came with substantial resources distorted local incentive structures and crowded out local organizations. Local peacebuilders regularly lost their influence once international organizations arrived, for instance, because the latter could pay per diems for attendance at workshops. Therefore, they started to encounter difficulties in having communities participate in workshops without being compensated.

This meant that while local and international peacebuilding programs changed over the long term with local actors adapting international statebuilding programs to local perspectives and international actors increasingly taking up the priority of social cohesion, they still only partially responded to the war with its multilayered issues. On the one hand, social cohesion programs lacked a necessary complement at the national level in the form of a functioning transitional justice process. On the other hand, statebuilding programs were of limited local relevance as local peacebuilders could only marginally adapt them in the implementation phase. This left important gaps in the peacebuilding response to the armed conflict in the DRC. Even after the end of widespread violence, relationships between different ethnic groups remain easily ignitable and land conflicts insufficiently addressed while the state still lacks the monopoly on the use of force as well as popularly legitimized authority. While both local and international peacebuilders had relevant programs, their efforts ultimately remained insufficient because they addressed the multilayered conflict issues in a partial manner. This left a fragile peace in Ituri with violence that continues to erupt until today.

Conclusions

In contrast to previous studies that focus on either local or international peacebuilders, this entry underlines the importance of understanding the interaction between them as a central factor influencing the effectiveness of efforts to address multilayered armed conflicts. It presented insights from the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) illustrating that local and international peacebuilders often have different perceptions on a given armed conflict and related peacebuilding priorities. Therefore, cooperation between them plays a crucial role in addressing a conflict in a comprehensive manner. Yet, their interaction is often hampered leading to partial responses to multilayered conflicts leaving situations of a fragile peace. Understanding the obstacles to improved cooperation is thus crucial in making peacebuilding more effective.

Cross-References

- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Post-Conflict Elections
- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

References

- Abo Naser, M., Hellmüller, S., Hilal, L., Katkhouda, R., & Nagui, Y. (2016). Inside Syria: What local actors are doing for peace. Bern: swisspeace.
- Autesserre, S. (2009). Hobbes and the Congo: Frames, local violence, and international intervention. International Organization, 63(2), 249–280.
- Autesserre, S. (2010). The trouble with the Congo: Local violence and the failure of international peacebuilding. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland: Conflict resolution and the everyday politics of international intervention. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bächtold, S., Dittli, R., & Servaes, S. (2013). Help or hindrance? Results-orientation in conflict-affected situations. Bern: swisspeace.
- Barnett, M. (2006). Building a republican peace: Stabilizing states after war. International Security, 30(4), 87–112.

- Barnett, M., Kim, H., O'Donnell, M., & Sitea, L. (2007). Peacebuilding: What is in a name? Global Governance, 13(1), 35–58.
- Begby, E., & Burgess, J. P. (2009). Human security and liberal peace. Public Reason, 1(1), 91–104.
- Bellamy, A. J. (2004). The 'Next Stage' in peace operations theory? International Peacekeeping, 11(1), 17–38.
- Bellamy, A. J. (2010). The institutionalisation of peacebuilding: What role for the UN peacebuilding commission? In O. Richmond (Ed.), Advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 193–212). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Williams, P. (2004). Introduction: Thinking anew about peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 11(1), 1–15.
- Belloni, R. (2012). Hybrid peace governance: Its emergence and significance. Global Governance, 18(1), 21–38.
- Borello, F. (2004). A first few steps – The long road to a just peace in the Democratic Republic of Congo. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An Agenda for Peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping (A/47/277 – S/24111). New York: United Nations.
- Call, C. T., & Cook, S. E. (2003). On democratization and peacebuilding. Global Governance, 9(2), 233–246.
- Carayannis, T. (2009). The challenge of building sustainable peace in the DRC. Geneva: Centre for Humanitarian Dialogue.
- Chandler, D. (2010). The uncritical critique of 'liberal peace'. Review of International Studies, 36(1), 1–19.
- Chesterman, S. (2007). Ownership in theory and in practice: Transfer of authority in UN statebuilding operations. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 1(1), 3–26.
- Chetail, V. (2009). Introduction: Post-conflict peacebuilding – Ambiguity and identity. In V. Chetail (Ed.), Post-conflict peacebuilding. A lexicon (pp. 1–33). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Clark, J. F. (2002). The African stakes of the Congo wars. Kampala: Fountain Publisher.
- Davis, L., & Hayner, P. (2009). Difficult peace, limited justice: Ten years of peacemaking in the DRC. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice.
- De Heredia, M. I. (2012). Escaping Statebuilding: Resistance and Civil Society in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 6(1), 75–89.
- Donais, T. (2009a). Empowerment or imposition? Dilemmas of local ownership in post-conflict peacebuilding processes. Peace & Change, 34(1), 3–26.
- Donais, T. (2009b). Inclusion or exclusion? Local ownership and security sector reform. Studies in Social Justice, 3(1), 117–131.
- Donais, T. (2012). Peacebuilding and local ownership – post-conflict consensus building. London / New York: Routledge.
- Dunn, K. C. (2003). Imagining the Congo – The international relations of identity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Eriksen, S. S. (2009). The liberal peace is neither: Peacebuilding, state building and the reproduction of conflict in the Democratic Republic of Congo. International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 652–666.
- Fetherston, B., & Nordstrom, C. (1995). Overcoming habitus in conflict management: UN peacekeeping and war zone ethnography. Peace & Change, 20(1), 94.
- Galtung, J. (1975). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking and peacebuilding. In J. Galtung (Ed.), Peace, war and defence – Essays in peace research (pp. 282–304). Copenhagen: Christian Ejerlw.
- Goetschel, L., & Hagmann, T. (2009). Civilian peacebuilding: Peace by bureaucratic means? Conflict, Security & Development, 9(1), 55–73.
- Haider, H. (2009). Community-based approaches to peacebuilding in conflict-affected and fragile contexts. Birmingham: Governance and Social Development Resource Center.
- Hansen, A. S. (2008). Local ownership in peace operations. In T. Donais (Ed.), Local ownership and security sector reform (pp. 39–58). Berlin: Lit Verlag.
- Heathershaw, J. (2013). Towards better theories of peacebuilding: Beyond the liberal peace debate. Peacebuilding, 1(2), 275–282.
- Hellmüller, S. (2014). Owners or partners? A critical analysis of the concept of local ownership. In S. Hellmüller & M. Santschi (Eds.), Is local beautiful? Peacebuilding between international interventions and locally led initiatives (pp. 3–14). Cham: Springer.
- Hellmüller, S. (2018). Partners for peace: The interaction between local and international peacebuilding actors. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Helman, G. B., & Ratner, S. R. (1992). Saving failed states. Foreign Policy, 89(Winter, 1992-1993), 3–20.
- Hoksbergen, R. (2005). Building Civil Society through partnership: Lessons from a case study of the Christian reformed World Relief Committee. Development in Practice, 15(1), 16–27.
- Ibrahim Abdi, D., & Mason, S. (2019). Small steps to peace: Mediation and governance in fragile contexts. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Jabri, V. (2010). War, government, politics: A critical response to the hegemony of the liberal peace. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 41–57). Basingstoke/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kanol, D. (2010). Civil society's role in peace-building: relevance of the cyprriot case. Journal of Ethnopolitics and Minority Issues in Europe, 9(1), 26–45.
- Kaplan, R. D. (1994). The coming anarchy. The Atlantic, 273(2).
- Kappler, S. (2015). The dynamic local: Delocalisation and (re-)localisation in the search for peacebuilding identity. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 875–889.
- Lemarchand, R. (2001). The Democratic Republic of Congo: From collapse to potential reconstruction. Copenhagen: Centre of African Studies, University of Copenhagen.

- Lidén, K., Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2009). Introduction: Beyond northern epistemologies of peace: Peacebuilding reconstructed? International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 587–598.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2006). How did peace become order? Paper presented at the Pole Bernheim for peace and citizenship fifth anniversary conference, Université Libre de Bruxelles.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008a). Indigenous peace-making versus the liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008b). Traditional and indigenous approaches to peacemaking. In J. Darby & R. M. Ginty (Eds.), Contemporary peacemaking. Conflict, peace processes and post-war reconstruction (pp. 120–130). Houndmills/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Hybrid peace: The interaction between top-down and bottom-up peace. Security Dialogue, 41(4), 391–412.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011a). Hybrid peace: How does hybrid peace come about? In S. Campbell, D. Chandler, & M. Sabaratnam (Eds.), A Liberal peace? The problems and practices of peacebuilding (pp. 209–225). London: Zed Books.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011b). Hybridity and hybridisation: Beyond top-down meets bottom-up. Paper presented at the Humanitarian and Conflict Response Institute Manchester/Bradford Seminar.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2011c). International peacebuilding and local resistance: Hybrid forms of peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Millar, G. (2014). Respecting complexity: Compound friction and unpredictability in peacebuilding. In A. Björkdahl, K. Höglund, G. Millar, J. Van der Lijn, & W. Verkoren (Eds.), Peacebuilding and friction: Global and local encounters in post-conflict societies (pp. 32–47). New York: Routledge.
- Mongo, E., Nkoy Elela, A. D., & van Puijenbroek, J. (2009). Conflits fonciers en Ituri – Poids du passé et défis pour l’avenir de la paix. Bunia: IKV Pax Christi.
- Nagelhus Schia, N., & Karlsrud, J. (2012). Contextualizing peacebuilding activities to local circumstances. Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs – Department of Security and Conflict Management.
- Nest, M., Grignon, F., & Kisangani, E. (2006). The Democratic Republic of Congo. Economic dimensions of War and Peace. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Newman, E., Paris, R., & Richmond, O. (2009). Introduction. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding (pp. 3–25). Tokyo/New York: United Nations University Press.
- Ottaway, M. (2003). Promoting democracy after conflict: The difficult choices. International Studies Perspectives, 4(3), 314–322.
- Oxford Dictionary. (n.d.-a.). Information. In Lexico.com dictionary, Retrieved June 1, 2020, from <https://www.lexico.com/definition/information>
- Oxford Dictionary. (n.d.-b). Knowledge. In Lexico.com dictionary, Retrieved June 1, 2020, from <https://www.lexico.com/definition/knowledge>.
- Paffenholz, T. (2010). What civil society can contribute to peacebuilding. In T. Paffenholz (Ed.), Civil society and peacebuilding (pp. 381–404). Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Paris, R. (2002). International peacebuilding and the ‘Mission Civilisatrice’. Review of International Studies, 28(4), 637–656.
- Paris, R. (2004). At War’s end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Paris, R. (2011). Critiques of Liberal peace. In S. Campbell, D. Chandler, & M. Sabaratnam (Eds.), A Liberal peace?: The problems and practices of peacebuilding (pp. 31–51). London: Zed Books.
- Paris, R., & Sisk, T. (2007). Managing contradictions: The inherent dilemmas of postwar Statebuilding. New York: International Peace Academy.
- Poulligny, B. (2005). Civil society and post-conflict peacebuilding: Ambiguities of international Programmes aimed at building ‘New’ societies. Security Dialogue, 36(4), 495–510.
- Poulligny, B. (2009). Local ownership. In V. Chetail (Ed.), Post-conflict peacebuilding. A lexicon (pp. 174–187). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Prendergast, J., & Plumb, E. (2002). Building local capacity: From implementation to peacebuilding. In S. J. Stedman, D. Rothchild, & E. M. Cousens (Eds.), Ending civil wars (pp. 327–349). Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Prunier, G. (2008). Africa’s world war: Congo, the Rwandan genocide, and the making of a continental catastrophe. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- RCN Justice & Démocratie. (2009). Les conflits fonciers en Ituri: de l’imposition à la consolidation de la paix. Bruxelles: RCN Justice et Démocratie.
- Reich, H. (2006). Local ownership’ in conflict transformation projects: Partnership, participation or patronage? (27). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Reyntjens, F. (2007). Democratic Republic of Congo: Political transition and beyond. African Affairs, 106(423), 307–317.
- Reyntjens, F. (2009). The great African war: Congo and regional geopolitics, 1996–2006. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. (2004a). The globalization of responses to conflict and the peacebuilding consensus. Cooperation and Conflict, 39(2), 129–150.
- Richmond, O. (2004b). UN peace operations and the dilemmas of the peacebuilding consensus. International Peacekeeping, 11(1), 83–101.
- Richmond, O. (2009). Liberal peace transitions: A rethink is urgent. <http://www.opendemocracy.net/oliver-p-richmond/liberal-peace-transitions-rethink-is-urgent>

- Richmond, O. (2012). The dilemmas of a hybrid peace. <http://www.e-ir.info/2012/12/23/the-dilemmas-of-a-hybrid-peace/>
- Richmond, O., & Mitchell, A. (2012). Hybrid forms of peace from everyday agency to post-liberalism. Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Roberts, D. (2008). Post-conflict statebuilding and state legitimacy: From negative to positive peace? Development and Change, 39(4), 537–555.
- Rogier, E. (2004). The peace process in the DRC: A reader. Pretoria: Institute for Security Studies.
- Rouw, H., & Willems, R. (2010). Connecting community security and DDR: Experiences from Eastern DRC. Utrecht: Network for Peace, Security and Development.
- Sabaratanam, M. (2011). The Liberal peace? An intellectual history of international conflict management, 1990–2010. In S. Campbell, D. Chandler, & M. Sabaratanam (Eds.), A Liberal peace? The problems and practices of peacebuilding (pp. 13–30). London: Zed Books.
- Samset, I., & Madore, Y. (2006). Evaluation of the UNDP/UNOPS peacebuilding and community development project in Ituri, the Democratic Republic of Congo. Bergen: CMI Chr. Michelsen Institute.
- Sending, O. J. (2009). Why peacebuilders fail to secure ownership and be sensitive to context. Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs.
- Smirl, L. (2008). Building the other, constructing ourselves: Spatial dimensions of international humanitarian response. International Political Sociology, 2(3), 236–253.
- Smith, D. (2004). Towards a strategic framework for peacebuilding: Getting their act together. Oslo: International Peace Research Institute.
- Tadjbakhsh, S. (2010). Human security and the legitimisation of peacebuilding. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 116–136). Basingstoke/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Tadjbakhsh, S. (2011). Rethinking the liberal peace: External models and local alternatives. London: Routledge.
- Tull, D. M. (2009). Peacekeeping in the Democratic Republic of Congo: Waging peace and fighting war. International Peacekeeping, 16(2), 215–230.
- Turner, T. (2007). The Congo wars: Conflict, myth and reality. London: Zed Books Ltd.
- Van Brabant, K. (2010). Peacebuilding how? Broad local ownership. Geneva: Interpeace.
- Van Leeuwen, M. (2009). Partners in peace: Discourses and practices of civil-society peacebuilding. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Van Tongeren, P., Brenk, M., Hellema, M., & Verhoeven, J. (Eds.). (1999). People building peace: 35 inspiring stories from around the world. Utrecht: European Centre for Conflict Prevention.
- Van Tongeren, P., Brenk, M., Hellema, M., & Verhoeven, J. (Eds.). (2005). People building peace II: Successful stories of civil society. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Van Woudenberg, A. (2004). Ethnically targeted violence in Ituri. In M. Malan & J. G. Porto (Eds.), Challenges of peace implementation: The UN mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (pp. 189–207). Pretoria: ISS.
- Veit, A. (2010). Intervention as indirect rule: Civil war and statebuilding in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Frankfurt/New York: Campus Verlag.
- Verkoren, W., & Van Leeuwen, M. (2014). The imagined agent of peace: Frictions in peacebuilding through civil society strengthening. In A. Björkdahl, K. Höglund, G. Millar, J. Van der Lijn, & W. Verkoren (Eds.), Peacebuilding and friction: Global and local encounters in post-conflict societies (pp. 103–119). London/New York: Routledge.
- Vircoulon, T. (2005a). Ambiguïtés de l'intervention internationale en République démocratique du Congo. Politique Africaine, 2(98), 79–95.
- Vircoulon, T. (2005b). L'Ituri ou la guerre au pluriel. Afrique contemporaine, 215(3), 129–146.
- Vircoulon, T. (2010). The Ituri paradox: When armed groups have a land policy and peacemakers do not. In C. A. W. Anseeuw (Ed.), The struggle over land in Africa: Conflicts, politics & change (pp. 209–219). Cape Town.
- Vlassenroot, K., & Raeymaekers, T. (2004). The politics of rebellion and intervention in Ituri. The emergence of a new political complex? African Affairs, 103(412), 385–412.
- Von Billerbeck, S. B. K. (2016). Whose peace? Local ownership and UN peacebuilding. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Von Einsiedel, S. (2005). Policy responses to state failure. In S. Chesterman, M. Ignatieff, & R. Thakur (Eds.), Making states work: State failure and the crisis of governance (pp. 13–35). New York: United Nations University Press.
- Zahar, M.-J. (2012). Norm transmission in peace- and statebuilding: Lessons from democracy promotion in Sudan and Lebanon. Global Governance, 18(1), 73–88.
- Zaum, D. (2006). The authority of international administrations in international society. Review of International Studies, 32(3), 455–473.
- Zaum, D. (2012). Beyond the 'Liberal Peace'. Global Governance, 18(1), 121–132.

Drawing

► Art and Reconciliation

Dual-Concern Models

► Negotiation

E

East Timor

- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste

Eastphalian Peace

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

Effects

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Electoral Manipulation and Prevention

- ▶ Voting Systems

Electoral Methods

- ▶ Voting Systems

Electoral Systems

- ▶ Voting Systems

Emancipation

- ▶ Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace

Emancipatory

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Emancipatory Peace

Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester, Department of Politics,
Manchester, UK

Synonyms

Critical theory; Emancipation; Liberalism; Peace; Realism

Description

Emancipatory peace describes a form of peace process that does more than provide basic security, but one that also advances rights, justice and sustainability and removes direct or indirect violence.

Introduction

There has been frequent reference to the concept of an ‘emancipatory peace’ in the critical academic literature on peace and conflict studies (see Richmond 2005; Nunes 2012; Booth 1991). Terms such as ‘emancipation’ and, its relative, ‘social justice’ are widely used in leftist and postcolonial theoretical literature and were perhaps common parlance in previous political eras in the previous two centuries (see Marx 1963). According to Rupert’s (2009) reading of Marx (1963, p. 54), “[p]olitical Emancipation” entails equal status of individual citizens in relation to the state, equality before the law, regardless of religion, property, or other “private” characteristics of individual persons. . . Political Emancipation represents real, historical progress’. The state is necessary in order to rescue the individual from a position in a fixed hierarchy (such as under feudalism). Liberal versions argue that civil society is necessary in order to enable the individual to achieve self-determination in relation to but also given the power of the state. Autonomy and agency are based upon the concept of the emancipated subject, liberated from oppression perhaps by democratic revolution or liberal intervention: processes of emancipation are therefore connected to security (Booth 1991), development, rights, peacebuilding, and state-building as well as, more recently, to the broader question of global justice (Arendt 1993; Sen 2000; Berlin 2004; Foucault 1982; Pieterse 1992; Rancière 2009). A debate has also begun pertaining to emancipation from modern forms of capitalism and technology (Duffield 2018, pp. 153–154; Howard 2015, p. xix; K.N.C. 2018; Monshipouri and Mokhtari 2016, p. 290).

It has become common in the critical, liberal, and mainstream literatures to claim or intimate that political emancipation is inherently violent because it must be connected to forms of intervention, risking vanguardism, or retrogressive social activism. Intervention is normally driven by actors and organisations with their own interests that lack local knowledge, accountability, and sensitivity and therefore create new ethical risks, as well as new opportunities for domination. After the emergence of territorial sovereignty and nationalism and its failure as a peaceful system of organisation, it has been inevitable that a liberal or neoliberal system of intervention would be refined, which would regulate political behaviour to maintain the status quo or refine it slowly in the interests of a balance between hegemonic power and sociopolitical claims. In other words, emancipation and intervention are related. Imperialism, statism, internationalism, and globalisation have all witnessed these pressures and phenomena. There is now pressure to abandon emancipation, to place structural forces or the natural, post-human world above the human, and to govern within the formers’ constraints (Chandler 2018, p. 21).

In the past it was clear what emancipation meant in the context of feudalism, slavery, imperialism, discrimination, a class system, nuclear weapons, and racism. Now it is less clear in the context of advanced capitalism and its technological links, whether democratic or authoritarian: resilience, autonomy, or intervention, and domination. Indeed, since literatures and approaches critiquing old-fashioned imperialism and racism have become widely sanctioned, if not censored in mainstream thought, debates on the possibility of emancipation have faded from view, being displaced by postcolonial approaches to sovereign autonomy, liberal notions of rights and governmentality, or neoliberal notions of self-help, resilience, and capital. Yet, this indicates a tendency to ignore important concepts that capture elemental dynamics of politics in peace and war, in particular foregrounding the claims, agency, rights, and societal interests of the subaltern, which is more traditionally the subject of power relations (Spivak 1988). Social forms of legitimacy have become obscured as a result. This raises the question of how the subaltern describes emancipation and social justice under contemporary, twenty-first-century conditions.

Emancipation in General Theoretical Usage

Scholars often refer to emancipation as if it were self-explanatory for both liberals and Marxists, north or south. In historical terms, emancipation has spanned issues of war in the nineteenth century, slavery also in that century, oppressive forms of work as the industrial revolution gathered pace throughout the said century, the expansion of voting rights from the nineteenth to the twentieth century, as well as the demand for gender equality, and the related reframing of the state towards an enabling, welfare state. It has also implied decolonisation, as well as ending arms races.

In practice and in mainstream liberal theory, emancipation tends to refer to the capacity of individuals to free themselves and for leadership to shape and improve social, economic, and political behaviour for a subaltern group. It has had religious and ideological overtones and has been associated also with revolutionary action. It is a vanguardist concept, depending on actors with direct, normative, and institutional power, emancipating the weak through ideas or force from poverty, injustice, war, slavery, or discrimination. This is in contradiction, however, to the underlying sense that emancipation of the weak has to occur according to subaltern demands and expectations.

In vanguardist terms, whether liberal or Marxist, emancipation occurs according to the preferences, norms, or ideology of the strong. In realist terms, it occurs as a side effect and alignment of power and interests. In liberal terms, it arises through individual action which shapes institutions. In Marxist terms, collective action is revolutionary. In other words, emancipation depends on the powerless confronting (or deploying) some of the most powerful instruments of international relations as well as geopolitical or geo-economic structural conditions, for example, predatory elites and states, extractive and fleeting global capital, geography, and resource distribution. Thus, conceptually emancipation is founded upon a serious contradiction, and many critical scholars equate it with the often violent history of enlightenment epistemology, whether Marxist or liberal, and Western hegemony [see as example Spivak (1988)]. The terms emancipation and social justice have been used to conceptually camouflage force and domination rather than, say, expand understandings of rights and equality from a subaltern perspective and thus need to be reclaimed. Rawls (1985) realised this to a degree with his work on justice and inequality.

The contemporary context raises the question of how the subaltern would describe emancipation and social justice under contemporary, networked, scalar, and increasingly 'digital' (Chandler 2018, p. 159) conditions.

Various Approaches to Emancipatory Peace

The main categories of theory across international relations (IR) and social sciences or humanities in general produce different approaches to emancipation. History and philosophy provide a grounding for the range of such debates.

Historical and Philosophically Informed Versions of Emancipatory Peace

A philosophical and historical version of an emancipatory peace would aim at the goal of an ever more sophisticated form of the 'good life' connected to the 'greater good' and the political systems required to realise this for society, the state, and the international community. Political philosophy has concerned itself with how this might be achieved at each level of analysis offering a different set of debates and different core objectives and methods. From the 'greatest good for the greatest many' to various forms of utilitarianism, liberalism, idealism, and utopianism, the debate has focused on the nature of the individual, society, belief, the nature of the state, and the possibility and potential of international law and world government (Chimni 2007). Some argue that this should be achieved via an elite vanguard of enlightened actors – Plato’s philosopher king or Aristotle’s aristocracy – or even more conservative notions of national leaders working ruthlessly for the national interest. Others argue that limited or broad democracy is required, even if this slows the process of emancipation. The subsequent literatures on cosmopolitanism and global justice probably offer the most sophisticated notion of emancipation within the framework of liberalism. In addition, these have been some post-liberal and postcolonial refinements (Gray 1993; Comaroff and Comaroff 2012; Prashad 2012).

A Realist Version of Emancipatory Peace

In contrast to such broad perspectives, a realist version of emancipation foregrounds geopolitical (and to some degree related geo-economic) power either through the state, the empire, or control of the global economy (Wood 2005). This is what emancipation targets in revolutionary mode, driven by subaltern claims for justice and sustainability over nationalism and territoriality. Basic geopolitical stability, meaning a balance of power between states and empires, is offered by realism as the ethical basis for and the agent of any possible, very limited emancipation. There is also the possibility that an imperial order will arise to reflect hegemony, however. A realist perspective means that a counter-revolutionary approach will actually restrain social and revolutionary movements in order to preserve older power structures. Compromise may emerge through the clash of interests between society and state, or between states, producing at best a negative peace meaning at least emancipation from direct violence (but not cultural, structural, or environmental violence) (Galtung 1969).

Later versions of neorealism and offensive realism highlight a concern with economic power and threats and do not extend their treatment of emancipation any further. This is partly because realism tends to assume that upsetting power structures is more dangerous than the status quo and that expanding subaltern rights would thus be counterproductive. Thus, a realist version would revolve around a victor’s peace where states establish a stable balance of power and where actors liberate themselves from oppression, in order to claim autonomy but without upsetting that balance of power. The post-1945 world offers a good example, in that the USA-backed order appeared relatively stable and allowed for human rights to be claimed by subaltern actors. In doing so the US maintained interests and increased their autonomy as well as their hegemony over others (Mearsheimer 2001; Williams 2005). Thus, emancipation was restrained by nationality and territorial boundaries, as previously by the extent of empire, and systems of inclusion and exclusion, perhaps mitigated by balancing activity. Imperialism and racial hierarchies delineate the stratifications or gradations of emancipation, with the imperialists in the highest plane and subjects below, order according to power. Emancipation rests on an accrual of national power, and the sacrifices this demands, and thus the domination of others in order to extract value and power. Herder and Mazzini have already made this intellectual journey, as well as Morgenthau and others (Lebow 2003). In modernity it elevates Anglo-Saxon and Western interests and naturalises them, carrying dangerous undertones of multiple exclusions in terms of nationality and race, whereby emancipation is achieved. Perhaps Schmitt put this paradox in its starkest form (Schmitt 1996 [1932]).

However, in the twenty-first century, it has increasingly been more difficult to see emancipation in purely Western, northern, or Eurocentric terms, either because of the rise of the emerging powers or the expanding claims from the global south, which have been quick to identify and reject new practices they equate with colonialism (Wallerstein 1974; Nkrumah 1965). These dynamics were on view during the US invasion of Iraq and afterwards (Dodge 2005; Allawi 2007).

A Social Version of Emancipatory Peace

Moving to a body of theory that engages more with lived experiences rather than abstract thought or power, a social version of emancipation foregrounds the social needs of society, making politics and economics subservient to these, and consolidates them in a legal and constitutional framework. Drawing on Marx, and in combination with liberal internationalism, it foregrounds economic and class relations as well as gender or identity rather than power (Laclau 2001 [1985]). The tools of emancipation are either the state or a social welfare system, as well as commensurate international systems. The social perspective aims to produce a social consensus, which is as wide as possible in order to prove that its legitimacy transcends that of elites. Social and international justice is its aim, based upon solidarity, rights, and the equality of citizens connected inevitably to the state, however. As soon as it is scaled up beyond the state, familiar problems of imperialism arise. In the past the aim of such a version was to amass centralised bureaucratic power in order to coordinate social peace and oversee equality and progress, either bounded by the state or connected to the international. Of course, such centralised government risked authoritarianism and inefficiency, this being the main argument of Hayek (1994 [1944]) against socialist experiments in the twentieth century. However, the aim of a social version of emancipation in contemporary contexts is to make the common needs of society the fulcrum around which political, economic, and cultural activity revolve, to mitigate elite predation, and to hold back the developmental or militaristic aims of vanguardist authoritarians. Hayek's argument that free markets made a better job of achieving these goals has been at the expense of widening inequality driven by power relations, which although relative has produced political risks. Thus, socialism and social engagements with emancipation (and social justice) offer slow progress, heavily dependent upon a benign elite, with a basic level of equality. However, it cannot compete with the 'creative destruction' and its pace in capitalist states, creating a range of dangerous internal and external tensions (as might be seen with the fate of former Yugoslavia). Nevertheless, capitalist states also proved to be unstable if inequality and international competition and their social effects are not mitigated, meaning a balance between the two is required (Honneth 2015). Eventually, a social democratic and Keynesian version emerged from such debates and positions, post-World War II (WWII), partly to balance the conflicting positions of realism, liberalism, and Marxism (Steger 1997).

A Liberal Version of Emancipatory Peace

A liberal version of emancipation has come to be based upon the achievement of human rights and democracy, with as few constraints as possible from power, religion, the state, or economics. It is aimed at liberation from oppressive power, the overweening state, and geopolitics through the adoption of both liberal norms and free trade, following the argumentation of early liberalism such as Locke (1988 [1689]) and Paine (2000 [1791]). It requires a democratic system and a rule of law, both of which point to the need for material capacity and equality under a republican system (Doyle 1986). The onus is on normative agreement, universality, and implementation through constitutions and law. Trade, trusteeship, and intervention are necessary stimulants (Fukuyama 1989). The tools of emancipation range from liberal forms of intervention (imperial, humanitarian, peacebuilding, development) to the constitutional framework of the state and the nature of international order. In its social democratic forms, liberal emancipation threatened the power of established elites and simultaneously required a strong state with high taxation in order to redistribute. Material rights were thus connected to human rights. Its cosmopolitan variant pointed to the universality of such rights and the need for an international community or law-abiding states and set of governmental institutions.

This version of emancipation was heavily diluted by the emergence of a neoliberal version in the 1980s, which placed economic development within a globalised free market above – or at least as a route to – human rights and the other liberal institutions, expecting that economic development would ultimately lead to the achievement of better rights (Boas and Gans-Morse 2009; Harvey 2005). Legal equality superseded material equality, replacing material rights with more abstract versions. This has had the effect of reducing the challenge that human rights aimed at conservative forms of political and economic power to a discursive challenge, which has allowed material inequality to deepen (Brown 2015). This has ultimately undermined donors' and international organisations' legitimacy, leading to resurgent nationalism (Barber 2016; Trump's world: The new nationalism 2016): the very dynamic it was supposed to end.

Perhaps the most concrete version of emancipation draws its inspiration from liberal internationalist and later critical thinking. It would require the establishment of a common normative world community (probably in federal form), capable of extending solidarity and material improvement around the world. Its underlying theorisation spans the work of Kant, Marx, and more recent cosmopolitan thinkers including Habermas, Beck, Falk, and others such as Kaldor, Held, and Linklater (Kant 2003 [1795]; Archibugi and Held 1995; Archibugi 2008; Falk 1995; Habermas 2001; Beck 1999; Linklater 1998). It is commonly thought of in global social democratic terms, as outlined by David Held (1995). It points to the Scandinavian model of a state writ large, though regional and international organisations, but exercising far greater political control over global capital, and in which intervention occurs based upon wide consensus for peace. Citizens will become liberal and share the commons, and a global social contract would be formed between citizens, social democracies, and regional or international organisations. The UN system would be the basis for an emerging global federation of sorts, reflecting global social democracy, in which common values could be discerned despite the existence of difference. It would draw its intellectual and practical heritage from the rise of the West and the post-war settlements of the twentieth century, though it would not see itself as Eurocentric. It would be facilitated by global trade but under the political control of the 'good state' (Lawler 2005) and good international architecture.

The liberal peace framework was soon seen as too selective in its approach to emancipation, partly because its ontological proposals about norms, institutions, states, structures, and agency were more indebted to Eurocentrism, sovereignty, statism, and capitalism that they often admitted.

A Postcolonial Version of Emancipatory Peace

A post- and anti-colonial version of emancipation would mean placing the most marginalised actors in international relations claims into a historical context and into the contemporary conditions of distributive justice. This may relate to justice for various forms of colonialism and political self-determination (Smith 1999). This would require major structural reform of the international system and global governance, far beyond that already attempted by the defunct UN Trusteeship Council and or UN General Assembly treaties on civil, political, minority, and indigenous rights. It would mean that former colonial subjects could be compensated for the ills of colonialism and the inequalities brought about by the evolution of global capitalism and related forms of empire. It would require global agreement and global institutions (see, e.g. Gonzalez 2017).

Herein lies a problem that Marx, Trotsky, and Lenin were familiar with: how to cause existing powerful actors or moribund institutions to dismantle themselves and how to remove them if they would not [cutting off the king's head, as Foucault (1980) famously noted]? How may we achieve this 'reform' without using violence or undermining the legitimacy of the new international order to come? This was a problem that Fanon (1963 [1961]) and other anti-colonial thinkers (see also Memmi 2006) 'solved' through accepting the use of violence to dismount injustice and achieve self-determination, also mirrored by a UN convention in the 1960s (United Nations, General Assembly 1960). All of these roads led to often violent forms of statehood (state formation), however. The self-determination and independence movements of the twentieth century, the emergence of the Non-Aligned Movement, the debates at the Bandung Conference, and, after, the 1970s attempt at the New International Economic Order were all designed to try to reform the systems that placed the emerging liberal peace and its close attachment to the Western political and economic model, and thus the material well-being of the people of the global north, above those of the newly independent countries in the global south (Acharya 2014a, b). By the 2000s, the Brazil, Russia, India, China, South Africa (BRICS), and in particular the rise of China, suggested that global order was evening out somewhat, yet at the same time economic inequality was growing. Postcolonial notions of emancipation indicate that this continues to relate to the injustices that global capital propagated, connected to former colonial practices and systems (Davis and Todd 2017, p. 763).

Post-Liberalism and Emancipatory Peace

This discussion points in different directions, one of which is towards a post-liberal version of emancipation. As posited under liberalism (ascribed to human rights, democracy, rule of law, and development or capitalism), it is Eurocentric, limited in material capacity, which undermines human rights and the legal equality it offers, as well as its failing to deliver services or prosperity (Gray 1993). It also begins to touch upon issues relating to the global commons (Ostrom 1990). The liberal version has overseen a major expansion of rights and prosperity, but positionality and national identity to a large degree still determine both. The liberal international architecture only offers discursive emancipation relative to existing power relations. A post-liberal version takes the postcolonial, gendered, and environmental critiques of liberalism and capitalism and attempts to understand what emancipation would look like during the transitional phase from liberalism into a more varied and multiple international system (Gray 1993). It attempts to transcend the history of Eurocentrism and imagine peace in the context of equality and the environment rather than nationally in the context of free capital and inequality (relating to identity, gender, and class) as under the modern advanced capitalist liberal state. Post-liberalism offers a form of emancipation mediated by the old hegemony of the liberal west and alternative claims and actors now emerging. It envisions an agonistic form of mediation and does not determine an outcome – other than a more sophisticated process of emancipation than before (Gray 1993). One step along this process always uncovers more power relations and injustices, however, meaning that rights will have to be expanded, in the context of the commons and the Anthropocene (Gonzalez 2017; Davis and Todd 2017, p. 763). The theoretical debates are divided between those who believe that post-liberalism means an abandonment of the state's ability to enforce and expand human rights to the vagaries of global governance and those who argue that more locally legitimate forms of political authority, from the local to the global scales, are emerging in the transition after liberalism (Ikenberry 2011). The problem with post-liberal versions of emancipation is that liberal and neoliberal hegemony refuse to give up power, ultimately undermining the limited progress it might offer.

Post-Structural Contributions

Connolly (2017, p. 4) has characterised an entangled humanism, which provides a new perspective on the planetary condition and in the context of political swarming. He refers to Foucault's 'technology of the self' and more recent engagements with 'micropolitics' to point to the new intersection that is emerging between postcolonial ecology, similar understandings emerging from the 'old capitalist centres', and the earth sciences. This represents an attempt to reposition politics (Connolly 2017, p. 12), moving beyond the older exemplars of social democracy and liberal international architecture as being the basis for the emancipation of labour and rights-bearing citizens. This pushes any discussion of emancipation away from a sole connection with ideology and international architecture, capitalism, or the state, towards a new planetary understanding of the 'good life' produced by entangled humanism in its Anthropocenic context (Connolly 2017, p. 13). It points to a much more expanded version of rights that has emerged from slavery, labour relations, class, gender, and capital or war. Expanded rights need to pinpoint the workings of power and to proceed from there: the point is to identify inequalities and mitigate them (Foucault 1978 [1976]). Both abstract and material equality are required: politics, economics, law, and institutions thus redistribute resources in order to achieve a sustainable, relational, networked, and mobile order, based upon relative equality and a sustainable ecological situation, which is apparent throughout each scale of analysis – local, state, and international. The objective of emancipatory peace is to liberate society or the individual from powerful predation via and through peace processes and peacebuilding connected to transversal and transnational networks, multiple agencies, and creative forms of resistance.

Global Justice and the Anthropocene

A global justice version of emancipatory peace follows closely on from such logic, proposing both a historical and distributive dimension to restitution and justice in post-conflict transitions. It places a lot of weight on the idea that individuals require and can attain justice and emancipation in relation to historical, political, economic, and social wrongs and contemporary inequalities (Pogge 2001). This may be achieved through the assistance of both civil society and international organisations and, in particular, domestic law and constitutional refinements, as well as international legal organisations, which act as a check and balance on the state or hegemony in favour of the citizen (Sen 2009). As the debates developed, it began to encompass custom and memory, as well as questions associated to the commons, trauma, and rights, in a philosophical, historical, and legal tradition, as well as the building up and further strengthening of international and state architecture. What is crucial about it, however, is the clear connection between war and global questions, thus pushing beyond older notions of sovereignty and agency and opening up issues relating to inequality and historical violence across time and space and in the context more recently of the Anthropocene (Gonzalez 2017). The placing of any act of violence into its broader context is very important in terms of developing a sustainable approach, but it is also unmanageable in terms of the sheer scale of the enterprise. Hence, its distillation into a range of international legal processes is often couched within the relatively limited framework of the international defence of basic human rights and national authority (Miller 2008; Young 2006). That the Anthropocene itself may be indicative of the inequality and injustice of industrial modernity has rarely been considered in mainstream literatures (Davis and Todd 2017).

Emancipation has traditionally been mainly focused on human oppression by other humans, the negative effects of the tyrannous state or imperialism, communism, and capitalism. The geopolitical and structural conditions have generally been seen as immutable but also exacerbated by human extraction. These were seen as the sum of human conflict, in the context of geopolitical and economic constraints, and a major debate has centred on whether violence may be used to achieve emancipation (Hewlett 2016). In the current era, the non-human world has entered the equation. Furthermore, as the concept of the commons has expanded its relationship with the development of human industrial activity, it has become clear that environmental degradation has become a factor in oppression.

Recent work on the Anthropocene as well as on 'new materialism' thus provides a deepened understanding of what contemporary emancipatory peace involves. Colonialism, industrialisation, the Cold War, and the emergence of global capital have all had their impact on the environment connecting old and new structures of power (Gonzalez 2017). It points to the problem of deeper structures rooted in the politics of resource use and distribution, something that Marx raised of course, but pointed not just to inequality and injustice but also the finite nature of these constraining resources. The Anthropocene itself is the product of unjust power structures (Gonzalez 2017). This temporal aspect relates to how political systems treat the environment but also accentuates questions of fairness in the use of resources across generations. This also raises crucial questions about how humans, societies, and states interact with the global commons and the environment. Justice, emancipation, politics, society, and economy thus have to be reconfigured for a complex world of intensifying environmental fragility. Thus, a key issue for contemporary emancipation relates to a broad range of relational dynamics, across generations, time, space, and networks, rather than its traditional focus on power and resistance. It points to a framework of sustainability after any revolutionary action.

Implications for an Emancipatory Peace

To draw together the different strands in the evolution relationship between peace and emancipatory critiques, a number of arguments remain pertinent to contemporary versions. In the colonial era, emancipation was clearly aimed at self-determination, as Fanon (1963 [1961]) argued, and the question was which methods were permissible, and whether violence could be applied against imperialism. In the Cold War era, emancipation was aimed at achieving human rights and democracy against communism or authoritarianism. It was also often concerned about matters of disarmament and Third World development. Or it was aimed against US or northern domination and capitalism, and there was much discussion about forms of resistance available to oppressed societies (non-violent in particular) (Roberts and Ash 2009). This was all to be contained within the dominant political vehicle of the state, softened by global governance and the liberal international architecture, with its focus on free trade and human rights. A lot of the academic literature using the term during the early post-Cold War tended to be leftist in orientation, sparking a focus on inequality, including questions of gender and on self-determination, was still concerned about global and social solidarity and how this might be built into an international system, such as the UN system.

In these different phases, emancipation began to align with matters of peace and conflict in a way that previously, when it was connected to economic and social hierarchies to do with race, ownership, and voting rights, in the state, empire, and the global economy, it was not. The idea of a peace agreement, peace processes, and ways of making peace began to align with the problem of emancipation in the emergent state and in the regional and international architecture. Through these mechanisms and processes, peace began to be connected to Marxist, critical, cosmopolitan, feminist, and postcolonial discussions about progress, liberation, the expansion of subaltern rights, and identifying and navigating around blockages erected by power to prevent equality or attacks on hierarchy.

In terms of historical evolution, emancipation was physical, social, political, and economic, and the process of balancing social and international claims or expanded rights through states and international institutions and law eventually became its main paradigms. This balance was to work against predatory economic, social, military, and political structures – from slavery to authoritarianism or inequality. However, the delegation of emancipation to the state, within UN doctrinal development (such as with human rights or minority rights), or development, the market and capital in the neoliberal era after the end of the Cold War pointed to a need for new understandings of emancipation. These new understandings would have to start from the premise that a peace settlement required structural change to deal with the causal factors of war, such as domination, inequality, territorialism and nationalism, and concurrent breakdowns of constitutional and regional political systems. All of these problems were associated with the state, meaning that anchoring emancipation to the state indicating significant subaltern social or international capacity was needed to achieve progress, where the state was paradoxically both the obstacle and provider of emancipation.

Thus, it is often pointed out that sovereignty or world government may be a tool of social justice, but it may also be an obstacle to it from the subaltern's perspective, just as global capital may contradict or support aspects of the international peacebuilding architecture's work. Hence, from a subaltern perspective peace may be attached to self-determination and expanded rights, but the state is more often than not an unambiguous vehicle for these goals. Therefore, it is more likely that peace attached to a notion of global justice in particular may not use the proxy of the 'international community' or the state as the main framework for understanding progressive order but instead may tend to adopt the positionality of the subaltern subject, engaging with social agency and power from below along its relationalities and networks. The state and international community thus are subcontractors for a broad concept of emancipatory peace, via hybridity, equality, and sustainability and drawing as it must on the work of post- and anti-colonial thinkers such as Fanon (Gibson 2003; Chabal 1983). This points to the need to reconcile the need for autonomy for subjects of past oppression or deprivation, the conservative requirement for a balanced structure, and the need for a progressive, interventionary vanguard with the power, skills, and resources to dismantle and replace the power structures of domination.

The contemporary relationship of peace with emancipation could follow either a hegemonic or a subaltern script. It could follow the hegemonic scripts including the interests and norms of the USA, EU, or China perhaps (see, e.g. Ginsburg 2010). Or it could follow a postcolonial, post-liberal script, following the path of General Assembly conventions in the 1960s; the Non-Aligned Movement and NEIO in the 1970s (United Nations, General Assembly 2018); the expansion of rights starting with the Helsinki Accords in the mid-1970s (Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe 1975) and in the 1990s; the Agendas for Peace, Democratisation, and Development (Boutros-Ghali 1992); the High-Level Panel Reports and R2P in the 2000s (International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty 2001; High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change 2004; United Nations, General Assembly 2005); and debates about sustainability in the 2010s, such as the 'Sustaining Peace' agenda (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2018; United Nations, General Assembly 2015).

These scripts were rarely identical, though, in the 1990s era of human rights and democracy, there began to be some convergence (though these may not have gone far enough for social actors and may have gone too far for many existing elites). For this reason, emancipation's connection with peace seems to have taken the current path of either sustainability (requiring historical, distributive, gender, and environmental justice) or resilience (based upon self-help and subsistence) in the most reason phase.

Since the end of the Cold War, emancipation was initially aimed at democratisation, human rights, and development within the state, balanced with autonomy and self-determination. As liberal peace shifted into neoliberal peace, with the onset of the 2000s, emancipation was increasingly linked implicitly with capitalism by the USA (as in Iraq and Afghanistan) rather than human rights as the UN preferred, supported by Western interventionism, neoliberal globalisation, and new technologies, including for communication and transport. Subaltern responses continued to equate emancipation, on the other hand, with more complex stances to Western interventionism (both supporting elements that dismantled oppressive regimes and rejecting elements that undermined their political aspirations), capitalism and environmental degradation, and unequal resource distribution.

By the 2000s, with the resurgence of neoliberal and westernised attempts to engage in global stabilisation (through development, peacebuilding, state-building, humanitarianism, and new forms of global governance), a new postcolonial context emerged with questions arising about the unbalanced global economy, Western and US-led intervention in Iraq and Afghanistan, and the lack of involvement in Syria (see, e.g. Mishraj 2012).

This has reframed how emancipation is understood, indicating the need to more fully implement science-led understandings [e.g. in UN doctrine leading up to 'Sustainable Peace' (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2018, para. 6) and 'Pathways to Peace' (United Nations, World Bank 2018) approaches] and to deal with the blockages caused by public reason, related to territorial sovereignty, the reluctance to engage with historical and distributive (global) justice question, and sustainability in practice terms within the state-system format.

In critical praxis it was now generally assumed as being based on meeting expanding rights and needs and respecting identity of subaltern subjects, all in an empathetic way. In particular, it foregrounded political claims from the global south, conflict-affected, and developmental societies (historically as well as in the contemporary global political economy). Equality, historical, and distributive justice, within the state and across the globe, became an often unspoken assumption, connecting peace with conceptions of global justice (increasingly postcolonial rather than liberal conceptions) (Kohn 2013, p. 190; Dallmayr 2003; Nagel 2005; Nussbaum 2000; Pogge 2008; Fraser 2010). It is thought to offer care and the prospect of a wide-ranging peace dividend. It highlights sustainability across generations, spaces, and modes of life, pointing to the newer concept of ‘planetary justice’ (Dryzek 2019, p. 67).

Thus, emancipation may be understood partly as a liberal political concept made possible by a contract between the subaltern and the state or international institutions and hegemony. It is certainly Eurocentric. It assumes individuals have a range of rights, duties, responsibilities, and agencies by virtue of their existence, which they can achieve either through their own agency or with centralised governmental or external assistance. They are able to mobilise for self-emancipation or are emancipated by intervening powers. It assumes that equality is a global and domestic public good, and emancipation is the process by which some approximation of this can be achieved. However, it carries with it a strong sense that both direct and structural violence will be dealt with through solidarity and networked agency and that subaltern voices will determine its nature, which will ultimately be progressive in terms of social justice. As with such political theory, there is a strong idealist strand in this type of thinking, which connects with a number of other debates: post-structuralism, post-colonialism, and anti-colonialism. In this vein it may be seen as connected to multiple forms of representation, social justice, and social democracy, as well as to self-determination. Deep structural hierarchies as well as environmental matters are sometimes referred to. Realists assume that basic security is the first step, but to develop further is unlikely and fraught with difficulty because security rests upon power, making emancipation a utopian goal. Marxist, liberal, and critical thinking indicate, however, that the Arendtian axiom of the expansion of rights is a stronger logic for emancipation (drawing on Arendt 1951; DeGooyer et al. 2018, p. 4; Moyn 2018, p. 68), meaning they travel from security, representation, and development to justice and sustainability, albeit agonistically. This points more to hybrid arrangements of emancipatory peace.

Thus, the concept of emancipatory peace assumes progress beyond the negative peace entailed in a diplomatic peace agreement, at least partly determined by power [as with the Camp David Accords between Egypt and Israel in the late 1970s (Princen 1991)] towards a positive peace [perhaps as might be seen with the post-settlement Northern Ireland environment (Cox et al. 2006)] and further to more hybrid forms of peace (see, e.g. Richmond 2011), opening up issues of global justice and sustainability. This linear path means that emancipation implies that any peace agreement between warring parties, which takes on the additional status of a constitutional framework or a normative prescription for social and state behaviour henceforth, must include a social dimension and justice dimension, which spans environmental, intergenerational, and material forms. Thus, it becomes rapidly overloaded, even though few resources are available. Without a local scale, and social positionality, able to identify oppressive forms and sources of power and inform interventionary praxis, legitimate authority for both the state and the peace is soon lost. Without the capacity for international actors to support peace through the enablement of subaltern agency and the reform of governance in line with political claims made transversally, emancipation cannot be achieved. The peace will be a victor’s peace or represent hegemonic or elite interests.

Identifying what structures of power there are opens up the emancipatory process of responding, ultimately to reconfigure power relations. This requires an international-intersectional perspective on subaltern political claims in order to establish a peace praxis driven by evening out a wide range of inequalities – race, class, and gender – on a local to international transversal scale. So far, the main theories of peace and conflict studies or IR have not addressed peace at this level of complexity or scale: victor’s, liberal, conflict management, resolution, or transformation versions of peace have tended to be limited to social or state-level interactions. This has meant the complex transmission of conflict across networks is not addressed. As Kant wrote (2003 [1795]), in a universal community, wrongs committed in one place are felt everywhere (Archibugi 1992). These complex interactions would need to be finely arranged in order to lead to a sustainable balance across difference [see the UN's recent Sustaining Peace agenda for this direction of thought (United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council 2018; United Nations, General Assembly 2015)]. Ultimately, this points to a continual expansion of rights, from domestic and localised matters of insecurity to the state and its constitutional framework and from international governance as in the liberal peace to longer-term intergenerational issues of justice and sustainability.

Putting all of this together, this indicates the following dimensions need to be considered. For Marxists emancipation requires a resolution of class conflict, which requires a dismantling of the whole structure of national and global political economy, which is designed by the powerful to otherwise preserve the vestiges of aristocracy. Its ownership would have to pass into the hands of the general population, and private property would tend to also be redistributed, because property, land, and other material resources are the basis of power: emancipation has to be about material equality, which then reflected in law and institutions, as well as norms. For liberals, it requires human rights, a social contract, and free trade to balance the powers that exist in society, state, and markets, recognising that rights, trade, and property within an enabling state and economy are the main determinants of emancipation. For realists, it requires a stable balance of power between nation-states, and ultimately emancipation arises through a mutually assured system of destruction. For constructivists, emancipation relates to how the interplay of identity leads to the formation of institutions designed to deal with political claims against oppressive or unjust forms of power, following a similar line to liberal thought. Along with critical theorists, liberal and constructivist thought also points to how an international architecture of institutions, law, and economic, political and military tools may be used to respond to such claims, where they undermine the notion of a cosmopolitan world community. This is why liberal notions of emancipation ultimately become top-down constructions, following a similar logic to critical, liberal, and structural notions of governance in domestic political settings. For feminists, emancipation requires gender equality and an understanding of the subtle and deep shifts in power relations this requires, as well as some historical recognition of injustice. Increasingly, many radical movements point to historical, distributive, and environmental forms of justice as essential components of emancipatory thought. Feminism adds an empathetic element to this understanding, relating not merely to material knowledge but also to identity and related class issues (Sylvester 2002).

This points to a far more relational framework, between people but also between issues, highlighting, for example, social and technological linkages with the environment, as well as the economy with social equality (Qin 2006). For anarchists, emancipation means far less government and far more personal autonomy. For environmentalists, emancipation means action to make resource use sustainable. For critical theorists, it aims at the creation of a cosmopolitan global community based upon functional or ideationally constructed common goals or, alternatively, the global mediation of difference across time and space into a more egalitarian material framework of politics. For postcolonialists, emancipation means removing direction and hidden forms of external domination and gaining autonomy as far as structural power relations might allow. For post-structuralists, emancipation refers to the removal of boundaries and binaries and anything in fact that prevents the individual from determining their own selves at any moment, freely and within an ethos of equalitarianism.

Critical positions, drawing on Marx, would see emancipation as being understood in Balibar (Balibar 2014) terms, more or less, as starting from a subaltern positionality in order to represent and balance rights, material equality, environmental sustainability, identity, culture, and norms through social and transversal consensus, law, institutions, the state, and regional and international institutions ('equa-liberty'). This has implications for deep, structural reform, basically confirming the positions of the global justice literatures, if not extending them (Porta et al. 2007).

The rethinking of the concept of emancipation along the lines of equa-liberty (Balibar 2014) will require a continual push by all agents against blockages in order to achieve progress in the theory and practice of global justice. This would be organised around post-liberal versions of sovereignty, legislative justice, and contractual international law, all within a multilateral, multi-vertical, and scalar umbrella pointing to hybrid peace: heterotopias emerging from critical agency and civil societies (Foucault and Miskowiec 1986 [1984]).

However, there are clearly contradictions in these possible interpretations. In essence, the dismantling of existing power structures in favour of global justice represents the epistemological and methodological aims of an emancipatory peace from a radical perspective, whereas, from a liberal or neoliberal perspective, it is the maintenance and expansion of core, elite structures that are necessary to produce a trickle-down or norm cascade (Finnemore and Sikkink 2002; Sunstein 1996). The latter liberal view may be justified on the grounds of what is possible and expedient, whereas the former critical approach is justified on the grounds of longer-term understandings of the conditions of a sustainable peace. The latter requires an acceptance that ontologically a positive form of hybrid peace is possible (given the acute differences in global populations' cultures and positionalities), that deep structures do not mitigate against such a peace, and that politics, economics, society, and culture are both 'resolvable' and transformational terrains of human interaction.

Glacially slow, and contested at every turn, this evolution is now becoming an empirical and intellectual schematic, which can be described, whilst at the same time comprising discursive and structural power, which simultaneously shapes subjectivity, often in favour of hegemony. This is probably why narratives about emancipation in history tend to favour the interpretation of elites (e.g. 'Whig history') rather than the subaltern actors, who were probably most dominant in the discursive and material struggle and resistance necessary to produce reform. In the end, this offers the tantalising possibility that emancipation can only be spoken by the local or networked subaltern, despite their positionality and weakness (and actually because of it). Elites may ignore emancipatory speech, as it is normally aimed against them, or they may claim it and adopt it. Defining and acting upon emancipatory discourse requires an alignment of the subaltern and power, neither of which are static, however.

This poses something of a problem for post-structuralist thought, which is predicated against any alignment of powers and is pro-difference. On the other hand, it supports the positions of critical theorists and Marxists, who seek global agreement in cosmopolitan or solidarist form. So, if emancipation can only be found in the fragmentation of power as Mouffe, Laclau, Balibar, and others argue (see, e.g. Mouffe 2013, p. 84), then where would the revolutionary agency come from necessary to break down existing power frameworks? Conversely, if power must be aligned across actors and scales for emancipation to become possible according to liberal thought, how do we make power accountable to the weaker rather than the stronger members of society, the state, and the international? These are old questions only partly answered by political liberalism, postcolonialism, post-structuralism, and other theories that engage with rights, checks and balances, equality, and sustainability.

Many thinkers engaged with the potential and problems of the global commons tend to point to the salience of direct forms of democracy in order to produce new forms of emancipation. First, subaltern positionalities identify the problems, power relations, and structures, often connecting resistance with the everyday and the international. Next, local knowledge offers an alternative perspective on what might be done about them.

Micro-solidarities and scalar networks have create new ways of creating such processes and achieving such goals in an age of increased social mobilisation and capacities at the social and transnational levels. The logic of the commons tends to focus on inclusiveness, sustainability, and justice, across time and space. This points to new scalar forms of governance, norms, and claims for rights in both legal and material terms, starting from contextual positionalities.

If such claims were socialised, environmentalised, empathised, pluralised, and equalised in an intergenerational perspective, it would become possible to refresh the concept of emancipation for general contemporary use in a more global setting, where the local is far more prominent than ever before. However, the advent of digital governmentality as part of a broader digital shift in IR (Owen 2015) means that emancipation has taken on a new contradiction. This is between the liberatory aspects of new technologies, networks, communications, transport, mobility, and knowledge that could achieve this (Lipschutz 2005) and the capacity of such technologies to be used for control to rescue those older power structures associated with nationalism, geopolitics, or geo-economics. Digital governmentality is closely aligned to colonial and industrial stratifications of peace, as well as to those adopted under liberalism and globalisation within the Anthropocene (Davis and Todd 2017; Owen 2015).

Even so, one clear meaning of emancipation which can be agreed on is that it is connected to the identification of systems of domination by those they oppress, and their dismantling and replacing either by external actors or their subjects. According to my analysis, it requires two positionalities working in tandem: the subaltern and the vanguard, configuring power relations between intervenors and the subaltern, which must inevitably be based upon trust and communication in difficult circumstances. The sides must agree for this to be included in any peace agreement or new constitutional order. More problematically, opponents who benefit from existing power relations must also agree.

Summary

Herein lie five important prerequisites for the rethinking of emancipation for the twenty-first century:

1. A definition which is politically progressive and materially plausible, sustainable across generations.
2. It gathers local and national democratic majorities as well as appeals to the international community in terms of its institutions and the transnational/transversal sets of international actors.
3. Existing national and international systems can be utilised and improved in order to deliver emancipation commensurate with the claims of the subaltern in political, social, and economic areas.
4. Alterity and expanded rights, global justice, networks, mobility, sustainability, and the commons provide the context for this rethinking of emancipation, connected with the current shift from an 'analogue' to 'digital' world.
5. A new layer of thinking and practice/governance needs to be brought into being to deal with emancipation in the new digital conditions.

This evolution begins to connect new forms of emancipation with debates about global justice, operating in connection to networks, mobility, relationality, and sustainability, across time, space, and structure.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Peace and Political Unsettlement
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Phenomenological Peace

References

- Acharya, A. (2014a). Global international relations (IR) and regional worlds: A new agenda for international studies. International Studies Quarterly, 58(4), 1–13.
- Acharya, A. (2014b). Who are the global norm makers: The Asian-African conference in Bandung and the evolution of norms. Global Governance, 20(3), 405–417.
- Allawi, A. A. (2007). The occupation of Iraq. Winning the war, losing the peace. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Archibugi, D. (1992). Models of international organization in perpetual peace projects. Review of International Studies, 18(4), 295–317.
- Archibugi, D. (2008). The global commonwealth of citizens: Toward cosmopolitan democracy. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Archibugi, D., & Held, D. (1995). Cosmopolitan democracy: An agenda for a new world order. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Arendt, H. (1951). The origins of totalitarianism. New York: Harcourt Brace.
- Arendt, H. (1993). Between past and future: Eight exercises in political thought. New York: Penguin.
- Balibar, É. (2014). Equaliberty: Political essays (J. Ingram, Trans.). Duke University Press.
- Barber, T. (2016, July 11). A renewed nationalism is stalking Europe. Financial Times. Retrieved October 2020, from <https://www.ft.com/content/53fc4518-4520-11e6-9b66-0712b3873ae1>
- Beck, U. (1999). World risk society. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Berlin, I. (2004). Liberty. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Boas, T. C., & Gans-Morse, J. (2009). Neoliberalism: From new Liberal philosophy to anti-liberal slogan. Studies in Comparative International Development, 44(2), 137–161.
- Booth, K. (1991). Security and emancipation. Review of International Studies, 17(4), 313–326.
- Boutros-Ghali, B. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping. New York: United Nations.
- Brown, W. (2015). Undoing the demos: Neoliberalism's stealth revolution. Cambridge: MIT Press.
- Chabal, P. (1983). Amílcar Cabral: Revolutionary leadership and people's war. New York/Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Chandler, D. (2018). Ontopolitics in the Anthropocene: An introduction to mapping, sensing and hacking. London: Routledge.
- Chimni, B. S. (2007). The past, present and future of international law: A critical third world approach. Melbourne Journal of International Law, 8(2), 499–515.
- Comaroff, J., & Comaroff, J. L. (2012). Theory from the south or: how euro-America is evolving toward Africa. Boulder: Paradigm Publishers.
- Connolly, W. E. (2017). Facing the planetary: Entangled humanism and the politics of swarming. Durham: Duke University Press.
- Cox, M., Guelke, A., & Stephen, F. (2006). A farewell to arms?: Beyond the Good Friday agreement. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Dallmayr, F. (2003). Cosmopolitanism: Moral and political. Political Theory, 31(3), 421–442.
- Davis, H., & Todd, Z. (2017). On the importance of a date, or, decolonizing the Anthropocene. ACME: An International Journal for Critical Geographies, 16(4), 761–780.
- DeGooyer, S., Hunt, A., Maxwell, L., Moyn, S., & Taylor, A. (2018). The right to have rights. London: Verso.
- Dodge, T. (2005). Inventing Iraq: The failure of nation building and a history denied. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Doyle, M. W. (1986). Liberalism and world politics. The American Political Science Review, 80(4), 1151–1169.
- Dryzek, J. S. (2019). The politics of the Anthropocene. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Duffield, M. (2018). Post-humanitarianism: Governing precarity in the digital world. Cambridge: Polity.
- Falk, R. (1995). On humane governance: Towards a new global politics. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Fanon, F. (1963 [1961]). The wretched of the earth (C. Farrington, Trans.). New York: Grove Weidenfeld.
- Finnemore, M., & Sikkink, K. (2002). International norm dynamics and political change. International Organization, 52(4), 887–917.
- Foucault, M. (1978 [1976]). History of sexuality volume 1: An introduction. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Foucault, M. (1980). Power/knowledge: Selected interviews and other writings, 1972–1977 (C. Gordon, Ed.). New York: Pantheon Books.
- Foucault, M. (1982). The subject and power. Critical Inquiry, 8(4), 777–795.
- Foucault, M., & Miskowicz, J. (1986 [1984]). Of other spaces. Diacritics, 16(1), 22–27.
- Fraser, N. (2010). Scales of justice: Reimagining political space in a globalizing world. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Fukuyama, F. (1989). The end of history? The National Interest, 16, 3–18.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Gibson, N. C. (2003). Fanon: The postcolonial imagination. Oxford: Polity Press.
- Ginsburg, T. (2010). Eastphalia as the perfection of Westphalia. Indiana Journal of Global Legal Studies, 17(1), 27–45.
- Gonzalez, C. G.-O. (2017). Global justice in the Anthropocene. In L. Kotze (Ed.), Environmental law and governance for the Anthropocene (Seattle University School of Law Research Paper No. 17-06). Retrieved from <https://ssrn.com/abstract=2929042>
- Gray, J. (1993). Postliberalism: Studies in political thought. London: Routledge.

- Habermas, J. (2001). The post-national constellation: Political essays. Cambridge: MIT Press.
- Harvey, D. (2005). A brief history of neoliberalism. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hayek, F. A. (1994 [1944]). The road to serfdom. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Held, D. (1995). Democracy and the global order: From the modern state to cosmopolitan governance. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Hewlett, N. (2016). Blood and progress: Violence in pursuit of emancipation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- High-level Panel on Threats, Challenges and Change. (2004). A more secure world: Our shared responsibility, A/59/565. United Nations.
- Honneth, A. (2015). The idea of socialism: Towards a renewal. Cambridge: Polity.
- Howard, P. N. (2015). Pax technica. New Heaven: Yale University Press.
- Ikenberry, G. J. (2011). The future of the liberal world order: Internationalism after America. Foreign Affairs, 60(3), 56–68.
- International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty. (2001). The responsibility to protect. Ottawa: International Development Research Centre.
- K.N.C. (2018, April 16). Technology and its discontents. Retrieved October 2020, from <https://www.economist.com/open-future/2018/04/16/technology-and-its-discontents>
- Kant, I. (2003 [1795]). To perpetual peace: A philosophical sketch. In Perpetual peace and other essays (T. Humphrey, Trans.). Indianapolis: Hackett Publishing Company.
- Kohn, M. (2013). Postcolonialism and global justice. Journal of Global Ethics, 9(2), 187–200.
- Laclau, E. (2001 [1985]). Hegemony and socialist strategy: Towards a radical democratic politics. London: Verso.
- Lawler, P. (2005). The good state: In praise of ‘classical’ internationalism. Review of International Studies, 31(3), 427–449.
- Lebow, R. N. (2003). The tragic vision of politics: Ethics, interests and orders. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Linklater, A. (1998). The transformation of political community: Ethical foundations of the post-Westphalian era. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Lipschutz, R. D. (2005). Power, politics and global civil society. Millennium, 33(3), 747–769.
- Locke, J. (1988 [1689]). Locke: Two treatises of government (P. Laslett, Ed.). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Marx, K. (1963). On the Jewish question. In T. B. Bottomore & M. Rubel (Eds.), Karl Marx: Early writings. New York/Toronto/London: McGraw-Hill.
- Mearsheimer, J. J. (2001). The tragedy of great power politics. New York: W.W. Norton & Company.
- Memmi, A. (2006). Decolonization and the decolonized. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Miller, D. (2008). National responsibility and global justice. Critical Review of International Social and Political Philosophy, 11(4), 383–399.
- Mishraj, P. (2012). From the ruins of empire: The intellectuals who remade Asia. London: Penguin.
- Monshipouri, M., & Mokhtari, S. (2016). The quest for human rights in the digital age. In M. Monshipouri (Ed.), Information politics, protests and human rights in the digital age. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Mouffe, C. (2013). Agonistics. London: Verso.
- Moyn, S. (2018). Not enough: Human rights in an unequal world. Cambridge/London: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.
- Nagel, T. (2005). The problem of global justice. Philosophy and Public Affairs, 33(2), 113–147.
- Nkrumah, K. (1965). Neo-colonialism, the last stage of imperialism. London: Thomas Nelson & Sons.
- Nunes, J. (2012). Reclaiming the political: Emancipation and critique in security studies. Security Dialogue, 43(4), 345–361.
- Nussbaum, M. (2000). Duties of justice, duties of material aid. Journal of Political Philosophy, 8(2), 176–206.
- Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe. (1975, August 1). Conference on security and co-operation in Europe final act. Retrieved from OSCE: <https://www.osce.org/files/f/documents/5/c/39501.pdf>
- Ostrom, E. (1990). Governing the commons: The evolution of institutions for collective action. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Owen, T. (2015). Disruptive power: The crisis of the state in the digital age. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Paine, T. (2000 [1791]). Rights of man. New York: Dover.
- Pieterse, J. N. (1992). Emancipations, modern and post-modern. Development and Change, 23(3), 5–41.
- Pogge, T. (2001). Priorities of global justice. Metaphilosophy, 32(1–2), 6–24.
- Pogge, T. (2008). World poverty and human rights. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Porta, D. D., Andretta, M., Calle, A., Combes, H., Eggert, N., Giugni, M. G., ... Marchetti, R. (2007). Global justice movement: Cross-national and transnational perspectives. London: Routledge.
- Prashad, V. (2012). The poorer nations: A possible history of the global south. London: Verso.
- Princen, T. (1991). Camp David: Problem-solving or power politics as usual? Journal of Peace Research, 28(1), 57–69.
- Qin, Y. (2006). A relational theory of world politics. International Studies Review, 18(1), 33–47.
- Rancière, J. (2009). The emancipated spectator (G. Elliot, Trans.). London: Verso.
- Rawls, J. (1985). Justice as fairness: Political not metaphysical. Political Theory, 14(3), 223–251.
- Richmond, O. P. (2005). The transformation of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. P. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.

- Roberts, A., & Ash, T. G. (Eds.). (2009). Civil resistance and power politics: The experience of non-violent action from Gandhi to the present. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rupert, M. (2009, March 22). Notes on political and human emancipation: A simplified reconstruction of Marx's reasoning in "on the Jewish question". Retrieved 2020 October, from [Wayback Machine] Maxwell Syracuse University: https://web.archive.org/web/20090322060613/http://faculty.maxwell.syr.edu/merupert/political_and_human_emancipation.htm
- Schmitt, C. (1996 [1932]). The concept of the political (G. Schwab, Trans.). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Sen, A. (2000). Development as freedom. New York: Anchor Books.
- Sen, A. (2009). The idea of justice. London: Penguin Books.
- Smith, L. T. (1999). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and indigenous peoples. London: Zed Books.
- Spivak, G. C. (1988). Can the subaltern speak? In C. Nelson & L. Grossberg (Eds.), Marxism and the interpretation of culture (pp. 271–313). Urbana: University of Illinois Press.
- Steger, M. B. (1997). The quest for evolutionary socialism: Eduard Bernstein and social democracy. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Sunstein, C. R. (1996). Social norms and social roles. Columbia Law Review, 96(4), 903–968.
- Sylvester, C. (2002). Feminist international relations: An unfinished journey. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Trump's world: The new nationalism. (2016, November 16). The Economist. Retrieved from <https://www.economist.com/leaders/2016/11/19/the-new-nationalism>
- United Nations, General Assembly. (1960, December 14). Declaration on the granting of Independence to colonial countries and peoples, A/RES/1514(XV). New York: United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly. (2005). In larger freedom: Towards development, security and human rights for all, A/59, 2005. United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly. (2015, October 21). Transforming our world: The 2030 agenda for sustainable development, A/RES/70/1. United Nations.
- United Nations, General Assembly. (2018, September 26). Upholding the UN Charter and the purposes and principles of the non-aligned movement (NAM): Towards a culture of peace. Retrieved October 2020, from United Nations: <https://www.un.org/pga/73/2018/09/26/upholding-the-un-charter-and-the-purposes-and-principles-of-the-non-aligned-movement-nam-towards-a-culture-of-peace/>
- United Nations, General Assembly, Security Council. (2018, January 18). Peacebuilding and sustaining peace, A/72/707–S/2018/43. United Nations.
- United Nations, World Bank. (2018). Pathways to peace: Inclusive approaches to preventing violent conflict. Washington: World Bank.
- Wallerstein, I. (1974). The modern world-system: Capitalist agriculture and the origins of the European world-economy in the sixteenth century. New York: Academic.
- Williams, M. C. (2005). The realist tradition and the limits of international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Wood, E. M. (2005). Empire of capital. London: Verso.
- Young, I. M. (2006). Responsibility and global justice. Social Philosophy and Policy, 23(1), 102–130.

Emergence

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Emergencies

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Emerging Power

- ▶ Asian Approaches to Peace

Emotions

- ▶ Artpeace: Validating Political Power or Imagining Emancipation

Empowerment

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy
- ▶ Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Environmental Peacebuilding

- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict

Epistemic Violence

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
-

Ethical Research

- ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research
-

Ethics

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy
 - ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research
-

Ethnic Cleansing

- ▶ R2P and Prevention
-

Ethnic Conflict

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
 - ▶ Identity and Political Violence
 - ▶ Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka
-

Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia

Lura Pollozhani
Centre for Southeast European Studies,
University of Graz, Graz, Austria

Synonyms

Discrimination; Ethnic conflict; Minority rights; North Macedonia; Violence

Definition

Ethnic tensions in the Republic of North Macedonia have been a fixture of its political and social life since the country was part of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and after its independence in 1991 to the present day. (This article uses the new constitutional name of North Macedonia resulting from the so-called Prespa agreement and the subsequent constitutional changes in 2019. The name “Macedonia” is used when referred to in original quotations.) The first issue for the new republic became the inclusiveness of the state and who belonged to it, which put the ethnic Macedonians and ethnic Albanians particularly at odds, the former as the majority community and the latter as the largest non-majority community. The political tensions of the 1990s and the inability to resolve them were the main cause behind the 2001 ethnic conflict between the Macedonian state and the ethnically Albanian guerrilla group, the National Liberation Army. The conflict claimed 250 lives, while more than 140,000 persons became refugees or internally displaced persons. Since 2001, North Macedonia has been relatively peaceful with political disagreements being resolved through democratic means. However, in 2015, there was a brief weekend conflict which proved that ethnic narratives are still among the main tropes of tension in the country. It also showed that things had advanced since 2001 as the conflict did not gain support from the ethnic Macedonians or ethnic Albanians, demonstrating a new political and social landscape where ethnicity is still important, but does not hold the same potential for mobilization that it used to hold.

State-Building in Multiethnic Societies

The Republic of North Macedonia gained its independence from Yugoslavia in 1991 relatively peacefully, since it did not result with or cause a war, as was the case with other countries which broke off from former Yugoslavia. Hence, North Macedonia is not often associated with conflict; however, conflicts have been present in the country and have oftentimes determined the course that it has taken toward state-building. North Macedonia is home to numerous ethnic communities including the ethnic Macedonian, Albanian, Turkish, Bosnian, Romani, and others. However, of these, the ethnic Macedonian is the majority community, which also claims the ownership of the state and the status of “titular nation.” (Titular nation or constituent peoples, i.e., ethnic majority. Ethnic groups that do not belong to the titular nation are ethnic minorities. In Yugoslavia, the members of the titular nations, such as the Macedonians, would fall under the category of “narod” (people), whereas the ethnic minorities, such as the Albanians, were “narodnosti” (nationalities).) In the context of such a multiethnic society, the sense of ownership in the state has been the main bone of contention and internal conflict since the republic was established in 1945 and after its independence in 1991. The Yugoslav context also matters when exploring conflict in contemporary North Macedonia, as it established the framework of statehood and nationhood even after independence. As Shaw and Štiks (2013) argue, “[t]he complex system of titular nations, nationalities and minorities applicable in Tito’s Yugoslavia was replaced with an equally complex system of multiple and overlapping citizenship regimes privileging often the dominant ethnic group” (p. 2). In Yugoslavia, two categories had existed, namely, the category of the constituent narod or nation which in the case of North Macedonia was the ethnic Macedonians and other the other narodnosti or nationalities which in the country context were the ethnic Albanians. After independence, the category of narod persisted, while the category of narodnosti did not, and was instead replaced by malcinstvo or minority (Brown 2000, pp. 128–129) which constituted a downgrade particularly for the Albanian community which had previously been recognized as a narodnosti with cultural and political rights (Spaskovska 2010, p. 7). The non-majority ethnic communities after independence “argued that all Macedonian citizens – whether ethnically Macedonian, Albanian, Turkish, Serb, Rom, Vlach, or Egyptian – should enjoy equal status” (Brown 2000, pp. 128–129). However, as was the case with other states succeeding Yugoslavia, North Macedonia’s citizenship regime, too, became ethnoculturally selective (Džankić 2015, p. 30).

The Constitution of the new state clearly delineated that the country was the “national state of the Macedonian people, in which full equality as citizens and permanent co-existence with the Macedonian people is provided for Albanians, Turks, Vlachs, Romanians and other nationalities living in the Republic of Macedonia” (Constitution of the Republic of Macedonia, Preamble 1991). This followed a pattern which Štiks (2006) identifies resulting from the dissolution of Yugoslavia, namely, that the “new legislation introduced in the successor states in most cases offered privileged status to members of the majority ethnic group regardless of their place of residence” (p. 484). Still, North Macedonia had to ensure minority rights for the different ethnic communities living within its borders in order to have its independent status recognized by the Badinter Arbitration Committee which was established in 1991 to offer advice and criteria on the recognition of the states dissolving from Yugoslavia (Džankić 2015, p. 61). The Committee had recommended that “the Republics must afford the members of those minorities and ethnic groups all the human rights and fundamental freedoms recognized in international law, including, where appropriate, the right to choose their nationality” (Pellet 1992, p. 184 as quoted in Džankić 2015, p. 61). North Macedonia effectively had satisfied these conditions, along with Slovenia, and therefore was deemed by the Badinter Committee to have fulfilled the criteria for recognition in January 1992 (Brown 2000, p. 122). Indeed, Spaskovska (2010) notes that the minority protection legal framework in North Macedonia postindependence offered the highest protections in the region (p. 7).

Disparities in the inclusion of then non-majority communities in the country, however, were present and were largely left unaddressed with the formation of the new state. This led to a turbulent first decade since:

the 1990s [in] North Macedonia [were] shaped by the unresolved and tense relationship between Macedonian and Albanians within the country [...]

The policy toward Albanians was a messy combination of inclusion (participating in the ruling coalition since 1991) and exclusion (in higher education and language rights). (Bieber 2020, p. 54)

Indeed, Albanian political parties were included in the governing coalitions since the first government, and they were also part of the parliament. However, Albanian political parties were unsatisfied by the state of affairs which led them to boycott and use other political methods of mobilization. This was due to the fact that they considered from the outset that the new Constitution and policies were rendering Albanians as second-class citizens (Štiks 2006, p. 490; Spaskovska 2010, p. 10). Notably, Albanians boycotted the referendum for the country's independence in 1991 as well as the first census of the independent state (Spaskovska 2010, p. 9). Instead, they organized a referendum on autonomy in 1992 (Spaskovska 2010; Brown 2003, p. 33), which, although significant since it was voted on by 99% of ethnic Albanian voters (Iseni 2013, pp. 181–182), was not acted upon but used as leverage by Albanian political parties to demand more rights. The Albanians' main complaints were the issue of education and employment, as well as the preamble of the Constitution which led to the boycott (Spaskovska 2010, p. 9). While the new constitution guaranteed education in the mother tongue for primary and secondary school, it did not provide for university education. State employment was also very low for Albanians, as low as 7% in state institutions (Bieber 2004, p. 116). The low level was not only the result of direct discrimination by the state (Bieber 2004; Brunnbauer 2004), but it was still largely affected by it and further contributed to a low inclusion of Albanians and other ethnic communities in state structures.

In addition to these real problems that the Albanian community faced, the Macedonian state was also excluding them and others from the narrative of the state. As Brunnbauer's (2003) analysis of the historiography of North Macedonia in the early years of its independence shows, the new state tried to develop a narrative that focused on the Macedonians, disregarding other narratives. The difference of narratives of what North Macedonia was and represented was very important, as they show a crucial point of contention. Namely, while for ethnic Macedonians the state was "theirs" or a state of the ethnic Macedonians, where other communities also lived, for "Albanians, Macedonia is a multicultural country and Albanians as a cultural and political community, are a component of it" (Iseni 2013, p. 176). This context is very important in understanding the conflict in North Macedonia, as it cannot be understood without considering the systemic discrimination and stratification of society. As Brunnbauer (2004) succinctly argues:

it is not so much these ethnic differences themselves which created the conflict—although they were a source of stereotypes and mutual misperceptions. It was the Macedonian state's lack of understanding and insensitivity to these differences, which politicized them and made them contentious. (p. 367)

Indeed, this lack of understanding can be seen in the violence and contention that preceded the 2001 ethnic conflict which marked an escalation of violence which did not erupt into a war, thanks to the signing of the Ohrid Framework Agreement (see the chapter "► Ohrid Framework Agreement, The," this volume).

Ethnic Disparities and the Precursors to Ethnic Conflict

Violence and ethnic conflict on a smaller scale were not unusual in North Macedonia, and they were precursors to the ethnic conflict which lasted for half a year in early 2001. These moments of violence during the 1990s resulted in mutual lack of trust between the ethnic Macedonians and Albanians and particularly between the Albanians and the state as such. In 1992, there was the Bit Pazar incident where "police exchanged fire with Albanian protesters, [which] created anxiety among Macedonians in Skopje" (Brown 2003, p. 33) and left four people dead (Brown 2000, p. 128). Furthermore, as Brown (2003) argues, certain "elements in the Albanian community consistently advocated the use of more radical forms of political action, and from 1992 onward Macedonia saw sporadic violence between ethnic Albanians and police” (p. 245). The next moment of violence happened in 1994, when a group of Albanian intellectuals decided to establish a university in Tetovo that would provide teaching in the Albanian language. The state responded with police violence, as the educational establishment was declared illegal and violence ensued. During the clash, one person died, 20 people were injured (Brown 2000, p. 130), while the rector of the university was imprisoned (Iseni 2013, p. 183). In response to the violence and indicative of the double narratives that dominate the public sphere of North Macedonia, the “Macedonian government emphasized the university’s illegality, while Albanian politicians emphasized police violence” (Brown 2000, p. 130). Despite the violence the university kept working by “being funded through a volunteer tax paid by Albanians both within and outside the country” (Iseni 2013, p. 183) though still illegal and conducting its teaching and activities from private homes.

The establishment of the university was the first act of contention which directly sought to change or react to the lack of legal or institutional provisions for Albanians in the country and which sought to respond to the vision of a mono-ethnic state. The second occurred in Gostivar in 1997, and it involved the use of national symbols and local autonomy, another issue of contention and political disagreement between the ethnic Macedonian and Albanian parties. In 1997, Rufe Osmani was elected mayor of the city after which:

the city council decided that it would fly the flags of the Turkish and Albanian communities alongside the Macedonian flag. Although this was technically legal, Macedonian law anachronistically insisted that the community’s flag bear the Yugoslav red star. Osmani was arrested because the flags on Gostivar city hall did not contain the star. This provoked widespread violent protests and harsh police responses. Osmani was jailed for 13 years, later reduces to seven on appeal. (Bellamy 2002, p. 125)

These two incidents already formed a strong background for the armed conflict in 2001 and the demands that the Albanians would make in the negotiations to end the conflict. As

Brown (2000) notes, with these two incidents “[o]stensibly at stake were rights to higher education and issues of local autonomy; both incidents were fraught with wider significance” (p. 130).

The contentious and violent activities continued. Ethnic Macedonians organized contentious acts as well, as was the case with the 1997 student movement in Skopje which mobilized and organized a strike against the proposal to reintroduce the Albanian language at the Faculty of Pedagogy (Bieber 2020, p. 54). During the protests, students “chanted slogans such as ‘gas chambers for Albanians’” (Iseni 2013, p. 183). This made the governing party push for a harder stance against Albanian demands, as the strikes were organized by the youth of the Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization-Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (VMRO DPMNE), who were then an opposition party with a nationalist ideology. In 1998, several bomb explosions occurred at urban centers for which police arrested “Albanian students with suspected links to the Kosovo Liberation Army” (Brown 2000, p. 128).

The first decade of the independent state thus displayed a volatile political balance. North Macedonia was very much a divided society, as Brown (2000) notes “[s]ome commentators go so far as to suggest that an ‘apartheid’ mentality persists, evoking as evidence the apparent and unthinking racism towards Albanians expressed by Macedonians in everyday settings” (p. 132). Indeed, various scholars and surveys highlight that Albanians were generally considered by the ethnic Macedonians to be more backward and unable to integrate well in the system (Džankić 2015; Brown 2000). The political positions of the ethnic Macedonian parties and the Albanian parties often seemed irreconcilable as they derived from two different stand points, the ethnic Macedonians fearing the lack of loyalty of Albanians to the state and the Albanians believing the state had still not done its share in encouraging their ownership of the state. Still, as a result of contention, “modest attempts at accommodation with the Albanian minority prevented a conflict until 2001” (Bieber and Keil 2009, p. 343). The practice of grand coalitions, which included

Albanian parties, postponed or assuaged harsher conflict. However, as Bieber and Keil (2009) point out, the conflict in North Macedonia happened despite the established practice of grand coalitions for nearly 10 years due to:

the inability or unwillingness of the majority-Macedonian parties to address the demands of the Albanian parties, as well as the emergence of an Albanian guerilla force [which] led to a situation where the participation of Albanian parties in government was no longer enough to address the needs of the Albanians of Macedonia. (pp. 350–351)

The end of the 1990s was marked by various bombings and attacks on judges and officials, marking also the initial apparitions of the National Liberation Army. It is an unfortunate moment of history that the demands that the Albanian parties had been making for the first decade since the country's independence were ultimately reached through a violent conflict lasting 6 months in 2001.

The 2001 Interethnic Conflict and the Peace Agreement

The 2001 interethnic conflict between the Macedonian state and the National Liberation Army (NLA) started in January 22 with an attack on a police station, after which the NLA announced its presence through a fax message sent from Germany to the BBC (Bellamy 2002, p. 132). The initial tone was more secessionist in nature; however, this was changed in the following months with the NLA issuing a "statement insisting that, 'we want to improve the rights of our people who are facing discrimination at the hands of the [Macedonians]', implying that it was joint ownership of rather than freedom from the Macedonian state that was demanded" (Bellamy 2002, p. 132). Indeed, the agenda of the NLA was predominantly a response to the unfulfilled rights that had been sought at the political level. For instance, one of the main disputes that was utilized as a justification by the NLA was the lack of an Albanian language university and the lack of economic equality and employment (Bellamy 2002, pp. 125–126). The issue of ownership of the state is also an imperative component which is in line with the political narrative, as the then leader of the largest Albanian party in North Macedonia, Arben Xhaferi, declared that the 2001 conflict would be explained as "as ethnic competition: to whom does the state belong? Macedonians want to create the state as their own ethnic property. Albanians deny this, and thus we have conflict" (Bellamy 2002, p. 124). It took several months of fighting for this dispute to reach the negotiating table and to halt the hostilities.

Initially, the NLA was denounced not only by the ethnic Macedonian parties but also by ethnic Albanian parties who considered it a "terrorist organization" (Iseni 2013, p. 184). In addition, the organization itself was not very centralized or sharing in one common agenda. The NLA was made of various people of differing backgrounds including people who thought using force would bring a faster and more efficient accommodation of the rights of Albanians, those who believed in a greater Albania, and radical Marxists (Bellamy 2002, p. 131). Therefore, it was not a straightforward process to winning allies with national or international actors. As a result, the fighting continued throughout the months of February, March, and April and mainly spread toward the regions populated by ethnic Albanians, namely, Tetovo and its surrounding villages and Kumanovo and several villages between it and the capital, Skopje. After the bombing, the fighting began initially in the village of Tanusevci, a village on the northern border of Kosovo, in late February of 2001. In March 13, the war moved to Tetovo (Bellamy 2002, pp. 134–135) where confrontations occurred in March 26, as the government forces led "offensive" after having rejected the call for a political dialogue made by the NLA (Bellamy 2002, p. 135). On April 28, 2001, the NLA killed eight Macedonian soldiers near Tetovo which instigated riots in various cities in North Macedonia by ethnic Macedonians (Bellamy 2002, p. 135). The "anti-Albanian riots in Bitola prompted its 10,000 Albanian residents to leave this city in the far south of the republic" (Bellamy 2002, p. 135). During the month of May, the conflict intensified and expanded into more villages close to Kumanovo, and as the “summer approached, international society began to engage more fully in the search for a political settlement amidst fears that Tetovo, Kumanovo and Skopje could all become ‘new Sarajevos’” (Bellamy 2002, p. 136) particularly since state forces had started shelling villages indiscriminately. It was the inclusion of the international community which initialized the pathway toward a peace process.

A government of national unity was established in May 13, and the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) began negotiations with the NLA and political parties, and reached a ceasefire. The OSCE then developed a two-stage plan for the peace process which included, firstly, confidence-building measures (disarming the NLA and addressing the five dispute areas) and, secondly, working toward a final political settlement (Bellamy 2002, p. 136). However, this attempt ended abruptly and unsuccessfully, which led to an escalation of hostilities during the summer. On July 20, 2001, three EU monitors were killed by a landmine, and there was violence in Tetovo. The ceasefire had effectively ended. With the inclusion of the NATO in the negotiations, a new ceasefire was reached on July 26, 2001 (Bellamy 2002, p. 138). This marked the start of the new negotiations in early August, which led to the signing of the Ohrid Framework Agreement (OFA). As leaders were preparing for discussions in Ohrid, the “deadliest fighting in the conflict occurred [. . .] On August 7, 2001 Macedonian police launched a raid on rebel forces in Skopje, killing five. [. . .] The next day, 10 Macedonian soldiers were killed in a rebel ambush between Skopje and Tetovo” (Kim 2002, pp. 7–8). This made the negotiations in Ohrid very intense, and political leaders from both sides faced a lot of pressure from their constituents. The OFA was signed on August 13, 2001, ending the hostilities and setting the path for the construction of a multiethnic state (see ► “Ohrid Framework Agreement, The”). Thus, ended the conflict in which “an estimated 250 persons were killed. Many of this number were killed during the final week of peace talks [and more] than 170,000 persons fled their homes”

(Kim 2002, p. 8). This conflict also marked the most violent ethnic conflict in the history of North Macedonia to date, while the Agreement still has implications and affects contemporary politics.

Post-2001 Society and Conflict Management

Ethnic relations between ethnic Macedonians and Albanians improved post-OFA, and the discussions and disputes moved back to the parliamentary and executive chambers. However, the path toward a more inclusive society continued to be strained, considering that “most of the Macedonian intellectuals and politicians experienced the OFA as a historical fatality” (Iseni 2013, p. 187). On the other hand, Albanians saw it as a victory, yet as Iseni notes, “did not manage to seize efficiently the historical opportunity that was presented in order to advance the process stated by the OFA” (Iseni 2013, p. 187). Indeed, the power-sharing arrangement, which was set up by the OFA, has led to a situation where parties largely cater to their ethnic constituents, which have maintained a public political sphere where discussions keep being divided on ethnic grounds. Progress has been made in increasing representation, employment, and university education in the Albanian language. Still, discrimination persists, and so does the utilization of ethnicity for political agendas, which sometimes continues to cause further crises.

While a conflict like the one in 2001 has not been repeated, there have been various moments of unrest and violence, including beatings between teenagers of different ethnic groups, ethnic slurs and racist language by public personalities, and hate speech. In 2011, there was a violent protest in the old Skopje fortress “Kale” between Albanian protesters and police (Iseni 2013, p. 190). The most violent incident happened in 2015, when North Macedonia seemed on the brink of another conflict. In the early hours of May 9, 2015, in the city of Kumanovo, heavy shooting occurred between Albanian fighters and the Macedonian security forces (Bieber 2020, p. 90). The whole incident lasted for one weekend (May 9 and 10) and left 22 persons dead, among whom 14 fighters and 8 policemen, while 40 police officers were wounded (Cvetanoski 2017). There was also damage on property, but no civilians were harmed. While the fighting was reminiscent of the 2001 conflict, citizens of Kumanovo were quick to point out that this attack did not originate from them and that this was not the beginning of an interethnic conflict. State authorities stated that the “gunmen were ethnic Albanian terrorists, mostly Macedonian, but led by five Albanians from neighboring Kosovo” (Macedonia clashes: ‘My town looks like a war zone,’ 2015). However, there was no support for the group by the local population or by the political parties (United Citizens after shootings in Kumanovo – Macedonia, 2015). As Bieber (2020) explained, “the incident appeared very odd. There had not previously been any Albanian groups seriously challenging the status quo or demanding greater rights. The gunmen were unknown in Kumanovo and were clearly outsiders” (p. 91). In addition, the incident took place in the midst of a deep political crisis (Policy Brief: Unraveling the Political Crisis in Macedonia, 2015) that had affected the state since the release of wiretapped conversations revealing corruption and abuse of power by the government led by VMRO-DPMNE, thus commentators suspected foul play. After the weekend incident, the 20 arrested gunmen were taken to Skopje to be prosecuted, and in 2017, they received sentences ranging from life sentence to between 12 and 40 years’ imprisonment. Fortunately, this incident did not cause a wider conflict, yet it did show how fragile ethnic relations are and how it still is used as a trope in political agendas to often create crisis and instability. However, it also showed that things had changed since 2001, with citizens no longer supporting a violent conflict to defend their rights.

Conclusion

The resolution of the political crisis which unraveled between 2015 and 2017 and the election of the new government in 2017 has shown signs of progress in the interethnic relations.

For the first time in the country’s history, ethnic Albanians voted in larger numbers for a traditionally ethnically Macedonian party, the Social Democratic Union of Macedonia (SDSM). While this does not establish a new pattern or mode of behavior, it does show a difference in the way that ethnic Albanians engage with the state and with politics, which differs from the first decade after independence. However, the perception of second-class citizenship still exists within the ethnic Albanian community, as the decade-old disparities among the different ethnic groups will take time to reach full equality and inclusivity. In large part, the ethnic conflict did not increase the understanding which Brunnbauer (2004) referred to. Instead, the resolution of the conflict instilled a top-down solution. Almost 20 years after the conflict, the increase in understanding has been slow, but there has been improvement, as shown by the fact that the 2015 Kumanovo incident did not become a full-blown conflict. On the other hand, the divisions between the communities persist since there is still not an active thinking instilled about the inclusion of non-majority communities. Namely, the inclusion of non-majority communities has not become understood as a must of a multicultural society, rather as a must of balancing the political parties and their constituents, which still bears similarities to the politics of the 1990s. The political rhetoric is still rife with nationalism, which makes the construction of a civic or a more inclusive society vulnerable to shifts that are dependent on the ruling parties of the day and not inscribed deeper into the modus operandi of the institutions. At the same time, the citizens are no longer easily mobilized along ethnic lines to create and sustain conflict, which is a positive development. For the country to move beyond the staple of ethnic conflict, it will have to fundamentally combine the institutional component whereby inclusion of marginalized communities becomes an active process of policy development while at the same time working on building trust and understanding between citizens. While the situation has ameliorated since North Macedonia’s independence, full equality between citizens, and a holistic understanding as to why this equality is important, has yet to be established as a solid political and social reality.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The

References

- 24 Vesti. (2015, May 10). United citizens after shootings in Kumanovo – Macedonia [Video]. YouTube. Retrieved from <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=sOX9kJRj54I>
- Bellamy, A. (2002). The new wolves at the door: Conflict in Macedonia. Civil Wars, 5(1), 117–144.
- Bieber, F. (2004). Partial implementation, partial success: The case of Macedonia. In I. O’Flynn & R. David (Eds.), Power sharing: New challenges for divided societies (pp. 107–122). London: Pluto Press.
- Bieber, F. (2020). The rise of authoritarianism in the Western Balkans. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bieber, F., & Keil, S. (2009). Power-sharing revisited: Lessons learned in the Balkans? Review of Central and East European Law, 34, 337–360.
- BiEPAG. (2015, June 3). Policy brief: Unraveling the political crisis in Macedonia: Toward resolution or calm before the storm? BiEPAG. Retrieved from <https://biepag.eu/policy-brief-unraveling-the-political-crisis-in-macedonia-toward-resolution-or-calm-before-the-storm/>
- Brown, K. (2000). In the realm of the double-headed eagle: Parapolitics in Macedonia, 1994–9. In J. K. Cowan (Ed.), Macedonia: The politics of identity and difference (pp. 122–139). London: Pluto Press.
- Brown, K. (2003). The past in question: Modern Macedonia and the uncertainties of nation. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Brunnbauer, U. (2003). Serving the nation: Historiography in the Republic of Macedonia (FYROM) after socialism. Historien, 4, 161–182.
- Brunnbauer, U. (2004). Fertility, families and ethnic conflict: Macedonians and Albanians in the Republic of Macedonia, 1944–2002. Nationalities Papers: The Journal of Nationalism and Ethnicity, 32(3), 565–598.
- Constitution of the Republic of North Macedonia. (1991). Retrieved from https://www.sobranie.mk/the-constitution-of-the-republic-of-macedonia-ns_article-constitution-of-the-republic-of-north-macedonia.nsp
- Cvetanoski, I. (2017, November 27). “Kumanovo group”, heavy convictions for the 2015 shootout. Osservatorio balcani e caucaso transeuropa. Retrieved from <https://www.balcanicaucaso.org/eng/All-the-news/Kumanovo-group-heavy-convictions-for-the-2015-shootout-184346>
- Džankić, J. (2015). Citizenship in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Macedonia and Montenegro. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Iseni, B. (2013). One state, divided society: The Albanians in Macedonia. In S. Ramet, O. Listhaug, & A. Simkus (Eds.), Civic and uncivic values in Macedonia: Value transformation, education and media (pp. 175–193). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kim, J. (2002). Macedonia: Country background and recent conflict (pp. 1–21). Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress.
- Shaw, J., & Štiks, I. (2013). Introduction: Citizenship in the new states of South Eastern Europe. In J. Shaw & I. Štiks (Eds.), Citizenship after Yugoslavia (pp. 1–14). London: Routledge.
- Spaskovska, L. (2010). In search of a demos: Transformations of citizenship and belonging in the Republic of Macedonia (CITSEE Working paper 2010/11). Edinburgh: University of Edinburgh.
- Štiks, I. (2006). Nationality and citizenship in the former Yugoslavia: From disintegration to European integration. Southeast European and Black Sea Studies, 6(4), 483–500.
- The Observers. (2015, May 11). Macedonia clashes: ‘My town looks like a war zone’. France 24. Retrieved from <https://observers.france24.com/en/20150511-macedonia-clashes-kumanovo-albanian>

Ethnofederalism

- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention

Ethnographic Peace Research

Gearoid Millar
 Department of Sociology, Institute for Conflict, Transition, and Peace Research (ICTPR), University of Aberdeen, Aberdeen, UK

Definition

Ethnographic peace research (EPR) is best defined not as a specific methodology for data collection, but as an approach to peace research that allows a particular depth of insight and analysis. Specifically, EPR requires that the data collected allows for both: (1) “thick description” of the complex social reality within local settings of peace interventions and (2) explanation not only of what happens, but of “why and how” these interventions impact local individuals and communities as they do. The driving motivation for the development of this approach has been the recognition that the stated end goals of peace interventions (including peace, justice, reconciliation, security, dignity, and empowerment) are experiential and not institutional. They are not universally constant, but locally rooted, historically contingent, and culturally defined concepts. As such, the perceptions, expectations, and experiences of peace interventions among “beneficiary” communities will diverge from what the international actors who plan, fund, and implement such projects expect. Any research seeking to understand the impact of peace interventions among beneficiaries (regarding peace, justice, security, etc.) must therefore commit to understanding how these concepts are defined within the locally, historically, and culturally specific contexts of intervention. EPR can be defined, therefore, as any peace research that seeks to achieve this depth of insight and analysis. However, this also means that even research that deploys methodologies often associated with ethnographic studies (interviews, participant observation, visual ethnography, participant mapping, etc.) cannot be defined as EPR if they do not seek, at a minimum, to achieve that depth.

Towards Locally Grounded Assessment of Peace and Conflict Dynamics

At its core, ethnographic peace research (EPR) is a means to understand the impacts of international peace interventions on local individuals and communities in post-conflict societies. Central to its initial development was the task of refocusing peace research data collection away from reliance on the relatively powerful actors who plan and implement peace interventions, and towards the relatively marginalized individuals and communities who experience those interventions (Millar 2014). Ideas regarding what constitutes peace, justice, reconciliation, and development (not to mention related constructs such as dignity, honor, empowerment, and security) are widely recognized to be culturally defined and, therefore, divergent across sociocultural contexts. There are, as a result, fundamental methodological problems with relying on the accounts of either international actors, national elites, or even local implementing partners to speak for the nonelite communities defined as the final “beneficiaries” of peace interventions. While there is much to be gained from speaking to these actors, it is methodologically unsound to rely on these voices to accurately report on the experiences of nonelite individuals or communities. The turn to ethnographic methods is one solution to this problem.

It is important to note that the EPR approach within peace and conflict studies (PCS) is indebted to a long history of ethnographic work within anthropology. This work has focused on local dynamics of conflict, transition, and peace, on local conflict resolution or mediation processes, and on local experiences of violence and recovery (see, for example, Hamer 1980; Podelefsky 1990; Honwana 2006; Theidon 2013; Bräuchler 2015). But, unfortunately, it is quite rare to see substantial engagement with this work in the leading PCS journals, and dominant policies and practices of peace intervention rarely evidence much exposure to or understanding of this research. While it has become fashionable to make reference to the importance of culture even within the core PCS journals, driven recently by the “local turn” literature (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013), the field of anthropology itself is still marginal to PCS debates and there remain substantial structural and cultural issues limiting the incorporation of anthropological ethnographic methods into the core of PCS research. EPR seeks to resolve this problem by striking a balance.

The balance struck by EPR is based on the need to incorporate key characteristics of anthropological ethnography (thick description and in-depth explanations of why impacts unfold as they do) into PCS research, but in a way that allows these to be used for shorter-term studies that focus on the central problems facing PCS, as opposed to the more long-term engagement and very different topics covered by anthropologists. It is, therefore, important to highlight that EPR is not ethnography as this is understood in anthropology. Whereas ethnography within anthropology usually focuses on broad cultural phenomena such as language, symbolism, ceremony, kinship systems, and systems of meaning making generally, in PCS our focus is more specific and bounded on the dynamics of conflict, violence, peace, and peacebuilding. In addition, unlike anthropology, which has largely evaded policy significance in the last few decades, PCS has an avowedly normative agenda and seeks to impact policy and practice as much as possible. While EPR, therefore, seeks to incorporate key characteristics of anthropological ethnography, it is not seeking to replicate this approach.

In PCS the EPR approach has also been divided into two quite different, but related, “registers,” one “scholarly” and the other “evaluative.” The scholarly register is best placed for the testing and generation of new PCS theory, as is central to scholarly work. EPR in this register is directly built on the two required characteristics of EPR as noted above: (1) “thick description” of the complex social reality within local settings of peace interventions and (2) explanation not only of what happens, but of “why and how” peace interventions impact local individuals and communities as they do. In addition, while these first two characteristics are required, two further characteristics which facilitate EPR studies should also be highlighted. These are: (1) the use of a “diversity of methodologies” capable of triangulating findings and responding to different data collection issues on the ground and (2) researcher “reflexivity,” or the constant self-critique and critical consideration of one’s own positionality and potential biases (see Millar 2018a, pp. 6–11). When implemented together, these four characteristics allow EPR in its scholarly register to generate and test PCS theories regarding the impacts and experiences of peace interventions.

At the same time, however, PCS is also in need of a less scholarly or theory-oriented approach; one which might be useful not only for scholars, but for evaluators working for funders and implementing partners who also seek to understand the impacts of their work in post-conflict settings. To this end, the “evaluative register” provides a simpler four pillar model for EPR (see Millar 2014). These pillars require evaluators to:

1. Switch from seeing peacebuilding as institutional to instead recognize it as experiential
2. Engage in a robust effort at ethnographic preparation, reading existing anthropological studies regarding the pertinent setting prior to evaluating peace interventions in that setting
3. Commit to substantive local engagement with the actual targeted beneficiaries of peace interventions instead of those who claim to represent them
4. Constantly appraise their own implicit assumptions regarding the meanings of concepts central to peace interventions, such as peace, justice, reconciliation, and security

The four pillars of the evaluative register do not map directly on to the four characteristics of the scholarly register, but they are designed to allow a more instrumental use of EPR that is less about theory generation and testing, and more about understanding for the purposes of improving policy and practice (see Millar 2018b).

Summary

The development of the EPR approach has been driven by the desire to incorporate some of the strengths of anthropological ethnography into PCS research. The central goal remains to understand in more depth the dynamics of conflict, violence, peace, and peacebuilding on the ground in post-conflict societies. EPR does this by refocusing peace research data collection away from those actors who plan and implement peace interventions, and towards the individuals and communities who experience those interventions. The two separate registers provide tools appropriate for the different communities within PCS who perform the work of assessment (scholarly and evaluative). While the first is focused on developing and testing theory and the other on policy and practice, both registers provide the depth of insight and analysis that defines the EPR approach.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict Fieldwork
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Culture, Anthropology, and Ethnography in Peace Research
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Reflexivity in the Study of Security and Conflict

References

- Bräuchler, B. (2015). The cultural dimensions of peace: Decentralization and reconciliation in Indonesia. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hamer, J. H. (1980). Preference, principle, and precedent: Dispute settlement and changing norms in Sidamoasociations. Ethnology, 19(1), 89–109.
- Honwana, A. (2006). Child soldiers in Africa. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Millar, G. (2014). An ethnographic approach to peacebuilding: Understanding local experiences in transitional states. London: Routledge.
- Millar, G. (2018a). Ethnographic peace research: Approaches and tensions. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Millar, G. (2018b). Decentring the intervention experts: Ethnographic peace research and policy engagement. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(2), 259–276.
- Podelefsky, A. (1990). Mediator roles in Simbuconflict management. Ethnology, 29(1), 67–81.
- Theidon, K. (2013). Intimate enemies: Violence and reconciliation in Peru. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.

EU Conditionality in the Western Balkans

Jasmin Mujanović
Brea, CA, USA

Keywords

EU enlargement · Conditionality · Western Balkans

Definition

Conditionality refers to the European Union's (EU) broad policy framework for incentivizing political and socioeconomic reforms from neighboring states. It is a process which encourages states to transform and reform various aspects of their regimes in exchange for the prospects of eventual membership in the EU, the largest economic and political union in human history. The conditionality mechanism was primarily developed to provide a formula for incorporating the former Eastern Bloc and Soviet states in the EU, but has, arguably, seen its most sustained (and difficult) application in the states of the Western Balkans.

Introduction

Since the 2003 Thessaloniki Summit, the cornerstone of European Union (EU) policy in the Western Balkans – that is, countries of the former Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY) plus Albania – has been the promise of the extension of EU membership to the region in exchange for a sustained process of economic, social, and political reform. That exchange – membership for reform – has been referred to in the EU's own policy texts and the relevant scholarship as “conditionality.” In short, the EU conditions its promise of enlargement on the delivery of credible transformations within these societies and thus, in theory, incentivizes and accelerates the process of post-conflict and post-authoritarian democratization. In the academic literature, this process is referred to as the “External Incentive Model” (EIM) (Schimmelfennig & Sedelmeier, 2020) which presupposes that states, and the elites who govern them, will rationally seek to maximize their own power and influence, and can therefore be incentivized to undergo difficult sociopolitical transformations by external actors like the EU, in exchange for inclusion within this bloc, the largest and most economically prosperous union in history.

The fundamental issue with this theoretical approach, however, is that what is “rational” is differently constituted for the EU, on the one hand, and the local political elites, on the other. Moreover, this approach neglects the extent to which local elites have been able to create parallel incentive structures among their own citizens which have allowed them simultaneously to extract concessions and benefits from the EU, while only engaging in limited, or otherwise cosmetic, reforms at home. Nor has this approach adequately accounted for the changes within EU politics, in particular the turn toward explicit anti-enlargement sentiment, especially following the 2015 migrant and refugee crisis.

Nearly 20 years on since the Thessaloniki summit, it appears that the central premise of the conditionality framework has fundamentally eroded. The promise of enlargement has proven to be less enticing to most of the region than anticipated; the EU has struggled to demonstrate credible commitments to democratic and political change in a complex, postwar region; and, in time, the EU's own members have begun to abandon the normative ideals which animated this policy framework in the first place (Holesch & Kyriazi, 2021).

The EU in the Western Balkans After 2003

The 2003 declaration promised that the “EU reiterates its unequivocal support to the European perspective of the Western Balkan countries. The future of the Balkans is within the European Union” (EU-Western Balkans Summit Thessaloniki, 2003). To date, that promise has only been realized by two Western Balkan states: Slovenia, which joined the Union as part of the “Big Bang” enlargement in 2004, and Croatia in 2013, the last state to have joined the bloc. Albania, Montenegro, North Macedonia, and Serbia are all formal candidates for membership; Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) has applied for candidacy status; Kosovo has not, and its 2008 independence from Serbia is not recognized by five of the EU's own member states. None of these remaining states – collectively referred to as the Western Balkan Six (WB6) – are likely to clinch accession in this decade. That will mean that 2020s will be the first decade since enlargement as concept began (with the 1973 accession of Denmark, Ireland, and the UK) that the Union will not take in any new members.

This prognosis, of course, is speculative. But it is rooted in a set of discernable facts about the changing political dynamics of both the Western Balkans and the EU. To begin with, conditionality was not a toolkit that could readily be adapted for use in the Western Balkans. As a policy framework, conditionality was developed to address the EU's relationship with the former Eastern Bloc and former Soviet states of Eastern Europe, and their states aspirations for inclusion in both the EU and NATO. But while the SFRY had attained a greater degree of economic development than nearly any of the Soviet or Eastern Bloc states by the late 1970s and early 1980s, the country's postcommunist period was far more catastrophic than the same in any of these latter states. The significance of the consequences of the Yugoslav dissolution – but also the post-Cold War chaos in Albania – cannot be overstated in this respect.

Between 140,000 and 150,000 people were killed in the Yugoslav Wars (1991–2001) (International Center for Transitional Justice, 2009), 100,000 of which were casualties in the Bosnian War (1992–1995) alone (Tokača, 2012). This decade of war – which saw the worst atrocities in Europe since WWII, the brunt of which took place in the context of the Bosnian genocide (see entry Bosnian Genocide) – devastated the region economically, socially, and politically. Even Albania, which escaped the Yugoslav Wars as such, notwithstanding its comparatively minor involvement in the Kosovo War, experienced a low-level civil war after the country's economic collapse in 1997. Quite simply, no other postcommunist state in Europe which eventually transitioned in EU membership had as cataclysmic an experience in the early 1990s as any of these polities.

Nor are Slovenia and Croatia's comparative success in this regard outliers per se. These two states were the most prosperous republics within the Yugoslav federation, and Slovenia's experience with the Yugoslav Wars extended no further than the so-called Ten-Day War – a comparatively minor skirmish between the republic’s incipient armed forces and the Serbian-controlled Yugoslav Peoples’ Army in 1991. Croatia’s war of independence was far longer and bloodier, lasting between 1991 and 1995 and costing the lives of some 15,000–20,000 people (Fink, 2010, p. 469). But unlike nearby BiH, Kosovo, Serbia, Montenegro, or North Macedonia, Croatia came out of the war without any significant outstanding internal or external political issues. The Zagreb government exercised full control over the whole of its territory, and it had only comparatively minor border issues to resolve with Slovenia and Serbia. As such, after 1995, Croatia was, in comparison to its neighbors, able to quickly recapture its position as one of the two largest economies in the region.

This is not to suggest that Croatia did not undergo a significant political transformation in its postwar years. The spectacular arrest and conviction of former Prime Minister Ivo Sanader in 2010, for instance, speaks to a period of sustained anti-corruption efforts in the country in the lead up to its formal accession into the EU (Vladisavljevic, 2020). And the material and human costs of the war, as noted, were significant. But already by the late 2000s, Croatia had obtained a level of political and economic recovery comparable, and even superior, to that of Bulgaria and Romania, which joined the EU in 2007.

The Absence of Reform in the Western Balkan Six

That was not case then, nor has it been the case since in the rest of the region. BiH remained riven by sectarian tensions, and above all by continued threats to its sovereignty and territorial integrity by Serb nationalist elements within BiH but also on the part of Serbia’s revanchist regime, under the leadership of Aleksandar Vučić (Mujanovic, 2020). Serbia, as noted, has reverted to a proto-autocratic rule not seen in the country since the Milošević era. Indeed, its experiment with genuine democratization was brief; it lasted just over a decade, and even then, it saw the assassination of arguably the most overtly reformist postwar figure, Prime Minister Zoran Đinđić, in 2003. Kosovo, of course, still lacks international recognition on account of the Russo-Chinese veto on the UN Security Council on behalf of Serbia. North Macedonia only recently resolved a quarter century dispute with Greece over the country’s constitutional name which hampered Skopje’s Euro-Atlantic aspirations for the duration and contributed also to a catastrophic collapse in democratic standards under former Prime Minister Nikola Gruevski. Montenegro only gained its independence from Serbia in 2006 and has been exposed near continued Serbian meddling in its internal politics – especially since Vučić’s rise to power beginning in 2012 – which culminated in a coup attempt in October 2016. Finally, Albania, which again did not experience direct consequences from the Yugoslav Wars, was a far less-developed polity than Yugoslavia to begin with, especially as compared to the SFRJ’s two most prosperous northern republics. The chaos of the 1990s further hampered the country’s European ambitions, on top of the lasting legacies of the obscenely repressive Hoxha regime.

Yet despite these differences, there are also relevant points of comparison between Slovenia and Croatia and the rest of the region, ones which are especially relevant to examine in the post-accession context. Namely, the past decade has seen significant democratic backsliding in both countries, in keeping with similar regional trends. Slovenia and Croatia remain freer and more democratic than their non-EU neighbors, but they are laggards by the Union’s standards. And much as is the case throughout the region, the war-time political elite in both countries remains dominant nearly three decades after the fact. Slovenia’s Prime Minister, Janez Janša, has been a mainstay of Slovenian politics since 1991 and has since the second decade of the twenty-first century emerged as one of the leading illiberal figures in European politics (Hopkins, 2021). In Croatia, the long-dominant Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ) has only ever lost two parliamentary elections since 1990. Both countries have seen a significant decline in press freedoms in recent years, and a turn to reactionary, anti-migrant politics, as well as an accompanying downturn in relations with neighboring states. And according to virtually every available metric on the subject, the rank consistently ranks as two of the most corrupt member states in the bloc, alongside Romania and Bulgaria (Stojanovic, 2021).

The point here is that while Slovenia and Croatia are frontrunners in terms of their overall sociopolitical development in comparison to the rest of the region, they are not complete outliers. Indeed, they are more alike the rest of the Western Balkan polities than not. And certainly, any kind of meaningful comparison between overall democratic standards between the two and, say, Germany or the Netherlands would be labored. Moreover, inasmuch as these two states have any sort of meaningful foreign policy it is exclusively directed toward intra-regional issues. Croatia's foreign policy is almost wholly concerned with the status of ethnic Croats in neighboring BiH, and Zagreb's continuous attempt to prevent significant reforms of the country's sectarian constitutional regime (which Croatia fears would disadvantage the Croat community there). Slovenia has no major interests in the region on the face of it, yet the Janša government has emerged as one of the chief advocates for new rounds of territorial reorganization of the Western Balkans – including schemes for the wholesale partition of BiH, Kosovo, and North Macedonia (Brezar, 2021). Relatedly, individuals in the orbit of the prime minister are widely suspected of being significant actors within regional money laundering and organized crime rings, and the prime minister previously served an (eventually overturned) jail sentence on similar charges (Kovacevic, 2018).

The End of the EU's Enlargement Agenda in the Western Balkans

But conditionality has not only – or even primarily – failed as a policy framework because of the recalcitrant tendencies in the region. It is the growing rejection of the concept of European enlargement within the EU itself that is, arguably, still a more significant factor. If the political will within the EU existed to provide a comprehensive, enforceable agenda for the region – one rooted in credible commitments to the rule of law, democratization, and the defense of human rights – then progress could be made. That, for instance, was certainly the experience of the US-led reconstruction process in BiH, the region's most complex polity, between 1996 and 2006. Despite the horrors of the Bosnian War, BiH made major strides toward EU and NATO membership in that decade – including the creation of a state police and unified armed forces, an almost unthinkable in the immediate aftermath of the conflict – largely because Washington provided clear incentives but also clear consequences for local political elites to undertake reform initiatives.

This is something the EU has never done, especially not since the American presence in the region largely receded after 2006–2008. Brussels has provided a host of direct and indirect incentives to local elites, but it has never truly developed a mechanism for responding to or punishing those who abuse its resources or hamper its initiatives, overtly or otherwise. The result of that policy is most evident with the ongoing democratic backsliding in member states like Hungary and Poland, but it has shaped the accession and conditionality process as well. Postwar leaders in much of the Western Balkans have essentially deduced that there are more benefits to dragging out the accession process than to concluding it. Some even maintain a degree of permanent instability to extract additional concession from the bloc (Mujanović, 2018, p. 48). Such an approach allows these bad faith actors to receive significant “development funds” from the EU, without having to make the kinds of painful political concessions that might jeopardize their own political and material fortunes (having learned a lesson from the illustrative downfall of Ivo Sanader).

Moreover, political sentiments within the EU itself have evolved significantly since the Thessaloniki era. While the global financial crisis of 2008–2009 contributed to dampening the appetites for further enlargement, it was the 2015 migrant and refugee crisis that fundamentally transformed the nature of the relationship between the EU and the region. Because the migrant crisis sharply bolstered the political fortunes of the far-right within the EU, it pushed parties on both the center-right and center-left to adopt a more reserved attitude toward further expansion. That was evident in the case of France where the election Emmanuel Macron, a nominal liberal, saw Paris upend virtually the entire enlargement process on two separate occasions to stonewall the start of accession negotiations with North Macedonia and Albania in 2019 (Stamouli, 2019). While both countries eventually started negotiations, it was not until France forced the EU to adopt an entirely new accession protocol. Although Paris' demands for a more merit-based approach, with more frequent opportunities to substantively evaluate the reform process in candidate states, was not without justification, the Macron government's conduct gestured at a more categorical change. Specifically, that rather merely making it more difficult to join the EU, Paris was effectively imploding the Union's entire commitment to the region. There was no longer an open-door policy; the door was closed, barring exceptional circumstances. And the fact that North Macedonia had, quite literally, changed its constitutional name to appease Greece and the EU in exchange for the start of negotiations was not, in the eyes of Paris at least, exceptional.

The French about-face was a massive blow to already beleaguered pro-liberal and pro-EU actors throughout the region. Following the onset of the French blockade—and despite its eventual lifting—it was difficult to interpret the episode as anything other than the practical conclusion of the end of the EU enlargement process. In 2014, the Juncker Commission had already announced that the Union would not take in any new members during its mandate. As no serious observer had expected otherwise, Commissioner Jean-Claude Juncker's explicit statement to that effect was widely interpreted as a signal that the EU was moving to slow the enlargement process (Erebara, 2014). When this was followed by the French blockade, it made the explicit shift in sentiment undeniable: enlargement was over.

For local pro-EU actors, the challenge has since become how to continue to use the EU horizon as a catalyst for spurring domestic reforms; not so much with the (evidently nonexistent) hope of enlargement in any meaningful timeframe but as an end unto itself. That, however, has proven to be exceedingly difficult. First because the darkening of the European project in the region has been accompanied by the surging influence of illiberal and authoritarian actors like Russia, China, and Turkey, but also those from within the EU's own midst like Hungary. This has, of course, only strengthened the position of already entrenched oligarchic regimes across the region. And it has accelerated the EU's drift toward marginalia in the region. While Russia, China, Turkey et al are steering the core political and strategic decision making of local elites, and thus shaping the geopolitical significance of the region on the continent, the EU is devoting funds to improving municipal governance.

Worse, the growing political clout of far-right and nativist actors within the EU has contributed to the perception in several regional states that the cause of Brussels' and the member states turn against enlargement is not actually rooted in the lack of political and democratic progress in the Western Balkans. Instead, the primary motivating factor is sectarian: that of the remaining six nonmember states in the region, three are Muslim-majority states (BiH, Albania, and Kosovo), while two have significant Muslim minorities (North Macedonia and Montenegro). Moreover, Serbia, which has typically been highlighted as the most overtly autocratic regime in the region by relevant observers, continues to be characterized by EU officials as the "frontrunner" for membership (Gojgić, 2020). But its Muslim minority is, percentage-wise, the smallest among the WB6.

Whether such perceptions are accurate is, ultimately, irrelevant; and they are, in any case, strenuously denied by Brussels. They are politically salient perceptions in much of the region, and ones that powers like Turkey, for instance, have sought to exploit, to position themselves as the actual benefactors of the region's Muslim-majority states (Maziad & Sotiriadis, 2020; Bechev, 2019). This then also exposes an absurd contradiction in the EU's turn against sustained, enlargement-oriented engagement in the region. The EU has turned against enlargement, supposedly, because it believes that the remaining WB6 states, broadly speaking, are not a good fit for the bloc given the current political conditions which have prevailed in those states (Fouéré, 2021). In so doing, Brussels has opened the door to adversaries and competitors to make in-roads in the region, and to undermine the EU's core strategic interest in the Western Balkans: that the region be stable, peaceful, and democratic. Russia, in particular, is categorically committed to keeping the region as an open sore for the bloc, forcing the EU to commit political and financial resources there indefinitely, a ploy that is only made more effective if that spending is accompanied by no coherent European strategy, as is presently the case.

In that sense, for the EU the problem is geographic rather than political. Any decision to sequester or quarantine the region is destined to failure because the Western Balkans is inescapably located on the European mainland. There is no sea protecting the core of the EU from its southeastern flank which means that, as in the 1990s, nonengagement is simply not an option. Even if the EU governments may not want to include the WB6 in the bloc, they cannot, whatever their desires, wall the region off. Any instability in the Western Balkans is inherently a political and security problem for the whole continent, a fact that has been repeatedly shown to be the case since at least the fifteenth-century absorption of the area by the Ottoman Empire. That is not to suggest necessarily that the Western Balkans must, in turn, be absorbed in their entirety by the EU. But it is to argue that a meaningful, sustained policy agenda for the region is required. And if the EU does not want to offer membership to the region, then it has to offer some kind of framework that will advance its own interests in the region; that this group of polities be at peace, stable, and democratic. To date, such a "Plan B" has not yet manifested.

A failure to provide this framework will, in the final analysis, not only undermine its credibility in the Western Balkans. This will have consequences for the EU as a foreign policy actor, as such. If the EU can offer nothing of substance to the Western Balkans, then what are its prospects for dealing with the ongoing war in Ukraine? Or the ring of violence which characterizes the contemporary situation in the greater Mediterranean? Or, for that matter, the growing significance of states like Russia and China within the politics of the Union itself? A conditionality or transformation mechanism that can be successfully deployed and enforced by the EU is therefore a matter of preeminent political concern for the bloc itself. If the EU is to survive as a coherent union of democracies with shared political interests it will, like all polities, require a means for engaging neighboring states. While the EU is not a traditional Westphalian state, it is a quasi-sovereign all the same, whose long-term survival is dependent on successfully advancing and protecting its interests in the international arena. That, ultimately, was and remains the purpose of conditionality.

Summary

The EU's conditionality regime in the Western Balkans has only been a partial success in the region. The mechanism delivered progress and reforms in the two most highly developed regional polities, Slovenia and Croatia, but it has fared considerably worse in the remaining WB6. The reasons for that are myriad but boil down to a combination of post-conflict instability, local political intransigence, an insufficiently robust EU foreign policy apparatus, and a shift to anti-enlargement sentiments within the bloc. While the EU will doubtlessly continue to engage with the region, it has yet to develop a comprehensive post-enlargement agenda for the Western Balkans, a fact which is only leading to further political turmoil.

Cross-References

- ▶ Bosnian Genocide.
- ▶ Democratization in Postconflict Western Balkans
- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- ▶ European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The
- ▶ Ohrid Framework Agreement, The
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia
- ▶ United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)

References

- Bechev, D. (2019, April 12). Turkey's policy in the Balkans: More than Neo-Ottomanism. Retrieved from Istituto per gli Studi di Politica Internazionale: <https://www.ispionline.it/it/pubblicazione/turkeys-policy-balkans-more-neo-ottomanism-22835>
- Brezar, A. (2021, April 20). Balkans rocked as leaked memo explores redrawing Bosnia's borders along ethnic lines. Retrieved from EuroNews: <https://www.euronews.com/2021/04/19/balkans-rocked-as-leaked-memo-explores-redrawing-bosnia-s-borders-along-ethnic-lines>
- Erebara, G. (2014, September 11). Fatigued EU downgrades enlargement portfolio. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2014/09/11/eu-downgrades-its-enlargement-portfolio-1/>
- EU-Western Balkans summit Thessaloniki. (2003, June). Retrieved from European Commission: https://ec.europa.eu/commission/presscorner/detail/en/PRES_03_163
- Fink, G. (2010). Stress of war, conflict and disaster. Amsterdam: Elsevier.
- Fouéré, E. (2021, January 12). The EU's enlargement agenda is no longer fit for purpose. Retrieved from CEPS: <https://www.ceps.eu/the-eus-enlargement-agenda-is-no-longer-fit-for-purpose/>
- Gojgić, L. (2020, July 1). Serbia is a frontrunner in the EU accession process. Retrieved from Cord Magazine: <https://cordmagazine.com/interview/alexander-schallenberg-serbia-is-a-frontrunner-in-the-eu-accession-process/>
- Holesch, A., & Kyriazi, A. (2021). Democratic backsliding in the European union: The role of the Hungarian-Polish coalition. East European Politics.
- Hopkins, V. (2021, May 21). Slovenia's Jansa follows Hungary down authoritarian path. Retrieved from Financial Times: <https://www.ft.com/content/100454c3-c628-40a0-af6e-392cc79a53f9>
- International Center for Transitional Justice. (2009). Transitional justice in the former Yugoslavia. Retrieved from International Center for Transitional Justice: <https://www.ictj.org/sites/default/files/ICTJ-FormerYugoslavia-Justice-Facts-2009-English.pdf>
- Kovacevic, D. (2018, January 17). Bosnia, Slovenia, Probe Hefiy loan to Jansa Party. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2018/01/17/bosnia-launched-an-investigation-into-a-loan-from-bosnian-businesswoman-to-slovenian-politician-01-16-2018/>
- Maziad, M., & Sotiriadis, J. (2020, April 21). Turkey's dangerous new exports: Pan-Islamist, Neo-Ottoman visions and regional instability. Retrieved from Middle East Institute: <https://www.mei.edu/publications/turkeys-dangerous-new-exports-pan-islamist-neo-ottoman-visions-and-regional>
- Mujanović, J. (2018). Hunger and fury: The crisis of democracy in the Balkans. London: Hurst Publishers.
- Mujanovic, J. (2020, August 31). Vucic's Serbia is waging political war against its neighbours. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2020/08/31/vucics-serbia-is-waging-political-war-against-its-neighbours/>
- Schimmelfennig, F., & Sedelmeier, U. (2020). The Europeanization of Eastern Europe: The external incentives model revisited. Journal of European Public Policy, 27(6), 814–833, <https://doi.org/10.1080/13501763.2019.1617333>
- Stamouli, N. (2019, November 12). North Macedonia's post-macron melancholy. Retrieved from Politico: <https://www.politico.eu/article/north-macedonia-eu-accession-post-emmanuel-macron-melancholy/>
- Stojanovic, M. (2021, January 28). Corruption perceptions worsening in Balkans, Central Europe, transparency says. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2021/01/28/corruption-perceptions-worsening-in-balkans-central-europe-transparency-says/>
- Tokača, M. (2012). The Bosnian book of the dead: Human losses in Bosnia and Herzegovina 1991–1995. Sarajevo: Istraživačko dokumentacioni centar Sarajevo.
- Vladislavljevic, A. (2020, November 13). Croatian ex-premier Sanader convicted in slush fund case retrial. Retrieved from Balkan Insight: <https://balkaninsight.com/2020/11/13/croatian-ex-premier-sanader-convicted-in-slush-fund-case-retrial/>

European Union

- ▶ European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The

European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The

Teresa Almeida Cravo

Faculty of Economics and Centre for Social Studies, University of Coimbra, Coimbra, Portugal

Synonyms

Civilian and military missions and operations; Common Security and Defence Policy; European Union; Global interventionism

Description

The European Union (EU) has carried out 36 peace missions and operations in Europe, Africa, and Asia since the early 2000s, which have featured prominently in its Common Security and Defence Policy (CSDP). This chapter presents an overview of these missions and operations and offers a critique of the EU's efforts. It first explains the institutional and decision-making apparatuses which frame CSDP missions and operations; it then briefly analyzes the forces that have shaped their emergence and evolution. The chapter moves on to provide a concise mapping of the EU's practice and, finally, it outlines a few of the most significant strengths and critiques

The author would like to thank the section editor, Kai Michael Kenkel, as well as Tor Krever, for comments on an earlier draft. The author also wishes to acknowledge the financial support of the Portuguese Foundation for Science and Technology through her Sabbatical Leave Grant (SFRH/BSAB/142996/2018) and the Strategic Project (UID/SOC/50012/2013). This chapter is an output of the Jean Monnet Centre of Excellence 'Peace Relations, Ontologies and Narratives in Europe: EU and its Eastern Neighbours' (PRONE), 611269-EPP-1-2019-1-PT-EPPJMO-CoE, based at the University of Coimbra. The European Commission's support for the production of this publication does not constitute an endorsement of the contents, which reflect the views only of the author, and the Commission cannot be held responsible for any use which may be made of the information contained therein.

of the Union's approach, as well as current challenges to its efforts.

Definition

The EU's peace missions and operations, deployed since 2003, aim to "help resolve or prevent conflict and crises, enhance the capacities of partners and, ultimately, protect the European Union and its citizens" (EEAS 2020). Although not officially carrying the label of "peace", these missions and operations are deployed under the framework of the CSDP, which "enables the Union to take a leading role in peace-keeping operations, conflict prevention and in the strengthening of the international security" (EEAS 2018).

With a broad mandate, their tasks range from crisis management, mediation, and peacebuilding to security sector reform assistance, capacity building, military training, and humanitarian aid. Interventions which are civilian in nature or require nonexecutive military support are labeled missions, and interventions which are military in nature, and have an executive mandate at the level of command, are labeled operations. While the decision-making and institutional apparatuses employed by the Union to manage missions and operations have evolved over time, the process essentially involves deployment following a request from the state subject to intervention and/or following authorization by a UN Security Council Resolution.

Within the EU, it is up to the Political and Security Committee, responsible for determining the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy (CFSP) and CSDP, and composed of representatives of all member states, to first discuss and endorse a mission or operation as an appropriate EU strategic action. Under its guidance, the decision to launch one takes place in the context of the Foreign Affairs Council and depends on the unanimous approval of member states, expressed through a European Council decision. The Council, alongside the High Representative of the Union for Foreign Affairs and Security Policy/Vice President of the European Commission (HR/VP), holds the authority over the specific mission or operation's overall political control and strategic direction throughout its lifespan.

At an operational level, the Civilian Planning and Conduct Capability oversees civilian CSDP missions' conduct, with its Director acting as the Civilian Operations Commander. The EU Military Staff coordinates military operations or missions requiring military support. Within it, the Military Planning and Conduct Capability manages nonexecutive military missions and will have the added responsibility of planning and commanding an executive military operation of up to an EU Battlegroup-size (1500 personnel).

Assets and personnel contributed to any mission or operation are provided primarily by member states. Financial resources for civilian missions are made available through the CFSP's budget; since 2021, military operations are financed by member states through the European Peace Facility. Third states have also contributed to CSDP missions and operations through Framework Participation Agreements.

CSDP peace missions and operations are, however, not merely part of a policy toolbox: they are supposed to reflect the EU's self-identity as a foreign policy actor aiming to "preserve peace, prevent conflicts and strengthen international security" (Art.21(2c)), TEU). They invoke a particular representation of the Union and the "way in which [it] engages with the rest of the world" (Davis 2018, p. 157), reinforced by the creation of the European External Action Service (EEAS) in 2010, and its 2016 Global Strategy for the EU's Foreign and Security Policy (EEAS 2016). From a strategic point of view, these missions and operations have become "an invaluable pillar of European security and defence" and a "tangible example of the EU's action for global security," as the current HR/VP, Josep Borrell, puts it (EEAS 2020).

The Emergence of CSDP Peace Missions and Operations

Conceived as a "giant peacebuilding project" (Duke and Courtier 2009, p. 14) since the end of the Second World War, the EU has always been concerned with peace and security. Yet, already from its origins, agreement among member states over issues of security and defense proved difficult. A certain ambivalence towards further integration in the face of the US and NATO's role in European security and defense, alongside member states' fierce protection of their national spheres, saw reluctance to deepen coordination continue until the end of the Cold War, despite brief spells of political cooperation (Bretherton and Vogler 2006, pp. 159–163).

The breakdown of the Soviet Union would spur member states to hasten their agreement on a common framework to address international threats to peace and security, especially those latent or erupting to their east in the former Soviet bloc, while embracing an opportunity to spread its values and install its socio-economic and political model. As Merlingen and Ostrauskaite write, "uncertainties and instability associated with the monumental political changes in the region" instilled in member states "a new sense of collective responsibility for pan-European affairs" (2006, p. 34).

The EU's most decisive step came in response to the Balkan Wars in the 1990s and its failure to respond in a timely and effective manner. As Yugoslavia violently disintegrated in 1991, Brussels looked to take a leading role in rebuilding peace. Yet, failing to speak as one voice, its diplomatic efforts were of limited effect and were overshadowed by NATO and the USA (Gnesotto 1996, pp. 116–118). Nonetheless, the Yugoslav experience – and the evident failure to maintain peace in its own neighborhood – served as a catalyst for member states to pursue further security integration, translated into the institutionalization of the CFSP in the Treaty of the EU (signed in 1992; into force in 1993) (Nuttall 2000).

Likewise, the EU's apparent inability to prevent armed conflict in Kosovo in February 1998 provided a further impetus for a more active and autonomous EU role in promoting peace. Renewed violence in the Balkans was thus followed by a new European Security and Defence Policy (ESDP) – later renamed CSDP in the Lisbon Treaty (signed in 2007; into force in 2009) – designed to provide the EU with the means necessary to respond quickly to international crises (Howorth 2007). These developments, although welcomed by many within the Union, generated concerns in some quarters that the EU's role as a security actor was too focused on its military capabilities, which needed to be balanced by a strong civilian component (Jakobsen 2009). Indeed, as Serrano puts it, “[w]e recognised early on that a civilian ESDP dimension was a precondition for a number of member states to accept military ESDP” (2020, p. 20).

With its identity as an engaged foreign policy actor gaining momentum, and with these concerns at heart, the EU launched its first independent civilian mission in January 2003, the EU Police Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina. Its first military operation, EUFOR Concordia in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, followed only 2 months later. The EU has since carried out over 30 peace missions and operations around the world, mapped briefly in the next section.

The EU's Past and Current CSDP Missions and Operations

Since 2003, the EU has deployed 36 CSDP missions and operations in Europe, Africa, and Asia: 19 completed and 17 ongoing, as of May 2021 (for a list of ongoing and completed missions, and their respective websites, see https://eeas.europa.eu/topics/military-and-civilian-missions-and-operations/430/military-and-civilian-missions-and-operations_en). An 18th mission, the EUBAM Moldova and Ukraine – European Border Assistance Mission to Moldova and Ukraine, created on 1 December 2005 and still ongoing, is not managed within CSDP structures, but given its similar goals to other missions, it is often included in maps and overviews of the EU's peace missions and operations. In total, the EU has deployed 16 missions and operations to what it considers its immediate neighborhood (Eastern Europe, the Balkans, the Mediterranean, the Middle East and North Africa, and the Caucasus), 18 to Sub-Saharan Africa, and 2 to Asia.

The EU's first civilian mission was deployed in 2003 in Bosnia and Herzegovina, following on from the UN's International Police Task Force, to train and equip a multiethnic police force to enforce the law and fight against organized crime and corruption. Soon after, the Union deployed its first military operation in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia, taking over from NATO but maintaining close cooperation with it and making use of its assets and capabilities, in order to provide security throughout the implementation of the Ohrid peace agreement. Currently, there are 11 civilian missions deployed in Ukraine, Georgia, Kosovo, Libya, the Palestinian Territories (Ramallah and Rafah), Niger, Mali, Somalia, Iraq, and the Central African Republic and 6 military missions and operations deployed in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Somalia, Mali, Central African Republic, and the Mediterranean. The most recent civilian mission is the EU Advisory Mission for the Central African Republic, deployed in July 2020 to Bangui, to advise the government's Security Sector Reform. In March 2020, the most recent military action, Operation Iriana (EUNAVFOR MED), was deployed to the Mediterranean to enforce the UN arms embargo on Libya, as well as to disrupt human smuggling and trafficking networks into Europe. Below are the tables of completed, as well as currently active, CSDP missions and operations.

Completed CSDP Missions and Operations

| | Dates | Mission/operation | Full name |
|---|--------------------------------|-------------------|--|
| 1 | 1 January 2003–30 June 2012 | EUPM/BiH | European Union Police Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina |
| 2 | 31 March 2003–15 December 2003 | EUFOR Concordia | European Union Military Operation in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia |
| 3 | 12 June 2003–1 September 2003 | EUFOR Artemis | European Union Military Operation in the Democratic |

(continued)

| | Dates | Mission/ operation | Full name | | Dates | Mission/ operation | Full name |
|----|--|-----------------------------|---|----|--|----------------------------|--|
| | | | Republic of Congo | | | | Congo (MONUC) during the election process |
| 4 | 15 December 2003–14 December 2005 | EUPOL FYROM | European Union Police Mission in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (EUPOL Proxima) | 12 | 15 June 2007–31 December 2016 | EUPOL Afghanistan | European Union Police Mission in Afghanistan |
| 5 | 16 July 2004–14 July 2005 | EJUST Themis/ Georgia | European Union Rule of Law Mission in Georgia | 13 | 1 July 2007–30 September 2014 | EUPOL RD Congo | European Union Police Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo |
| 6 | 12 April 2005–31 December 2006 | EUPOL Kinshasa | European Union Police Mission in Kinshasa | 14 | 28 January 2008–15 March 2009 | EUFOR Tchad/RCA | European Union Military Operation in Chad and the Central African Republic |
| 7 | June 2005–June 2006 | EUSEC RD Congo | European Union Security Sector Reform Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo | 15 | 12 February 2008–30 September 2010 | EUSSR Guinea- Bissau | European Union Mission in Support of Security Sector Reform in Guinea-Bissau |
| 8 | 1 July 2005–31 December 2013 | EJUST LEX Iraq | European Union Integrated Rule of Law Mission in Iraq | 16 | 18 June 2012–17 January 2014 | EUAVSEC South Sudan | European Union Aviation Security Mission in South Sudan |
| 9 | 15 September 2005–15 December 2006 | AMM | European Union Monitoring Mission in Aceh | 17 | 10 February 2014–15 March 2015 | EUFOR RCA | European Union Military Operation in the Central African Republic |
| 10 | 15 December 2005–14 June 2006 | EUPAT | European Union Police Advisory Team in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia | 18 | 23 March 2015–16 July 2016 | EUMAM RCA | European Union Military Advisory Mission in the Central African Republic |
| 11 | 12 June 2006–30 November 2006) | EUFOR RD Congo | European Union Military Operation in Support of the United Nations Organisation Mission in the Democratic Republic of the | 19 | 22 June 2015–31 March 2020 | EUNAVFOR Med | European Union Naval Force Mediterranean (Operation Sophia) |

(continued)

Current CSDP Missions and Operations

| | Dates | Mission/ operation | Full name |
|---|-----------------------|-----------------------|--|
| 1 | 2 December 2004 – | EUFOR BiH | European Union Military Operation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Operation Althea) |
| 2 | 25 November 2005 – | EUBAM Rafah | European Border Assistance Mission to Rafah |
| 3 | 1 January 2006 – | EUPOL COPPS | European Union Police Mission for the Palestinian Territories |
| 4 | 1 October 2008 – | EUMM Georgia | European Union Monitoring Mission in Georgia |
| 5 | 9 December 2008 – | EUNAVFOR Somalia | European Union Naval Force in Somalia (Operation Atalanta) |
| 6 | 9 December 2008 – | EULEX Kosovo | European Union Rule of Law Mission in Kosovo |
| 7 | 10 April 2010 – | EUTM Somalia | European Union Training Mission in Somalia |
| 8 | 8 August 2012 – | EUCAP Sahel Niger | European Union Capacity Building Mission in Niger |
| 9 | 16 July 2012 – | EUCAP Somalia | European Union Capacity Building Mission in Somalia (Operation Nestor) |

(continued)

| | Dates | Mission/ operation | Full name |
|----|-----------------------|-----------------------|---|
| 10 | 18 February 2013 – | EUTM Mali | European Union Training Mission in Mali |
| 11 | 22 May 2013 – | EUBAM Libya | European Border Assistance Mission in Libya |
| 12 | 15 January 2015 – | EUCAP Sahel Mali | European Union Capacity Building Mission in Mali |
| 13 | 1 December 2014 – | EUAM Ukraine | European Union Advisory Mission in Ukraine |
| 14 | 16 July 2016 – | EUTM RCA | European Union Training Mission in the Central African Republic |
| 15 | 16 October 2017 – | EUAM Iraq | European Union Advisory Mission in Iraq |
| 16 | 31 March 2020 – | EUNAVFOR Med | European Union Naval Force Mediterranean (Operation Irina) |
| 17 | 30 July 2020 – | EUAM RCA | European Union Advisory Mission in the Central African Republic |

Key Features

Geographically, while the choice to intervene in territories close to the EU – and where insecurity at the borders can have a greater spill-over effect – fits the Union's stated priority of linking international peace and security with the protection of its own citizens, the geographical scope of CSDP missions and operations may nonetheless appear limited. A vast number of countries around the world have seen crises, instability, and violence since the inception of CSDP missions and operations; yet the precise number of states subject to action may be considered small when compared to the EU's global scope rhetoric. Interventions in its immediate neighborhood comprise 16 missions and operations in eight territories, plus the Mediterranean sea: six interventions in the Balkans – Bosnia and Herzegovina (one completed, one ongoing), Kosovo (one ongoing), Macedonia (three completed); five in the Middle East and North Africa – two in Iraq (one completed, one ongoing), two (ongoing) in Palestine, and one (ongoing) in Libya; two in the Caucasus, both in Georgia (one completed, one ongoing); one in Eastern Europe, in Ukraine (ongoing); and two naval operations in the Mediterranean (one completed, one ongoing). Further afield, in sub-Saharan Africa, the number of operations is even higher, but the pattern is similar. While some 18 missions and operations have been deployed here, they have been concentrated in eight countries: the Central African Republic (three completed, which includes one joint operation with Tchad, two ongoing); the Democratic Republic of Congo (five completed); Guinea-Bissau (one completed); Mali (two ongoing); Niger (one ongoing); Somalia (three ongoing); and South Sudan (one completed). Only two countries in Asia have drawn the EU's attention: one mission completed in Aceh (Indonesia) and one completed in Afghanistan. No CSDP missions or operations have been deployed to the Americas. The EU's work thus appears to be focused on particular countries – perceived to merit repeated extensions and/or new missions and operations in complementary areas – and not on branching out into new countries or increasing the geographical range of its CSDP deployments.

The majority of the 36 missions and operations deployed (22) have been civilian in nature and have focused on capacity-building, monitoring peace processes and particular sectors, and even, in the case of executive missions, undertaking tasks on behalf of the recipient state. Civilian missions have entailed strengthening police, border guards and customs officials, drafting national justice strategies, assisting in legislative changes, advising on the reform of rule of law institutions, monitoring trials, and training in gender issues. The remaining 14 military missions and operations have generally shied away from open use of force and coercion (Tardy 2015, p. 23). They have focused on providing military assistance to armed forces, deterring armed violence, securing the provision of humanitarian aid, advising security sector reforms, training local security forces, implementing arms embargos, and preventing trafficking into Europe. The EU has sent Falcon airplanes to the Mediterranean, naval vessels to the Horn of Africa, soldiers to the Congo, police to the Palestinian territories, judges to Georgia, monitors to Aceh, and human rights advisers to Iraq. Its specialization in military and civilian resources, and flexibility in deploying both, have proven useful. Indeed, as Fiott explains, “fusing civil and military tools” is a “hallmark of the Union's strategy against instability” (2020, p. 8).

In terms of scale, it is worth pointing out that neither civilian missions nor those with a military component can, in fact, be considered large, when compared to those of other organizations (Keohane 2011, p. 202) such as NATO, which commanded, at one moment, more than 130,000 NATO and non-NATO soldiers in its Afghanistan operation (ISAF) from 2003–2014, or the UN, with over 15,000 staff in Mali (MINUSMA) today. At its height, EUFOR Althea military operation in Bosnia and Herzegovina employed no more than 7,000 staff. On the civilian side, the largest civilian mission to date thus far consisted of 1,710 personnel in EULEX Kosovo. In its 17 ongoing missions and operations, the EU today deploys a total of 5,000 people.

In terms of length, EU missions and operations are generally proposed for an initial one-year deployment, although many receive one or more extensions to complete their initial mandate or address additional concerns. The shortest EU intervention was that of EUFOR Artemis, a military operation in the Democratic Republic of Congo, between June and September 2003, to stabilize and improve the humanitarian situation in Bunia. The longest, still ongoing after 15 years, is the EU military operation in Bosnia and Herzegovina (EUFOR BiH), established to deter violence and preserve the peace agreement.

Between 2003 and 2008, some 21 missions and operations were authorized. No period since has seen the same intensity of deployments, despite continuing instability in the EU's immediate and wider periphery. In the 12 years since 2008, only 15 missions and operations have been conducted, signaling a waning of the initial enthusiasm for this new instrument of EU security and defense policy, as well as a less permissive environment.

Strengths

A variety of actors are involved in post-Cold War global interventionism, each with their respective comparative advantages. What, specifically, sets the EU apart from others?

With a large territory, population and economy, and its status as the largest integrated market, trade bloc, and donor in the world, the EU enjoys significant influence in global affairs (Murphy 2008, p. 61). It currently engages in relations with almost every country in the world and has intervened, through various channels, on all continents. As regional agency goes, the Union's degree of integration bears no comparison with other regional arrangements (Hettne 2010). Moreover, the EU is not only a significant actor in global interventionism when operating as a regional organization; it is also composed of some of the most prominent individual states with long histories of ties to the periphery. While many such ties are rooted in colonialism, European states – such as the UK (prior to Brexit), France, Spain, Portugal, the Netherlands, Belgium, Italy, and Germany – continue to draw on these shared histories to maintain and foster special connections with many countries of the global South, providing an entry point for the EU to exert political and economic clout.

That the EU's relationship with the once-colonized periphery is often mediated through former colonial powers is problematic: questions of neo-colonialism, dependency, and unequal power relations abound. Yet, these same enduring vested interests also ensure a level of long-term commitment, less prone to fads and more likely to translate pledges into actual support. Through the geopolitical and historical connections of many of its member states – be it by way of former colonial ties or stable relationships established post-independence – the Union can ensure that at least some members are invested in, and assume responsibility for, EU endeavors, such as its peace missions and operations, while also eliciting support from other members.

The EU benefits from stable and knowledgeable sources of information, as well as a depth and breadth of prolific policies on the part of its member states, besides its own. This shapes the nature of the Union's interventionism in the global South and the plethora of activities and instruments it deploys. From development aid and security sector reform to rule of law and civil society support, there is space for synergies and coordination between CSDP peace missions and operations, between them and different yet complementary EEAS' initiatives, and between them and initiatives carried out by individual member states as part of their own autonomous bilateral relations. Indeed, CSDP peace missions and operations are but one element of a much broader and comprehensive toolbox: on the one hand, they build on instruments already in place and, on the other, their activities are incorporated into other EU foreign policies on the ground when they leave (Gross 2014, pp. 1–2).

Acknowledgment of this peculiarity has led to profuse discussions on the distinctiveness of the Union's engagement in the international arena. In particular, much debated ideas of the EU as a “civilian power” (Duchêne 1972) and a “normative power” (Manners 2002) have drawn attention to the organization's ability to exercise power and influence, not through a projection of military force or other coercive means, but leading by example – that is, echoing beyond EU borders its commitment within them to the values of peace, freedom, democracy, rule of law, and human rights. Though the Union's actual practices often contradict its own rhetoric, the idea of a cosmopolitan and pluralist Europe, which seeks to distance itself from other leading states' historic power politics, might (optimistically) still be rescued, to the advantage of those with whom the EU engages.

Critiques

Opinions about the EU's practice as a security and peace provider range from "impressive results" (Keohane 2011, p. 201) to "room for improvement" (Juncos and Blockmans 2018, p. 131) to having "largely failed" (Keukeleire and Delreux 2015, p. 49). Despite the inevitable dissent born out of these analyses, on many occasions, interventions have revealed an EU struggling to meet the challenges presented by the contexts in which it is involved. Despite multiple factors and distinct problems in each of these missions and operations, the overall mixed record stems, at least in part, from the institution's theoretical and conceptual framework and the blindspots and assumptions that such a framework produces.

EU peace missions and operations are predominantly guided by European interests and concerns, to the detriment of those prioritized by recipients. A common thread is a focus specifically on addressing European security, stability, and commercial interests, expressed through links with perceived transnational threats, such as those associated with migration, terrorism, or organized crime. The EU NAVFOR Atalanta military operation, launched in 2008 to combat piracy off the coast of Somalia, is an apposite example. Security arrangements are evidently relevant and counterparts' interests are not ignored altogether, yet they certainly appear to be relegated to the background, as is the broad goal of promoting peace, rather than the narrow one of stabilization.

CSDP missions and operations, once deployed, also appear to suffer from varied levels of commitment. Indeed, political and financial support has proven elusive on some occasions, while perhaps revealing the absence of an exit strategy on others. There remains much disagreement on what constitutes the bloc's common interests and threats thereto, as well as whether CSDP missions are the right instrument to address these (Keohane 2011, p. 205). As a consequence, when situations on the ground become thorny, as with the EU Security Sector Reform mission in Guinea-Bissau (2008–2010) (Almeida Cravo 2016), waning support in EU capitals can rapidly determine the fate of an operation, with cuts followed by an abrupt end. In contrast, in Bosnia and Herzegovina (Operation Althea, 2004–), due to recent history and geographical proximity, withdrawal is considered high risk and becomes difficult to contemplate. In other words, the EU's deployments in situations of rising tension, crisis, war, or postwar reconstruction remain disjointed, inconsistent, and not entirely predictable.

Another recurrent and incisive criticism of the EU's engagement with the periphery relates to the way the Union appears to view conflict and post-conflict settings as clean slates onto which its own institutional template can be implanted. Presuming the universality of the liberal peace, the paradigm followed in CSDP missions and operations (and elsewhere) entails the imposition of a hegemonic system into the global South that reproduces particular (Western) social, political, and economic institutions and norms (Richmond 2011). Its focus tends to be exclusively on formal institutions and legal structures, often undermining the local legitimacy of reforms, with informal and/or traditional institutions largely ignored or simply outside its conceptual framework. Indeed, the preferred modus operandi of drafting of blueprints guided by western standards has often disregarded the local political and economic dynamics that underpin both enactment of and resistance to reforms transplanted from the EU.

Notwithstanding claims of support for local ownership, peace promotion remains informed and undergirded by a liberal ethos and a practice of expert knowledge. It is characterized by low involvement of local authorities and the local population, from consultation to planning. For instance, following an assessment of Georgia's criminal system, the EU's mission in Georgia (EUJUST Themis) focused mainly on assisting the drafting of a legislative proposal. Once local counterparts began proposing legislative changes which ran counter to the European criminal justice model, the proclaimed principle of local ownership was swiftly overlooked and part of the draft strategy was actually concluded without Georgian input (Kurowska 2009, pp. 206–209). Elsewhere, as Marchetti and Tocci argue, EU efforts to build civil society in recipient countries tend to focus on replicating its own liberal urban and middle class, responsive foremost to EU, rather than local, concerns (2015, p. 175). This one-size-fits-all approach is characterized by little appreciation for local contexts or understandings and routinely dismisses the plural landscapes of peace, where locally resourced alternatives might be found and explored.

Current Challenges

In spite of its many achievements, the EU project has encountered numerous obstacles throughout its history – both to its efforts to unify and govern Europe and to its efforts to act as a unified and coherent actor in international affairs. In recent years, however, the Eurozone crisis and the rise of the extreme right and populist nationalist movements – bolstered by electoral success across Europe and the 2016 Brexit precedent – represent a significant challenge for multilateral engagement, as well as the very notion of European integration (Berend 2021). Enthusiasm for the European project has made way for a more conservative approach towards a minimum common denominator; likewise, backing for the EU's international activities has waned. Early domestic support for foreign interventions outside the narrow lens of national(ist) interest has faded in the face of a simplistic discourse privileging European security and taking care of our own. In a time of added budgetary strain, such sentiments inevitably undermine any beneficent or holistic policy towards the global South. And the more the current health and economic crisis lasts, the more reluctant member states will be to contribute to budgets for foreign policy and peace promotion activities in the periphery which are not recognized as directly addressing their more immediate concerns. As Winn (2003) observes, robust operational capability, staunch political leadership, and sympathetic domestic opinion are all essential for the success of CSDP interventions. Yet, as in the past, the EU is struggling to combine all three – and the current context appears to foretell further difficulties in the near future.

These internal pressures are compounded by broader geopolitical shifts and increased tensions with other international powers. The relationship with the US has cooled – for a number of years but especially sharply during the Trump Presidency – casting doubts over its role as a security provider for Europe, while Russia and China seek to impose their stamp on world affairs (Bendiek et al. 2020). The turmoil surrounding Brexit has also hinted at a consequential rivalry between the UK and the Union, if trust is not restored between them, besides the evident loss for the EU at the level of military capabilities. A further challenge comes from recipients of EU support and intervention themselves. With its share of failed promises, the EU has often disappointed its interlocutors in the global South, creating weariness – even acrimony – towards the Union, which may prove difficult to surmount against the backdrop of multiple donors.

With its own neighborhood growing in volatility, the EU is struggling to define its place in world affairs. Some in the Union have seen increased threats, such as those posed by Russia's annexation of Crimea in 2014, as grounds to reaffirm NATO as the primary line of defense for European countries, hindering efforts towards more integration in the area of European defense (Major and Mölling 2020, p. 42). Others have sought to use the uncertainty of the international context to advance EU "strategic autonomy," with Charles Michel, current President of the European Council, urging that this be "goal number one for our generation" (2020). Whether this ambition of boosting the Union's capacity to intervene independently within and beyond its borders will gain momentum remains to be seen. Either way, the redirection of EU resources and political clout towards European security narrowly conceived does not bode well for CSDP missions and operations – and peace promotion in general – geared towards overseas commitments (Forti 2018).

Summary

Efforts towards making security and defense a central component of EU integration, unthinkable 30 years ago, have undoubtedly born recent fruits. The CSDP has institutionalized political cooperation between member states, which has translated into specific commitments in the realm of global interventionism, of which its peace missions and operations are a crucial outcome. Yet, even though the EU has come a long way in its ability to act strategically in global affairs and has expanded its collective role in international peace and security, its efforts to curb instability abroad remain elusive, as does its proclaimed goal of building a sustainable peace in the periphery.

On the one hand, many internal obstacles often impede joint efforts and the EU's coherent role in the international arena. Indeed, Hill's much-cited "capabilities-expectations gap" (1993) still lingers. On the other, strategies defined in Brussels are themselves deserving of criticism. From privileging narrow goals of threat containment and stabilization, despite a rhetoric often implying the contrary, to prioritizing the transplantation of a western liberal framework, the EU's performance in its missions and operations has largely lost sight of its supposedly holistic approach to supporting peace and of its commitment towards an equal partnership. While the Union's original peace project for the continent is generally considered a major achievement, the success of its peace promotion initiatives beyond the EU space, as translated into its CSDP missions and operations, remains far less so.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding

- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Almeida Cravo, T. (2016). Linking peacebuilding, rule of law and security sector reform: The European Union's experience. Asia-Europe Journal, Special Issue: The Rule of Law as a Strategic Priority in the European Union's External Action, 14(1), 107–124.
- Bendiek, A., Ålander, M., & Bochtler, P. (2020). CFSP: The capability-expectation gap revisited: A data-based analysis. SWP Comment, no. 58, November. https://www.swp-berlin.org/fileadmin/contents/products/comments/2020C58_CFSPOutput.pdf
- Berend, I. (2021). The economics and politics of European integration: Populism, nationalism and the history of the EU. London: Routledge.
- Bretherton, C., & Vogler, J. (2006). The European Union as a global actor (2nd ed.). London: Routledge.
- Davis, L. (2018). Betwixt and between: Conceptual and practical challenges of preventing violent conflict through EU external action. Global Affairs, 4(2–3), 157–169.
- Duchêne, F. (1972). Europe's role in world peace. In Mayne (Ed.), Europe tomorrow: Sixteen Europeans look ahead. London: Fontana.
- Duke, S., & Courtier, A. (2009). EU Peacebuilding: Concepts, players and instruments (CLEER Working Papers, 2009/3). <https://www.peacepalacelibrary.nl/ebooks/files/335882072.pdf>
- European External Action Service. (2016). Shared vision, common action: A stronger Europe – A global strategy for the European Union's Foreign and Security Policy, June 2016. https://eeas.europa.eu/sites/eeas/files/eugs_review_web_0.pdf
- European External Action Service. (2018). The common security and defence policy (CSDP). https://eeas.europa.eu/topics/common-security-and-defence-policy-csdp/431/common-security-and-defence-policy-csdp_en. Accessed May 2021.
- European External Action Service. (2019). Military and civilian missions and operations. https://eeas.europa.eu/topics/military-and-civilian-missions-and-operations/430/military-and-civilian-missions-and-operations_en. Accessed May 2021.
- European External Action Service. (2020). EU missions and operations, July 2020. https://eeas.europa.eu/sites/eeas/files/eu_military_operations_and_civilian_missions_july_2020.pdf
- Fiott, D. (2020). Introduction. In Fiott (Ed.), The CSDP in 2020: The EU's legacy and ambition in security and

- Defence* (pp. 6–13). Paris: European Union Institute for Security Studies.
- Forti, D. (2018). European Contributions to UN Peacekeeping Operations: Lessons Learned and the Way Forward. International Peace Institute Meeting Note, July 2018. <https://www.ipinst.org/wp-content/uploads/2018/07/IPI-ERPT-European-Contributions.pdf>
- Gnesotto, N. (1996). La défense européenne au carrefour de la Bosnie et de la CIG. Politique étrangère, 1(61^e année), 113–124.
- Gross, E. (2014). Exit strategies: What's in a name? European Union Institute for Security Studies Brief No. 23, 18 July 2014. <https://www.iss.europa.eu/content/exit-strategies-whats-name>
- Hettne, B. (2010). The European Union as an emerging global actor. In Wunderlich & Bailey (Eds.), The European Union and global governance (pp. 28–36). London: Routledge.
- Hill, C. (1993). The capability-expectations gap, or conceptualizing Europe's international role. Journal of Common Market Studies, 31, 305–328.
- Howorth, J. (2007). Security and Defence policy in the European Union. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jakobsen, P. V. (2009). Small states, big influence: The overlooked Nordic influence on the civilian ESDP. Journal of Common Market Studies, 47(1), 81–102.
- Juncos, A., & Blockmans, S. (2018). The EU's role in conflict prevention and peacebuilding: Four key challenges. Global Affairs, 4(2–3), 131–140.
- Keohane, D. (2011). Lessons from EU peace operations. Journal of International Peacekeeping, 15, 200–217.
- Keukeleire, S., & Delreux, T. (2015). Competing structural powers and challenges for the EU's structural foreign policy. Global Affairs, 1(1), 43–50.
- Kurowska, X. (2009). The rule-of-law mission in Georgia (EUJUST Themis). In Grevi, Helly, & Keohane (Eds.), European security and Defence policy: The first ten years (1999–2009). Paris: European Union Institute for Security Studies.
- Major, C., & Mölling, C. (2020). The EU's military legacy: Over-institutionalised, under-equipped and strategically divided. In Fiott (Ed.), The CSDP in 2020: The EU's legacy and ambition in security and Defence (pp. 38–49). Paris: European Union Institute for Security Studies.
- Manners, I. (2002). Normative power Europe: A contradiction in terms? Journal of Common Market Studies, 40, 235–258.
- Marchetti, R., & Tocci, N. (2015). Trapped in the liberal peace: The EU's approach to peacebuilding via civil society. In Boulden & Kymlicka (Eds.), International approaches to governing ethnic diversity (pp. 169–197). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Merlingen, M., & Ostrauskaite, R. (2006). European Union peacebuilding and policing: Governance and the European security and Defence policy. London: Routledge.
- Michel, C. (2020). Recovery plan: Powering Europe's strategic autonomy. Speech by President of the European Council at the Brussels Economic Forum, 8 September 2020. <https://www.consilium.europa.eu/en/press/press-releases/2020/09/08/recovery-plan-powering-europe-s-strategic-autonomy-speech-by-president-charles-michel-at-the-brussels-economic-forum/>
- Murphy, R. (2008). The European Union and developments in crisis management operations and peacekeeping. Connect, 8(1), 58–91.
- Nuttall, S. J. (2000). European foreign policy. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. (2011). A post-liberal peace. London: Routledge.
- Serrano, P. (2020). Truth and dare: A personal reflection on 20 years of CSDP. In Fiott (Ed.), The CSDP in 2020: The EU's legacy and ambition in security and Defence (pp. 16–37). Paris: European Union Institute for Security Studies.
- Tardy, T. (2015). CSDP in action: What contribution to International Security? EUISS Chaillot Papers, no. 134, 9. <https://www.iss.europa.eu/content/csdp-action-%E2%80%93-what-contribution-international-security>
- Winn, N. (2003). CFSP, ESDP, and the future of European security: Whither NATO? The Brown Journal of World Affairs, 9(2), 149–160.

Evaluation

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Measuring the Implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda

Event Data

- ▶ Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence

Everday

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Everyday Peace

Roger Mac Ginty
Durham University, Durham, UK

Definition

Everyday peace is comprised of the actions, stances, and forms of communication used by individuals and groups to safely navigate through life in conflict-affected contexts. While mainly occurring at the level of microactions and stances, it can have wider significance if everyday peace acts reach critical mass and shape the nature of inter-group interaction in a society.

Introduction

Everyday peace can be regarded as the actions, stances, and speech-acts used by individuals and groups to safely navigate their way through life in deeply divided or conflict-affected contexts (Berents 2015; Mac Ginty 2014). It can also be regarded as a mode of thinking or logic (Brewer 2018). It relies on emotional intelligence and the ability to “read” social situations and calculate what might be possible and safe given the context. It can take the form of a one-off act or a series of actions and stances. While occurring at an interpersonal or small group level, it has the potential to have a wider impact (Mac Ginty 2021). For example, multiple small acts of inter-group civility in everyday actions in a deeply divided society can have a conflict-calming effect. Everyday peace can also operate at the intragroup level with, for example, some community members acting to restrain fellow group members who might advocate for incivility or worse toward out-group members.

The notion of everyday peace rests heavily on sociological and anthropological perspectives that regard the everyday, the familial, the intimate, and the hyperlocal as legitimate sites of scrutiny (Foucault 1980; Millar 2020). As such, everyday peace represents a very different vantage point to the classic top-down and institution-centric perspectives that tend to see conflicts in terms of states, governments, political parties, and militant groups (Kissinger 2011). The everyday perspective instead highlights the importance of the family, friendship networks, colleagues, classmates, neighbors, and fellow shoppers and commuters. As such, it recognizes the importance of informal institutions.

Everyday peace can manifest itself in multiple ways that will be context-specific. Often it will operate in subtle ways and involve microactions. Thus, for example, it may involve civility between a Muslim stallholder and a Christian shopper in northern Nigeria, a Bosnian Muslim business owner employing a Croat on the basis of merit rather than only employing someone of the same faith, or Northern Ireland Catholics and Protestants maintaining friendship despite political tensions. Everyday peace is far-removed from the “big peace” of formal peace accords between major conflict-parties such as governments and militant groups. It can be thought of as “small peace,” or bottom-up prosocial and propeace activities and stances. Sometimes, everyday peace will be enabled by an elite-level peace process or peace accord. This might provide the physical security and psychological confidence to allow individuals and groups to engage in microactions of civility and respect. Sometimes, individuals and groups may act against the dominant opinion in their community and show civility and friendship to “the other side.” Such actions and stances may incur costs, such as being accused of being disloyal or treacherous.

We can think of everyday peace as being constituted by three mutually reinforcing ways of thinking and acting: sociality, reciprocity, and solidarity (Mac Ginty 2021). Sociality is a basic recognition that we are all human, social, and deserving of dignity and a minimum of rights. It involves an identification with others on the basis of their humanity rather than a stratification of humanity such as membership of a tribal or religious group. Reciprocity relies on the notion of exchange for mutual benefit. Individuals act in a particular way (for example, giving up a seat on the metro to an infirm person) because they would hope that this courtesy would be extended to them if they were in need. If factored out across society, this reciprocity would help spread and normalize civility. Solidarity denotes a “standing with” and necessitates action rather than merely a privately held belief. Solidarity may be rare in cases of violent conflict, not least because it can bring costs such as the accusation of being a traitor.

As everyday peace operates at the local level (the apartment stairwell, the queue for the bus, and the local coffee shop), it requires us to utilize research methods that are able to capture highly localized and often subtle forms of action (see everydaypeaceindicators.org) (Firchow 2019). Those engaging in everyday peace may, quite deliberately, keep their actions quiet so as to avoid surveillance or discipline. Extremist in-group members may work hard to discipline their own group and thus may wish to discipline anyone from their own group who “breaks rank.”

In cases of overt conflict, everyday peace can be regarded as the first and last peace. It may be the last peace in the sense that some instances of inter-group friendship or civility might survive as a society descends toward incivility and violent conflict (Moore 2013). It might be the first peace in the sense of the first inter-group links (re)-established in the wake of violent conflict. These highly localized, people-to-people forms of interaction might form an assemblage of actions, speech acts, stances, and modes of thinking that can have a transformative effect on wider conflict (Mac Ginty 2021). They may be able to prevent the total collapse of society into conflict. Or they might be the ways that an elite-level peace accord becomes manifest on the ground.

In turn, this encourages us to think about how everyday peace – as embodied and enacted at the café or school gate in a conflict-affected society – might connect with wider political and military contexts. Orthodox thinking on peace operates on the assumption of “trickle down peace” or the notion that an elite level peace accord creates a context that so-called “ordinary” people will populate with acts of civility. But the link between the top-down and the bottom-up is not automatic. Peacebuilding initiatives designed to support inter-group toleration (and perhaps reconciliation) often have a limited reach, and so individuals and groups of individuals often take initiatives in their everyday lives (Brewer 2018).

Everyday peace may be regarded as a form of power. This requires us to move away from understandings of power that concentrate on the material and institutional elements such as armies or governments. Instead, everyday peace relies on forms of power rooted in emotional intelligence, force of personality of charismatic individuals, the quiet persuasion from an older relative, the dignity of an individual who reacts to provocation with indifference, or some other conflict-calming response. These are all immaterial forms of power. While orthodox forms of power often stress “power over” or coercive forms of power, everyday peace emphasizes more emancipatory forms of power such as power to, power with, and power from. These immaterial forms of power might rely on persuasion, respect, and personality trait.

Summary

A key question faces everyday peace: Is it really peace? In many cases, everyday peace may take the form of tolerance and coexistence rather than more expansive forms of peace. These grudging actions and stances might be best regarded as “negative peace.” It is, however, worth remembering issues of context. It may be that the security situation only allows for minimal speech-acts of civility. Emotions may be too raw, or the security situation too febrile, to allow for anything more expansive. Multiple small acts of everyday peace might be able to accrete and have a wider impact across society. In an optimistic scenario, everyday peace can be seen as a first step that helps a peace process or peace accord become manifest on the ground.

Cross-References

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality

- ▶ Textiles Making Peace
- ▶ Youth and Peacebuilding

References

- Berents, H. (2015). An embodied everyday peace in the midst of violence. Peacebuilding: Every Day Peace and Youth, 3(2), 1–14.
- Brewer, J. D. (2018). The sociology of everyday life peacebuilding. Palgrave. <https://www.bookdepository.com/Sociology-Everyday-Life-Peacebuilding-John-D-Brewer/9783030076931>. 8 Oct 2020.
- Firchow, P. (2019). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge University Press.
- Foucault, M. (1980). Power/Knowledge: Selected interviews and other writings, 1972–1977. Harvester P, Pearson Education.
- Kissinger, H. (2011). White house years. Simon & Schuster.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday Peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2021). Everyday peace: How so-called ordinary people can disrupt violent conflict. Oxford University Press.
- Millar, G. (2020). Hidden interactions in the economics of peace and conflict. Economic Anthropology, 7(1), 150–152.
- Moore, A. (2013). Peacebuilding in practice: Local experience in two Bosnian towns (1st ed.). Cornell University Press.

Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Michael Beary
Delgany, County Wicklow, Ireland

Synonyms

Female Peacekeepers – Gender balance in peace operations; Holding the ground peacekeeping – maintaining the status quo; Identity Politics – Politics centred on leadership figures, sectarian and other groups; Peacekeeping – Conflict Stabilisation; Peacekeeping – Crisis

Management; Peacekeeping – Peacebuilding-Peace operations; Peacekeeping inputs – assessing approaches; Peacekeeping Mission objective – mission end state; Peacekeeping Missions – Peacekeeping Operations; Peacekeeping Operations – Protection of Civilians; Peacekeeping outputs – measuring peace; Peacekeeping Sovereignty – host government responsibilities; Successful Peacekeeping outcome – political solution to conflicts

Definition

Peacekeeping as an international tool for the stabilization of conflict has reached a new phase in its development. There is a certain worldwide change to the overall concept of peacekeeping and its role in the promotion of peace and stability. The United Nations (UN) has over 100,000 civilian and military personnel dispersed among 13 UN missions across the world (United Nations 2019a). The budget of 6.5 billion represents less than 0.5% of worldwide military spending (United Nations 2019b). Peacekeeping now rests in a period of uncertainty with questions over international commitment to such operations reflected in an ever-tightening budgetary environment. The rules-based international order centered on effective multilateralism cannot be taken for granted given the trend toward isolationism, populism on the extreme left and right fringes, and the rise of nationalism. Instability remains endemic worldwide and at issue is the evolution of practice in generating, deploying, and conducting peacekeeping operations. The concept is examined through the prism of an established peacekeeping mission in place since 1978 UNIFIL in South Lebanon and a more contemporary example MINUSMA in Mali. Peacekeeping challenges and failings are considered and a pathway reviewing new initiatives to foster the development of UN Peacekeeping as an important tool for the international community to promote peace and stabilize both established and emerging democracies.

Shifting the Peacekeeping Paradigm

Peacekeeping as an international tool for the stabilization of conflict- and crisis-driven nations has reached a new phase in its development. There is a certain worldwide change to the overall concept of peacekeeping and its role in the promotion of peace and stability. At issue is the evolution of practice in generating, deploying, and conducting such operations. Certainly, the UN overall has now entered a period of significant adjustment. In September 2015, the then Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon commented on the critical need for change in the High-level Independent Panel on Peace Operations (HIPPO) report: “We must harness the full range of tools available: political, security, development, human rights and humanitarian, and we need to change the way in which we do business within and across that range” (Mueller 2015, p. 255). Peacekeeping now rests in a period of uncertainty with questions over international commitment to such operations reflected in an ever-tightening budgetary environment. Just one member, the United States (from a total of 193 UN member states), is funding 22% of the overall UN budget and 28.47% (United Nations 2019b) of the peacekeeping budget in the financial year 2018–2019. The rules-based international order centered on effective multilateralism cannot be taken for granted given the trend toward isolationism, populism on the extreme left and right fringes, and the rise of nationalism.

Instability remains endemic worldwide, with prominent examples including the Democratic Republic of Congo, the Central African Republic, and Mali in Africa. In the Middle East, the tragedy of Yemen verging on famine continues to unfold and Syria only now starting to emerge from chaos with the Occupied Palestinian territories and Gaza remaining restive and unpredictable. Venezuela in South America and Ukraine in Europe could all provide real challenges into the future – real challenges that the UN including traditional peacekeeping nations will be asked to address. The UN has been subjected to criticism from many quarters, and an unfortunate simple new phrase has entered the lexicon surrounding the deployment of peacekeeping operations: “A UN mission should do no harm” which is some distance from the original UN Charter and the ideal of nations banding together to promote peace worldwide. This situation emerging from some poor UN experiences in Africa with Sexual Exploitation and Abuse and in Haiti with the introduction of infectious disease. UN casualties have also spiked; since 2013, over 205 personnel in UNPKOs (United Nations 2019c) have been killed by acts of violence, more than during any other 5-year period in UN history. For example, the highest UN mission in terms of fatalities is UNIFIL with 313 of which Ireland has the greatest number at 47. This prompted the completion of the Lt Gen Santos Cruz report to review peacekeeping operations where it stated:

The United Nations has not fully adapted to modern hostile, operational environments and Security Council mandates. The United Nations lacks a conceptual approach as certain missions operate outside the governing principles of peacekeeping – consent, impartiality and minimum use of force. The UN also lacks required supporting skill sets, and resource processes and mindset for delivering peace operations in modern, complex conflict environments and forceful Security Council mandates. (United Nations 2017, p. 18)

The UN has over 100,000 civilian and military personnel dispersed among 13 UN missions (United Nations 2019a). The budget of 6.5 billion represents less than 0.5% of worldwide military spending. The EU had 16 military and civilian missions deployed worldwide in November 2019 (European Union 2019) with approximately 5,000 personnel. In the framework of the CSDP, the EU has launched some 35 missions and operations since 2003 bringing stability, rule of law, and security sector reform to countries as diverse as Afghanistan, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Kosovo, Iraq, and Ukraine. About 5,000 personnel are currently serving in the 16 ongoing operations, 10 civilian and 6 military (2018). This represents a significant international commitment by both the EU and UN to peace. However, a significant challenge for the UN has been the nonengagement in UNPKOs by European countries where only 7.4% of UN troops (Novosseloff 2018b) are provided by western countries and a significant proportion of them are represented in the Middle Eastern missions including UNDOF, UNFICYP, and UNIFIL which has 14 EU/NATO countries. Why do we have such low representation? Firstly, former Yugoslavia, the Rwanda, and Srebrenica disasters still impact the thinking of some EU countries, and it is politically difficult for EU/NATO countries to accept fatalities in such missions. Ireland has been proactive and suggested a new initiative of rotation cycles or deeper cooperation between European countries in contributing to PKOs. However, “No End State” is always a concern for EU/NATO countries and particularly when important capabilities are deployed. The EU/NATO position is diametrically opposed to UN planning where short-term deployments with frequent turnovers are a real challenge.

Change is being addressed. Secretary-General Guterres launched his Action for Peacekeeping (A4P) initiative in 2018 and effective from Jan 1, 2019, UN HQ peace, and security architecture is now reconfigured in a new Department of Peace Operations (DPO), Department of Support (DOS), and a Department of Political and Peacebuilding Affairs (DPPA) with the intention to deliver more regionally integrated political strategies and improving linkages with regional partners such as the AU and EU (Sherman 2018). Time, of course, will reveal if such initiatives gain enough traction to have a real impact.

The changing practice in peacekeeping operations can be reviewed through the prism of two missions which demand different conceptual approaches. Firstly, the experience in Mali where a January 2013 offensive by armed groups toward the south including the capital Bamako risked losing this important region to criminality and terrorism.

A New Awakening: The Experience of Mali

UN Headquarters note that MINUSMA (UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali) was established by Security Council resolution 2100 of April 25, 2013, to support national political processes and carry out a number of security-related tasks. The Mission was asked to support the transitional authorities of Mali in the stabilization of the country and implementation of the transitional road map. UNSC resolution 2164 of June 25, 2014, further decided that the Mission should focus on duties, such as ensuring security, stabilization, and protection of civilians; supporting national political dialogue and reconciliation; and assisting the reestablishment of state authority, the rebuilding of the security sector, and the promotion and protection of human rights in that country. The seven-part mandate included support to the implementation of Mali’s transitional road map adopted in January to restore democracy and stability in addition to the protection of civilians and promotion and protection of human rights.

MINUSMA represents a major advance in peacekeeping evolution and is seeking through its mandate to assist in providing a path toward democracy for a state that could easily slip into failed status. The cost has been high; the strength of military and police in the MINUSMA mission is 13,539 (United Nations 2019a) and an approved budget of $1,221,420,600 (United Nations 2019e). However, the real cost has been in lost peacekeeper’s lives, and MINUSMA is considered the UN’s most dangerous mission with 206 fatalities (United Nations, Fatalities 2019c). The mission has demonstrated that donning a blue helmet is no defense against militant jihadis with many fatalities resulting from roadside improvised explosive devices. The UN has had the difficult challenge of finding the correct path to follow both politically and militarily in a robust Chapter VII environment, balancing the peacekeeping principles of minimum force, agreement of the parties, and impartiality while been actively targeted by aggressive militants. Peacekeeping forces with white vehicles and aircraft are not designed for offensive military war fighting in any theatre. However, though the mission has no real end state in sight, it represents effective multilateralism with the international community working together to ensure that Mali does not turn into a haven for jihadi terrorists, drug dealers, and illegal migration but is stabilized again in the community of democracies. Important here is that Mali is protected and supported as it seeks to negotiate a path to democracy. While Africa is providing the current focus for peacekeeping operations, it is also important to consider long-standing operations, and this is a good entry point to explore the role of peacekeeping in UNIFIL and the Middle East.

The Value of Consistency: Lebanon and the Middle East

Lebanon historically is enjoying a “purple patch,” and South Lebanon is currently playing out an uncharacteristic role in a period of unprecedented calm with gentle winds blowing through Tyre, Sidon, and Bint Jbeil while surrounded by perfect storms including Syria, Yemen, Libya, and even the Occupied Palestinian territories. The contrast now between the initial deployments by the United Nations under UNSCR 425 and 426 could not be more pronounced. During 2018 and 2019, Lebanon has successfully held local elections; framed an electoral law with proportional representation; held general elections on May 6, 2018; and managed following a significant time delay to form a government. For a country with 18 officially recognized religions (Global Security 2019) and major external influencers, Iran and Saudi Arabia, that is a significant achievement. However, corruption, provision of basic services, and over a million Syrian refugees in addition to the resident Palestinian refugee population place great strain on this embryonic institutional framework.

Interactions with the Lebanese government indicate that memories of the 15-year civil war and conflicts with Israel help greatly to reduce tensions and temper exchanges within the government. Hezbollah continues to grow in power, and in the general elections, Hezbollah and Amal won 28/128 (Wimmen 2018) seats taking all seats in South Lebanon. Lebanon has a form of identity politics focused on leaders and sectarian groups.

Militarily they represent a meaningful deterrent to Israel considering their success at frustrating the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) in the 34-day 2006 war and recent war fighting experience gained in Syria. Additionally, Hassan Nasrallah’s public pronouncements indicating that the next war will be fought in Israel contribute to maintaining high levels of tension between the parties. While the situation is relatively calm, the potential for a flare-up along the 118 km Blue Line is ever present, and constant liaison along that line of withdrawal by UNIFIL is imperative. The international community cannot let their guard down regarding this enduring flashpoint.

UNSCR 1701 adopted in August 2006 was a comprehensive mandate, containing both the military and political aspects. The mandate has been successful in providing the mission with the handrails to maintain stability. For instance, in 2019 UNIFIL had a military strength of 10,252 (United Nations 2019f) comprising 42 nations including 14 NATO/EU countries with a budget of 483 million. It is unique within PKOs in that it has a maritime task force, and within the UN, it is considered a “Five Star Mission” well-resourced comprising well-trained personnel. However, we should remind ourselves that in South Lebanon, we are sitting on a major regional fault line rife with many conflict triggers and traditionally the greatest hotspot in the Middle East. The underlying causes of the indigenous conflict remain unaddressed, and the strategic considerations underlying UNIFIL’s deployment in its current form remain equally valid today and rendered even more complex by the regional conflict. The 2019 constitutional crisis in Lebanon with determined anti-government protests in Beirut adds complexity to the mission’s deployment.

However, “holding the ground” peacekeeping and acceptance of the status quo is not enough; it must be dynamic and innovative, and risks must be taken to build a conducive environment between the parties while reassuring the international community that the resources they are providing are being put to good use. A mission like UNIFIL cannot replace an overall political solution, and peace cannot be imposed or enforced; it must grow from the parties.

Engaging the Parties

UNIFIL hosts monthly meetings between senior Lebanese Armed Forces (LAF) and Israeli Defence Forces (IDF) Commanders, known as Tripartite Meetings, where both, despite still technically at war, can sit together in one room and calmly and professionally discuss issues of a tactical nature at Brigadier General Level. Both parties take part voluntarily in this process, and it is a mechanism that the UN is considering utilizing in other conflict areas. Backing up the tripartite system of communication, the Mission has Liaison Teams deployed on both sides of the Blue Line with the LAF and IDF to allow for immediate communication in the event of an incident occurring. A UNIFIL initiative was to assist in resolving a long-standing disagreement centered on the IDF construction of a wall/fence, and the Lebanese need to regain land in 13 reservation areas where the Blue Line was at variance from the 1948 armistice line. The 19 Tripartite Meetings held in 2017 represented more than three times the annual average with full engagement and cooperation between the negotiators on each side and chaired by UNIFIL. However, while ground solutions were found the Lebanese election cycle served to frustrate UNIFIL's efforts and were further complicated by the Lebanese imperative to solve the maritime resource issue offshore.

The question of Maritime resources provides both opportunities and challenges. The opportunity rests in the potential for the issue to help build some trust between Lebanon and Israel, but the possibility of disputes leading to greater tensions also exists. This Maritime issue though not part of UNIFIL's mandate resulted in the mission being drawn into the negotiations on solutions UNIFIL took an active part in assisting the acting US Assistant Secretary of State for Near Eastern Affairs David Satterfield in seeking solutions. However, trust needs to be built before there will be a satisfactory outcome for both parties. These negotiation initiatives will likely continue for some time into the future, and these two examples provide an understanding of the major strategic issues that UNIFIL sought to help resolve.

Developing the Concept: Steps Forward in Peacekeeping Practice

The 2018 Action for Peacekeeping (A4P) initiative seeks to provide a formula for the evolution of Peacekeeping in the years ahead. This strategy places emphasis on peacebuilding, performance, people, partnerships, and politics to strengthen peacekeeping overall. Greater coherence is emphasized between the Security Council and the Peacebuilding Commission and between the UN and external regional and subregional organizations such as the African Union and the European Union, host countries, and international financial institutions. Performance and leadership top down and bottom up to ensure peacekeepers have the training, equipment, and mindset to complete their mission without being overly exposed to fatalities as currently the case in Mali. People must always be central to all peacekeeping operations, and a deployed force must be ready to protect civilians at any point when they are found in harm's way.

The peacekeeping model will only evolve correctly along sustainable lines if gender balance is fully incorporated in the concept. There are many challenges to greater inclusion, and deploying females in appropriate numbers in full operational roles will be a work in progress for many years to come. The UNIFIL female strength of 587 out of a total strength of 10,252 (United Nations 2019d) though low in numbers was utilized fully to reach out to the female population of South Lebanon predominantly Shia and hence culturally difficult for UNIFIL male interaction. Such reach out ensured UNIFIL was communicating with the entire South Lebanon population and not just 50%. The inclusion of females is very much in accordance with the greater UN and Secretary-General Guterres' agenda to mainstream gender and promote more females to leadership positions in HQ and in the field.

The synergy that partnerships bring to bear on peacekeeping deployments must be a central tenet of future evolutionary trends. Hard lessons learned must be shared to enhance complementarity. Force generation to match the deployments to the mandate demands close cooperation.

The implementation of the new UN light coordination mechanism in UNHQ to avoid duplication and assist P/TCCs to provide the appropriate capability at the correct time will help grow partnership into the future. Peacekeeping in theatre must focus on the effect it wants to achieve and not just on the traditional modus operandi of providing adequate numbers on the ground.

On politics the mandates must be realistic and fit the resources provided. Acceptance of the political status quo can only lead to long protracted deployments such as witnessed in the Middle East going back to the 1948 war. Political movement is imperative to avoid a peacekeeping mission becoming an accepted entity in the local environment, a frozen force unable to broker solutions. The host government must be leveraged to find such solutions with UN member states recognizing the importance even primacy of the host government role. In general, the overall coherence of the political effort must be improved. In the Lebanon example, political movement now as UNIFIL passes the 41-year deployment mark is critical. UNIFIL continues to do its work essentially Fire Brigading along the Blue Line and ensuring the Area of Operations is not used to mount aggressive actions. However, the fact that a PKO can never replace political movement is very true in the case of Lebanon and Israel. Difficult conversations will need to take place, conversations that in some quarters can never be countenanced.

Pointing Toward the Future

Peacekeeping is the right way forward despite its detractors. However, peacekeeping has limitations, and such multinational deployments are not suitable for war fighting. Peace cannot be imposed or enforced; it must grow from the parties. UNIFIL is proving that where we can secure the commitment of the parties, peacekeeping can be successful and deliver. The relative calm along the Blue Line between Israel and Lebanon tends to suggest that UNIFIL is merely a holding operation; and hence the question of how much the international community should continue to invest toward this venture (annual budget of 483 million). However, this holding operation has gained strategic significance in the current regional context. There is merit in holding the ground when everything around is in free fall.

MINUSMA with over 50 contributing countries is pushing out the boundaries of peacekeeping practice, assisting in the stabilization of Mali and promotion of democracy. It is a highly complex environment with multiple challenges and shares its theatre of operations with the French Barkhane force engaged in counterterrorist operations. The 42 nations in UNIFIL have assisted the host country to gift peace to the population of South Lebanon for 13 years, and dividends of peace include the emergence of Tyre deservedly to become a hub for tourism, extensive infrastructural and personal building projects, and farming up to the Blue Line impossible in times past. In a similar manner, the population of Northern Israel have benefited from the presence of UNIFIL.

The South Lebanese take on Clausewitz's Enigmatic trilogy is – The Army, the People and the Resistance (in lieu of Government). UNIFIL has been building resistance to war and has a metric also, measuring peace by reference to the “teenage index” putting South Lebanon now 13 years (July 12, 2006) since the 34-day war and local youths who have not seen the face of conflict. This teenage index is the best hope for future accommodations and success because it is from that generation that progress can be made.

On the general construct of Peacekeeping, some commentators contend that states favor the logic of security and war over the logic of peace. Alexandra Novosseloff (2018a), a noted commentator on UN affairs, provides insights on how PK might go forward:

Peacekeeping is a worthy idea; what needs to be re-examined is how member states use it. Successful peacekeeping missions require that everyone be mobilized. They also require a genuine strategy that is understood by all actors, with the Security Council acting as an orchestra conductor and providing political support, while troop contributors manage the military support, the Secretariat oversees quality control of contributions, and partner organizations supply any political or military services within this strategy.

Peacekeeping remains the best path forward, but constant change is necessary to keep the concept fresh and meaningful. Globally there have been many interventions in attempts to promote democracy and stability where formerly tyrants held sway. The outcome of those interventions has often left an enduring legacy of instability. Long-term commitment to a peacekeeping operation is far less expensive and morally more sustainable as opposed to long-term instability in a state leading to a failed state. Peacekeeping operations may well be the worst method of bringing stability to existing and emerging democracies, but it is better than all the rest. Peacekeeping works, and we must persevere.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- European Union. (2019). European Union External Action Service. Retrieved December 2019 from https://eeas.europa.eu/headquarters/headquarters-homepage/area/geo_en
- Global Security. Lebanon's 18 Recognised Religions. Retrieved December 2019 from <https://www.globalsecurity.org/military/world/lebanon/religious-sects.htm>
- Mueller, J. (2015). Reforming the United Nations: A chronology. (J. Müller, Ed.) Leiden/Boston: Brill.
- Novosseloff, A. (2018a, April 19). UN peacekeeping: Back to basics is not backwards. The Global Observatory.
- Novosseloff, A. (2018b, February 16). Blue helmets: UN's unloved stepchild needs leadership. The Global Observatory.
- Sherman, J. (2018). Action for peacekeeping: Will political consensus lead to change in practice? New York: International Peace Institute.
- United Nations. (2017, November 29). Improving security of United Nations peacekeepers: We need to change the way we are doing business. Retrieved from https://peacekeeping.un.org/sites/default/files/improving_security_of_united_nations_peacekeepers_report.pdf
- United Nations. (2019a). United Nations home. Retrieved November 2019, from United Nations Peacekeeping: <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en>
- United Nations. (2019b). How we are funded. Retrieved November 2019, from United Nations Peacekeeping: <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/how-we-are-funded>
- United Nations. (2019c). Fatalities. Retrieved November 2019, from <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/fatalities>
- United Nations. (2019d). Gender. Retrieved November 2019, from <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/gender>
- United Nations. (2019e). Financing of the United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali. <https://undocs.org/A/RES/73/320>
- United Nations. (2019f). Troop and Police contributors. Retrieved December 2019, from <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/troop-and-police-contributors>
- Wimmen, H. (2018, May 9). In Lebanon's elections, more of the same is mostly good news. International Crisis Group.

Expats

- ▶ Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Experiencia de Paz (Peace Experience)

- ▶ Zones of Peace

Extraterritorial Citizenship

- ▶ Politics of Passportization and Territorial Conflicts

Extraterritorial Naturalization

- ▶ Politics of Passportization and Territorial Conflicts

Extremism

- ▶ Kenya's War on Terror

F

Facilitation

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Fact-Finding

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Fair Division

David Churchman
California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Property disputes

Description

Discusses three possible meanings and four desirable characteristics of fairness and proposes an easily understood method suitable for achieving that goal with minimal stress in dividing property among claimants in a wide variety of circumstances.

Disputes involving division of property or raising similar issues come up in divorces, settling estates, dividing the assets of a business, assigning household chores, setting salaries and tax rates, and allocating resources (e.g., water among farmers, fish, homeowners, industry, and recreational users). It is a common element in truces and treaties, such as setting the boundary between North and South Korea, the de facto division of Cyprus into two states, the Israeli occupation of the Golan Heights, and the allocation of zones of occupation of Germany after World War II. Everyone wants to be treated fairly, but just what that means becomes particularly elusive when claimants define “fair” differently.

What Qualifies as “Fair”?

Imagine yourself as the judge in a court where three people have all been found guilty of driving 25 miles per hour over the speed limit. One is a multimillionaire who earns $5000 a day in dividends from investments, one a hardworking blue-collar father who earns a median national income of about $200 a day and was rushing his father to a hospital with a heart attack, and one an orphaned college freshman working his way through college with part-time earnings of about $50 a day and largely dependent on loans. Assuming you have complete discretion, will you fine them the same amount, say $200 each? Or would you punish each of them with a fine of one day's pay in an effort to equalize the pain? Or would you let the second one off with a lecture telling him he should have called an ambulance? If you chose the first possibility, you equate fairness in this case with equality. If you chose the second, you think fairness requires equity. If you chose the third, you think that fairness requires consideration of need. These are three different definitions of fairness.

Brams and Taylor (1996) identified four additional considerations in thought problems based on two children sharing a cake. The classic solution, divide and choose, has one child cut it, while the second child chooses first. Theoretically, the result is proportional, in that neither child will feel the other one got a larger piece (although the chooser may sometimes feel he got the larger one). The procedure also is envy-free, a second condition, unless the chooser feels deserving of a larger piece for some reason. Now, suppose that half the cake is vanilla and the other half is chocolate. The girl likes vanilla and cannot abide chocolate, while the boy likes chocolate, thinks vanilla sickening, and is the cutter but does not know their tastes differ. To be certain to get some of his favorite flavor, he will cut the cake so each piece has equal amounts of chocolate. Both would end up with cake they would not eat, which is inefficient unless they trade the leftovers. If brother and sister had announced their preferences in advance, the boy could have cut the cake so that he got all the chocolate and his sister got all the vanilla (for our purpose, we need not worry about how to make such cakes). The solution would remain proportional and envy-free and also would be efficient, a third desirable consideration of fair division. But, if sister was being deceptive about her preference, which really is for chocolate, she will end up with all the chocolate and the boy only with the vanilla he dislikes. Efficiency also requires truthfulness, often limited among people in conflict.

How can Fairness be Achieved?

Instead of sharing cake, consider siblings deciding who inherits a classic 1938 Brough SS80 motorcycle with sidecar and who inherits a room-size handwoven silk Persian rug from Isfahan, both professionally appraised at $30,000. They could of course simply sell both items and split the proceeds less any costs of making the sales. But sister is a cycle fanatic who values the rare machine at $38,000. Brother, whose home is decorated with antique and modern Middle Eastern art from his travels and never learned to ride a bicycle let alone motorcycle, values the rug at $35,000. If the cycle went to the girl and the rug to the brother, they would feel they had received total value of $73,000, a joint improvement of $13,000, illustrating how efficiency leaves both better off. Even though unequal, the second solution also is likely to prove a stable solution, a fifth desirable characteristic of agreements first identified by Nash (1950) and more fully developed by Fraser and Hipel (Churchman 2020). Add cross-reference here to the article on identifying stable solutions, submitted at the same time as this one.

Putting all this together, ideally, a fair division should be proportional, envy-free, and efficient, motivate truthfulness, maximize value, and prove stable, but fairness usually requires a choice among equality, equity, or consideration of need.

Regardless of how these issues are resolved, a practical method to achieve that complex list of characteristics remains elusive. Several methods have been devised, some extremely difficult to explain to anyone without a doctorate in mathematics, so less likely to be trusted by claimants. Two methods come close. The first and simplest is to sell everything and divide the cash among the claimants (not necessarily equally or limited to two individuals). This does not preclude the claimants buying particular items knowing that some of the payment will be returned when the cash is divided.

This idea leads naturally to an "imaginary auction." Before starting the auction, the rules must be clarified and agreed. First, the proportion of the total value each claimant is to receive must be determined (it is not always equal). Second, it is common to use the winning bid for each item to calculate the total value received. Third, the currency and minimum raise required must be agreed. Fourth, after the auction, the books must be balanced with cash. Fifth, the method for disposition of any items not “sold” must be agreed.

Claimants make and raise bids on each item in turn until someone wins it. Instead of actually paying for an item, the winning bid is credited as value received. After auctioning off all items, the total value received by each claimant is determined, and cash is used to balance the books. The cash might be part of the property to be divided (so is not included in the auction), some of which might come from sale of items on which no claimant bids. If there is no cash, or not enough, the winner of the greatest value must make payments from personal funds (over time if necessary). If there is more cash remaining than necessary to balance the books, it can be divided among the claimants.

The figure shows what might have happened in such an auction in which 40 items were divided among three retirees with 40%, 35%, and 25% (to illustrate the case of unequal claims) entitlements to the assets involved.

| Each partner’s agreed entitlement | 40% | 35% | 25% | Totals |
|-----------------------------------|---------|---------|---------|---------|
| Items received | 15 | 19 | 6 | 40 |
| Bid totals $ | 384,900 | 273,540 | 214,325 | 872,765 |
| Entitlement | 349,106 | 305,468 | 218,191 | 872,765 |
| Cash to even up | -35,794 | 31,928 | 3866 | 0 |
| Total received | 349,106 | 305,468 | 218,191 | 872,765 |
| Percent received | 40% | 35% | 25% | 100% |

A claimant could try to gain an advantage if he knows how much someone else values an item. By overbidding, he could force the other person to overpay, ultimately increasing the value he receives. However, the person seeking the advantage may overestimate the amount the other will bid and end up winning the item for more than he values it, reducing rather than increasing the total value received. Warning participants in advance against announcing which items they “must have” and making sure everyone understands the trick and its implications before the auction starts tend to increase truthfulness and reduce even if it does not guarantee eliminating strategic bidding.

Summary

The imaginary auction meets most of the requirements for fair division discussed above most of the time. It assigns each item to the person who wants it most, so the result is likely to be efficient, envy-free, and stable. Proportionality is impossible to calculate because knowing how much more each winning bidder would have paid is unlikely – something the bidders might not even know themselves. Nobody has to decide in advance how much to bid on an item. Unequal entitlements are possible. It minimizes bickering and bitterness, reduces time wasted in trying to reach a solution, and is easy to understand, and many find auctions enjoyable.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts
- ▶ Independent Commissions and Peace Settlements
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

Brams, S., & Taylor, A. (1996). Fair division: From cake cutting to dispute resolution. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.
 Nash, J. (1950). The bargaining problem. Econometrica, 18, 155–162.

Famine

- ▶ Conflict and Hunger

Favelas

► Urban Violence and Crime

Female Combatants and Peacebuilding

Niall Gilmartin

School of Applied Social and Policy Sciences, Ulster University, Newtownabbey, UK

Description

Despite the pain, loss, and suffering that accompanies armed conflicts, and of course notwithstanding the stigmatized and gendered barriers to their participation as combatants, it is undeniable that women's involvement in political violence represents a way for many to exercise agency which under "normal circumstances" they could not. They therefore emerge from the aftermath of war not only as politicized and mobilized activists but also as persons who previously held positions of leadership and responsibility, representing a key but often neglected source of peacebuilding capital. Despite the centrality and importance of their postwar activism in the pursuit of peace, particularly within their own communities, combatant women constitute a group of peacebuilders that are consistently marginalized, overlooked, and undervalued. Drawing upon theoretical and empirical works, this entry highlights several important issues. Firstly, that peace processes are as gendered as wars. Certainly, from the perspectives of former female combatants, the transition from war to peace and the accompanying rhetoric of equality and rights tends to mask the reconstruction of patriarchal power. Second, there is a pressing need not only to recognize but fundamentally address the eclectic range of barriers that combatant women face in the aftermath of armed conflict. Finally, rather than focusing on "demobilizing" female combatants, it is necessary to consolidate their agency and activism by seeking out their involvement in process of conflict transformation as agentic and competent peacebuilders.

Introduction

Despite the ill-informed and long-standing conflation of women with peace and peacefulness within mainstream narratives, there is now a relatively sizable amount of feminist research documenting women's role as armed activists during armed conflict. These significant studies challenged the dichotomies of male/violence and female/peace, demonstrated women's politicization and mobilization, examined women's motivations and experiences, and defied the notion that women and political violence are somehow mutually exclusive (for example, see Henshaw 2017; Lorentzen and Turpin 1998; Sjoberg and Gentry 2007). Despite the pain, loss, and suffering that accompanies armed conflicts, and of course notwithstanding the stigmatized and gendered barriers to their participation as combatants, it is undeniable that women's involvement in political violence represents a way for many to exercise agency which under "normal circumstances" they could not. Combatant women therefore emerge from the aftermath of war not only as politicized and mobilized activists but also as persons who previously held positions of leadership and responsibility. While the passage of United Nations SCR 1325 in October 2000 acknowledged women's roles as combatants, the resulting "Women, Peace and Security" agenda over the course of the last two decades has largely overlooked the peacebuilding agency and capabilities of combatant women. Despite the centrality and importance of their postwar activism in the pursuit of peace, particularly within their own communities, combatant women constitute a group of peacebuilders that are consistently marginalized, overlooked, and undervalued.

(Re)Defining Peace and Peacebuilding

The principal concern of those charged with devising a new "post-conflict" landscape are issues such as state security, sovereignty, law and order, democratic governance, and functioning capitalist economies. The establishment and delivery of such approaches requires a political, cultural, and discursive framework that legitimizes this “negative peace,” that being the absence of military violence, and recasting it as universally beneficial for all. The power of those who propagate the ending of armed actions as signifying “post-conflict” resides in their capacity to normalize all other forms of violence that do not sit within the narrow confines of physical violence. Traditional approaches to war, peace, and security, as embodied by the dominant schools of realism and liberalism, seek to analytically differentiate armed conflict from everyday violence through cultural and discursive representation of war as something exceptional and a source of insecurity for all. The construction of meaning with regards to war not only solidifies its privileged status as an exceptional and therefore paramount existential source of insecurity; in doing so, it diminishes the meaning associated with other forms of violence as less important.

Feminist scholars, among others, have long taken issue with the apparent orthodoxy that pervades these conventional tropes and practices. While prevailing forms of peace and peacebuilding are delineated as universally beneficial for all, evidence from postwar societies around the world demonstrates a continuity of violence for women, with many also facing new forms of violence. A vast body of work documenting the many instances of violence against women in the aftermath (and, of course, during) war challenges the prevailing discourse of “post-conflict” or a “return to normal” (Pillay 2001). Female insecurity and exposure to various acts of violence during the so-called “peace time” indicates the androcentric bias within mainstream conflict resolution processes, particularly levels of gender-based and sexual violence, which remain high, and in many instances increase exponentially in the aftermath of wartime violence (Handrahan 2004). “Post-conflict” is therefore reconceptualized by feminists as a period of continued violence and insecurity for women (McLeod 2011, p. 599), where they remain socially, politically, and economically marginalized, and exposed to various forms of physical violence, which paradoxically appears to increase in the aftermath of war (Cockburn 2013; Karam 2001).

A common distinctive characteristic of feminist visions of peace is the consensus that peace is not merely the absence of “conventional violence” but is a broader tackling of all forms of violence and discrimination (Anderlini 2007; Karam 2001; Pankhurst 2008; Porter 2007). Of importance to feminists is the work of Johan Galtung (1969) and John-Paul Lederach (1997), which distinguished between a “negative” and a “positive” peace. While the former adheres strictly to conventional ideas around ending armed conflict, the latter encompasses structures and cultures of violence which pervade the so-called postwar peace. Structural violence exists when people suffer or die because of economic or social structures, not because of direct, physical violence (Galtung 1969). In many respects, the emphasis on social justice provides a theoretical link between women’s pursuit of peace and their struggle for emancipation, arguing that a genuine peace “is the antithesis of exploitation, marginalisation, and oppression. Ending discrimination against women and achieving peace are mutually interdependent, virtually inseparable goals” (Reardon 1993, p. 71).

Oliver Richmond reminds us that peace processes, peacebuilding, and state building are intensely political processes which represent a contestation over resources, needs, and rights (2013, p. 68). He contends that peacebuilding approaches need to recognize where oppression has arisen, whether from local political, social, or economic systems. The negotiation between macro, international peace interventions and localized, micro forms of peacebuilding requires us to be cognizant of the need for local ownership, identity, custom, need, and aspiration to shape a peace project in each specific context (see chapter ► “Everyday Peace”). Given the heterogenous and often contested nature of peace, there is a need to transcend dominant forms of liberal peacebuilding which deliver a peace that serves the interests of the international order, and instead, focus on localized visions and practices of peace. A critical understanding of peacebuilding is attentive to allowing space for local actors and agency to shape a peace of their own making (Aggestam and Björkdahl 2013).

Women, War, and Peace

The universalizing tendencies within conventional approaches to war and peace typically homogenize women as a unitary group while simultaneously positioning them as “outsiders” to the conflict. Such approaches assume they are neither representatives of warring parties nor members of other groups involved in war (Jansson and Eduards 2016, p. 7). These tropes typically find clear expression in the persistent conflation of women with peace and/or victimhood, so much so that the “women and peace” hypothesis remains a dominant conceptual frame in which the role of gender in conflict zones is analyzed (Aharoni 2017). While women’s pursuit of peace and non-violence creates spaces for mobilization, activism, and the pursuit of social justice, theoretically the idea that shared gender indicates a shared meaning of peace is highly problematic. It neglects the historical and cultural specificities that shape women’s identities, needs, and interests and assumes that women primarily interpret or construct their political identities in a one-dimensional way, that being through gender, without taking seriously their ethnic, national, and racial identities. The deliberate positioning of women as “outsiders” to the conflict is premised on a myth that women do not have an interest or stake in ethno-national politics. If gender and women are both generally positioned as “outsiders” to mainstream accounts of war and peace, then combatant women are undoubtedly the “outsiders’ outsider” (Gilmartin 2018, p. 15). Therefore, examining the postwar lives of former female combatants not only challenges the reductive dualism of warring male and peaceful female but also yields significant new insights into their overlooked peacebuilding capabilities.

Notwithstanding, a burgeoning body of work on combatant women has documented the myriad of ways in which they continue their struggles for peace, justice, and security long after the weapons of war have fallen silent. The overriding focus for many of these scholarly excavations however, has been women’s exclusions and experiences of demilitarization, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR) programs (Anderlini 2007) (see chapter ▶ “Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR)”). While such explorations offer incredibly rich and important insights into the gendered and often patriarchal assumption and exclusions underpinning such programs, they also tend to implicitly (and unintentionally) re-establish a link between women and victimhood. While DDR is an important part of the story concerning female combatants and conflict transition, focusing solely on their “demobilization” as armed fighters neglects the ways in which combatant women use consolidated gains from wartime experiences to organize politically in conflict transition. In other words, we need to look beyond the “demobilization” moment of combatant women and take seriously their capacity, activism, and skills for peacebuilding.

Combatants as Peacebuilders: A Contradiction?

Given that they defy the gender stereotypes, the idea of associating women of combat with peace or peacebuilding may appear to represent something of an anomaly. An examination from a burgeoning body of global research on the postwar lives of female combatants, however, suggest that combatant women and peacebuilding are not mutually exclusive. Furthermore, endeavors to disassociate female combatants from peacebuilding serve to augment and underscore erroneous gender tropes regarding “men’s violence” and “women’s peacefulness.” Peace from the perspectives of combatant women particularly those in liberation/nationalism from below movements typically conceptualizes peace and security in multidimensional and sometimes overlapping ways. Combatant women’s acquisition of political consciousness and revolutionary mobilization can and at times does nurture a feminist and often socialist standpoint that transcends their political objectives beyond nationalism and nation-building.

In Palestine and Israel, Aharoni (2017) finds that women’s vision of peace is invariably shaped by structural conditions, economic vulnerability, and ethnic discrimination (see chapter ► “Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT)”). Women’s experiences of war, their ethno-national identities, class position, and, of course, their gendered lives determine their visions of peace and security. In her research on combatant women in El Salvador and Colombia, Luisa Ortega (2015) contends that female ex-combatants tend to have broad conceptual understandings of peace as not simply the ending of armed hostilities but with processes of political and social transformation. There, ex-combatants spoke of human rights, corruptions, gender, ethnic and class discrimination, reproductive rights, and gay rights. Like nationalist women active in other regions such as Palestine (Farr 2011) and Iraq (Gibbings 2011), republican women active in the Irish Republican army (IRA) in Northern Ireland describe a postwar landscape enmeshed in various forms of violence, oppression, and insecurity. While the 1998 Good Friday Agreement (GFA) has and continues to draw plaudits both nationally and internationally as a model of conflict resolution, and its unambiguous commitments to gender equality and the promotion of women within the text of the 1998 peace accord, the postwar period has brought an increase in other forms of violence including gender-based violence, homophobic attacks, the crippling effects of neoliberal austerity, and the continuing struggle for women’s reproductive rights. Republican women’s postwar struggle for the betterment of their communities today represents a continuity of political consciousness stemming from their wartime experiences of injustice (Gilmartin 2015, 2018). As former combatant women, their plural understandings of violence – physical, direct, cultural, and structural – is central to understanding the links between postwar sources of insecurity and the demonstrable capacity of combatant women to recognize, root out, and resist these ubiquitous forms of violence. In other words, the experiences and practices of armed conflict cultivate a political consciousness that does not simply “demobilize” alongside the ending of armed actions. On the contrary, their wartime activism and high degree of agency mutates from practices of armed struggle to practices of peacebuilding, that being the pursuit of social justice, equality, and the removal of all sources of insecurity.

Mobilized Resources for Peacebuilding: International Perspectives

The overwhelming consensus among the body of research pertaining to combatant women in the aftermath of armed conflict signifies several important issues. First, levels of political consciousness and activism among combatant women does not “demobilize” or end with cessations of military violence. Second, their “postwar” pursuit of peace across several outlets including electoral politics or grassroots organizing is informed by the pursuit of social justice and a “positive peace” on behalf of a defined community. In postwar El Salvador and Colombia, former combatant women’s organizations transformed into women’s NGOs and firmly embedded themselves in the wider women’s movement, specializing as service providers and capacity builders to install gender-sensitive approaches in the Attorney Generals Office and the Ministry of Education (Ortega 2015). Female Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN) members in postwar El Salvador re-energized their semiautonomous activism during conflict transition period to ensure women’s demands were visible (Luciak 1999, p. 48). Las Mèlidas, a feminist organization formed in 1992 after the Peace Accords were signed, began with women who came from the Popular Liberation Forces, one of the political-military forces that made up the FMLN. Like many combatant women’s organizations, Las Mèlidas advocated and agitated around issues beyond their immediate combatant identities and were instrumental in working for women experiencing poverty and exclusion, lesbian and sex workers, promoting sexual and reproductive rights, as well as campaigning for women’s empowerment, citizenship, and political rights. The Colectivo de Mujeres Excombatientes in Colombia, a group of former female combatants from a range of insurgent groups, have successfully drawn public attention to the importance of women’s peace agenda while campaigning for economic, social, political, and cultural rights. The postwar period in Nicaragua witnessed significant advancements for women there due to the formation of AMNLAE, a mass-based women's popular organization that ran in parallel to other Sandinista organizations. To consolidate these successes, Chinchilla advocates for vigorous grassroots pressure as well as international solidarity and links to other feminist groups in post-conflict (1990, p. 393). A common trend across case-studies of female combatants and nationalist women in Latin America is their visions of women's rights as something far more than participation in formal politics. Issues of health care, education, childcare, gender-based violence, struggle against sexism, the burden of unpaid domestic labor are all consistently cited as barriers to women's emancipation (Chinchilla 1990).

In northern Uganda, former Lord's Resistance Army (LRA) fighters established and maintained community projects supporting other "girl mothers," providing counselling and care for these former abductees and their children, as well as foster cross-community reconciliation work (Anderlini 2007). In South Africa, the main anti-apartheid movement, the African National Congress (hereafter the ANC) women organized in semiautonomous groups to pursue women's rights alongside the anti-apartheid struggle agenda, broadening the political agenda of the ANC. Many of these demands resided in the immediacy of the State's failure to provide basic resources. The feminist demands that emerge within the ANC in the early 1990s and throughout the transition emanated not from the few at a leadership level but from the grassroots popular base from which the ANC draws its support (Seidman 1993, p. 315). The pressure to question male control in the transition comes from women who have organized independently or semi-autonomously, and who clearly insist that their gender-specific needs be addressed alongside the national question (Axelsson 2015; Seidman 1993, p. 315).

Field research from Palestine also reveals a distinct trend of regression as institutional politics re-emerges in the years following the 1993 Oslo Accord. The gendered political structures of the Palestinian Authority (PA) presented restrictions and limitations for Palestinian women. While operating to resist ongoing Israeli aggression, Palestinian women also face the constraints of conservative gender ideologies within their own movement (Farr 2011, p. 545). Palestinian women channel their energies into all aspects of women's lives including health, education, legal literacy, income generation, advocacy of rights, among others. Such activism has increased women's role in public life and to some extent has challenged patriarchal control, helping Palestinians understand the interconnections between public, militarized violence, and violence in the home (Farr 2011, p. 545). Most practically, "they argue that the gap between where ordinary people find themselves and where politicians focus is so significant that nothing decided at the top will have meaning when attempts are made to apply it on the ground" (Farr 2011, p. 546). Considering this, women's autonomous organizing in the face of postwar patriarchal barriers offers women the best site and opportunities for continuing their political struggle (Richter-Devroe 2012). The case of Palestinian women demonstrates that different groups of women live different experiences and wage their struggle for emancipation and peace according to their location and needs (Abdulahadi 1998, p. 669).

In El Salvador, an initial reading of the post-conflict moment indicates that most female combatants within the FMLN returned to "civilian life." Barriers to women's meaningful participation in postwar recovery and transitional processes are equally as potent and ubiquitous as those present during war. In the aftermath of armed actions, combatant women, deemed to have transgressed traditional gender roles, face multiple barriers to continued political activism, including stigma, taboo, resurrection of traditional gender expectations, marginalization, shame, among others for having seemingly transgressed their traditional gender role (Anderlini 2007). In addition are other practical matters such as war fatigue and lack of childcare. It is therefore understandable that some wish to and do return pre-conflict roles, shedding their former roles and lives as fighters. The reality for many former combatant women is that the skills and competency acquired during their conflict enabled them to contribute significantly to the development of their communities. Drawing upon the networks forged during the conflict, combatant women were instrumental in the development of community-based organizations providing education, training, and health care (Anderlini 2007). While the comparative case-studies are diverse, the primary underlying commonality is that first, combatant women have the consciousness to recognize postwar violence, insecurity, oppression, and injustice in its many forms and complexions, and second, they have the experience of exerting agency for social change and therefore ideally situated to tackle it. Sanam Naraghi Anderlini contends that increased recognition and support for female ex-combatants who are pushing for peace both within their respective movements and within their communities would be an efficient future use of social and financial resources (2007, p. 105).

Summary

Feminist scholarly encounters with female combatants have increased steadily over the last two decades or more, offering new insights and understandings of women, conflict and peace from their unique perspectives. This direction in feminist research points to several important issues that warrant future attention. Firstly, there is a pressing need not only to recognize but fundamentally address the eclectic range of barriers that combatant women face in the aftermath of armed conflict. Second, rather than “demobilizing” female combatants, it is necessary to consolidate their agency and activism by seeking out their involvement in process of conflict transformation as agentic and competent peacebuilders across a range of multiple post-conflict settings. Finally, the complex relationship between gender, nationalism, and non-state military movements offers a nascent avenue of future scholarly inquiry. The eclectic postwar experiences among former female combatants defy the tropes which suggest a return to “pre-conflict” roles as dominant masculinity once again reasserts itself as military actions cease. This means attention not only to the consequences of post-conflict but also the enhancing peacebuilding capacity and consciousness of combatant women.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Women’s Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

References

- Abdulhadi, R. (1998). The Palestinian women’s autonomous movement: Emergence, dynamics and challenges. Gender and Society, 12(6), 649–673.
- Aggestam, K., & Björkdahl, A. (Eds.). (2013). Rethinking peacebuilding. The quest for just peace in the Middle East and Western Balkans. London/New York: Routledge.
- Aharoni, S. B. (2017). Who needs the women and peace hypothesis? Rethinking modes of inquiry on gender and conflict in Israel/Palestine. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 19(3), 311–326. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2016.1237457>
- Anderlini, S. N. (2007). Women building peace: What they do, why it matters. Boulder/London: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Axelsson, S. (2015). Gendered struggle for freedom: A narrative inquiry into female ex-combatants in South Africa. In S. Shekhawat (Ed.), Female combatants in conflict and peace (pp. 167–184). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Chinchilla, N. S. (1990). Revolutionary popular feminism in Nicaragua: Articulating class, gender, and national sovereignty. Gender and Security, 4, 370–397.
- Cockburn, C. (2013). A movement stalled: Outcomes of women’s campaign for equalities and inclusion in the Northern Ireland peace process. Interface: A Journal for and About Social Movements, 5(1), 151–182.
- Farr, V. (2011). UNSCR 1325 and women’s peace activism in the occupied Palestinian territory. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 539–556.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6, 167–191.
- Gibbins, S. L. (2011). No angry women at the United Nations: Political dreams and the cultural politics of United Nations Security Resolution 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 522–538.

- Gilmartin, N. (2015). Negotiating new roles?: Irish republican women and the politics of conflict transformation. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 17(1), 58–76.
- Gilmartin, N. (2018). Female combatants after armed struggle: Lost in transition? London/New York: Routledge.
- Handrahan, L. (2004). Conflict, gender, ethnicity and post-conflict reconstruction. Security Dialogue, 35(4), 429–445.
- Henshaw, A. (2017). Why women rebel. Understanding women's participation in armed rebel groups. London/New York: Routledge.
- Jansson, M., & Eduards, M. (2016). The politics of gender in the UN security council resolutions on women, peace and security. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 18(4), 241–261.
- Karam, A. (2001). Women in war and peace-building. International Journal of Feminist Politics, 3(1), 2–25.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Lorentzen, L. A., & Turpin, J. (Eds.). (1998). The women and war reader. New York: New York University.
- Luciak, I. A. (1999). Gender equality in the Salvadoran transition. Latin American Perspectives, 26, 43–67.
- McLeod, L. (2011). Configurations of post-conflict: Impacts of representations of conflict and post-conflict upon the (political) translations of gender security within UNSCR 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 594–611.
- Ortega, L. (2015). Untapped resources for peace: A comparative study of women's organisation of guerrilla ex-combatants in Colombia and El Salvador. In S. Shekhawat (Ed.), Female combatants in conflict and peace (pp. 232–249). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Pankhurst, D. (2008). Introduction: Gendered war and peace. In D. Pankhurst (Ed.), Gendered peace: Women's struggles for post-war justice and reconciliation (pp. 1–31). New York: Routledge.
- Pillay, A. (2001). Violence against women in the aftermath. In S. Meintjes, A. Pillay, & M. Turshen (Eds.), The aftermath: Women in post-conflict transformation (pp. 35–45). New York: Zed Books.
- Porter, E. (2007). Peacebuilding: Women in international perspective. London/New York: Routledge.
- Reardon, B. A. (1993). Women and peace: Feminist visions of global security. New York: State of New York University Press.
- Richmond, O. (2013). From peacebuilding as resistance to peacebuilding as liberation. In K. Aggestam & A. Björkdahl (Eds.), Rethinking peacebuilding. The quest for just peace in the Middle East and Western Balkans (pp. 64–77). London/New York: Routledge.
- Richter-Devroe, S. (2012). Defending their land, protecting their men. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 14(2), 181–201.
- Seidman, G. (1993). No freedom without the women: Mobilization and gender in South Africa, 1970–1992.

Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 18(2), 291–320.

- Sjoberg, L., & Gentry, C. (2007). Mothers, monsters, whores. London/New York: Zed Books.

Female Peacekeepers – Gender Balance in Peace Operations

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Feminism

- ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research

Feminist

- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding

Feminist Agenda in the Cypriot Peace Negotiations

- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

Feminist Foreign Policy

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Feminist Peace Activism

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Feminist Peace Research

Annick T. R. Wibben¹ and Amanda E. Donahoe²

¹War Studies, Swedish Defence University, Stockholm, Sweden

²History and Political Science, Centenary College of Louisiana, Shreveport, LA, USA

Synonyms

Class; Critical Theories; Emancipatory; Epistemic Violence; Everyday; Gender; Grassroots; Intersectional; Justice; Kashmir; Local; Margins; Normative; Northern Ireland; Oppression; Patriarchy; Positive Peace; Power Structures; Race; Sexuality; Standpoint Theory; Transdisciplinary; Transnational; Transversal Politics

Summary (Definition)

This chapter introduces the reader to feminist peace research whose analysis of the gendered continuum of violence offers key insights to the field of peace and conflict studies. Feminist thinkers have long worked with an understanding that violence and peace occur along continua that span multiple levels of analysis; they explore instances of peace- and war-making at the international level as well as at the state, group, and interpersonal levels. The approach of feminist peace research recognizes the importance of analyzing gender – but also sexuality, race, class, and other relations – as power structures within any given empirical setting. The orientation of feminist peace research is explicitly normative putting the transformation of gendered power relations at the center of peaceful societies. As this chapter outlines, adopting a feminist approach to peace research fundamentally challenges not just what peace means but also how one should research it.

Introduction

Scholars and activists unfamiliar with feminist approaches might think of familiar themes of women and peace, when they hear about feminist peace research. Studying women's involvements in peace movements and their work as peace-makers in their homes and communities is an important part of the larger research area but, as is outlined below, feminist peace research has a much broader agenda and offers key insights to the whole field of peace and conflict studies.

In terms of its scope, feminist peace research (hereafter FPR) is concerned not just with spectacular instances of violence, such as the event of war, but considers the everyday as a key site of concern (see chapter ► “Everyday Peace”). Feminist thinkers have long implicitly (if not explicitly) worked with an understanding that violence and peace are gendered and that they occur along continua, an interconnected series of instances that share a fundamental quality (see, e.g., Donahoe 2019). For example, war is clearly a type of spectacular violence that affects men and women differently, but feminist scholars extend their concern to everyday violences such as domestic abuse or bullying of trans-community members. Violence occurs at these sites and so too can peace. The scope of FPR is therefore multi-level, exploring spectacular instances of peace-making at the international level as well as instances at the state, group, and interpersonal levels.

As Wibben et al. have argued, FPR aims to be “transdisciplinary, intersectional, normative, and transnational [which] challenge[s] disciplinary (and other) boundary-making, allowing for conceptual and methodological cross-pollination to occur” (2019, p. 86). What is more, “as a feminist endeavor, feminist peace research necessarily analyses gender, sexuality, race, and class relations as power structures within any given empirical setting” (ibid., p. 87). Feminism and peace research are each grounded by an explicitly normative agenda: gender equality for feminism, a world without violence for peace research. As Catia Confortini has argued convincingly, “[a]t the most elementary level, then, [FPR] integrates these two normative goals into an axiology of transformation of gender relations as a constitutive element of peaceful societies” (in Wibben et al. 2019, p. 88). Adopting a feminist approach to peace research fundamentally challenges what peace means and proposes different ways of studying it. In what follows, therefore, this chapter discusses feminist peace research by talking about each element: (1) feminism; (2) peace; and (3) research in turn, before turning to a (small) illustrative case study on Northern Ireland to show what this means in practice.

Feminism

Feminism, besides describing a form of activism, refers to a set of critical theories that interrogate power structures, mainly (but not exclusively) through the lens of gender. Due to its long histories and multiple sites of origin, it is not monolithic, being more accurately described as feminisms, multiple. While liberal, equality feminisms have often dominated mainstream understandings of feminist thought, it is the work of scholars whose experiences from the margins of (global) society illuminate about how the center functions that is emphasized here. These scholars teach that patterns of (gender) subordination intersect across dimensions of ability, class, caste, ethnicity, indigeneity, race, religion, sexuality, and more (see Agathangelou and Ling 2009; Chowdry and Nair 2004; Crenshaw 1991; Collins 2000; hooks 1984; Kirk and Okazawa-Rey 2020; Mohanty 1984; Tuhiwai-Smith 2012, and chapter “► Intersectionality and Peace,” this volume). These intersections compound injustice among vulnerable populations and, Patricia Hill-Collins notes, “regardless of the particular intersections involved, structural, disciplinary, hegemonic, and interpersonal domains of power reappear across quite different forms of oppression” (2000, p. 18).

Feminisms are inherently normative: seeking not only to analyze and critique unjust gender structures but to develop emancipatory alternatives to them. While feminist scholars and activists emerge in a variety of locations and address specific grievances, they are united by the shared goal of gender justice. “Feminism is about liberation from gender discrimination and other forms of oppression,” as Gwen Kirk and Margo Okazawa-Rey (2020, p. 2) argue. For intersectional feminists the struggles against any particular form of oppression can never be divorced from other struggles for justice. What this means in any specific case depends on the grievance being addressed. While gender oppression is a global phenomenon, it manifests in particular ways in different sites.

María Lugones and Elizabeth Spelman’s (1983) discussion of the demand for “the woman’s voice” – singular – in feminist theory and activism illustrates this issue nicely. Rather than attempt to capture “the woman’s voice,” they suggest that the purpose of theory should be to be “helpful, illuminating, empowering, respectful” (Lugones and Spelman 1983, p. 578). For them, “a theory that is respectful about those about whom it is a theory will not assume that changes that are perceived as making life better for some women are changes that will make, and will be perceived as making life better for other women” (ibid., p. 579). It is not possible, therefore, to devise one feminist agenda that fits all (women, queers, trans), because “our visions of what is better are always informed by our perception of what is bad about our present situation” (Lugones and Spelman 1983, p. 579). Indeed, “how we think and what we think about does depend in large part on who is there - not to mention who is expected or encouraged to speak” (ibid.). This is crucial because “oppression works through systems of power and inequality, including the dominance of certain values, beliefs and assumptions about people and how society should be organized” (Kirk and Okazawa-Rey 2020, p. 14) – those whose values dominate often fail to recognize their privilege and how it facilitates the ease with which they move in (global) society. It is only by centering those on the margins and by encouraging and valuing a wide variety of perspectives that scholars and activists get better at challenging all forms of oppression – hence the importance of focusing on feminist knowledges from the margins.

Feminist scholarship is also always transdisciplinary and transnational – not only has it developed across a wide variety of places and spaces, but since gender oppression is global (even as it expresses itself locally), resistance to it must be global (and local at the same time). This involves difficult conversations and has led to the need to challenge simplistic notions of global sisterhood and “the image of a deracialized universal woman” (Falcón 2016, p. 12). Hence, Barbara Smith’s early challenge for feminist politics is key: “What I really feel is radical is trying to make coalitions with people who are different from you. I feel it is radical to be dealing with race and sex and class and sexual identity all at one time” (Smith 1981, quoted in Collins 2000, p. 233). This also implies to “listen seriously to the concerns, fears, and agendas of those one is unaccustomed to heeding when building social theory, taking on board, rather than dismissing” (Sylvester 1994, p. 317).

Transversal politics (developed mainly by Yuval-Davis, see, e.g., 1994, 2006) is one way of capturing intersectionalities and problematizing assumptions of homogeneity as well as of universality. It is based on a recognition that position, identity, and values are not the same and are not necessarily co-located: Members of the same identity group, for example, can be differently positioned (in terms of, e.g., class, race, ability, life-stage, etc.), while, at the same time, similar positioning may not result in similar (social, cultural, economic, political, etc.) values. Like feminist standpoint theory, transversal politics recognizes the importance of point of view while also complicating the understanding of a standpoint by recognizing its shifting, unfinished character. Importantly, it emphasizes difference not in opposition to equality, but rather as making justice possible by acknowledging power differentials entailed in varied positionalities. It is the contention of FPR scholars that only by drawing on multiple feminist insights, while consistently interrogating their limits and their unfinished character, FPR scholarship can remain “true to feminist methodological and political commitments and to continual, radical, and deliberate critique, allowing for only temporal resting points” (Wibben 2011, p. 114).

Peace

As Betty Reardon (1993, p. 6) explains, “peace is a social environment that favors the full development of the human person.” While much traditional scholarship reads the human as either male (such as in the tradition of “natural man” described by Thomas Hobbes in the Leviathan) or as neutral (where a human person could be any or no gender), feminist explorations of the human point to a number of crucial limitations with these accounts. For example, Natashia Marhia points to the importance of interrogating “how the ‘human’ has historically been constructed as an exclusionary – and fundamentally gendered – category” (2013, p. 19). This particular construction of the human in the “liberal humanist, normative intellectual heritage” (ibid., p. 20) underpins the human development and the human rights discourses, all of which have been criticized by feminists for their emphasis on individual capabilities without considering often conflicting needs of the group, side-stepping the need for one’s humanity to be recognized and valued by others, and a tendency to universalize an a priori understanding of what it means to be fully human. As Marhia (2013, p. 32, citing Butler and Robinson) concludes, “in order to address the uneven global distribution of embodied vulnerabilities [our understanding of the human] must also include ‘the social relations that mediate human life in ways that ensure its quality and flourishing.’”

Consequently, if peace is a social environment that favors the full development of the human person, then violence is that which interrupts human development or the social environment in which it thrives. In order to build peace, one must “endeavor to achieve... humane and equitable global social conditions” (Reardon 1993, p. 5) – and FPR points toward the ways in which intersecting oppressions shape these conditions, opening up “other ways to make grievances known” (Vellacott 2008, p. 203). Otherwise this “peace” (often referred to as negative peace) continues to be shaped by varied forms of violence, many of which are continuous with violence during war and whose effects are gendered, raced, classed, and more. Conditions of peace must occur across multiple levels, across all the sites in which human development takes place and can be interrupted with violence. “FPR understands peace as dynamic (Vellacott 2008) and constantly in the making, a process laying the foundations for relationships of mutuality within “multiple worlds” (Ling 2014)” (Wibben et al. 2019, p. 87).

In their recent article on feminist peace research, Annick Wibben et al. (2019, p. 87) propose that a key contribution of FPR is that it “not only provides insights into what can be termed ‘spectacular’ instances of violence but also sharpens our analysis of the everydayness and possibilities of peaceful coexistence and conflict transformation and prevention.” Identifying the everyday as an additional key site of analysis has a number of implications for feminist conceptions of peace. Most importantly, such a focus grounds feminist peace in human experience, which allows the researcher to pay attention to intersecting forms of oppression, rather than what Choi (forthcoming) refers to as the “established institutionalized language of states.”

This focus on everyday experiences of peace (and war) requires “paying attention [at] the level of the interpersonal and intercorporeal” (Wibben et al. 2019, p. 87) and moves FPR past the peace/war dichotomy, to identify the ways in which various violences may simultaneously overlap with various spaces of peace. “Formal peace can be negotiated in the state house while domestic violence continues in the family house” (Donahoe 2019, p. 88). A country supposedly at peace with its neighbors may suffer domestic crime, poverty, and racism and be lacking health care and education; a state’s citizens may exercise civil liberties at the same time as indigenous rights continue to be stripped away. Researching these issues from the margins shifts the focus to ongoing violences, leading FPR scholars to note how each of these injustices maintain and invite violence into the lives of many. From this vantage point, “peace is never a return to normality when life before the war was already in a shape of war for certain gendered, sexualized and variously othered bodies and lives” (Choi forthcoming). Feminist scholars have often referred to this phenomenon as the continuum of violence that spans war and peace as well as the multiplicity of sites associated with them (e.g., Cockburn 2004; Enloe 2004; Kelly 1987; Reardon 1993).

Caroline Moser (2001) pointed out that thinking about violence as a continuum provides an heuristic to identify the ways in which types of violence are linked and reinforce each other. Paying attention to this continuum, argues Sanam Roohi, “can make us aware of insidious forms of violence that hinder peace or the promise of peace” (in Wibben et al. 2019, p. 92). Without such attention, she goes on, peace researchers “render opaque the everydayness of both peace negotiations and the eruption of [violent] conflict in places like Kashmir” (ibid.). Notwithstanding this (overdue) recognition, FPR argues that “feminist scholarship provides particularly located insights about how a wide range of practices and discourses - security, war, and citizenship being just three examples - are crucially gendered, sexualized expressions of patriarchal power” (Choi forthcoming).

FPR highlights peacebuilding practices along the continuum of peace beyond the spectacular as well. These practices are localized, particularistic, and bottom-up (see, e.g., McLeod 2015). A particular type of example is the people-to-people activities that are often rooted in care. As Vaittinen et al. (2019, p. 3) argue “care, and the gendered power relations that go with it, cut through social practices in all contexts of peace and conflict. For the understanding of everyday peace, engaging with feminist theories of care is therefore crucial.” While not essentially (biologically) female, care acts tend to be interpreted as women’s work and are henceforth devalued (Ruddick 2002). This is a topic FPR scholars emphasize because traditional scholarship neglects the historical reality that traditionally gendered care work has produced skills and resources among women that are “critical not only to human survival but to human development” (Boulding 2000, pp. 108–109) and therefore peace.

Given the importance of full human development (with the feminist caveats outlined above), more attention to the politics of care is a key concern for FPR. “Everyday practices of care not only sustain life through direct acts of care-giving, but in various gendered ways involving caring human beings they also sustain and help to build trust among and within communities” (Vaittinen et al. 2019, p. 3). Care, whether for children, elders, or the community at large, the rhythm of daily life with its rituals and celebrations that build trust, along with other everyday acts form cultures of peace (Boulding 2000) and amount to what Donahoe (2017, p. 2) terms slow peace because of the ways in which it is often banal, dispersed both across time and space rather than spectacular, and a process of accretion. From an FPR perspective, at each level of peacebuilding, whether international and spectacular, driven by formal practices or local, slow, everyday practices, peace is the ongoing challenge to create and sustain environments in which human beings thrive.

Research

The previous two sections introduced the reader to intersectional feminism and then outlined how a focus on the everyday, as a key site for peace research, stretches the definition not just of what peace might be but also where insights might be found. This third section turns to how these insights shape feminist research on peace. Since FPR “is prefigurative of feminist peace [...] we are committed to ask at every step of our research process the following question: how does my research contribute to human flourishing, gender justice, and a gender-informed positive peace?” (Confortini in Wibben et al. 2019, p. 88). This question is at the heart of feminist research in peace and conflict studies, even if it might not always be perfectly executed.

It is also important to note that “most writing that explicitly locates itself as part of the feminist tradition takes a political stance, but not all scholars that research women (or gender) do so [some work uses] gender only as a variable or takes an essentialist view of gender” (Wibben 2016a, p. 2). Feminist peace research, especially as it is currently being revitalized through efforts such as the Feminist Peace Research Network, takes a more explicitly intersectional feminist approach as outlined above. While some scholars “specifically anchor the discussion by building knowledge on the basis of women’s experiences [...] others engage more broadly with feminist insights, even studying the experiences of men rather than of women” (Wibben 2016a, p. 2). Importantly, while social science often requires that “we have to think about women as a group—and of the structures that make it necessary to think of them as such and that also affect their everyday lives—we also need to pay attention to the ways in which individual women are situated in varied contexts which shape not only their experience, but also how they identify themselves and make sense of their lives” (Wibben 2016a, p. 3). As such, much of FPR is transversal, paying attention to a variety of perspectives shaped by identities, positionalities, and values, which are in constant flux as the conversation and those involved continue to change (see also Yuval-Davis 1994).

As a critical theory, feminism approaches research methods with a keen recognition that “knowledge is for someone and for some purpose” (Cox 1981, p. 128). Hence a feminist understanding of the continuum of violence includes attention to epistemic violence, the term developed by Gayatri Spivak to describe the “type of violence that attempts to eliminate knowledge possessed by marginal subjects” (Dotson 2011, p. 236). The critique inherent in the term “epistemic violence” is that knowledge can function as a form of domination when it is designed and applied to silence the “colonial other” (Spivak 1994, pp. 24–25; see also Chowdry and Nair 2004; Tuhiwai-Smith 2012). While epistemic violence draws attention to how knowledge practices can silence and exclude, it is also possible for knowledge to be emancipatory by bringing awareness to patterns of shared oppressions as well as strategies for resistance. Here, feminist commitments to interrogating power structures, also as they appear in how research is conducted, what counts as knowledge, and who is allowed to participate in the conversations and to set its frame (Lugones and Spelman 1983), are crucial.

Feminist peace scholars have long been concerned with examining power: Almost 50 years ago, in 1972, Berenice Carroll challenged peace research's "cult of power" and Judith Stiehm's explored nonviolent power. They and other scholars have pointed out there are many ways to think of power. More recently, Jo Rowlands (1997) proposed four types of power: power-over (coercion), power-to (agency), power-within (empowerment), and power-with which is both collective and collaborative. While power-to and power-within are each important formulations for feminism, the feminist research process conscientiously engages the power-with formulation which emphasizes the value of the relational. To achieve this, feminists purposefully engage across levels of analysis in order to better understand relationships between people, structures of violence, and social relations (see also Agathangelou and Ling 2009; Tickner 2001).

This is true across multiple levels of research. Feminists are often drawn to research methodologies that pay careful attention to the ways in which subjects relate to one another and interact. Feminists are also cognizant of the ways in which they as researchers relate to research participants, pursuing methodologies that require them to engage directly with the populations they study, whether through interviews or ethnographic work (see also Ackerly et al. 2006; Tuhiwai-Smith 2012). These commitments also imply that feminist scholars often engage in research that emanates from and is directly applicable to particular activist communities (of which the researcher herself might be a part). Consequently, feminists prize participatory research where they work with or alongside communities (of which the researcher might have become a part in the process or of which they were already a part), emphasizing the need for reflexivity throughout the research process (see also Wibben 2016a, b). It is no surprise then that feminist scholars value working with colleagues as co-researchers, co-authors, and members of networks, creating knowledge that serves all those involved in the project.

Accordingly feminist research ethics emphasize "a self-reflexive commitment to revisiting epistemological choices, boundaries and relationships throughout the research process" (Ackerly and True 2010, p. 38). Unlike traditional science where objectivity (supposedly) arises from a view from nowhere, "feminist objectivity means quite simply situated knowledges," writes Donna Haraway (1988, p. 581). Acknowledging that scholars are variously positioned, as transversal politics also emphasizes, and reflecting on the constraints this places on knowledge creation, makes for more accurate (objective) research. What is more, by emphasizing the "with" in their relationships with the populations they study, with colleagues, and with students, feminists privilege the relational elements of the research process: collaboration, community building, and respect for the agency of those working toward peace and toward a better understanding of peace. The knowledge garnered and created by FPR seeks to be not just illuminating but also respectful and empowering (Lugones and Spelman 1983), thus contributing to the full development of the human person. Thus, FPR as a normative endeavor contributes directly to the goal of peace.

Northern Ireland

Formal peace processes generally include elites among belligerent parties. These are rarely women. As Christine Bell and Catherine O'Rourke (2010) found, only 16% of peace agreements even reference women and only rarely do those "references illustrate good practice." The result is that those tasked with making peace are often those same men responsible for making war. The Northern Ireland peace process is an interesting exception because women were formally elected to participate in the peace process though Eilish Rooney (1995) notes that women's peacebuilding attempts here had been historically dismissed. A network of women in the community and voluntary sector organized to form the Northern Ireland Women's Coalition (the Coalition). As an "identity conflict" characterized by the sociopolitical divide between Catholics and Protestants, the three decades of political violence known as the Troubles were formally concluded by the 1998 Belfast or Good Friday Agreement (see chapters ► "Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict" and ► "Reconciliation in Northern Ireland"). The Coalition received a large enough share of votes that two of their members, Pearl Sagar (Protestant) and Monica McWilliams (Catholic), were granted seats at the all-party talks (see Aretxaga 1997; Sales 1997; Ward 2004, 2005). Women's participation in this peace process is a useful heuristic not simply for identifying ways in which women work for peace but also for exposing the ways in which peace and conflict processes are inherently gendered.

FPR analysis shows how gender operated in this case and how women contributed to the peace process in numerous ways and changed the dynamic between parties. The violence of many decades often spilt over into antagonisms and aggressive behavior between opposing parties during the peace talks. Members of the Coalition experienced this same antagonistic behavior, but what the public accepted as normal behavior between rival men looked abnormal when carried out against women. The members of the Coalition neither yielded nor returned the abuse and, instead, publicly shamed the leaders of the other parties for their bad behavior. This shifted public opinion and resulted in better interactions between all parties, allowing the space for productive discussions. It also alleviated concerns voiced publicly from numerous corners that perhaps the peace process was not a place for women (Donahoe 2017; Fearon 1999). Not only did Coalition members evidence the same capacities as their male colleagues, their engagement in the peace process challenged the gender norms of the process in its entirety and contributed positively to the final agreement.

Importantly, as members of the community and voluntary sector, the Coalition represented communities and a wide range of issues across Northern Ireland. The women's work was at the local, grassroots level, serving the everyday needs of their communities: running after school programs, education and training courses, writing grants for community centers, parks and memorials, and delivering critical information to their communities regarding unemployment and welfare. Callie Persic explains that as part of women's networks and representatives of communities, they were not committed to party politics (2004, p. 178) and posed no direct threat to the establishment. Rather than run as local candidates for office, they served as vote collectors.

This method of organizing is an example of transversal politics. Where women across Northern Ireland represented a multitude of differences in political identity, class, life stage, and other positions, they shared the political value of women's inclusion and peace according to Linda Holmgren (2014). While the Coalition did not win seats in any district nor get any individual member elected, they garnered enough votes overall to qualify for their seats at the peace talks. Their logic prioritized the needs of the communities for a cessation of violence and the recognition that those needs were unlikely to be served if the only parties at the table were the political arms of paramilitary organizations. Further the Coalition argued for and achieved the creation of the Civic Forum in the Agreement. The Civic Forum would sit in parallel to the government to ensure that the thriving community and voluntary sector which continues to employ women in the majority could continue to serve as a conduit of information to and from the government (see chapter ▶ "Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation"). As such, the Coalition strived to connect the government to the everyday needs of women and the community at large. In the first years following the peace agreement, the Civic Forum was stood down and never reinstated. The Coalition members lamented that this was a metaphor for the government, and "politics" in general, not caring for the needs of people on the ground (Donahoe 2017).

As a political party, the Coalition was short lived. May Blood, Avila Kilmurray, Bronagh Hinds, and Monica McWilliams, founding members of the Coalition with long resumes of ongoing political activism and public engagement since 1998, each stated clearly that their goal was not to create a formal political party (A Century of Women 2020). They organized "out of almost sheer badness" Avila Kilmurray described, in order to ensure that women would be represented at the peace talks (Donahoe 2017, p. 58). Monica McWilliams who continued to represent the Coalition in the Stormont government following the agreement described the Coalition as a temporary “affirmative action measure” and agreed in 2006 that it had served its purpose (Donahoe 2017, p. 74.) A common view was that the Coalition had failed and fell apart or that their mandate had diminished (Murtagh 2008, p. 37; Ashe 2012, pp. 234–235), but when read through the lens of transversal politics, a different picture emerges.

One key element of transversal politics is that coalitions are often temporary, because they are based in shifting, continually renegotiated, interests (Collins 2000; Yuval-Davis 1994). To dismiss the Coalition as a failed experiment also dismissed the purposeful and strategic work that these women did to ensure that the women of Northern Ireland would have a voice in their own peace. Additionally, in prioritizing power-with methodology, it was important to the researcher to give space in the analysis to the voices of these women who had shared their lived experience. They challenged the gender norms of political participation. As further evidence of their long-term impact, it is noteworthy that most of the political parties of Northern Ireland began putting women forward on their party lists as it was clear that the failure to run women candidates was costing them votes (Donahoe 2017, pp. 76–77).

FPR not only challenges the inherent patriarchy of peace processes that exclude women and draw attention to why women’s participation is important (O’Rourke 2014); it must also employ a feminist critique as outlined above. While religious affiliation looms large as an intersectional concern in this story (Cockburn 1998, 2010), it is often narrated without attention to the whiteness of the process. Northern Ireland is touted as a successful case of women’s inclusion and yet rarely is there mention of the silences that were maintained in the other forms of homogeneity present. One might also draw attention to the ways in which the Coalition was organized by the women listed above and others who were well-educated either through formal schooling or through professional careers. For example, their strategy required a deep understanding of the political and legal ramifications of the electoral process that was employed for the peace talks to recognize that the Coalition wouldn’t need to garner enough votes to get women elected in any single community. As noted, their strategy also worked because it did not require their members to directly compete with the larger more established political parties. The privilege of knowing how to navigate the political process helped create the space in which the Coalition operated, but it is unlikely to be replicated in other spaces.

Though the participation of the Coalition in the formal peace talks is often the focus of research on gender and peace in Northern Ireland because it is spectacular, that is only part of the story. This focus on women and peace ignores an equally interesting parallel story about women in paramilitary organizations and their direct participation in violence (see, e.g., Alison 2009 and chapter “► Female Combatants and Peacebuilding,” this volume). The spectacular story of formal peace talks also ignores the work of slow peace as actors in community development, a field dominated by women and often described as women’s work, even when undertaken by men, operate after-school programs to prevent kids from participating in riots or engaging in paramilitaries or write grants for international peace funding to operate centers for victims of domestic violence, for training and education to combat unemployment, and for physical and mental health services to combat problems with drug addiction and suicide. This less spectacular work takes place across the boundaries of the sectarian divide as women from historically opposing communities support and learn from each other (see chapter ► “Women’s Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts”). Men in Northern Ireland have been less likely to or able to cross communal lines in the same ways because for men this is more likely to be interpreted as treachery (Donahoe 2017). Community development efforts are sometimes deliberately oriented toward peace as in Women Together (Roulston and Davies 2000, p. 188), the Women’s Peace Movement (Aretxaga 1997, p. 181), or the Peace People whose founders Mairead Corrigan and Betty Williams were awarded a Nobel Peace Prize in 1977 (Fairweather et al. 1984; Edgerton 1986; Morgan 1996). Overall the varied efforts are purposeful in achieving power-with members of their own and other communities to fully develop the human person.

Key Takeaways

This chapter set out to show how taking a feminist approach to peace research has implications for the entire field: its strong normative orientation puts gender justice at the center of peaceful societies. After introducing the reader to contemporary intersectional feminisms which interrogate gendered power relations as they intersect with various additional forms of oppression, it turned to discussing implications for conceptions of peace that have long been championed by feminist peace scholars and activists (see also Väyrynen et al. forthcoming). Starting from the everyday experiences of peace and the varied types of violence that shape human lives across the peace-war continuum, feminists have paid particular attention to the corporeal and to relations of care that are fundamental to achieving gender justice and positive peace. Studying the everyday also requires strong ethical commitments, including recognition of how all (research) relations are imbued with power. Through ongoing reflexive practices, feminist scholars have developed unique practices of working with research participants and, indeed, creating new communities of knowledge and action in the process. These broader insights and commitments, including acknowledging a multiplicity of identities, positionalities, and values, are exemplified in the case study on women's involvement in the Northern Ireland peace process.

To conclude, the insights in this chapter are made possible because of a community of scholars and activists: the Feminist Peace Research Network (FPRN). The members' collective aim is to revitalize a feminist peace research tradition; one that includes not just recovered insights from the past (also beyond the one third world), but one that is truly interdisciplinary and transnational (see, e.g., Lyytikäinen et al. 2020). This is not just an intellectual endeavor; feminist scholarship provides important insights that are needed to solve current crises: from ongoing wars and the resulting refugee flows, to climate change, environmental degradation, and the resulting global health implications, to the always present but ever-increasing inequalities that shape our ability to respond in a humane manner. This chapter is one piece in the larger puzzle of making feminist contributions to peace and conflict research visible (again) and encouraging colleagues to teach them. The articles and books cited here (including a forthcoming Handbook of Feminist Peace Research, edited by Väyrynen et al.) should provide plenty of material for those interested in digging deeper.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

References

- A Century of Women. (2020). <https://www.acenturyofwomen.com/>
- Ackerly, B. A., & True, J. (2010). Doing feminist research in political and social science. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ackerly, B. A., Stern, M., & True, J. (Eds.). (2006). Feminist methodologies for international relations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Agathangelou, A., & Ling, L. H. M. (Eds.). (2009). Transforming world politics: From empire to multiple worlds. London/New York: Routledge.
- Alison, M. (2009). Women and political violence: Female combatants in ethno-national conflict. London: Routledge.
- Aretxaga, B. (1997). Shattering silence: Women, nationalism and political subjectivity in Northern Ireland. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ashe, F. (2012). Gendering war and peace: Militarized masculinities in Northern Ireland. Men and Masculinities, 15(3), 230–248.

- Bell, C., & O'Rourke, C. (2010). Peace agreements or pieces of paper? The impact of UNSC resolution 1325 on peace processes and their agreements. International and Comparative Law Quarterly, 59(04), 941–980.
- Boulding, E. (2000). Cultures of peace: The hidden side of history. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Carroll, B. (1972). Peace research: The cult of power. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 16(4), 585–616.
- Choi, S. (forthcoming). Critical feminist everyday approaches to peace. In T. Väyrynen, S. Parashar, E. Féron & C. C. Confortini (Eds.), Handbook of feminist peace research. London/New York: Routledge.
- Chowdry, G., & Nair, S. (Eds.). (2004). Power, post-colonialism and international relations: Reading race, gender and class. London/New York: Routledge.
- Cockburn, C. (1998). The space between us: Negotiating gender and national identities in conflict. London: Zed Books.
- Cockburn, C. (2004). The continuum of violence: A gender perspective on war and peace. In W. Giles & J. Hyndman (Eds.), Sites of violence: Gender and conflict zones. Berkeley, Los Angeles, London: University of California Press.
- Cockburn, C. (2010). Militarism and war. In L. J. Shepherd (Ed.), Gender matters in global politics. A feminist introduction to international relations (pp. 105–115). London: Routledge.
- Collins, P. H. (2000). Black feminist thought: Knowledge, consciousness, and the politics of empowerment (2nd ed.). London/New York: Routledge.
- Cox, R. W. (1981). Social forces, states and world orders: Beyond international relations theory. Millennium: Journal of International Studies, 10(2), 126.
- Crenshaw, K. (1991). Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of color. Stanford Law Review, 43(6), 1241–1299.
- Donahoe, A. E. (2017). Peacebuilding through women's community development: Wee women's work in Northern Ireland. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Donahoe, A. E. (2019). Feminist continua in peace and conflict studies. In A. Kulnazarova & V. Popovski (Eds.), The Palgrave handbook of global approaches to peace. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Dotson, K. (2011). Tracking epistemic violence, tracking practices of silencing. Hypatia, 26(2), 236–257.
- Edgerton, L. (1986). Public protest, domestic acquiescence: Women in Northern Ireland. In R. Ridd & H. Callaway (Eds.), Caught up in conflict: women's responses to political strife. London: Macmillan Education LTD.
- Enloe, C. (2004). The continuum of violence: A gender perspective on war and peace. In W. Giles & J. Hyndman (Eds.), Sites of violence: Gender and conflict zones. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Fairweather, E., McDonough, R., & McFadyean, M. (1984). Only the rivers run free. Northern Ireland: The women's war. London: Pluto.
- Falcón, S. M. (2016). Power interrupted: Antiracist and feminist activism inside the United Nations. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Fearon, K. (1999). Women's work: The story of the Northern Ireland Women's coalition. Belfast: The Blackstaff Press.
- Haraway, D. (1988). Situated knowledges: The science question in feminism and the privilege of partial perspective. Feminist Studies, 14(3), 575–599.
- Holmgren, L. E. (2014). Where there is dialogue, there is Hope: Nation, gender and transversal dialogue in Belfast, Northern Ireland (Working paper no. 4). Lund: Lund University.
- Hooks, B. (1984). Feminist theory: From margin to center. Boston: South End Press.
- Kelly, L. (1987). The continuum of sexual violence. In J. Hamner & M. Maynard (Eds.), Women, violence and social control. Atlantic Highlands: Humanities Press International.
- Kirk, G., & Okazawa-Rey, M. (2020). Gendered lives: Intersectional perspectives (2nd ed.). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ling, L. H. M. (2014). Imagining world politics: Sihar & Shenya, a fable for our times. London & New York: Routledge.
- Lugones, M. C., & Spelman, E. V. (1983). Have we got a theory for you! Feminist theory, cultural imperialism and the demand for 'the woman's voice. Women's Studies International Forum, 6(6), 573–581.
- Lyytikäinen, M., Yadav, P., Wibben, A. T. R., Jauhola, M., & Confortini, C. C. (2020). Unruly wives in the household of peace research: Toward feminist genealogies for peace research. Cooperation & Conflict. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836720938397>
- Marhia, N. (2013). Some humans are more human than others: Troubling the "human" in human security from a critical feminist perspective. Security Dialogue, 44(1), 19–35.
- McLeod, L. (2015). A feminist approach to hybridity: Understanding local and international interactions in producing post-conflict gender security. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 9(1), 48–69.
- Mohanty, C. T. (1984). Under western eyes: Feminist scholarship and colonial discourses. Boundary 2, 12:3–13:1, 333–358.
- Morgan, V. (1996). Peacemakers? Peacekeepers? Women in Northern Ireland 1969–1995. Londonderry: INCORE.
- Moser, C. O. N. (2001). The gendered continuum of violence and conflict. In C. O. N. Moser & F. C. Clark (Eds.), Victims, perpetrators or actors? London: Zed Books.
- Murtagh, C. (2008). A transient transition: The cultural and institutional obstacles impeding the Northern Ireland women's coalition in its progression from informal to formal politics. Irish Political Studies, 23(1), 21–40.
- O'Rourke, C. (2014). Walk[ing] the halls of power?? Understanding women's participation in international - peace and security. Melbourne Journal of International Law, 15, 128.

- Persic, C. (2004). The emergence of a gender consciousness: Women and community work in West Belfast. In L. Ryan & M. Ward (Eds.), Irish women and nationalism. Soldiers, new women and wicked hags (pp. 167–183). Dublin: Irish Academic Press.
- Reardon, B. A. (1993). Women and peace: Feminist visions of global security. Albany: State University of New York Press.
- Rooney, E. (1995). Political division, practical alliance: Problems for women in conflict. Journal of Women's History, 6/7(4/1), 40–48.
- Roulston, C., & Davies, C. (Eds.). (2000). Gender, democracy and inclusion in Northern Ireland. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Rowlands, J. (1997). Questioning empowerment: Working with women in Honduras. Oxford: Oxfam.
- Ruddick, S. (2002). Maternal thinking: Toward a politics of peace. Boston: Beacon.
- Sales, R. (1997). Women divided. Gender, religion and politics in Northern Ireland. London: Routledge.
- Spivak, G. C. (1994). Can the subaltern speak. In P. Williams & L. Chrisman (Eds.), Colonial discourse and post-colonial theory: A reader. Hertfordshire: Harvester Wheatsheaf.
- Stiehm, J. (1972). Nonviolent power: Active and passive resistance in America. Lexington: Heath Publishers.
- Sylvester, C. (1994). Empathetic cooperation: A feminist method for IR. Millennium, 23(2), 315–334.
- Tickner, J. A. (2001). Gendering world politics: Issues and approaches in the post-Cold War era. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Tuhiwai-Smith, L. (2012). Decolonizing methodologies: Research and indigenous peoples (2nd ed.). London: Zed Books.
- Vaaitinen, T., Donahoe, A. E., Kunz, R., Ómarsdóttir, S. B., & Roohi, S. (2019). Care as everyday peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 7(2), 194–209. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1588453>.
- Väyrynen, T., Parashar, S., Féron, É., & Confortini, C. C. (forthcoming). Handbook of feminist peace research. London/New York: Routledge.
- Vellacott, J. (2008). Dynamic peace and the practicality of pacifism. In T. J. Fisk & J. L. Schellenberg (Eds.), Patterns of conflict, paths of peace (pp. 202–205). Toronto: University of Toronto Press.
- Ward, M. (2004). Times of transition: Republican women, feminism and political representation. In L. Ryan & M. Ward (Eds.), Irish women and nationalism. Soldiers, new women and wicked hags (pp. 184–201). Dublin: Irish Academic Press.
- Ward, M. (2005). Gender, citizenship and the future of the Northern Ireland peace process. Éire-Ireland, 40(3 & 4), 1–22.
- Wibben, A. T. R. (2011). Feminist security studies: A narrative approach. London/New York: Routledge.
- Wibben, A. T. R. (2016a). Researching war: Feminist methods, ethics and politics. London/New York: Routledge.
- Wibben, A. T. R. (2016b). Feminist methodologies and world politics. In J. Steans & D. Tepe-Belfrage (Eds.), Handbook on gender and world politics (pp. 66–73). Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
- Wibben, A. T. R., Confortini, C. C., Roohi, S., Aharoni, S. A., Vastapuu, L., & Vaaitinen, T. (2019). Collective discussion: Piecing up feminist peace research. International Political Sociology, 13(1), 86–107. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ips/oly034>.
- Yuval-Davis, N. (1994). Women, ethnicity and empowerment: Towards transversal politics. Feminism & Psychology, 4(1), 179–197. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0959353594041010>
- Yuval-Davis, N. (2006). Human/women's rights and feminist transversal politics. In M. M. Ferree & A. M. Tripp (Eds.), Global feminism. Transnational Women's activism, organizing and human rights (pp. 275–295). New York: New York University Press.

Feminist Security Studies

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Fetial Code

- ▶ Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Fieldwork

- ▶ Reflexivity and Fieldwork in Feminist Peace Research

Fiscal Decentralization

- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention

Foreign Mediation

- ▶ Yemen Conflict

Fragile Peace Transitions

- ▶ Yemen Conflict

Fragmentation

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Freedom from Anxiety

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security

Frontier Cities

- ▶ Divided Cities

Future Peace: Digital Innovations and the International Peace Architecture

Oliver P. Richmond¹ and Gëzim Visoka²

¹University of Manchester, Department of Politics, Manchester, UK

²Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Artificial intelligence; Big data; Digital peace; Digital technologies; International peace architecture

Definition

Intellectual and policy attempts to make peace after war have recently been enthused by the implications of new data-driven possibilities and technologies. These digital approaches to peace and security offer the possibility for predicting wars and making a better quality of peace, both for researchers and policymakers. After recent failures in peacemaking, and lengthy wars since 9/11 from Afghanistan and Iraq to Syria and Yemen, it was likely that new approaches would emerge. New artificial intelligence (AI) and data-driven approaches to conflict prevention, peacekeeping, and humanitarian aid are the international community's latest hope, but they also appear to be something of a chimera. In fact, they should not be seen as anything more than an addition to the already substantial international peace architecture. This entry offers a brief overview of the emerging digital innovations and their application and potential limits for peacebuilding and conflict resolution.

Introduction

There is a familiar pattern in modern history: after every cycle of war, new innovations are required for peacemaking. Over the centuries, these innovations have built up into an international peace architecture (IPA), which has evolved different layers, tools, and techniques (see Richmond 2020a,b and 2021). The IPA has been led by US foreign policy apparatus and diplomacy, and it is embedded in the UN system via human rights and multilateralism. It is a substantial, intergenerational architecture, transcending geopolitical, social, public, and private boundaries and systems. Geopolitical balancing, intervention, liberal internationalism and law, democratization and development, peacekeeping, mediation, peacebuilding and statebuilding emerged in different epochs, each new layer and method building on the last. They respond to geopolitical, imperial, and colonial conflicts, industrial-scale and ideological warfare, wars of decolonization and self-determination, revolutions, post-socialist ethnic, tribal wars, as well as insurgency and terrorism (Richmond 2021). New artificial intelligence (AI) and data-driven approaches to conflict prevention, peacekeeping, and humanitarian aid are its latest hope, but they also appear to be something of a chimera (see Wählisch 2020).

“Future peace” is a historical term commonly used to herald new approaches. In the contemporary era, this refers to “digital peace.” However, it should not be seen as anything more than an addition to the already substantial architecture. This already spans local NGOs, networks, and social movements, to a range of state and international, political, social, economic, and security issues and apparatus to consolidate peace (Peace Direct 2020). Indeed, though it offers new capacities for peacemaking, it also introduces new risks (Karlsrud 2014).

Digital Peacemaking or Self-Interest?

Much of the early literature on peace and war, couched in more traditional problem-solving methodologies, offered broadly agreed insights on the roots of conflict and the measures that may be used to remedy them. In modernity, the entire international peace architecture and more formal UN system has been built upon such premises. Yet, in practice, peacekeeping, peacebuilding, statebuilding, as well as international mediation have tended to follow well-worn paths of development, following great power interests and political will with only minor modifications based upon scientific development (Fortna 2008, p. 116). As a result, practice has diverged from the interdisciplinary, scientific consensus on peacemaking. Will new AI and data-driven responses to war and related research and practice on peace follow the scientific consensus or great power interests? They may deepen data patterns and speed up micro-responses to local instability, but they do not tend to engage with issues of peace and security’s quality, especially when measured against local political claims in conflict-affected societies (as much research on everyday experiences of peace has already indicated). This is because they tend to reflect the interests of powerful actors in the international political economy and reflect their technological progress. Such new approaches’ rapid adoption may undermine such work and destabilize the overall IPA, in other words. Yet, the UN, security actors, and donor states are pushing the agenda for peace and security into these new digital terrains (UN DPPA 2021). They have so far fallen short in addressing the pressing needs of millions of civilians affected by conflict. Though on paper digital peace approaches may offer the potential to predict and prevent war, in practice they shift peace and security processes to a technical level of analysis. Consequently, they risk ignoring the underlying and fundamental political compromises involved in peacemaking and peacebuilding according to its multidisciplinary strands (Richmond and Tellidis 2020).

There is a risk that peace data and algorithms risk introducing blockages within the finely balanced, existing “analogue” international peace architecture (Richmond 2020a,b). This is because of their limited political engagement with a conflict’s root causes and dynamics (Perera 2017). They risk ignoring the enormous amount of existing qualitative data, particularly from conflict-affected and historical contexts, that has already been amassed across a range of disciplines (Mac Ginty 2017). This existing data and set of peace and security methodologies has informed some of the key breakthroughs since the end of the Cold War, including in the conceptual development of peacebuilding, the role of civil society, concepts like human security, Responsibility to Protect, and the Sustaining Peace agenda the UN has been developing recently (UN Security Council 2018). The latter points to the connection between rights, justice, and sustainability (everyday, hybrid, peace formation processes, in other words), in line with multidisciplinary scientific findings, and empirical evidence (Richmond 2016).

In fact, new digital technologies offer the prospect of supporting but not replacing existing practices in the states-system and global political economy, despite the work of civil society, the donor, and multilateral system (Richmond and Visoka 2021). This is because they offer the temptation – through data patterns and algorithms – of governing risk and war from afar without endangering vital interests in the older extant geopolitical systems (Duffield 2018). They allow previous findings on peace and security to be watered down. New technologies are not value-neutral, apolitical, or detached from socio-material interests, particularly those of the superpowers and major corporations. They are rather an extension of existing tools and patterns. This indicates that they will tend to bypass issues raised by the roots causes of war, such as self-determination struggles and resistance against oppression, state collapse and regional geopolitics, environmental collapse, socioeconomic inequality and power stratifications, nationalism, and militarism.

The new tools are “owned” or connected to hegemonic actors and their knowledge systems in the states with the most substantial foreign policy apparatus, able to support their security, deploying peacekeeping, peacebuilding and development measures in order to maintain their positions in international relations. There are not yet AI algorithms substantial enough to prevent or predict war, and respond with measures designed to deal with the deeper, structural and political issues that lead to political violence. Thus, inevitably, such approaches remain related to the maintenance of the status quo rather than its substantial improvement, thus limiting their humanitarian or emancipatory legitimacy.

The Political Limits of New Approaches in Peacemaking

All peace processes are about significant political issues, relating to power, law, and justice, the distribution of land and resources, the organization of society and government, and international governance (Richmond 2014). Big data and AI tends to be manipulated to favor existing power relations in conflict-affected societies, reflecting geopolitical biases (Zuboff 2019: 9). This is so even among outside third parties, and undermines peacemakers’ aim to enable human security and the political claims of the wider conflict-affected population for more secure and improved lives and prospects. These tools cannot be used as a panacea to replace old tools, or to replace and ignore the findings of existing research. Alone, they have methodological and ethical flaws and make it easier to avoid responding to the political claims made in conflict-affected societies for self-determination, more rights and prosperity (see Lepore 2020). Many peacekeeping and peacebuilding interventions have suffered from cultural biases against local populations, on top of limited resources and political will. Technologies operating on algorithmic formulas can antagonize further and discriminate against certain targeted groups and local communities. Experience from the use of technology and big data for counterterrorism, surveillance, and migration control illustrates how racialized and depoliticizing algorithmic predictions can be (Gilman and Baker 2014; Jacobsen 2015).

Given these deficits, it is difficult to see how digital humanitarianism and prevention, remote peacekeeping, and digital enhancements for peacebuilding might address of the existing flaws in predicting, understanding, and responding to conflict trends, in creating suitable responses that carry local and regional legitimacy, and amassing sufficient resources and political will (Jacobsen 2015). By ignoring such long-standing issues, they risk deepening the insecurity of civilian populations in conflict (Donini and Maxwell 2014). Moreover, the lack of technological resources and capacity to engage with new technologies in conflict-affected zones makes it extremely difficult for conflict-affected communities to make use of and benefit from such data. Essentially, these approaches might lead to a new form of digital colonialism and digital trusteeship, that reproduces yet again the dynamics of material and cultural domination and exploitation within peace processes rather than responding to inequalities as causal factors in war (Kwet 2019). They have not, so far provided answers to the political claims, security or material problems of conflict-affected populations, as in Syria, Yemen, or many earlier conflicts where peace processes, mediation attempts, peacekeeping, diplomacy, or peacebuilding are now frozen or in retreat, such as in the Balkans, DRC, or Colombia.

Digital approaches give an impression of international engagement, with little political substance in addressing the root causes and contemporary dynamics of the conflict. They may create the impression that local communities are resilient (Chandler 2014). However, they reduce the possibility for engaged interactions between local and international actors and risk undermining the legitimacy of any externally and remotely designed or imposed peace settlement. Existing research shows that generating data, methods, and theory from a substantial distance about the local dynamics of conflict and citizens' perceptions on the ground is an unreliable approach to peace and security issues. Predictive systems and AI operate on the symptoms of violence rather than the causes. Scholarship in peace and conflict studies, using more traditional methodologies, has already made this clear and amassed substantial data, theory, and methods.

So many aspects of the goal of peace depend on issues of identity, culture, custom, human relations, and justice in historical, distributive, and environmental senses (global or planetary justice, in other words) (Nagel 2005; Dryzek and Pickering 2019: 67), as well as on political reform. Peacemaking thus depends on multidisciplinary scholarship, evidence, and approaches in order to address root causes of war and violence and develop sustainable and emancipatory alternative political orders. The major lacunae in recent times have been a lack of political will for reform or intervention at state levels, and an absent political engagement with everyday, local political claims, rather than a lack of data or digital capacity.

As in the long Syrian war, the availability of early warning, data collection, and prevention technologies have been of no consequence in preventing or resolving it. Such failures probably would not have been avoided with new data and AI methods. Sufficient data already existed as did the methods of conflict prevention, peacekeeping, and peacemaking, all of which were undermined by the failure of multilateralism and the lack of international political will. No new data, variables, or methods would have saved Syria's population under these conditions. This failure has placed the legitimacy of international and civil society actors actually trying to reform the state, support human rights and democracy, via the existing IPA frameworks for diplomacy, mediation, intervention, rights, and law, at great risk. Technological supplements for peacemaking activities risk deflecting from its failures, displacing the long-standing need to address substantive security, rights, and justice concerns in conflict-affected societies.

Summary

The contribution of new technologies and data approaches should be set into the context of the existing IPA, which already monitors and moderates geopolitics, builds international law, norms, state constitutions, and human rights, based upon an enormous volume of multidisciplinary evidence. This has been captured to some degree in the evolution of UN doctrines, and is now connected to the wider goals set by the UN's Sustaining Peace agenda (United Nations 2015; UN Secretary-General 2018; UN General Assembly 2015). Peace praxis also needs to relate, not to Western and Northern interests, but more closely to the political claims and the complex balances peace with global justice requires within conflict-affected societies (Richmond 2021). New approaches and technologies can help but should not disrupt this system, at least without a clear idea of consequences, intended and unintended. This is a hard lesson learned from the connection between industrialized states and empires, the development of total and cold war, and the several breakdowns of international order last century. Bridges need to be built with existing approaches in the IPA as a complementary process of innovation, rather than displacement.

AI for peace is no panacea, nor a replacement for the existing and highly complex epistemological and practice frameworks of the IPA and wider international order. Displacing the latter with "peace tech and & data-stabilisation" methodologies and epistemologies is connected to a hegemonic epistemology that seeks to pacify and contain war while maintaining exclusive interests, economic hierarchies, and sovereignty. This may maintain the existing domestic and international order in the short term only. These methods may support warlords more than citizens, may not be able to maintain legitimate political order in conflict-affected societies, and risk destabilizing the entire legacy IPA, as well as its newly emerging layers. For these reasons, new technologies for predicting conflicts and then devising strategies for peaceful resolutions should support the existing IPA, and enhance its capacity vis-à-vis the new types of war that have coming into being since the end of the Cold War, many of which have been facilitated by new technologies of violence. They should not be aimed at status-quo management or the extension of geopolitical power. That path risks the collapse of the legacy, analogue international order and also threatens more recent innovations in the IPA resting on the scientific, expanded human rights, environmental, and policy nexus. In order to maintain the legitimacy and capacity of the whole IPA, the expansion and extension of the quality of peace and security are required, but for this digital peace is relatively marginal in terms of political innovation.

Cross-References

- ▶ Asymmetrical Warfare
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Cyber Conflict
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Technology and Peace

References

- Chandler, D. (2014). Beyond neoliberalism: Resilience, the new art of governing complexity. Resilience, 2(1), 47–63.
- Donini, A., & Maxwell, D. (2014). From face-to-face to face-to-screen: remote management, effectiveness and accountability of humanitarian action in insecure environments. International Review of the Red Cross, 95, 383–413.
- Dryzek, J. S., & Pickering, J. (2019). The politics of the Anthropocene. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Duffield, M. (2018). Post-humanitarianism: Governing precarity in the digital world. London: Wiley.
- Fortna, V. (2008). Does peacekeeping work? Shaping Bel-ligerents' choices after civil war. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Gilman, D., & Baker, L. (2014). Humanitarianism in the age of cyber-warfare: Towards the principled and secure use of information in humanitarian emergencies. New York: UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.
- Jacobsen, K. L. (2015). The politics of humanitarian technology: Good intentions, unintended consequences and insecurity. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Karlsrud, J. (2014). Peacekeeping 4.0: Harnessing the potential of big data, social media and cyber technology. In J. F. Kremer & B. Müller (Eds.), Cyber space and international relations. Theory, prospects and challenges (pp. 141–160). Berlin: Springer.
- Kwet, M. (2019). Digital colonialism: US empire and the new imperialism in the Global South. Race & Class, 60(4), 3–26.
- Lepore, J. (2020). Scientists use big data to sway elections and predict riots – welcome to the 1960s. Nature, 585, 348–350.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2017). Peacekeeping and data. International Peacekeeping, 24(5), 695–705.
- Nagel, T. (2005). The problem of global justice. Philosophy and Public Affairs, 33(2), 113–147.
- Peace Direct. (2020). Digital Pathways for Peace: Insights and lessons from a global online consultation. <https://www.peacedirect.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/08/PD-LVP-Tech-Report.pdf>
- Perera, S. (2017). To boldly know: Knowledge, peacekeeping and remote data gathering in conflict-affected states. International Peacekeeping, 24(5), 803–822.
- Richmond, O.P. (2014) A revolution in peacebuilding (Development, and Humanitarian) affairs?, unpublished.
- Richmond, O. P. (2016). Peace formation and political order. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2020a). Peace in international relations (2nd ed.). London: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2020b). Peace in analogue/digital international relations. Global Change, Peace & Security, 32(3), 317–336.
- Richmond, O. P. (2021). The Grand Design. OUP, 2021.
- Richmond, O. P. (2022). The grand design: The evolution of the international peace architecture. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Richmond, O. P., & Tellidis, I. (2020). Analogue crisis, digital renewal? Current dilemmas of peacebuilding. Globalizations, 17, 835–952.
- Richmond, O. P., & Visoka, G. (Eds.). (2021). The oxford handbook of peacebuilding, statebuilding, and peace formation. New York: Oxford University Press.
- UN DPPA. (2021). Digital Technologies and Mediation Toolkit 1.0. <https://peacemaker.un.org/digitaltoolkit/>

- UN General Assembly. (2015). Seventy-second session 18 January 2018; Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development, A/RES/70/1. New York: United Nations.
- UN Secretary-General. (2018). Report of the secretary-general, Peacebuilding and sustaining peace (A/72/707-S/2018/43). New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2015). Final report of the expert panel on technology and innovation in UN peacekeeping. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations Security Council. (2018). Peacebuilding and sustaining peace (Report of the Secretary General, S/2018/43). New York: United Nations.
- Wählisch, M. (2020). Big data, new technologies, and sustainable peace: Challenges and opportunities for the UN. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 15(1), 122–126.
- Zuboff, S. (2019). The age of surveillance capitalism. London: Profile.

G

Gender

- ▶ Consociationalism and Peace After Conflict
- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Gender and Mediation

Catherine Turner
Durham University, Durham, UK

Synonyms

Inclusive mediation; Women's participation in peace processes

Definition

Gender and Mediation refers to the ways in which women, their rights and interests are taken into account in peace processes.

Introduction: Origins

The question of gender in mediation has its roots in the Security Council's Women Peace and Security Agenda (WPS). UNSCR 1325 (2000) recognized that women have a role to play in conflict resolution (see also ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda).

This was subsequently developed through a series of UNSC resolutions under the so-called "participation" pillar of the WPS Agenda (Kirby and Shepherd 2021). While the participation pillar is concerned with women's participation in peace and security broadly defined, it also makes specific provision for participation in conflict resolution, including mediation.

Mediation is defined by the UN as a "process whereby a third party assists two or more parties, with their consent, to prevent, manage or resolve a conflict by helping them to develop mutually acceptable agreements" (UN, 2012). Recent years have seen an increasing emphasis on mediation as a tool for sustainable peace globally. This has emerged alongside a new approach to leadership at the UN which increasingly recognizes the need to increase the diversity of the leadership pool (United Nations, 2017a) and deliver a global gender equality strategy (United Nations, 2017b). The need for women's leadership in peace and security has also begun to appear in the text of WPS Resolutions (UNSCR 2122, 2013b). The question of gender and mediation therefore sits at the intersection of a number of institutional priorities for the United Nations at the beginning of the twenty-first century.

Of particular note for the question of gender and mediation is the existence of a model of “multi-track” mediation whereby mediation happens in different spaces with different actors (Palmiano Federer et al., 2019). Track 1 mediation is generally understood as a high-level political process in which political and military representatives take part in an official capacity. Track 2 is an informal process which brings together civic leaders (such as, for example, community or religious leaders, intellectuals, or politicians acting in their personal capacity) to engage in creative thinking about the conflict. Track 3 is more recently recognized as part of the mediation landscape (Turner, 2018). It is understood as encompassing the work done at grassroots level to prevent and mitigate the effect of violent conflict within and between communities (Table 1). These three “tracks” of mediation are now recognized as the dominant way in which mediation and the role of gender are conceptualized (see also ► Mediation).

Women’s participation in peace processes has emerged as one of the most dominant sites of advocacy within the broader WPS Agenda. A significant body of policy and supporting practice has emerged around supporting women to participate in peace negotiations and highlighting the benefits for peace of such participation. More recently there has been a closer focus on mediation as the specific vehicle through which to increase women’s participation.

Representing Women in Peace Mediation

The question of gender in mediation begins with the underrepresentation of women in peace processes. Research from UN Women has demonstrated the persistently low numbers of women who participate in peace processes in any capacity. In 2012 a UN Women study reported that between 1992 and 2011, across 31 major peace processes, women had comprised only 2% of chief mediators, 4% of witnesses and signatories, and 9% of negotiators (UN Women, 2012). These figures catalyzed action on increasing the representation of women in mediation. Not only were women physically absent from peace talks, but their interests were not represented as a result (UN Women, 2012).

From the outset the participation resolutions have recognized the dual strategy of women’s participation in peace processes on one hand, and recognizing the unique ways in which women are impacted by conflict and different perspectives they bring to mediation as a result on the other. These dual aspects emerge and develop through the resolutions and are supplemented by policy approaches to participation. Work on women’s participation is therefore structured around two separate but linked forms of representation – descriptive representation and substantive representation. Attention has also turned more recently to how women’s participation can be made meaningful.

Descriptive Representation

As a starting point, women’s descriptive representation reflects the fact that as a principle of equality, women have a right to full and equal participation. It is also important symbolically to have women visible in decision-making roles in mediation processes. There are a number of ways in which women’s descriptive representation can be promoted in peace processes. These focus primarily on creating mechanisms to give women direct access to high-level track 1 processes.

A difficulty that arises from looking at women’s participation in peace processes through the lens of descriptive representation is that there is no guarantee that the women who participate in talks will represent the rights or interests of women. Direct participation is not the same as equality of influence with regard to women’s rights and gender equality outcomes. Therefore, what is important is not just counting women, but making women count (Paffenholz et al., 2016). This raises the question of “who” participates in mediation, and whether they are able or willing to

Gender and Mediation, Table 1 Women's participation in mediation in the WPS Resolutions

| Resolution | Provisions on participation |
|-------------|---|
| 1325 (2000) | Reaffirming the important role of women in the prevention and resolution of conflicts and in peacebuilding Stressing the importance of their equal participation and full involvement in all efforts for the maintenance and promotion of peace and security, Urges member states to ensure increased representation of women [in the] prevention, management, and resolution of conflict; and Encourages the secretary-general to implement his strategic plan of action (A/49/587) calling for an increase in the participation of women at decision-making levels in conflict resolution and peace processes |
| 1820 (2008) | Reaffirming the important role of women in the prevention and resolution of conflicts and in peacebuilding, and Stressing the importance of their equal participation and full involvement in all efforts for the maintenance and promotion of peace and security Deeply concerned also about the persistent obstacles and challenges to women's participation and full involvement in the prevention and resolution of conflicts as a result of violence, intimidation, and discrimination, which erode women's capacity and legitimacy to participate in post-conflict public life, and acknowledging the negative impact this has on durable peace, security, and reconciliation, including post-conflict peacebuilding |
| 1889 (2009) | Reiterating the need for the full, equal, and effective participation of women at all stages of peace processes Expressing deep concern about the underrepresentation of women at all stages of peace processes, particularly the very low numbers of women in formal roles in mediation processes Urges member states, international and regional organizations to take further measures to improve women's participation during all stages of peace processes, particularly in conflict resolution |
| 2122 (2013) | Intends to focus more attention on women's leadership and participation in conflict resolution Requests the secretary-general and his special envoys and special representatives to United Nations missions, as part of their regular briefings, to update the council on progress in inviting women to participate, including through consultations with civil society, including women's organizations, in discussions pertinent to the prevention and resolution of conflict Recognizes the continuing need to increase women's participation and the consideration of gender-related issues in all discussions pertinent to the prevention and resolution of armed conflict Requests the secretary-general to support the appointments of women at senior levels as United Nations mediators and within the composition of United Nations mediation teams; and Calls on all parties to such peace talks to facilitate the equal and full participation of women at decision-making levels |
| 2242 (2015) | Encourages those supporting peace processes to facilitate women's meaningful inclusion in negotiating parties' delegations to peace talks, Calls upon donor countries to provide financial and technical assistance to women involved in peace processes, including training in mediation, advocacy, and technical areas of negotiation, as well as providing support and training to mediators and technical teams on the impact of women's participation and strategies for women's effective inclusion |
| 2493 (2019) | Urges member states supporting peace processes to facilitate women's full, equal, and meaningful inclusion and participation in peace talks from the outset, both in negotiating parties' delegations and in the mechanisms set up to implement and monitor agreements | bring about transformative change through that participation (Ellerby, 2016; Shepherd, 2011).

Substantive Representation

Women's substantive equality requires that matters that particularly concern women's equality and rights should be included on the agenda of peace negotiations. The connection between presence and influence has been significant in shaping the direction of the research agenda on gender and mediation. The emphasis on women's participation arises from the perceived connections between women's participation, their influence on the mediation agenda, and the resulting gender sensitivity of the outcome. The connection is explicitly made in the WPS Resolutions. UNSCR 1889 recognizes “that an understanding of the impact of situations of armed conflict on women and girls, . . . adequate and rapid response to their particular needs, and effective institutional arrangements to guarantee their protection and full participation in the peace process, . . . can significantly contribute to the maintenance and promotion of international peace and security.”

This requirement of taking women’s needs, rights, and equality into account in mediation process design has been present in the text of the Security Council Resolutions from the outset. UNSCR 1325 calls on all actors involved, when negotiating and implementing peace agreements, to adopt a gender perspective, including measures that ensure the protection of and respect for human rights of women and girls. This reflects a substantive engagement with the rights and interests of women and girls as defined normatively in the WPS Resolutions (Bell & O’Rourke, 2010) (see also ► Women, Peace and Security Agenda).

Initially this connection was drawn between the presence of women at the negotiating table and their influence on the agenda and outcomes of peace negotiations (UN Women, 2012), which led to greater attention being paid to the ways in which women were or were not able to influence the agenda of mediation. This is referred to as “meaningful” participation.

“Full, Equal and Meaningful Participation”

Addressing the connection between women’s presence and their influence on the agenda of mediation, UNSCR 2493 (2019b) encourages Member States to support efforts, including timely support to women to enhance their participation and capacity building in peace processes, in order to address the unequal representation and participation of women in the peace and security agenda. This provision reflects and underpins systemic efforts on the part of agencies such as UN Women, as well as international civil society organizations, to provide technical assistance to enable women’s participation and overcome systemic barriers such as education or resources that prevent women from participating. Meaningful participation in this sense refers to the extent to which women who do participate in mediation processes are able to effectively influence either the agenda or the outcome.

Participation and the Durability of Agreements

Another central theme of research and policy is the connection between women’s participation in peace talks and the durability and inclusivity of the resulting peace agreement. A statistical analysis of 181 peace agreement demonstrated that peace processes that included women had a 20% greater chance of the agreement lasting for 2 years, and a 35% increased chance of it lasting for 15 years (Stone, cited in O’Reilly et al., 2015). Studies have also shown that when women participate in mediation the outcome is likely to be more gender sensitive (Kraus et al. 2018). The reasons cited for this are that women are deemed to be more likely to build consensus, and were also more likely to push for a deal to be reached (UN Women, 2015).

Gender sensitivity in this regard is measured in terms of the references made to women or gender in the text of an agreement (UN Women, 2015; Bell & O’Rourke, 2010). There were also higher levels of implementation when women participated (see also ► Peace Agreements).

UNSCR 2242 notes “the substantial link between women’s meaningful involvement in efforts to prevent, resolve and rebuild from conflict and those efforts’ effectiveness and long-term sustainability.” As a result, advocacy for women’s inclusion has been shaped by functionalist arguments for including women that draw on assumptions that women will act as peacemakers (Anderlini, 2007).

Gender Advisors in Mediation Teams

In addition to the connection being made between women’s participation and the gender sensitivity of peace agreements, the question of gender sensitivity in peace mediation has begun to be detached from women's participation. Mirroring a more general trend toward professionalization in the peace mediation field (Convergne, 2016), and an increasing influence of norms in shaping mediation processes (Helmuller et al., 2020), gender-sensitive mediation has emerged as a technical approach which can be implemented by men or women through the provision of gender advice to mediators and their teams. This breaks the inherent connection between women and gender when it comes to peace mediation. It also reveals a move away from the language of "participation" toward that of "inclusion," and inclusive strategies, which applies to civil society more broadly (Hirblinger & Landau, 2020) (see ► Mediation).

UNSCR 2122 requests the secretary-general to "strengthen the knowledge of negotiating delegations to peace talks, and members of mediation support teams, on the gender dimensions of peacebuilding, by making gender expertise and gender experts available to all United Nations mediation teams." This request is actioned through the UN Department of Political and Peacebuilding Affairs (DPPA) which makes gender expertise available through its Standby Team of Mediation Experts and a roster of senior technical experts who are available to give advice as needed. In 2013 gender expertise was provided by the UN to 88% of processes, a figure which fell to 67% in 2014 (UN Women, 2015).

In 2017 the UN DPPA published a guidance note on gender inclusive mediation strategies which set out the core strands of this approach. The guidance seeks to enhance gender-sensitive mediation practice, and to create more consultative mediation processes, both through the meaningful participation of women and effective gender-sensitive process design and outcomes (United Nations, 2017c). While incorporating women's participation into inclusive strategies, the guidance adopts a broader definition of gender to underpin its aims. Gender, for the purposes of inclusive mediation, is defined as "the social attributes, challenges and opportunities as well as relationships associated with being male or female" (United Nations, 2017c, 7). Of particular note is the way that gender has become a cross-cutting theme, and a lens which should be applied to all the variety of substantive issues that may be on the negotiating agenda in a mediation – including, for example, security arrangements or constitutional reform (United Nations, 2017c). This builds on an earlier guidance for mediators addressing conflict-related sexual violence in peace negotiations and agreements which reinforces the need to incorporate gendered security concerns into mediation processes (United Nations, 2012).

One notable feature of the guidance on gender inclusive mediation is that it seeks to connect both process and substance-focused aspects of mediation. Gender inclusive mediation addresses the need for broad consultation and engagement in process design, as well as the need for gender-sensitive conflict analysis to inform those processes of engagement. This represents a step forward in terms of recognizing the need to create pathways for women to influence the mediation agenda before talks are convened, and responds clearly to previous barriers that women had experienced in accessing political talks (Turner, 2018; O'Reilly et al., 2015). Introducing requirements for consultation and engagement also help to connect the different "tracks" of mediation and recognizes the considerable role played by civil society in the prevention, management, and resolution of conflict.

Reflecting the diversity of actors in the peace mediation field, as well as the important role played by nongovernmental organizations in supporting participation in mediation, practitioner "toolkits" for gender-sensitive conflict analysis and mediation have also been produced by NGOs working in the peace mediation field at the grassroots level (Mason et al., 2015; Conciliation Resources, 2015). These toolkits are made freely available to assist practitioners in integrating a gender analysis into their work.

While the modalities outlined above (Table 2) are aimed at creating formal mechanisms for women's participation, more recent strategies have focused on the need to create pathways for civil society, including women's groups, to influence mediation.

Gender and Mediation, Table 2 Modalities for women’s participation

| Form of participation | Examples |
|--------------------------------|---|
| Negotiator | As a member of a negotiating delegation: on behalf of a government on behalf of an official opposition party on behalf of an armed group |
| Civil society consultee | Appointed to a dedicated mechanism created to advise the mediator: gender technical commission Women’s Advisory Boards consultations with civil society groups without formal roles in the process |
| Mediator | Appointed to the mediation team: envoy/Lead mediator/co-mediator mediation advisor mediation expert |

Connecting the Local and the Global

One reason that has been suggested for the increased durability of peace agreements that have been negotiated in a process that includes women is the collaboration between female delegates for official talks and civil society organizations (Kraus et al., 2018; O’Reilly & O’Súilleabháin, 2013). This collaboration leads to more gender-sensitive content, and higher implementation rates. This reasoning is also adopted by UN Women in its 2015 Global Study, which cites that peace agreements are 64% less likely to fail when civil society representatives participate (UN Women, 2015, 42).

A central theme of recent research has been the need to connect the different “tracks” of peace mediation. This reflects that while there is some work done on gender in mediation as an aspect of diplomacy (Aggestam & Svensson, 2018), advocacy for women’s participation, and for gender sensitivity, has been primarily driven by civil society. This in turn reflects the relatively small numbers of women involved in track 1 mediation, and the overrepresentation of women in track 3 mediation. Most of the mechanisms that have been created to date have focused on increasing the number of women participating in track 1 processes. And yet the majority of the work that women do is at the grassroots level through civil society organizations. As a result, more recent research on women in mediation has focused on the need to make visible the work that women mediators and peacebuilders are doing at the grassroots (or track 3) level, and also to create pathways to connect that work into the political mediation processes at tracks 2 and 3 (Bell & Turner, 2020; Turner, 2018; O’Reilly et al., 2015).

The need for these connections has also been set out in the resolutions. UNSCR 2122 (2013b) takes “note of the critical contributions of civil society, including women’s organizations to conflict prevention, resolution and peacebuilding and in this regard the importance of sustained consultation and dialogue between women and national and international decision makers. . .”.

One of the most significant new developments has been the creation of a number of regional networks of women mediators. These networks have been created as foreign policy tools aimed at increasing the representation of women in high-level mediation. Networks have been created for the Nordic region, the Mediterranean, the Commonwealth, Africa, and the Arab region. Since 2018 the networks have worked together to form a Global Alliance of Regional Women Mediator’s Networks, which was also created to coordinate activities and advocacy.

The networks have an explicit goal of addressing the underrepresentation of women in mediation, focusing on the potential of women mediators to amplify the voices of women peacebuilders across the spectrum of WPS, and to address the relative invisibility of women’s peace work at the institutional level (Fellin & Turner, 2021, 295). To do this, their work focuses on three priorities: (1) increasing the visibility of women mediators; (2) the development of skills and capacity of women participating in mediation in any role; and (3) using the tool of the network to make more effective connections between global actors and local initiatives. These networks aim not only to increase the representation of women in high-level international processes, but to increase the visibility of all women’s voices in mediation.

For example, research conducted with members of the Women Mediators Across the Commonwealth network has demonstrated the contribution that the work of women mediators and peacebuilders makes to conflict prevention and sustainable peace locally, nationally, and regionally (Conciliation Resources, 2020). This research has also begun to examine the specific skills and approaches women bring to mediation and how these contribute to the effectiveness of mediation efforts (Conciliation Resources, 2020; Turner, 2020) (see ► Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus).

What has emerged from this research is the need to think beyond simply adding women to high-level political processes where they have little chance of shaping the agenda, toward creating different pathways into mediation processes that allow women and civil society to engage with the mediation process at different times and on different subjects as necessary (Bell & Turner, 2020). This would help to shift the focus away from the “peace table” as the primary site where mediation occurs and to recognize the multiple and varied ways in which mediation is practiced beyond the political.

Mediation and Gender

While there has been extensive feminist engagement with the need to increase the representation of women and the gender sensitivity of mediation, research in the field of mediation demonstrates a less positive engagement. Inclusive mediation is now generally accepted as an overarching norm of mediation, yet UN Women reported in 2015 that requests for specialist gender advice and expertise were significantly lower than for other areas of technical expertise (UN Women, 2015). Where WPS work has focused on the need to adhere to substantive norms related to the substance of peace talks and agreements, mediation research has tended to look more closely at process-related norms and how they shape the activity of the mediator (Helmüller et al. 2015). For mediators, gender exists as a “non-core” norm of mediation – one to be addressed once other “core” norms, such as the consent of the parties to mediate, have been established (Palmiano Federer, 2016) (see also ► Mediation).

Further, unless lead mediators are expressly mandated by the Security Council to include women in the process, the decision to invite women to participate, or to request gender expertise, rests with the individual mediator (Turner, 2018). This leaves gender vulnerable to marginalization when the mediator and their team engage in analysis and process design. The mediator must weigh up the value of including women in the process with the risk that other participants will withdraw their consent. One way in which this tension has been addressed in the Syrian process is through the creation of a technical Women’s Advisory Board by the Office of the United Nations Envoy. This body was created to advise the Envoy on gender aspects of the process without being fully included in the talks (Bell & Turner, 2020). The UN Guidance on Inclusive Mediation Strategies encourages mediators and their teams to engage in gender-sensitive conflict analysis and consultation, but as yet there remains some tension over the relative priority of gender in mediation.

New Directions

Research in the field of gender and mediation has developed significantly from its initial focus on women’s participation. Yet there are still some tensions underpinning work in this area.

First is the question of representation. Much of the advocacy on women’s inclusion has been based on the idea that women are inherently more peaceful than men, and as a result more likely to seek consensus and push for agreement. This has led to inclusion being advocated more often on the basis of its utility to peace than on its contribution to equality (Charlesworth, 2008; El Bushra, 2007). This also leads to a dilemma whereby only the “right” women – namely those who will participate on a feminist platform – are sought for participation. It also expects that women can and will work across other political divides in a way that men are not expected to (Poutanen and Turner 2021). This risks excluding women who do not self-identify in these terms, and raises thorny issues of both representation and mandate for women who do participate. For example, the Syrian Women’s Advisory Board has been criticized for being unrepresentative of Syrian women broadly, and of being “elite” and disconnected from grassroots women’s movements (see Bell and Turner, 2020; Kapur, 2016).

Similarly, it is not always clear that civil society mechanisms that sit outside the main structure of peace talks can make a meaningful impact. A more nuanced approach is needed to challenge the tendency to essentialize women and to ensure that a diverse range of women are included in talks. It is also suggested that the narrow and technical frame of inclusion serves to depoliticize women’s activism (Turner, 2020) and the reasons for political mobilization (Tarnaala, 2021). Further research is required to more fully connect the multifaced ways in which women mobilize politically with the realities of technical mediation process design in which they are reduced to a homogenous social group who are invited to contribute on a limited range of issues.

A second strand of emerging research is the connections between women’s participation in mediation, and peacebuilding more generally, and their protection. UNSCR 2467 (2019a) recognizes that “women’s protection and participation are inextricably linked and mutually-reinforcing...” Recent research from the International Civil Society Network (ICAN) has demonstrated the very real security risks faced by women who engage in the field of peace and security (Holmes, 2020). More needs to be done to connect the WPS pillars of participation and protection, to recognize cost of participation and the need to challenge exclusionary norms and structures that expose women to very real risks when they challenge the status quo through their participation in mediation and post-conflict implementation of agreements (Holmes, 2020; Turner and Swaine, 2021).

Finally, the limitations and challenges faced in increasing the representation of women, and the gender sensitivity of mediation, are all linked by the idea that by using “inclusion” as a technical approach, women are being asked to participate in processes that are not structured to allow them to make a difference. The emphasis on “meaningful” participation acknowledges this tension, but until there is more fundamental transformation in the model of mediation and the way in which it contributes to the restoration of peace existing structures of inequality will continue to limit the possibilities of mediation as a vehicle for advancing gender equality (Sapiano, 2021) (see also ► Feminist Peace Research).

Summary

Women’s inclusion in peace mediation has been a central concern of peace process research for the past two decades. During this time a normative architecture has developed that speaks to the need not only to include women in peace processes and conflict resolution more generally, but also to ensure that peace agreements are gender sensitive. This entry traces the development of both norms and strategies for the inclusion of women and gender in peace mediation at the global level. It demonstrates the ways in which connections are made between the representation of women in peace negotiations and the substantive goal of gender sensitivity. It engages with core debates about the role of women and gender in peace mediation and the ways in which advocacy is framed to support women’s inclusion. Finally, it considers the relationship between scholarship and activism in the field of WPS, and that in the separate field of mediation, outlining a gap in the way in which the role of gender is understood.

Cross-References

- Feminist Peace Research
- Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- Mediation
- Peace Agreements

- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

References

- Aggestam, K., & Svensson, I. (2018). Where are the women in peace mediation? In K. Aggestam & A. E. Towns (Eds.), Gendering diplomacy and international relations. Palgrave Macmillan.
- Anderlini, S. (2007). Women building peace: What they do and why it matters. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Bell, C., & O'Rourke, C. (2010). Peace agreements or pieces of paper? The impact of UNSC resolution 1325 on peace processes and their agreements. International and Comparative Law Quarterly, 59(4), 941–980.
- Bell, C., & Turner, C. (2020). Models for women's inclusion in track one peace and transition processes. Cairo: UN Women.
- Charlesworth, H. (2008). Are women peaceful? Reflections on the role of women in peacebuilding. Feminist Legal Studies, 16, 347.
- Conciliation Resources. (2015). Gender and conflict analysis toolkit for peacebuilders. London: Conciliation Resources.
- Conciliation Resources. (2020). Women mediators: Bridging the peace gap. London: Conciliation Resources.
- Convergne, E. (2016). Learning to mediate? The mediation support unit and the production of expertise by the UN. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(2), 181–199.
- El Bushra, J. (2007). Feminism, gender and women's peace activism. Development and Change, 38(1), 131.
- Ellerby, K. (2016). A seat at the table is not enough: Understanding women's substantive representation in peace processes. Peacebuilding, 4(2), 136–150.
- Fellin, I., & Turner, C. (2021). Networks of women mediators: Reflections on an emerging global trend. In C. Turner & M. Wählisch (Eds.), Rethinking peace mediation: Challenges of contemporary peacemaking practice (pp. 285–306). Bristol University Press.
- Helmüller et al. 2015. The Role of Norms in International Peace Mediation. Basel. Swisspeace.
- Helmüller, S., Pring, J., & Richmond, O. (2020). How norms matter in peace mediation. Swiss Political Science Review, 26(4), 345–363.
- Hirblinger, A., & Landau, D. (2020). Daring to differ? Strategies of inclusion in peacemaking. Security Dialogue, 51(4), 305–322.
- Holmes, M. (2020). Protecting women peacebuilders: The front lines of sustainable peace. ICAN.
- Kapur, B. (2016). Syrian women in political processes: The participation of Syrian women in political processes. Literature Review 2012–2016. Kvinna Til Kvinna.
- Kirby PL, Shepherd J (2021) Women Peace and Security: Mapping the (Re)Production of a Policy Ecosystem. Journal of Global Security Studies 6(3). <https://doi.org/10.1093/jogss/ogaa045>
- Kraus, J., et al. (2018). Women's participation in peace negotiations and the durability of peace'. International Interventions, 44(6), 985–1016.
- Mason, S., et al. (2015). Gender in mediation: An exercise handbook for trainers. Zurich: Centre for Security Studies.
- O'Reilly, M., & O'Súilleabháin, A. (2013). Issue brief: Wome in conflict mediation: Why it matters. New York: International Peace Institute.
- O'Reilly, M., O'Súilleabháin, A., & Paffenholz, T. (2015). Re-imagining peacemaking: Women's roles in peace processes. New York: International Peace Institute.
- Paffenholz, T., Ross, N., Dixon, S., Schluchter, A.-L., & True, J. (2016). Making women count-not just counting women: Assessing women's inclusion and influence on peace negotiations. Inclusive peace and transition initiative and UN women, 2016.
- Palmiano Federer, et al. (2019). Across the tracks: Reflections on multi-track approaches to peace processes. <https://www.hdcentre.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/01/Beyond-the-Tracks-Reflections-on-Multitrack-Approaches-to-Peace-Processes.pdf>
- Palmiano Federer, Julia. (2016). On gender: The role of norms in international peace mediation. Basel: Swisspeace.
- Poutanen J, Turner C (2021) Overcoming Essentialisation: Understanding and Supporting Women's Diverse Roles in Peace Processes. Helsinki. CMI Martii Ahtisaari Peace Foundation.
- Sapiano, J. (2021). The boundaries of peace: A feminist analysis of international peace mediation. Griffith Law Review, 29(3), 451–467.
- Shepherd, L. (2011). Sex, security and superhero(in)es: From 1325 to 1820 and beyond. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 504.
- Tarnaala, E. (2021). Rethinking mediation during contested regime transformation and episodes of mobilisation. In C. Turner & M. Wählisch (Eds.), Rethinking peace mediation: Challenges of contemporary peacemaking practice (pp. 139–156). Bristol University Press.
- Turner, C. (2018). Absent or invisible? Women mediators and the United Nations. Global Policy, 9(2), 244–253.
- Turner, C. (2020). Soft ways of doing hard things: Women mediators and the question of gender in mediation. Peacebuilding, 8(4), 383–401.
- Turner, C., & Swaine, A. (2021). At the nexus of participation and protection: Protection related risks and barriers to women's participation in Northern Ireland. New York: International Peace Institute.
- UN Women. (2012). Women's participation in peace processes: Connections between presence and influence (2nd ed.) <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/03AWomenPeaceNeg.pdf>.

- UN Women. (2015). Preventing conflict, transforming justice, securing the peace: A global study on the implementation of United Nations security council resolution 1325. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2012). Guidance for mediators addressing conflict related sexual violence in peace negotiations and agreements. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2017a). System wide gender parity strategy. https://www.un.org/gender/sites/www.un.org/gender/files/gender_parity_strategy_october_2017.pdf
- United Nations. (2017b, March 3). Report of the high level committee on programmes at its thirty third session. United Nations chief executive board for co-ordination, annex, leadership framework UN Doc. CEB/2017/1 2017.
- United Nations. (2017c). Guidance on gender and inclusive mediation strategies. New York: Department of Political Affairs.
- United Nations, Security Council (UNSC). (2000). Resolution 1325, S/RES/1325.
- United Nations, Security Council (UNSC). (2013b). Resolution 2122, S/RES/2122.
- United Nations, Security Council (UNSC). (2019a). Resolution 2467, S/RES/2467.
- United Nations, Security Council (UNSC). (2019b). Resolution 2493, S/RES/2493.

Gender and Peacebuilding in Cyprus

- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

Gender Equality

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Gender in the Negotiations in Cyprus

- ▶ Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

Gender Justice

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Gender Justice and Peacebuilding

Maria O'Reilly

Leeds Beckett University, Leeds, UK

Synonyms

Gender-just peace; Conflict; Feminist peace research; Gender; Sexual and gender-based violence; Violence; UNSCR 1325; Women's participation in transitional justice

Definition

Gender justice in peacebuilding contexts can be defined as efforts to recognize, and provide redress for, the gendered harms of war. In post-war contexts, transitional justice mechanisms are often used to address complex legacies of mass violence and widespread human rights abuses. In recent decades, feminist researchers and activists have highlighted the importance of integrating gender justice into peace and justice initiatives. This entry focuses on two key approaches to achieving gender justice in peacebuilding settings. The first, legal justice, is a top-down, formal approach to gender justice. It involves states and/or international organizations establishing courts and tribunals where perpetrators are held accountable under international criminal law. The second, Women's Courts and Tribunals, represents a bottom-up, informal approach to gender justice. It involves grassroots actors creating informal truth-telling mechanisms, which may better respond to the needs of survivors and the communities in which they live.

Introduction

The question of how to achieve gender justice in peacebuilding contexts has occupied the minds of policymakers, practitioners, and researchers alike in recent years. Since the 1990s, reports of sexual and gender-based violence (SGBV) experienced by civilians in situations of armed conflict have attracted increased attention. The widespread use of rape, sexual slavery, enforced pregnancy, and other forms of SGBV during periods of war and dictatorship has been documented by international media and human rights organizations. Sharper awareness of the gendered logic and impact of violent conflict has led to calls to transform transitional justice mechanisms – including criminal trials, truth-telling initiatives, reparation programs, institutional reform – that are used to help societies recover from war and authoritarian rule. A key challenge is to ensure that transitional mechanisms recognize and respond to gender-based harms, and also confront the (hetero-)sexism underpinning SGBV.

Early transitional justice initiatives were criticized for being “gender-blind” (Valji 2007: 8) – since many failed to incorporate gender and the situated experiences of women, girls, and non-binary people into the design and implementation of these accountability mechanisms. UN Security Council Resolution 1325 and subsequent resolutions on “Women, Peace, and Security” provide an important impetus to integrate gender justice into peacebuilding. These resolutions emphasize the importance of preventing and prosecuting crimes of SGBV in situations of armed conflict. They stress the need to ensure that survivors can access justice and redress. Crucially, they emphasize the importance of recognizing women as agents of post-war justice and peacebuilding processes.

Transitional justice mechanisms have the potential to acknowledge the gendered harms of war. By advancing criminal accountability for SGBV, uncovering the truth about human rights violations, and awarding symbolic and/or material reparations, for example, these mechanisms can extend important measures of justice and redress to victims and survivors. Acknowledging victims of SGBV, challenging socioeconomic injustice and providing a platform for survivors to voice their experiences and concerns are all important steps to prompt positive transformation following violent conflict. Some progress in tackling SGBV in conflict has been made in recent years. Yet, key obstacles to achieving gender justice remain, resulting in all-too-frequent failure to hold perpetrators accountable and to provide victims with adequate redress.

Definition

Gender justice in peacebuilding contexts can be defined as efforts to recognize, and provide redress for, the gendered harms of war. In post-war contexts, a variety of transitional justice mechanisms – including criminal trials, truth-telling initiatives, reparation programs, institutional reform – are used to address complex legacies of mass violence and widespread human rights abuses. These mechanisms have often failed to provide justice to victims of gender-based violations.

Feminist research and activism have stressed the importance of integrating gender justice into peacebuilding. Building a just and durable peace requires identifying and addressing the gendered harms of war. It also entails designing and implementing justice processes and institutions that succeed in challenging rather than reinforcing gendered hierarchies of power (Valji 2007; Campbell 2007). Without addressing unequal power relationships, confronting (hetero)sexist attitudes and behaviors, and dismantling oppressive power structures and institutions, the shift from war to peace is unlikely to be long-lasting.

Acts of sexual violence – including rape, sexual enslavement, enforced pregnancy, forced marriage, forced prostitution, and other forms of sexual assault – are examples of the gendered and sexualized forms of harm experienced by people of different genders during armed conflict. Sexual violence can be defined as “acts of violence that are enacted, intended, or experienced as ‘sexual’, either because they involve sexual or reproductive organs or otherwise relate to the victim or perpetrator as sexual agents” (Buss 2014: 8). These acts may be experienced by women and men, girls and boys, and people from sexual and gender minorities, who are living in conflict settings.

Rape is not an inevitable part of war (Wood 2009). However, the coercive circumstances of violent conflict can provide the enabling conditions for sexual violence to emerge (Campbell 2018: 481). Different forms, functions, and patterns of sexual violence in conflict have been observed by researchers and peace-workers. Some acts of sexual violence may be strategic and form part of an “orchestrated policy to achieve military and political ends” – such as the destruction of a protected group (genocide) or an attack against a civilian population (Buss 2014: 10). Other acts may be opportunistic, perpetrated without an instrumental goal.

Crucially, sexual violence in conflict is strongly connected to pre-war inequalities, with particular groups in society targeted along lines of gender, as well as race, class, sexuality, nationality, etc. (Boesten & Wilding 2015). Addressing the underlying causes or enabling conditions of sexual violence in conflict requires connecting such acts to preexisting structures of inequality, including gendered patterns of violence, domination, and oppression that span both wartime and peacetime (Buss 2014: 7). Achieving gender justice in peacebuilding contexts therefore involves not only ensuring that transitional justice mechanisms respond to individual survivors’ interests, needs, and rights to redress, it also requires tackling asymmetrical relationships, transforming unequal social structures and institutions, and challenging cultures of domination that promote and/or maintain gender inequality before, during, and after conflict.

Theorizing Gender Justice

Justice as Recognition, Redistribution, and Representation

Nancy Fraser’s model of justice as recognition, redistribution, and representation provides a useful framework for understanding and evaluating gender justice initiatives in peacebuilding contexts. This framework can be used to identify the gendered forms of exclusion and inequality that are so often constructed and maintained in the transition from war to peace (O’Reilly 2018).

Fraser (2008: 16) defines justice as “parity of participation,” whereby social relations and institutions enable everyone to “participate as peers.” Participatory parity requires distributing resources equitably in society, and promoting modes of representation which grant recognition, foster respect and social esteem.

Fraser (1997, 2005) highlights three institutionalized forms of injustice that require redress:

- Cultural/symbolic injustice, which is rooted in negative forms of representation, non-recognition, and disrespect of certain individuals and social groups
- Socioeconomic injustice, which refers to economic exploitation, marginalization, and discrimination that act as barriers to full participation in society
- Participatory injustice, meaning the marginalization and exclusion of disadvantaged individuals and social groups from political institutions and decision-making processes

Tackling gender injustice requires social arrangements which foster respect and value the contributions and activities of all groups in society. This means challenging androcentrism, heterosexism, racism, and other discriminatory norms, values, and practices so that members of all social groups can participate as equals in social life. Confronting gender injustice also involves tackling the root causes of poverty and income inequality, to ensure that human needs are satisfied and to prevent women and other marginalized groups from experiencing exploitation. Challenging gender injustice also requires creating structures and institutions that enable women to participate fully and equally in political life.

Gender Justice in Peacebuilding Contexts

Extending Fraser’s model to peacebuilding contexts, there is evidence that all three forms of gender injustice are frequently present (O’Reilly 2018). For example, female combatants often experience stigma and discrimination after wars end, after having challenged conventional norms surrounding “acceptable” womanhood (Shekhawat 2015: 17). This is a common example of cultural/symbolic injustice.

Wars also produce socioeconomic injustice. Armed conflict leads to material destruction – of property, infrastructure – and creates economic recession and poverty in the post-war period (Đurić Kuzmanović and Pajvančić-Cizelj 2020). The economic impacts of war are not gender-neutral, with both women and survivors of SGBV more likely to experience poverty, job insecurity, and economic exploitation (Kuzmanović & Pajvančić-Cizelj 2020).

As regards participatory injustice, women living in conflict-affected settings continue to be drastically underrepresented in formal peace negotiations (Bell 2018). At these negotiations, crucial decisions are often made concerning the establishment of post-war justice mechanisms (Ní Aoláin and Turner 2007). This exclusion reduces the likelihood that the gendered impact of conflict is discussed and addressed.

Affirmative Versus Transformative Remedies

Fraser outlines two contrasting approaches to remedying injustice: affirmation and transformation (1997). Affirmative remedies strive to fix unjust outcomes without changing the social arrangements that generated inequity in the first place. One example, of affirmative recognition, is the criminal prosecution of SGBV in conflict. Prosecuting SGBV extends recognition that SGBV is as serious and as violent as other crimes (Chappell 2015). This remedy is significant since it challenges the historical silencing of survivors' experiences. By making visible sexual violence and other harms that women disproportionately endure, prosecutions also offer acknowledgement of "women as equal and worthy members of . . . 'humanity'" (Buss 2014: 11).

Transformative remedies, in contrast, aim to correct unjust outcomes by transforming the underlying structural inequalities that enable SGBV to emerge. One example, of transformative redistribution, is the decision to award forms of reparations that challenge, rather than reaffirm, the root causes of violence and discrimination. By destabilizing the gendered economic structures and divisions of labor, reparations can be used to transform the structural position of survivors rather than merely returning them back to a prewar position of economic marginalization and discrimination (Manjoo 2017).

Gender Justice from Above: Legal Justice

There is a long history of SGBV being perpetrated in armed conflict. Notorious examples from the twentieth century include the sexual enslavement of Korean "comfort women" by Japanese military during World War II (Kimura 2016); the targeting of civilians, including the rape of women and girls, during the 1990s wars in Yugoslavia (Campbell 2007); and the use of sexual violence during the Rwandan genocide (Mibenge 2013).

Rape was for centuries prohibited by international humanitarian law and by military codes regulating armed conflict (Meron 1993). Yet, historically, very few perpetrators were brought to justice. Wartime rape and sexual violence were often wrongly characterized as involving damage to women's "honor" rather than recognized as violent crimes (Jarvis 2016: 11). Consequently, perpetrators of sexual violence in war enjoyed widespread impunity.

Early prosecutions under international criminal law (ICL) failed to recognize SGBV as international crimes. Sexual violence crimes were largely overlooked by the 1945 International Military Tribunal (Nuremberg Tribunal) and 1946 International Military Tribunal for the Far East (Tokyo Tribunal, or IMTFE), which were created following World War II (De Brouwer 2005: 5–9). The Charters of both Tribunals, which outlined the crimes falling within the Tribunals' jurisdiction, failed to expressly reference sexual and gender-based crimes (Askin 2003: 301). Sexual violence was not explicitly prosecuted at Nuremberg, and the Tokyo Tribunal prosecuted rape in a limited fashion and under general war crimes categories (Askin 2003: 301).

Prosecuting Crimes of SGBV

Since the 1990s, however, ICL has been applied progressively to challenge impunity for these crimes. The UN Security Council established the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) in 1993 and International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) in 1994. These tribunals were charged with bringing prosecutions for war crimes, for genocide, and for crimes against humanity (Haddad 2011). Prosecutions under ICL have also taken place at other ad hoc tribunals (including tribunals for Cambodia, Sierra Leone, and Timor Leste), at domestic courts, and at the permanent International Criminal Court (ICC) (Londras 2010: 290).

The Rwandan and Yugoslav tribunals took important steps to establish accountability for crimes of sexual violence. These tribunals set out legal definitions for sexual violence offences and demonstrated that rape and other forms of sexual violence were prosecutable under charges of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide (Campbell 2016: 227). The 1998 Rome Statute (which created the ICC) built on ICTY and ICTR jurisprudence by recognizing a wide range of sexual and gender-based crimes. The Rome Statute explicitly recognized that rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy, enforced sterilization, and “any other form of sexual violence” can be committed as a war crime or as a crime against humanity (Chappell 2014: 186). And, for the first time, persecution on the grounds of gender was recognized as a crime against humanity (Chappell 2014: 186). These advances challenge the androcentrism of ICL and its historical failure to recognize gender-based harms (Chappell 2015).

International courts and tribunals have introduced a range of policies and strategies to advance the prosecution of SGBV. The Rwandan and Yugoslav Tribunals, and the ICC, all put in place witness protection and support measures, to encourage sexual violence victims to participate as witnesses in court proceedings. These measures include the use of pseudonyms and closed sessions. They also include prohibitions on the admissibility of evidence relating to the prior sexual conduct of a victim, and the use of consent as a defense (De Brouwer 2005: 231–282). Victims and Witnesses Sections were also established to provide counseling and support to victims and witnesses, and training to Tribunal/Court staff (De Brouwer 2005: 277–278). These measures were introduced to safeguard witnesses’ rights to privacy and dignity, to safety, and to physical and psychological well-being (De Brouwer 2005: 231–282).

Steps have been taken to address the historical under-representation of female lawyers, and to embed “gender competence” within the Court and Tribunals (Chappell 2015; Jarvis and Nabti 2016: 79). The Rome Statute, for example, states that “a fair representation of female and male judges” should be considered when appointing judges to the bench (ICC Statute cited in Chappell 2015: 63). Gender advisors and other dedicated mechanisms have also been used to focus attention on sexual violence crimes. At both the ICTY and ICTR, for example, specialized teams were created to investigate sexual assaults. A Legal Advisor for Gender-related Crimes was also appointed to the Office of the Prosecutor at both tribunals, to help advance the investigation and prosecution of sexual violence offences (Haddad 2011: 114–116; Jarvis and Nabti 2016: 74–76).

Limitations of Criminal Justice Mechanisms

Progress has been made in challenging the traditional gender bias of international law. Yet, there remain significant barriers to prosecuting SGBV. Jarvis and Vigneswaran (2016) highlight as key concerns misconceptions regarding the nature of sexual violence (such as the belief that victims are reluctant to testify) and the impact of prosecutorial discretion on which crimes should take priority. The authors also identify key hurdles, or “pressure points,” at each phase of legal proceedings. For example, sexual assault allegations may not be adequately investigated, and charges for sexual violence may fail to be included in indictments or may be dropped at the pre-trial phase (Jarvis and Vigneswaran 2016: 54–66). The attrition of sexual violence cases from the criminal justice system remains a significant concern.

Other scholars identify a need to further develop ICL, so that it more accurately reflects the gender harms of war (Campbell 2016; Jarvis 2016). They point out that prosecutions are hampered by the fact that crimes of SGBV are not standalone offences under ICL and are instead prosecuted as war crimes, crimes against humanity, or as genocide. Consequently, prosecutors must place these acts within the context of conflict, and outline the connections to other acts of violence, so that SGBV can be appropriately charged (Jarvis 2016: 5–8). Another problem is that some forms of SGBV achieve “heightened visibility” while other “types of harms and categories of victims are rendered invisible or unseeable” through the process of legal categorization (Buss 2009: 154–155). At the ICTR, for example, sexual violence perpetrated against Hutu women and Tutsi men tended not to be prosecuted, since these acts did not form part of a genocidal strategy (Buss 2009; Mibenge 2013). One solution to the under-development of ICL, proposed by Campbell (2016), is to introduce a convention on the prohibition, prevention, and punishment of sexual and gender-based crimes. This convention would set out these offences and “incorporate a full range of implementation, enforcement, and referral policies and mechanisms” (Campbell 2016: 229).

The suitability of legal remedies in providing justice to survivors of SGBV is also debated. Key challenges facing victim-witnesses include trauma, fatigue, community silence, and inadequate witness support mechanisms (Jarvis and Vigneswaran 2016). The adversarial structure of legal proceedings can mean that testifying in the courtroom, particularly under cross-examination, is a disempowering experience (Kelsall & Stepakoff 2007; Mertus 2004). Despite the constraints of the legal process, it is important to recognize that witnesses have found space to articulate agency and resistance (Grewal 2017). Nevertheless, the subversive potential of criminal justice is constrained by the tendency of international legal norms and practices to reinforce (rather than undermine) hierarchical gender norms (Campbell 2007).

To promote agency and recovery, Mertus (2004: 124) advocates the use of bottom-up justice mechanisms, such as people’s tribunals, grassroots truth commissions, and memory projects, as complementary to criminal trials. These methods, she points out, focus on addressing victims’ needs, rather than punishing perpetrators. These mechanisms can “help create a narrative that fully includes survivors’ experiences and empowers them in the process,” thereby honoring their agency and strength in recovering and rebuilding their lives (Mertus 2004: 124).

Gender Justice from Below: Women’s Courts and Tribunals

The shortcomings of legal justice have prompted feminists and women’s organizations to pioneer the development of informal truth-telling mechanisms. In the last two decades, civil society groups have organized dozens of Women’s Courts and Tribunals across the world. These are specifically designed to acknowledge women’s experiences of violence and injustice and to call for formal recognition of gender-based harms. Women’s Courts and Tribunals follow a tradition of “popular justice” in which individuals and groups from civil society deliver justice using informal mechanisms (O’Reilly 2016: 428). Popular justice promotes notions of “popular sovereignty, direct governance and control by the people” (Merry & Milner 1995: 4). They involve civil society actors, rather than states or international organizations, taking responsibility for organizing proceedings.

History of Women’s Courts and Tribunals

Women’s Courts and Tribunals are part of “a global movement that seeks to relook at rights and other notions of justice from the lives and life visions of women – particularly from the global South” (El Taller, cited in Duhacek 2015: 160). The concept and model for the Women’s Court emerged in the Asia Pacific region, from the work of the Asian Women’s Human Rights Council (AWHRC) which organized several Courts in the region.

The first Women’s Court was held in Lahore, Pakistan (1992) and focused thematically on violence against women (Kumar 2005: 192). Since then, Women’s Courts have taken place across Asia and have addressed different aspects of gender violence and injustice – including crimes committed against Dalit women (Bangalore, 1994), human trafficking (Kathmandu, 1995), war crimes against women (Tokyo in 1994), and the violence of development (Bangalore, 1995) (Kovačević et al. 2011: 21–33).

AWHRC's sister organization, El Taller International, brought these courts to Africa, the Middle East, and to Central and South America (Duhacek 2015: 175). The Courts have examined a range of topics including the feminization of poverty (Nairobi, 1999), nuclear issues and land rights (Aotearoa, 1999), and war and peace (Cape Town 2001) (Kumar 2005: 194).

A recent example was the Women's Court for the former Yugoslavia, held in May 2015 in Sarajevo. Thirty-six women from all Yugoslav successor states (Bosnia & Herzegovina, Croatia, Kosovo, Macedonia, Montenegro, Serbia, and Slovenia) publicly testified before an audience of around 500 people. The Women's Court – A Feminist Approach to Justice is significant, since it offered an alternative, feminist model of justice to women affected by the violent dissolution of the Yugoslav state during the 1990s (Duhacek 2015).

Women's Tribunals are another important form of popular justice. The first Women's Tribunal, the International Tribunal on Crimes Against Women, was organized in Brussels in 1976. It brought together over 2000 women from over 40 countries to raise awareness of violence against women and to demand that states sanction gender crimes (Russell and Van De Ven 1990: 6). Since then, several women's tribunals have been convened across the world. At the Global Tribunal on Women's Human Rights (Vienna, 1993), for example, participants protested the failure of human rights mechanisms to protect women's rights (Bunch & Reilly 1994). Other Tribunals have sought justice for survivors of wartime sexual violence – including the Women's International War Crimes Tribunal on Japan's Military Sexual Slavery (Tokyo, 2000), the Guatemala Tribunal of Conscience for Women Survivors of Sexual Violence during the Armed Conflict (Guatemala City, 2010), and the Women's Tribunal on Sexual Violence on Women During Conflict (Kathmandu, 2014).

Alternative Model of Gender Justice

A similar model of gender justice underpins the work of Women's Courts and Tribunals. First, it is grassroots women's organizations, survivor's organizations, and other actors from civil society who take the lead in organizing proceedings. The Women's Court for the former Yugoslavia, for example, was organized by a coalition of women's groups and nongovernmental organizations from across the region of ex-Yugoslavia (Duhacek 2015).

Second, these alternative mechanisms are established in response to the failure of formal justice mechanisms to secure redress for survivors of SGBV (Duhacek 2015). The Women's Tribunal in Tokyo, for example, was created in response to the failure of the IMTFE to bring charges against those responsible for rape and sexual slavery by the Japanese military during World War II, and in response to the refusal of the Japanese government to accept legal responsibility for these crimes (Chinkin 2001: 335–336).

Third, Women's Courts and Tribunals are designed as women-only hearings. Violence specifically perpetrated against women, particularly rape and sexual violence, is significantly underreported in the proceedings and reports of mainstream justice mechanisms (Goldblatt & Meintjes 1998). The rationale for organizing women-only hearings in Guatemala and other peacebuilding contexts is that supportive spaces are required to enable women to testify to violence against themselves (Crosby and Lykes 2011: 461).

Fourth, since Women's Courts and Tribunals take place in contexts where perpetrators of human rights abuses enjoy widespread impunity, the process of organizing and preparing for each court or tribunal is emphasized as strongly as the hearings themselves (Duhacek 2015: 161). In the lead-up to the Women's Court for former Yugoslavia, for example, women's organizations spent 5 years prior to the event raising awareness of the initiative within their local communities and working with potential witnesses by providing practical and psychological support and preparing them to testify (O'Reilly 2016). This preparatory process is viewed as essential to ensure that a supportive environment is created where survivors feel safe and empowered to voice their experiences.

Fifth, in contrast to international criminal tribunals (such as the ICTY and ICTR), Women's Courts and Tribunals localize justice by holding proceedings in the countries where human rights abuses took place, rather than organizing these in third countries (Chinkin 2001: 339–340; O'Reilly 2016: 429). This allows each initiative to design the preparatory process and proceedings so that they acknowledge and respond to the situated experiences, interests, and concerns of the context in which they take place (Duhacek 2015). It also provides opportunities to create space for public discussions and debate on the wartime past, using street performances, art exhibitions, and other artistic interventions and alternative commemorative practices (O'Reilly 2016).

Sixth, the structure of proceedings holds some continuity with the structure of legal proceedings. The Women's Tribunal in Tokyo, for example, resembled a mock trial. It featured testimonies of women who survived military sexual slavery and was the first time these experiences were publicly aired. Prosecution teams from ten countries where women were enslaved, plus two lead prosecutors, presented indictments (Chinkin 2001: 336). After oral and documentary evidence was presented by victim-witnesses and by expert witnesses, a panel of international judges deliberated before handing down a preliminary judgment. This judgment indicated that the Tribunal found Emperor Hirohito guilty on the basis of command responsibility, and also indicated that Japan was responsible for crimes of rape and sexual slavery as crimes against humanity (Chinkin 2001: 338).

Reformist Versus Transformative Approaches

There are, however, important differences between, on the one hand, Women's Courts and Tribunals, and, on the other hand, legal proceedings. Unlike criminal trials, the proceedings are not adversarial and these alternative justice institutions do not have the power to sanction perpetrators or award reparations (Duhacek 2015).

Furthermore, while some Women's Courts and Tribunals are "distinctly legal projects" that aim to reform and extend the law, others demonstrate "transformative ambitions beyond the law" (Otto 2017: 228).

The Women's Tribunal in Tokyo took a reformist approach to gender justice. It was designed to extend IMTFE proceedings and drew on international law which was applicable at the time of the events to establish guilt and legal responsibility (Chinkin 2001: 338). In this way, the Tribunal aimed to extend legal justice to women who had been denied justice by the IMTFE and formal justice institutions, and also aimed to contribute to the development of international law (Dolgopol 2003).

By contrast, the Sarajevo Women's Court represents a transformative approach which moved beyond the framework of legal justice (Otto 2017). It offered an explicitly feminist model of justice which promoted greater empathy for, and solidarity with, survivors of SGBV (Zajović 2015), while also providing space for women to take up agential roles as "political subjects" (rather than objects) of justice (O'Reilly 2016: 426). As described by participants of preparatory workshops, the Court aimed to:

- Make visible the continuum of violence experienced by women across war and peace
- Give voice to women's situated experiences and incorporate these into collective memory
- Acknowledge the suffering of victims
- Identify the wider social, economic, cultural, relational, and personal context in which violence against women was enabled
- Construct a new approach to justice that addresses victims' needs
- Empower women and create transnational networks of solidarity
- Prevent future crimes and build a just peace for future generations (Zajović 2015: 26–27)

At the proceedings, witnesses testified to a wide spectrum of harms and to the ongoing impact of war and of post-war liberalization processes. Expert testimonies contextualized witnesses' accounts, highlighting the structural inequalities and hierarchies of power that provided the enabling conditions for SGBV to materialize (O'Reilly 2016). The preliminary decision issued by the Court's Judicial Council named the crimes that were perpetrated. It also identified as responsible individuals and groups who were part of "systems of criminality, which reinforce and intensify unequal power relations between men and women" (Bunch et al. 2015: 5). The decision called for "truth, justice, reparations, and a commitment that these crimes will never recur" (Bunch et al. 2015: 6). It also foregrounded the courage and agency of survivors in giving testimony and fighting for justice. Overall, the Sarajevo Court extended recognition of women across the former Yugoslavia as victims, as survivors, and (crucially) as agents of change. It also expanded women's participation in justice processes and strengthened calls for redistributive justice in the region (O'Reilly 2016).

Summary

Feminist contributions to the fields of transitional justice and peacebuilding have critically evaluated the extent to which post-war justice mechanisms adequately respond to gendered forms of violence and help to build a gender-just peace. A top-down approach aims to provide gender justice from above. This involves states and/or international organizations establishing courts and tribunals where perpetrators are held accountable under the law. Prosecutions under ICL have been used to challenge impunity. By prosecuting SGBV in conflict, acts of SGBV are recognized as serious crimes worthy of redress. Legal rules and practices of rendering justice have evolved significantly in recent decades. Yet, further steps are required to address gaps in gender justice and to ensure that the law adequately captures gendered experiences of harm. There is an ongoing need to identify and address the various barriers to prosecution and to enable survivors of SGBV to participate in legal proceedings in ways that honors their agency and courage in surviving these crimes.

An alternative approach is to use Women's Courts and Tribunals. This bottom-up approach involves grassroots actors establishing informal truth-telling initiatives. Women's Courts and Tribunals aspire to better respond to the needs of survivors and the communities and societies in which they live. These provide alternative arenas in which survivors of SGBV can testify to the various harms endured – in public and private, in wartime, and in peacetime. They open up space to discuss the continuity of the forms of violence that are experienced across war and peace.

Whichever mechanisms (or combination of mechanisms) are chosen, many feminists point to the need to shift the focus from affirmative to transformative approaches to remedying injustice. Building gender-just peace involves not only acknowledging the gender harms of war, it also involves achieving a more equitable distribution of material resources within a society. Moreover, gender-just peace means enabling survivors of SGBV to participate as agents of post-war justice and peacebuilding processes. Both criminal trials and grassroots truth-telling initiatives can contribute to gender justice in peacebuilding contexts. The challenge is to use these mechanisms to generate positive impacts on the lives of individuals and communities recovering from war. This involves challenging (rather than reinforcing) the underlying gender inequalities that enable gendered forms of violence to be perpetrated.

Cross-References

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-conflict Contexts

Acknowledgments Maria O'Reilly, Gendered Agency in War and Peace, 2018, Palgrave Macmillan, reproduced with permission of Palgrave Macmillan.

References

- Askin, K. D. (2003). The quest for post-conflict gender justice. Columbia Journal of Transnational Law, 41(3), 509–552.
- Bedont, B., & Hall-Martinez, K. (1999). Ending impunity for gender crimes under the international criminal court. Brown Journal of World Affairs, 6(1), 65–85.
- Bell, C. (2015). Text and context: Evaluating peace agreements for their 'gender perspective'. New York: UN Women.
- Bell, C. (2018). Women, peace negotiations, and peace agreements. In F. Ni Aoláin, N. Cahn, D. F. Haynes, & N. Valji (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of gender and conflict (pp. 417–429). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Bell, C., & O'Rourke, C. (2007). Does feminist need a theory of transitional justice? An introductory essay. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(1), 23–44.
- Bluen, K. (2016). Globalizing justice, homogenizing sexual violence: The legacy of the ICTY and ICTR in terms of sexual violence. AJIL Unbound, 110, 214–219.
- Boesten, J., & Wilding, P. (2015). Transformative gender justice: Setting an agenda. Women's Studies International Forum, 51, 75–80.
- Bunch, C., & Reilly, N. (1994). Demanding accountability: The global campaign and Vienna Tribunal for women's human rights. New York: The Centre for Women's Global Leadership and the United Nations Development Fund for Women.
- Bunch, C., Campbell, K., Mlinarevic, G., Otto, D., Perovic, L., Rakic Vodinelic, V., & Terselic, V. (2015). Preliminary Decision, Judicial Council of the Women's Court for the Former Yugoslavia. Available at <https://research.gold.ac.uk/id/eprint/17965/1/Women's%20Court%20Preliminary%20Decision%20Judicial%20Council%2009%2005%202015.pdf>. Last accessed 20 May 2021.
- Buss, D. E. (2009). Rethinking 'rape as a weapon of war'. Feminist Legal Studies, 17(2), 145–163.
- Buss, D. (2014). Seeing sexual violence in conflict and post-conflict societies. In D. Buss, J. Lebert, B. Rutherford, D. Sharkey, & O. Aginam (Eds.), Sexual violence in conflict and post-conflict societies: International agendas and African contexts (pp. 1–27). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Campbell, K. (2007). The gender of transitional justice: Law, sexual violence and the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(3), 411–431.
- Campbell, K. (2016). Gender justice beyond the tribunals: From criminal accountability to transformative justice. AJIL Unbound, 110, 227–233.
- Campbell, K. (2018). Producing knowledge in the field of sexual violence in armed conflict research: Objects, methods, politics, and gender justice methodology. Social Politics: International Studies in Gender, State & Society, 25(4), 469–495.
- Chappell, L. (2014). Conflicting institutions and the search for gender justice at the international criminal court. Political Research Quarterly, 67(1), 183–196.
- Chappell, L. (2015). The politics of gender justice at the international criminal court: Legacies and legitimacy. Oxford University Press.
- Chinkin, C. (1994). Rape and sexual abuse of women in international law. European Journal of International Law, 5(3), 326–341.
- Chinkin, C. (2001). Women's international tribunal on Japanese military sexual slavery. The American Journal of International Law, 95(2), 335–341.
- Chinkin, C. (2006). People's tribunals: Legitimate or rough justice. Windsor Yearbook Access to Justice, 24(2), 201–220.
- Crosby, A., & Lykes, B. M. (2011). Mayan women survivors speak: The gendered relations of truth telling in postwar Guatemala. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 5(3), 456–476.
- De Brouwer, A.M. (2005). Supranational Criminal Prosecution of Sexual Violence: The ICC and the Practice of the ICTY and the ICTR (Vol. 20). Intersentia nv.
- De Brouwer, A. M. (2009). What the international criminal court has achieved and can achieve for victim/survivors of sexual violence. International Review of Victimology, 16(2), 183–209.
- De Londras, F. (2010). Prosecuting sexual violence in the ad hoc international criminal tribunals for Rwanda and the Former Yugoslavia. In M. Albertson Fineman (Ed.), Transcending the boundaries of law: Generations of feminism and legal theory (pp. 290–304). New York: Routledge.
- Dolgopol, T. (2003). The judgment of the Tokyo Women's tribunal. Alternative Law Journal, 28(5), 242–249.
- Duhacek, D. G. (2015). The women's court: A feminist approach to in/justice. European Journal of Women's Studies, 22(2), 159–176.
- Đurić Kuzmanović, T., & Pajvančić-Cizelj, A. (2020). Economic violence against women: Testimonies from the women's court in Sarajevo. European Journal of Women's Studies, 27(1), 25–40.
- Ferizović, J., & Mlinarević, G. (2020). Applying international experiences in National Prosecutions of conflict-related sexual violence: A case study of application of the ICTY law, findings and practices in prosecutions before the court of Bosnia and Herzegovina. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 18(2), 325–348.
- Gallagher, M. E., Prakash, D., & Li, Z. (2020). Engendering justice: Women and the prosecution of sexual violence in international criminal courts. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(2), 227–249.
- Gardam, J. G., & Jarvis, M. J. (2001). Women, armed conflict, and international law. The Hague: Kluwer Law International.
- Goldblatt, B., & Meintjes, S. (1998). Dealing with the aftermath: Sexual violence and the truth and reconciliation commission. Agenda, 13(36), 7–18.

- Grey, R., McLoughlin, K., & Chappell, L. (2021). Gender and judging at the international criminal court: Lessons from 'feminist judgment projects'. Leiden Journal of International Law, 34(1), 247–264.
- Grewal. (2017). The socio-political practice of human rights: Between the universal and the particular (p. 2017). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Haddad, H. N. (2011). Mobilizing the will to prosecute: Crimes of rape at the Yugoslav and Rwandan tribunals. Human Rights Review, 12(1), 109–132.
- Hagen, J. J. (2016). Queering women, peace and security. International Affairs, 92(2), 313–332.
- Harbour, G. (2016). International concern regarding conflict-related sexual violence in the Lead-up to the ICTY's establishment. In S. Brammertz & M. Jarvis (Eds.), Prosecuting conflict-related sexual violence at the ICTY (pp. 19–32). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Hayner, P. B. (2001). Unspeakable truths: Facing the challenge of truth commissions. New York: Routledge.
- Jarvis, M. (2016). Overview: The challenge of accountability for conflict-related sexual violence crimes. In S. Brammertz & M. Jarvis (Eds.), Prosecuting conflict-related sexual violence at the ICTY (pp. 1–18). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jarvis, M., & Nabti, N. (2016). Policies and institutional strategies for successful sexual violence prosecutions. In S. Brammertz & M. Jarvis (Eds.), Prosecuting conflict-related sexual violence at the ICTY (pp. 73–110). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Jarvis, M., & Vigneswaran, K. (2016). Challenges to successful outcomes in sexual violence cases. In S. Brammertz & M. Jarvis (Eds.), Prosecuting conflict-related sexual violence at the ICTY (pp. 33–72). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Kent, L. (2014). Narratives of suffering and endurance: Coercive sexual relationships, truth commissions and possibilities for gender justice in Timor-Leste. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8(2), 289–313.
- Kelsall, M. S., & Stepakoff, S. (2007). "When we wanted to talk about rape": Silencing sexual violence at the special court for Sierra Leone. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(3), 355–374.
- Kimura, M. (2016). Unfolding the 'comfort women' debates: Modernity, violence, Women's voices. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Kumar, C. (2005). South wind: Towards a new political imaginary. In M. R. Waller & S. Marcos (Eds.), Dialogue and difference: Feminisms challenge globalization (pp. 165–199). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kusafuka, A. (2009). Truth commissions and gender: A south African case study. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 9(2), 45–67.
- Manjoo, R. (2017). Introduction: Reflections on the concept and implementation of transformative reparations. International Journal of Human Rights, 21(9), 1193–1203.
- Mookherjee, N. (2015). The spectral wound: Sexual violence, public memories, and the Bangladesh war of 1971. Durham, NC: Duke University Press.
- Meron, T. (1993). Rape as a crime under international humanitarian law. The American Journal of International Law, 87(3), 424–428.
- Merry, S. E., & Milner, N. (1995). Introduction. In S. E. Merry & N. Milner (Eds.), The possibility of popular justice: A case study of community mediation in the United States (pp. 1–30). Michigan: University of Michigan Press.
- Mertus, J. (2004). Shouting from the bottom of the well: The impact of international trials for wartime rape on Women's agency. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 6(1), 110–128.
- Mertus, J. (2008). When adding women matters: Women's participation in the international criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. Seton Hall Law Review, 38(4), 1297–1326.
- Mibenge, C. S. (2013). Sex and international tribunals: The erasure of gender from the war narrative. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Mischkowski, G., & Hauser, M. Sexualised wartime violence – Perception and consequences. In M. Mondiale (Ed.), My body is no battlefield: Expert articles on sexualised violence, trauma and justice (pp. 8–12). Cologne: Medica Mondiale. e.V.
- Nesiah, V. (2006). Truth commissions and gender: Principles, policies, and procedures. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice.
- Ní Aoláin, F. (2019). Transformative gender justice? In P. Gready & S. Robins (Eds.), From transitional to transformative justice (pp. 150–171). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Ní Aoláin, F., & Turner, C. (2007). Gender, truth & (and) transition. UCLA Women's LJ, 16, 229–279.
- Otto, D. (2017). Beyond legal justice: Some personal reflections on people's tribunals, listening and responsibility. London Review of International Law, 5(2), 225–249.
- Porobić Isaković, N., & Mlinarević, G. (2019). Sustainable transitions to peace need Women's groups and feminists. Journal of International Affairs, 72(2), 173–190.
- Reid, L. (2021). Peace agreements and women's political rights following civil war. Journal of Peace Research. 0022343320972748.
- O'Reilly, M. (2016). Peace and justice through a feminist lens: Gender justice and the Women's court for the former Yugoslavia. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 419–445.
- O'Reilly, M. (2018). Gendered agency in war and peace. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Sarkin, J., & Ackermann, S. (2019). Understanding the extent to which truth commissions are gender sensitive and promote women's issues: Comparing and contrasting these truth commission roles in South Africa, Guatemala, Peru, Sierra Leone and Liberia. Georgetown Journal of International Law, 50(2), 463–516.

- Shekhawat, S. (2015). Introduction: Women in conflict and peace-making. In S. Shekhawat (Ed.), Female combatants in conflict and peace (pp. 1–19). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Staggs Kelsall, M., & Stepakoff, S. (2007). ‘When we wanted to talk about rape’: Silencing sexual violence at the special court for Sierra Leone. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 1(3), 355–374.
- Theidon, K. (2007). Gender in transition: Common sense, women, and war. Journal of Human Rights, 6(4), 453–478.
- Valji, N. (2007). Gender justice and reconciliation. Berlin: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung.
- Valji, N., Sigsworth, R. and Goetz, A. M. (2012). A Window of Opportunity: Making Transitional Justice Work for Women, UN Women (second edition).
- Verrall, S. (2016). A picture of sexual violence in the former Yugoslavia conflicts as reflected in ICTY judgments. In S. Brammertz & M. Jarvis (Eds.), Prosecuting conflict-related sexual violence at the ICTY (pp. 229–334). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Viseur Sellers, P., & Okuizumi, K. (1997). Intentional prosecution of sexual assaults. Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems, 7, 45–80.
- Wood, E. J. (2009). Armed groups and sexual violence: When is wartime rape rare? Politics and Society, 37(1), 131–161.
- Zajović, S. (2015). The Women’s court - a feminist approach to justice. In S. Zajović (Ed.), Women’s court: About the process (pp. 6–66). Belgrade: Women in Black and Centre for Women’s Studies.

Gender Mainstreaming

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Gender-Just Peace

- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding

Genocide

- ▶ Post-Conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ R2P and Prevention

Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence

Emma Elfversson¹, Ivan Gusic^{2,3},
Thao-Nguyen Ha⁴ and Marie-Therese Meyer⁵

¹Department of Peace and Conflict Research,
Uppsala University, Uppsala, Sweden

²Lund University, Lund, Sweden

³Department of Global Political Studies, Malmö
University, Malmö, Sweden

⁴Department of Political Science, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, TN, USA

⁵Graduate School of Social Sciences, University of Mannheim, Mannheim, Germany

Definition/Description

Geocoding refers to the systematic assignment of geographic coordinates (such as longitude and latitude) in order to denote places in the world where something is located or takes place. Geocoding within peace and conflict research usually refers to pinning down the precise locations where violent interactions or other similar events take place, with the purpose of enabling the study of spatial dynamics of violence across time and space. Geocoded violent event datasets usually contain rows of information where each row represents an event and rows contain information such as date, form of event, intensity of violence, and the actors involved, in addition to location coordinates. Such data can then be projected onto a map to study patterns of violence or analyzed using statistical software to assess if and why certain types of events tend to occur close to each other. It can also be connected to other geocoded datasets to assess whether certain physical or social conditions increase or decrease risks of violence locally. The introduction of geocoded event datasets covering multiple states since around 2010 have opened up many new avenues of inquiry within peace and conflict research as well as helped answer old questions.

The authors are listed alphabetically, and have contributed equally to the chapter.

Synonyms

Event data; Location data; Mapping

Introduction

The location of conflict-related violence is fundamental to how it is reacted to or what consequences it has. People in the vicinity of violence tend to flee from it while societies exposed to it often suffer enormous losses – of population, infrastructure, political institutions, economic output, and societal norms. Those at safe distance can in turn resort to increasing aid, accepting refugees, and sending peacekeepers or ignoring the matter, closing borders, and exploiting the situation for economic, geopolitical, or military gains. Where violence happens thus has an enormous impact on both its immediate surroundings and the world beyond. This means that knowing where violence happens (and where it does not) is key for research exploring why it happens and what events or dynamics fuel it, predicting where and when it will manifest, or developing tools for dealing with or even preventing it.

In line with realizing the importance of location, peace and conflict researchers have begun mapping where violence takes place by geocoding it, which concretely means systematically assigning geographic coordinates (such as longitude and latitude) to denote places in the world where violence is located or manifests. The overall ambition of these endeavors is to enable the study of spatial patterns of violence, which then can be used to understand what dynamics fuel or suppress violence as well as what kind of spaces attract or are spared from it. Analyses of geocoded data add to a broader body of empirical research on armed conflict and political violence, comprising in-depth studies of individual cases – such as states, regions, or other geographic entities – and comparative studies across multiple cases, including statistical analyses covering the whole world.

Geocoded data on violent events has made possible a broad range of empirical analyses that generate new knowledge, both on individual cases and vis-à-vis broader questions. Examples are when an analysis of the Peruvian armed conflict in the 1980s counterintuitively reveals that communities victimized by state forces were more likely to revolt against insurgents at later stages of the conflict (Schubiger 2021) or when a cross-case analysis of geocoded data questions the common assumption that armed conflict has become increasingly urban (Elfvérsson and Höglund 2021).

By enabling the study of spatial patterns of violence dynamics, as well as the links between such patterns and other sociopolitical dynamics at the subnational level, geocoding has facilitated a much more nuanced and in-depth understanding of violence and its causes and effects. It is therefore important for students, scholars, and analysts to understand the opportunities and challenges of geocoding within peace and conflict studies as well as the practical procedure of compiling and working with geocoded violence data. This chapter provides an overview of these matters. It begins by making a theoretical case for geocoding and gives examples of the types of knowledge the availability of geocoded data has enabled. The next section presents a concrete example of the practice of geocoding conflict-related violence, discusses practical challenges involved in geocoding, and provides some examples of how the data can be used. The chapter concludes with a summary and outlook for future research – both research enabled by and research avenues opened through geocoding.

A Theoretical Case for Geocoding

Many of the theoretical questions peace and conflict scholars have engaged with through the discipline's history are fundamentally spatial in nature. Concepts such as war zones and peace zones are in themselves spatial, while questions about conflict dynamics are inherently linked to patterns of fighting and control across space – for instance, territorial sovereignty is often the key aim of war while securing strategic sites is crucial in winning it (Björkdahl and Buckley-Zistel 2016). Other theoretical questions also require attention to trends, patterns, and dynamics that take place in specific locations. To fully understand why war breaks out, we need to examine the confluence of factors that shape motivations and possibilities for armed struggle among people within a specific local context. Understanding prospects for sustainable peace after war in turn necessitates paying attention to the local experiences of peacebuilding and the way that space conditions interactions and power relations (Crossref: ► Human Geography and Peacebuilding; Crossref: ► Local Peacebuilding; Crossref: ► Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation). The actual location of violence is thus key to answering some of the most fundamental problems that have occupied peace and conflict scholars for long, while knowing where violence takes place in more detail also enables asking new questions about the causes, experiences, and consequences of violence.

In line with such considerations, geocoded conflict datasets have begun laying the foundation for major advances in empirical peace research. Geocoded data has been a longtime feature in some fields of research, such as studies of climate change and geophysical features, urbanization, and logistics. Within peace and conflict studies, however, geocoding is a relatively recent phenomenon. A major development has been the introduction of violent events datasets covering large-scale political violence across the world or large parts of it. Examples are the Uppsala Conflict Data Program's Georeferenced Events Dataset (UCDP GED) (Sundberg and Melander 2013), the Armed Conflict Location and Events Dataset (ACLED) (Raleigh et al. 2010), and the Social Conflict in Africa Database (SCAD) (Salehyan et al. 2012). More recent additions include geocoded data on the subnational presence of peacekeeping operations (Cil et al. 2019), sexual violence during armed conflict (Bahgat et al. 2016) and social disorder in major cities in the developing world (Urdal and Hoelscher 2012), as well as microlevel data on violence within specific cities such as Belfast (Cunningham and Gregory 2014) and Jerusalem (Rokem et al. 2018). Datasets like these have enabled researchers to study quantitatively how localized weather and climate patterns affect the risk that violence breaks out (Fjelde and von Uexkull 2012; Gizelis et al. 2021; Hendrix and Salehyan 2012); how the degree of state presence and power struggles in different parts of a country affect different types of conflict (Elfverson 2015; Raleigh 2014); and how the experience of conflict at the local level affects long-term health and well-being (Bendavid et al. 2021). More generally, the availability of geocoded data has – in combination with in-depth qualitative case studies that have always been a core component of peace and conflict research – improved the theoretical and empirical understanding of how armed conflicts emerge, develop, and end.

Research on peacekeeping is one concrete example of the importance of knowing where conflict and peace take place. Geocoded conflict data has enabled researchers to more closely study theorized links between peacekeeping presence and violence deterrence. The question of whether peacekeeping “works” in preventing a resurgence of warfare has for long been an unresolved debate within the field (Crossref: see ► Assessment of Peace Operations), partly because many of the theoretical mechanisms posited – such as physically preventing violence or shaming perpetrators through monitoring – play out locally whereas comparative studies have often focused on the state or conflict as the unit of analysis. The result of the data being too aggregated is that researchers have been unable to explore and explain relevant micro dynamics closer to the theorized causal mechanisms. This has recently begun to change as studies using disaggregated geocoded data have been able to make major advances to the theoretical understanding of peacekeeping by showing that the presence of peacekeepers at the local level has a clear effect in terms of shortening episodes of conflict (Ruggeri et al. 2017), bolstering local economies (Bove et al. 2021), and reducing the risk of violence against civilians (Fjelde et al. 2019).

In addition to the ability to carry out statistical analysis of causal hypotheses with better precision, geocoding as a method in itself is exciting because it gives researchers a unique way to combine quantitative and qualitative research as well as positivist and critical traditions. The field of human geography has spearheaded an extensive methodological debate and a robust research agenda that seeks to incorporate the merits of these different methodological and theoretical strands (e.g., Schwanen and Kwan 2009; Shelton et al. 2015). Other fields may also benefit from such a pragmatic approach given that systematically geocoded data can – as an example – underpin critical studies that challenge dominant conceptualizations of cases and spaces.

Take the city of Belfast as an illustrative example. At first glance, the entire city was ravaged by war for nearly three decades and today remains stuck in its transition to peace. Yet disaggregated data at the sub-city level complicates the picture as it reveals that the city’s north, west, and center were disproportionately affected by riots, shootings, and bombs while the east and south were much less affected to the point that these two clusters almost constituted different worlds (Cunningham and Gregory 2014). It also tells us that this pattern remains in the postwar period as the east, south, and the now regenerated city center have “moved on” – at least economically if not also politically and socially – from war while the north and west remain in a “no war no peace” state (cf. Mac Ginty 2016; Murtagh et al. 2019). Disaggregated and more fine-grained geocoded data thus shows us that for some Belfast was never that dangerous and today almost is like any other city, while for others it was immensely dangerous and remains so today.

The example of Belfast furthermore underlines that the degree of precision in the geocoding – which can vary between assigning events to very specific places (such as a particular building or landmark), via villages or towns, to less precise assignment of events to subnational regions, districts, or even states – matters immensely for the type of research questions the data can help answer and in what ways. The case of Belfast, just as the research on peacekeeping mentioned above, underlines how conclusions made on aggregated geocoded data may be nuanced and sometimes even “proven wrong” when this data is disaggregated and more fine-grained insights are gained.

The move toward increasingly disaggregated data also aligns well with the recent “turn” in peace and conflict research toward recognizing that war and peace are inescapably spatial in the sense that they shape but also are shaped by space (Crossref: ► Human Geography and Peacebuilding; Crossref: ► Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation). This intrinsic relationality between space and violence reiterates that knowledge about where violence happens – and also: where it does not – is fundamental to understanding its causes and effects. It is only by knowing where violence takes place and exploring the nature of these sites – e.g. their material composition, who lives there and what relations they have, what (political, economic, social, strategic, geopolitical) roles they play, how they are governed, and so on – that we can begin understanding what dynamics and conditions cause violence. The examination of sites which are spared from violence might in turn uncover what planning regimes, policing strategies, economic models, or demographic compositions are effective against violence.

Geocoded Data on Conflict-Related Violence in Cities

One research agenda where geocoded data has enabled new progress revolves around urban peace and conflict (Crossref: ► Urban Peacebuilding) – including how political violence manifests differently between rural and urban areas (e.g., Elfversson and Höglund 2021; Nedal et al. 2019; Raleigh 2015) and if climate-driven urbanization affects risks of violent contestation in cities (Gizelis et al. 2021; Petrova 2021). Much of this existing research has studied patterns within and across entire states. Studies using geocoded data to analyze patterns within cities are, by contrast, relatively scarce since most of the major conflict datasets do not geocode events to precise locations within cities. UCDP assigns all events within one city to a standardized set of coordinates for that city (i.e. its central point) (Högbladh 2021: 36). ACLED does assign some events to a more specific location within cities – “when events occur in neighbourhoods of large cities and distinct neighbourhood/district coordinates are available” – but does not discriminate between these and city-level events through its precision codes (ACLED 2019: 29). These examples illustrate that the highest precision level in some of the leading armed conflict datasets often is quite far from the location where an act of violence actually takes place. While geocoded datasets such as these have – as illustrated above – enabled a lot of progress within peace and conflict studies, they usually do not enable analysis of violence dynamics within cities – meaning that we neither know in which city parts violence concentrates nor why.

There are many benefits of geocoding event data with higher precision within cities. For instance, such data can help us better understand why many postwar cities remain (or become) violently contested even after war has formally ended (Crossref: ► Divided Cities; Crossref: ► Urban Violence and Crime). A few recent studies that have used geocoded data to look at patterns within cities during and after war illustrate the potential of such data to assess how urban peacekeeping relates to dynamics of violence in a case like Mogadishu (Elfversson et al. 2019) and how infrastructure and mobility affects risks for individual and collective violence within a contested city like Jerusalem (Rokem et al. 2018). The following section presents the process of geocoding as a method for mapping conflict-related violence in postwar cities in more depth, as well as illustrates some of the potential uses of such data, drawing on insights and experiences from the research project The continuation of conflict-related violence in postwar cities: Mapping violence at the street level (below, “Postwar Cities”).

Geocoding in Practice

The process of geocoding involves several steps and a significant amount of detective work. A first step is to identify the events to be geocoded. This normally entails defining a set of scope conditions and definitions, and then conducting a systematic search in news databases or other information repositories. Within the Postwar Cities project, research assistants rely on a pre-set search string in order to identify events of conflict-related violence that occur within a set of postwar cities. The procedure is guided by a detailed codebook where each part of the procedure is concretized and documented. This includes defining conflict-related violence as violence which is perpetrated by those previously active in the war and/or which is manifested across identity lines that were salient in the war, as well as delimiting the scope to events that entail serious physical violence. The codebook also sets out the search string used by the research assistants to identify events in a major news database. For each city, the search string includes the city name (taking account of different names and spellings), a set of standardized keywords to pick up reports of physical violence, and context-specific keywords that enable connecting the event to the preceding war.

The codebook also describes all the variables to be coded based on the news information, and the values the variables can take. Some variables denote intensity or level (e.g. number of reported injuries), others contain standardized categories (e.g. type of weapons used), while some contain free-text descriptions of the violent event and actors involved. Information about each identified event is noted down in a structured spreadsheet. In addition to systematically recording information about the actors involved and the nature of the violent event, all available information about the physical location of the event – such as the neighborhood, street names, and proximity to certain landmarks or buildings – is carefully noted down and used as a basis for assigning geocoordinates that as precisely as possible locate the event on the city map.

The result of the coding process is a spreadsheet where each row denotes one event and different columns contain information about different variables – e.g. the date the event took place, the actors involved, the dynamics and intensity of violence, and the location of the event. The latter includes a description of the specific location, within what part of the city it is located, and the latitude and longitude coordinates.

Practical Challenges and Solutions in Geocoding Violence Within Cities

The procedure of pinpointing events to specific geocoordinates is often challenging and time consuming. Within the Postwar Cities project, the aim is to be able to assign each event to a location that is as precise as possible. In some cases, the specific location is immediately available – e.g. a report may specify that the event took place inside a specific public building, on a specific bridge, or similar. Yet reports of violence often do not provide enough details. News reports often only mention in which neighborhood or city administrative area an event has taken place. There are, however, often additional clues that, given some triangulation, can help derive a more specific location – the report may mention that the event took place outside a pub associated with a certain sports team, or that it occurred near the residence of a certain politician. In Abidjan, an incident was described as taking place at the base of a pro-government militia group and using an external source, the location of this former base was possible to identify. In other cases, satellite imagery can be used to confirm the precise location of a site, such as the parking lot of the Hotel Ivoire, also in Abidjan.

While it is often possible to pinpoint geocoordinates through a search in web mapping platforms, such as Google Maps, Wikimapia, or Mapcarta, sometimes information on the location of violence events does not produce any tangible results. When coding historical events, for example, street names or neighborhood layouts mentioned in old news reports may not exist anymore. In the case of Belfast, this meant that historical maps, online neighborhood forums, and transcriptions of historical street directories had to be used to pinpoint locations of violent events. Meanwhile, some cities or neighborhoods do not have official street names, with residents often using nearby landmarks as points of references. Real estate websites can also be a good resource for cities for which maps do not have enough information on sub-district-level units – if not to identify the location, then to confirm that it indeed exists before further researching geocoordinates.

Other challenges of geocoding might include discrepancies in how place names are spelled or in which languages locations appear in. In Beirut, a directory of restaurants and eateries called “Zomato” was used to identify street names since these were available on Google Maps only in Arabic. In Mitrovica, Kosovo, news reports variously referred to locations in Serbian, Albanian, or English, thus requiring some triangulation in determining what places were referenced.

One specific challenge relates to determining whether events took place within the city at all. This includes taking a theoretically informed decision on where the city ends and the surrounding areas begin. Within the Postwar Cities project, cities are theoretically understood as being heterogeneous, densely populated, open/permeable, and functioning through mixing, conflict, accommodation, creativity, and fragmentation (Gusic 2020). These characteristics are most likely to be present within the contiguous built-up area with dense communication networks to the rest of the city – this is where people and ideas are in close proximity and contact. Consequently, suburbs that are well-integrated into the city fabric are included, but not satellite cities and peri-urban areas.

A particularly difficult case for geocoding presented itself in the city of Imphal. Here, news reports use the labels “Imphal West” and “Imphal East” for the two main sub-divisions of the city as well as for the larger districts of the area that reach far beyond the city borders. This meant that every event had to be carefully evaluated based on the question whether it occurred inside the city or not. In one event this required mapping the potential routes that a victim, who was shot dead while driving their vehicle, could have taken to reach their intended destination, and the determination whether these routes fell within the city boundaries or not.

Limitations and Dilemmas in Geocoding Violence

A first broader challenge when it comes to any geocoding project is that it is a time-consuming endeavor. As can be gleaned from the examples above, every geographic context brings unique challenges with it that require adaptation and creativity in the individual coding procedures. A general point then is that high-quality geocoding requires coder familiarity with the case in question. Those planning a geocoding project should make sure to include ample time in their planning for getting familiar with the cases to be coded as well as for geographic detective work subsequently needed throughout the coding process. Much of this entails learning about how a city works. The experiences within the Postwar Cities project also underline that it may be impossible to achieve maximum precision for all events (see also Sundberg and Melander 2013). This has important implications for analysts: For instance, quantitative algorithms to detect clusters of events should always be validated by rigorous qualitative examination of the nature of each event.

In addition to the practical challenges of assigning events to specific locations, geocoding also raises ethical dilemmas that warrant reflection. For example, information about a person's home can be considered sensitive. Researchers compiling and analyzing this type of data should therefore be mindful of what information is made available to others. As an example, the Postwar Cities project, while relying on publicly available information to compile the datasets, only makes available the data in a form where the coordinates are not connected to information identifying individuals. Additional concerns relate to the purposes for which the data might be used – for instance, how should we handle data that could be sensitive for battle outcomes? It is also important, as has been emphasized by other fields, that we are careful when branding certain areas as “hotspots of violence” because doing so can create new cartographies that affect how UN peacekeepers move around, or whether areas are safe/dangerous with implications for policing strategies and everyday life (Ratcliffe 2002; Kindynis 2014; Lemay-Hebert 2018).

Using Geocoded Data to Analyze Violence in Postwar Cities

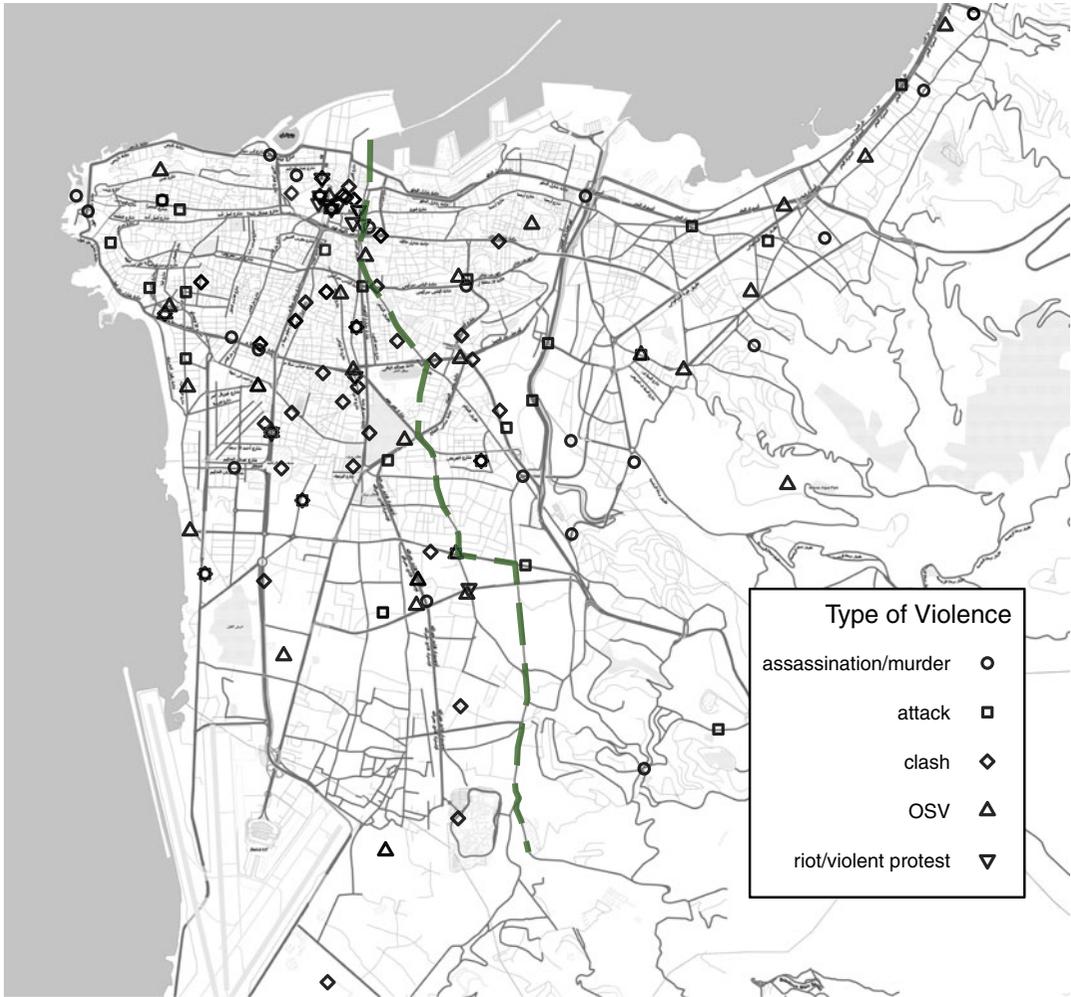

Geocoded datasets can be processed in GIS software – such as ArcGIS, QGIS, and R – to generate static or interactive maps. We illustrate below how mapping the events of conflict-related violence in one city – Beirut – provides a clear view of the distribution of the different types of violence within the city. The maps were created using the programming language R and the packages sf (Pebesma 2018) and ggmap (Kahle and Wickham 2013). Similar datasets can also be used to generate interactive maps, where the user can click on event symbols on the map to read more about the dynamics of the specific event (for examples of such interactive maps, see the UCDP database (<https://ucdp.uu.se/exploratory>)).

Figure 1 highlights the different types of violence that occurred in Beirut from 1990 to 2019 and their respective location within the city. Looking at the map, it becomes clear that riots/violent protests seem to cluster around Beirut's Central District while other types of violence seem to be more widely spread across the city. Examining the trajectory of Beirut's Green Line – which separated Christian East Beirut from Muslim West Beirut during the Lebanese Civil War (Bădescu 2011) – further adds an interesting layer to the pattern of violence by showing that while some events occurred along this division, the majority did not. The disaggregated nature of the data thus enables observations of violent trends at the microlevel.

Figure 2 illustrates the significance of pursuing precision when geocoding locations of violent events. It contrasts event locations with higher precision with those that could only be assigned to larger administrative units – i.e. the level of geocoding precision that events would have been coded at if research assistants had not pursued precision. The red triangles in the map are center points of the quarters whereas the black dots show the actual locations where these events occurred. This allows for additional observations, such as the significance of the distribution of violence alongside specific roads or within the vicinity of government buildings, which would not be possible otherwise and which enriches our understanding of the particular case study.

The information contained in geocoded datasets can also be used for descriptive analysis of a case or for statistical analysis of the patterns

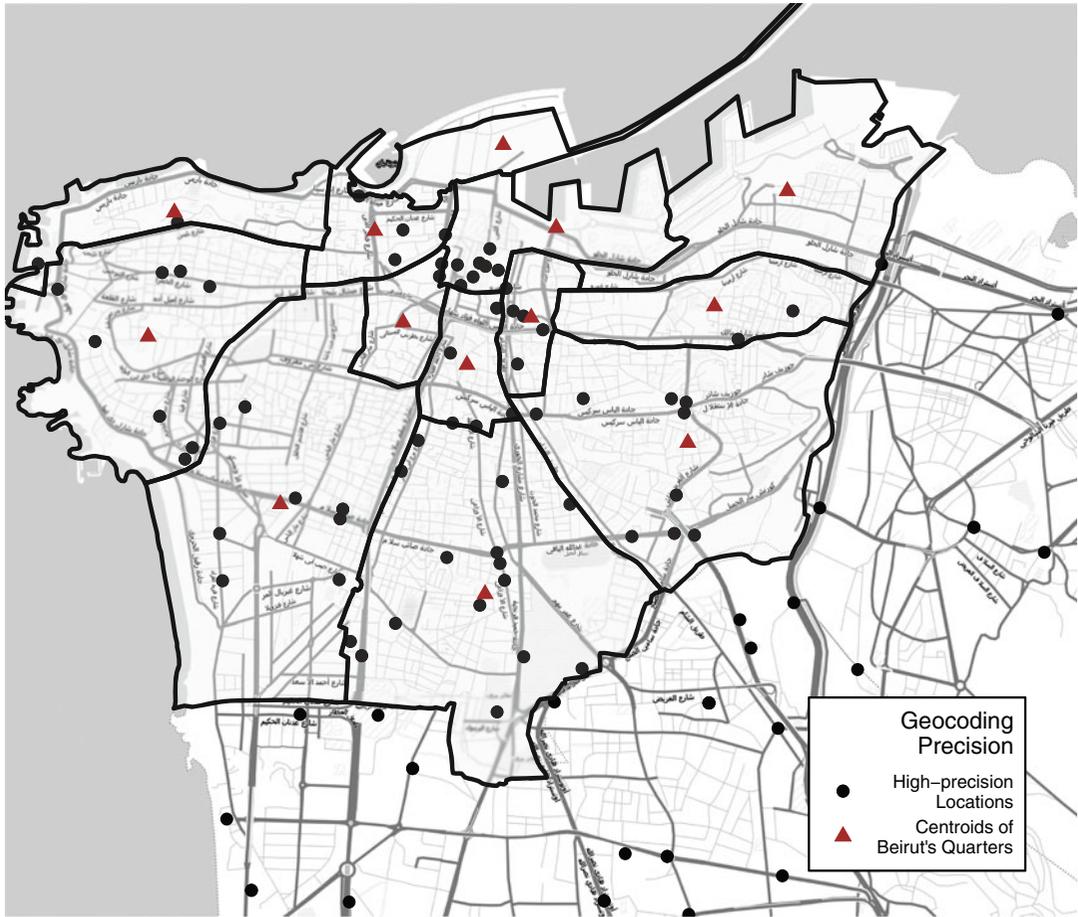

Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence, Fig. 1 Conflict-related violence events in Beirut. The different points indicate types of violence, and the solid line represents the Green Line that divide Beirut during the civil war. The Green Line relies on information provided by the Lebanese Institute, while the shapefiles of the quarters of Beirut city come from GADM (<https://gadm.org/>) of violence across time and space. As an example of the former, the data collected for Abidjan within the Postwar Cities project was used to identify appropriate case studies for field work. Mapping the events of violence and looking deeper into the dynamics and characteristics of the events enabled identifying locations that were particularly violence-affected as well as locations that exhibited puzzlingly low levels of violence. The information contained in the data also matters beyond the coordinates as its more qualitative nature can offer a glimpse into the relationship between the location and the perpetrators and victims of violence. This could for instance be illustrative for research that seeks to understand mobilization in urban contexts (see Staniland 2010). More generally, geocoding can be used as a framework to guide the collection and organization of qualitative in-depth case studies. It could, for example, be useful for organizing process-tracing data. In terms of formal statistical analysis, Rokem, Weiss and Miodownik (2018)

Geocoding as a Method for Mapping Conflict-Related Violence, Fig. 2 Different levels of geocoding precision in Beirut

offer an example of how the method of space syntax analysis can be used to assess the relationship between urban infrastructure and violence.

Importantly, geocoded data on violence within cities offers a fruitful basis for mixed-methods analysis and for the combination of systematic mapping and inductive or interpretive theorizing. Combining forms of analysis helps overcome drawbacks with different methods – for instance, in-depth study can help overcome the risk of reporting bias inherent in large-scale data collection, whereas relying on comprehensive datasets reduces the risk of case-selection bias. Within the Postwar Cities project, for instance, combining geocoded data on Mitrovica and qualitative field material allows for ascertaining where conflict-related violence concentrates and then exploring how the way spaces are perceived and lived affect their potential for concentrating violence or generating coexistence (Meye et al. 2021).

Summary and Notes on Future Research

This chapter has provided an overview of geocoding as a method for mapping conflict-related violence and has illustrated the many theoretical and analytical benefits of geocoded data. The chapter underlines that matters of war and peace are inherently spatial and that geocoded data is essential to the study of causes, experiences, and consequences of violence. It has also described how geocoding is carried out and noted some of the challenges involved in geocoding violence with high precision, taking violence in postwar cities as a concrete example. There are several important avenues for future research within this growing body of work. The demonstrated usefulness – and widespread lack – of geocoded data at the micro-level suggests that it would be extremely beneficial to expand the empirical endeavor to include more cases which are coded with maximum precision (e.g. more cities) but also to include additional forms of violence (such as physical violence which does not lead to serious injury and more indirect or structural forms of violence), more accurate temporality (able to capture how risks and dynamics of violence change at different times of the day), and additional aspects of the impacts or severity of violence (e.g. by systematically capturing psychological harm and damage to property). In terms of the research agenda, existing and future data also enables answering theoretical questions such as what roles built environment, climate change and weather patterns, socioeconomic development and inequality, and pandemics play in the micro trends and patterns of violence. These are all dimensions of war and peace that need to be explored better.

If lifting the gaze to geocoding within peace and conflict studies at large, there are obvious benefits from and reasons to expand the empirical endeavor to look beyond violence and also geocode with maximum precision the location of peacebuilding initiatives, defensive architecture, public space regeneration efforts, economic development programs, memorials, sites of actual and/or symbolic value, and so on. While violence – especially direct physical violence related to the conflict – is much easier to code than many other similar aspects, war and peace are much more multifaceted than violence between different groups, meaning that the ability to avoid war and build peace can be also be advanced by more detailed and fine-grained data on other aspects as well – so that we can explore to what extent local economic development increases the stability of any given site or whether more “shared” spaces stimulate coexistence or securitization of territory.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding
- ▶ Urban Violence and Crime

References

- ACLED. (2019). Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project (ACLED) Codebook. <https://acleddata.com/resources/general-guides/>. Accessed 15 September 2021.
- Bădescu, G. (2011). Beyond the green line: Sustainability and Beirut's post-war reconstruction. Development, 54(3), 358–367.
- Bahgat, K., Nordås, R., & Østby, G. (2016). Geocoded SVAC dataset (GEO-SVAC) version 1.0. Peace Research Institute Oslo (PRIO).
- Bendavid, E., Boerma, T., Akseer, N., Langer, A., Malembaka, E. B., Okiro, E. A., . . . Bhutta, Z. A. (2021). The effects of armed conflict on the health of women and children. The Lancet, 397(10273), 522–532.
- Björkdahl, A., & Buckley-Zistel, S. (2016). Spatialising peace and conflict: Mapping the production of places, sites and scales of violence. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bove, V., Di Salvatore, J., & Elia, L. (2021). UN peacekeeping and households' well-being in civil wars. American Journal of Political Science. <https://doi.org/10.1111/ajps.12644>
- Cil, D., Fjelde, H., Hultman, L., & Nilsson, D. (2019). Mapping blue helmets: Introducing the geocoded peacekeeping operations (geo-PKO) dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 57(2), 360–370.
- Cunningham, N., & Gregory, I. (2014). Hard to miss, easy to blame? Peacelines, interfaces and political deaths in Belfast during the troubles. Political Geography, 40, 64–78.
- Elfversson, E. (2015). Providing security or protecting interests? Government interventions in violent communal conflicts in Africa. Journal of Peace Research, 52(6), 791–805.
- Elfversson, E., & Höglund, K. (2021). Are armed conflicts becoming more urban? Cities, 119. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.cities.2021.103356>.
- Elfversson, E., Lindberg Bromley, S., & Williams, P. D. (2019). Urban peacekeeping under siege: Attacks on African union peacekeepers in Mogadishu, 2007–2009. Third World Thematics: A TWQ Journal, 4(2–3), 158–178.

- Fjelde, H., Hultman, L., & Nilsson, D. (2019). Protection through presence: UN peacekeeping and the costs of targeting civilians. International Organization, 73(1), 103–131.
- Fjelde, H., & von Uexkull, N. (2012). Climate triggers: Rainfall anomalies, vulnerability and communal conflict in sub-Saharan Africa. Political Geography, 31(7), 444–453.
- Gizelis, T.-I., Pickering, S., & Urdal, H. (2021). Conflict on the urban fringe: Urbanization, environmental stress, and urban unrest in Africa. Political Geography, 86, 102357. <https://doi.org/10.1016/j.polgeo.2021.102357>.
- Gusic, I. (2020). Contesting peace in the Postwar City: Belfast, Mitrovica and Mostar. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hendrix, C. S., & Salehyan, I. (2012). Climate change, rainfall, and social conflict in Africa. Journal of Peace Research, 49(1), 35–50.
- Högladh, S. (2021). UCDP GED codebook version 21.1. Uppsala: Department of Peace and Conflict Research.
- Kahle, D., & Wickham, H. (2013). Ggmap: Spatial visualization with ggplot2. The R Journal, 5(1), 144–161.
- Kindynis, T. (2014). Ripping up the map: Criminology and cartography reconsidered. British Journal of Criminology, 54(2), 222–243.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2016). No war, no peace: The rejuvenation of stalled peace processes and peace accords. Springer.
- Meye, M.-T., Gusic, I., & Elfversson, E. (2021). The bridge to violence: Mapping and understanding conflict-related violence in postwar Mitrovica. Manuscript submitted for publication.
- Murtagh, B., Grounds, A., Boland, P., & Fox-Rogers, L. (2019). Urban restructuring, social economics and violence after conflict. Third World Thematics: A TWQ Journal, 4(2–3), 220–238.
- Nedal, D., Stewart, M., & Weintraub, M. (2019). Urban concentration and civil war. Journal of Conflict Resolution. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022002719892054>.
- Pebesma, E. (2018). Simple features for r: Standardized support for spatial vector data. The R Journal, 10(1), 439–446.
- Petrova, K. (2021). Natural hazards, internal migration and protests in Bangladesh. Journal of Peace Research, 58(1), 33–49.
- Raleigh, C. (2014). Political hierarchies and landscapes of conflict across Africa. Political Geography, 42, 92–103.
- Raleigh, C. (2015). Urban violence patterns across African states. International Studies Review, 17(1), 90–106.
- Raleigh, C., Linke, A., Hegre, H., & Karlsen, J. (2010). Introducing ACLED: An armed conflict location and event dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 47(5), 651–660.
- Ratcliffe, J. H. (2002). Damned if you don't, damned if you do: Crime mapping and its implications in the real world. Policing and Society, 12(3), 211–225.
- Rokem, J., Weiss, C. M., & Miodownik, D. (2018). Geographies of violence in Jerusalem: The spatial logic of urban intergroup conflict. Political Geography, 66, 88–97.
- Ruggeri, A., Dorussen, H., & Gizelis, T.-I. (2017). Winning the peace locally: UN peacekeeping and local conflict. International Organization, 71(1), 163–185.
- Salehyan, I., Hendrix, C. S., Hamner, J., Case, C., Linebarger, C., Stull, E., & Williams, J. (2012). Social conflict in Africa: A new database. International Interactions, 38(4), 503–511.
- Schwanen, T., & Kwan, M.-P. (2009). “Doing” critical geographies with numbers. The Professional Geographer, 61(4), 459–464.
- Schubiger, L. I. (2021). State violence and wartime civilian agency: Evidence from Peru. Journal of Politics, 83(4), 1383–1398.
- Shelton, T., Poorthuis, A., & Zook, M. (2015). Social media and the city: Rethinking urban socio-spatial inequality using user-generated geographic information. Landscape and Urban Planning, 142, 198–211.
- Staniland, P. (2010). Cities on fire: Social mobilization, state policy, and urban insurgency. Comparative Political Studies, 43(12), 1623–1649.
- Sundberg, R., & Melander, E. (2013). Introducing the UCDP georeferenced event dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 50(4), 523–532.
- Urdal, H., & Hoelscher, K. (2012). Explaining urban social disorder and violence: An empirical study of event data from Asian and sub-Saharan African cities. International Interactions, 38(4), 512–528.

Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict

Donnacha Ó Beacháin
School of Law and Government, Dublin City
University, Dublin, Ireland

Definition

As Soviet power declined, and Georgian nationalists sought independence, Abkhazians tried first to remain within the USSR before opting for independence. A bitter Georgian-Abkhaz war claimed about 10,000 lives between 1992 and 1993. Approximately 250,000 ethnic Georgians fled Abkhazia, most of whom have never returned. The conflict remained largely “frozen” for 15 years until August 2008 when following a brief war that primarily involved Russian and Georgian forces in South Ossetia, the Kremlin recognized Abkhazia as an independent state.

Only a handful of UN member states followed suit. The Kremlin's investment has brought economic dividends for Abkhazians, but it has also increased the risk of more intensive Russification. While international law favors Georgia, this does little to convince Abkhazians. In their view, the Soviet Union's arbitrary borders were frequently conceived with the aim of elevating one nation's interests over another and that for the international community to recognize these boundaries breathe life into Stalin's legacy. Since 2009 no mediating international organization has had a permanent field presence inside Abkhazia. Initiatives such as the European Union Monitoring Mission and the Geneva International Discussions have no mandate to facilitate negotiations on major areas of dispute such as Abkhazia's status. Rather they manage the status quo by addressing the humanitarian needs of the conflict-affected population.

Historical Background

Since the thirteenth century, Turks, Arabs, Persians, and Mongols have occupied Georgia. However, it is the Russian influence, which begins in force from the beginning of the nineteenth century, that is most important for understanding the country today. The collapse of the Russian Empire permitted the Democratic Republic of Georgia a brief experiment in independent rule from 1918 to 1921, incorporating a recalcitrant Abkhazian population that, in 1919, was granted autonomy within the new state. Once the Red Army had consolidated its control in Russia, the "prison of nations" (as Lenin had described the Tsar-led empire) was re-established in the form of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (USSR). Four days after the Georgians had enacted their constitution, the Red Army invaded. When the country regained its sovereignty seven decades later, it proved to be a poisoned chalice. Economically, politically, and psychologically unprepared for the challenges of independence, Georgians could not impose their authority on substantial parts of the new state; between 1991 and 1993, Georgia endured two secessionist wars with South Ossetia and Abkhazia and two civil wars (Jones 2015).

Many Georgians maintain that their nation enjoyed a productive relationship with Abkhazians over several centuries (Coppieters et al. 1998). The use of Georgian as the language of Abkhazian nobility in medieval times, intermarriage, and shared customs are all cited as evidence of this intermingling. They blame Russia for the deterioration in Georgian-Abkhaz relations which, through the Tsarist and Soviet Empires, fostered divisions between the two groups. Georgian nationalists consider Abkhazians to be Moscow's puppets with few legitimate concerns or grievances of their own.

Russia has indeed played a major role in the affairs of the South Caucasus region. The "near abroad" – as the newly independent post-Soviet states are often called in Russia – is vital for the Kremlin's ambitions to revive its geopolitical fortunes and resurrect itself as a world power. Moscow can hardly aspire to be a major actor on the global stage if unable to impose its will as a regional hegemon. Foreign policy success is also necessary to secure domestic allegiance and respect. For if the Kremlin cannot be lord of its neighborhood, it will assuredly be unable to be the master in its own house. Obsessed with territorial security, the Russian leadership viewed the Caucasus as a vulnerable "soft underbelly" at which opponents might direct attacks. While Russia has been the primary supporter of Abkhazian secessionism, the relationship is a complicated one. The extreme asymmetry of this association, combined with Abkhazia's anomalous status, has fostered a very high level of dependence on Moscow's goodwill. Economically Russia is responsible for most of Abkhazia's trade and subsidizes about half of Abkhazia's annual budget. The result is that Abkhazians appreciate Kremlin assistance but worry of creeping annexation. After all, they fought for independence and not to join the Russian Federation.

Abkhazians are indigenous to the Caucasus and autochthons of Abkhazia. According to the most recent census (2011), little more than 240,000 people live in the Black Sea republic, less than half the number that resided there at the end of the Soviet era. There is also a large diaspora in Turkey, mostly decedents of those expelled by the Russian empire in the late nineteenth century following rebellions against the Tsarist rule. Under direct rule from Moscow, Abkhazia was repopulated with a plethora of other nationalities including Mingrelians, Armenians, Russians, and Greeks. Abkhazians became a minority within Abkhazia, producing a demographic crisis for the small nation from which it has never recovered (Trier et al. 2010). During the last century, Russification has reduced the numbers of native speakers of Abkhaz, an ancient tongue unrelated to Georgian, which belongs to the Western Caucasian branch of Abaza-Circassian languages (Hewitt 2013, p. 2).

The Soviet Period

With the collapse of the Russian Empire in 1917, Abkhazia was incorporated into, and granted autonomy within, the newly established Democratic Republic of Georgia, but in February 1921, both Georgia and Abkhazia were made Soviet Socialist Republics within the USSR. Abkhazia's status was repeatedly diluted, until in 1931 it was reduced to an autonomous republic within Georgia.

A "Georgianization" policy was vigorously pursued during the 1930s and 1940s accompanied by substantial migration to the region. Many in Abkhazia today attribute this period of repression to two ethnic Georgians, Joseph Stalin and Lavrentiy Beria, the latter being a native of Abkhazia, who headed the secret police within the Soviet Union and regulated inter-ethnic disputes within the Caucasus. Although conditions improved for Abkhazians in the decades following Stalin and Beria's deaths in 1953, they continued to lose the demographic battle. The 1959 census indicated that their numbers had dropped to just 15% of the population and that they constituted only the fourth largest group in Abkhazia, after Georgians, Russians, and Armenians. In every decade (1957, 1964, 1967, 1978, and 1989), Abkhazians made direct representations to Moscow demanding secession from Georgia.

As Soviet power declined, and Georgian nationalists sought independence, Abkhazians tried to remain within the USSR. In his speech to the First Congress of People's Deputies of the USSR in 1989, Vladislav Ardzinba, considered the founding father of modern-day Abkhazia, declared that "the Abkhaz people consider remaining within the USSR the sole possible means of preserving its national self-identity." An ever-widening chasm developed between the Georgian and Abkhazian national projects. Notwithstanding the trials of the early Soviet period, Abkhazians had come to see membership of the USSR as a bulwark against Georgian domination. Despite their inferior numbers, Abkhazians enjoyed disproportionate political influence within the republic with all the trappings of statehood including a parliament, flag, and anthem. By contrast, Georgians felt emasculated within the Soviet system and believed that only full independence would facilitate the development of their nation. The Soviet massacre of peaceful protesters in the capital Tbilisi on 9 April 1989 only accentuated separatist sentiments among Georgians. Georgians now viewed the aspirations and demands of smaller nationalities such as the Abkhaz as a Soviet/Russian strategy to keep their nation within the USSR. The unexpected collapse of the Soviet Union created a dangerous vacuum, whereby Georgians considered it feasible to subdue the Abkhaz militarily.

The 1992–1993 War

An intense and bitter war followed the invasion of Abkhazia on 14 August 1992 by Georgian paramilitaries under the direction of the executive in Tbilisi controlled by warlords Tengiz Kitovani and Jaba Ioseliani and under the titular leadership of former Soviet foreign minister Eduard Shevardnadze who had returned to Georgia at their invitation in March 1992. Reflecting on mistakes made at this critical juncture, Shevardnadze conceded many years later that he should have immediately flown to the Abkhazian capital of Sukhum/i to speak directly to Ardzinba in an effort to preempt an escalation of the conflict (Shevardnadze, interview with the author, 2008).

The Georgians that invaded Abkhazia fought for territorial integrity, but for Abkhazians the struggle was for nothing less than survival. This was made clear when the Commander-in-Chief of Georgian troops in Abkhazia, General Giorgi Karkarashvili, occupied the local television station and, in a formal televised address to the people of Abkhazia on 24 August, warned that Georgian troops would not be taking prisoners of war. Moreover, he maintained that if 100,000 Georgians lost their lives, it would mean that all 97,000 Abkhazians would be killed and that the Abkhaz nation would be without descendants. In a similar vein, the Georgian Minister for Abkhazia in Tbilisi, Giorgi Khaindrava, told Le Monde Diplomatique that “there are only 80,000 Abkhazians, which means that we can easily and completely destroy the genetic stock of their nation by killing 15,000 of their youth. And we are perfectly capable of doing this.” (Ó Beacháin, 2016, p. 213)

Although the war lasted just over a year (14 August 1992–30 September 1993), it claimed up to 10,000 lives. Approximately 250,000 ethnic Georgians (many of them Mingrelians) fled Abkhazia as the war drew to a close although tens of thousands have since returned and resettled primarily in the southern district of Gal/i. The war had far-reaching effects on Abkhazian relationships with Georgians and their sense of themselves as a nation. During the 13-month conflict, the Abkhaz lost about 4% of their population.

Georgian leaders underestimated Abkhazian resistance to their national project. Abkhazians were considered numerically insignificant and incapable of surviving alone. The Georgians fought without external support, however, and were pitted against not only Abkhazians but also other ethnic minorities within Abkhazia. General Karkarashvili recalled: “we [Georgians] entered Abkhazia in a very disorganized way. We didn’t even have a specific goal and we started looting villages along the way. As a result, in the space of a month we managed to make enemies of the entire local population, especially the Armenians.” Abkhazians also managed to attract support from the people of the North Caucasus, including their ethnic cousins the Adyghe (Adyghe, Kabardians, and Circassians), the Abaza, and the Chechens. They also gained support from the Abkhaz and Circassian diasporas (Ó Beacháin, 2016, pp. 212–213).

Georgians today tend to de-emphasize local opposition in Abkhazia in favor of a narrative that suggests that Georgia lost to Russia, which used the Abkhazian issue to make Georgia more pliant to Moscow’s wishes and to preserve a Russian sphere of influence in the Caucasus (Shevardnadze, interview with the author, 2008). The character and extent of the Kremlin’s involvement during the 1992–1993 conflict are difficult to gauge accurately, and there have been wildly conflicting evaluations. When the Soviet Union imploded, substantial arsenals of military hardware ended up outside of state control, and in this chaotic environment, much of what passed for military activity was decentralized, ad hoc, and personalized.

Following the ceasefire between the Georgian and Abkhazian authorities, the United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia (UNOMIG) was established in August 1993 to verify compliance. The UNOMIG’s mandate was expanded following the signing by the parties of the 1994 Agreement on a Ceasefire and Separation of Forces. The ceasefire, which gave Russia a central role in the region, remained largely intact until 2008.

The 2008 War

The inauguration of a 36-year-old Mikheil Saakashvili as President of Georgia in January 2004 introduced a new dynamic to the conflict. Saakashvili had come to power as a result of the “Rose Revolution” that followed popular mobilization to challenge fraudulent parliamentary results in November 2003. The collapse of the Adjara police state, which was ruled as a personal fiefdom by Aslan Abashidze, in May 2004, gave the new Georgian administration a false basis for optimism when approaching the more intractable separatist regions of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. It was regularly claimed or implied that a breakthrough would be achieved during the Saakashvili presidency, thus personalizing the conflict resolution process. Controversially, the Georgian government changed the name of the Ministry for Conflict Resolution to the Ministry for Reintegration (of the national territory), which inhibited interaction with the Abkhaz authorities. Rival (pro-Tbilisi) governments were established on the territory of Abkhazia (in the mountainous Kodori Gorge region) and South Ossetia, but Georgia's attempts to widen conflict resolution formats by the internationalization of "peacekeeping" duties consistently blocked. There was widespread and ever-increasing hostility to the role played by Russian peacekeepers in Abkhazia and South Ossetia (dubbed "piece-keepers" by some Georgian officials).

Georgia requested the EU to involve itself directly in the peacekeeping process but was rebuffed, in part because Brussels knew the proposal would be unacceptable to Russia. The European Neighbourhood Policy (ENP) Action Plan negotiated throughout 2006 placed a low priority on resolving Georgia's territorial integrity problems. In contrast to the Action Plans agreed with Moldova and Azerbaijan, which made conflict resolution the top priority, for Georgia it was sixth, and the document spoke vaguely of the EU's willingness to "contribute to the conflict settlements" in Abkhazia and South Ossetia without spelling out how this might be done. Instead the Action Plan focused on improving Georgian governance. The ENP Action Plan's limited scope and financial support were a source of dissatisfaction for the Georgian government (Georgian government ministers, interviews with the author, 2006–2008). From the EU's side, it reflected both a wariness of getting too tied up in Tbilisi's efforts to regain its "lost territories" and a belief that in the aftermath of the Rose Revolution, the greatest returns were most likely to be achieved by investing in democratization, which in turn might also yield results in the sphere of conflict resolution (EU officials, interviews with the author, 2011).

Saakashvili's plans to extend his government's jurisdiction over Abkhazia and South Ossetia put him on a collision course with Moscow. Since the collapse of the USSR, Russian-Georgian relations had never been warm. Many of the political elites in Moscow adopted a neo-imperial policy toward Georgia and found it difficult to conceive of Georgia as a sovereign state, independent of Russia. In seeking membership of the EU and NATO, Georgia challenged the Kremlin's role as regional hegemon and risked setting an example to other post-Soviet states. Moreover, Russia viewed western economic, political, and military support for Georgia as actions hostile to Russian interests.

There was a clear relationship between Georgia's moves toward NATO and Russia's actions toward Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Shortly after the NATO summit on 16 April 2008, which declared that Georgia and Ukraine would eventually join the military alliance, President Putin signed a decree that strengthened diplomatic and economic links with Abkhazia and South Ossetia. In addition, Russia deployed an additional 1500 troops to its "peacekeeping" force in Abkhazia. This was done without Tbilisi's consent – thus violating the 1994 ceasefire agreement – and some of the troops were equipped with heavy weaponry. Russia's MIG fighters shot down unmanned Georgian drones in Abkhazia, again violating the 1994 agreement. In June, the Kremlin deployed troops to Abkhazia to rebuild the rail line linking Sukhum/i and Ochamchire, an action widely considered to be for military purposes. The following month, Russia conducted a large-scale military manoeuvre to the immediate north of Georgia (entitled Caucasus 2008), which involved almost 10,000 troops and several hundred pieces of military hardware.

What happened next is a matter of political and partisan controversy (Tagliavini 2009). Following provocations, Georgian government forces launched a major military assault on the South Ossetian capital of Tskhinvali inflicting hundreds of casualties before being repulsed by Russian and South Ossetian forces. The Russian military continued their advance deep into Georgia, coming within 30 km of Tbilisi and used its air and naval superiority to degrade Georgia's military infrastructure. With Russian military assistance, Abkhazian forces expelled the Georgian government forces from the Kodori Gorge. It is widely believed that Saakashvili and his coterie of advisors were shepherded into a well-prepared trap and that the Kremlin orchestrated a pretext for a military confrontation.

The international community scrambled to find an effective mechanism to end military hostilities, and the European Union quickly emerged as the favored mediator. The 2008 war exposed the limitations of the EU efforts (and those of international institutions generally) to prevent military conflict. However, it was the very lack of a prior strong or coherent involvement that pushed the EU to the forefront of endeavors to negotiate a ceasefire and then monitor and maintain the peace. For Russia, the USA and NATO were unacceptable mediators, and the OSCE had been discredited for its failure to warn of, or react to, the large-scale conflagration. After shuttling between Moscow and Tbilisi, a six-point accord was brokered by Nicolas Sarkozy, the President of France, which had the rotating EU presidency. The agreement included provisions for an immediate ceasefire, the nonuse of force, the withdrawal of the Russian and Georgian troops to ex ante positions, and the opening of international discussions on the modalities of lasting security in Abkhazia and South Ossetia. The option of deploying armed peacekeepers that would separate the conflicting parties was ultimately rejected in favor of a more modest proposal of sending unarmed EU monitors.

Recognition of Abkhazia

Russia's decision to recognize Abkhazia as an independent state on 28 August 2008 enhanced the Abkhazians' sense of security and triggered a campaign to obtain additional recognitions (O'Loughlin et al. 2011, p. 2). Early successes were achieved in Latin America with Nicaragua (2008) and Venezuela (2009) establishing diplomatic ties with Abkhazia, and there appear to have been near misses in Bolivia, Ecuador, and the Dominican Republic. Intensive efforts to secure recognition from Belarus, considered the most loyal ally in the post-Soviet space, did not bear fruit due to pressure from the EU. Other allies in the Commonwealth of Independent States and Shanghai Cooperation Organisation had their own secessionist threats to contend with. Attention shifted to the South Pacific microstates, many of which were veterans of the China-Taiwan recognition tug-of-war. Consequently, the UN member states Nauru (2009), Tuvalu (2011), and Vanuatu (2011) all recognized Abkhazia, but the latter two subsequently withdrew from this by establishing diplomatic ties with Georgia. Alive to the threat, and with the EU and US support, Georgia embarked on an extensive diplomatic counteroffensive. During the 4 years following the 2008 war, Georgia established diplomatic relations with no less than 50 UN member states (Ó Beacháin, 2019, p. 68). In 2018, Syria joined the small batch of states recognizing Abkhazia.

Postwar Efforts at Mediation and Intervention

The 2008 war brought an end to the UNOMIG due to a lack of consensus on the UN Security Council. The primary controversy stemmed from Russia's attempts to have the mission's name changed to the UN Observer Mission in Abkhazia, which Georgia's supporters refused to countenance. Since 2009 no mediating international organization has had a permanent field presence inside Abkhazia. Shortly after the war subsided, in October 2008, the Geneva International Discussions (GID) were launched to address the consequences of the conflagration. Co-chaired by the OSCE, the EU, and the UN, the Geneva process brings together representatives of Georgia, Russia, Abkhazia, South Ossetia, and the USA. Since the cessation of the UNOMIG, the GID is the only platform for parties to the Georgian-Abkhaz conflict. It is not, however, a conflict resolution process and has no mandate to deal with issues such as the status of Abkhazia. Rather it offers opportunities for Georgian and Abkhazian representatives to meet and to oversee the status quo by solving local disputes and issues, such as the humanitarian needs of the conflict-affected population. In this way the talks are aimed at managing rather than transforming the conflict and preempting any problems that might trigger an escalation (OSCE officials and participants of GID, interviews with the author, 2011). The European Union Monitoring Mission (EUMM) continues to operate solely on Tbilisi-controlled territory with 200 unarmed monitors from the EU member states. By verifying information on the ground and evaluating conflicting reports of incidents, the EUMM can help defuse tensions and act as a trip-switch in the event of future military mobilizations.

Following the 2008 war, the Georgian government introduced the State Strategy on Occupied Territories, which contained many useful ideas about how Georgians and Abkhazians might cooperate, but was largely undermined by the subsequent publication of the modalities. (“On Approval of Modalities for Conducting Activities in the Occupied Territories of Georgia,” Regulation of the Government of Georgia, N 320 Tbilisi, 15 October 2010) The modalities made engagement between Abkhazia and foreign states and international organizations conditional on Georgian government approval. Linking cross-border cooperation or inter-community interaction to a larger strategy of “de-occupation” made cooperation problematic (even the strategy’s name seemed guaranteed to thwart its ostensible aim of reaching out to Abkhazians and Ossetians). Many Abkhazians viewed the strategy on the occupied territories as a direct response to the EU’s policy of “engagement without recognition” and designed to limit any interaction between Abkhazia and the outside world. Abkhazian public representatives and civil society leaders, interviews with the author 2009–2012. For many years Tbilisi has financed and directed a “government in exile” for Abkhazia. It plays no role in conflict-resolution formats and is largely a publicity exercise for international consumption. Whereas during the decade following the 1992–1993 war seats were symbolically reserved in the Georgian parliament for Abkhazia, these have since been abolished.

Summary

It is unlikely that there will be any resolution to the dispute between Georgians and Abkhazians given the incompatible and mutually exclusive features of their respective nation-building projects. Although the Georgian official (and popular) narrative tends to portray the essential conflict as being one between Georgia and Russia, the clash is at heart an intra-Caucasian one between two different nationalities which, whatever their past amities, have polar-opposite views on the present and future status of Abkhazia. Georgians still speak of a resolution to the conflict and of absorbing Abkhazia, whereas for Abkhazians – separated from Georgia for almost three decades – the conflict is over, and they wish merely to settle the terms of the divorce.

Cross-References

- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Acknowledgments This research was supported by a Marie Curie Research and Innovation Staff Exchange scheme within the H2020 Programme (grant acronym: SHADOW, no.: 778118).

References

- Coppieters, B., Nodia, G., & Anchabadze, Y. (1998). Georgians and Abkhazians: The search for a peace settlement. Brussels: Vrije Universiteit Brussel.
- Hewitt, B. G. (2013). Discordant neighbours: A reassessment of the Georgian-Abkhazian and Georgian-South Ossetian conflicts. Leiden: Brill.
- Jones, S. (2015). Georgia: A political history since independence. London: IB Tauris.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2016). Elections and Nation-Building in Abkhazia. In R. Isaacs & A. Polese, Nation-Building and Identity in the Post-Soviet Space. Abingdon: Routledge, 208–227.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2019). Cheque-Mates? Abkhazia’s quest for international recognition. Studies in Transition States and Societies, 11(1), 55–76.
- O’Loughlin, J., Kolossov, V., & Toal, G. (2011). Inside Abkhazia: Survey of attitudes in a de facto state. Post-Soviet Affairs, 27(1), 1–36.

Tagliavini, H. (2009). Independent international fact-finding mission on the conflict in Georgia: Report: Volume One. Geneva: Council of the European Union.

Trier, T., Lohm, H., & Szakonyi, D. (2010). Under siege: Inter-ethnic relations in Abkhazia. New York: Columbia University Press.

Global Governance

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Global Interventionism

- ▶ European Union's Peace Missions and Operations, The

Global Justice

- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace

Global Peace Index [GPI]

- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches

Good Life

- ▶ Human Dignity and Transitional Justice

Governance

- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Graffiti

- ▶ Street Art and Peace

Grassroots

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Grassroots Mobilisation

- ▶ Technology and Peace

Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding

Sarah Jankowitz

Queen's University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Synonyms

Civil society; Community-based organizations; Conflict transformation; Local peacebuilding

Description

Grassroots and community-based organizations mobilize “ordinary” people in peacebuilding processes, initiating wide-ranging and contextually specific action which is crucial to the “bottom-up” transformation of personal, relational, structural, and cultural dynamics of conflict-affected societies. Contributions made by these organizations inform and drive activity in a range of sectors relevant to peacebuilding, including providing services for victims and survivors of conflict, reintegration of combatants, economic and political representation, transitional and transformative justice, memory work, commemoration, and many more. Grassroots organizations reflect the contestation and sociopolitical divisions of the societies from which they emerge, which presents complex challenges but also ensures a diversity of perspectives and experiences are incorporated in the consolidation of peace. In the internationally orientated contemporary discourse of peacebuilding, the agency and potential of grassroots organizations tend to be homogenized and marginalized in favor of top-down liberal peace interventions. This entry explores the forms and functions of grassroots organizations working to build peace and considers the contextual and structural constraints they face in light of hegemonic liberal peacebuilding discourses.

Introduction

It is broadly agreed in theory – if not reflected in mainstream peacebuilding practice – that individuals and communities affected by conflict hold the greatest potential for building peace (Curle 1994; Lederach 1997). Excluding or ignoring the specific experiences and needs of those most directly affected by conflict leaves significant underlying forces of conflict unresolved and undermines the sustainability of peace processes. Indeed, the imposition of norms, assumptions, and policies from external actors into local initiatives has often proven counterproductive (see Autesserre 2017 for an overview of failed international peacebuilding interventions). The extent and patterns of conflict vary greatly from one community to the next, and so international- and even national-level initiatives alone cannot always capture meaning for those whose experiences vary significantly (Arriaza and Roht-Arriaza 2008). Grassroots organizations and community-based stakeholders are best placed to understand and address these specific experiences of violence, and to develop sustainable processes to heal individual and collective trauma, build relationships, address structural inequalities, and influence official peacebuilding mechanisms.

Paternalistic views of local populations by international organizations often obscure the reality that “there is no shortage of agency in most post-conflict spaces at grassroots levels” (Roberts 2011, p. 421), and that local actors who were embedded in the “everydayness” of conflict can and should be the primary architects, owners, and long-term stakeholders of peace (Fetherston 2000). Not only can grassroots organizations and stakeholders provide contextually sensitive and appropriate peacebuilding activity in their own right, their inclusion in wider processes is crucial, because, as Donais (2009, p. 3) argues, “any peace process not embraced by those who have to live with it is likely to fail.”

Peacebuilding “From Below”

Despite its more contemporary international, institutional formulations, peacebuilding as a concept is often attributed to peace scholars such as Johan Galtung and John Paul Lederach who were interested in how affected communities themselves could transform conditions which underpin violent conflict in contextually specific and sustainable ways. Galtung in particular conceptualized peacebuilding out of the distinction between negative and positive peace, wherein negative peace denotes the absence of direct or physical violence, and positive peace entails identifying and addressing the structural roots of conflict and striving for social justice (Galtung 1969, 1975). Through his scholarship and practice, Lederach carried forward this notion of peacebuilding, theorizing how transforming conflict requires constructive change of personal, relational, structural, and cultural levels (Lederach 2003), and maintaining that “the greatest resource for sustaining peace in the long term is always rooted in the local people and their culture” (Lederach 1997). In this view, peacebuilding is a holistic, multi-level and long-term process that seeks to transform violent conflict in its many phases and forms. These theories have been highly influential in the design and practice of local peacebuilding efforts over the past several decades (Paffenholz 2014), and how these efforts are understood and articulated in research and evaluation.

Lederach’s conflict transformation-orientated peacebuilding theory approaches the processes required to build sustainable peace holistically, drawing conceptually from Galtung’s work on violence and peacebuilding, social-psychological approaches to relationship building, the management of protracted social conflicts, and Friere’s

Pedagogy of the Oppressed (Paffenholz 2014). It is based on the premise that conflict is an inevitable and necessary part of human existence, and indeed is a driver of change (Lederach 2003). Such principles are supported by more recent applications of Complexity Theory to peacebuilding, which argue that “[c]hange and conflict are normal and necessary, and peacebuilding should thus not be so much about order and stability, as it should be about stimulating change and facilitating constructive conflict” (de Coning 2016, p. 29). This counters conflict management and conflict resolution approaches to peacebuilding which understand conflict as a problem for which a solution must be designed and implemented, and which continues to be a core logic in technocratic international peacebuilding operations (Mac Ginty 2012).

The task of transformative, “bottom-up” peacebuilding, then, is to seek constructive change in those areas which are producing violence and violent conflict. Lederach (2003) identifies four of these areas, which he refers to as “change goals”: the personal, the relational, the structural, and the cultural. Personal change involves cognitive, emotional, and perceptual development, for example, dealing with issues such as wellbeing, trauma, and guilt that may emerge from experiences of violent conflict. Relational change requires the building of relationships both within and between social groups, facilitating interdependence, communication, and eventually mutual trust between erstwhile enemies. Structural change refers to the need to reorganize social, political, and economic structures that have often been both affected by and instrumental in conflict in order to ensure they provide basic needs and access to resources for all members of society. Finally, cultural change refers to the broadest patterns of life such as identities, rituals, languages, and symbols.

Other scholars have considered specific, strategic objectives of peacebuilding which help to begin articulating the myriad roles and contributions of grassroots organizations. Lisa Schirch, for example, has developed a strategic peacebuilding framework which she and colleagues have applied to various types of peacebuilding actors such as women’s organizations (Schirch and Sewak 2005) and types of peacebuilding activity such as arts-based interventions (Shank and Schirch 2008). This conceptual framework is underpinned by principles of conflict transformation, and includes (1) waging conflict non-violently through initiatives such as monitoring, advocacy, and direct action, (2) reducing direct violence through legal routes, ceasefires and peace zones, humanitarian assistance, and early warning systems, (3) transforming relationships through trauma services, restorative and transitional justice, and local conflict transformation work, and (4) building capacity through training and education, development and research (Schirch 2005). This framework demonstrates how those constructive change processes which are core to Lederach’s approach to peacebuilding may be operationalized by a range of actors.

The conceptualizations of a transformative peacebuilding approach represented here reflect the need for “complex, flexible, and inter-subjectively produced” responses to violent conflict (Fetherston 2000, p. 23). Far from the professionalized, externally imposed approaches of the liberal peace paradigm, these frameworks provide tangible pathways for organizations rooted in communities affected by conflict to constructively transform conditions within their societies to prevent further violence and build sustainable peace.

Grassroots Organizing for Peace

Grassroots organizations emerge from and mobilize “ordinary” people and communities to take collective action, filling gaps where official state and international institutions fail to address their needs or indeed often leading the agenda on necessary reforms within society. “Grassroots” describes the level and location of activity that is “bottom-up,” directly related to and often based in the communities in which that activity seeks to benefit, and consisting of “organic activities that citizens commit to and participate in” (Mitlin 2008, p. 343). In the broader view of peacebuilding actors, Lederach (1997) positions the grassroots as part of a top-down, middle-out, and bottom-up formation where grassroots feeds up into middle-level and elite-level action. However, the grassroots itself is not an exclusive category or boundary. For example, organizations that emerge from the grassroots may operate and mobilize in multiple spaces ranging from local and national political processes to international exchanges. Indeed, grassroots and community-based organizations are as varied and diverse as the social, economic, political, and cultural issues present in the societies in which they are based. This section provides an overview of how grassroots organizing contributes to peacebuilding as well as some specific types of grassroots activity that relate to peacebuilding processes.

Grassroots organizing emphasizes collective, participatory action, which brings more diverse voices and perspectives into the design and undertaking of peacebuilding initiatives (Fetherston 2000; Paffenholz 2014). Broadly speaking, it is argued that citizen participation and civic engagement encourages more just decisions, greater buy-in, and cooperation (Staples 2012). The participatory nature of grassroots organizing is a means to consolidate local action, address immediate needs within communities, and negotiate with official state processes (Mitlin 2008). Moreover, empowering individuals and communities who were directly affected by conflict through participation in peacebuilding initiatives may in itself constitute an opportunity for addressing and “healing” trauma (Parent 2016), not to mention ensuring the full range of needs and experiences emerging from conflict are heard and addressed.

Of course, challenges as well as opportunities arise out of the diversity of grassroots organizing. The grassroots is a highly contested, heterogeneous space, necessarily embodying the contestation, social and political divisions, and structural inequalities that characterize a society emerging from violent conflict (Mac Ginty 2015). Grassroots organizations represent and mobilize a range of interests which may conflict with one another and embrace not only different definitions and visions of peace (if that is indeed their objective) but also different beliefs about how that peace may be achieved. In this way, grassroots and civil society organizations reflect the “politicized realities of conflict situations” and are “subject to the same set of political dynamics, constraints, and incentives that affect local political elites” (Donais 2009, p. 14). Conflict and contestation need not be seen a spoiler for peacebuilding, however, as much as an enabling and generative factor in the transformation of conflict (Lederach 1997, 2003).

Grassroots organizations may also demand and deliver upon the social justice and transformational promise of positive peace. Such initiatives represent and articulate the interests of groups who are frequently unheard or otherwise structurally disadvantaged in official processes. Indeed, women – often excluded from elite level decision-making in peace processes – have played a significant role in developing grassroots and community-based organizations around the world (Marshall 2000). Organizations based in communities and which operate in this bottom-up way represent a resistance to narrow, institutionally focused peacebuilding initiatives that rarely scratch the surface of lived experiences of all who were affected by and/or involved in conflict, or undertake the necessary transformations to upend structural inequalities and hierarchies of power. By encouraging participation of marginalized voices and identities such as women, LGBTQ communities, young people, ethnic minorities, and other oppressed groups, grassroots organizations may resist liberal peace interventions that often reinforce existing local, national, and global power disparities (Chandler 2010).

Grassroots organizations in the context of peacebuilding operate in a wide range of overlapping sectors, take many different forms and engage with a variety of local stakeholders. These contributions relate to many interrelated facets of peacebuilding, including transitional justice, services, and support for victims and survivors, reintegration of offenders, relationship building, storytelling and memory work, reconciliation, and in-group capacity building among others. Insufficient research and policy focus has been dedicated to understanding grassroots peacebuilding activity, and for that reason it is challenging to provide a comprehensive overview of the full range of its forms and functions. However, it is useful to demonstrate the diversity of areas in which grassroots organizations may contribute to peacebuilding.

The most coherent scholarship in the broad area of grassroots peacebuilding focuses in particular on civil society contributions. The terminology of grassroots is often used alongside “civil society” though there are a number of issues with conflating the two, not least because civil society is differently conceived in Global North and Global South (Weerawardhana 2018, pp. 72–74). The concept of civil society itself carries certain Western and institutional connotations which further highlight the frequent mismatch of liberal peace interventions and the social, political, and cultural contexts in which they operate (Richmond 2009) and may refer to NGOs and other organizations that are externally based rather than grassroots. Nevertheless, there is some congruence in the categorizations offered in this literature for the purposes of sketching out the general thrust of community-based initiatives. In her work on civil society and peacebuilding, Thania Paffenholz (2015) outlines seven categories of activity through which grassroots organizations may contribute to peacebuilding: protection, monitoring, advocacy, socialization to promote in-group identity building, social cohesion to promote inter-group relationship building, facilitation and mediation, and service delivery.

These categories of activity relate back to the conceptualizations of bottom-up peacebuilding described above. Revisiting Lederach and Schirch’s lenses for strategic and transformational approaches to peacebuilding helps to articulate how grassroots and community-based organizations may reduce direct violence, wage conflict non-violently, transform relationships and build communities’ capacity in order to effect personal, relational, structural, and cultural transformation. While reducing direct violence, or protection work, aligns most explicitly with negative peace, the diversionary activities and community or even cross-community-based networks aimed at diffusing immediate tensions may galvanize relational change among those involved.

Waging conflict non-violently, or harnessing the constructive change processes of conflict, may entail a range of monitoring and advocacy initiatives. Monitoring work may involve anything from drawing attention to human rights abuses to holding states and other institutions accountable for implementing ceasefires, negotiated agreements and policies. Grassroots advocacy work articulates specific needs and interests in order to demand inclusion in and influence over official mechanisms, institutions, and policies. This advocacy may take a variety of forms, including facilitating community engagement with official processes, both in terms of demanding those processes be shaped through participation and facilitating access and support for those individuals and communities who engage with those mechanisms. These processes may include complex transitional justice mechanisms such as truth commissions, reparations hearings and official archives, development of new modes of governance, or re-structuring of public services and support. A women’s peacebuilding network in Burundi called Dushirehamwe, for example, has successfully lobbied to incorporate policy priorities around addressing sexual- and gender-based violence, equal rights, representation, and economic policies that support rural women into the national policy agenda (Vernon 2019). In Northern Ireland, the organization Healing Through Remembering (HTR), co-produced resources and workshops to enable public debate around official mechanisms proposed to deal with the legacy of its conflict in the 2014 Stormont House Agreement and to widen participation in a 2018 public consultation into the implementation of those mechanisms.

Transforming relationships is perhaps the type of work most associated with peacebuilding practice, and encompasses a wide range of mutually reinforcing processes including in-group socialization, social cohesion between groups, as well as facilitation and mediation that may effect relational, personal, and cultural transformation. This relationship work may consist of initiatives specifically designed for that purpose, such as intergroup dialogue or encounter workshops (Lowry and Littlejohn 2006), though many other initiatives facilitate this transformation indirectly. Arts interventions may transcend ethno-national divisions by creating inclusive public spaces, for example, the organization Abart which promoted art and culture in the city of Mostar to enable new “modalities of being together” (Carabelli 2018, 32 emphasis in original) or site-specific drama performances developed in Northern Ireland by Kabosh Theatre Company. Memory and storytelling work ranging from informal narrative gathering exercises to wide-scale oral history archives may also enable individual reflection and catharsis as well as collective acknowledgment of common experiences across conflict divisions (Senehi 2015). Initiatives aimed at reintegrating ex-combatants into society may deliver crucial services in terms of education and employment training while also contributing to processes of socialization and social cohesion by facilitating dialogue among combatants from different armed groups as well as with victims and survivors through restorative and transitional justice initiatives. The organization Fambul tok, responding to gaps in community reconciliation left by the UN supported Special Court for Sierra Leone and the national Sierra Leone Truth and Reconciliation Commission, used village level storytelling and dialogue with the aim to transform relationships among offenders, victims, and their communities (Mhandara 2020).

Depending on their structure and objectives, some organizations may contribute across a range of peacebuilding processes. For example, community organizations involved in delivery of wellbeing and trauma services to victims and survivors may aid in personal transformations, while also lobbying for formal recognition from the state and thus working to transform structural aspects of conflict and cultures of violence. Organizations such as Unidad para las Victimas in Colombia and WAVE Trauma Centre in Northern Ireland deliver specific therapeutic services to address trauma, isolation, self-esteem, and guilt, as well as undertake more collective processes of dialogue, memory, and memorialization. Through this work, such organizations may directly or indirectly effect relational change through socialization and/or social cohesion processes and implementing restorative and transitional justice processes. Similar transformative approaches can be identified in organizations working with other specific stakeholders such as young people or ex-combatants, and in other types of interventions such as arts-based peacebuilding, sports, dialogue workshops, storytelling, and many others.

Capacity building also represents a crucial contribution of grassroots peacebuilding organizations, and may entail provision of citizenship and peace education, social and economic development, as well as research and knowledge transfer. Local peacebuilding practitioners generate significant locally based practical knowledge on effective conflict transformation and peacebuilding practices. Much like the hegemonic views of grassroots peacebuilding practice, however, this knowledge is often undervalued and subjugated in favor of academic knowledge production (Stanton and Kelly 2015). This practical knowledge may be used in education and dialogue processes, monitoring and advocacy, and of course research and evaluation of effective peacebuilding practice. A core aim of HTR in Northern Ireland is to generate and share learning among and beyond its diverse community membership. To this end the organization has established collectives such as the Stories Network, through which local oral history practitioners share lessons, resources and technical expertise, developed and shared core principles for “dealing with the past,” coordinated international study visits for local community practitioners to generate insights and connections with practitioners in other regions, as well as produced reports in collaboration with local scholars.

Given the long-term nature of peacebuilding and dynamic realities of societies emerging from violent conflict, the relevance and urgency of grassroots organizing may also evolve over time. For example, during early negotiations and development of new institutions, these organizations may advocate to include particular voices and issues into the agenda whereas later work may be needed to ensure agreements are implemented inclusively, and individuals and communities can access and fully utilize mechanisms for truth, justice, reparations, development, and so forth. Never Again Rwanda, a peacebuilding and social justice organization founded in the wake of the 1994 genocide, began as a space for addressing young peoples' trauma and promoting societal healing. Over the years, however, its scope has evolved in response to changing societal and political conditions to incorporate work around rights, education, and sustainable livelihoods.

Of course, there are aspects of grassroots organizing that may constrain its contributions to peacebuilding. The self-organization of grassroots and community-based activity is by its very nature non-linear, unpredictable, and a reflection of complex social systems, and thus may limit the degree to which knowledge from one context can be generalized and applied elsewhere (de Coning 2016), or scaled up and/or integrated with top-down processes (Donais and Knorr 2013; McKeon 2003).

Constraints of the "Local Turn" in Peacebuilding

Contemporary peacebuilding practice has been dominated by international, institutional conceptions of peace which are largely driven by external interventions to introduce liberal values such as democratization, free markets, human rights, neoliberal development, and law and order (Donais 2009; Richmond 2006). This international focus has nevertheless experienced a well-recorded "local turn" (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013) which has spilled over into related fields such as transitional justice (Kochanski 2020) and has a range of implications for the work of grassroots and community-based peacebuilding. In particular, this liberal peacebuilding project has faced significant critique for the ways it has co-opted and exploited local stakeholders, reproduced structural inequalities, and undermined local initiatives. Critical peace scholars have conceptualized alternatives to this shallow local turn, including critical localism (Mac Ginty 2015), emancipatory peace (Richmond 2006), and communitarian peacebuilding (Donais 2009). Nevertheless, the assumptions underpinning top-down, liberal peace interventions remain the norm.

The version of the "local" towards which international peacebuilding has claimed to shift is constructed and perceived through the vantage point of global encounters (Hirblinger and Simons 2015, 422), and grassroots stakeholders are co-opted and exploited primarily in terms of their utility in achieving liberal peace outcomes regardless of whether those outcomes align with the interests of local communities (Campbell 2013, 40). Rather than shifting power and resources to empower and reflect the agency of local stakeholders, this local turn emphasizes the utility of local actors in increasing legitimacy, sustainability, and cost-effectiveness of international peace interventions (Mac Ginty 2015, 846). Local populations and grassroots actors are often romanticized (Richmond 2009), simultaneously considered "saviors" of peacebuilding interventions in that they provide legitimacy and access for international actors, while also being viewed as uncivil, incapable, and in need of assistance from external intervenors who "know better" about what is needed to build sustainable peace (Mac Ginty 2015). Hughes and Pupavac highlight what they call the "pathologisation" of the local in Cambodia and the post-Yugoslav states, where international organizations project an image of whole societies as irrational, traumatized, and inherently predisposed to violence that "legitimizes perpetual international supervision" (2005, 875). Local actors are valued within international peacebuilding structures insofar as they adopt and legitimize liberal, Western values and conceptions of peace yet are granted limited agency in developing and leading peacebuilding processes.

International peacebuilding values a highly mediated, instrumental notion of who local actors are and how they can best operate to serve and adopt international, neoliberal norms, values, and practices (de Coning 2013; Richmond 2009). The messiness, complexity, and politics of grassroots and community-based peacebuilding initiatives undermine the managerial, bureaucratic, and depoliticized ideals of the liberal peace. As such, rather than embracing or empowering insiders in societies affected by conflict and following their lead, "local perspectives are more often viewed as hurdles to be overcome or obstacles to be avoided than as potential sources of sustainable solutions" (Donais 2009, 8). From this vantage point, the view of the local as fractious, contested, and politicized limits the amount of control external actors will relinquish because of uncertainty about the legitimacy of local representatives (de Coning 2013; see also Hirblinger and Simons 2015).

Moreover, in imposing external visions of peacebuilding in societies affected by conflict, the liberal peace reinforces and reproduces structural inequalities, existing power hierarchies, ideologies, and interests as well as neo-colonial geopolitical dynamics (Chandler 2010; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Weerawardhana 2018). The subjugation and trivialization of local knowledge reinforces these inequalities (Stanton and Kelly 2015), and “[t]his knowledge hierarchy legitimates and justifies the interveners’ claim that they have the capacity and expertise necessary to help resolve the host populations’ problems” (Autesserre 2017, 125). The balance of power by which outsiders hold the resources, determine decision-making structures and select local partners (Donais 2009), exacerbates structural inequalities within local communities as well. Support goes to local actors who are willing to model the neoliberal values championed by external actors and can help to implement prescriptive policies and definitions of peace: “outside support continues to be largely directed to moderate, like-minded, urban, non-membership, elite-based peacebuilding NGOs” (Paffenholz 2014, p. 25) and has “deliberately excluded local actors that do not support its geopolitical worldviews” (Goetschell and Hagman 2009, p. 63). Weerawardhana (2018, 91–96), for example, describes how Sinhala nationalist groups in Sri Lanka resisted what they saw as the neo-colonial influence of Western peacebuilding NGOs in the governance of Sri Lanka and she contends that the neglect of these “uncivil” components of civil society is in part responsible for failures of the Sri Lankan peace process. Representations of local stakeholders as “good” or “bad” for the liberal peace imposed by external actors, regardless of the politics of those constructions (Hirblinger and Simons 2015, 423), once again creates scenarios where local stakeholders willing to adopt and implement liberal peace ideals are lifted up over grassroots and community-based organizations which challenge or resist externally imported blueprints for peace.

Grassroots organizations often face tensions in their relationship to national and international institutions committed to a peace project that is “intolerant of alternatives and creativity” (Mac Ginty 2012, 288). Many rely on support from state and international funding bodies and thus out of necessity must absorb and model external conceptions of peace, effective practice, and neoliberal governance to comply with the terms of that support. Grassroots organizations receiving external resources and support face challenges in balancing the adaptations they make to maintain that support while remaining focused on the specific local populations, experiences, and circumstances with whom they work. In these unequal relationships, “the power dynamics between international and local peacebuilders are such that the latter have little opportunity to challenge even the most counterproductive ideas” (Autesserre 2017, 121), and assumptions about effective peacebuilding held by interveners are usually prioritized.

Despite espousing commitment to local ownership and empowerment, the very nature of neoliberal peacebuilding often leads to the marginalization and instrumentalization of local actors and organizations (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013, 764; Richmond 2009), undermining local initiatives and disempowering local stakeholders (Autesserre 2017; Van Leeuwen 2020). By placing the emphasis on local actors and local ownership, international organizations shift responsibility for policy outcomes onto these local stakeholders (Campbell 2013; Chandler 2010) without handing over any agency with regards to policy design or implementation. Donors determine organizational practices and strategies, within which “organizations and communities may have to fight to apply their own approaches, and their knowledge is not always respected” (Firchow 2018, 16). In Northern Ireland, for example, some organizations seeking to capacity build in “single-identity” or single community programs have been told that to secure funding they must re-design their activities to be entirely “cross-community” according to donor beliefs about effective peacebuilding. Similarly, EU funding in the region comes with strict conditions for how many hours participants must engage in “cross-community” encounters in order to satisfy donor metrics of success. Local actors often must adopt and implement externally conceived peacebuilding policies regardless of local needs and visions, fundamentally disempowering local agency, and expertise (Donais 2009, 7).

The increasing rhetorical gestures towards the importance of local stakeholders, participation, and buy-in, have not been accompanied by any meaningful shift in power or resources in favor of grassroots or “bottom-up” peacebuilding (de Coning 2013). Resources, direction, concepts, and authority continue to reside with international donors, administrators, and institutions (Mac Ginty 2015, 846), and peacebuilding interventions still tend to overlook the crucial role of grassroots organizations in attending to local needs, definitions, and practices of peace.

Summary

This entry has provided a brief overview of the nature of grassroots peacebuilding, its conceptual underpinnings, and the constraints it faces within the wider field of peacebuilding research and practice. It emphasized the importance of taking local-level initiatives as a starting point, rather than an addition to externally conceived peace for practical and ethical reasons. Grassroots and community-based peacebuilding actors have context-specific knowledge, resources, and agency which must be centered. Emancipatory (Richmond 2006) and communitarian (Donais 2009) approaches to peacebuilding argue similar, and place significant importance on local, community determinations about “the legitimacy and appropriateness of particular visions of social order, justice, or ethics” (Donais 2009, p. 6). Grassroots peacebuilding actors understanding intimately the personal, relational, structural, and cultural transformations that must happen to consolidate peace in their communities.

Grassroots organizations are nevertheless marginalized in liberal peace research and policy which, it has been argued, privilege top-down, state-orientated interventions and co-opt local stakeholders to achieve certain agendas which may not align with their own. As a result, community-based initiatives may be persuaded to accept and implement externally imposed values, norms, and practices in order to receive necessary funding and support. This undermines the transformative potential of grassroots organizing for peace, reinforces structural inequalities and power hierarchies that exist in conflict-affected societies, and risks excluding those actors and initiatives which resist external intervention.

More, varied research focus should be dedicated to the local and specific in peacebuilding, not as a legitimating resource or savior of internationally led processes, but as core to re-orienting peacebuilding practices, processes, and knowledge. As important, that focus on local actors and “bottom up” approaches needs to be accompanied by critical shifts in power and vantage point so that research and policy does not simply replicate neo-colonial structures which homogenize, pathologize, and subjugate grassroots actors. This research should be critical and challenge existing neo-colonial power structures as part of an active decolonizing process, and embrace subjective, indigenous knowledge production rooted in conflict-affected societies in the Global South who can articulate, with nuance and detail, specific local peacebuilding initiatives, their practices, definitions, and obstacles.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ DR Congo: Local and International Peacebuilders' Interaction
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Youth and Peacebuilding

References

- Arriaza, L., & Roht-Arriaza, N. (2008). Social reconstruction as a local process. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 2(1), 152–172.
- Autesserre, S. (2017). International peacebuilding and local success: Assumptions and effectiveness. International Studies Review, 19, 114–132.

- Campbell, S. (2013). Construing top-down as bottom-up: The governmental co-option of peacebuilding “from below”. Vis-à-Vis. Explorations in Anthropology, 11(1), 39–56.
- Carabelli, G. (2018). The divided city and the grassroots: The (un)making of ethnic divisions in Mostar. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Chandler, D. (2010). Post-conflict statebuilding: Governance without government. In M. Pugh, N. Cooper, & M. Turner (Eds.), Whose peace? Critical perspectives on the political economy of peacebuilding (pp. 337–355). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Curle, A. (1994). New challenges for citizen peacemaking. Medicine and War, 10(2), 96–105.
- de Coning, C. (2013). Understanding peacebuilding as essentially local. Stability, 2(1), 1–6.
- de Coning, C. (2016). Implications of complexity for peacebuilding policies and practices. In E. Brusset, B. Hughes, & C. de Coning (Eds.), Complexity thinking for peacebuilding practice and evaluation (pp. 19–48). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Donais, T. (2009). Empowerment or imposition? Dilemmas of local ownership in post-conflict peacebuilding processes. Peace & Change, 34(1), 3–26.
- Donais, T., & Knorr, A. C. (2013). Peacebuilding from below vs. the liberal peace: The case of Haiti. Canadian Journal of Development Studies, 34(1), 54–69.
- Fetherston, A. B. (2000). From conflict transformation to transformative peacebuilding: Reflections from Croatia. CCR working papers, No. 4. Centre for Conflict Resolution, Department of Peace Studies, University of Bradford.
- Firchow, P. (2018). Reclaiming everyday peace: Local voices in measurement and evaluation after war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace, and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Galtung, J. (1975). Three approaches to peace: Peacekeeping, peacemaking, and peacebuilding. In J. Galtung (Ed.), Peace, war and defence: Essays in peace research (pp. 282–304). Copenhagen: Christian Ejlert.
- Goetschell, L., & Hagman, T. (2009). Civilian peacebuilding: Peace by bureaucratic means? Conflict, Security & Development, 9(1), 55–73.
- Hirblinger, A., & Simons, C. (2015). The good, the bad, and the powerful: Representations of the ‘local’ in peacebuilding. Security Dialogue, 46(5), 422–439.
- Hughes, C., & Pupavac, V. (2005). Framing post-conflict societies: International pathologisation of Cambodia and the post-Yugoslav states. Third World Quarterly, 6, 873–889.
- Kochanski, A. (2020). The “local turn” in transitional justice: Curb the enthusiasm. International Studies Review, 22(1), 26–50.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (2003). The little book of conflict transformation: Clear articulation of the guiding principles by a pioneer in the field. New York: Good Books.
- Lowry, C. S., & Littlejohn, S. (2006). Dialogue and the discourse of peacebuilding in Maluku, Indonesia. Conflict Resolution Quarterly, 23(4), 409–426.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2012). Routine peace: Technocracy and peacebuilding. Cooperation and Conflict, 47(3), 287–308.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Marshall, D. R. (2000). Women in war and peace: Grassroots peacebuilding. Peaceworks no. 34. Washington, D.C.: United States Institute of Peace.
- McKeon, C. (2003). From the ground up: Exploring dichotomies in grassroots peace building. Post-conflict, Development and Peace conference, Department of Political Science, Javeriana University, Bogota Colombia. https://rc-services-assets.s3.eu-west-1.amazonaws.com/s3fs-public/FromTheGroundUp_200310_ENG.pdf. Accessed 5 Sept 2020.
- Mhandara, L. (2020). Community-based reconciliation in practice and lessons for the National Peace and reconciliation Commission of Zimbabwe. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 20(1), 35–58.
- Mitlin, D. (2008). With and beyond the state-co-production as a route to political influence, power and transformation for grassroots organizations. Environment & Urbanization, 20(2), 339–360.
- Paffenholz, T. (2014). International peacebuilding goes local: Analysing Lederach’s conflict transformation theory and its ambivalent encounter with 20 years of practice. Peacebuilding, 2(1), 11–27.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874.
- Parent, G. (2016). Local peacebuilding, trauma, and empowerment in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Peace & Change, 41(4), 510–538.
- Richmond, O. (2006). The problem of peace: Understanding the ‘liberal peace’. Conflict, Security & Development, 6(3), 291–314.
- Richmond, O. (2009). The romanticisation of the local: Welfare, culture and peacebuilding. The International Spectator, 44(1), 149–169.
- Roberts, D. (2011). Post-conflict peacebuilding, liberal irrelevance and the locus of legitimacy. International Peacekeeping, 18(4), 410–424.
- Schirch, L. (2005). Little book of strategic peacebuilding: A vision and framework for peace with justice. New York: Good Books.
- Schirch, L., & Sewak, M. (2005). The role of women in peacebuilding. Working paper, Global Partnership for the Prevention of Armed Conflict. <https://genderandsecurity.org/projects-resources/research/role-women-peacebuilding>. Accessed 5 Sept 2020.
- Senehi, J. (2015). The role of constructive, transcultural storytelling in ethnopolitical conflict transformation in Northern Ireland. In J. Carter, G. Irani, & V. D. Volkan

- (Eds.), Regional and ethnic conflicts: Perspectives from the front lines (pp. 227–237). New York: Routledge.
- Shank, M., & Schirch, L. (2008). Strategic arts-based peacebuilding. Peace & Change, 33(2), 217–242.
- Stanton, E., & Kelly, G. (2015). Exploring barriers to constructing locally based peacebuilding theory: The case of Northern Ireland. International Journal of Conflict Engagement and Resolution, 1(3), 33–52.
- Staples, L. (2012). Community organizing for social justice: Grassroots groups for power. Social Work with Groups, 35, 287–297.
- Van Leeuwen, M. (2020). The ‘local turn’ and notions of conflict and peacebuilding: Reflections on local peace committees in Burundi and eastern DR Congo. Peacebuilding, 8(3), 279–299.
- Vernon, P. (2019). Local peacebuilding: What works and why. London: Peace Direct and the Alliance for Peacebuilding.
- Weerawardhana, C. (2018). Decolonising peacebuilding: Managing conflict from Northern Ireland to Sri Lanka and beyond. Newcastle upon Tyne: Cambridge Scholars Publishing.

the permanent five members (P5) of the UN Security Council: The United States, Russia, China, the United Kingdom, and France. These five states hold control over the legitimate use of force under the UN framework and thus can influence peace operations in unique ways.

The scholarly literature has thus far looked at two forms of great power involvement in peace operations: (1) their direct involvement as peacekeeping contributors and (2) their impact on launching and shaping peace operations (e.g., where peace operations get deployed; what they do in the operational theatre). In this chapter, I provide an overview of these two active research areas with regards to peace operations launched under a UN umbrella as well as regional (EU, NATO, AU) and ad hoc frameworks. I conclude by highlighting interesting future avenues of research in this burgeoning field of scientific inquiry.

Grassroots Peacebuilding

► Local Peacebuilding

Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations

Marina E. Henke
Northwestern University, Evanston, IL, USA
Hertie School, Berlin, Germany

Definition/Description

In the academic field of International Relations (IR), great powers are both material and ideational constructs. They possess first-class military-political capabilities (usually measured in terms of population, territory, resource endowment, economic capability, political stability, and military strength), while at the same time see themselves and are accepted by others in rhetoric and behavior as having this rank (Waltz 1993, 50; Buzan 2004). In the peace operations field, five great powers are particularly noteworthy. These are

Great Powers as Peacekeeping Contributors

At the time of this writing, the involvement of most P5 nations as UN peacekeeping contributors is limited. US contributions peaked from November 1992 to March 1996, when the US government sent significant numbers of personnel to UN missions in Somalia (UNOSOM II), Haiti (UNMIH), and the former Yugoslavia (UNPROFOR and UNPREDEP). However, after suffering numerous US casualties in Somalia, US president Bill Clinton signed Presidential Decision Directive (PDD) 25 in May 1994 de facto extricating the United States from UN missions (Smith in Bellamy and Williams 2013). From then on, US troops have served in regional and ad hoc peace operations but no longer in UN missions. Similarly, France and the United Kingdom were among the largest UN troop contributors in the 1990s contributing a significant number of soldiers to UN operations in the Balkans. Nevertheless, this trend did not endure. Starting in the mid-1990s, both countries also shifted their attention away from UN operations to regional or ad hoc missions. Russian reluctance to contribute to UN missions also started in the mid-1990s. Perceiving UN operations in the Balkans as a mere tool of “Western influence,”

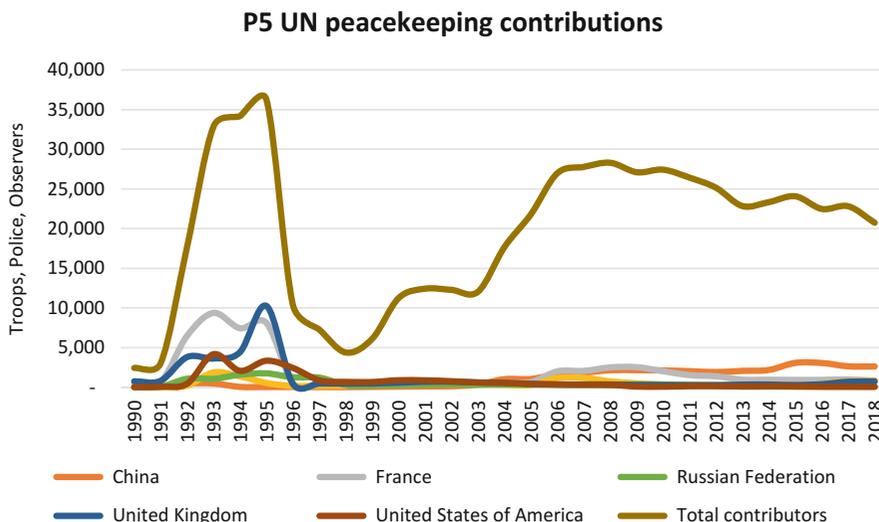

Russian contributions to UN peacekeeping declined and Russia retooled the Commonwealth of Independent States, a regional organization composed of nine former Soviet Union member states into a peacekeeping organization to intervene e.g., in Tajikistan and Moldova (Allison 2013; Mackinlay and Cross 2003). Nevertheless, Russia still is the second largest supplier of contractor services to UN peacekeeping operations, and the main supplier of air transportation services. China is the only P5 member bucking the trend of declining UN contributions. Since the early 2000s, Chinese commitments to UN missions have increased more than 20-fold. Scholars have proposed various reasons to explain this development. UN peacekeeping allows China to demonstrate its commitment to “peaceful conflict resolution,” while at the same time foster Chinese military modernization and professionalization (Hirono and Lanteigne 2011, 2013).

Great Powers as Peacekeeping Influencers

It is always states (not institutions) that are the ultimate decision-makers on whether peace operations get launched, and how the mandates of these operations look like. Great Powers play critical roles in the latter processes.

Great Powers Influence Where Peacekeepers Go
What explains why peace operations deploy to some countries, but not to others? The existing literature proposes two sets of arguments to answer this question: the “needs-based” argument focuses on aspects of the conflict (e.g., civilian death tolls, large displaced populations) to explain international actions. It stipulates that the “harder” a case, the more likely it is that a peace operation gets sent (e.g., Doyle and Sambanis 2000, 2006; Gilligan and Stedman 2003; Bredsley and Schmidt 2012; this section should simply refer to Fortna 2004, 2008; Allen and Yuen 2014). The “high politics” argument, in turn, proposes that Great Powers and, in particular, the P-5 determine the destinations of peace operations (e.g., Regan 2002; Gilligan and Stedman 2003; Mullenbach 2005; Allen and Yuen 2014; Jakobsen 1996). De Jonge Oudraat (1996, 491), for instance, argues:

It is a mistake to think of ‘the United Nations’ as an independent political actor with respect to peace and security issues: it would be more accurate to think of the United Nations as a policy instrument of the organization’s member states. Except for limited actions undertaken by the Secretary-General, such as fact-finding and mediation efforts, member states, led by the P-5, determine when and whether action will be taken.

Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations, Fig. 1 Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations. Data source: UN peacekeeping department

Durch (1993, 23) tells a similar story suggesting that peace operations “require complimentary political support from the great powers and the local parties” and if “either is missing or deficient, an operation may never get underway.” Henke (2019a, b) tries to explain when exactly individual P5 members mobilize. She argues that no single variable can explain such development. Rather, it is a combination of structural and domestic factors that motivate certain states to take on this role in the context of a particular conflict. For example, US leadership on Darfur in 2007 was largely the result of intense lobbying efforts by a domestic mass movement: The Save Darfur Coalition. French leadership on conflicts in Mali, Côte d’Ivoire, and Chad/Central African Republic (CAR), in turn, is the result of colonial legacies and ad hoc domestic factors.

Great Powers’ Influence on What Peacekeepers Do

Similar to peace operation destinations, there is a debate in the literature on how peace operation mandates are formulated. What criteria are used to determine how many troops, police, and observers to deploy, what postures to adopt and what mission objectives to achieve? A variety of arguments have been advanced including conflict dynamics, bureaucratic process, and great power influence (e.g., Allen and Yuen 2014; Autesserre 2014; Benson and Kathman 2014). With regard to the latter, Howard and Dayal (2018), for instance, suggest that the parochial interests of the P-5 member states dominate UN mandate writing, in particular, when it comes to what type of mission to authorize (i.e., a mission under Chapter VI or Chapter VII of the UN Charter). Frequently, P-5 states have only limited geopolitical interests in the states in which peace operations deploy. As a result, they do not bother to tailor mandates to individual country characteristics but rather focus on what Howard and Dayal (2018:73) call “group-preserving” dynamics (i.e., they repeat previously agreed upon solutions even when these solutions do not fit the new context and may appear suboptimal, illogical, or even pathological. They thereby privilege the achievement and repetition of agreement over the content of the agreement to maintain group status and legitimacy). Allen and Yuen (2014) and Benson and Kathman (2014) provide more nuanced assessments. They find that the UN Security Council does at times tailor mandates to local events (e.g., civilian fatalities). However, P-5 parochial interest do constrain these actions considerably.

Great Powers Affect Which Countries Offer Peacekeepers

Recent research has revealed that Great Powers are intensely involved in recruiting forces to serve in peace operations – UN and others. Henke (2016, 2019a) found, for instance, that the United States was deeply engaged in recruiting peacekeepers for the UN-AU peacekeeping force in Darfur (UNAMID). On several occasions, the US State Department instructed US ambassadors all around the world to petition their host governments for UNAMID force contributions. When UNAMID fell short of specific strategic assets (e.g., helicopters and other transport equipment), the United States would again appeal to foreign governments at the highest political levels to make the required contributions. Moreover, on some occasions the US government was willing to offer troop allowances, air lift, training and equipment or other political rewards to countries if they agreed to deploy. As a result, Henke (2016) suggests that a distinct division of labor exists between the United Nations and Great Powers when it comes to UN force generation. In the case of UNAMID, UN officials, such as UN Under-Secretary-General for Peacekeeping Operations, Jean-Marie Guéhenno, and Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sudan, Jan Pronk, provided the United States with valuable information on which countries to approach for UNAMID force contributions and why. Indeed, these UN officials served as important “brokers” between the United States and potential peacekeeping contributing states. They identified suitable states, which the United States would then approach bilaterally and bargain into the operation. For the most part, the United States would negotiate a political commitment to join a peacekeeping operation. Once these commitments were locked down, the United States would instruct its recruits to get in touch with UNDPKO in New York and to engage UNDPKO in direct discussions of its precise military requirements. UNDPKO would then negotiate with the peacekeepers as to which area of the conflict theatre they would operate, what type of equipment they would provide, and what the exact reimbursement rates were for the equipment. UNDPKO also inspected the countries' equipment prior to their deployment.

Great Powers Train Peacekeeping Troops

Lastly, the United States, France, and the UK all run important peacekeeping training programs. The US-led Global Peace Operations Initiative (GPOI) provides training and equipment to potential peacekeeping nations. It is today the largest bilateral UN peacekeeping capacity-builder of any UN member state. The EU has established similar training programs called EURO-RECAMP and AMANI Africa.

Remaining Puzzles

The involvement of Great Powers in peace operations is a field of research that is still in its infancy and many questions remain unanswered. One critical question is, of course, whether Great Power involvement contributes positively or negatively to the success of the peace operation. Thus far, no definitive answers exist. On the one hand, scholars have suggested that without Great Power involvement hardly any peace operations would deploy (Bellamy and Williams 2010; Henke 2019b). In this regard, because of Great Power engagement, international cooperation in the security sphere occurs much more frequently than the actual constellation of intrinsic security preferences would permit. Nevertheless, what's the quality of such "constructed" cooperation? How do states perform in peace operations if they are not entirely intrinsically motivated to participate but are prodded or even coerced to do so by Great Powers? Does Great Power involvement contribute to some of the shortcomings of recent and past peace operations?

In this context, the externalities of payments the Great Powers provide to peacekeeping contingents require special scrutiny. Optimists would suggest that these payments do not generate any negative side effects. Most payment packages, especially those that might trigger controversy, are never made public. Rather, recipient states often go to great lengths to publicly justify their deployment in other ways. Moreover, these payments can benefit the country at large by helping build proficient militaries, as well as boosting economic, social, and political development from the individual soldier to the nation state (Atkinson 2006; Ruby and Gibler 2010; Worboys 2007).

Pessimists would, however, argue that a deleterious propensity toward profit has infiltrated peace deployments. States limit their peacekeeping commitment to ensure a profit margin (i.e., they restrict their involvement to a minimum, for example, via risk-averse operational strategies or caveats). Moreover, if a Great Power reneges on a promised payment, threatens to do so, or is perceived to do so (sometimes falsely so), peace operation contingents may retaliate accordingly. Such behavior is feasible for two reasons. First, it is hard for Great Powers to observe what is going on in the deployment theater at all times and places. As a result, peacekeeping participants may be tempted to look for shortcuts to protect their assets: Why undertake undue risks? Why engage with difficult targets if easier activities can be undertaken? Second, Great Powers face punishment challenges, especially in environments in which peacekeeping participants are scarce. Great Power then have few options for disciplining deviant peacekeeping states if they desperately rely on them.

Furthermore, at the state and individual level, Great Power incentive payments can also create complex social and political contingencies. At the microlevel, allowances received by soldiers deploying abroad often exceed the salaries of other professions and their own salaries prior to joining a mission (Wilén et al. 2015, 316). Such an influx of money can create jealousy and social tension, both inside the military between those who deploy and those who stay behind, among different military ranks, and between the military and the civilian population (Dwyer 2015). Such payments can also create the potential for corruption, favoritism, and nepotism, e.g., in the selection process of officers that get to serve in operations or in the process of how funds are used (e.g., Aning 2007, 141; Levin et al. 2016). At the macrolevel, research suggests that the money, material, and training provided by pivotal states risks increasing domestic political repression and even the probability of coups (Savage and Caverley 2017).

Various strategies may be able to counteract these negative forces. Pakistan reportedly allows its soldiers to serve only once in any foreign “subsidized” operation to diminish the risk of social inequality and excessive “autonomy” (Murphy 2007, 166), while Uruguay has put in place an elaborate system of how soldiers receive their share of the deployment subsidies. Nevertheless, implementing these strategies is complex and, arguably, can have an impact on the operational effectiveness of the mission (e.g., soldiers get chosen not for their professional capacities but for sociopolitical reasons).

Summary

Great Powers, and in particular, the P-5 nations, play a critical role in the set-up and conduct of peace operations. While their troop commitments to UN operations has declined over the years, they are active in non-UN peace operations such as NATO and the EU. However, when it comes to UN operations, Great Powers still pull many of the organizational strings. The scholarly debate today centers on the degree of influence. Are they critical and decisive or do other factors such as conflict dynamics, bureaucracies, etc. mitigate their power? Moreover, the quality of their influence constitutes another emerging and vast field of inquiry. Do Great Powers help or hurt in the process of establishing sustainable peace via peace operations?

References

- Allen, S. H., & Yuen, A. T. (2014). The politics of peacekeeping: UN security council oversight across peacekeeping missions. International Studies Quarterly, 58(3), 621–632.
- Allison, R. (2013). Russia, the West, and military intervention. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Aning, K. (2007). Unintended consequences of peace operations for troop-contributing countries from West Africa: The case of Ghana. In C. Aoi, C. De Coning, & R. Thakur (Eds.), Unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations (pp. 133–155). Tokyo: United Nations Press.
- Atkinson, C. (2006). Constructivist implications of material power: Military engagement and the socialization of states, 1972–2000. International Studies Quarterly, 50(3), 509–537.
- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland: Conflict resolution and the everyday politics of international intervention. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Beardsley, K., & Schmidt, H. (2012). Following the flag or following the charter? Examining the determinants of UN involvement in international crises, 1945–2002. International Studies Quarterly, 56(1), 33–49.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Williams, P. (2010). Understanding peacekeeping. Cambridge, UK: Polity.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Williams, P. (2013). Providing peacekeepers: the politics, challenges, and future of United Nations peacekeeping contributions. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Benson, M., & Kathman, J. D. (2014). United Nations bias and force commitments in civil conflicts. The Journal of Politics, 76(2), 350–363.
- Buzan, B. (2004). The United States and the great powers: world politics in the twenty-first century. Cambridge: Polity.
- De Jonge Oudraat, C. (1996). The United Nations and international conflict. In M. E. Brown (Ed.), The international dimensions of internal conflict (pp. 489–536). Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2000). International peacebuilding: A theoretical and quantitative analysis. American Political Science Review, 94(4), 779–801.
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Durch, W. J. (1993). The evolution of UN peacekeeping: Case studies and comparative analysis. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Dwyer, M. (2015). Peacekeeping abroad, trouble making at home: Mutinies in West Africa. African Affairs, 114(455), 206–225.
- Fortna, V. P. (2004). Does peacekeeping keep peace? International intervention and the duration of peace after civil war. International Studies Quarterly, 48(2), 269–292.
- Fortna, V. P. (2008). Does peacekeeping work?: Shaping belligerents’ choices after civil war. Princeton: Princeton University Press.

- Gilligan, M., & Stedman, S. J. (2003). Where do the peacekeepers go? International Studies Review, 5(4), 37–54.
- Henke, M. E. (2016). Great powers and UN force generation: A case study of UNAMID. International Peacekeeping, 23(3), 468–492.
- Henke, M. E. (2019a). Buying allies: Payment practices in multilateral military coalition-building. International Security, 43(4), 128–162.
- Henke, M. E. (2019b). Constructing allied cooperation: Diplomacy, payments, and power in multilateral military coalitions. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Hirono, M., & Lanteigne, M. (2011). Introduction: China and UN peacekeeping. International Peacekeeping, 18(3), 243–256.
- Howard, L. M., & Kaushlesh Dayal, A. (2018). The use of force in UN peacekeeping. International Organization, 72(1), 71–103.
