Small-scale food production operates substantially according to an exchange (or custom) economy. The exchange economy is enmeshed with more commercial or “formal” economic interaction and is a significant part of Vanuatu’s economic life. Most people’s participation in the exchange economy exceeds their involvement in the cash economy, which is largely concentrated in the country’s two towns. Much of the cash available in Vanuatu circulates in the towns, generating disparity between urban and rural communities in terms of access to money. Where access to food, housing, community engagement, and standing does not rely on money, however, lack of money does not itself equate to poverty, particularly in areas of good soil fertility. Rural Ni-Vanuatu regularly forgo opportunities to acquire more cash if there is no pressing need for it. Nevertheless, some areas have seen increasing pressure on available land, while lack of money does limit the life options available, for some severely. This encourages urban drift which in turn contributes to squatter settlements, actual poverty, and social problems, such as alcohol and substance abuse, property crime, prostitution, and teenage pregnancies.

The extended family and the patterns of mutual obligation of the kinship system not only provide livelihood but are the main form of social welfare across the country, generally ensuring that people have access to food and shelter and perhaps (because family networks spread wide) to cash. The custom economy works around reciprocity and relationship. Accumulation is not generally regarded as an endpoint. As active, shared community welfare this system has been effective in many respects, responding both to everyday need and (with limitations) to large-scale disaster and crisis. In view of the rapid growth of Vanuatu's population, the ongoing provision of everyday food security is notable, even if it is at times severely stretched.

This safety net supports social well-being and gives Vanuatu significant resilience, even if the economic dynamic that generates it also means that government has a narrow tax base (since much of the economy is not monetized). The government relies on this safety net, for example, advising town dwellers who lost employment during the pandemic to return to their islands. Nevertheless, the kinship safety net is facing complex demands, partly as a result of urban drift, changing expectations around life choices and the ongoing monetization of the economy and partly in the face of the intense disruptions and demands generated by climate change and accelerating natural disasters. Gross domestic product figures or economic indicators that only register the formal economy, however, do not properly capture the state of Vanuatu's economic life. They are not without meaning, however. Significant public goods such as education and health are funded fundamentally through the formal economy (and thus rely substantially on international assistance).

Given its fundamental significance in social and economic life, the health of the exchange economy and a positive enmeshment with the formal economy are vitally important. While the interaction of economic frameworks and the social relations in which they are embedded can operate fluidly, there are also significant points of friction which could lead to serious conflict. The question of land offers an example. The exchange economy and the social relations in which it is embedded are underpinned by access to land. Land is not an individual possession but is held within the context of the kin network. The tenure systems for land holding and land use are complex and vary among language groups, but land is the basis for family livelihood and underpins both a sense of autonomy and of inter-relationship. Upheld through oral history and closely guarded clan stories, tenure is embedded in custom governance and social norms (Bolton 2003). Land is an ancestral realm, reaching across time and linking people to their forebears and to those not yet born. For most Ni-Vanuatu, it is sacred and part of themselves (and vice versa), woven into a web of life that holds together kin and ancestors, culture, history, the unseen world of the spirit, and sources of meaning (Bolton 2003; see entry ► “Culture and Conflict Resolution”).

Understanding humans, nature, and the world of the spirit as interwoven is widely shared across the Pacific Islands, and indeed there are variants of this deeply embedded world view underlying ways of life in many places, particularly amongst Indigenous peoples (Boege 2020; see entry ► “Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and its Legacy”). For many ni-Vanuatu and Pacific Islanders, this world view connects with forms of Christianity (although some Christian denominations reject Indigenous cosmologies). Vanua – the word from which the country is named – encompasses land, people, ancestors, and one's place. Similar words can be found throughout Oceania (Boege 2020; see entry ► “Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security”).

Land and access to land through customary land-holding arrangements is thus embedded in shared economic, spiritual, and communal meanings. It is a basis of customary life and politically highly significant. Reclaiming land alienated through colonization or protecting it from alienation was a key issue mobilizing support for independence. As a result, with the exception of land immediately around the major towns, the constitution forbids the outright sale of land to foreign parties. Whereas in some countries the state in the last analysis owns the land, in Vanuatu, the land belongs to customary landholders. Leasing arrangements, however, have enabled the continuation of plantations and other commercial interests (see entry ► “Land Politics and Conflict”).

This understanding of land is sharply at odds with the formal economy’s approach to land as property that can be bought or sold. It also offers a very different grasp of the human than the self-possessed individual of liberalism (Bolton 2003; see entry ► “Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject”). Despite the restoration of land to customary landowners following independence in 1980, however, over time there has been considerable long-term leasing of land (up to 75 years) to foreign and cashed-up capital city ni-Vanuatu investors, largely in tourism developments. The lease conditions make the land’s return to original landholders extremely difficult, and the leasing process routinely occurs without meaningful informed consent (given weak understanding of legal English, the formal legal system, and the formal economy). The inherited legal system and mechanisms for implementing it have not been sufficiently oriented towards actual ways of life in the country.

Two-thirds of Efate Island (where the capital is located) and nearly all of its coastline have been leased to investors and land speculation severely affects other islands. As a result, landlessness, previously extremely rare, has been emerging. The attraction of the cash economy, unscrupulous investors, a fragmentary legal system, and (for many years) too much power vested in a single government minister have enabled these developments. Some economists argue that economic development requires the transition to land as a commodity. Customary land holding is integral to the nature of Vanuatu’s social economy and social order, however, a bulwark against real poverty and a key basis of social peace. The creation of landless, unemployed slum dwellers who could reasonably feel cheated of their land would be a fundamental shift in the nature of ni-Vanuatu society and politics and a recipe for violence. Efforts to address land alienation are underway (discussed later) but change is difficult and slow (see entries ► “Land Politics and Conflict” and ► “Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security”).

Kastom, Chiefs, and Community

Vanuatu’s National Security Strategy notes the “impressive level of social cohesion” that characterizes Vanuatu and attributes it to the “traditional values of kastom” and the work of “chiefs and communities” (Government of Vanuatu 2019, p. 19). Having some understanding of kastom, chiefs, and communities, then, is fundamental to understanding sources of peace in Vanuatu. Kastom, the Bislama word for custom, is a multi-layered, context-dependent term. It can refer to specific ancestral practices, materials, and beliefs, grounded in place. But kastom is at the same time understood as living traditions, with varying, place-specific practices that are nevertheless linked through broadly shared ways of life, shaped by tradition and long histories of interaction and capable of responding to prevailing conditions. Articulating this emphasis, Vanuatu’s first Prime Minister Father Walter Lini noted that “custom is part of life, but as our way of life changes, so must custom. Its strength in the future must lie in its flexibility” (quoted by Jolly 1994, p. 256). As a source of collective authenticity, however, kastom can also become something that is competed for, reified, claimed, and mis-used (see entry ► “Culture and Conflict Resolution”).

Many elements of communities’ ways of life have changed substantially or been lost through the impact of missionization, colonization, the independence struggle, development, or simply through time. Missionaries moved some scattered communities into concentrated coastal villages, for example, while the independence struggle crafted a sense of national identity from particular, gendered elements of custom, heightening the focus on male custom (Bolton 2003). Some practices, polygamy for example, have been rejected. While people will commonly say they are closer to customary values than to those of “modern” consumer society, extensive knowledge of traditional systems seems rare. Some islands have seen a revival of customary practices while the inhabitants of others consider that they have lost touch. Even in these regions, however, what might be regarded as some fundamental elements of kastom remain strong.

Identifying underlying commonalities across customary difference can only be contentious and tentative. Nevertheless, some points stand out. The first is the continuity of land and kin across time, mentioned earlier. This continuity includes livelihood and sustenance as people work together to sustain their collective life, but it also includes the world of nature and spirit (Bolton 2003). The second is reciprocity, mutual-ity, and relationality as a fundamental way of being in the world. Taking time to tend and extend networks and pay appropriate respect is valued and often required behavior. Respect, as the essential way of tending relations, is widely upheld as a fundamental virtue, even while its loss is repeatedly decried (Forsyth 2009). Restorative conflict management approaches that emphasize arriving at harmony and maintaining community are also highly valued and part of the emphasis on relationality (Forsyth 2009).

The third commonality is that authority structures tend to be personalized and relatively flat rather than pyramid-shaped. Leaders can carry great authority, so there is hierarchy, but this authority comes from place and tribe in a direct and material way (see entry ► “Post-conflict Timor-Leste”). Nevertheless, perhaps because of customary leadership’s legitimacy and gravity, customary chiefs can speak with considerable authority beyond their place and people. These three characteristics produce styles of leadership that can surprise non-Melanesians. Aspects of this style can also extend into the state realm. For example, after joining the Melanesian Spearhead Group’s public censure of Fiji’s military coup (2006), Vanuatu’s Foreign Minister is reported to have visited his Fijian counterpart, approaching him on hands and knees and giving him a ceremonial mat to underscore the respect in which the relationship continued to be held.

The title “chief” has become a catch-all for various kinds of authority. There is no indigenous word for chief – it is an English or a Bislama word (jif) which translates a Western simplification of complex systems of authority. In some islands, those with the greatest community stature may be hidden figures, with others taking public roles as community managers. Depending on region, positions of authority might be established through descent, through rising in a system of ranks, through demonstration of leadership qualities and community service, or (often) through some combination of these. In some regions, customary mechanisms have died away and voting is used. Clan authority is nevertheless significant with both matrilineal and patrilineal descent practiced. In colonial times, missionaries identified “leaders” of newly constructed communities, while colonial district administrators established local “assessors” to assist them. Assessors and church leaders rose to prominence as middlemen between local and colonial actors, becoming “village chiefs.” These roles often continue to operate alongside clan or other customary authorities.

A proliferation of chiefly titles and contest over their power and authority has reduced respect for chiefs. Nevertheless, chiefs continue to provide an ideal model of leadership in a way that national political elites do not, whether or not individual leaders fulfill these ideals. Leaders are seen as ideally on the ground, with and answerable to their communities, responsible for the community’s well-being and peace. The roles can be arduous, full-time and are not salaried. Nor are they singular, however. Customary governance is collective and is not reducible to “chiefs.” Rather, a network of authoritative roles are embedded in patterns of kinship, community, reciprocity, and “respect.”

Customary and community life in Vanuatu is not inherently peaceful. Not all communities function well. Conflict over chieftancy, land disputes, clashes between Christian denominations, and tension around development activities are common. Lack of opportunities for increasing numbers of young people, decreasing availability of land, changing social expectations around gender, poverty, and pressure to gain cash add to friction, uncertainty, and aggression. Despite these pressures and the reality of conflict, with the notable exception of gender violence, communities are largely peaceful and work hard at maintaining good relations (Forsyth 2009).

Violence against women, however, is a significant form of social conflict (GoV 2019; see entry ► “Gender Justice and Peacebuilding”). It is a problem which is often seen by external observers and some ni-Vanuatu as caused by custom and hence used to discount customary forms of social order as sources of peace. There is an argument for this. The National Council of Chiefs, for example, an all-male organization, long delayed passage of the bill which criminalizes gender-based violence. The focus on chiefs, now all male, works to underscore male custom and power (Bolton 2003). Nevertheless, it is ultimately misleading and counter-productive to identify gender violence with customary life per se, rather than with broader patterns of structural violence, marginalization, and social stress (Brown 2018; Taylor 2008). Identifying gender violence with customary life implicitly asserts that modernity enables us to move beyond such violence. This has not proved to be the case.

Custom is associated with deeply valued dimensions of life – dimensions repeatedly dismissed or belittled by colonization. To make undoing violence against women conditional on abandoning these things of value creates a serious and unnecessary obstacle to working against gender violence and sidelines customary social order as a source of peace. Customary practices have changed over time and continue to change. Indeed, some traditional practices which enabled women's status and authority or protected against family violence have been abandoned through modernization (Bolton 2003). Custom is not the cause of gender violence, but it has great responsibility and scope regarding such violence, because it plays such a significant role in social relations. Leading organizations (such as the Vanuatu Women's Centre) working against gender violence work with customary authorities and communities not to abandon customary ways of life but to pursue values of respect and mutuality central to their cultures (Brown 2018).

Governance, Justice, Social Peace

The character of governance, social justice, and justice processes are fundamental to peace. While these processes flow from a mixture of state institutional and societal sources in any country, in Vanuatu, societal governance and justice processes are extensive and critically important. The pattern of interaction between state institutional and societal governance in Vanuatu, however, is still largely ad hoc, fractured and in relatively early phases of taking shape.

Vanuatu became an independent parliamentary democracy in 1980, following colonization by both Britain and France in a chaotic condominium informally known as the “Pandemonium.” Reflecting the independence struggle, the new state's constitution refers to the significance of both chiefs and Christian values. A National Council of Chiefs (the Malvatumauri) was established to advise government. The metaphors of a bird with two wings or an outrigger canoe are commonly used to convey an ideal of modes and ethics of governance functioning together, advising and holding each other accountable (Forsyth 2009).

Despite this, government for some decades paid little attention to the Malvatumauri and was generally ambivalent about customary authority. This is understandable. Customary authorities could in some respects pose a direct challenge to government, although this direction has not been taken (Forsyth and Batley 2016). Moreover, internationally available discourses of good governance and development have little to offer regarding the experience of different forms of governance working constructively together, while custom and tradition can easily appear (and at times be) parochial and closed. In Vanuatu this overlooking of custom may be changing gradually. The Malvatumauri and local customary institutions have been given more active formal roles protecting customary landholding and a commission of eminent persons to consider relations among government, kastom, and churches has been proposed (GoV 2019).

In practice, governance is undertaken by both government and customary and community authorities, with churches also players in communities. Customary governance is widely regarded as responsible for peace, including by government. Conflict resolution and conflict prevention is largely the work of customary arrangements, as is much decision-making around community life (Boege and Forsyth 2018; see entry ► “Grass-roots Organizations and Peacebuilding”). By contrast, formal state institutions have limited outreach beyond major centers. Vanuatu has five police stations across the country, two of which are in towns. Given difficult terrain, poor infrastructure, and lack of resources, the police are effectively dependent on customary authorities to keep order in rural areas. Moreover, the police suffer from “limited human resources, lack of community trust, poor governance, low levels of discipline, lack of strong leadership . . . and political interference” among other problems (GoV 2019, p. 24).

Despite the practical reality of joint governance, the actual nature of relations between customary governance and state institutions is unclear, with their interaction repeatedly marked by contradiction, confusion, and gaps. Friction as to how far police should liaise with community leaders on police action such as arrests is ongoing, for example, and while chiefs and courts have cooperated at key moments, jurisdictional tensions are common (Forsyth 2009). It would be a mistake to see the relationship as simply a matter of levels or to make the assumption that customary arrangements are concerned only with parochial matters. Conflict resolution and community decision-making includes matters of life and death and of fundamental social well-being that can play out at national levels and beyond. The respect accorded to chiefs and the relational webs nurtured by customary approaches often reach beyond individual communities. Most importantly, forms of customary and community governance underpin the country’s social resilience, food security, social peace, and sense of identity (see entry ► “Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies”).

Some Examples

Towns offer many examples of the enmeshment of government and customary authorities. The towns are small enough for linkages to occur spontaneously, through the bars serving kava (the local intoxicant) or kin relations, or more formally, through the work of the Malvatumauri, the Vanuatu Cultural Centre, which has played a central role in highlighting the significance of custom and gathering and valuing accounts of cultural practices and artifacts, or through an active government minister, bureaucrat, or policeman seeking assistance.

Police are active in towns, but even here customary authorities play a critical role in social order. This was dramatically illustrated when an armed standoff in the capital between the police and the Vanuatu Mobile Force (Vanuatu’s semi-military force) was defused by customary authorities who were in town at the time (Boege and Forsyth 2018). The crisis developed from a long-running dispute between the forces and could have initiated serious violence. The government did not immediately respond to the crisis, but the Malvatumauri brought the government back in, convincing the police, Mobile Force, and the government to undertake traditional reconciliation activities where “[p]igs were killed and traditional mats and kava exchanged. Tears were shed Hundreds of people witnessed the reconciliation ceremony” (Boege and Forsyth 2018, p. 196). It is notable that the Malvatumauri then supported the matter moving to court, providing authoritative consensus for prosecutions. Moreover, in a characteristically customary gesture, 8 years after the crisis and convictions, a final reconciliation ceremony between the two forces was held to maintain respect and honor the significance of positive relations (see entry ► “Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security”).

A breakout of 20 prisoners from the capital’s prison in 2006, protesting poor conditions, offers a further example. The Malvatumauri offered refuge to the prisoners within the space of the traditional meeting house. While challenging the Malvatumauri’s action as illegal, the police did not breach the space. The Malvatumauri negotiated the return of the prisoners to jail, following reconciliation ceremonies between police, prisoners, and government. But it also took up the case of prison conditions with government, leading to the police pledging not to punish the prisoners and to new legislation establishing a separate correctional service which incorporated greater emphasis on reconciliation (Boege and Forsyth 2018).

The 2015 parliamentary corruption case offers an instructive example in which the Malvatumauri played a small but significant role. In 2015 and 2016, 14 members of parliament were tried and convicted of receiving bribes and sentenced to jail. The convictions were unprecedented (although the crime was not) and stand as a powerful example of the legal system operating to hold political corruption to account (Forsyth and Batley 2016). Some of the defendants claimed their corrupt actions were in keeping with kastom. The Malvatumauri, however, rejected these claims, so underlining a distinction between gift giving in an exchange economy, which is subject to its own forms of accountability, and bribery. The Malvatumauri also called for calm, “asking people to respect the state judicial system as well as kastom authority and not to take the law into their own hands” (Forsyth and Batley 2016, p. 274).

These illustrations show responses to crises, but there are many examples of the interaction of different forms of governance in everyday conflict prevention and management. Vanuatu’s towns are melting pots of people from different islands and informal settlements can be sites of particular friction. Senior figures living in town are recognized as responsible for their own Island groups and liaise with police on this basis. These chiefs also work together to maintain good relations across groups. Towns also have growing numbers of young unemployed people with little affiliation with custom, church, or state. Some consider that those without Island ties are beyond the scope of custom, but others believe that custom’s task is to work towards peace and so seek to engage people living in new circumstances. Kastom festivals (such as the Namakura Festival) or traditional meeting houses specifically for young people are some of the ways of engaging urban youth in the languages and ways of life of their broader culture.

The Malvatumauri also engages more widely with questions of conflict. It maintains pressure on government to take a strong position on West Papua, has held ceremonies to honor the traditional owners of the land upon which the capital now stands (learning from the conflict in the Solomon Islands), and has worked with police against organized crime becoming entrenched in certain island groups. These are evolving mechanisms, responding to particular crises and dependent on those involved.

The Challenge of Linking Across Modes of Governance

While towns offer many examples of the enmeshment of state institutional and customary authority, the challenges nationally are greater. There are systemic tensions between the nature of political and economic community conceived by kastom and by the liberal state, despite the elasticity of both (see entry ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”). The conflict between fundamentally different ways of valuing land noted earlier exemplifies these challenges. While this conflict points to exploitation and corruption, it also raises difficult questions about the nature of the development that people seek and how to balance competing needs. While not suggesting these conflicts cannot be creatively managed over time, the challenges are significant.

Another of these challenges is how authority is seen to flow. While kastom has national significance, customary governance works substantially on a face to face basis. State institutions and government are more abstract hierarchies. People in rural Vanuatu make a substantial commitment to their governance. Government, however, is experienced as distant, geographically, and in other ways. Communities increasingly expect and need a range of services, but government’s capacity to provide services is low. Voting, often as a block, has become a way to secure elusive services or just cash, setting up a vicious electoral cycle that neither meets the needs of communities nor of political communication and representation. This negative cycle does not support accountability and encourages corruption but is difficult for either candidates or communities to break. Government represents independence and is seen as broadly legitimate, but politicians are not held in high regard. There is little meaningful flow of communication or accountability between rural communities and government.

The Malvatumauri, established at the intersection of customary and state forms of governance, could be understood as an effort to link localized models of authority with the national arena and to represent community values and concerns within national debates. The Malvatumauri itself relies on a pyramid model, however, where chiefs are elected up a series of geographical tiers. While the Malvatumauri has some weight and effect in the capital and undertakes a range of often creative functions, it too struggles to link successfully with communities.

There are nevertheless examples of linkage across forms of governance and across the country. Two of the most significant might be the effort to restrain land leasing and the national response to the Ambae earthquake in 2017. In 2006, the Malvatumauri initiated a national summit to focus national attention on the seriousness of land alienation and propose solutions. With government support, the summit provided an opportunity for the Malvatumauri and rural customary actors, government, women's groups, business, and others to collectively frame recommendations to shape a new national land policy aimed at returning control to custom landholders. This summit enabled new thinking, political action, and coalitions around land. Seven years later it was followed by a second government-initiated summit which led to legislation based on the earlier recommendations and gave the Malvatumauri and Island customary institutions greater control. There continue to be problems with land alienation and with the operation of the mechanisms instituted but there is a basis for further development (see entry ► “Land Politics and Conflict”). How government and customary bodies together mediate and manage these challenges is vitally important to Vanuatu's peace and well-being and will shape the character of its political community (see entry ► “Peace Formation”).

In 2017 the Ambae volcano erupted, raining ash and acid rain over many months. The government decided that the island's entire population of more than 11,600 people had to be evacuated. Although many have now returned home, at the time it was thought the resettlement might last decades. Finding alternative land where entire communities could rebuild lives and livelihoods in a country with limited arable land is challenging. The government, with local and Island Councils of Chiefs, negotiated a “second home” for evacuees on a neighboring island. Many evacuees, working through social networks, chose to settle on a third island. A network of government, customary actors, church organizations, kin, and NGOs facilitated the settlement of thousands of people to rural and urban sites through rolling negotiations and the provision of transport, accommodation, and community support. International assistance provided significant logistical support but the accommodation of thousands without serious conflict in essentially already occupied land is an achievement. As climate change intensifies, it is an achievement that will need to be learnt from and built upon.

Conclusion

Two themes have guided this discussion. The first is that contemporary expressions of customary ways of life contribute fundamentally to peace and stability within Vanuatu and to adaptability in the face of change and disruption. While customary organization is in many respects intrinsically conservative, it also has strong dynamic and adaptive elements (Forsyth 2009). This is not to idealize customary practices, or to suggest that they are without violence, but to recognize their significance. Customary forms underpin ways of life across the country for most people and are rooted in family, livelihood, and sources of meaning.

The second theme is that while customary, government, and religious institutions all contribute to governance, the nature of relations among them and among the people engaged in them is at least as relevant to questions of peace. There is a great deal of attention given to how formal state institutions and processes should ideally operate, but much less to the operation of networks of governance, or how different modes of governance might be working together, constructively or otherwise, or how the friction between different social, economic, political, and ontological systems is being navigated in the contexts of countries' varying histories and circumstances. Yet this is a pressing challenge and a source of vulnerability and potentially also of strength for many states. People are working across different institutional modes in efforts to resolve complex problems, such as land alienation, gender violence, and political accountability. These experiences and experiments will shape the nature of socio-political community in Vanuatu and are worth learning from (see entries ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace” and ► “Peace Formation”).

Customary ways of life have been the focus of this entry both because of the significant role they play and because they are often overlooked or cast as obstacles to government. Kastom can be reified and manipulated. Its contemporary habits, dominated by older men, often marginalize women and young people, although these habits may be no more common to custom than to many other contemporary ways of life. Kastom also seeks dialogue and respectful relations. In the effort to build webs of governance that support peace, this emphasis provides a fundamental direction.

Summary

This chapter addresses sources of peace in Vanuatu, one of the small island states of the Pacific Islands region. Though the region is highly diverse, there is much that is shared regarding social organization, colonial history, contemporary vulnerabilities, and sources of social stability and peace. The discussion's themes are thus relevant to other regional states and in broad terms beyond the region. Governance is often seen as fundamental to peace and social stability, but governance is generally understood in terms of state institutions. The chapter argues that governance in Vanuatu rests largely on a mix of state institutions and customary governance. Vanuatu is strongly Christian and various Churches also play a role in governance. In Vanuatu, as in many countries, governance could be understood as a hybrid network or interactive web of different modes of governance that is being shaped by unscripted processes of interaction and experimentation.

Customary practices have changed substantially over time, including through the processes of state formation and development, interaction with the cash economy, the influence of Christian churches, and simply the passage of time. They will continue to change. Nevertheless, fundamental elements of custom and customary governance, including the continuity and centrality of kin and land, the significance of the world of the spirit, and principles of reciprocity and respect continue to shape the lives of much of the population. Customary ways of life enable food security and social welfare across the country. They contribute fundamentally to peace and stability and to adaptability in the face of intense pressures of rapid social, political, and economic change. They also contribute to responding to climate change, which is the most pressing threat to lives and livelihoods across the region.

While customary and government institutions and (to some extent) churches all contribute to governance, however, the nature of relations among them is critical to questions of peace. There is enmeshment and cooperation between government and customary governance but there are also substantial gaps, friction, and confusion. There are also systemic tensions between the nature of political and economic community conceived by custom and by the liberal state and free market, despite the elasticity of both. The conflict between fundamentally different ways of valuing land, as a foundation of life or as a commodity, exemplifies these tensions.

Another pressing challenge is how authority is seen to operate. People are close to customary governance and authority is understood to flow from the ground. By contrast, while central government is seen as legitimate, it is also largely experienced as remote and unaccountable. Linking people and ways of life in rural Vanuatu, where the majority of the population lives, to government, which essentially takes place in towns, is a significant practical but also systemic challenge. How both government and customary bodies mediate and manage these challenges is critical to Vanuatu's peace and well-being and to the character of its political community.

The chapter follows these questions through a series of short examples and issues, including land, gender violence, political crises, and responses to natural disaster that indicate the significance of customary governance in both crises and everyday conflict management and the importance of constructive relations between customary and state institutional governance. While there is much international attention given to how formal state institutions should operate, there is much less focus on understanding the operation of networks of governance, or on how tensions between different social, economic, political, and ontological systems are being navigated. Yet this is a pressing challenge and potentially also a source of strength for many states. There is much to be learnt from Vanuatu's ongoing efforts and experience.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Decentralization and Conflict Prevention
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Grassroots Organizations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies
- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Peace Formation in Bougainville
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Post-conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

References

- Boege, V. (2018). Climate change and conflict in Oceania. Toda Peace Institute Policy Brief No. 17. <https://toda.org/policy-briefs-and-resources/policy-briefs/climate-change-and-conflict-in-oceania-challenges-responses-and-suggestions-for-a-policy-relevant-research-agenda.html>. Accessed Nov 2020.
- Boege, V. (2020). The United Nations Security Council, the Boe declaration and Upolu Luma Vaai's umbilical cord – And why they matter for peacebuilding in the era of man-made climate change. Toda Peace Institute, Policy Brief No. 76. <https://toda.org/policy-briefs-and-resources/policy-briefs/the-united-nations-security-council-the-boe-declaration-and-upolu-luma-vaais-umbilical-cord-and-why-they-matter-for-peacebuilding-in-the-era-of-man-made-climate-change.html>. Accessed Nov 2020.
- Boege, V., & Forsyth, M. (2018). Customary conflict resolution in a state environment – Cases from Vanuatu. In K. Aning, M. A. Brown, V. Boege, & C. Hunt (Eds.), Exploring peace formation: Justice and security in post-colonial states. London: Routledge.
- Boege, V., Brown, M. A., Clements, K., & Nolan, A. (2008). On hybrid political orders and emerging states: State formation in the context of 'fragility' (Berghof Handbook Dialogue Series No. 8) (pp. 87–93). Berlin: Berghof Research Center for Constructive Conflict Management.
- Bolton, L. (2003). Unfolding the moon: Enacting women's Kastom in Vanuatu. Hawaii: University of Hawaii Press.
- Brown, M. A. (2007). Security and development in the Pacific Islands: Social resilience in emerging states. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Brown, M. A. (2018). Working with 'illiberal' sources of peace and order. In K. Aning, M. A. Brown, V. Boege, & C. Hunt (Eds.), Exploring peace formation: Justice and security in post-colonial states. London: Routledge.
- Countrymeters – Vanuatu. (2020). <https://countrymeters.info/en/Vanuatu>. Accessed 1 Oct 2020.
- Forsyth, M. (2009). A bird that flies with two wings. Canberra: ANU E-Press.
- Forsyth, M., & Batley, J. (2016). What the political corruption scandal of 2015 reveals about checks and balances in Vanuatu governance. The Journal of Pacific History, 5(3), 255–277.
- Francois, A., Lacrampe, S., Franjeh, M., & Schnell, S. (2015). The languages of Vanuatu: Unity and diversity. Canberra: ANU E-Press.
- Government of Vanuatu. (2019). Vanuatu national security strategy. https://www.gov.vu/images/publications/Vanuatu_National_Security_Strategy.pdf. Accessed Dec 2020.
- Jolly, M. (1994). Women of the place: Kastom, colonialism and gender in Vanuatu. Melbourne: Harwood Academic Publishers.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- MALFFB (Ministry of Agriculture, Livestock, Fisheries, Forestry and Biosecurity, Government of Vanuatu). (2020). News and events – Facts. <https://malffb.gov.vu/>. Accessed Dec 2020.
- Pacific Island Forum. (2018). Boe declaration. <https://www.forumsec.org/2018/09/05/boe-declaration-on-regional-security/>. Accessed Dec 2020.

Taylor, J. P. (2008). The social life of rights: 'Gender antagonism', modernity and Raet in Vanuatu. Australian Journal of Anthropology, 19(2), 165–178.

Further Reading

Government of Vanuatu. (2020). About Vanuatu. <https://www.gov.vu/index.php/about/about-vanuatu>.

Accessed Feb 2021. About Vanuatu and its links offer a useful site for accessing a wide range of information. See also MALFFB below.

Pacific UNFPA, Pacific United Nations Population Fund. (2014). Population and development profiles: Pacific Island countries. https://pacific.unfpa.org/sites/default/files/pub-pdf/web__140414_UNFPAPopulationandDevelopmentProfiles-PacificSub-RegionExtendedv1LRv2_0.pdf. Accessed 1 Oct 2020.

Vanuatu Daily Post. This is Vanuatu's daily newspaper. Accessible online at <https://dailypost.vu/>

South Africa

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

South Sudan

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Southeast Europe

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept

Southeast European Studies

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept

Southern Africa

- ▶ Mozambique

Sovereignty Conflicts

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Soviet

- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict

Space, Place, and Peacebuilding

- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding

Spatial Agency

- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding

Spatial Analysis

- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding

Spoilers

- ▶ Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Sri Lankan Peace Process

- ▶ Liberal and Illiberal Peacebuilding in Sri Lanka

SSR

- ▶ Police Reform and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

Stability Analysis

- ▶ Identifying Stable Solutions to Conflicts

Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

Roberto Belloni
 Department of Sociology and Social Research, University of Trento, Trento, Italy

Introduction

The concept of stabilization was first employed by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) in Bosnia-Herzegovina (1996–2004), where the organization focused on the effort to sustain the transition from a peace operation to long-term development. Stabilization required mobile and flexible forces ready for quick deployment and trained to confront both armed attacks and civilian demonstrators. Military experience in Afghanistan and Iraq since the early 2000s reinforced a view of stabilization among Western states as requiring small and flexible units engaging in unconventional warfare, either “asymmetric,” “irregular,” or involving an insurgency. At roughly the same time, the popularity of the term “stabilization” began to increase exponentially. The total number of times that “stabilization” is mentioned in United Nations (UN) Security Council meetings rose from 59 times in 2001 to 671 times in 2014 (Curran and Holtom 2015, p. 8). The attractiveness of the term was confirmed by the UN launch of at least four operations, which will be briefly discussed below, with “stability” as their main mission.

Despite its popularity, stabilization has not been defined. This chapter begins with a discussion of the different usages of the term by the United States (US), the United Kingdom, and France which, more than any other state, have contributed to “upload” their understanding of stabilization in UN Security Council resolutions. Second, the chapter examines conceptual aspects. Stabilization is often associated to, or used as a synonymous of, other terms like peacekeeping, peace enforcement, counterterrorism, counterinsurgency, and peacebuilding. Indeed, stabilization involves all of these aspects but does not coincide with any of them. Finally, key empirical examples of UN-led stabilization operations are briefly reviewed. They reveal the importance of a “robust posture” in stabilization operations, as well as of a number of contradictions and antinomies emerging in the process of implementation of stabilization’s activities. As a whole, stabilization reflects the disappointment with earlier large-scale, transformative peacebuilding interventions and the related downgrading among the list of international priorities of normative issues such as the promotion of democracy and the protection of human rights.

Definitional Issues

While in the 1990s and early 2000s most UN peace operations were deployed in post-settlement implementation missions, currently more than two-thirds of these operations are deployed amidst ongoing conflicts. The use of force in this type of situations has increasingly been endorsed by the UN, which throughout the 1990s had been accused of passivity in front of widespread atrocities. As a result, in order to enable measures for facing spoilers, protecting civilians, and restoring state authorities, which have emerged as key elements in the mandates of UN missions, most operations have been authorized under Chapter VII of the UN Charter and, following the disappointment with large-scale US-led intervention in both Afghanistan and Iraq, have been mandated to use force in more targeted and selective ways (De Coning 2018; De Coning and Peter 2019; Hunt 2017).

While increasing referring to stabilization for this type of operations, the UN has left its understanding of the term mostly implicit, thus creating the conditions for different interpretations. The mandates of the four missions deployed by the UN Security Council with a stabilization component offer a profusion of meanings of the term, involving activities as disparate as the use of force, the protection of civilians, the strengthening of host state's authority, the development of democratic institutions and the rule of law, the demobilization of combatants, and the implementation of quick impact projects (Gilder 2019). Not only each of these elements has been given a different weight in each mission, but their relative importance also changed overtime. In general, headquarters in New York tend to view the term as involving offensive military force, while field staff understands it as civilian-led and development-driven work (Gorur 2016). Unsurprisingly, the High-Level Independent Panel on United Nations Peace Operations suggested the need for the UN to clarify the meaning of stabilization, since the term "has a wide range of interpretations" (HIPPO 2015, p. 30).

From the UN Security Council perspective, there is value in leaving the concept undefined, since vagueness and constructive ambiguity allow for flexibility in its interpretation and application. Because of the lack of a clear definition, stabilization can be used as a discursive tool to engage with a wide range of stakeholders within and beyond UN circles and to refer to a broad range of unrelated activities gathered under the same broad category. While this lack of conceptual clarity has been effective in soliciting funds and support from UN member states, it has also meant that peacekeepers are trained based on wrong assumptions and out-of-date concepts. In such a context, missions are less effective, and unintended consequences become almost inevitable, as further discussed below.

In the absence of an agreed-upon definition, the meaning of the term can be inferred by examining the doctrines of those states which have endorsed it. The "P3" Security Council member states – the United States, the United Kingdom, and France – exercise a significant influence on the content of peacekeeping mandates. Through the practice of being penholders of most UN Security Council resolutions, the P3 "upload" (Curran and Holtom 2015, p. 1) their understandings of stabilization into UN interventions. Above all, American and British definitions of stabilization have informed the UN's current use of the term, while France has been particularly influential in those cases where it maintains a strong strategic interest, such as Mali and the Sahel region. For all of them – the United States, the United Kingdom, and France – stabilization experiences in Afghanistan and Iraq, where the line between peacekeeping and peace enforcement was erased (Peter 2015), have contributed decisively to their understanding of what stabilization involves and how missions under this rubric should be carried out.

The US military doctrine has traditionally focused on conventional, high-intensity warfare, but it evolved significantly as a result of large-scale military experience in Afghanistan and Iraq. In 2006 the US Department of Defense issued a directive which declared that stability operations were, along with combat, part of the US military's core mission. As a result, US-led stability operations currently operate in at least 50 fragile states, particularly in the Americas, Africa, and the Middle East. The Joint Chiefs of Staff (2016, p. ix) defined stabilization as "the process by which military and nonmilitary actors collectively apply various instruments of national power to address drivers of conflict, foster host-nation resiliencies, and create conditions that enable sustainable peace and security." In practice, the rise of stabilization testifies to a shift in emphasis from warfare to population-centered intervention. Large counterinsurgency and peacebuilding operations (in US jargon frequently defined as "nation-building" campaigns) have been replaced by targeted missions involving drone strikes, special forces, and the increasing reliance on local troops, combined with the delivery of quick impact projects to alleviate the suffering of the population involved in areas of combat.

Similarly, recent British military doctrine was developed in the context of the campaigns in Iraq and Afghanistan. The UK Stabilization Unit (2014) defined the term as “one of the approaches used in situations of violent conflict which is designed to protect and promote legitimate political authority, using a combination of integrated civilian and military actions to reduce violence, re-establish security and prepare for longer-term recovery by building an enabling environment for structural stability.” While this definition replicates in part the US understanding of the term, the United Kingdom has placed greater emphasis on civilian rather than military tasks. It has focused on a “comprehensive approach” to stabilization which should be led by civilian priorities and actors supported by the military.

Finally, for France a proactive foreign policy is one of the constitutive elements of its political culture and national identity. In recent years, France engaged in the fight against terrorism by supporting American efforts against the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria in the Middle East and by launching a large-scale military intervention in West Africa. These experiences demonstrate France’s “warrior” approach to stabilization (and, more broadly, to UN peacekeeping operations), whereby military force is greatly valued as a tool for intervention. In particular France developed the concept of “peace restoration” operations, whereby the notion of “active impartiality” is introduced to fill the gap created by peace operations which receive a peacekeeping mandate but at the same time engage in “limited war” (Tardy 2014). France has strongly supported robust and even enforcement mandates for UN missions, in particular in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) and Mali.

In general, the P3 refer to stabilization as a way to respond to intrastate conflict. Stabilization is understood broadly as involving a wide range of coordinated military and civilian activities designed to impact on different conflict drivers. Its main objective is to support the maintenance of security and the delivery of basic services when national authorities do not possess the legitimacy and/or the resources to exercise effective control over their territory or provide basic services. In its narrow meaning, stabilization is applied to situations where there is no political settlement in place (De Coning et al. 2017) and thus where peacekeeping (as well as peacebuilding) principles appear to be irrelevant. In its broader meaning, it refers to situations of insecurity and instability in weak and fragile states that require a comprehensive and integrated approach to achieving stability (Muggah 2014).

The UN has leaned towards the narrow understanding of the term, in particular with regard to the deployment of “robust peacekeeping” operations during ongoing conflicts tasked with protecting civilians and supporting state authorities from armed elements. UN stabilization missions have been deployed alongside host state forces with the aim of creating a stable and legitimate state. Stabilization entails a significant level of force against perceived “spoilers,” that is, non-state actors who enjoy no international legitimacy because of their often abysmal human rights record. Similar to the cases of Afghanistan and Iraq, the UN has been confronting extremist non-state actors (such as Al-Shabaab, the 23 March Movement, Boko Haram, and other Islamist formations in the Maghreb) but on a smaller scale and with the primary objective of containing the spillover effects of these conflicts (Peter 2015, p. 354). The forceful approach to pacifying unruly areas reflects the preference and approach of not only the UN but also Western states and regional organizations such as the African Union (AU).

These missions are also mandated to support the reaching of an agreed-upon political outcome between the fighting parties. However, in practice the adoption of a strong counterterrorist and counterinsurgency rhetoric and the related need to neutralize spoilers has made UN mediation efforts hard to pursue. Rather than favoring the signing of a peace settlement, UN’s understanding of stabilization has been decidedly partial and focused on supporting state authorities. Indeed, according to Gorur (2016), the defining characteristic of stabilization is precisely the transfer of territorial control from spoilers to legitimate authorities. As a result, stabilization missions have displayed a strong military focus – leaning towards peace enforcement and counterterrorism – while governance and development challenges have received less attention. “Stable” authoritarian or semi-authoritarian solutions may be preferred by international actors to imperfect democracies (Belloni and Moro 2019).

Although the use of force in support of a party to the conflict – usually the host-state government – is a defining characteristic of stabilization (de Coning et al. 2017; Hunt 2017) even narrow, military-centered approaches include a minimal component of both humanitarian intervention and peace- and state-building efforts (Belloni and Moro 2019). In particular, a range of early peacebuilding activities in socioeconomic, health, sanitation, and education areas are widely conceived of as critical components in winning a population’s “hearts and minds” and in delivering security benefits (Gordon 2010, p. 369). These activities do not have transformative ambitions, but, rather, they operate on a restorative logic designed to improve the provision of basic services to the population, including water, electricity, and health services. Quick fixes and pragmatic solutions aim at buying time to enable local actors to take responsibility for reconstruction and development. Ultimately, quick impact projects, the provision of essential services, and some iconic reconstruction schemes help strengthen the military gains and develop the host state’s legitimacy and core capabilities.

As further discussed below, the UN has embarked in stabilization operations with some degree of hesitation, above all for fear of crossing the Rubicon of peacekeeping into peace enforcement. For this reason, when enforcement actions are required, the UN Security Council has mandated regional arrangements, coalitions, or pivotal states (such as France in Côte d’Ivoire, Mali, and the Central African Republic – CAR) to adopt robust posture and use force. These arrangements have allowed a rapid response when intervention was deemed unpalatable for the UN (Bellamy and Hunt 2015, p. 1289). For example, missions mandated under Chapter 7 in the DRC and Mali have been deployed in close cooperation with both the AU and African states, signaling the emergence of a “Chapter Seven and a Half” practice combining strong mandates and the close cooperation with regional actors (Karlsrud 2018). As a result of this practice, a complimentary model has developed, whereby the AU acts as the first responder to situations of violent conflict and, once a minimal level of stability has been restored, the UN is expected to assume responsibility for the peace consolidation phase (De Coning 2017). Alongside the AU, many European states have assisted in or conducted military action against terrorist groups in sub-Saharan Africa. In general, however, international organizations, ad hoc coalitions of the willing and states have struggled to link stabilization interventions to a long-term political strategy (Berdal and Ucko 2014).

Conceptual and Theoretical Aspects

Often the term “stabilization” has merged with other ones adopted in discussions related to peacekeeping, peace enforcement, counterterrorism, counterinsurgency, peacebuilding, and the like. Indeed, as noted above, the term’s ambiguous nature has made it increasingly popular to a number of UN member states, regional organizations, and bilateral donors who have been willing to support operations deployed under this rubric. In the absence of a set of clearly defined guidelines, diverging understandings of the term are bound to persist. In practice, stabilization may assume from time to time characteristics commonly associated to other doctrines.

To begin with, the UN has authorized stabilization interventions attempting to maintain them within the confines of peacekeeping doctrine – which prescribe the deployment of an impartial lightly armed force overseeing a peace agreement with the consent of the warring parties. Significantly, impartiality does not necessarily involve neutrality, since peace operations can use force in defense of their mandate (UN 2008, pp. 31–35). However, despite UN’s efforts, stabilization missions challenge drastically the peacekeeping’ principles of consent, impartiality, and limited use of force. Indeed, these missions are deployed in contexts of active conflict with the consent of the government but not of other main parties. They often involve the use of force well beyond self-defense and the protection of civilians against organized armed groups – which are typically seen as criminals rather than the expression of a political conflict to be mediated (Rhoads 2016). As a result, while both stabilization and peacekeeping allow for the use of force, they do so with different purposes. Within peacekeeping the use of force is permitted to achieve or protect peace. Force is allowed at the tactical level with the consent of the host authorities and/or the main parties to the conflict in order to “defend its mandate against spoilers whose activities pose a threat to civilians or risk undermining the peace process” (UN 2008, p. 98). By contrast, stabilization involves an understanding of force that is closer to a peace enforcement notion involving violence deployed at the strategic or international level (UN 2008, p. 19).

Not only stabilization operations challenge the principle of the limited use of force but also that of impartiality. These missions are self-consciously partial, since they do not treat all parties alike but support the state if necessary to defeat spoilers (Bellamy and Hunt 2015; Karlsrud 2018). In some cases, such as Somalia, Côte d’Ivoire, and the DRC, UN forces have become directly involved in regular armed clashes with local groups. Most notably, in 2013 the Security Council authorized a Force Intervention Brigade (FIB) to carry out combat operations against the 23 March Movement (M23) – an armed group in the DRC. Thus, while UN intervention initially appeared to be closer to a peacebuilding mission, the introduction of an enforcement mandate turned UN troops into an offensive combat force and made the mission increasingly more military-centered. The FIB defeated M23 in November 2013 and created “islands of stability” to consolidate military gains through the provision of humanitarian assistance. In practice, the FIB epitomized the growing importance of counterinsurgency (COIN) type operations – further discussed below – which involve taking sides against identified aggressors (Tull 2018). While the UN Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs, Stephen Mathias (2017), has argued that support for the host states and clashes with spoilers do not necessarily make the UN party to a conflict, nonetheless these missions make the UN likely to be perceived as such by both armed groups and the local population. In addition, not only stabilization missions typically side with the host government to confront domestic non-state actors but also frequently involve neighboring states with significant interests in the way the conflicts they engage in are managed and solved – undermining impartiality further (Karlsrud 2019b).

Because of these characteristics, stabilization is closer to peace enforcement, defined as “the application, with the authorization of the Security Council, of a range of coercive measures, including the use of military force” (UN 2008, p. 17), rather than peacekeeping. The UN recognizes that it is not well suited to undertake peace enforcement operations (HIPPO 2015) and that such missions should be undertaken by the host government, a capable regional force, or an ad hoc coalition authorized by the Security Council (UN 2008, p. 31). Accordingly, the UN claims that, despite their robust posture, stabilization remains within the boundaries of peacekeeping and the use of force in defense of the mandate does not qualitatively change the character of peacekeeping operations. This claim is intended to allow for the use of force while retaining the principles of classical peacekeeping, thus appeasing generally risk-averse troop-contributing countries.

Despite UN’s efforts to keep peacekeeping and peace enforcement distinct, doctrinal differences are often blurred in practice. Since the use of force in defense of the mandate permits the use of offensive force (Gilder 2019, p. 56), stabilization efforts involve elements of peace enforcement. In Haiti, the DRC, Mali, and CAR, the UN Security Council authorized the use of military force for a variety of purposes, including the defeat of spoilers, the protection of civilians, and the implementation of the mission mandate. The assertive execution of these tasks has led commentators to suggest that these operations may constitute the forerunner of a new era of UN peace enforcement operations (Karlsrud 2018, pp. 41–43). However, while developing alongside each other and increasingly overlapping, peace enforcement and stabilization remain conceptually different, since the latter recognizes that the military effort alone cannot achieve its objectives but needs to be combined with political, economic, governance, and development efforts (Muggah 2014).

Stabilization also shares elements with counterterrorism and counterinsurgency (COIN). Indeed, both are frequently mentioned together within the context of stabilization operations, even though counterterrorism and counterinsurgency are based on different assumptions. To begin with, the use of force can be ruthless in counterterrorism but needs to be contained in counterinsurgency not to alienate the local population. More precisely, while counterterrorism is premised upon the willingness to apply massive force against terrorists, counterinsurgency strategy is driven by the slogan “clear, hold, and build,” which was developed in 2007 by the US Army and Marine Corps Counterinsurgency Field Manual (FM 3-24) and which involves the instrumental use of violence to reach political objectives.

In stabilization operations, military-led counterinsurgency and stabilization discourses are merged (Gordon 2010, p. 372). For example, in the DRC the UN implemented an International Security and Stabilization Support Strategy based on the “clear, hold, and build” credo typical of US-led counterinsurgency operations (De Vries 2015, pp. 47–55). This type of operation recognizes that there is no military solution to an insurgency. Rather, the focus is on shifting the loyalty of people from the insurgents to the domestic authorities. The military’s goal is to clear an area of insurgents (sometimes defined as “spoilers” or even “terrorists”) and then keep it safe for civilian actors tasked with providing the population with essential services. Through this process local authorities should be able to extend their authority and legitimacy to areas previously controlled by the insurgents. Thus, counterinsurgency aims at building the political capital of the local government by shifting population’s loyalty away from extremist groups and towards domestic institutions (Boyle 2010). Within this framework, the protection of civilians is not a moral imperative grounded on human rights values, as within peacekeeping operations, but a means to reduce popular support for insurgents (Friis 2010). In addition, civilian activities are subordinated and instrumental to military priorities and considered as an added minor tactical tool following combat in order to win the “hearts and minds” of the local population.

By contrast, counterterrorism relies on the political capital of the government to authorize and justify often unpopular missions. The UN has approached counterterrorist activities with caution. In 2014 the UN Security Council condemned violent extremism and terrorism, in 2016 the Secretary-General has presented a Plan of Action to Prevent Violent Extremism, and in 2017 the General Assembly established an Office of Counter-Terrorism – revealing the UN’s willingness to contribute to the evolving counterterrorist agenda (Karlsrud 2019b). At the same time, many UN member states, think tanks, and policy analysts doubt that the UN could, or even should, involve itself in these activities. To begin with, not only the use of violence against “terrorists” restricts nonmilitary alternatives but also the fluidity of local allegiances can make it very difficult to distinguish between “terrorist” and “non-terrorist” groups. The binary distinction between legitimate and terrorist groups may prevent the identification of those political problems that need to be addressed in order to reach an agreed-upon settlement and risks threatening the possibility of pursuing a peace operation’s other priorities. In particular, the possibility that the UN could act as an impartial arbitrator is diminished by being an active part of the conflict, and thus the pursuit of an inclusive peace and national reconciliation is undermined (Gilder 2019).

Most importantly from the UN perspective, the organization lacks unity of command and the necessary means to conduct counterterrorist activities. Thus, the HIPPO report argued on practical grounds that the UN should not be involved in counterterrorist operations and where the UN intervenes alongside other counterterrorist forces, the role and responsibilities of each actor should be clearly delineated (HIPPO 2015, p. 34). Nonetheless, the emerging consensus among Western states on the need to give the UN a greater role in countering terrorism, as well as the American administration's threat to reduce its financial contribution to the organization, contributed to motivate the Security Council to raise the UN's profile in this area.

As a result, counterterrorism has become an increasingly important component of stabilization missions. In Mali, the UN stabilization operation uneasily oscillated between civilian peacebuilding activities and military counterterrorism. UN member states (most notably France, in addition to the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, and Mali's neighboring countries) were motivated to contribute to a robust operation involving the use of force because of their assessment of the terrorist threat spreading in the north of the country (Karlsrud 2019a). In 2016 the UN Security Council authorized the use of robust force under Chapter VII of the Charter and supported the host government (and other actors such as French troops) in its fight against terrorism, including by sharing intelligence (Centre FrancoPaix 2018). In Iraq, the UN has delegated counterterrorist activities to the Global Coalition against Daesh, while counterinsurgency tasks were assigned to local authorities. This approach presupposed the presence of a solid and effective Iraqi government – a problematic assumption, which contributes to explain the difficulties in defeating the internal insurgency and thus “stabilize” the country. Similar to other stabilization cases, the Global Coalition did not extend its mandate to governance objectives, such as building viable institutions, or economic ones, including the reactivation of local economic activities (Belloni and Costantini 2019).

In sum, stabilization involves a variety of different components and draws from doctrines as diverse as peacekeeping, peace enforcement, counterinsurgency, and counterterrorism. In addition, humanitarian, developmental, and governance elements are also implicated in stabilization operations, even though they are generally secondary and instrumental to military activities. These elements involve early peacebuilding activities, and thus they may be associated to the liberal peacebuilding framework that guided intervention in fragile states since the 1990s onwards. However, as further explained below, despite some similarities the two approaches not only stand in stark contrast to each other but also they appear to be alternatives – with stabilization actually considered as the most widely endorsed substitute to liberal peacebuilding among UN member states and international organizations.

Stabilization and Peacebuilding

Unlike stabilization missions, peacebuilding interventions require relatively permissive environments and are focused on long-term civilian intervention tools, rather than military ones.

Moreover, while liberal peace interventions adhere rather closely to a standard recipe involving democratization and liberalization tools, and thus take as their point of departure the supply side of intervention, stabilization emphasizes the demand side, relegating outsiders to important but secondary roles. Indeed, “the contribution made by external actors is often characterized in very limited terms, reflecting a perceived inability to impose a political settlement or generate public confidence in a government” (Gordon 2010, p. 372).

Stabilization assesses external actions not on the grounds of their respect of liberal principles but on the basis of their practical consequences. This pragmatic approach suggests that those universal liberal values which informed liberal peacebuilding must be adapted to the circumstances of each case. Accordingly, while peacebuilding develops from a general template, stabilization is situation-specific. It moves beyond the liberal peace template in order to focus on the local context, and its operationalization changes from one case to another. Stabilization emphasizes flexibility, awareness of the peculiarities of each particular situation, and pragmatism in identifying what may be the most appropriate intervention instrument for each case – all elements entailing a shift from the liberal peacebuilding template involving intrusive and (relatively) long-term strategies to address the root causes of conflict to a more limited, short-term approach with less transformative ambitions.

While democracy and human rights continue to inform international involvement in fragile states, liberal interventionist goals and values are pursued on a case-by-case basis, and, if needed to reach broader strategic goals such as suppressing terrorist groups, fighting an insurgency or strengthening domestic authorities, they may be downgraded in the list of international priorities (Belloni and Moro 2019).

The growing emphasis on stabilization within the UN, its member states, as well as bilateral donors and other international organizations reflects a profound disappointment with the type of large-scale peacebuilding interventions which characterized external involvement within fragile states since the mid-1990s onwards. While in the immediate aftermath of the 2003 invasion of Iraq, American President George W. Bush argued that “stability cannot be purchased at the expense of liberty” (Bush 2003), since the early mid-2010s belief in the transformative potential of external intervention, and the related assumption that liberal and economic reforms will contribute to stability, is increasingly considered as illusory. Not only does stabilization provides an alternative to peacebuilding, but also it reverses the peacebuilding logic: while peacebuilding considered ever greater levels of democratization and liberalization as indispensable to achieve stability, stabilization is premised upon the opposite idea, that is, that democracy and a market economy can only follow stability (Belloni and Costantini 2019).

On balance, the popularity of stabilization arises from a set of conditions all related to disappointment with liberal peacebuilding. First, such a popularity reveals an awareness of the limits of the neoliberal hubris that characterized interventions in countries like Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo, Iraq, and Afghanistan. The limits apparent in the imposition of external frameworks (and/or conditions) as a way to pursue liberal internationalist goals have advised the adoption of a more modest approach. The real or perceived failures of international intervention in unruly parts of the world throughout the 1990s and 2000s have led to a move away from the liberal peacebuilding framework involving a fairly standardized political and economic intervention tools to a more limited, short-term approach focused on developing resilience and internal capacities to deal with state fragility (Chandler 2012). The post-2008 global financial crisis also contributed to make long-term, extremely expensive involvement in fragile states difficult to sustain.

Second, the rise and competition for influence of non-Western states such as China, Russia, and, regionally, Saudi Arabia and Iran have further counselled a reconsideration of Western interventionism based on the liberal peacebuilding agenda. These states pose a challenge to Western intervention because they are scarcely interested, if at all, in democratic conditionalities and human rights issues. For example, China is increasingly intent in participating to the creation of “common goods” by contributing to peacekeeping missions, but this interest involves clear preferences over what good governance and economic reconstruction imply. Similarly, Russian influence in Afghanistan and Iranian influence in Iraq have frequently frustrated the attempt to sustain the development of democratic institutions, the rule of law, and individual and group rights. As a result, because Western states possess less leverage to influence the governments of fragile states (Levitsky and Way 2005, pp. 21–22), they have further lowered their transformative ambitions.

Third, in addition to disappointment with large-scale peacebuilding interventions, the failure of the so-called Arab Springs testifies to the difficulties with moving undemocratic states towards representative institutions and market economies even when demands for change are generated domestically. The spillover effects which emerged from these failures on (mainly) European states included terrorist attacks and migration waves and heightened the perception among Western policy-makers of the interdependence between external and internal security. This perception contributed to the re-evaluation of Western involvement in fragile states, moving to the top of international concerns the fight against terrorism, the control of migration, the curbing of human trafficking, and the dismantling of criminal syndicates – rather than the implantation of liberal norms and institutions.

In states as diverse as Afghanistan, Iraq, and Mali, counterterrorism appears to be a priority – framed within a stabilization discourse.

In sum, no longer do multilateral organizations and Western states pursue the type of radical restructuring which motivated peacebuilding interventions but, more modestly, while maintaining their rhetoric on promoting democratization and human rights, they have, in fact, greatly lowered their ambitions. Ever more common references to the importance of taking into account the local context express the endorsement of lower benchmarks and standards as appropriate for fragile states. Accordingly, expressions such as “good enough governance” (Grindle 2004), which has been embraced by the UK Stabilization Unit, indicate the lower and decreasing expectations associated to international intervention. Accordingly, stabilization reflects the ethos of a post-interventionary age which has abandoned grandiose transformative ambitions in favor of pragmatic involvement in fragile states in unruly parts of the world (McGinty 2012).

The Antinomies of Stabilization

Since the early 2000s, the number of UN stabilization missions has been increasing. The missions to Haiti (2004), DRC (2010–), Mali (2013–), and CAR (2014–) all have “stabilization” in their title. In addition, many other missions have included stabilization goals: in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo, Timor-Leste, Afghanistan, Iraq, Somalia, and South Sudan, stabilization has been an important concern for all external interveners – including the UN, as well as other international organizations such as the NATO, the AU, and the EU. In several of these cases, the UN has deployed its mission in a context where a political solution to persisting domestic violence is still missing. Under these conditions, the UN’s goal is not only that of achieving strategic stability by supporting an inclusive peace process and the reaching of a peace agreement between the parties but also that of sustaining the development of a legitimate state authority and its monopoly over the use of force.

Often these missions include an explicit reference and mandate to proactively protect civilians. Starting with the UN Mission in Sierra Leone (1999), the Security Council routinely passed resolutions authorizing the use of “all means necessary” to protect civilians from harm. Technological advances enable remote surveillance, data collection, and potentially more effective ways of conducting timely intervention on behalf of endangered populations (Karlsrud 2018, pp. 59–82) even though, in practice, despite the authorization of “robust mandates” external actors have generally been reluctant to intervene with force when civilians are under attack (Rudolf 2017, p. 164). In sum, in recent years UN operations have been deployed in the midst of ongoing conflicts, mandated to protect civilians and to restore and maintain stability by supporting the government to extend its authority throughout the territory. Despite the fact that they are allowed to use force proactively, UN missions not only try to achieve a military solution to a conflict, but also they aim at supporting the search for political solutions by helping to shape the security environment (Muggah 2014).

This type of stabilization is contentious and has come under close scrutiny. The problematic aspects of these operations can be understood as predictable side effects, rather than unintended consequences (Hunt 2017). First, greater militarization may actually endanger civilians who find themselves in the crossfire or may be targeted during revenge attacks if they are perceived to be on the side of the UN (or that of its partners). Thus, rather than providing security to civilians, UN’s involvement in a protracted conflict can further harm to them. Furthermore, an offensive posture may make the UN party to an armed conflict. If peacekeepers use force, the distinction between combatants and noncombatants becomes blurred, and UN personnel could lose the protection given to civilians under international humanitarian law. Peacekeepers themselves may be considered a legitimate military target and become more vulnerable. For example, in Mali UN forces have been identified as the enemy alongside the government, and armed and terrorist groups have targeted them for retaliation – leading to a very high number of casualties and fatalities. The dangerousness of these missions is likely to make it ever more difficult for the UN to recruit the forces it needs.

Second, humanitarian actors are concerned about the possible costs of stabilization, including less humanitarian access and greater insecurity for their workers. Security-focused stabilization efforts may endanger the “humanitarian space” – understood as the wider political, social, or geographical space within which individuals implement coping and survival strategies in the midst of conflict (Attree et al. 2018). As a result, the range of activities carried out by civilian actors, such as humanitarian and development NGOs, is greatly constrained due to issues of security. The cases of Afghanistan, Iraq, the DRC, Mali, and the CAR confirm these difficulties. In some cases, the military even identifies and manages quick impact projects and engages in aid delivery, leading to the militarization and securitization of assistance. This type of service provision transforms needs-based priorities into political or military ones (Gordon 2010, p. 380). Accordingly, the attitude of the international humanitarian community ranges from diffident and defensive to openly hostile to much of what has been advanced under the stabilization rubric.

While these problems are frequently noted, less debated are the difficulties raised by stabilization in relation to the link between the use of military force and the political process. First, the UN’s ability to engage in political negotiations is damaged if international forces are used to achieve a particular political reality on the ground. It is hard to act as an impartial broker in the peace process while simultaneously attempting to defeat one of the parties militarily. Thus, several policy analysts have argued that more attention should be given to strategically link UN activities to political processes aimed at bringing violent conflict to an end (see, e.g., Berdal and Ucko 2014). Most worrisome, the host government may interpret the UN war-fighting attitude as support in the attempt to defeat a non-state actor militarily and thus may feel little pressure to negotiate a political settlement with those associated with the aggressor. For instance, in the DRC the neutralization of M23 not only did not eliminated armed threats, since other groups continued to operate, but also it changed adversely the incentives of the government, which quickly lost interest in the objectives of building institutions and enhancing inclusive politics (Tull 2018). In addition, in some cases non-state actors targeted militarily by external intervention enjoy significant popular support from the local population, such as Al-Shabaab in Somalia. Accordingly, even if the insurgency is defeated the government that emerges as victorious may still be seen as illegitimate in the eyes of its citizens.

Second, the expansion of the state’s authority is frequently part of a mission’s mandate, as in Mali and CAR. In practice, not only UN operations may preclude particular political solutions by siding with contested governments, but also they may boost illiberal, autocratic, and authoritarian governments. The attempt at strengthening the capacity and legitimacy of state institutions may ultimately lead to the empowerment of predatory and corrupt regimes. Several fragile states have experienced the phenomenon of “state capture.” The development of a highly corrupt, client state in situations as diverse as Bosnia-Herzegovina, Afghanistan, Iraq, and South Sudan clashes with the stabilization’s objective of creating legitimate, accountable, and sustainable institutions. In addition, the strengthening of the state security sector can contribute to the government’s ability to inflict damage on the civilian population and even lead to a rise in terrorist group recruitment. Indeed, dissatisfaction with government and incidents such as the killing of a family member or a friend are drivers of violent extremist recruitment, particularly in Africa (UNDP 2017).

Third, the human rights agenda may suffer from the closeness between international interveners and state authorities. The UN is committed to support a government on the basis of its respect of human rights and humanitarian law. In practice, however, stabilization activities have involved the UN in human rights abuses (Gilder 2019, p. 67). In addition, other international actors, such as the United States and France, have downplayed human rights violations in order to gain the host government's counterterrorism support. More generally, Western governments have been willing to set aside humanitarian efforts when dealing with a particular state authority considered to be an ally in the fight against terrorism. In this type of cases, the structural relationship between external actors and the host government hinders engagement with non-state actors and civil society, particularly at the local level, and thus limits the possibility of contributing to sustainable peace (Attree et al. 2018).

In sum, stabilization presents difficult conceptual and practical challenges. The lack of an established doctrine complicates the assessment of stabilization activities. Stabilization's added value appears to be its pragmatic, case-by-case effort to address situations of instability through a range of tools, tailoring intervention to the peculiarities of each case. In practice, however, stabilization prioritizes security achievements over governance, with a range of potentially negative consequences, including the militarization of conflicts, the closing of the humanitarian space, the strengthening of illiberal governments, and, perhaps most problematically for the long-term prospects, the marginalization of diplomatic, political solutions to instability and conflict.

Conclusions

It has become increasingly apparent that the type of peacekeeping based on consent, impartiality, and the limited use of force which predominated during the Cold War does not fit the current characteristics of conflict. Peace operations have to confront insurgents, terrorists, spoilers, criminals, and proxy armies, while future ones will likely continue to do so. The prospect that additional operations in states like Libya, Syria, and Yemen can be mandated to "stabilize" these states confirms the need to assess the UN's role in this type of theaters. Thus far, the gap between peacekeeping principles and the evolution of operations on the grounds has been widening, with the UN authorizing "robust mandates" and operating alongside regional partners and pivotal states struggling to enforce a range of stabilization tasks (De Coning et al. 2017; Karlsrud 2018).

In the absence of an official stabilization doctrine, these tasks have greatly varied across different operations. In general, security objectives associated with the support to central authorities have been prioritized over developmental and human rights concerns. UN practice suggests that stabilization is linked to the authorization to use "robust" force, the protection of civilians, counterterrorism, cooperation with the host-state government, and the adoption of humanitarian and development projects aimed at reinforcing political gains against domestic spoilers. Stabilization's state-centered bias has come with considerable costs, above all the risk of legitimizing unpalatable governments in the name of "stability," while retarding the search for a political solution to violent conflict. Above all, the robustness of stabilization may give the false impression that there are military solutions to complex political problems, even though the strong emphasis on counterterrorist and counterinsurgency activities has both failed to resolve violent conflicts and marginalized non-violent conflict management and mediation options. Rather than supporting negotiated settlements, robust mandates carry the risk of offering a disincentive to governments to address the roots of violence and seek a dialogue and/or a compromise.

As a whole, stabilization has provided Western states with a short-term, security-based alternative to controversial, large-scale peacebuilding operations. In theory, stabilization could be conceived of as a first step towards longer-term interventions involving governance and development activities designed to tackle the roots of instability. In practice, however, stabilization has been both short-term and not organically connected to a political process. It is perhaps unsurprising that these operations remain controversial. Ultimately, as the HIPPO (2015) report argues, long-term, sustainable solutions must be rooted in a political and peacebuilding process. Stabilization operations confirm that the often-repeated need to link the use of force to a broader political strategy remains as compelling as ever.

References

- Attree, L., Street, J., & Venchiarutti, L. (2018). United Nations peace operations in a complex environment. London: Saferworld.
- Bellamy, A. J., & Hunt, C. T. (2015). Twenty-first century UN peace operations: Protection, force and the changing security environment. International Affairs, 91(6), 1277–1298.
- Belloni, R., & Costantini, I. (2019). From liberal state building to counterinsurgency and stabilization: The international intervention in Iraq. Ethnopolitics, 18(4), 509–525. (in press).
- Belloni, R., & Moro, F. N. (2019). Stabilization and stability operations: Definitions, drivers, approaches. Ethnopolitics, 18(4), 445–461. (in press).
- Berdal, M., & Ucko, D. H. (2014). The United Nations and the use of force: Between promise and peril. Journal of Strategic Studies, 37(5), 665–673.
- Boyle, M. J. (2010). Do counterterrorism and counterinsurgency go together? International Affairs, 86(2), 333–353.
- Bush, G. W. (2003). Remarks by president George W. Bush at the 20th anniversary of the national endowment for democracy. Washington, DC: United States Chamber of Commerce. 6 Nov 2003.
- Centre FrancoPaix. (2018). Stabilizing Mali: The challenges to conflict resolution. Montreal: Centre FrancoPaix.
- Chandler, D. (2012). Rethinking the conflict-poverty nexus: From securitising intervention to resilience. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 4(1), 1–14.
- Curran, D., & Holtom, P. (2015). Resonating, rejecting, and reinterpreting: Mapping the stabilization discourse in the United Nations Security Council, 2000–2012. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 4(1), 1–18.
- De Coning, C. (2017). Peace enforcement in Africa: Doctrinal distinctions between the African Union and United Nations. Contemporary Security Policy, 38(1), 145–160.
- De Coning, C. (2018). Is stabilization the new normal? Implications of stabilization mandates for the use of force in UN peacekeeping operations. In P. Nadin (Ed.), The use of force in UN peacekeeping (pp. 85–99). London/New York: Routledge.
- De Coning, C., & Peter, M. (Eds.). (2019). United Nations peace operations in a changing global order. Houndmills: Palgrave.
- De Coning, C., Aoi, C., & Karlsrud, J. (Eds.). (2017). UN peacekeeping doctrine in a new era: Adapting to stabilisation, protection and new threats. London: Routledge.
- De Vries, H. (2015). Going around in circles: The challenges of peacekeeping and stabilization in the Democratic Republic of Congo. Clingendael: The Hague.
- Friis, K. (2010). Peacekeeping and Counter-insurgency – Two of a Kind? International Peacekeeping, 17(1), 49–66.
- Gilder, A. (2019). The effect of ‘stabilization’ in the mandates and practice of UN peace operations. Netherlands International Law Review, 66, 47–73.
- Gordon, S. (2010). The United Kingdom’s stabilisation model and Afghanistan: The impact on humanitarian actors. Disasters, 34(3), 368–387.
- Gorur, A. (2016). Defining the boundaries of UN stabilization missions. Washington, DC: Stimson Center.
- Grindle, M. S. (2004). Good enough governance: Poverty reduction and reform in developing countries. Governance, 17(4), 525–548.
- HIPPO (High Level Independent Panel on United Nations Peace Operations). (2015). Uniting our strengths for peace – Politics, partnership and peace. 16 June. New York: High Level Independent Panel on United Nations Peace Operations.
- Hunt, C. T. (2017). All necessary means to what ends? The unintended consequences of the ‘robust turn’ in UN peace operations. International Peacekeeping, 24(1), 108–131.
- Karlsrud, J. (2018). The UN at war: Peace operations in a new era. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Karlsrud, J. (2019a). United Nations stabilization operations: Chapter seven and a half. Ethnopolitics, 18(3), 494. (in press).
- Karlsrud, J. (2019b). From liberal peacebuilding to stabilization and counter-terrorism. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 1–21.
- Levitsky, S., & Way, L. A. (2005). International linkage and democratization. Journal of Democracy, 16(3), 20–34.
- Mathias, S. (2017). UN peacekeeping today: Legal challenges and uncertainties. Melbourne Journal of International Law, 18(2), 138–153.
- McGinty, R. (2012). Against stabilization. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 1(1), 20–30.
- Muggah, R. (Ed.). (2014). Stabilization operations, security and development. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Peter, M. (2015). Between doctrine and practice: The UN peacekeeping dilemma. Global Governance, 21(3), 351–370.
- Rhoads, E. P. (2016). Taking sides in peacekeeping: Impartiality and the future of the United Nations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Rudolf, P. (2017). UN peace operations and the use of military force. Survival, 59(3), 161–182.
- Stabilisation Unit. (2014). UK principles for stabilisation organisations and programmes. London: Stabilisation Unit.
- Tardy, T. (2014). The reluctant peacekeeper: France and the use of force in peace operations. Journal of Strategic Studies, 37(5), 770–792.
- Tull, D. M. (2018). The limits and unintended consequences of UN peace enforcement: The force - intervention brigade in the DR Congo. International Peacekeeping, 25(2), 167–190.

- UN (United Nations). (2008). United Nations peacekeeping: Principles and guidelines. New York: Department of Peacekeeping Operations and Department of Field Support.
- UNDP (United Nations Development Programme). (2017). Journey to extremism in Africa. Drivers, incentives and the tipping point for recruitment. New York: UNDP Regional Bureau for Africa.
- United States Department of the Army and United States Marine Corps. (2007). The US Army/Marine Corps counterinsurgency field manual: US Army field manual no. 3-24: Marine Corps warfighting publication no. 3-33.5. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- US Joint Chiefs of Staff. (2016). Stability. Joint Publication 3-07, 3 August.

Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

M. Anne Brown and Mary Graham
The University of Queensland, Brisbane, QLD, Australia

Synonyms

Colonization; Hybridity; Peacebuilding; Relationality; Shared sovereignty; Structural violence; Treaty

Definition

Relations between Australia's First Peoples and its non-Indigenous government and peoples provide an example of stalled peacebuilding. Peacebuilding is rarely considered in relation to Australia, but Australia is a colonial-settler state. When colonization began, Australia was already governed by an extensive network of Indigenous political communities. The modern Australian state was built upon denial of these sovereign First Peoples and of the profound protracted violence of dispossessing them. As a consequence of this denial, essentially colonial relations continue, resulting in First Peoples facing significant ongoing systemic violence and profound distortion of Australian political community.

Despite the language of Indigenous self-determination, there is little self-determination in practice. A treaty with government is one way in which Indigenous people are seeking to move away from the violence of colonial relations and establish recognition as sovereign First Peoples, coexistent with the state. Greater trust, mutuality, and practical self-determination are needed to enable a meaningful treaty, however, while any treaty needs to incorporate First Nation values, concepts, and processes. This would shape more nuanced ways of being a state. Protracted systemic violence in Australia underlines the failure of a well-resourced liberal state to deal nonviolently with key forms of difference and resolve embedded conflict at the heart of the state. This case demonstrates how liberal governance can entrench violence with significant implications for liberal peacebuilding. Studies of peace and conflict have valuable insights to offer efforts to move past the violence of colonial relations, including emphasizing the importance of relationship and mutuality.

Introduction

This chapter addresses peacebuilding between Australia's First Nations and its non-Indigenous government and peoples. The discussion touches on the need for peacemaking, obstacles to it, and what the transformation of relations it seeks might entail. A treaty or treaties is one of the mechanisms being pursued to navigate that transformation and is a focus of this discussion. The chapter emphasizes the stalled nature of peacebuilding in Australia, but also points to the profound benefit that exploring a different pattern of relations between First Nations and non-Indigenous peoples offers the country – that is, exploring relations that turn around acknowledging First Nations people and engaging with the scope and complexity of the country's history through deep time and the modern era.

Peacebuilding is not a term commonly applied to Australia. It is more often associated with images of international missions carrying often pret-a-porter development agendas in the aftermath of open fighting. Australia presents a different case, but one that has something important to say to understandings of peace and peacebuilding. International peacebuilding missions often seek to restrain violent conflict through introducing or strengthening selected liberal governance institutions, or some semblance of them (Richmond 2007; see Chapter ► “Liberal Peacebuilding”). As discussed later, the need for peacebuilding within what is widely regarded as a stable, well-functioning liberal democracy underlines serious misconceptions with this approach. Experiences from violent conflict and efforts to build peace elsewhere also offer insights and points of comparison to Australia.

The modern state of Australia was founded as a colonial-settler state. In fundamental dimensions of society and polity, it remains so, despite legislative, policy, and sociocultural shifts over the past two centuries. Australia demonstrates the challenges of peacebuilding where the violence of colonization and the persistence of structural and direct violence and intergenerational trauma flowing from that history have been obscured (Reynolds 2013). More fundamentally, as part of the “not-seeing” of colonialism, the presence and significance of First Nations peoples as those whose country was colonized, and as interlocutors with whom colonial-settler Australia must deal is effectively, even aggressively, overlooked in mainstream Australian life and political exchange. Indigenous disadvantage is often noted, but there is little recognition and active erasure of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples as First Peoples in their own country (see Chapter ► “Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security”). Despite the language of self-determination, Indigenous Australians continue to be governed overwhelmingly through the categories, decisions, and structures of others (Nakata 2007). Fundamental questions of sovereignty and what it means for First Nations and non-Indigenous people and governance to share the country are yet to be explored.

What appears to be stability, then, is in part the arrested development that comes from an erasure

of history and the systemic “overlooking” of whole peoples and their Law that is central to colonization in Australia. This chosen amnesia and the violence it obscures distorts and damages Australia’s political and sociocultural life and places heavy burdens on Indigenous lives. It is clear, however, that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples have not been eradicated or assimilated and do not live as one of a number of minority groups. Indigenous Australians make up 3.3 per cent of the overall population according to the 2016 census, but the questions raised by their presence speak to the heart of the state. While papered over, the questions posed by the violence of colonization and its aftermath do not go away, but emerge repeatedly, through Indigenous voices, government inquiries, social movements, and occasional outbursts of popular disquiet. Far from fading away, Indigenous peoples have consistently asserted their sovereignty and understanding of sovereignty as coexistent with the state and sought to arrive at an agreement or a means of dealing which encompasses not only non-Indigenous but also First Nation values, concepts, and structures (see Chapter ► “Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding”).

This discussion is the work of two voices, from First Nations and non-Indigenous contexts. These voices are at times melded together and at times distinct and separate (although not explicitly identified). It is not clear whether, how and when settler-colonial Australia might break out of denial and into the work of crafting ways of being together not distorted by structural violence. However a transformation of relations away from systemic violence might take place, mutuality, exchange, and the development of what Mary Graham calls autonomous regard (touched on later) are fundamental to the process. This writing is an effort to enact those practices.

A Short Account of First Nations History and Social and Political Philosophy

Indigenous civilization on the Australian continent is 65,000 years old on conservative estimates, but perhaps almost twice that, so

Australia's First Peoples practiced political functions long before the emergence of European conceptions of politics and hold a sense of history that reaches into deep time. Over millennia Indigenous politics, society and philosophy have been shaped by land and by practices of nurturing land, supporting a continuity of coexistence with land and living things, and an ordered cohabitation among human groups in the face of far-reaching ecological change (see Chapter ► “Human Geography and Peacebuilding”). The sociopolitical, philosophical, and ethical order that emerged from this extraordinary continuity and adaptability in turn enabled a high degree of social stability within and among groups (Pascoe 2018).

For most of this long history, numerous distinct Australian Aboriginal nations (approximately 500 at the time of British colonization) lived in relative isolation from the wider world, but in webs of exchange with each other. “The songlines of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people connected language groups and clans from one side of the country to another. The cultural, economic, genetic, and artistic conduits of the songlines brought goods, art, news, ideas, technology, and marriage partners to centres of exchange” (Pascoe 2018, p. 274). Contrary to popular mythology, Indigenous peoples did not simply wander the continent in an opportunistic search for game or edible plants. Language groups were associated with clearly defined areas of the continent and economic life was underpinned by “subtle but comprehensive management of the land and its productivity” (Pascoe 2018, p. 271). The processes of managing land and the “economic foundations of traditional society were inseparable from the philosophic and religious beliefs” (Pascoe 2018, p. 266). Careful management of Australia's often fragile soils and ecosystems enabled Indigenous people to care for and draw sustenance from areas out of reach of contemporary farming and to survive and thrive in often extremely challenging environments.

Relationship with land is the foundation of Indigenous political, social, economic, and philosophical life. The Law comes from the land. Land is generative and sentient – all life forms come from it. (Various accounts of this process appear as the Dreaming of different nations). It has thrown human beings up into the world and into the imaginative ability to create society and culture. It continuously helps us to form society and keeps us alive and creative through its resources, its changes, and enabling capacities. In this way, land becomes Country, a force that participates in a reciprocal relationship with human beings. We are ultimately, inextricably, and forever obliged to Land-as-Country for our existence. These relations of obligation are the basis of social and political order and ethics, of how we are and act with each other, including human and other-than-human-beings. “The land, and how we treat it, is what determines our human-ness. Because land is sacred and must be looked after, the relation between people and land becomes the template for society and social relations” (Graham 2008, pp. 181–182). The primary relationship is between people and land while other relations, among people and with other-than-human relatives, are contingent on this primary relationship (see Chapter ► “Human Geography and Peacebuilding”).

People are thus embedded within a sentient landscape, with each other and with other-than-human beings in a system of coexistence or a non-anthropocentric ecology of relations (Bawaka et al. 2016; Graham and Brigg 2020). The forms of sociopolitical order and ethics that emerged from this relational grasp of life are flexible and stable, adaptive, and enduring. They turn around reciprocal social and cultural arrangements in which human collectives – clan and language groups – “look after” Land-as-Country within particular regions recognized by other groups, somewhat like a network of interlinked but autonomous local governments. A complex systematization, the Law, became embedded within and between groups, providing a poetic ordering system for guiding behaviors and relations among people. The Law orders the world through cultural narratives, kinship systems, and languages; through ceremony in which meaning, relationship and duty are enacted; and through organizational structures. Organizational structures are largely nonhierarchical. Elders exercise authority that is relatively constrained and contingent on their abilities. Practical injunctions help inculcate and guide behaviors, while models of conduct emphasize self-regulation, non-competitiveness, harmonious relations, cooperation, and the pursuit of balance (see Chapter ► “Culture and Conflict Resolution”).

This is a relational and custodial ethic that ensures care for family, kin, and Country and offers a way of securing entwined human and other-than-human existence. It is also an ethic of autonomous regard, which emerges from and guides relations with land and with human and nonhuman living beings. Human beings are at once autonomous and operating within an ecology of relations. We are watching the living world and the living world is looking at us. How do we weigh our behavior and ourselves in the sight of the Country, the ground itself, in relation to others in and outside the group, to the ancestors and to spirit beings in the overall register of Dreaming and Law? How do we conduct ourselves to find and ensure a good fit? This ethic serves the valuable purpose of suspending social and political judgmentalism, including between groups, while making each individual part of, and therefore responsible for, the continuation of sociopolitical order. Within this political and ethical context, invasion is meaningless. While there was (and is) conflict between clan or language groups, the power of this ethic and the relationship between land and people meant that there was no invasion of other’s country. As Bruce Pascoe notes, the absence of imperial warfare “demands respect, and the skills employed to bring about the longest pan-continental stability that the world has known must be investigated, because they might become Australia’s greatest export” (Pascoe 2018, p. 276; Graham and Brigg 2020).

Australian First Peoples practiced this relational ethic as owners and runners of Country on the Australian continent for tens of thousands of years. This is a civilizational history. Many First Peoples continue to be active owners and runners of Country or are reclaiming this role. “Colonial destruction has badly damaged relations with Country . . . But Country and its processes persist, whether in active practices or as patterns etched in the landscape by tens of thousands of years of human occupation that are available for recovery and revival in face of colonisation” (Graham and Brigg 2020, p. 5). As Bruce Pascoe comments, “there are elements of agriculture, conservation, culture, and government that, having been tested against the nature of Aboriginal society for a minimum of 60,000 years, hold profitable messages for the nation” (Pascoe 2018, p. 273; see Chapter ► “Hybrid Peace”).

Colonization

Britain began colonization in Australia in 1788 with the process extending gradually across the continent. In the mainstream Australian imaginary, the history of colonization is an account of gradual settlement, difficult and varied migrations, challenging landscapes, and the struggle to overcome adversity. These accounts form only a small part of the story, however. Colonization in Australia focused on acquisition and settlement of land. This was resisted, and the dispossession of those whose land it was involved significant violence, described by an early traveler in frontier regions as a process of extermination (Treaty Working Group 2020). In the state of Queensland alone, the frontier conflicts are estimated to have led to more than 65,000 deaths while at least 311 massacres across the country have been documented, with nearly all deaths Indigenous (Ryan et al. 2019; Treaty Working Group 2020).

Land was central to colonization in ways that have proved extraordinarily potent (see Chapter ► “Land Politics and Conflict”). Following Locke and other early theorists of the state, the country was legally classified as terra nullius, or empty land. This classification formed the international legal basis for asserting the legitimacy of British occupation. The land was not “empty” because no people were observed, however, but because the European arrivals identified no system of fixed agriculture and land ownership that they recognized. In a profoundly narrow definition of what it is to be human, such systems were taken as the essential defining feature of social and political order. Indigenous peoples in Australia were placed in the imaginary “state of nature,” seen to occupy but not own the land where possession could only be achieved by fixed agriculture. First Peoples were seen as the chrysalis stage of humankind and their extinction was considered to be inevitable (Stanner 1969). Despite Indigenous societies' complex governance and land management they were not regarded as constituting political communities with systems of governance, agriculture, or law. Terra nullius meant First Nations were not recognized as peoples with whom the colonial powers needed to negotiate or deal (see Chapter ► “Culture and Conflict Resolution”). Without terra nullius, a treaty would have been required, as it was across the British Empire of the time. Meanwhile, on the land, Indigenous dispossession was followed by rapid deterioration of the soil (Pascoe 2018).

The Colonial Legacy

The modern Australia that took shape on the basis of terra nullius has operated according to what anthropologist W. E. H. Stanner called the “great Australian silence,” “a view from a window which has been carefully placed to exclude a whole quadrant of the landscape” (Stanner 1969, p. 64). This erasure is itself an act of violence, and a denial of that violence. It is systemic, rooted in the character of the sovereignty claimed by the state – based significantly on the dispossession of those who were classified as not fully human – and the lack of regard that mode of sovereignty offers to different ways of being in the world (Tully 1995; Nakata 2007). Erasure is also practical and concrete, evident in the lack of information regarding First Nations peoples in much school curricula, media, and public discourse, and in the profound ignorance of and often aggressive disregard for Indigenous people's values, priorities, contexts, and lives.

The institutional structures and practices founded on this erasure have entrenched and normalized wide-ranging forms of violence. Over decades following colonization, these struck at every dimension of First Peoples' lives, forcing people from their lands, taking children forcibly from families and disrupting emotional, cultural, and psychic continuities, fracturing clans and compelling fragments of different groups to live together in patrolled settlements, forbidding the use of vernacular, stripping autonomy, and ruling over lives in minute detail, demanding work without pay and so undermining intergenerational wealth (Kidd 2000). These forms of violent control were often undertaken in the name of a protecting and civilizing mission. They have left a deep, intergenerational legacy of trauma.

The twentieth and twenty-first centuries have been marked by persistent Indigenous activism, social movements supporting Indigenous causes and changes in government policy and legal frameworks regarding Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islanders. Policies of assimilation, themselves a denial of Indigenous ways of being, were introduced in the 1930s and repudiated in the 1970s. Terra nullius was overturned by the Australian High Court in the Mabo Decision in 1992, with significant effects for land rights. Despite this, terra nullius and assimilation continue to exert powerful social, cultural, and political effects. The disregard for and pursuit of control over Indigenous lives is evident in continuing patterns of violence – extraordinary rates of incarceration, youth detention and deaths in custody, disproportionately high rates of early death and youth suicide, and intergenerational impoverishment (Australian Human Rights Commission 2020). Investigations repeatedly point to dispossession, the colonial legacy, and lack of effective self-determination as fundamental causes (Australian Law Reform Commission 2018; Royal Commission 1991). Yet neither the far-reaching change necessary to enable genuine self-determination nor the work to shift mainstream societal attitudes (through schools for example) have been undertaken.

To give one example, in 1991, the Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody released a damning report into the high rate of Indigenous incarceration and deaths in custody. The government accepted the report, but as of 2020, approximately 30 years since its release, there have been 433 additional Aboriginal deaths in custody with no convictions in relation to these deaths. Moreover, rates of Indigenous incarceration have increased, from one in seven adults in prison in 1992, to one in four in 2020 – drawn from approximately 3 per cent of the population (Creative Spirits 2020). Many of the Royal Commission’s wide-ranging recommendations have yet to be implemented.

Despite the language of self-determination, Indigenous peoples are repeatedly excluded from fundamental decisions bearing on their communities and well-being. The 2020 destruction by a mining company of Juukan Gorge is a starkly violent example of this exclusion, of a brutal indifference towards Indigenous people, and of the weakness of legislation designed to protect Indigenous interests. Juukan Gorge was a 46,000-year-old site sacred to local clans with artwork and evidence of human habitation reaching back 28,000 years (see Chapter ► “Land Politics and Conflict”). It was destroyed despite being part of Indigenous owners’ native title and in the face of their strong opposition. Similarly, state government approval for a large liquor store to be sited close to three Indigenous communities, one intentionally alcohol free, in the face of opposition from Indigenous and non-Indigenous communities and from liquor licensing authorities, entirely contradicts government’s supposed commitment to principles of Indigenous self-determination and well-being.

First Peoples are repeatedly defined through lack and portrayed as “problems,” welfare “hard cases,” victims, or threats. This continues a polarizing, objectifying relationship that allows no scope for self-determination. Even when approached as citizens, the model of citizenship rests on exclusionary notions of competitive liberal individualism and operates in practice around welfare and service delivery which positions recipients as passive. A model of citizenship that is blind to the injustice of its own practice and to ways of being other than those of liberal subjectivity cannot enable self-determination or engagement across difference. For Indigenous Australians, citizenship has not enabled participation in shaping political community or even in making decisions concerning matters directly affecting them. Not surprisingly then, it has not worked to overcome disadvantage. Successive Australian governments have approached systemic injustice and political marginalization as a service delivery issue, with the nature of both need and service largely determined by state institutions, and the importance of delivering the service often ranked well below commercial and other interests (see Chapter ► “Human Rights”).

Peacebuilding and the Colonial Relationship

Experiences of violent conflict and its aftermath elsewhere have insights to offer the Australian situation. One is that violent conflict often does not end with the cessation of direct hostilities but continues in other forms, while the nature of the “peace” reflects dominant power relations, often entrenching systemic marginalization (Richmond 2007). Australia demonstrates one form of this dynamic. The Australian case highlights the profound limitations of liberal peacebuilding (Richmond 2007; see Chapter ► “Liberal Peacebuilding”). Liberal peacebuilding promotes the view that liberal governance institutions enable difference and division to be managed without violence and so represent the fundamental response to violent conflict within states. Australia offers a clear example where broadly effective, resourced liberal governance has over many decades not enabled resolution of the conflict and violence of colonial relations but has in many respects veiled its continuation. Nor has citizenship protected Indigenous peoples from systemic marginalization. Calls for reconciliation have become prominent. In the face of continuing deaths in custody, however, “reconciliation” rings empty.

Liberal political orders articulate powerful goals of participation and accountability and offer an array of governance mechanisms. But they also assume universal validity for models of the person and the state as centralized, unitary sovereigns (Brigg 2016). The claim to universality only further excludes those whose ways of being are not recognized by liberal models of personhood and political community, undermining the scope for actual participation and accountability (Tully 1995). While various categories of people are excluded to varying degrees, in a colonial context, the very foundation of the state turns upon dispossession of Indigenous people. Liberal governance in Australia has not “seen” its own act of dispossession and so has not entered into genuine coexistence with First Nations peoples. It has not included Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples through their own categories and forms of engagement. To do so would be to fashion a more complex, nuanced, or hybrid model of sovereignty and governance, shaped by the practice of mutual recognition or of autonomous regard (Tully 1995; see Chapter ▶ “Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject”). Australia’s experience makes clear how liberal governance can embed violence (Graham and Brigg 2020; see Chapter ▶ “Liberal Peacebuilding”).

While the nature of the “peace” reflects prevailing power relations, struggles to build relations that do not entrench violence play out over generations. A “realist” account of Australia might consider that First Peoples “lost” the war of colonization and take this as the end of the story. Yet this is not the case. First Nations have persisted as peoples with living cultures that weave through and connect diverse ways of life. They have continued to assert their standing and sovereignty and the tie to the land that is its basis, and from that place have repeatedly invited non-Indigenous Australians into a different relationship. This is not to suggest that Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander ways of life have not undergone far-reaching change and disruption, that there is any essential way of life that is Indigenous, or that Indigenous and non-Indigenous Australians are not already deeply enmeshed. It is rather to say that in the face of this dispossession, disruption, and violence, there is a profound endurance – “[t]hat peoples possessed a land for sixty millennia and this sacred link disappears from world history in merely the last two hundred years” (Referendum Council 2017:1). From this endurance emerge dynamic, diverse forms of cultural and political expression, and an ongoing preparedness to engage non-Indigenous Australians. This active, creative endurance counters the narratives of lack. It is itself a form of power that resists and confronts colonial structures and builds new connections across communities. The conflict has not ceased, but nor has the struggle for peace (see Chapter ▶ “Local Peacebuilding”).

Studies of conflict also highlight both the critical significance of feeling, emotion, and trauma in driving violence and division and in efforts to undo them and the centrality of relationships to peacebuilding (Lederach 2005). Conflict undermines trust and polarizes people, perspectives, and identities. The process of overcoming violence, then, involves a reordering of feeling and calls for some realization of all parties being part of the same interdependent web of living relations. First Nations peoples can carry a burden of intergenerational trauma and confront daily discriminations and vulnerabilities to violence that most non-Indigenous people neither experience nor comprehend. They face decades of unfulfilled government promises and disregard. Indigenous people in Australia have no reason to trust non-Indigenous authorities or society. While not on the same scale as Indigenous trauma, for non-Indigenous Australians, facing historical and contemporary violence is painful, challenging them to grapple with racism, come to terms with difference and confront fear of loss. While truth-telling is not about blame, it is difficult to avoid feelings of guilt, distress, and resentment. These feelings can become obstacles to change (see Chapter ▶ “Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts”). For Indigenous and non-Indigenous people, being aware of and prepared to work with difficult emotions is part of shaping new relations. For non-Indigenous Australians in particular, recognizing First Peoples also involves the realization of being part of a web of relational mutuality.

Makarrata and Treaty

Calls to recognize Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander peoples as Australia’s First Nations and so move beyond colonial relations has long been expressed in terms of the need for some form of accord (ANTaR 2019). Most recently, in 2017, the Indigenous National Constitutional Convention put out the Uluru Statement from the Heart, calling for a voice to national parliament enshrined in the Constitution, a makarrata (a “coming together after a struggle”) and a Makarrata Commission “to supervise a process of agreement-making between governments and First Nations and truth-telling about our history” (Referendum Council 2017; see Chapter ▶ “Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding”). This call has so far been rejected by the national government, but tentative processes towards treaties are underway in some states.

In principle, an accord is a symbol and a promise of the complete overturn of terra nullius, rejecting it not only as a legal construct but also as a pervasive political and cultural world view embedded in the daily practice of Australia’s institutions. Ideally, the process of coming to an accord would entail recognizing the ancient, living roots of First Nations peoples and the civilizational insight they bring to the exchange and grasping a more accurate account of colonization and Australia’s modern history. A genuine process of treaty-making would enable and enact the coming together of different parties in mutual recognition to move beyond systemic violence (see Chapter ▶ “Negotiation”). This process would thus directly address the character and quality of participation and accountability in Australia, while unpicking terra nullius from institutional practice would open the way for genuine Indigenous self-determination, openness to Indigenous modes of governance, and more consultative and participatory models of governance more broadly. A treaty would symbolize and articulate these goals, and provide a strategic pathway for pursuing them, but in itself, in the context of systemic violence, a treaty cannot make these things. It would rather express and guide an ongoing process that was already underway.

Progress towards some form of accord requires an extended process that engages over time with all dimensions of policy and practice affecting Indigenous peoples. Treaty as a legal document or elite agreement that left everyday practice largely untouched would merely be a cover for continuing marginalization. Preparing the ground for a treaty may be more important than the accord itself, although a well-prepared treaty would provide an important legal basis for future relations between First Nations and non-Indigenous forms of governance and authority.

Preparing the ground for a treaty needs to begin with at least three steps, upon which other steps would be built (see Chapter ▶ “Negotiation”). The first step would be to come to agreement on a method and process for negotiating an accord. This method would need to reflect Indigenous values and approaches. It would identify actions and goals to build trust (outlined below) and towards which progress would be needed in preparation for a formal agreement, and it would agree on processes and “rules of engagement” to ensure appropriate authority and inclusion. Indigenous social organization constructs agreements from the bottom or the local up. Grounding discussion in concrete communities, sectors, and issues from the beginning, while still orienting them towards shared goals and broader networks of exchange, would also have considerable practical and political value. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander approaches to decision-making, emphasizing consensus rather than voting and allowing talks to take the time they need for participants to be heard, need to guide discussion (see Chapter ▶ “Local Peacebuilding”).

The second step concerns building trust. Government (in its various different forms), non-Indigenous and Indigenous peoples have to “grow relationality” and work at improving their relations. Growing relationality and building trust require the different parts of government to together provide evidence of genuine commitment to a different kind of relationship, based on justice and recognition, with First Nations peoples. Taking concrete action to undo the violent legacy of colonialism would constitute such evidence of commitment and is urgently needed across a range of key areas. This would include progress on rates of incarceration and deaths in custody, and fully implementing the Royal Commission’s recommendations. First Nations people would need to be meaningfully included in policy-making processes involving their communities while efforts to address Indigenous disadvantage (in health, housing, education, etc.) should be led or informed by Indigenous community knowledge, leadership, and forms of organization.

Well-informed material on Indigenous cultures, languages, knowledges, and history, as well as more accurate accounts of colonization should be included as part of regular curriculum in education systems across the country, moving to counter non-Indigenous ignorance and emphasize inclusion. “Decolonisation projects” or activities that worked to build relationships across communities and organizations would be encouraged. The annual reconciliation processes undertaken by Indigenous and non-Indigenous communities at Myall Creek, commemorating a nineteenth century massacre of local Aboriginal tribespeople, is just one example of such a project but many kinds of activities, around caring for land, for example, are possible. Undertaking these changes would be slow and exploratory, but there are already examples of all of them in action in particular organizations or localities, in health centers, schools, and police stations. They need to become normal, countrywide, and required rather than exceptional and optional (see Chapter ► “Local Peacebuilding”).

The third, concurrent step, considers the question of who speaks for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander communities. Given the long experience of disruption, First Nation clans need time and resources to gather and consolidate their own authority and stance. Full agreement cannot be reached by self-appointed groups that lack authentic political authority to speak on behalf of the polity. While they may have valuable advice to offer, no nongovernment organization, government, or corporate entity can speak with authority for First Nations. First Nation polities also need to talk with each other and establish agreements among themselves before discussions with local or state governments regarding treaties. From these processes, First Nations authorities able to negotiate with state authorities can become clear. These three steps are needed to establish mutual relationality and basic trust between Indigenous and non-Indigenous parties, and authority within First Nations communities. Building on these steps, other phases of discussion, activity, and agreement would be needed before decisive accords could be reached.

Negotiating a treaty is to move away from highly centralized to shared models of sovereignty. There are different ways of understanding this – for the Uluru Statement, “sovereignty is a spiritual concept” that is nevertheless a practical orientation guiding decision-making and governance as it bears on First Nations (Referendum Council 2017: 1). For an agreement to be more than a continuation of the “peace of the powerful,” it has to encompass First Nation values and approaches. Principles of relationality and reciprocity, of autonomous regard and the custodial ethic of looking after Country and kin are fundamental to such a treaty. These principles recognize First Nations’ authority and sovereignty within the country, but this is not to pose competing sovereignties. It is rather to recognize difference within the context of mutuality and relationship, and autonomy and self-governance within the context of mutual respect and obligation. In the context of particular areas of policy and practice, such principles are practical and concrete. At the minimum, they begin with understanding the crucial difference between people managing their own affairs and having government manage their affairs for them. They speak also to care for land. Accepting real difference within webs of interconnection counters polarization and is fundamental to peacebuilding (see Chapter ► “Peace Formation”, and Chapter ► “Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies”).

Conclusion

Australia is marked by a conflict that goes to the heart of its constitution as a state and a political community. Though characterized by significant violence, this conflict has been made invisible to the extent much of the population seems hardly aware of it. While the proportion of First Nations peoples to the general population is small, demography is not the cause of this “overlooking.” This erasure is politically entrenched and the consequence of colonization. There have been areas of progress in sectors and localities, but while sites of progress are important and to be valued, there has not been improvement in fundamental patterns of violence – deaths in custody, youth suicide, and so on, and the lack of self-determination and sovereignty and the acts of barbarous indifference which drive these traumas. This “is the tragedy of our powerlessness” that is stalled peacebuilding (Referendum Council 2017: 1).

It is not clear how non-Indigenous government and society might come to recognize First Nations as peoples who governed the country for millennia, who have not ceded that role and who have deep insight into it, or as partners in how we live together. A treaty is one path on the table. Some form of treaty or charter of agreements, guided by values and processes rooted in Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander ways of being but not altogether alien to other traditions, grounded in local discussion and accords but also in federal recognition and authority, that worked gradually through areas of legislation, institutional policy and practice, could reweave relations and undo the violence rooted in them. This would enable the positive lessons learnt from community and other efforts, in reconciliation, education or policing for example, to serve as guides for the rest of the country. First Nations people and political philosophy have much to offer about living with this land, and about engaging with difference (see Chapter ► “Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace”).

This is a slow model of treaty and of peacebuilding, where peacebuilding is understood as the ongoing work of undoing systemic violence (see Chapter ► “Peace Formation”). Treaty-making touches on and challenges many things – entrenched power relations, sovereignty, national identity, everyday institutional practice, and collective emotions. It will be difficult and slow. Building peace that moved beyond the violence of colonial relations, however, would require more nuanced ways of being a state, with hybrid, shared models of sovereignty, more participatory forms of governance and greater openness to difference (see Chapter ► “Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding”). Some consider a treaty would emphasize the divisions in Australian life. In reality, the divisions exist and some suffer them through incarceration, burdens of disease, mental health, and suicide. Treaty-making, as the form of peacebuilding tentatively underway, is rather the challenge of recognizing the enduring reality of First Peoples and exploring what it means to truly coexist and share country.

Summary

Relations between Australia’s First Peoples and its non-Indigenous government and peoples can be understood as a case of stalled peacebuilding. Peacebuilding is rarely considered in relation to Australia, but Australia is a colonial-settler state, colonized by Britain from 1788, and this process involved protracted violent conflict. When colonizers arrived, the continent of Australia was already governed by an extensive network of Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander political communities, with rich, complex systems of social order focused on caring for land. The modern Australian state was built upon denial of these sovereign First Peoples and of the protracted violence of dispossessing them. As a consequence of this double denial, essentially colonial relations continue. This results in First Peoples facing significant, ongoing systemic violence as structural marginalization and trauma are overlooked, and the continuing distortion of Australian political community. Despite the language of Indigenous self-determination, there is little scope for self-determination in practice. Indigenous disadvantage is addressed as a service delivery issue, rather than systemic political marginalization and violence, and consequently continues to grow. Calls for reconciliation ring hollow when systemic violence continues unabated. The double denial also means that, despite signs of growing public support for Indigenous peoples, there is relatively little understanding of Australia’s history or of the patterns of Indigenous/non-Indigenous relations in the wider Australian society.

A treaty or treaties with government is one way in which Indigenous people are seeking to move away from the violence of colonial relations and establish recognition as sovereign First Peoples, in a form of sovereignty coexistent with the state. While this direction has so far been rejected by the national government, some state governments are tentatively exploring it. A formal agreement that did not change everyday practice, however, would merely be a cover for continuing marginalization. Preparing the ground, by building trust between First Peoples and all levels of government, enabling practical self-determination, and increasing mainstream knowledge of First Peoples, is necessary if a treaty is to enact and enable genuine recognition and exchange. A treaty or treaties needs to draw from First Nation values, concepts, and processes. This requires a slow, challenging process of exchange between Indigenous communities, government, and other bodies around matters of practical governance across the country.

Protracted systemic violence in Australia underlines the failure of a well-resourced liberal state to deal nonviolently with key forms of difference and resolve embedded conflict at the heart of the state. This case demonstrates how systemic violence can continue under the guise of “peace” and how liberal governance can entrench violence. It thus highlights some of the significant limitations of liberal peacebuilding. Building peace that moved beyond the violence of colonial relations would require more nuanced ways of being a state, with hybrid, shared models of sovereignty, more participatory forms of governance, and greater openness to difference. A slow process of working towards a treaty or treaties in ways that grow mutual relationship may enable progress towards these goals.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Conflict, Peace, and Ontological Security
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Human Rights
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Land Politics and Conflict
- ▶ Liberal Peace

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Participatory Constitution-Making and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Formation
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject

References

- Australian Human Rights Commission. Aboriginal and torres strait Islander social justice. Multiple resources on <https://humanrights.gov.au/our-work/aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-social-justice> Accessed Feb 2020.
- Australian Law Reform Commission. (2018). Pathways to justice – inquiry into the incarceration rate of aboriginal and torres strait Islander peoples (ALRC Report 133). <https://www.alrc.gov.au/publication/pathways-to-justice-inquiry-into-the-incarceration-rate-of-aboriginal-and-torres-strait-islander-peoples-alrc-report-133/executive-summary-15/> Accessed 1 May 2020.
- ANTaR (Australians for Native Title and Reconciliation) (2019). Treaty in Australia. Resource. Antar.org.au/treaty Accessed Dec 2019.
- Bawaka Country, Wright, S., Suchet-Pearson, S., Lloyd, K., Burarrwanga, L., Ganambarr, R., Ganambarr-Stubbs, M., Ganambarr, B., Maymuru, D., & Sweeney, J. (2016). Co-becoming Bawaka: Towards a relational understanding of place/space. Progress in Human Geography, 40(4), 455–475.
- Brigg, M. (2016). Engaging indigenous Knowledges: From sovereign to relational knowers. The Australian Journal of Indigenous Education, 45(2), 152–158.
- Creative Spirits, Aboriginal Timeline: Protest; Aboriginal Prison Rates. Resource documents. <https://www.creativespirits.info> Accessed 1 June 2020.
- Graham, M. (2008). Some thoughts about the philosophic underpinnings of aboriginal worldviews. Australian Humanities Review, 45, 181–194.
- Graham, M. & Brigg, M., (2020). Why we need Aboriginal political philosophy now more than ever. Australian Broadcasting Commission, <https://www.abc.net.au/reliigion/why-we-need-aboriginal-political-philosophy/12865016>
- Kidd, R. (2000). Black lives, government lies. Sydney: UNSW Press.
- Lederach, J.-P. (2005). The moral imagination: The art and soul of building peace. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Nakata, M. (2007). Disciplining the savages, savaging the disciplines. Canberra: Aboriginal Studies Press.
- Pascoe, B. (2018). Dark Emu: Aboriginal Australia and the birth of agriculture (2nd ed.). Broome: Magabala Books.

- Referendum Council. (2017). The Uluru Statement from the Heart. <https://www.ulurustatement.org/> Accessed Dec 2019.
- Reynolds, H. (2013). Forgotten war. Sydney: New South Publishing.
- Richmond, O. P. (2007). The transformation of peace. Houndmills/Basingstoke/Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Royal Commission into Aboriginal Deaths in Custody. (1991). Final report. Canberra, ACT: Commonwealth Government of Australia.
- Ryan, L., Pascoe, W., Debenham, J., Gilbert, S., Richards, J., Smith, R., Owen, C., Anders, R. J., Brown M., Price D., Newley, J. & Usher, K., (2019). Australian Colonial Massacres 1780–1930. University of Newcastle. <https://c21ch.newcastle.edu.au/colonialmassacres/map.php> Accessed 1 May 2020.
- Stanner, W. E. H. (1969). After the dreaming. The 1968 Boyer lectures. Sydney: The Australian Broadcasting Commission.
- Treaty Working Group. (2020). Path to treaty. Brisbane: State of Queensland. <https://www.datsip.qld.gov.au/resources/datsima/programs/tracks-to-treaty/path-treaty/treaty-working-group-report-2020.pdf> Accessed Aug 2020.
- Tully, J. (1995). Strange multiplicity: Constitutionalism in an age of diversity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.

Standpoint Theory

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Starvation

- ▶ Conflict and Hunger

State Repression

- ▶ Civil Society and State Violence in South America

(State-)security

- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Statebuilding

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Liberal Peace and Its Critiques
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject

State-Building

- ▶ Post-Conflict Nation-Building

Statebuilding in Afghanistan: Inertia and Ambiguity

Florian P. Kühn
School of Global Studies, University of Gothenburg, Gothenburg, Sweden

Introduction

The terrorist attacks of 9/11 triggered one of the most comprehensive intervention missions to remove the Taliban de-facto government and hunt down members of Al Qaida in Afghanistan. While there was little doubt that the US government acted in self-defense, the international community was keenly aware that removing a de-facto government was not sufficient to prevent violence and human suffering to occur anew in the country (Johnson and Leslie 2004; Finlan 2014). Afghanistan had seen a period of over 20 years of war, which had started with the Soviet intervention in 1979 which, after the Geneva Accords of 1988, led to even worse infighting during the 1990s between the mujaheddin/warlords who had successfully fought and worn down the Soviet military. The death toll and human suffering, but also damage to infrastructure and social relations, during this time was arguably more devastating than communist rule.

Consequently, Afghanistan was viewed as a country without a state in 2001 (Noelle-Karimi et al. 2002). A sequenced plan was pushed for in international diplomacy which fed into the Petersberg Accords of 2001 which, after consultations with different Afghan groups, provided the “road map” to reconstruction of political rule. Reconciliation was meant to be one of the cornerstones of this envisioned process, while the institutions built during the process would mediate factional interests and mold national unity. The Accords envisioned several steps to establish “proper” Afghan state institutions: An emergency government was agreed on which ought to hold an “Emergency Loya Jirga,” a national assembly of elders and appointed representatives. This Loya Jirga was tasked with finding and defining the terms of an Interim Administration which, on the basis of a newly to be scripted constitution (agreed upon by another, “Constitutional” Loya Jirga to be held at a later stage), ought to be replaced by a regular government after national elections. Afghanistan in this process embodied the very notion of statebuilding – a state the legal notion of which did exist, thanks to the international system of states, but which had little to no practical institutional, administrative, or social relevance on its territory. As a result, far-fetched fantasies of building proper statehood from scratch dominated, and positive results seemed easily to be achieved (Kühn 2010).

While the political process was unfolding, the so-called War against Terror swept across Afghanistan. The fighting shaped the international involvement in a twofold way: on the one hand, the political process was contingent upon the military intervention, while the international engagement was trapped in the duality of delivering civilian political support and humanitarian aid to legitimize the anti-terrorist invasion (Suhrke 2016). The statebuilding effort was to be militarily supported by a Security Council-mandated mission called International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), initially limited to Kabul and tasked with assisting “the Afghan Interim Authority in the maintenance of security in Kabul and its surrounding areas, so that the Afghan Interim Authority as well as the personnel of the United Nations can operate in a secure environment” (UN SC Resolution 1386, S/RES/1386 (2001), 20 December).

ISAF’s mandate was prolonged by Security Council decisions, while the US-led Operation Enduring Freedom (OEF) remained outside of this legitimization procedure and continued to be waged as US “self-defense” (authorized by the UN Charter itself); eventually both missions were merged into a hybrid (stabilizing and war-waging) ISAF. ISAF was not a UN-mission but a multinational one mandated by the Security Council; the UN established the United Nations Assistance Mission Afghanistan (UNAMA). The process of establishing statehood after the toppling of the Taliban, as a result, was accompanied by the dynamics of military fighting and resistance. On a political level, statebuilding was hence always tainted by the impression held by many Afghans that the institutions built and the policies implemented existed mostly in service of external, namely US-interests. In this, statebuilding after 2001 resembled the intervention of the Soviets in support of the communist Afghan government two decades earlier. Over time, Afghan elites took over epistemic leadership and guided the intervention to mostly serve their particularistic interests rather than serve a majority of the people (Goodhand and Sedra 2013). While the internationally guided process took care to refer to earlier Afghan state institutions such as the Constitution of 1964, strained state-society relations which had characterized the establishment of an Afghan state in the international system were never fully taken into account. The next section will briefly sketch the cornerstones of Afghanistan’s history as a state and explain its problems permeating society. In the following, this will be connected to the problematic dynamics of statebuilding under military intervention until (and beyond) 2014.

A Brief History of the Afghan State

Afghanistan provides an illustrative example of state formation in colonial times. Shifting empires and local rule characterized what later was to become Afghanistan. Ahmad Shah Durrani, ending the Persian Saffawid dynasty, was still a military ruler but established a center of dependent tribes in the area of Kabul and Kandahar. British colonialism taking hold in what is now Pakistan forced Afghanistan to establish state rule as its Western neighbor. Because territoriality had been of minor importance earlier, no defined border existed at this time; to the day, for many, the border is of little social relevance. However, British interest in Afghanistan grew in the nineteenth century among rivalry with the expanding Russian empire. In what was called the “Great Game,” Russia was assumed to be aspiring to take over Afghanistan to gain access to the warm Indian Ocean. Incursions by the British to counter that and to preserve and expand its influence led to Anglo-Afghan wars (1839–1842 and 1878–1881).

While rulers’ control over Afghan populations was limited, external influences pressured Afghanistan into its territorial form. Its eastern frontier was dictated by the British at a time when Afghanistan was weak; consequently, the Durand line which demarcates the border is still contested. It was established shortly after the Second Anglo-Afghan War, and only intended to demarcate where respective spheres of influence began, not necessarily as an international border. Never fully colonized, Afghanistan gained full independence in 1919 ahead of many colonies, when the protectorate status ended with the Anglo-Afghan Treaty. While during these years Afghanistan had already been rent-dependent (collecting resources from outside rather than able to fund its spending through internal revenue, such as customs or taxes), the dependency on external financial support increased with attempts to establish state institutions.

State institutions in this period emulated those of other states but hardly replaced other modes of social regulation. Since full independence until the 1970s, Afghanistan followed a self-proclaimed neutrality principle which, during World War II and the subsequently ensuing Cold War, allowed to cooperate with different countries to attract funding. After a short democratic honeymoon in the 1960s, the economic situation deteriorated while ideological radicalization increased, mostly between Islamist and communist urban educated young people. Several attempted or successful coups d’état eventually brought to power a communist government, resistance against which became pronounced when a policy for land reform and for co-education were vehemently implemented (Dorransoro 2005).

As violence escalated, and at risk of losing their proxy partners, the Soviet politburo, consisting of an old elite detached from outside world developments, rather without proper evaluation of risks and benefits stumbled into an intervention to keep the communist government in place (Feifer 2009). While the violence employed by the Soviet military, and more so by their Afghan communist partners, was fierce, so was the resistance. It was only after 1985, after the resistance had already held out in dire circumstances without “proxy” support for several years, that US support in money and weapons channelled through Pakistan’s intelligence service increased massively. By the time, the Soviet leadership under Gorbachev had already concluded that the war was no longer worth fighting (Rubin 2002, p. 181). He still, upon coming to power, escalated by giving the Red Army free reign to wage war as they deemed necessary to turn their fortunes around; in turn, as the Red Army laid waste to large parts of the rural areas, the Soviets sought to find a diplomatic way out of their Afghan trap (Braithwaite 2011). Statebuilding the communists had pursued thus was able to improve the lives of many in the cities, mainly Kabul, inadvertently deepening the rift between educated urban elites and largely poor, often illiterate, rural traditional leaders.

The compromise Najibullah government held out remarkably long, based on its ability to allocate funding; once the funding disappeared following the demise of the Soviet Union – the SU disappeared as funder, while the US saw no further reason to fund their former allies – unity disappeared and infighting between mujaheddin factions broke out. The ensuing chaos, lawlessness, and human rights abuses are well remembered by most Afghans, and many welcomed the Taliban when they, from the mid-1990s onwards started establishing their violent order. By that time, most Soviet-built institutions had been plundered or literally shot to rubble. The Taliban governed locally, mostly against bandits controlling street checkpoints, and as they conquered checkpoint upon checkpoint, their ranks grew. Even when they controlled most of Afghanistan, their state was single-issue oriented: implementation of political decisions was limited to fatwas (religious decrees) oriented toward restoring the virtue lost during the civil war – and based on the Taliban’s particular interpretation of sharia which often contradicted Afghan traditional practice. Their law-and-order approach at the beginning brought them popular support, while their Islamist ideology only was enforced when they were established more solidly (Barfield 2010, p. 257). Beyond that, for example, in terms of economic development, education, or international relations, the Taliban demonstrated remarkably little political aspiration. Rather, they refused to become a proper government (and most likely lacked the skill to become one, had they wanted to be one) and remained diplomatically recognized only by their sponsors in Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United Arab Emirates.

When in 2001 the Western intervention began, the Taliban had been controlling most of the country except a few pockets of resistance in the North. The so-called Northern Alliance, new partners of CIA and the other intervention agencies, consisted of formerly infighting mujaheddin warlords and was born out of necessity against the Taliban’s success (Rashid 2010); it had, however, limited political vision or common ground to work from when taking power thanks to the opportunity created by the overwhelming force of the US military. In fact, intense and persistent, ethnically coded rivalry, over funds and ideological interpretation dated back to the period of the “unified” fight against the Soviets (Schetter 2003).

Statebuilding After 2001

Statebuilding continued after 2001, and the 1964 constitution was agreed to be valid until the Constitutional Loya Jirga would have agreed on a new one. However, given the devastation of the wars, no institutions were functional. This underscored the Western impression that no state existed and that Afghanistan was blank slate where state function had to be introduced and built from zero. Hence, statebuilding efforts became heavily foreign-dictated and funded, and followed scripts derived from Western state experience. There was, however, deep understanding in Afghanistan of how institutions of the state worked, particularly those providing services to the population. At the same time, keeping the centralized state at bay, to keep local and regional autonomy, was the main balancing game Afghan politics continued to engage in. During Soviet times, negotiating social benefits had been used to win over the urban classes in particular; during the civil war, however, other societal institutions had evolved, which continued to shape people’s lives while being overlooked by the interveners (Kühn 2011a, 64–65). Thus, modern state institutions came to compete with local, often “traditional” ways of organizing social life (albeit in many cases invented out of necessity during the violent periods). In fact, the Western can-do approach of social engineering aimed at replacing these institutions, undermining their legitimacy and functionality, or simply criminalizing them as “terrorist” (Bliesemann de Guevara 2012).

Western statebuilding, in its modernizing impetus, at the same time did not fall very short of the communist’s enforced re-education. Despite paying lip service to Islamic principles, the heavy-handed US-led restructuring of Afghan politics was suspected to be against Islam and of attempting to unroot Afghan cultural values, triggering the same instincts for resistance that the Soviets had encountered two decades earlier. What was narrated as a war of liberation for civil society, and particularly, women, from Taliban extremist rule to Western audiences, resulted in an easy win for religious elites whose (often hypocritical) claim to embody Islamic and Afghan values allowed them to remain very influential as conservative keepers of true faith and its interpretation. Simultaneously, “development [was] used as an incentive to acquiesce to ruptures in the social, political, cultural and religious life” (Kühn 2011a, 65). Statebuilding, which the US-government of George W. Bush never wanted to get engaged in the first place, thus gradually replaced the security mission to oust Taliban and Al Qaida remnants and prevent their return to “ungoverned spaces.” The shift to institutions, with money coming in to buy over Afghan clients, allowed corruption to grow.

Politics, however, became increasingly militarized. The Afghan government under the leadership of Hamid Karzai, portrayed as an American stooge by his Taliban enemies, despite its dependence on US military support, persistently claimed that it should not be kept in the dark about military objectives and lamented civilian victims, night raids to suspects’ homes, and a general perception of being sidelined. As a consequence, it countered talks with the Taliban with a narrative of an international, particularly US-Pakistani, conspiracy to undermine Afghanistan’s sovereignty. Barack Obama’s attempt to end the war was increasingly hampered by his military’s advice not to leave without a decisive victory and a peace deal. The military mission aimed at creating a situation it could be claimed to have won the war; this led to increasing tensions over the interpretation of what was going on. General Stanley McChrystal, one of the staunchest advocates of Counter-Insurgency (COIN), who once was able to lure Obama into increasing the mission deploying additional 30,000 troops, was forced to resign from his position (and shortly thereafter from the military) in an attempt to restore civilian oversight and political authority over the military. McChrystal and his inner circle had mocked and called into question the authority and expertise of a number of Obama’s top-diplomats, as reported in a Rolling Stone article (Hastings 2010).

The COIN doctrine represents the militarization of statebuilding. Presenting it as desirable solution was an acknowledgement that there was no political process to begin with. The steps of the Bonn Agreement had been taken, but the limited idea of merely backing up the political process was long gone. With US interest moving to Iraq shortly after the invasion of Afghanistan, there was for too long a time next to no political engagement with the opponents of the political reconstruction efforts, no peace process to speak of. The Taliban and other insurgent groups had regrouped in Pakistan with the help of military intelligence (Shahzad 2011), and by the time they had re-emerged as a violent force and certainly a political voice (with many affiliated candidates in parliament and other public office); they spoke for a number of disenfranchised Afghans who saw a lot of money pouring into the country but little effect in terms of development and economic upswing. Rather, old elites known to have been ruthlessly pushing for their version of Islamicized tribal politics during the civil war were now in influential positions guarded by their Western backers – and amply funded through their statebuilding efforts. COIN did not change that: in an attempt to win over “hearts and minds,” the Western intervention poured even more money into Afghanistan, creating plenty of opportunities for bribery and embezzlement. These opportunities were widely used, by Afghans and internationals alike, to siphon off funds for private gain.

COIN was a last-ditch attempt at “turning around” what had been going wrong with regard to building a politically institutionalized, liberal state in Afghanistan. While institutions were established and services (partly) delivered, the classical features of stateness (Nettl 1968) such as control of the territory, monopolization of the means of violence, and setting of unitary rules continued to be only partly in place. This is not to say that institutions did not exist and that politics did not take place: in fact, many social, political, and economic exchanges took place for many years outside state structures and in informal ways adaptive to ruptures caused by outbreaks of violence, sudden shifts in alliances, or economic opportunities. Barack Obama, already reluctant to invest in the project “Afghanistan” as it was seen in Washington’s policy circles, decided to pull out when COIN showed not to be improving the military situation. The decision recognized that the Afghan state was a while away from being established sufficiently to hold the ground that COIN had tried to create. NATO, in turn, relieved of its longest and politically damaging mission, decided to continue training of security forces following 2014 but to otherwise officially adopt a very low profile – a position officially unrecognized but rather realistic even during the period NATO was formally in command of ISAF. In the meanwhile, intensifying violence influenced the detachment of humanitarian and development aid from most people, letting it appear as elitist and exclusive (Andersson and Weigand 2015). The next section will analyze the reasons why the intervention did not achieve its (changing) aims and systematically argue why the statebuilding endeavor in Afghanistan was unrelated to building peace from the beginning.

Problems and Pitfalls of the Statebuilding Project

The problems and pitfalls of the Western intervention's policy in Afghanistan after 2001 are many. Some blame lack of military engagement, as troops were sent to Iraq (a war of choice) instead of increasing their number right away in Afghanistan. Others have blamed lack of coordination of the civilian activities, leading to inefficient use of funds and project-based thinking rather than full economic recovery and associated benefits for the population. Neighboring countries' meddling, clan and nepotist practices, misogynist and minority-discriminating norms, decreasing interest of international politics and diplomacy over the period of intervention, as well as unequal distribution of social and economic capital, among others, have been blamed for the "failures." All play their part, but the main reasons for intervention inertia circle around the order(s) of violence, state finance, and legitimacy (see Bliesemann de Guevara and Kühn 2010). These will be described in turn.

Orders of Violence

When the intervention began, with few troops on the ground and overwhelming air (bombing) power, the Taliban left Afghanistan and seemingly disappeared. The weak and diminished troops of regional commanders, who as "Northern Alliance" suddenly came to be the USA's allies, took their place. While for the Western intervention they were useful aides in pursuing remnants of Taliban and al Qaida, they were well known to the population for their grave human rights violations, banditry, and disregard for the suffering their sectarian fighting caused. However, they not only came to control their respective regions, officially representing the state. Their military clout and local knowledge along with their ability to play the tune of the US military also allowed them to direct their US partners to fight or eliminate contenders. Hence, in the first phase of the intervention, they established predominance and henceforth showed little inclination to let go of the military means and associated political influence. (In a similar process, drug dealers aligned with the opponents of the statebuilding project were targeted and systematically fought out of business while those with ties to the government and holding strategic value for the interveners could escape such pressures. As a result, the number of big mid-level traders diminished by two-thirds, down to about a dozen from just under 40 (Interview, UNODC official, Kabul 2006; Kühn 2011b).)

As the Bonn Process unfolded, they were able to turn their military dominance into political positions. This guaranteed that they were never truly bothered to disarm or integrate in the Afghan National Army and be controlled by the government. Rather, many turned the state into their own asset, establishing firm networks of international (ized) clientelism (Hönke 2018). The Taliban, and other "insurgents" – as had been the case for most of Afghanistan's modern history – tried to fight these forces for shares of (local/regional) control or to force their way into political positions from which they would be able to further their economic and ideological interests. This locally inspired fighting was overshadowed by the zealous Global War on Terror doctrine, which falsely identified anyone involved in fighting as genuine Taliban or al-Qaida member (Strick van Linschoten and Kuehn 2012). The violence employed in service of global "security" often contradicted the interests of the Afghan government; its own security policy was, simultaneously, fragmented and regionally diverse depending which local military strongmen controlled an area. Interlacing dynamics of violence, from the very local fight for control and resources to the global scope of deterring supporters of “terrorism” in the West, prevented the state from developing a security identity. As a result, many in Afghanistan’s population view the security forces as a personal threat rather than an institution to turn to for protection (Sedra 2013). In effect, the order of violence in Afghanistan still lacks a dominant space for the state, as “pragmatic” security choices prevented establishing a recognizable and legal-based security regime in which non-state or external violent actors would become seen as deviation from the standard.

State Finance

One reason for the fragmented security landscape continues to be the way the Afghan state is financed. Unlike a taxation state, where citizens by paying their share of what is to be spent, acquire a say in how the funds are allocated, a rentier state like Afghanistan fails to develop close ties between tax-paying voters and decision makers. Afghanistan as a rentier state, financed mainly by foreign funding for military but also the state’s budget, became the source of funding for citizens rather than a collector of taxes (Kühn 2008). In search of jobs and absent alternative options, getting into state positions became attractive for the educated urban middle-class. Over the years of the intervention a lucrative, and often externally sponsored economy of training, courses and certificates developed, of course without being able to fill the lack of motivated and well-educated administrators and entrepreneurs required to relaunch Afghanistan’s economy beyond narcotics.

Another factor was that positions came to be traded. Those in charge of appointing ministry and other administrative positions would either stick to their own kin or appoint the highest bidder with the best connections, bypassing candidates with merits. As a result, political connections were strengthened vertically as lower ranks were connected to influential decision makers higher up in a clientelist network, who in turn often invested heavily in good relations with external donors. Horizontal cooperation or even dissemination of important information between institutions remained scarce. This in turn strengthened the center, by elevating the position of the already over-centralized political influence of the president; needless to say that having even questions of minor importance decreed by the president did not add to efficiency or decisions’ wisdom (Kühn 2010, 317–318).

Counterintuitively, the Afghan government became more independent the longer the intervention lasted. While most state activity was funded externally, the leverage of donors over political decisions was increasingly limited. This included external control of Rule of Law (RoL) programs, which formulated grandiose reform targets, only to never adhere to them. Because of (fears of) corruption, many projects bypassed state channels anyway, while the state’s institutions could pick-and-choose from several donors. Afghan institutions, with a long legacy of organizing rentier income, were able to play their Western (and other) protectors against each other. Political pressure to spend allocated money in the donor countries as well as the potent argument that, should funding cease to flow, terrorists would regroup in Afghanistan, proved sufficient to keep the cash flowing (Bliesemann de Guevara and Kühn 2013). At the time of writing, funding for Afghanistan’s security apparatus, according to conventional wisdom the only remedy to keep terrorists and Taliban at bay, continues to flow.

Legitimacy

Because Afghanistan’s security and political landscape was so fragmented when the statebuilding path was drafted, a heavily centralized state was envisioned with a strong president at its center. The parliament has a constitutionally weak place. This misbalance of power proved to be a serious burden of state politics, particularly as elections were largely irregular and, in many parts of the country, outright rigged. While in Western donor capitals the democratic façade was deemed more important than contesting the election results, over time the legitimacy of the Afghan government suffered even in the eyes of its most faithful supporters. At the same time, the intervention was ill-equipped to initiate, nourish, and navigate a peace process which, as the emphasis on Afghan sovereignty dictated, was contingent upon Afghan decisions and leadership (Semple 2009).

With its procedural legitimacy on the weaker end of the spectrum, output legitimacy remained even lower. Many externally funded development, education or humanitarian projects, bypassing state structures, did little to strengthen a positive vision of state activity for the population. Orienting people's expectations for services towards international organization, foundations or trust funds as well as towards traditional problem-solvers such as strongmen who would act as a remedy for unexpected emergencies, diluted political engagement as well as orientation towards the state to concentrate its services on the population. That poverty was not reduced visibly and that the risks of life were not mitigated better over time was blamed on the dire security situation and, tautologically, on levels of poverty.

The ideological aspect of legitimacy, that a government is accepted at all and as representing the country rather than foreign interests remains of course the sore spot of the Afghan government. As the Taliban were not part of the negotiations in Bonn which led to the process of sequenced installation of government institutions, they were continuously opposed to anything that might look like recognizing the government. In places where traditional forces were influential, among others the Taliban, the Western-tainted central government's legitimacy was always hardly noticeable. The intervention, which focused predominantly on legitimacy such as UN Security Council mandates, was unable to influence the structures which decisively shape how legitimacy is perceived (Barfield 2010). The Western intervention's discourse about legitimacy was largely directed at an audience in the intervening countries, while the intervened were – if at all – relegated to secondary relevance. The agreement between the US government and the Taliban, which essentially recognizes the latter as the military and political force it is, seems not to have altered that situation: predominantly Western interests were guiding the negotiations, while it remains to be seen if a 'peace process' of sorts could be developed between Taliban and the government, involving and honouring the interests of the population.

Summary

The intervention, obsessed with Western security, did nothing to achieve peace in Afghanistan. Existing long-standing conflictual fault lines which were suppressed by the Taliban came to the open with full force during the intervention while little was done to address them. The new rulers, former mujaheddin fighters, were divided and politically unexperienced, and kept their distance to the "state," true to their rentier socialization. The state was seen as a source of income which needed to be kept weak in case it should one day be controlled by a competing faction. The divisions between poor, uneducated, and deeply religious countryside on one, and urban, partly westernized, and affluent strata of society on the other hand have become more pronounced. Sectarian and ideological rifts have become deeper, as the distinctions between followers of the faith and infidels sturdily prevent political dialogue. Likewise, ethnic boundaries, hypostasized and essentialized, are reinforced by the clientelist networks, being part of which decides over access to economic opportunities and political power. Instead of creating an environment in which politics as an exchange of conflicting views and eventual settlement could take place, politics was reduced to exclusionary elite pacts attracting massive resentment (Zyck 2012). The violence employed by the intervention continues to undermine claims to the moral and functional superiority of the liberal system of the interveners, ostensibly fitted to honor individual and human rights, to empower citizens politically and, as a result, to create wealth and distribute it fairly. As it looks, the USA's eagerness to leave Afghanistan seems to have given up on many of the institutional gains made during the statebuilding years (Kühn 2019). Thus, positive peace has not materialized and conditions for its belated coming are being squandered. But neither has negative peace been supported which would allow to settle conflicts without the use or threat of violence.

References

- Andersson, R., & Weigand, F. (2015). Intervention at risk: The vicious cycle of distance and danger in Mali and Afghanistan. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 9(4), 519–541. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2015.1054655>.
- Barfield, T. (2010). Afghanistan. A cultural and political history. Princeton/Oxford: Princeton University Press.
- Braithwaite, R. (2011). Afgantsy. The Russians in Afghanistan 1979–89. London: Profile.
- Bliesemann de Guevara, B. (2012). Introduction. Statebuilding and state-formation. In B. Bliesemann de Guevara (Ed.), Statebuilding and state formation. The political sociology of intervention (pp. 1–19). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Kühn, F. P. (2010). Illusion statebuilding. Warum der westliche Staat so schwer zu exportieren ist. Hamburg: edition Körberstiftung.
- Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Kühn, F. P. (2013). The political economy of statebuilding: Rents, taxes, and perpetual dependency. In D. Chandler & T. D. Sisk (Eds.), International statebuilding: Concepts, themes and practices – A Routledge handbook (pp. 219–230). London: Routledge.
- Dorronsoro, G. (2005). Revolution unending. Afghanistan: 1979 to the present. London: Hurst.
- Feifer, G. (2009). The great gamble. The Soviet war in Afghanistan. New York: Harper Collins.
- Finlan, A. (2014). Contemporary military strategy and the global war on terror: US and UK armed forces in Afghanistan and Iraq 2001–2012. New York: Bloomsbury.
- Goodhand, J., & Sedra, M. (2013). Rethinking liberal peacebuilding, statebuilding and transition in Afghanistan: An introduction. Central Asian Survey, 32(3), 239–254. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02634937.2013.850769>.
- Hastings, M. (2010). The Runaway general. Rolling Stone Magazine, July 10, 2010. Available at: <https://www.rollingstone.com/politics/politics-news/the-runaway-general-the-profile-that-brought-down-mcchrysal-192609/>. Accessed 29 Oct 2019.
- Hönke, J. (2018). Transnational clientelism, global (resource) governance, and the disciplining of dissent. International Political Sociology, 12, 109–124. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ips/oly007>.
- Johnson, C., & Leslie, J. (2004). Afghanistan. The mirage of peace. London/New York: Zed Books.
- Kühn, F. P. (2008). Aid, opium and the state of rents in Afghanistan: Competition, cooperation, or cohabitation? Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 2(3), 309–327.
- Kühn, F. P. (2010). Sicherheit und Entwicklung in der Weltgesellschaft. Liberales Paradigma und Statebuilding in Afghanistan. Wiesbaden: VS.
- Kühn, F. P. (2011a). Less is more: International intervention and the limits of external stabilization. Canadian Foreign Policy Journal, 17(1), 62–74. <https://doi.org/10.1080/11926422.2011.559107>.
- Kühn, F. P. (2011b). Deutschlands (Nicht-)Drogenpolitik in Afghanistan. Zeitschrift für Außen- und Sicherheitspolitik, 4(S1), 115–129. <https://doi.org/10.1007/s12399-011-0208-5>.
- Kühn, F. P. (2019). Normative scaling and crisis knowledge: The problematic use of selective analogies to compare conflicts. Civil Wars, 21(4), 1–25. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2019.1654326>.
- Nettl, J. P. (1968). The state as a conceptual variable. World Politics, 20(4), 559–592.
- Noelle-Karimi, C., Schetter, C., & Schlagintweit, R. (Eds.). (2002). Afghanistan – A country without a state? Frankfurt am Main/London: IKO Verlag.
- Rashid, A. (2010). Taliban. The power of militant Islam in Afghanistan and beyond. London: I.B. Tauris.
- Rubin, B. R. (2002). The fragmentation of Afghanistan. State formation and collapse in the international system. New Haven/London: Yale University Press.
- Schetter, C. (2003). Ethnizität und ethnische Konflikte in Afghanistan. Berlin: Dietrich Reimer.
- Sedra, M. (2013). The hollowing-out of the liberal peace project in Afghanistan: The case of security sector reform. Central Asian Survey, 32(3), 371–387. <https://doi.org/10.1080/02634937.2013.843387>.
- Semple, M. (2009). Reconciliation in Afghanistan. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Shahzad, S. S. (2011). Inside Al-Qaeda and the Taliban. Beyond Bin Laden and 9/11. London: Pluto.
- Strick van Linschoten, A., & Kuehn, F. (2012). An enemy we created. The myth of the Taliban-Al Qaeda Merger in Afghanistan, 1970–2010. London: Hurst.
- Suhrke, A. (2016). Waging war and building peace in Afghanistan. In M. Turner & F. P. Kühn (Eds.), The politics of international intervention. The tyranny of peace (pp. 161–178). London: Routledge.
- Zyck, S. A. (2012). How to lose allies and finance your enemies: The economisation of conflict termination in Afghanistan. Conflict, Security and Development, 12(3), 249–271. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14678802.2012.703534>.

Statehood Conflict

► Kashmir Conflict, The

Statehood Conflicts

George Kyris
University of Birmingham, Birmingham, UK

Synonyms

Conflicts of de facto states; Conflicts of unrecognized states; Secessionist conflicts; Separatist conflicts; Sovereignty conflicts; Territorial conflicts

Definition/Description

Statehood conflicts are those emanating from incompatible claims to and substantial efforts at statehood over the same territory. The main parts to the conflict are the different claimants to statehood, often but not always a recognized state and a group that is seeking secession from it. A variety of other regional or global actors, like states or international organizations, are also involved to a greater or lesser degree. While often defined by intractability, typical solutions of such conflicts include forceful or peaceful (re)integration to the state from which secession is attempted or, more rarely, independent statehood.

Introduction

The process of state creation lies at the heart of the modern international system. It is also most often a violent process with secession, the default way in which new states emerge, being responsible for some of the world's most complex conflicts and great human and material cost. This entry reflects on statehood conflicts, i.e., conflicts between different actors who pursue statehood over the same territory – as they happen, these are mostly secessionist conflicts but, as explained later, not only. Rather than a probably impossible holistic account of the topic, this entry instead elaborates on some of the main statehood issues at the heart of these disputes, namely, control over territory and population (internal statehood) and international recognition (external statehood) – this is done after the next section on definitional issues of the phenomenon. Finally, a series of ideas for further avenues for researching statehood conflicts are highlighted, including more research into variations of both internal and external aspects to statehood and their relation to conflict, a more nuanced understanding of so-called patron actors of state-seeking groups, studies more inclusive of historical cases, and a greater reflection on methodological challenges of researching statehood conflict.

Secession and Conflict over Statehood

Secession, the process of withdrawing a territory and population from a state in order to establish an independent state in the same area (e.g., Pavković and Radan 2011, 2), has often been the source of conflict, mostly in cases where this process is not agreed by the parent state from which withdrawal is attempted (often known as unilateral secession, see also Pavković 2020). Such conflicts are at the very heart of international relations because they relate to secession – the default way in which states are born. The focus of this entry on “statehood” suggests a rather sustained effort at building a state, which is not the case with all secessionist movements, and also highlights issues of statehood that are at the very heart of these conflicts. As such, statehood conflicts are different to interstate conflicts in that they relate to attempts at independent statehood, rather than a conflict between two recognized and independent states.

The main actors involved in these conflicts are the different claimants to statehood, and these are usually two: on the one hand stands the parent state or more rarely referred to as metropolitan state (e.g., Berg and Toomla 2009) or metropolis (Griffiths 2016) and on the other hand stands the group that seeks statehood. There are, however, instances in which conflict occurs between a group that seeks statehood and a claimant to the same territories that cannot be seen as a parent state facing a secession challenge from this group.

These are often conflicts that have emerged during decolonization. While some scholars distinguish these instances from secession (Ker-Lindsay 2012), there are broader definitions that treat, as Dugard puts it (2013, 154), “decolonization as a species of secession” (e.g., Coggins 2014). Crucially, however, the definition of statehood conflict proposed here does not seek to include conflicts between the colonizers and the colonized, which are considered as substantially different. Rather, it mostly concerns cases where the process of decolonization has given birth to conflicts between two different statehood claimants to the territory previously held by a colonizer (Fig. 1). For example, although the Palestinian struggle for self-determination was first waged against the Ottomans and the British, the more recent statehood conflict Palestinians are engaged in is with Israel. As a result, in some of these cases, sides to the conflict are often seen as occupiers to the territory, such as Israel in the conflict with Palestine or Indonesia in the case of East Timor. In this spirit, Fernández-Molina (2020) offers a useful categorization that groups parent and what she calls “annexing” states together.

Examples

decolonization Israel and Palestine, Timor-Leste

Secession Nagorno Karabakh, Serbia Krajina

Statehood Conflicts, Fig. 1 Statehood conflicts

Here, therefore, the term “statehood conflicts” allows us to bridge terminological disagreements, for example, the aforementioned disagreement between those who see decolonization-related cases as secession and those that don’t (see also Fig. 1): while cases of decolonization are hereby treated as substantially different, it is recognized that there are some former colonial territories that host or have hosted statehood conflicts, along the lines this entry defines them.

What is more, there exist conflicts where the statehood claimants are more than two and/or no part to the conflict neatly fits definitions of a parent state. For example, the early phase of the conflict in Western Sahara involved the Polisario Front, Morocco, and Mauritania claiming the territories and none of them can be seen as a parent state facing a secession challenge. Finally, these conflicts are rarely local only. They involve a variety of regional and international actors – take, for example, the conflict in Eastern Ukraine which involves the unrecognized states of Donetsk and Luhansk and the Ukrainian government locally, Russia and the European Union (EU) more regionally, and the USA and NATO more internationally (for a discussion of local, regional, and international levels of conflict, see Cordell and Wolff 2009).

The international involvement in those types of conflicts is covered elsewhere (see chapter ▶ “International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts”), but here attention must be paid on a specific, usually regional, actor involved extensively on the ground and often consider as a part to the dispute, what has been mostly called a “patron state” (for examples, see Table 1, and for a listing of cases, see Geldenhuys 2009). This is an actor that “patronizes” aspiring states, and especially their governance, in many different ways and degrees, including financial, economic, political, and/or military assistance. Time and

Statehood Conflicts, Table 1 Actors in statehood conflicts

| Statehood claimants | Patrons |
|--|----------------------------|
| Polisario Front, Morocco, Mauritania (until 1979) | Algeria to Polisario Front |
| Cyprus (parent state), TRNC | Turkey to TRNC |

again, unrecognized states might also seek further integration, even annexation, with this state too (see also later). Heraclides (1991, 48) offers an early account of patrons in secessionist movements and talks of tangible support in material terms (various forms of aid, including transactional involvement, humanitarian, military and nonmilitary involvement) and political-diplomatic or moral support (e.g., support of peace talks, recognition of a right to self-determination and to statehood). Though concerned with postcolonial states rather than secessionists, Sorensen (1999, 601) has also reflected on how the lack of substantial sovereignty might bring reliance on the international community for performing certain state tasks, such as protection from intervention. More recently, the discussion on patrons has mostly focused on the role of Russia in statehood conflicts of the post-Soviet space (Bakke et al. 2018; Ganohariti 2020; Gerrits and Bader 2017), but other examples include Turkey, which plays an important role in the unrecognized state of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC, e.g. Dayioğlu et al. 2019), Algeria or Armenia for the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR), and Nagorno Karabakh, respectively, while Kolstø (2006) argues for a similar understanding of the US role vis a vis Taiwan. In historical cases, Heraclides (1991) sees Belgium as a patron to Katanga and France toward Biafra, while China has also been seen as a patron to East Timor (Southgate 2019).

Unpacking the Concept of Statehood Conflicts

The main conceptual blocks here are conflict and statehood. By conflict here is meant the pursuit of incompatible aims by different actors (see, e.g., Cordell and Wolff 2009, 4) whereby the aim is statehood over the same territory, clearly illustrated in the words of PM, Ben Gurion: “We and they (Arabs) want the same thing. we both want Palestine” (Teveth in Dowty 2017, 77). In this regard, these conflicts relate to wishes to control territory via establishing statehood, the typical way in which people organize their societies in the modern era. Such conflicts include those displaying ongoing war or violence but also those where disagreement persists despite a general lack of hostilities – these have often been referred to as “frozen conflicts” (e.g., Lynch 2005; Bebler 2015; Dembinska and Campana 2017). In terms of statehood, this will be discussed with regard to two tenants of the concept that are the heart of these conflicts: the ability to control and govern a territory with a population (schematically referred to here as internal statehood) and the recognition of this as statehood by international actors (external statehood).

Indicative of the importance of these two tenants of statehood is that a growing number of researchers focus on conflicts that relate to sustained efforts at building states (internal statehood) despite their lack of recognition (external statehood). Works on this type of entities have steadily increased, looking at a range of different issues, including overviews of the phenomenon (e.g., Pegg 1998; Kolstø 2006; Geldenhuys 2009; Caspersen 2012; Florea 2017), the impact of those entities on the conflict (King 2001) and how these conflicts are accommodated or not in the international system (Anderson 2011), the way in which international actors have reacted to these entities (e.g., Pegg 1998; Lynch 2004; Newman and Visoka 2018), and their internal dynamics (e.g., Ó Beacháin et al. 2016; Berg and Mölder 2012; Kolstø and Blakkisrud 2008), also with reference to democratization (e.g., Caspersen 2011; Voller 2013).

Different concepts have been proposed to discuss this phenomenon. Recently “de facto states” is gaining popularity as a term to define entities that look like states but which do not enjoy international recognition (e.g., Ker-Lindsay and Berg 2018). The term “de facto states” implies the presence of effective government and territorial control and statehood as an achieved reality. More recent terms such as “emerging states” (Visoka 2019) or “territorial contenders” (Lemke and Crabtree 2019) follow a similar logic. And yet, many of these works also discuss cases such as SADR or Palestine whose de facto statehood might be questioned, because of their incomplete control over the territories they claim and/or institutional development. This might be a testament to the fact that studying these cases alongside others with more developed internal statehood allows us to make interesting comparisons, not least observe a variation in the extent to which state builders are successful in attaining territorial control and governance. It is probably in this spirit that Caspersen (2017) recommends looking at de facto states as part of a broader spectrum of rebel governance as suggested by Arjona (2016).

Variation can also be seen in external statehood, i.e., the recognition of the claims to independence, and this has not been problematized as much either. Literature tends to concentrate on the binary of recognized vs. unrecognized states. This might be a result of the fact that the majority of independence efforts are either recognized or completely unrecognized/only minimally recognized. And yet, there are a few examples that are recognized by a minority of United Nations (UN) members (e.g., SADR, Taiwan, Abkhazia) or a small or a big majority (Kosovo and Palestine, respectively).

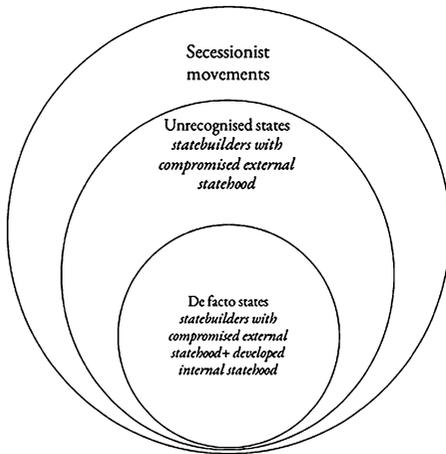

Such variations relate to both sides of the conflict, since statehood is a zero-sum game. An increase in controlling territory from one side only happens at the expense of the other's side control, given that there can be no two supreme rulers over an area (for a recent example study of the complexity of de facto sovereignty in contested areas, see Knotter 2018). Bartelson (2014, 38), in fact, suggests that this indivisibility of sovereignty makes conflicts intractable. This also applies to external dimensions of statehood, since there can be no recognition of two different states over the same territory (rare examples of attempts at dual recognition include France in the 1960s and South Africa in the nineties that tried to recognize Taiwan alongside China but abandoned once the latter raised opposition). This can be very clearly illustrated in cases where there is some degree of recognition in each side – for example, the states that recognize Taiwan do not recognize China's sovereignty over the island, and, indeed, there are quite a few cases of switching recognition from one side of the conflict to the other also in other cases (e.g., Serbia and Kosovo) – this relates to the phenomenon of derecognition (see, e.g., Visoka 2020).

In this regard, there are many dilemmas a researcher is confronted with. For example, how much territorial control and/or state capacity is enough in order to define an entity as a state? How severe the lack of recognition should be for approaching a case as an unrecognized state? The best way to solve such conceptual issues depends a lot on the questions at the microscope of the given study program. In order to help with some of the dilemmas just outlined and to account for and better understanding of variation in statehood and its relevance to conflict, perhaps a constructive way is to think of sub-/categories. In this way, unrecognized states can be seen as a sub-category of secessionist movements united in their effort at (rather than the achievement/presence of) statehood and their lack of general recognition, which allows to account for variation both in terms of internal and external statehood. It follows from that that de facto states can be a further subcategory of unrecognized states where internal statehood is rather developed (see also Fig. 2).

Birth and Death of Conflict

There is a tendency to view statehood conflicts as a result of these acts by the state-seeking group. However, looking at statehood conflicts as emanating from disagreements over statehood (rather than specifically the effort of a side to pursue statehood) captures better the complexity of the phenomenon. Indeed, the relationship between actions of secessionists and the parent state is far less linear than it might seem. For example, a few secession attempts can be seen or have been framed as an attempt to curtail the power of that group by what was to become the parent state. For example, the effort of the Greek Cypriots to modify the constitution and the power-sharing arrangements with consequences for the rights of the Turkish Cypriots in the bicomunal state led to conflict during the sixties and the start of the gradual territorial and administrative division of the two groups, which culminated in the declaration of a separate state by the Turkish Cypriots in 1975 and again in 1983. The failure of the Sri Lanka government to implement power-sharing

Examples

| | |
|------------------------------|----------------------------------|
| Secessionist movement | Kashmir |
| Unrecognised state | Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic |
| De Facto State | Abkhazia |

Statehood Conflicts, Fig. 2 Efforts at secession and statehood

arrangements that catered for the Tamils also harbored the secessionist movement in the island. In this context, the switch to independence aspirations can also be seen as a process of radicalization of the conflict, whereby calls to statehood and recognition are a way for a group to make a clear mark of their grievances – this is in line with views of sovereignty as an expression of identity, a way to say “here we are” (Wallenstein 2014, 45). In Transnistria as well as elsewhere, the dissolution of the former Soviet Union alarmed certain groups for their place in the new state of affairs and became a main narrative for their unilateral declaration of independence later. This also highlights how claims to statehood, including those that remain unrecognized, emerge more frequently during political transitions (e.g., decolonization, dissolution of Soviet Union or of Yugoslavia). During such political transformations, the phenomenon of “recursive secession” (Pavkovic 2000) can also be observed, i.e., secession from a state that is itself in the process of seceding – it is along these lines that Bahceli et al. (2004, 21) talk of ‘matryoshka dolls’ to discuss secessions efforts within the states that came out of the dissolution of the Soviet Union, like with Abkhazia (for more see chapter ▶ “Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict”) and South Ossetia in Georgia or Transnistria in Moldova. In some cases, secession did not occur immediately during the transition but was a more gradual process (e.g., Palestine) or came years after, as a result of dissatisfaction with the state of affairs that replaced the previous political order (e.g., Cyprus, Somaliland, Donetsk, and Lugansk). In a way, therefore, the curtailing of internal self-determination for minority groups can sometimes be seen as fostering claims for external self-determination, and this also relates to remedial secession (e.g., Seymour 2007), i.e., secession justified in the name of injustices inflicted upon the group that seeks independent statehood.

Statehood conflicts rarely result in the secessionists becoming a recognized state, and, instead, most unrecognized states die. Often this can be seen as a result of the fact that the international community follows the parent state in not recognizing secession (e.g., Griffiths 2016). This might also relate to the fact that the act of unilateral secession is seen as undermining central principles of international relations, notably the respect of sovereignty and territorial integrity. In the words of the UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros Ghali: “If every ethnic, religious or linguistic group claimed statehood, there will be no limit to fragmentation, and peace, security and economic well-being for all would become even more difficult to achieve.” More instrumental reasons for states or other international actors to oppose unilateral secession are the fear of setting a precedent. For example, Visoka (2019) documents a large number of states that do not recognize Kosovo facing secession challenges in their territories.

If not independent statehood, then what? Anderson (2011) identifies a few other outcomes to the conflict: reintegration into the parent state, via force or peacefully through a negotiated agreement, or both (see also Csergo et al. 2017). However, there are two more possibilities less explored in the literature (see also Table 1): one is that unrecognized states are somehow re-incarnated – one can read this way the fact that Kosovo (declared in 2008) replaced the Republic of Kosova (1991). Eritrea’s lifetime as an unrecognized state can also be divided into a first iteration of the independence effort until 1991 and a second one after the agreement between the Ethiopian People’s Revolutionary Democratic Front and the Eritrean People’s Liberation Front for a referendum on independence, which commenced a short period of internationally supported efforts at independence which were completed when in 1993 it was fully recognized as an independent state. Finally, there are rare cases where secession has resulted into integration to a third state, e.g., the 2014 secession of Crimea from Ukraine to join Russia (see also Wydra 2014) (Table 2).

Such different outcomes are sometimes reflected in strategies of secessionists, and there are also cases in which seeking statehood might be an intermediate step toward a different objective. For example, Heraclides (1991) refers to “secessionist-merger” movements, whose ultimate aim is to integrate with a different state. Contemporary examples that might be relevant here are Nagorno Karabakh and South Ossetia, where union with Armenia and Russia, respectively, has been from time to time a popular option (see, e.g., Bakke et al. 2018). Historical cases also exist: Anjouan contemplated joining France; the 1991 declaration of independence of the Republic of Kosova was accompanied by a political declaration that listed unification with Albania alongside secession as potential options (Prifti 1999, 205). Interestingly, there are also instances in which secessionism might be, or portrayed as, a step toward a peaceful resolution of the dispute under a different arrangement. A typical example here is the TRNC. When Turkish Cypriots declared themselves independent first in 1975 and then in 1983, they argued that by establishing a separate state they facilitate a resolution based on a federation between this newly declared state and a Greek Cypriot state – tellingly, the name of the 1975 state was Turkish Federate (my emphasis) Republic of Cyprus, and the second declaration in 1983 noted that

The proclamation of the Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus will not hinder but facilitate the re-establishment of the partnership between the two Peoples within a federal framework and will also facilitate the settlement of the problems between them.

Where Next for the Study of Statehood Conflicts

This last part of the contribution will summarize some of the themes presented so far and suggest some areas that merit further attention from the research community. The first point to highlight is that central elements to statehood, and particularly the ability to govern territories and state recognition, might be better understood as spectrums. In order to do so, it might be better to look at statehood as an objective and/or a process rather than just an outcome, which, among else, will allow us to study aspiring states beyond those that have achieved de facto statehood – rebel governance is rightly seen as a neighboring literature that scholars of statehood conflicts should engage with because it allows to capture different degrees of internal statehood. Furthermore, research will benefit by a greater discussion of the variation in state recognition, which was discussed earlier. Looking at both internal and external statehood as spectrums allows us to appreciate its non-static character too. State-building is often discussed as a process, testifying to its dynamic nature, but there is more room to explore changes in external dimensions of statehood and state recognition, for example, cases like Taiwan or SADR in Western

Statehood Conflicts, Table 2 Statehood conflict outcomes

| Outcome | Example |
|------------------------------------|--------------------|
| Recognized statehood | Timor-Leste (2003) |
| Reintegration | |
| Peaceful | Gaugazia (1994) |
| Forceful | Katanga (1963) |
| Integration with a third state | Crimea (2014) |
| Reincarnation of statehood efforts | Kosovo (2008) |

Sahara have seen great fluctuation in their recognition. Tracing these changes over time also encourages us to historicize and contextualize the way in which statehood is achieved or granted and the extent to which conflict is triggered as a result.

Although there are many works that conceptually distinguish internal and external aspects of statehood (e.g., James 1999; Kurtulus 2005), there is still room to discuss the interrelation between them. Maybe as a result of the fact that each aspect of statehood sometimes speaks to different audiences (e.g., territorial control being more at the focus of political geographers vs. state recognition being influenced by international law perspectives), there is still a lot of room for exploring if and how these two might link. For example, there is some work on how state-building is used to gain recognition (Richards and Smith 2015), also along the lines of “earned sovereignty” (Berg and Mölder 2012; Bolton and Visoka 2010; Caspersen 2008), but there is not much discussion on how recognition might inform international state-building, although there is some preliminary evidence that they might be related (Kyrus 2018). Elsewhere, some emerging research on diaspora matters (e.g., Koinova 2018) and its importance for fuzzing internal and external dimensions of statehood efforts needs to be expanded upon, especially given that there are signs diaspora has been instrumental in many attempts at independence (e.g., Kosovo secession supported financially by diaspora, Somaliland National Movement established in London).

A related issue that has troubled scholars is that of the permanence of entities that seek recognized statehood – how long should a group persist with state-building so as it is regarded as an unrecognized state? Lemke and Crabtree (2019) offer interesting insights about the relationship between the duration of what they call “territorial contenders” and their survival and conflict density, but the study does not seek to resolve the question of what should the minimum duration criterion be for studying sustained but unrecognized efforts at statehood. In this regard, a lot depends on the question one is asking. For example, scholars (e.g., Pegg 1998; Kolstø 2006;

Caspersen 2012) have defined unrecognized states as those existing for no less than 2 years. This has been adopted by many studies, most likely in order to ensure the production of a meaningful definitional population that will not include ephemeral political configurations. Though a somehow arbitrary threshold, a focus on permanence for such questions is not misguided. Existing literature, including international law, that suggests permanence as a criterion of statehood (see Grant 1999, 31; Knight 1992) and an indication of what differentiates statehood to state government (Crawford 2006, 32) lends support to such an approach. A few examples from international practice further justify such a decision: reservation toward the newness of institutions played a role in the admission of Mongolia to the UN (Grant 2009, 59). In 1920, the USA withheld recognition of the Baltic states so as to avoid recognizing territorial changes while the Russian civil war was still unravelling. Chen (1951, 59–60) uses the example of the US recognition policy toward the Baltic states in 1920 to highlight that the continuation of a war suggests that a state has not “ripened” yet so as to be accorded recognition. With reference to secession in particular, Crawford (2006, 90) suggests that permanence can be of a high significance as a continuous existence might be evidence for the existence of statehood, even if more specific criteria are not fully present. Summarizing these arguments, permanence seems as not a necessary criterion of statehood but, nevertheless, a highly relevant matter for cases that might be in flux, such as with statehood conflicts. The question of how much permanence should be expected remains open, but this might be a sign that a blanket threshold is not constructive and that each researcher might also need to exercise a certain degree of more qualitative assessment of greyer cases. But, instead of focusing on the duration of statehood efforts, perhaps a more constructive approach will be to focus on their quality. Rather than trying to come up with a time-related criterion, perhaps a less futile choice will be to move on to a more meticulous discussion of what permanence is, for example, a distinction between permanence in institutions (more conducive for the study of institutional capacity variance across state-builders) and permanence in the objective and effort to pursue and build statehood (the latter might be more conducive for exploring, e.g., secession rhetoric and justifications).

Besides, independent statehood as a clearly articulated and genuine objective of a secessionist movement is another aspect of conflicts over statehood that merits further attention. The literature on groups that seek to be recognized as states has been skeptical from the start about this – seminal works highlight that paying too much attention to formal declarations of independence is potentially deceiving because political aims of secessionist movements change (Pegg 1998). Indeed, there are cases where secession was used toward different aims or disguised under different pretences, but there might also be cases where secession could be seen as a result of a gradual organic process related to a complex network of causes, including, for example, violence, territorial division, assistance of the patron actors, or the ongoing inability of the conflicting parties to agree to a different arrangement. Bradbury's study of Somaliland (2008) is a good example of secession seen as such an incremental process. Therefore, the relationship between rhetoric, strategies, and un/intended consequences of statehood conflicts should be problematized more.

There is also a need for a greater dialogue between studies on elements of statehood presented so far and studies on conflict-this entry represents an effort toward this direction. A group of scholars is increasingly preoccupied with questions of state-becoming, both in terms of internal statehood and of its recognition. There are recent works important for understanding how efforts at statehood succeed or fail (e.g., Florea 2017; Griffiths 2016), but there is room for more research specifically into statehood outcomes that mean something for conflict resolution (e.g., reintegration as an outcome related to a peaceful resolution of the dispute). There are some works that have already tried to combine these two themes of statehood and conflict resolution (e.g., Caspersen 2017; Csergo et al. 2017) and which have contributed to a better understanding of statehood conflicts. More research is needed in this direction.

Moving on to the more specific actors in statehood conflicts, the role of patrons has been explored to a good degree but more research is welcome toward a few directions. First, more empirical research is needed into some of the less investigated cases (e.g., Turkey and TRNC, Algeria and SADR, USA, and Taiwan) and, most importantly, comparisons between different cases that can help refining the concept of patronage. More research is also needed into the power balance between aspiring states and their patron states. Parent states often treat patrons as the main actors they need to resolve the conflict with. This might be problematic for many reasons, not least because it leads to a neglect of the group with which the parent state will need to co-exist in a reintegration scenario. There are works on the matter of agency of unrecognized states (e.g., Fernández-Molina 2020; Berg and Vits 2020) that can pave the way for more research. Finally, literature will benefit by moving beyond state-centricity to explore whether there are other international actors that undertake similar patronage activities – can, for example, the UN and the EU at the height of their state-building activities in Kosovo or Palestine be seen as patrons? Indeed, there are sporadic references to patronage by actors other than states that research can expand on, for example, Anderson (2011) acknowledges in passing the possibility of international actors such as NATO acting as “protectors,” while Biermann (2020) writes of patrons more generally and includes non-state actors too, like NGOs.

More generally about methods, a greater reflexivity in terms of conducting research on statehood conflicts is welcome. The conceptual challenges outlined earlier have obvious methodological implications. For example, more reflection is needed on what are the appropriate methods for arriving at rigorous definitions that can produce meaningful populations within which findings can travel (see also Beach and Pedersen 2016, 103). This is especially important for allowing theory building and extracting lessons from case studies that can be relevant for other cases as well. Such methodological advances could be particularly beneficial for some sub-sections of the literature, such as on unrecognized states that are characterized by a large number of case-specific studies. This is not to disregard the value of case studies but more to highlight their potential for generation of more general knowledge (see also Gerring 2016).

One way in which concept and theory development can be facilitated is by allowing for a more extensive study of historical cases, i.e., statehood conflicts that have been one way or the other resolved. One can assume a range of reasons why contemporary cases have attracted the attention of the scholarly community, such as the wish to produce findings with better public and policy relevance or easier access to data (e.g., to interviewees or policy documents). However, looking at historical cases comes with important benefits. For example, studies that look at a number of cases can include historical cases in order to provide a greater population, more extensive data and therefore stronger falsification of claims (see also King et al. 1994, 22) and better conceptualization. There is also evidence to suggest that looking at historical cases might also open up new areas of research, such as exploring how state-builders die (Florea 2017) also via conflict resolution (Csgero et al. 2017).

At the same time, while challenges in conducting research in conflict-ridden areas have been discussed (e.g., Rivas and Browne 2018; chapter “► Conflict Fieldwork”), there is still room to reflect on researching statehood conflicts in particular. In such conflicts, more specific challenges might relate to the sensitivity of the subjects researched, for example, with reference to the contestation of legitimacy or recognition of statehood claims and how these impact research – what are the specific challenges when conducting fieldwork in contested territories? Do issues of recognition impact the conduct of research, perhaps in a similar way to how they impact the role of international organizations? What are the particular problems of physically accessing territories that are contested in order to conduct on-site research? Those and other related questions are important for enabling a better investigation and, ultimately, understanding of statehood conflicts.

Summary

Statehood conflicts are hereby seen as those appearing where different groups lay claim over the same territories, and which also see the involvement of various other local, regional, and international actors. This entry reflected on how issues of control over territory and population (internal statehood) and international recognition (external statehood) affect these kinds of conflicts and their management or resolution. Not only groups see their despite for independence fulfilled through achieving statehood, but solutions to these conflicts (e.g., forceful or peaceful integration of secessionists to the state which they try separating from, or, more rarely, independent statehood) also reflect the dominance of state sovereignty as an organizing principle. As such, statehood conflicts testify to the ongoing and multifaceted significance of sovereignty for world politics. More research is welcome into these type of conflicts, including, for example, variations of both internal and external aspects to statehood, and what they mean for how we understand sovereignty and conflicts over it. Finally, a greater reflection on methodological opportunities and challenges surrounding the study of statehood conflicts will undoubtedly contribute to a better understanding of some of the world’s most intractable disputes.

Cross-References

- Conflict Fieldwork
- Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict

References

- Anderson, L. (2011). Reintegration unrecognised states. In G. Stansfield & N. Caspersen (Eds.), Unrecognised states in the international system. London: Routledge.
- Arjona, A. (2016). Rebelocracy: Social order in the Colombian civil war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Bahceli, T., Bartman, B., & Srebrnik, H. (2004). De facto states: The quest for sovereignty. London: Routledge.

- Bakke, K. M., Linke, A. M., O'Loughlin, J., & Toal, G. (2018). Dynamics of state-building after war: External-internal relations in Eurasian de facto states. Political Geography, 63, 159–173.
- Bartelson, J. (2014). Can sovereignty be divided? In M. LeVine & M. Mossberg (Eds.), One land two states. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Beach, D., & Pedersen, R. (2016). Causal case study methods. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.
- Bebler, A. (Ed.). (2015). Frozen conflicts in Europe. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Berg, E., & Mølder, M. (2012). Who is entitled to “earn sovereignty”? Legitimacy and regime support in Abkhazia and Nagorno-Karabakh. Nations and Nationalism, 18(3), 527–545. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1469-8129.2011.00527.x>.
- Berg, E., & Toomla, R. (2009). Forms of normalisation in the quest for de facto statehood. The International Spectator: Italian Journal of International Affairs, 44(4), 27.
- Berg, E., & Vits, K. (2020). Exploring de facto state agency: Negotiation power, international engagement and patronage. In G. Baldacchino & A. Wivel (Eds.), Research handbook on the politics of small states. Cheltenham: Edward Elgar.
- Biermann, R. (2020). Secessionist conflict: A happy marriage between norms and interests? Ethics & International Affairs, 33, 29. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0892679418000898>.
- Bolton, G., & Visoka, G. (2010). Recognizing Kosovo's independence: Remedial secession or earned sovereignty? (11). Retrieved from <http://www.sant.ox.ac.uk/seesox/pdf/RecognizingKosovosindependence.pdf>
- Bradbury, M. (2008). Becoming Somaliland. London: Progression.
- Caspersen, N. (2008). From Kosovo to Karabakh: International responses to de facto states. Südosteuropa, 56(1), 58–83.
- Caspersen, N. (2011). States without sovereignty: Imitating democratic statehood. In G. Stansfield & N. Caspersen (Eds.), Unrecognised states in the international system. London: Routledge.
- Caspersen, N. (2012). Unrecognised states. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Caspersen, N. (2017). Peace agreements: Finding solutions to intra-state conflicts. Cambridge: Polity.
- Chen, T.-C. (1951). The international law of recognition. New York: Praeger.
- Coggins, B. (2014). Power politics and state formation in the twentieth century: The dynamics of recognition. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Cordell, K., & Wolff, S. (2009). Ethnic conflict: Causes, consequences, and responses. Cambridge: Polity.
- Crawford, J. (2006). The creation of states in international law. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Csergo, Z., Roseberry, P., & Wolff, S. (2017). Institutional outcomes of territorial contestation: Lessons from post-communist Europe, 1989–2012. Publius: The Journal of Federalism, 47, 491.
- Dayioğlu, A., Çiraklı, M., & Koldaş, U. (2019). Turkish nationalism and the Cyprus question: Change, continuity and implications for engagement with Northern Cyprus. Ethnopolitics. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2019.1676524>.
- Dembinska, M., & Campana, A. (2017). Frozen conflicts and internal dynamics of de facto states: Perspectives and directions for research. International Studies Review, 19(2), 254–278. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isr/vix010>. Oxford Academic.
- Dowty, A. (2017). Israel/Palestine. Cambridge: Polity.
- Dugard, J. (2013). The secession of states and their recognition in the wake of Kosovo. Leiden: Brill.
- Fernández-Molina, I. (2020). Bottom-up change in frozen conflicts: Transnational struggles and mechanisms of recognition in Western Sahara. Review of International Studies, 45(3), 407–430.
- Florea, A. (2017). De facto states: Survival and disappearance (1945–2011). International Studies Quarterly, 61(2), 337–351. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isq/sqw049>.
- Ganohariti, R. (2020). Dual citizenship in de facto states: Comparative case study of abkhazia and transnistria. Nationalities Papers. <https://doi.org/10.1017/nps.2018.80>.
- Geldenhuis, D. (2009). Contested states in world politics. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Gerring, J. (2016). Case study research. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gerrits, A. W. M., & Bader, M. (2017). Russian patronage over Abkhazia and South Ossetia: Implications for conflict resolution. East European Politics, 32(3), 297–313.
- Grant, T. D. (1999). The recognition of states: Law and practice in debate and evolution. Westport: Praeger.
- Grant, T. D. (2009). Admission to the United Nations: Charter article 4 and the rise of universal organization. Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.
- Griffiths, R. D. (2016). Age of secession: The international and domestic determinants of state birth. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Heraclides, A. (1991). The self-determination of minorities in international politics. London: Routledge.
- James, A. (1999). The practice of sovereign statehood in contemporary international society. Political Studies, XLVII, 457–473.
- Ker-Lindsay, J. (2012). The foreign policy of counter secession: Preventing the recognition of contested states. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Ker-Lindsay, J., & Berg, E. (2018). Introduction: A conceptual framework for engagement with de facto states. Ethnopolitics, 17(4), 335–342.
- King, C. (2001). The benefits of ethnic war: Understanding Eurasia's unrecognized states. World Politics, 53(4), 524–552.
- King, G., Keohane, R. O., & Verba, S. (1994). Designing social inquiry. Princeton: Princeton University.

- Knight, D. B. (1992). The Middle East and the emerging new world order. GeoJournal, 28(3), 311–318.
- Knottter, L. (2018). The de facto sovereignty of unrecognised states: Towards a classical realist perspective? Ethnopolitics. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2018.1504432>.
- Koinova, M. (2018). Critical junctures and transformative events in diaspora mobilisation for Kosovo and Palestinian statehood. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 44(8), 1289–1308.
- Kolstø, P. (2006). The sustainability and future of unrecognized quasi-states. Journal of Peace Research, 43(6), 723–740. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343306068102>.
- Kolstø, P., & Blakkisrud, H. (2008). Living with non-recognition: State- and nation-building in South Caucasian Quasi-states. Europe-Asia Studies, 60(3), 483–509. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09668130801948158>.
- Kurtulus, E. N. (2005). State sovereignty: Concept, phenomenon and ramifications. London: Palgrave.
- Kyris, G. (2018). Sovereignty and engagement without recognition: Explaining the failure of conflict resolution in Cyprus. Ethnopolitics, 17(4), 426–442.
- Lemke, D., & Crabtree, C. (2019). Territorial contenders in world politics. Journal of Conflict Resolution. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022002719847742>.
- Lynch, D. (2004). Engaging Eurasia's Separatist States: Unresolved Conflicts and De Facto States. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace.
- Lynch, D. (2005). New thinking about frozen conflicts. Helsinki Monitor, 16(3), 192–195.
- Newman, E., & Visoka, G. (2018). The European Union's practice of state recognition: Between norms and interests. Review of International Studies. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0260210518000104>.
- Ó Beacháin, D., Comai, G., & Tsurtsunia-Zurabashvili, A. (2016). The secret lives of unrecognized states: Internal dynamics, external relations, and counter-recognition strategies. Small Wars and Insurgencies, 27(3), 440–466. <https://doi.org/10.1080/09592318.2016.1151654>.
- Pavkovic, A. (2000). Recursive Secessions in Former Yugoslavia: Too Hard a Case for Theories of Secession? Political Studies, 48, 485–502.
- Pavković, A. (2020). Recognition of unilateral secession. In G. Visoka, J. Doyle, & E. Newman (Eds.), Routledge handbook of state recognition. London: Routledge.
- Pavković, A., & Radan, P. (2011). Introduction: What is secession? In A. Pavković & P. Radan (Eds.), The Ashgate research companion to secession. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Pegg, S. (1998). International society and the de facto state. Aldershot: Ashgate.
- Prifti, P. R. (1999). Confrontation in Kosova. Boulder: East European Monographs.
- Richards, R., & Smith, R. (2015). Playing in the sandbox: State building in the space of non-recognition. Third World Quarterly, 36(9), 1717–1735. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1058149>.
- Rivas, A. M., & Browne, B. C. (Eds.). (2018). Experiences with violent research and researching violence. Bristol: Policy Press.
- Seymour, M. (2007). Secession as a remedial right. Inquiry: An Interdisciplinary Journal of Philosophy, 50, 395–423.
- Sorensen, G. (1999). Sovereignty: Change and continuity in a fundamental institution. Political Studies, 47, 590. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1467-9248.00218>.
- Southgate, L. (2019). ASEAN resistance to sovereignty violation. Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Visoka, G. (2019). Acting like a state. London: Routledge.
- Visoka, G. (2020). The derecognition of states. In G. Visoka, J. Doyle, & E. Newman (Eds.), Routledge handbook of state recognition. London: Routledge.
- Voller, Y. (2013). Contested sovereignty as an opportunity: Understanding democratic transitions in unrecognized states. Democratization, 347(May 2014), 1–21. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13510347.2013.856418>.
- Wallensteen, P. (2014). Parallel sovereignty. In M. LeVine & M. Mossberg (Eds.), One land two states. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Wydra, D. (2014). What went wrong with Crimean autonomy? Security and Human Rights, 25(3), 312–327.

Strategic Peacebuilding

► Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

Street Art and Peace

Ioannis Tellidis

College of International Studies, Kyung Hee University, Yongin-si, South Korea

Synonyms

Aesthetics; Bottom-up peace; Critical peace research; Graffiti; Peacebuilding; Street-art

Definition

This chapter looks at street art and its relationship to peace efforts. Specifically, it examines how street art is used as a medium to express the concerns, needs, and wants of societal groups whose everyday lives are affected by decisions made at (and by) higher political levels, but whose voices remain marginalized and/or silenced. The fact that this type of artistic intervention takes place in the street means that its message is by definition accessible by a large audience. Depending on the circumstances of each case and the severity of the situation faced by everyday actors, street art interventions may not only manifest instances of injustice or mistreatment but may also lead to the transformation of the situation through collective action (mobilization, protest, manifestation). The chapter looks at a few examples where street art has had this type of effect.

Introduction

The turn of the century has seen the establishment of the Critical Peace Research agenda, whose approach to the study and practice of peace is diametrically antithetical to the problem-solving approaches of earlier times. Peace is not (and should not be) merely the victor's dominance and the absence of violence that comes with it, as implied in realist frameworks, nor is it only the product of international collaboration facilitated by institutions, norms, and ethical prerogatives, as argued by liberal theories. Instead, peace should be looked at and understood for what it is: a messy (Perera 2017) and cacophonous (Shinko 2008) process precisely because it involves a plethora of actors, active at multiple levels, and with diverse interests, agendas, and needs. This plurality has led scholars to shift their focus from governmental and/or international contexts that constitute the privileged status quo and to begin examining the role and agency of the "everyday," often through interdisciplinary frameworks such as the aesthetics (Bleiker 2001, 2009; Rancière 2010; Frost 2010).

Due to its character (unsolicited; public, thus accessible; in many cases illegal, thus ephemeral), street art is one form of aesthetics that acts as a vehicle for the voices of those marginalized. Although "graffiti" is but one type of street art, the two terms have been conflated in the past decades and are now used interchangeably (see McAuliffe 2012) – this chapter will also follow this path. What is interesting with all street art in general, and graffiti in particular, is that the space(s) and place(s) where it occurs, as its name suggests, are at the core of everyday life (the streets). It is also true that macro-level issues (such as peace, economic inequality, social justice) and micro-level concerns (demands to free political prisoners or prosecute corrupt officials) often coexist in street artworks (Majid 2018: 211). During the Arab Spring protests in Egypt, for example, "choices of location, symbolism, and artistic form constitute[d] particular responses to general economic, political, and social configurations of the Egyptian state" (ibid.).

Examining street art as an integral part of the everyday allows us to evaluate the ways in which it is used and utilized in order to vocalize marginalized actors and promote alternative, non-traditional ways of thinking and doing peace and security. The following section looks at four cases of communities and individuals affected by war and violence and how they have utilized street art to make their view(s) (or situation, more broadly) known to the rest of the world. These cases are not offered here as examples of successful conflict transformation or even peacebuilding. Instead, they serve to demonstrate that the "everyday" is not as voiceless or, indeed, as weak as dominant theories assume it to be and that street art interventions do have the potential to alter policies and decisions at the macro-level. As such, the below may offer some insights for the methodological, ontological, and epistemological agenda of Critical Peace Research. Using these cases as a vehicle, the chapter will then contextualize the concept of the everyday and examine the ways in which it carries its agency and its potential to affect international situations. Finally, this will then be followed by an analysis of the street as the space and the place where art happens and the implications that this has for critical approaches to peace research.

Street Art and Peace

Yemen

In September 2012, Yemeni graffiti artist Murad Subay began painting stencils of the faces of the people who were forcibly disappeared by the country's security agencies since the 1970s (Hammond 2012; Alviso-Marino 2017) – a campaign he called “The Walls Remember Their Faces.” The portraits were accompanied by the person's name and the date it happened, with some of them also containing the words “enforced disappearance.” This is perhaps the most impactful case of street art as it led to “[t]he creation of a special committee to investigate cases of enforced disappearance, the discussion over the elaboration of a transitional justice law, and the attention of the Human Rights Minister to promote debate at the institutional level” (Alviso-Marino 2017: 127). More importantly, thanks to the massive participation it generated, it resulted in locating alive some of those individuals that were forcibly disappeared.

Pakistan

Spurred by Rolling Stone magazine's revelation in 2012 that US drone operators refer to the killing of their targets as “bug splats,” an artists' collective decided to challenge this insensitivity and raise awareness of civilian casualties (“collateral damage” in the military's desensitizing terminology) (NotABugSplat 2014). To this end, and with the collaboration of locals, the group installed a gigantic picture of an unnamed girl whose parents and two younger siblings were allegedly killed in a US drone operation in the province of Khyber Pakhtunkhwa (Benedictus 2014). The aim was for drone operators to be reminded of the effect of their actions and to remove any illusions that this is just another electronic game.

Palestine

In what is perhaps the most famous activist intervention, English graffiti artist Banksy and 14 other street artists used the wall that separates Jerusalem from the West Bank as a canvas for their projects, mainly oriented at oppositional protest art and local resistance (Parry 2010). While many Palestinian residents agree that the initiative is indeed a form of resistance (Larkin 2014: 134, 143), others are skeptical and even antithetical to it. For example, as Banksy himself made known, he thanked an old Palestinian man who told him that his paintings made the wall look beautiful. The Palestinian man's reply, however, was not what Banksy may have hoped for: “We don't want it to be beautiful, we hate this wall. Go home” (Jones 2005). Others have also commented that it did not matter how much you paint the wall – it and its implications for everyday life will continue to exist unaltered (Larkin 2014: 143). Others, still, have tried to make this point by using the very language and/or tools that Banksy and the other artists used: one of the stencils on the wall that depicted a window view of a beautiful countryside was stencilled over with bricks. This is perhaps the most appropriate case to denote the cacophony and messiness of peace, but also how activists may not always get it right when it comes to speaking on behalf of others. For despite Banksy's and other international artists' intentions, it seems more plausible that their works targeted international audiences about the situation in Palestine (international indifference, inaction, and apathy) rather than local understandings, experiences, and needs.

Colombia

Before serious efforts to establish peace began taking shape in 2016 with the negotiations between the government and the Armed Revolutionary Forces of Colombia (FARC), 50 years of conflict in the country meant that violence became systemic and all-encompassing. As one of the country's most famous street artists, DJ Lu, explained, “[my] work is born of my experiences, of a life immersed in a state of violence at every level: from the government, guerrillas, paramilitaries, not forgetting of course street violence and even violence inside the family” (Morgan 2011). These, along with women's rights, rights of the indigenous peoples, and calls to memory of the Colombian conflict (Rolston and Ospina 2017: 34), are widespread not only in the capital, Bogotá, but also in other urban settings. For instance, the district of San Javier, in Medellín, was once famous as Pablo Escobar's neighborhood and one of the most dangerous places on earth, but is now referred to as "Comuna 13" and is attracting international visitors taking graffiti tours (See <https://www.medellingraffititour.com/>).

Everyday, Street, and Art

The "everyday" is as messy as the concept and practice of peace, consisting of a wide variety of actors, from the most extremist to the more moderate and even apathetic. Equally undeniably, however, it is also laden with agency and not as indifferent or as inactive as traditional theories assume. Despite its marginalization by dominant analyses, theories, and agendas, the agency of the everyday is constantly present either through its compliance with these agendas or, particularly so, through its resistance (Solomon and Steele 2017). This points to the fact that the agency of the everyday is political, for resistance and compliance imply an engagement with power – its alteration and continuation, respectively. The Occupy movement, the Arab Spring, and the Indignant Movement in Greece and Spain following the financial crisis of 2008 – these are all examples of the everyday being visible, agentive, and resisting. As such, the everyday should also be understood as a level of analysis because its vision (s), needs, and wants link directly to, and may indeed affect, the higher levels where decisions are being taken and policies are formulated. Consider as an example that the current humanitarian catastrophe in Syria and its international repercussions – be it the involvement (or noninvolvement) of international actors or the mass refugee waves that led to an increase in xenophobia in Europe – began when 15 adolescent boys painted an anti-Assad graffiti in Daraa (Tellidis, with Glomm 2019).

Unlike private spaces where art objects are exhibited to a select few (either invited or paying) members of the public, the street is what brings art and the everyday together. Critically, the visibility of the artist's message and its interpretation by a large, unrestricted audience means that the street is no longer simply a place (a material dimension) but a space (an immaterial dimension) (Björkdahl and Kappler 2017: 3) where the artist's agency (the message or idea of his/her art) meets the agency of the audience (its opposition to or support of said message). The street is also of agentive capacity because it functions as both the content and the method of analysis (Nayak 2017: 202). Spatial agency "entails a commitment to social change with the aim of altering the behaviour of others, changing policies and politics and transforming ideational structures" (Björkdahl and Mannergren Selimovic 2015: 170–171). This coincides precisely with street art's agency, if one considers street art to be "a device used to express issues that become considered as worthy of collectively being shared and denounced, and the potential capacity of mobilization that this use of painting on public spaces can have in the short or long term" (Alviso-Marino 2017: 122). Finally, it must also be borne in mind that, through the ages, the street has also been the space where dominant and privileged agents, such as the state, either displayed or reasserted their power and/or dominance: military parades, public executions, and royal weddings are, among others, manifestations of that (Cohen-Cruz 2013: 4).

The aforementioned discussion highlights that artistic agency can be political, in which instance it demarginalizes the unvoiced and the unheard by transcending the orientalist views bestowed upon them by "established oppressive situations" (Murphy and Omar 2013: 352). The conjuring of street art and political agency becomes even more clearer by "artivism," a concept and a practice that "confronts, interrogates or even shrugs off the status quo" (Artivism Network, quoted in Diverlus 2016: 191). Much like Critical Peace Research's intentions, street art aims at highlighting instances of injustice and disequilibrium. To be clear, the terms "unvoiced," "marginalized," "sidelined," etc. may also refer to extreme, pro-violent actors who also seek "justice" and "peace" but in their own, exclusionary, and violent terms. As seen on the walls of Belfast, Northern Ireland (Sluka 1992); Dili, East Timor (Parkinson 2010); and various towns of the Basque Country, Spain (Chaffee 1988), to mention a few examples, street art has also been used and utilized by such actors to make their presence visible, to raise their profile, or to resonate with those individuals/groups who feel they need to take action.

Summary

The arts have long been known to be a suitable vehicle for healing trauma (Cohen and Yalen 2006) as well as create the conditions necessary for inclusive and pluralist narratives to emerge (Premaratna and Bleiker 2010). To that effect, their potential to contribute to peacebuilding efforts is greater than what is often assumed, particularly if they are used in a coordinated fashion “for specific tasks that measurably contribute to peacebuilding” rather than when they are used as a “feel-good” attempt (Shank and Shirch 2008: 218).

Street art and graffiti can be found virtually in every region that has experienced violent conflict – whether as tags, as stencils, or more elaborate as the ones in Colombia or Palestine. As such, it is perhaps the most political of all genres of aesthetics by virtue of the fact that it is unsolicited, it materializes in the street, and its messages in conflict settings are usually about protesting and/or resisting a situation of domination that leads to imposition of injustices – as Rolston and Ospina (2017: 31) put it, “mural painting represents the meeting between victims’ agency and activist art.” Coincidentally, this is also the core of the CPR agenda when it comes to adopting alternative methodologies that will help unpack alternative understandings and existences that have so far been left hidden or marginalized. In turn, these latter will help understand peace not only as the absence of violence or even the mere coexistence of adversary communities but as the product of conscious interdependence, trust, and respect for difference. The four cases briefly explored above (and many more present elsewhere but unexplored here) show that, even when street art does not explicitly call for trust, respect, and an understanding of interdependence, at least it alludes to their lacking. More than that, street art resonates with and vocalizes the everyday because the artists themselves are part of it.

The links between street art’s and CPR’s objectives notwithstanding, it must be stressed that street art is only the medium that may generate the agency to transform violent or unjust situations. That agency itself comes from the audience that is/has been exposed to the murals and the images. CPR’s intention, therefore, must be to decode how street art expresses the people’s desires and feelings for peace and, on the other hand, how can street art be deployed in a manner that will facilitate the transformation of violent and/or unjust situations in ways that will facilitate peace efforts.

Cross-References

- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Alviso-Marino, A. (2017). The politics of street art in Yemen (2012–2017). Communication and the Public, 2(2), 120–135.
- Benedictus, L. (2014). The Artists Who Are Giving a Human Face to the US’s ‘Bug Splat’ Strikes. The Guardian, 7 Apr. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/shortcuts/2014/apr/07/artists-give-human-face-drones-bug-splat-pakistan>. Accessed 1 Aug 2019.
- Björkdahl, A., & Kappler, S. (2017). Peacebuilding and spatial transformation: Peace. In Space and place. London: Routledge.
- Björkdahl, A., & Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2015). Gendering Agency. Security Dialogue, 46(2), 165–182.
- Bleiker, R. (2001). The aesthetic turn in international political theory. Millennium, 30(3), 509–533.
- Bleiker, R. (2009). Aesthetics and world politics. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Boulding, E. (2000). Cultures of peace: The hidden side of history. Syracuse: University Press.
- Chaffee, L. (1988). Social conflict and alternative mass communications: Public art and politics in the Service of Spanish-Basque Nationalism. European Journal of Political Research, 16(5), 545–572.

- Cohen, C., & Yalen, L. (Eds.). (2006). Recasting reconciliation through culture and the arts: A virtual collection. Waltham: Brandeis University.
- Cohen-Cruz, J. (2013). Introduction. In J. Cohen-Cruz (Ed.), Radical street performance: An international anthology (pp. 1–6). London: Routledge.
- Diverlus, R. (2016). Re/imagining activism. In D. Elliott, M. Silverman, & W. Bowman (Eds.), Artistic citizenship: Artistry, social responsibility and ethical praxis (pp. 189–209). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Frost, L. (2010). Aesthetics and politics. Global Society, 24(3), 433–443.
- Hammond, A. (2012). Yemenis paint disappeared activists on Sanaa streets. Reuters, 25 Sept. <http://www.reuters.com/article/us-yemen-disappeared-idUSBRE8800YG20120925>. Accessed 1 Aug 2019.
- Jones, S. (2005) Spray Can Prankster Tackles Israel's Security Barrier. The Guardian, 5 Aug. <https://www.theguardian.com/world/2005/aug/05/israel.artsnews>. Accessed 12 Aug 2019.
- Larkin, C. (2014). Jerusalem's Separation Wall and global message board: Graffiti, murals and the art of Sumud. The Arab Studies Journal, 22(1), 134–169.
- Majid, A. (2018). Improvisatory Peace Activism? Graffiti During and After Egypt's Most Recent Revolution. In William Knoblauch, Michael Loadenthal, and Christian Petersen (eds.), The Routledge History of World Peace since 1750 (Abingdon: Routledge, 2018), pp. 208–226.
- McAuliffe, C. (2012). Graffiti or street art? Negotiating the moral geographies of the Creative City. Journal of Urban Affairs, 34(2), 189–206.
- Morgan, V. (2011). Street Art Politics in Bogotá. Fatcap, 20 Sept. <https://www.fatcap.com/article/672.html>. Accessed 12 Aug 2019.
- Murphy, J., & Omar, S. M. (2013). Aesthetics or resistance in western Sahara. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 25(3), 349–358.
- Nayak, S. (2017). Location as method. Qualitative Research Journal, 17(3), 202–216.
- NotABugSplat (2014). A giant art installation targets predator drone operators. <https://notabugsplat.com>. Accessed 12 Aug 2019.
- Parkinson, C. (2010). Peace of wall: Street art from East Timor. Melbourne: Affirm Press.
- Parry, W. (2010). Against the wall: The art of resistance in Palestine. London: Pluto Press.
- Perera, S. (2017). Bermuda triangulation: Embracing the messiness of researching in conflict. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 11(1), 42–57.
- Premaratna, N., & Bleiker, R. (2010). Art and peacebuilding: How theatre transforms conflict in Sri Lanka. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 376–391). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Rancière, J. (2010). Dissensus: On politics and aesthetics (trans: Corcoran, S.). London: Continuum.
- Rolston, B., & Ospina, S. (2017). Picturing peace: Murals and memory in Colombia. Race and Class, 58(3), 23–45.
- Shank, M., & Schirch, L. (2008). Strategic arts-based peacebuilding. Peace and Change, 33(2), 217–242.
- Shinko, R. E. (2008). Agonistic peace: A postmodern reading. Millennium – Journal of International Studies, 36(3), 473–491.
- Sluka, J. A. (1992). The politics of painting: Political murals in Northern Ireland. In C. Nordstrom & J. Martin (Eds.), The paths to domination, resistance and terror (pp. 190–216). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Solomon, T., & Steele, B. J. (2017). Micro-moves in international relations theory. European Journal of International Relations, 23(2), 267–291.
- Tellidis, I., & Glomm, A. (2019). Street art as everyday counterterrorism? The Norwegian art community's reaction to the 22 July 2011 Attacks. Cooperation and Conflict, 54(2), 191–210.

Street-Art

- ▶ Street Art and Peace

Structural Violence

- ▶ Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

Successful Peacekeeping Outcome – Political Solution to Conflicts

- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations

Sudan

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Summary Jury Trials

- ▶ Alternative Dispute Resolution

Sweden

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

System of Government

- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan

Symbolic Reparations

- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice

System Thinking

- ▶ Resilience and Peace

T

Technology and Peace

Ioannis Tellidis
College of International Studies, Kyung Hee University, Yongin-si, South Korea

Synonyms

Bottom-up peace; Grassroots mobilisation; Non-violence; Peacetech

Definition

This chapter aims to examine the ways in which technology has been used in bottom-up ways that seek to resist and/or transform violent and oppressive contexts in order to build peace. At the same time, the chapter also highlights those instances by which international actors (organizations and states) seek to co-opt technological advances that debilitate traditional, top-down hierarchies of power and order because they perceive them as a tool that facilitates the erosion of their control. The chapter's main argument is that technological advances hold great potential for the future of peacebuilding's praxis and research by including marginalized voices, but it must be born in mind that they are nothing but a tool – meaning that they can be used to promote peace as much as they can be used to foment divisions or instigate and sustain violence. Nonetheless, any future research agenda on peace must unavoidably take into consideration the variety of technological tools and platforms utilized by grassroots actors.

Introduction

While history has its fair share of cases of technologically ill- or under-equipped Davids beating technologically supreme Goliaths, it is also true that – more often than not – technological superiority has been a key factor in deciding the outcome of warfare. As such, technology has featured more prominently in war and/or strategic studies than it has in peace studies. One exception to that would be in cases where “peace” denotes the kind of victor's peace and therefore one group's domination over another. In that case, technology may be used as a tool of discipline and control, much like Jeremy Bentham's Panopticon explored by Foucault (1978). Recently, however, the emergence of social media (due to technological advances in network speeds; ever-smaller and simultaneously powerful processors; cryptography, and others) has facilitated more horizontal connections between users (as opposed to the vertical model referred to earlier, in the domination example). This has led to the organization and mobilization of civil society actors who, among other things, have given voice to marginalized and neglected groups; have opposed and overturned illiberal practices of governance; have prevented violence from taking place and/or spreading; have facilitated reconciliation and coexistence; and have established and promoted peace education programs.

At the same time, international actors like the United Nations (UN), the European Union (EU), or bodies involved in international aid have also jumped on the technological train (as it were), finding recourse in a variety of technological tools and platforms in order to promote or strengthen their approaches to peacebuilding. Nevertheless, rather than reconcile with the fact that new technologies debilitate vertical relations and hierarchies, said organizations' use of ICTs demonstrates an almost desperate attempt to maintain control. To a large extent, this is because of the traditional, power-oriented ways in which these organizations (were built to) operate, and these mentalities are distilled into their understanding(s) of how new technologies should be used. Moreover, it should be born in mind that ICTs are simply a tool that can be used for whichever objective their user intended. As such, they may be (and indeed, have been) used to foment exclusion and authoritarianism (Morozov 2011; Rød and Weidmann 2015), as well as to instigate or sustain violence (Bailard 2015; Warren 2015). Finally, the largest part of those in need of peace do not have access to ICTs, which renders them "digitally invisible" (Mac Ginty 2017).

This short chapter provides a few examples that showcase how technology has been used in participatory and inclusionary ways that seek to build peace and/or resist oppressive and violent contexts, as well as cases in which international actors are utilizing ICTs for the purposes of peace but without "letting go of control" (Puig-Larrauri 2013).

Bottom-Up Uses of ICTs for Peace

Mobile phones have been the primary tool for the mobilization of nonstate actors and peace initiatives. In Kenya, Nigeria, Uganda, and Zimbabwe, for example, rudimentary messaging systems were implemented to anticipate the outbreak of electoral violence (Tellidis and Kappler 2016, p. 78; Gagliardone et al. 2015, p. 7; Welch et al.

2014, p. 64; Coyle and Meier 2009, p. 42). Notwithstanding, as mobile phone technology has advanced considerably, most Internet platforms explored below are now designed to operate on mobile phones too ("smartphones"). As such, rather than treat mobile phones as a distinct category, this section summarizes ICT platforms and tools that have been used for peace purposes in two broad categories: crowdsourcing and social media.

Crowdsourcing

Crowdsourcing is one of the earliest methods that took advantage of mobile phone technologies for the purposes of better coordinating preventative or relief activities. Although there exist various definitions, crowdsourcing "entails the collection of vast amounts of data to be processed at high-speed" (Hunt and Specht 2019, p. 2). Crowdsourcing platforms can use information sent by mobile phones, emails, or the web to create online maps depicting where and how a crisis is developing, and the type of reaction and/or assistance that is needed. Their use took off in the aftermath of Haiti's earthquake in 2010 and they have proved tremendously valuable for emergency humanitarian responses as well as for preventing the outbreak of violence. For instance, Ushahidi and OpenStreetMap (OSM), the most known crowdsourcing platforms, have been used to improve the severity of the situation (and better coordinate action) in Niger's and Kenya's elections in 2011 and 2013, respectively; in Somalia's Afgooye corridor, home to "the world's largest concentration of internally displaced people" (Beaumont 2010); in the Philippines during hurricane Haiyan; in Nepal's earthquake; in monitoring violence in Syria and the Central African Republic; and elsewhere (Hunt and Specht 2019, p. 2).

Due to the magnitude of data collected, however, crowdsourcing is facing some serious challenges, chief among which is the reliability of the information transmitted (Coyle and Meier 2009, p. 17). For example, only around 780 out of 230,000 tweets sent during the first two days of hurricane Haiyan were deemed useful to the emergency response teams (Moore and Verity 2014, p. 3). The efficiency of the response is also compounded by the organizational politics and operating procedures of international humanitarian actors. In the aftermath of Nepal's earthquake, for example, Ramalingam noted an inability to focus on the role of local organizations and instead concentrate on the needs of stakeholders (2016, p. 31).

Social Media

Prevalent among these are platforms like Facebook, Instagram, Twitter, and YouTube that have been used in a variety of contexts. In Israel, during one of the periods of heightened tensions with Iran, Ronny Edry, an Israeli teacher, posted on Facebook how Israel's official warmongering policies against Iran did not represent him or his friends and neighbors. His message was quickly picked up by others, in both Israel and Iran, and a peace-movement of sorts called "Israel-loves-Iran" was born on Facebook. What is particularly interesting in this case, as Edry himself puts it, "[i]t has been disappointing no Israeli politician has contacted us. Not a single one. And it's not like they don't know it is going on, it's been on every Israeli channel, on Al Jazeera, on CNN. They call themselves leaders but they don't lead" (quoted in Elgot 2012).

In Bosnia, politics based on strengthening ethnic divisions led to a law that prevented newborns from being given an identification number. This meant that they could also not be issued with travel documents, healthcare. The death of a newborn that needed immediate treatment abroad but could not travel because of said law led to mass protests throughout the country. These protests, dubbed "Babylution," were organized mainly on Facebook and they attracted people from across ethnic divides for the first time since the end of the war (Gocmanac 2013).

In Cyprus, all of these platforms are utilized by bi-communal grassroot activist movements like "Occupy the buffer zone" and "Mahallae" to engage members of both communities. In Egypt, during the Arab Spring, Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube were widely used but in a more strategic fashion: "Facebook was used to schedule the protests, Twitter to coordinate the activities, and YouTube to inform the world" (Baytiyeh 2019, p. 76).

Newer platforms that increase anonymity and that have been developed as a response to the authorities' mass surveillance schemes should also be taken into consideration, for they too are becoming increasingly popular. The Telegram app is one such example used recently for the purposes of organizing the mass protest movement in Hong Kong against the Chinese central government's dictats.

Top-Down Uses of ICTs for Peace

The increasing use of ICTs in peacebuilding efforts has also attracted the attention of international governmental organizations, with the UN noting their importance for its missions as well for the populations whose lives it seeks to improve (United Nations 2015). Nevertheless, the cumbersome nature, interest-driven agendas, and statist focus of international governmental organizations means that they are five times less likely to adopt new technologies to design more inclusionary approaches to peacebuilding than nongovernmental organizations (Gaskell et al. 2016, p. 6).

Although international organizations do have a digital presence through the most popular social media platforms (such as the ones described above), their use of these is often to advertise their actions and/or initiatives, rather than to facilitate some kind of bottom-up action. This is understandable if one considers the interests of the member-states of these organizations, and how letting go of control would undermine said interests. Nevertheless, there are other technologies that international organizations are currently that are very effective in providing protection from or alleviation of suffering. Two of these that are currently in use are blockchain and unmanned aerial vehicles (UAVs), or more commonly known, "drones."

Blockchain

Blockchain is the newest type of technology that is perhaps most famous because of its association with electronic currencies (cryptocurrencies), most notably Bitcoin. Its innovation and potential lies in the fact that it does away with the need of middlemen or third parties. Instead, its operation is based on trustless, transparent (and thus verifiable by anyone), decentralized, unfalsifiable, and public contracts between two parties. The UN appears to have fallen in love with the technology so much so that it has set up a dedicated website (UN-blockchain.org). Indeed, a number of UN agencies have already adjusted it to their needs, while others are exploring further uses for humanitarian purposes. For example, the World Food Programme (WFP) is using the technology to authenticate and record food and cash donations to vulnerable populations in Jordan and Pakistan (World Food Programme 2018). Other agencies, like the UN Office for Project Services (UNOPS) and the Office of Information and Communication Technologies (UN-OICT), are planning to utilize the technology to combat child trafficking by providing identities to undocumented children (World Identity Network 2017). Others have even expressed the thought that blockchain technology may be used to finance the UN's Sustainable Development Goals, without relying on charities (Brunnhuber 2018).

Drones

At the turn of the century, technological advances in satellite imaging, image processing capabilities, and surveillance technologies meant that there was great potential for the UN's core peace and security missions to benefit directly. The UN Mission in Sudan (UNMIS) was the first instance where a Security Council Resolution (1706) explicitly called for "aerial means" and "aerial reconnaissance" to be used in order to help protect civilian populations (United Nations 2006). The organization also used drones for the protection of refugees and internally displaced populations (IDPs) in Chad in 2009. In 2013, the UN officially adopted the use of drones for its mission in Congo (MONUSCO) (BBC News 2013), not only as a means to respond to violence but also as a tool of deterrence (UN News Centre 2013).

Besides politically-driven humanitarian crises, the UN-operated drones were used in Haiti in 2010 to support the International Organisation of Migration in its efforts to map sites of IDPs in 2012 (Karlsruud and Rosén 2013, p. 2). Drone and satellite imagery is also used by the UNDP to support the activities of humanitarian and development actors in Mali, and disaster preparedness and response in the Maldives and Tanzania (UNDP 2017). Like blockchain, the potential of drone technology seems to complement the organizations missions very well. So much so, in fact, that DPKO's Expert Panel on Technology and Innovation in Peacekeeping recommended its use as "an immediate measure" (Lute 2014, p. 55).

There are important questions here still unanswered, however. Who owns or leases the technology, and who has access to it and the data it generates, as well as the nature of the subcontractual relations it often depends upon are some of these questions. Furthermore, as Larauri and Meier (2015, p. 12) have noted, records of this information will most likely outlast the life of the mission, in which case no guarantees can be provided about the extension of "do-no-harm" policies. Indeed, considering the digital gap between developed and developing or underdeveloped countries, it might well be the case that new dependencies are emerging with the adoption of such technologies, which increasingly look like older power relations.

Summary

This chapter set out to present cases in which technology can aid peace efforts, especially when these help address and vocalize issues and needs faced by marginalized and/or neglected groups and communities. Nevertheless, it almost goes without saying that technology is simply a tool that can put at the service of all sorts of objectives. As such, it can be (and indeed it has been) used for the promotion of violence and the recruitment of extremists as much as it can be used for the mobilization of rescuers and volunteers.

ICTs should also be evaluated within their overall information context, that is a broader "system of people, practices, values, and technologies in a particular local environment" (Nardi and O'Day 1999, p. 49). Doing otherwise would run the risk of presenting technology as panacea rather than uncovering the fact that it may reinforce already existing cleavages and divisions. For example, the penetration of technology in the underdeveloped world is virtually always a privilege of the elites. This implies that people living in abject poverty and/or without access to education or electricity face extreme difficulty in affording the equipment or having the necessary knowledge to fully benefit from its operation. As a result, their marginalization and subalternity remain intact.

Furthermore, although some top-down approaches to peace that rely heavily on technology may have positively tangible effects, they also help reinforce the controlling agenda of the dominant powers that unroll such technologies. The very decentralized character of blockchain technology, for example, may be viewed as a threat to established norms and practices unless it is deployed by dominant actors, thus allowing some degree of regulation and control. Related to that is the flow of technological aid and assistance from the developed to the developing and underdeveloped regions: although commendable with regards to bridging the technological gap, it is also the case that developed actors require their partners to focus on (and counter) threats and risks that are of more concern to the former than to the latter (Hurwitz 2014, p. 330).

With all that in mind, technology can certainly help uncover instances of injustice and disequilibrium (and help address them, so long as there is sufficient political will to do so), but it can also help those who want to expand their control and/or domination. As such, any discussion about whether technology can help promote peace is seemingly deceptive – not because it can, as I hope to have demonstrated, but because of the political efforts to control and co-opt it as well as the extremist and deadly objectives it is used for (which, in turn, become an excuse for the aforementioned controlling efforts).

Cross-References

- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Search for Peace, the

References

- Bailard, C. S. (2015). Ethnic conflict goes mobile: Mobile technology's effect on the opportunities and motivations for violent collective action. Journal of Peace Research, 52(3), 323–337.
- Baytiyeh, H. (2019). Social media's role in peacebuilding and post-conflict recovery. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 31(1), 74–82.
- BBC News. (2013). UN starts drone surveillance in DR Congo. Retrieved from <http://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-25197754>
- Beaumont, P. (2010, October 4). The Afgooey corridor: World capital of internally displaced people. The Guardian. <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/poverty-matters/2010/oct/04/somalia-afgooye-corridor-displaced-people>. Accessed 1 Oct 2010.
- Brunnhuber, S. (2018, April 10–12). How can blockchain technology helps us to finance SDGs? Presentation at the world association for sustainable development 16th international annual conference. Geneva: United Nations
- Coyle, D., & Meier, P. (2009). New technologies in emergencies and conflicts: The role of information and social networks. Washington, DC: UN Foundation-Vodafone Foundation Partnership. http://www.globalproblems-globalsolutions-files.org/pdf/UNF_tech/emergency_tech_report2009/Tech_EmergencyTechReport_full.pdf. Accessed 1 Oct 2019.
- Elgot, J. (2012, September 1). Israel Loves Iran: The peace campaign against middle east war that began on Facebook. Huffington Post UK. https://www.huffingtonpost.co.uk/2012/08/31/israel-loves-iran-facebook-ronny-edry_n_1846168.html. Accessed 30 Sept 2019.
- Foucault, M. (1978). Discipline and punish: The birth of the prison. New York: Pantheon Books.
- Gagliardone, I., et al. (2015). In search of local knowledge on ICTs in Africa. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 4(1), 7–15, Art.35.
- Gaskell, J. R., et al. (2016). Uses of information and communication technologies (ICTs) for EU conflict prevention and peacebuilding. London: London School of Economics and Political Sciences, and Build Up.
- Gocmanac, T. (2013, July 9). Bosnian lawmakers fail to meet 'Babylution' protest demands. Global Voices. <https://globalvoices.org/2013/07/09/bosnian-lawmakers-fail-to-meet-babylution-protest-demands/>. Accessed 30 Sept 2019.
- Hunt, A., & Specht, D. (2019). Crowdsourced mapping in crisis zones: Collaboration, organization and impact. Journal of International Humanitarian Action, 4(1), 1–11.
- Hurwitz, R. (2014). The play of states: Norms and security in cyberspace. American Foreign Policy Interests, 36(5), 322–331.
- Karlsrud, J., & Rosén, F. (2013). In the eye of the beholder? The UN and the use of drones to protect civilians. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 2(2), 1–10.

- Larauri, H. P., & Meier, P. (2015). Peacekeepers in the Sky: The Use of Unmanned Unarmed Aerial Vehicles for Peacekeeping. Geneva: ICT4Peace Foundation.
- Lute, J. H. (2014). Performance peacekeeping: Final report of the expert panel on technology and innovation in peacekeeping. Retrieved from <http://peacekeeping.un.org/en/final-report-of-expert-panel-technology-and-innovation-un-peacekeeping>
- Mac Ginty, R. (2017). Peacekeeping and data. International Peacekeeping, 24(5), 695–705.
- Moore, R., & Verity, A. (2014). Hashtag standards for emergencies. Geneva: United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs.
- Morozov, E. (2011). The net delusion: How not to liberate the world. London: Allen Lane.
- Nardi, B., & O'Day, V. L. (1999). Information ecologies: Using technology with heart. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press.
- Puig-Larrauri, H. (2013, May 26). Dragons, UNDP and re-thinking empowerment. Let Them Talk. <https://letthemtalkdotorg.wordpress.com/2013/05/26/dragons-undp-and-re-thinking-empowerment/>. Accessed 23 Sept 2019.
- Ramalingam, B. (2016). Innovations in the Nepal earthquake response: Ten lessons from the DEC response review. Humanitarian Exchange, 66, 30–33.
- Rød, E. G., & Weidmann, N. D. (2015). Empowering activists or autocrats? The internet in authoritarian regimes. Journal of Peace Research, 52(3), 338–351.
- Tellisidis, I., & Kappler, S. (2016). Information and communication technologies in peacebuilding: Implications, opportunities and challenges. Cooperation and Conflict, 51(1), 75–93.
- UN News Centre. (2013). UN peacekeeping mission in Mali increasingly possible, says top official. Retrieved from <http://www.un.org/apps/news/story.asp?NewsID=44087>
- UNDP. (2017). Spark, scale, sustain: Innovation for the sustainable development goals. New York: UNDP.
- United Nations. (2006). Security council resolution, S/RES/1706. Available at: https://undocs.org/S/RES/1706\(2006\))
- United Nations. (2015). Uniting our strengths for peace – Politics, partnerships, and people: Report of the high-level independent panel on United Nations peace operations. New York: United Nations.
- Warren, T. C. (2015). Explosive connections? Mass media, social media and the geography of collective violence in African states. Journal of Peace Research, 52(3), 297–311.
- Welch, J. R., Halford, S., & Weal, M. (2014). Conceptualising the web for post-conflict governance peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 3(1), 58–74.
- World Food Programme. (2018). What is 'blockchain' and how is it connected to fighting hunger. Retrieved from <https://insight.wfp.org/what-is-blockchain-and-how-is-it-connected-to-fighting-hunger-7f1b42da9fe>
- World Identity Network. (2017). World Identity Network and United Nations team up to launch innovative blockchain pilot to help prevent child trafficking. Retrieved from <https://www.pnewsire.com/news-releases/world-identity-network-and-united-nations-team-up-to-launch-innovative-blockchain-pilot-to-help-prevent-child-trafficking-300553921.html>

Territorial Conflicts

- ▶ International Organizations and Statehood Conflicts
- ▶ Statehood Conflicts

Terrorism

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Kenya's War on Terror

Textile-Making as Research Method

Beatriz E. Arias López¹, Berit Bliesemann de Guevara² and Laura A. Coral Velásquez³

¹Faculty of Nursing, University of Antioquia, Medellín, Colombia

²Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University, Aberystwyth, UK

³Facultad de Artes ASAB, Universidad Distrital Francisco José de Caldas, Bogotá, Colombia

Synonyms

Art; Arts-based research; Craft; Needlework; Participatory research; Peace and conflict textiles; Ways of knowing

Definition

Textile-making – broadly defined as a practice based on crafts such as sewing, embroidering, appliquéing, knitting, quilting, and weaving – is an arts-based method, which is increasingly used in participatory qualitative research but so far under-explored as an approach in peace and conflict studies. Textile-making is particularly suited for impactful peace and conflict research, as it offers innovative ways to combine fieldwork-based qualitative data generation with the emancipatory, transformative, and therapeutic benefits of art in general and needlework more specifically. Textile-making shares arts-based methods' ability to explore experiential and practical knowledge by offering nonlinguistic ways of expression. As a visual method, images expressed through needlework diversify the iconographic and iconological analyses of other visual approaches. Additionally, textiles' materiality and the process of making have been shown to generate trust, care, and healing, with the fabric and needlework processes also being powerful metaphors that allude to the repair of damage and the healing of wounds. As a participatory and relational method, textile-making can be used at any stage of qualitative peace and conflict research and, depending on the research methodology into which it is embedded, serve different purposes in the research design including social-transformative aims.

Introduction

This chapter discusses textile-making as a method for peace and conflict research. Textile genres used as qualitative social-scientific research methods include, for example, narrative quilts, (autobiographical) dolls, embroideries, appliquéd wall hangings (arpilleras), story or memory cloths, knitted objects, and crocheted blankets (e.g., Arias López 2015; Arias López et al. 2019; Cohen 2013; Garlock 2016; Lawton 2010; Shercliff and Holroyd 2020). Textile-making is a particularly suited qualitative method for participatory, bottom-up peace and conflict research: it expands what counts as knowledge from a narrow propositional-conceptual focus to include people's practical and experiential knowledge (Julian et al. 2019) and combines the academic aim of data generation with the potential to make a positive contribution to transformative social processes from war to peace – be it as part of the research impact agenda or out of researchers' social-transformative commitments. The insights in this chapter are mainly taken from the Latin-American context, where textile-making constitutes an important part of the culture and which therefore provides powerful examples of the relational, participatory, and transformative research as well as the feminist and decolonial potential enabled by textile-making as a method.

The chapter first discusses textile-making as an arts-based research method, highlighting both commonalities and specifics. It then illustrates textile-making's potential roles at different stages of the research process through the example of the authors' research with former combatants of the Colombian guerrilla group FARC and their peasant neighbors, which combined textile-making with the methodology of narrative practices. As a versatile method, textile-making can be employed to generate visual and textual data that can serve as the main corpus or complement other research processes and data; to support the dissemination of research findings; to generate dialogue and resonances with wider audiences that in turn may constitute additional data; and to facilitate researcher reflexivity. The chapter concludes with a summary of the benefits, challenges, and limits of textile-making as a research method.

Textile-Making as Specific Arts-Based Research Method

Textile-making as a method can be understood as a form of arts-based research (ABR). However, while much ABR literature sees art mainly as a set of technical skills that can be employed for research purposes (see, e.g., Savin-Baden and Wimpenny 2014, p. 1), a wider understanding suggests that art is more: it is a specific way of seeing, asking, thinking, and relating to the world (Fernández 2019). This wider understanding allows for an important move from a vertical to a horizontal relation between research and art, which has two implications. First, it situates arts-based research within an inter- rather than trans-disciplinary field: art is not subsumed under research but recognized as a different but equally valid way of knowing – calling for interdisciplinary teams involving researchers and artists (Arias López and Coral Velásquez 2017; cf. Fernández and Dias 2016 on the fluidity of roles). Second, art is understood not as an object but as an aesthetic relationship, which creates knowledge and holds decolonial and feminist potentials (Fernández 2019; Springgay 2010). Increasingly collaborating with qualitative social-scientific research, art thereby not only generates epistemological turns in conventional forms of knowing, but it also dynamizes entrenched research procedures and methodologies (Arias López and Coral Velásquez 2017; Knowles and Cole 2008; Mannay 2016).

In the ABR literature, textile-making is clearly underrepresented, illustrating the historical relegation of needlework to the realm of popular and indigenous craft and of women's private domestic activity (Parker 2010). This contrasts with the elevated status, presumed cosmopolitanism, and public functions attributed to art. Pushing back against this marginalization, textile-making has been highlighted both as a form of political activism and as art in its own right (Alario Trigueros 2008; Andrä 2020; Fry 2014; Sánchez Aldana et al. 2019). In a move to invert the idea of art at the service of activism, some authors hold that activism using activities such as knitting is art, in the sense of “‘an aesthetic of civic engagement’, whereby art is based on social relationships that make culture and creativity a central part of civic life” (Springgay 2010, p. 113). Textile-making shares with other arts-based methods the aim to include nonlinguistic dimensions of knowing, especially the experiential and practical knowledge held by participant-subjects, into the research (Liamputtong and Rumbold 2008). It offers ways to explore and create tacit, embodied, and practical knowledges (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2020, pp. 193–198; Estrella and Forinash 2007, p. 379) and to share traumatic, silent/silenced or tabooed experiences (Cohen 2013; Gameiro et al. 2018; Garlock 2016), which are hard to be expressed in words and therefore difficult to capture with standard social-scientific methods (interviews, focus groups, surveys) with their focus on linguistic expression (Bagnoli 2009, pp. 547–548; Shercliff and Holroyd 2020, p. 12). Used as part of wider feminist, decolonial, or interpretive methodologies, textile-making and other arts-based methods are also particularly suited to amplify the voice of groups which are marginalized by dominant discursive and material structures, as they allow for participant-subjects' self-definition, agenda-setting, and meaning-making in the research process. They thereby hold the potential to work against patriarchal, colonial, western-centric, and other entrenched power differentials inherent in many conventional research methods and designs (Arias López et al. 2019; Huss 2007, p. 985).

Since arts-based research is “rooted in aesthetic considerations” (Barone and Eisner 2012, p. 1) and produces not just research data but also works of art, its products are particularly well suited to disseminate research findings to wider nonacademic audiences, enable dialogue and induce resonances among and between different societal groups, and generate empathy and solidarity (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2020; Milton 2014, p. 23). Consequently, arts-based methods hold a transformative potential for the research participants (e.g., empowerment or the acquisition of new skills), for their artworks' audiences (e.g., change in attitudes or behavior), and for the researchers themselves (e.g., enhanced reflexivity on their positionality) (Rydzik et al. 2013; Arias López et al. forthcoming). Due to this transformative potential, some authors specifically highlight the activist role ABR methods can play in participatory, critical, action-oriented research that is committed to deep interactions between researchers and participants, aims to improve participants' lives, and works towards a visionary perspective of a better future (Finley 2003).

Textile-making is particularly suited for peace and conflict researchers, who seek to combine fieldwork-based qualitative data generation with this nourishing and social-transformative potential of collaborating with the arts. In addition to the characteristics it shares with arts-based research, textile-making as a method contains some qualities specific to the materiality of fabric and to activities such as sewing, embroidering, knitting, and crocheting. Textile-making is “a language that can only be transmitted from and received with the body. [...] It is an embodied writing in threads, made with the materials that accompany us from birth to death: textiles [...] and that frees us with an intimate scream when it becomes our voice” (textile artist Mercy Rojas, authors’ interview, Medellín, 2018).

In the context of Colombian survivors’ memory work after violent conflict and related loss (e.g., killed or forcefully disappeared relatives), the embodied, relational, therapeutic, and material effects of textile-making have been studied in some detail. These studies show that needlework – often carried out in groups – creates spaces and relations of trust, affect, and mutual care, which allow individuals to express and resignify their suffering and collectives to establish or resignify relations (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2020, p. 189; Pérez-Bustos and Chocontá Piraquive 2018, pp. 5–7). The materials of which the textiles are made often carry symbolic meaning, e.g., representing the absence of lost loved ones by using scraps of their clothes (Andrä et al. 2019, p. 8). The materiality of textiles thereby contributes to a “pedagogy of touch” based on the sensuousness of fabric and thread (Springgay 2010). The “making” aspect (Ingold 2013) – i.e., the slow practice of needlework – furthermore revolves around notions of mending, unraveling, and recomposing, not only materially but also emotionally, which gives their makers the possibility to resignify events and to heal. Textile-making is consequently often described as generating strength and energy or to contribute to heightened self-esteem and empowerment (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2020, p. 194; Cohen 2013, p. 165).

Yet, as an artwork, textiles also have agency independently of their makers (Belalcazar Valencia and Molina Valencia 2017). Not only do narrative textiles carry their makers’ resisting stories – documenting events, preserving memories, denouncing violations and injustices, or expressing wishes, hopes, and fears – and thereby liberate their makers from the burden of retelling Aranguren Romero 2020, p. 198–200; Pérez-Bustos and Chocontá Piraquive 2018, pp. 7–10); the textiles also take on a social life, for example, when interacting with different audiences and generating resonances in exhibitions and workshops, and thereby bear the potential to create relations between subjects who are unlikely to meet in person (Andrä et al. 2019, pp. 12–13). These specific effects of textile-making suggest that needlework can be particularly useful as a method in peace and conflict research with marginalized or vulnerable groups and that its benefits may consist in the resignification of participants’ and audiences’ collective meaning-making in a way that contributes to reconciliation and peace.

Embroidering with Ex-Guerrillas in Colombia: A Research Example

While textile-making as a method for peace and conflict studies has mostly been used in research with participant-subjects categorized as “victims” of violent conflict (e.g., Arias López 2015, 2017; Arias López et al. 2019), the method is not limited to any particular participant group. In the following, the authors’ project with former guerrilla fighters and their post-conflict peasant neighbors in Colombia is discussed, to illustrate how textile-making as a method may nourish the research process at different stages and for a number of purposes (Figs. 1, 2, and 3).

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 1 Ex-combatant embroidering the FARC’s party logo, a rose. San José de León, May 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method,

Fig. 2 Textile workshop. San José de León, May 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 3 Female ex-combatant embroidering. San José de León, May 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

The project: The project “(Un-)Stitching the Subjects of Colombia’s reconciliation process” was jointly supported by Minciencias (project reference FP44842-282-2018) and the Newton Fund (project reference AH/R01373X/1) and hosted by Aberystwyth University, the University of Antioquia, and the Association of Victims and Survivors of Northeast Antioquia. The research team explored the changing subjectivities of former fighters of the Colombian guerrilla group FARC (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia), who are in a process of reincorporation into civilian society. Despite the signing of a peace agreement between the FARC and the Colombian government in December 2016, mainstream political and media discourses in Colombia remain dominated by antagonizing portrayals of ex-FARC combatants as enemies or criminals, thereby undermining the reconciliation process. The project set out to explore how ex-combatants, their relatives, and their new peasant neighbors narrate themselves and their situation in the transformation process and to bring their stories into conversation with other members of Colombian society – thereby studying, and making a social intervention into, the ongoing but increasingly precarious peace process. The team worked in two communities in the department of Antioquia: San José de León in the Mutatá region, a self-organized, economically thriving village built by a former fighting unit of the FARC, and Llano Grande in Dabeiba, a state-organized reintegration zone for former fighters whose socioeconomic sustainability is as yet uncertain (Figs. 4, 5, and 6).

Methodology and methods: The functions that methods take on in a research process depend on the methodology into which they are embedded. This project chose narrative practices (White and Epston 1990; White 2007) as an overarching qualitative-interpretive methodology guiding the research. This originally psychotherapeutic approach understands individuals’ subjectivities as composed of stories: persons make sense of their lives and the world around them by putting

Textile-Making as Research Method,

Fig. 4 Three exhibitions – three contexts – three gazes. San José de León, October 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as
Research Method,

Fig. 5 Three exhibitions – three contexts – three gazes. Apartadó, October 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

some of their experiences into a particular temporal and causal order to create and perform meaning (White and Epston 1990, pp. 10–12). Since subjectivities are multistoried, people have the possibility to re-author their lives, for example, when adapting to changed circumstances (White and Epston 1990, pp. 13, 16–17). At the same time, the approach also acknowledges that people's (self-)narratives are embedded in wider sociocultural discourses, which limit the repertoires of meanings and performances that are socially acceptable and which often preclude or silence alternative narratives (White and Epston 1990, pp. 27–28). The research employed biographical interviews to determine dominant and alternative narratives of its different types of participant-subjects (former combatants, their relatives, and their new peasant neighbors), ethnographic observation to explore silent/silenced narratives, and textile-making to elicit participants' preferred narratives (i.e., stories they wanted other Colombians to know) and to

Textile-Making as Research Method,

Fig. 6 Three exhibitions – three contexts – three gazes. Medellín, November 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 7 Embroidered stories: Shaking hands. San José de León, June 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 8 Embroidered stories: El Nacional football club. San José de León, June 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

create resonances between the textile artworks and wider Colombian society through exhibitions and workshops (Figs. 7, 8, and 9).

Participants: The research was open to all community members in San José de León and Llano Grande. Initial embroidery workshops ensured that everyone had the opportunity to learn basic techniques and participate in textile-making. Also, some basic embroidery and sewing skills were present among ex-FARC participants of all genders, due to wartime practices and necessities of labeling and mending clothes and bodies. Nonetheless, the textile-making activities mainly attracted female participants, although some male members of the former combatant and local peasant communities took part and produced powerful textiles. The main reason for this gendered turnout is entrenched gender stereotypes, which have structured the fighters' reincorporation process more generally, despite far-reaching gender provisions in the peace agreement. The textile-making component also attracted fewer community members in formal positions of decision-making and more members at the communities' margins (although some participants were women social leaders), emphasizing its potential of amplifying voice (Figs. 10, 11, and 12).

Data generation: Over the course of 12 months, over 80 participants in the two communities engaged in 31 textile-making workshops or sessions and produced around 120 textile pieces, which the project team coded thematically, grouping them into 12 textile books (for impressions of the research process, see Proyecto (Des) tejiendo miradas 2019a). The themes of these preferred stories included nostalgias of life in the guerrilla; the shared rural roots of ex-combatant and civilian participants; family reunions between ex-combatants, their children, and other relatives made possible through the peace agreement; trust-building between ex-combatants and local peasant communities (often victims of the previous violence); diverse transformation processes; ex-combatants' commitment to the peace process; and hopes for, as well as uncertainties about, the future (Arias López et al. 2020). Participants were invited to explain their embroideries in conversational interviews, in order to include their own interpretation of their artwork. Taken together, the artworks and conversations give insights into the everyday peace and reconciliation processes in Colombia's state-neglected rural areas. Within the wider project, these data complemented the data generated through narrative biographical interviews and ethnographic observation, which allowed to gauge dominant and alternative narratives as well as silences in ex-combatants meaning-making and (re-)signification of the past, present, and future (Figs. 13 and 14).

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 9 Embroidered stories: Our children, our great loves. San José de León, June 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 10 The participants enjoy the embroidery workshop. San José de León, April 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Participant feedback: Participants' reflections on the textile method largely confirmed the assumptions and experiences of textile-making as a method discussed above. Participants felt that they had been given an opportunity to express some of the feelings, memories, and thoughts that normally remain silent/silenced. They appreciated learning new skills, which have been turned by some into artisanal income-generating activities. Core participants among female ex-combatants and civilians also came together more closely as a group in which relations were established, trust was built, and stories were shared – constituting important steps towards the difficult task of creating a horizontal community structure after years of hierarchical organization in the guerrilla. Exhibitions in the project communities furthermore helped render the voices and skills of some of the more marginalized community members publicly audible/visible and highlighted the value of memory and cultural work in communities so far focused almost exclusively on income-generating projects. Finally, the textile-making activities also built more horizontal relationships between participant-subjects and researcher-subjects, with the latter's textile reflections becoming part of the research data and dissemination.

Data dissemination and resonances among audiences: By exhibiting the textiles created by participants, the project aimed to enable dialogue between different parts of Colombian society and thereby to contribute positively to the fragile peace and reconciliation process (for impressions of the exhibitions in San José de León and Apartadó, see Proyecto (des)tejiendo miradas

Textile-Making as Research Method,

Fig. 11 Immersed in the needlework. San José de León, April 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method,

Fig. 12 After-work embroidery session. San José de León, April 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 13 Nostalgias of life in the bush: Gun. San José de León, May and July 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

2019b). The thematically grouped textile books formed the basis for exhibitions in the two project communities, as well as the town of Apartadó and the departmental capital Medellín, visited by c.600 persons, as well as for workshops with different society groups including victims of the violent conflict. Exhibition visitors and workshop participants were invited to reflect in embroidered and verbal forms what the exhibition had inspired them to un-stitch and/or re-stitch, e.g., with regard to ex-combatants or the Colombian peace process. This process of textile resonances, which took inspiration from narrative practices techniques such as problem externalization and definitional ceremonies (White 2007, Chaps. 1 and 4), not only resulted in textiles which have formed part of future exhibitions and generated additional data about the state of post-conflict reconciliation and peacebuilding in Colombia; it also contributed to transformations in collective meaning-making about the violent conflict in Colombia (Arias López et al. 2020, chapter “Fabric of Resonances”) (Figs. 15, 16, and 17).

Researcher reflexivity: The heterogeneous project team, consisting of 10 women from different national, generational, disciplinary, and life backgrounds, also used textile-making for the purpose of ongoing individual and collective reflexivity (Arias López et al. forthcoming). Through techniques of narrative practice and textile-making, team members reflected at the outset of the project what had led them to participate in a research with former combatants. Later, embroidery and narrative resonances were used to continuously reflect on what the researchers had un- or re-stitched in the research process. The resulting textiles formed part of the project exhibitions, reflecting the relations built between researchers and participants in the process of joint needlework and making the researchers visible as part of the world they study.

Summary

This chapter has discussed the use of textile-making as a productive method for peace and conflict research. As a versatile arts-based method, textile-making is conceivable in a range of participatory qualitative research designs and will benefit research by excavating experiential and practical knowledge and providing researchers with engaging outputs for dissemination and impact activities. Textile-making can also be applied at the (co-) designing stage of a project. In the case of the Colombian research discussed in detail here, the method was embedded into the qualitative-interpretive methodology of narrative practices, which co-determined how art and research interacted regarding data generation, research dissemination and impact, and researcher reflexivity.

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 14 Nostalgias of life in the bush: Designing a textile memory. San José de León, May and July 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 15 Resonances. Apartadó, November 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-making as a method is especially useful in projects which seek to contribute to positive social transformation. As part of critical, activist, and/or transformative research designs, textile-making can be a method to help change participants' lives for the better. It starts from their experiences and stimulates them to generate embodied knowledge, that is, knowledge which emerges as it passes through the body and is experienced and felt, producing not only cognitive but also affective and emotional transformations within participants and between them. People's everyday closeness to textiles and textiles' material associations with protection and intimacy render textile-making also a particularly suited means to generate relations. Finally, textile artworks make the research publicly accessible and help generate social impact, not least because art is the very expression of the vitality that war cannot destroy in its entirety, and which in post-conflict processes provides avenues for understanding and reconciliation.

These benefits notwithstanding, there are some challenges which need to be thought through when considering the use of textile-making as a research method. First, while the method is relatively inexpensive in terms of materials needed, two major challenges lie in the necessity for the researcher to learn needlework skills themselves and in the time needed to teach those skills to participants, especially since this practical knowledge is only obtainable through trial, error, and repetition. The method may thus work best in projects involving a longer fieldwork period or reiterative visits to the same research location/group.

Second, textile-making as a method also finds its limits where participants are unable or unwilling to engage in textile-making, be it due to a lack of prior skills or to (resistance against) gender norms. Due to its image as feminized labor, needlework has remained at the margins of both research and the arts (Parker 2010; Pérez-Bustos and Márquez Gutiérrez 2015), and the process of politicizing textile narratives has been as slow and complex as the process of politicizing that which is deemed feminine. This may have implications for whether and how research findings generated through textile-making are valued by academic peers.

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 16 Visitors un-stitching and re-stitching gazes. Apartadó, November 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Textile-Making as Research Method, Fig. 17 Resonances. Dabeiba, December 2019. (Photo: Laura Coral Velásquez)

Third, like any arts-based method, the assumed openness of textile-making and its participatory character also depend on the wider methodology and research design into which they are embedded. Specific instructions of what or how to embroider, for instance, will narrow the general openness of creative methods. In the Colombian example, method closure was avoided through the narrative practice methodology, which is interested in participants' dominant, silent/silenced, alternative, and preferred stories, without presupposing what these stories consist in.

Fourth, in the arts-based research literature, there is also a lively debate about the extent to which artistic products should be interpreted by their maker, the researcher, or both and according to which criteria – aesthetic or social-scientific (e.g., Guillemin 2004). The answer to this will to some extent depend on the overall research aims and methodology (Hernández Salgar 2014). From an art perspective, object and subject, research and artistic process are inseparable, highlighting the need for and importance of continuous reflexive interpretation as a major feature of an arts-based research that takes the arts seriously (Borgdorff 2006; cf. Arias López et al. forthcoming).

Finally, there are also ethical questions to be taken into account when using textile-making as a research method. In addition to general ethical concerns around research with human participants, especially if these are marginalized or vulnerable, the transformative potentials inherent in arts-based methods warrant specific consideration, not least a participatory approach to deciding what constitutes “positive social change.” Here, the wider methodology is essential: embedded in critical, participatory methodologies, textile-making as a method holds a great potential to contribute to both a deepened experiential understanding of violent conflict and its active transformation.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Perpetrator Research
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Textiles Making Peace

References

- Alario Trigueros, M. T. (2008). Arte y Feminismo. Donostia-San Sebastian: Nerea.
- Andrä, C. (2020). Textiles making peace. In O. Richmond & G. Visoka (Eds.), The Palgrave encyclopedia of peace and conflict studies. https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-030-11795-5_125-1.
- Andrä, C., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., Cole, L., & House, D. (2019). Knowing through needlework: Curating the difficult knowledge of conflict textiles. Critical Military Studies. Online First. Retrieved 14 Mar 2020 from <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/23337486.2019.1692566>.
- Arias López, B. E. (2015). Las tramas de un estudio cualitativo en salud mental y violencia política. Lecciones aprendidas. Revista Facultad Nacional Salud Pública, 32(1), S107–S115.
- Arias López, B. E. (2017). Entre-tejidos y Redes. Recursos estratégicos de cuidado de la vida y promoción de la salud mental en contextos de sufrimiento social. Prospectiva: Revista de Trabajo Social e intervención social, 23, 51–72.
- Arias López, B. E., & Coral Velásquez, L. A. (2017). Investigar el cuidado comunitario de la vida a través de las artes plásticas: Una experiencia en contexto rural. Revista Universidad y Salud, 19(1), 75–84.
- Arias López, B. E., Coral Velásquez, L. A., Valderrama Arboleda, M., & Parra Mojica, E. P. (2019). Pasado por el cuerpo y la aguja: Reflexiones metodológicas para la investigación intercultural. In M. Rosero Otero (Ed.), Humanización del cuidado de enfermería desde la teoría de las transiciones (pp. 251–260). UNIMAR: San Juan de Pasto.
- Arias López, B. E., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Coral Velásquez, L. A. (2020). (Des)tejiendo miradas: Hilar, bordar y remendar la reconciliación en Colombia/ (Un)stitching gazes: Spinning, embroidering, and mending reconciliation in Colombia. Medellín: Periferia.
- Arias López, B. E., André, C., & Bliesemann de Guevara, B. (forthcoming). Reflexivity in research teams through narrative and textile practice.
- Ashbaugh, A. (2014). Fated webs. In M. Agosin (Ed.), Stitching resistance: Women, creativity and fiber arts (pp. 3–11). Tunbridge Wells: Solis Press.

- Bagnoli, A. (2009). Beyond the standard interview: The use of graphic elicitation and arts-based methods. Qualitative Research, 9(5), 547–570.
- Barone, T., & Eisner, E. W. (2012). Arts based research. Los Angeles: Sage.
- Belalcazar Valencia, J. G., & Molina Valencia, N. (2017). Los tejidos de las mujeres de Mampuján: prácticas estético-artísticas de memoria situada en el marco del conflicto armado colombiano. Andamios, 14(34), 59–85.
- Bello Tocancipá, A. C., & Aranguren Romero, J. P. (2020). Voces de hilo y aguja: construcciones de sentido y gestión emocional por medio de prácticas textiles en el conflicto armado colombiano. H-ART, 6, 181–204.
- Borgdorff, H. (2006). The debate on research in the arts. Conference paper. Published at https://konst.gu.se/digitalAssets/1322/1322713_the_debate_on_research_in_the_arts.pdf
- Cohen, L. (2013). Common threads: A recovery programme for survivors of gender-based violence. Intervention: Journal of Mental Health and Psychosocial Support in Conflict Affected Areas, 11(2), 157–168.
- Estrella, K., & Forinash, M. (2007). Narrative inquiry and arts-based inquiry: Multinarrative perspectives. Journal of Humanistic Psychology, 47(3), 376–383.
- Fernández, T. (2019). La metodología de Investigación Basada en Arte – IBA y su valor descolonizador. Video-recorded presentation, Universidad Católica Boliviana, La Paz, 1 August 2019. <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=qEfCqWGTa3w&t=2017s>
- Fernández, T., & Dias, B. (2016). Aguas turbulentas: el encuentro entre el giro educativo en el arte y el giro de la visualidad en la educación. Art, 17, 6–14.
- Finley, S. (2003). Arts-based inquiry in QI: Seven years from crisis to guerrilla warfare. Qualitative Inquiry, 9(2), 281–296.
- Fry, R. (2014). Craftivism: The role of feminism in craft activism. MA thesis in Women and Gender Studies. Nova Scotia: Saint Mary's University, Halifax.
- Gameiro, S., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., Payson, A., & El Refaie, E. (2018). DrawingOut – An innovative drawing workshop method to support the generation and dissemination of research findings. PLoS One, 13(9), e0203197.
- Garlock, L. R. (2016). Stories in the cloth: Art therapy and narrative textiles. Art Therapy, 33(2), 58–66.
- Guillemin, M. (2004). Understanding illness: Using drawings as a research method. Qualitative Health Research, 14(2), 272–289.
- Hernández Salgar, Ó. (2014). La creación y la investigación artística en instituciones colombianas de educación superior. A Contratiempo: Revista de música en la cultura, 23. <http://www.musigrafia.org/contratiempo/?ediciones/revista-23/articulos/la-creacion-y-la-investigacion-artistica-en-instituciones-colombianas-de-educacion-superior.html>
- Huss, E. (2007). Houses, swimming pools, and thin blonde women: Arts-based research through a critical lens with impoverished bedouin women. Qualitative Inquiry, 13(7), 960–988.
- Ingold, T. (2013). Making: Anthropology, archaeology, art and architecture. New York: Routledge.
- Julian, R., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Redhead, R. (2019). From expert to experiential knowledge: Exploring the inclusion of local experiences in understanding violence in conflict. Peacebuilding, 7(2), 210–225.
- Knowles, G., & Cole, A. (2008). Handbook of the arts in social science research: Methods, issues and perspectives. Thousand Oaks: Sage.
- Lawton, P. H. (2010). Hand-in hand, building community on common ground. Art Education, 63(6), 6–12.
- Liamputtong, P., & Rumbold, J. (Eds.). (2008). Knowing differently: Arts-based and collaborative research. Hauppauge: Nova Science Publishers.
- Mannay, D. (2016). Visual, narrative and creative research methods: Application, reflection and ethics. London: Routledge.
- Milton, C. E. (Ed.). (2014). Art from a fractured past: Memory and truth-telling in post-shining path Peru. Durham/London: Duke University Press.
- Parker, R. (2010). The subversive stitch: Embroidery and the making of the feminine (3rd revised ed.). London: I. B. Tauris.
- Pérez-Bustos, T., & Chocontá Piraquive, A. (2018). Bordando una etnografía: sobre cómo el bordar colectivo afecta la intimidad etnográfica. Debate Feminista, 56, 1–25.
- Pérez-Bustos, T., & Márquez Gutiérrez, S. (2015). Aprendiendo a bordar: reflexiones desde el campo sobre el oficio de bordar y de investigar. Horizontes Antropológicos, 21(44), 279–308.
- Proyecto (Des)tejiendo miradas. (2019a). Destejiendo miradas (video). <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=P-ZVxlxSC7U&t=55s>
- Proyecto (Des)tejiendo miradas. (2019b). Destejiendo miradas: Exposiciones con subtítulos (video). <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=MdORWGESHHI&t=86s>
- Rydzik, A., Pritchard, A., Morgan, N., & Sedgley, D. (2013). The potential of arts-based transformative research. Annals of Tourism Research, 40, 283–305.
- Sánchez Aldana, E., Pérez-Bustos, T., & Chocontá Piraquive, A. (2019). ¿Qué son los activismos textiles? Una mirada desde los estudios feministas a catorce casos bogotanos. Athenea Digital, 19(3). <https://doi.org/10.5565/rev/athenea.2407>.
- Savin-Baden, M., & Wimpenny, K. (2014). A practical guide to arts-related research. Rotterdam: Sense Publishers.
- Shercliff, E., & Holroyd, A. T. (2020). Stitching together: Participatory textile making as an emerging methodological approach to research. Journal of Arts and Communities, 10(1+2), 5–18.
- Springgay, S. (2010). Knitting as an aesthetic of civic engagement: Re-conceptualizing feminist pedagogy through touch. Feminist Teacher, 20(2), 111–123.

White, M. (2007). Maps of narrative practice. New York: W.W. Norton.

White, M., & Epston, D. (1990). Narrative means to therapeutic ends. New York: W.W. Norton.

Textiles Making Peace

Christine Andrä

Department of International Politics, Aberystwyth University, Aberystwyth, UK

Synonyms

Art = peace; Crafts = politics; Memory activism; Peace activism; Truth and reconciliation commissions

Definition

To examine what textiles and textile-making can contribute to peace efforts, this chapter asks: In what sense can it be said that textiles make peace? In answering this question, broad conceptions of textiles, peace, and making are used. Textiles are flexible material structures made of spun fibers such as thread or yarn and produced through techniques including appliqué, crochet, embroidery, knitting, knotting, quilting, sewing, and weaving. Peace is understood both negatively as the absence of physical, structural, cultural, and other violences and positively as the existence of human cooperation and social integration (Galtung 1964), both as a process and an outcome and as an endeavor situated both in high politics and in the everyday. Making is intended in both a literal and a figurative sense: it connotes manual practices of crafting, constructing, or otherwise bringing into being material objects and artifacts as well as activities that contribute to the achievement – the making – of peace. Using these broad understandings of textiles, peace and making, the chapter interrogates their interrelationship from different theoretical angles and through empirical examples drawn from the Global South and North.

Introduction

What is the relationship between textiles and peace, and in how far can textile-making constitute a hands-on kind of peace-making? Due to textiles' soft and flexible materiality and to the association of needlework with women's work, textiles are customarily thought of as inherently peaceful, yet politically inconsequential. For much the same reasons, needlework tends to be "considered at odds with intellectual life" (Parker 2010, p. 214; cf. St Clair 2019, p. xii) and overlooked as a research topic in the social sciences. Yet none of these assumptions holds up to closer scrutiny.

Textiles are far from naturally peaceful: flags and uniforms play a prominent role in war and military operations (Guillaume et al. 2015), and textile-making at the home front supports violent practices abroad in material and ideational ways (Bryan-Wilson 2017: 10 f.; Tidy 2019). Therefore, the capacity of textiles to further peace cannot simply be assumed, but needs to be unpacked and analyzed. In fact, there are many different ways in which textiles – banners, blankets, embroideries, guerrilla knits, quilts, ribbons, rugs, story cloths, textile artworks, wall hangings, and weavings – have effectively challenged different violences and proposed nonviolent alternatives (Andrä 2020). Textiles are often used to protest against and resist all kinds of state-sponsored and other violences (Figs. 1 and 2). As records documenting war-time massacres, torture, and enforced disappearance, textiles are also media for storing and conveying information about these events (Andrä et al. 2019). Textile-

This text is based on work of the international collaborative research project "(Des)tejiendo miradas sobre los sujetos en proceso de reconciliación en Colombia/(Un)Stitching the subjects of Colombia's reconciliation process", jointly supported by the Colombian research council Colciencias (project reference FP44842-282-2018) and the British Newton Fund (project reference AH/R01373X/1) and hosted by Aberystwyth University, UK, the University of Antioquia, Colombia, and the Association of Victims and Survivors of Northeast Antioquia, Colombia.

Textiles Making Peace,

Fig. 1 Paz - Justicia - Libertad/Peace - Justice - Freedom: An arpillera (textile wall hanging) by an anonymous maker showing the ongoing protests against the Pinochet military dictatorship, Chile, 1970s (Photo: C. Peck, (c) Conflict Textiles)

Textiles Making Peace,

Fig. 2 An embroidered handkerchief by Bordando por la Paz protesting the enforced disappearance of Cispín Frías Guardado, Mexico, 2016 (Photo: D. House (2019: 139)) making can constitute an artistic, artisanal, economic, mnemonic, or therapeutic praxis of working toward peace. In particular, textile-making can be a way of reconstructing communities and individual and collective identities after conflict.

To think through the relationship between textiles and peace, and to argue for textiles' potential to make peace in both a literal and a metaphorical sense, this chapter first discusses different theoretical approaches to textiles and politics. It then examines historical and contemporaneous examples of textiles contributing to efforts for peace in the Global South and North. In conclusion, the chapter suggests that making sense of the relationship between textiles and peace requires an engagement not only with multiple theoretical perspectives and empirical examples but also with practices of making.

Textiles and Peace: Theoretical Approaches

In peace and conflict research and neighboring disciplines such as anthropology, political science, and sociology, the potential of textiles to contribute to peace has received little attention thus far. Existing analyses bespeak the power of textiles in activism for peace and social justice (e.g., Adams 2012; Agosin 2008; Wedderburn 2019) but are conceived around individual examples and mostly do not offer a systematization – let alone a theorization – of the potency of textiles in peace efforts. Motivated by the idea that textile images and narratives of conflict and war can help advance the cause of peace, a few studies also examine how “weavings of war” (Zeltin Cooke and MacDowell 2005), “stitches of war” (Deacon and Calvin 2014), and “conflict textiles” (Andrä et al. 2019) depict, speak of, and address different violences from a comparative perspective. Yet their starting point for conceptualizing the power of textiles is a focus on violence rather than on peace, and they generally assume rather than scrutinize the practical efficacy of textiles in peace-making. In light of this relative dearth of knowledge about textiles in peace and conflict research, this section sketches possible theoretical roads ahead.

The literature on textiles and textile-making in cultural studies and art history provides some starting points for thinking about the relationship between textiles and peace. On the one hand, this literature emphasizes the specific nature of textiles, including their “specially tensile qualities” and their “capacity to be pulled, stressed and to withstand tension” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 5); the fact that our bodies are constantly touched by or enshrouded in textiles such as garments and linen (St Clair 2019); and the particular processes and techniques through which fibers and fabrics are produced and textiles are made (Parker 2010; St Clair 2019). On the other hand, this literature is wary of generalizing from textiles’ material and sociocultural nature to their role within political and social endeavors. Rather, textile scholars point to what Rozsika Parker calls textiles’ “dual face” (Parker 2010, p. xix). Historically, textiles and textile-making have been harnessed for both conservative and progressive projects and “claimed [...] as at once hegemonic and counterhegemonic” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 3; cf. Adamson 2013). Theorizations of the relationship between textiles and peace thus need to account for textiles’ materially specific character and for their socially and politically constituted double-sidedness.

One way of thinking about the relationship between textiles and peace in light of this double-sidedness is to conceive of textiles as representational. Textile-making is meaning-making: needleworkers “transform materials to produce sense – whole ranges of meanings” (Parker 2010, p. 6). Textiles are narrative, visual, and tactile “forms of communication” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 4) or “bearers of knowledge” (Andrä et al. 2019). As representational artifacts, textiles such as the arpillera (wall hanging) and the embroidered handkerchief pictured above depict experiences of violence and hopes for peace. Textiles communicate in various “documentary, visual, and sensory registers” simultaneously (Andrä et al. 2019, p. 3) and are “dense with multiple meanings and [...] available for a range of readings and conflicting interpretations” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 4). The twofold question of how peace can be represented and of how representations can contribute to peace is at the core of visual peace research (Möller 2020), which stipulates theoretically that because visualizations “are broader, less direct, and less confrontational than text,” they “can help retrieve and process traumatic memories more easily than oral or written art” and “provide an alternative means of engaging with society” (Engelkamp et al. 2020, p. 13 f.). Empirically, visual peace research has found that visualizations of peace in paintings, photography, and films overwhelmingly conjure up negative rather than positive visions of peace (Engelkamp et al. 2020). The representational multiplicity of textiles pushes these theoretical and empirical findings. Textiles challenge visual peace research to expand the range of artefacts and contexts it considers. Moreover, textiles’ multiple registers mean that they might look “lovely” but be made of rough materials and depict violent events (Andrä et al. 2019, p. 6; cf. Becker 2004, p. 119; Hemmings 2011, p. 42). By triggering “sensory recall” (Hunter 2019, p. 94), textiles might also help with processing traumatic memories. Finally, taking advantage of needlework’s multivocality and its seemingly humble lineage, textile representations can surprise their viewers in ways not open to more conventional visual media and thus have a special capacity to induce (peaceful) changes in thinking and action (Andrä et al. 2019, p. 12).

Feminism constitutes another theoretical resource for grappling with the implications of textiles' double-sidedness for their ability to contribute to peace. Textile scholar and psychoanalyst Parker originally developed her conclusions about textiles' "dual face" by analyzing how embroidery had historically "provided both a weapon of resistance for women and functioned as a source of constraint. It has promoted submission to the norms of feminine obedience and offered both psychological and practical means to independence" (Parker 2010, p. xix). Textile-making is not only time-consuming, but usually also undervalued and trivialized, and it has often been employed to keep women down. However, it can also be empowering and subversive of oppressive gender relations. Therefore, textiles have the potential to reproduce but importantly also to undo static, binary, and hierarchical orderings of gender (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 19). Insofar as peace needs to be practiced in terms of gender, too (Confortini 2006), textiles can contribute to efforts for peace by speaking out against sexual and gender-based violence, unequal gender relations, and gendered discourses of war and by offering alternative forms of agency, conviviality, and resistance (Cole 2019; Garlock 2016). Yet to be explored more fully, theoretical affinities between feminist peace research and feminist perspectives on textiles also include the refusal to take women's presumably inherent peacefulness as an analytical point of departure (Confortini 2006) and the focus on the (de-) construction of gendered identities and relations (Wibben et al. 2019).

A theorization of textiles making peace could also benefit from intersectional and decolonial analyses. Art historical studies have focused on the intersectional formation of textiles within the categorical divide between publicly made, economically valuable "art" usually produced by men and domestically made, economically worthless "craft" undertaken mostly by women. When this hierarchy was first instituted in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Britain, it led to the marginalization of the "working-class [...] or disadvantaged middle-class women" who made up the majority of the country's textile workforce (Parker 2010, p. 5). For contemporary textile work, while the art/craft binary may have "more or less eroded, there persist classed, raced, and gendered distinctions between 'high craft' meant for institutional display [...] and the 'low craft' of hobbyists" (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 13 f.). As peace research is increasingly interested in art as a "bottom-up" approach to peacebuilding (Premaratna and Bleiker 2016), it might seem straightforward to subsume textiles under this emerging research program by conceiving of them as art in the service of peace (e.g., Adams 2013; Wedderburn 2019). Highlighting how intersections of class, gender, race, and sexuality come to matter in art as an approach to peace, a conceptualization of textiles as art/craft offers a helpful counterweight.

A decolonial perspective on textiles and peace could start from how textiles' "differing histories of production, use, and meaning" have played out within colonialism and coloniality (Hemmings 2011, p. 42). Textiles "conditioned the relations between colonizer and colonized" not only in a material and economic sense but also through a racialized framing of textile-making as craft and hence "as static, trapped within tradition" and in need of enlightened improvement (Adamson 2013, p. xvii; cf. Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 10). Yet textiles, as the "subalterns of the art world," can also assume "an unexpected location of power" (Hemmings 2011, p. 41 f.). In the context of the violences of colonialism and coloniality, textiles' double-sidedness means that they can be employed to make or break colonial framings and relations. An example of this are the uniforms and "long dresses" of the Ovaherero Otruppe movement in Namibia: through their use of colors and symbolism, these garments assimilated textile forms and practices first introduced by Rhenish missionaries in the nineteenth century and asserted Ovaherero identity in the wake of German colonial rule and the German genocide of the Ovaherero and Nama in 1904 (Hendrickson 1996; Naughten 2013). Future research could consider how textiles and textile-making can contribute to a decolonial peace by constituting a “postcolonial archive” (McEwan 2003), helping to transpose the “paradigm of war and difference” (Ndlovu-Gatsveni 2015), or strengthening the agency of the actual subjects of peace against the universalizing rationalities of external interventions (Jabri 2013).

Within the kind of everyday peace-making that this last point suggests (MacGinty 2014), textiles can also come to matter in terms of their materiality. This includes “what they are made of and how they are designed” and also “the specific contexts of their use” (Woodward 2020, p. 19). Within these contexts, textiles’ materiality can be made sense of in terms of entanglements or assemblages or also by considering textiles’ social lives (Hendrickson 1996). In particular, research on the materiality of textiles focuses on their embodied and affective relations. Along these lines, collective textile-making among victims of violent conflict has been shown to encourage, through the textured and tempered materiality of thread, cloth and needle, embodied and affective ways of sharing, listening to, and sometimes even overcoming painful and debilitating emotions (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2019). Yet while their “[m]aterial specificities” might suggest that textiles are generally prone to promote peace, their material relationalities always depend upon how they are “used and received” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 28 f.). In this way, textiles can add a complexifying dimension to research on the role of embodiment, affect and lived experience in peacebuilding (Berents 2015; Väyrynen 2019).

Finally, textile-making can be a creative and hands-on kind of peace-making. Generally, making constitutes a nonintellectual way of relating to and engaging with the world, others, and the self. As sociologist David Gauntlett (2018) argues, “making is connecting”: to create any new artefact or object, we have to connect existing materials and ideas, connect with people, and connect with our environments. From a psychoanalytical perspective, making also “affirms the self as a being with agency, acceptability and potency” (Parker 2010, p. xx; cf. Hunter 2019, p. 49). Not only can textile-making be a means for “the finding of form for thought” (Parker 2010, p. xx), but it can also constitute a way of thinking in its own right: “once we are tacitly familiar with the practice, the movement [of needle and thread] itself becomes a way of thinking” (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2019, p. 194). As a way of relating and engaging, textile-making is also political: taking “textile as a transitive verb,” “[t]o textile politics is to refuse easy binaries, to acknowledge complications: textured as in uneven, but also [...] as in tangibly worked and retaining some of the grain of that labor” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 7). However, “textile-based techniques, like any others, have no immanent politics” (Bryan-Wilson 2017, p. 31). Textile-making has often been employed in the service of war (Tidy 2019), but as the suffragette movement in the 1900s and 1910s, the peace activists of the 1970s and 1980s, and contemporary craftivists show, it can also be engaged as a different, more peaceful practice of politics (Greer 2014; Parker 2010). In post-conflict situations, needlework can serve to remake individuals’ sense of self and the social fabric of communities (Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2019; Garlock 2016). Therefore, not only can peace and conflict studies analyze textiles as textual, visual, and material primary sources (Adams 2018; Andrä et al. 2019; Doolan 2019; McEwan 2003), but it can also use textile-making as a method of participatory research, working not on but with victims and perpetrators of violence (Andrä and Bliesemann de Guevara 2019; Bliesemann de Guevara and Arias Lopez 2019; Bello Tocancipá and Aranguren Romero 2019).

Peace Through Textiles: Empirical Examples

Of the many textiles making peace, this section discusses a few examples to illustrate some of the theoretical threads outlined above: textiles that have played a role within official post-conflict mechanisms; traditional forms of textiles that were adapted and employed in struggles for peace; collective, transnational examples of textile-making for peace; and textile interpretations of a famous piece of anti-war art.

Textiles have sometimes played a part in official post-violence mechanisms. In Canada, the Living Healing Quilt Project was initiated in response to the Indian Residential Schools Truth and Reconciliation Commission and later gained the sponsorship of the commission. Consisting of individual quilt blocks produced by survivors of the residential schools that sought to assimilate indigenous children to Canadian culture, the project put together three quilts – “Schools of Shame,” “Child Prisoners,” and “Crimes Against Humanity” – which then traveled with the commission as it collected oral testimonies (Robertson 2009). In Peru, the indigenous women of the Asociación Kuyanaky collective gave testimony to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission by means of the arpillera (appliquéd wall hanging) “Ayer-Hoy” (“Yesterday-Today”). Documenting its makers’ experiences of the armed conflict between the military and the Sendero Luminoso, “Ayer-Hoy” was presented before the commission and later also used in a “vigil in front of the law court’s gate” (Franger 2014, p. 113f.) (Fig. 3). In South Africa, the Amazwi Abesifazane (Voices of Women) project responded to the limits and exclusions of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, whose process was focused on certain kinds of violence only, by documenting indigenous women’s experiences of apartheid violences in thousands of embroidered memory cloths that were later exhibited in South Africa and abroad (Becker 2004). As these examples show, for survivors whose experiences of violence would otherwise not be heard within official post-violence mechanisms – for women, indigenous, and other marginalized groups – textiles can offer an alternative language in which to bear testimony and make their voices heard.

Beyond official mechanisms, people have adapted traditional textile forms and practices to struggle for peace. In Chile, arpilleras – appliquéd and embroidered wall hangings

Textiles Making Peace, Fig. 3 Women of the Asociación Kuyanaky display the arpillera “Ayer-Hoy” in front of the building in Pamplona Alta in which the Truth and Reconciliation Commission held one of its official hearings, Peru, 2002 (Photo: G. Franger)

Textiles Making Peace,

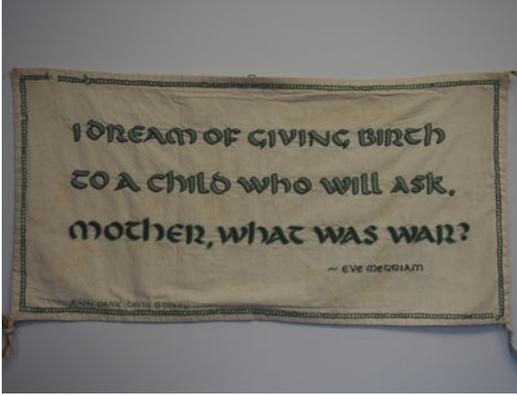

Fig. 4 Hay Golpe de Estado/There is a Coup d'Etat: An arpillera by an anonymous maker depicting the bombing of La Moneda, the Chilean seat of government, on 11 September 1973, Chile, 1989 (Photo: M. Melaugh, (c) Conflict Textiles) depicting mundane rural scenes, usually made by women – are a “traditional” textile craft that, during the Pinochet regime, was turned into a “dissident” one (Voionmaa Tanner 2012, p. 9) (Fig. 4). Relatives of the military dictatorship’s victims sewed arpilleras to record and denounce abductions, torture, murder, and economic deprivation. Smuggled out of the country and sold by international solidarity groups, some of these arpilleras also carried their messages to international audiences and created a modest income for their makers (Adams 2013; Agosin 2008). In Southeast Asia, the Hmong’s phra pra vet are intricately embroidered story cloths that depict not only “traditional tales” and “Hmong daily and ceremonial life” but also the Hmong’s “experiences of war, migration, and resettlement” (MacDowell 1991). An ethnic group from China, the Hmong were displaced to Vietnam, Laos, and Thailand during the nineteenth century and again faced displacement in the aftermath of the Vietnam War and the Laotian Civil War (Hamilton 2019, p. 577). Originally, Hmong women embroidered abstract decorative adornments for clothing and costumes (paj ntaub). Following the second wave of displacement, however, Hmong women and men in refugee camps in Thailand and the United States began to embroider pictorial story cloths to capture their experiences and share them with others (Craig 2010; Hassell 1984). Today, arpilleras and phra pra vet continue their struggle for peace. As part of public or private collections, they feature in exhibitions around the world and teach ever-new audiences about the misery that war and other violences cause (Andrä et al. 2019; Doolan 2019), and new generations of activists use arpillera-style textiles as visual and tactile means to communicate and protest new violences in Chile, Mexico, and elsewhere (Nowell 2020; Pardo 2017).

Textile-making can amount to a collective, transnational project of working toward peace. In August 1985, thousands of individually embroidered, appliquéd, quilted, woven, and painted panels were tied together to form a Peace Ribbon that spanned 15 miles from the United States Capitol along the National Mall and once around the Pentagon (Figs. 5 and 6). The ribbon was a “mode of communication” through which its makers, mostly women from the United States and around the world, protested against the nuclear arms race (Pershing 1996, p. 3). The Peace Ribbon exemplifies textiles’ “dual face”: the gendered connotations of the ribbon’s textile medium meant that it seemed “nonthreatening” to its makers and audience, which “made it possible for participants to make a public statement about nuclear arms policy” but which “[u]ltimately [. . .] had the effect of limiting the immediate impact of the event on the governmental level” (Pershing 1996, p. 3; cf. Hunter 2019, p. 141). Another example of collective and transnational textile-making for peace is the ongoing (since 2011) Bordando por la Paz y la Memoria (Embroidering for Peace and Memory) project (Fig. 7). Consisting of white cotton handkerchiefs onto which the personal details of people disappeared and killed in the context of the Mexican “war on drugs” have been stitched, the project seeks “to register every single person who had been killed,” “to rouse indignation” among the general public, and “to create a citizen memorial” (House 2019, p. 138). As handkerchiefs are embroidered in public settings in Mexico and elsewhere, the project is an example of how textile-making can be a way of remaking connections, communities, and social worlds (House 2019, p. 146 f.).

Textiles Making Peace, Fig. 5 Panel from the Peace Ribbon (Photo: L. Cole)

Textiles Making Peace, Fig. 6 Panel from the Peace Ribbon (Photo: L. Cole)

One of the most iconic anti-war paintings of the twentieth century, Pablo Picasso’s Guernica has been reworked in textile multiple times. A woven tapestry version made by artists Jacqueline and René de la Baume Dürrbach in 1955 and sanctioned by Picasso himself hangs just outside the chamber of the United Nations Security Council; it gained global attention when it was covered for the 2003 press conference in which Colin Powell argued for the necessity of the US-led war in Iraq (Ashmore 2017). Other textile replicas of Guernica were made collectively by activists and community organizations. A tapestry produced by the Keiskamma Art Project in 2009 and 2010 adapts Guernica’s imagery to articulate the impact of HIV/AIDS on rural South Africans as well as its makers’ resistance to the South African government’s inaction in the matter (Ashmore 2017, p. 390; cf. Wedderburn 2019). Other textile remakings of Guernica include a protest banner made by British activists (Ashmore 2017), an arpillera sewn by the daughter of parents who lived through the bombardment of the Basque town of Gernika in 1937 (Conflict Textiles 2020), and a 3D installation crocheted by Italian guerrilla crochet group Sul Filo dell’Arte. Collectively, these textile remakings complicate binary understandings of art/craft in the service of peace and bespeak the power of textiles “to convey a statement of opposition to those in power who prioritize their own agendas to the detriment of civilians” (Ashmore 2017, p. 379f.).

Summary

This chapter has offered theoretical and empirical starting points for peace and conflict research to begin to think about the relationship between textiles and peace. A thread running through the chapter has been the idea that textiles can, figuratively and literally, help to make peace. Textile-making – as meaning-making; as a material, affective, and embodied practice; and as creative and hands-on doing – can be a way of peace-making. Ultimately, thinking about the relationship between textiles and peace in terms of theoretical approaches and empirical examples will therefore only go so far.

Textiles Making Peace, Fig. 7 Bordando por la Paz y la Memoria embroidering handkerchiefs in public, Mexico, 2016 (Photo: D. House (2019: 141))

What is needed is not only an appreciation of textiles and peace as a research topic in its own right but a practical engagement in textile-making as a different way of thinking.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Conflict, Memory, and Memory Activism: Dealing with Difficult Pasts
- ▶ Memorials and Transitional Justice
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Photography and Peace
- ▶ Street Art and Peace

References

- Adams, J. (2013). Art Against Dictatorship: Making and Exporting Arpilleras Under Pinochet. Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Adams, J. (2018). Using visual methods in human rights research. Journal of Human Rights, 17(5), 674–684.
- Adamson, G. (2013). The Invention of Craft. London: Bloomsbury.
- Agosin, M. (2008). Tapestries of Hope, Threads of Love: The Arpillera Movement in Chile. Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Andrä, C. (2020). Textile efforts for peace. Stitched Voices Blog. Retrieved 27 May 2020 from <https://stitchedvoices.wordpress.com/2020/03/19/textile-efforts-for-peace/>.
- Andrä, C., & Bliesemann de Guevara, B. (2019). Konflikttextilien: Analytischer, Ästhetischer und Politischer Stoff für Friedensforschung und –arbeit. Wissenschaft und Frieden, 38(4). Retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://wissenschaft-und-frieden.de/seite.php?artikelID=2396>.
- Andrä, C., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., Cole, L., & House, D. (2019). Knowing through needlework: Curating the difficult knowledge of conflict textiles. Critical Military Studies. Online First, retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/full/10.1080/23337486.2019.1692566>.
- Ashmore, N. (2017). Guernica Remakings: Action, collaboration and thread. TEXTILE, 15(4), 376–395.
- Becker, C. (2004). Amazwi Abesifazane (voices of women). Art Journal, 63(4), 116–134.
- Bello Tocancipá, A. C., & Aranguren Romero, J. P. (2019). Voces de Hilo e Aguja: Construcciones de Sentido y

- Gestión Emocional de Prácticas Textiles en el Conflicto Armado Colombiano. H-ART Revista de Historia, Teoría y Crítica de Arte, 6(1), 181–204.
- Berents, H. (2015). An embodied everyday peace in the midst of violence. Peacebuilding, 3(2), 1–14.
- Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Arias Lopez, B. (2019). Biographical narratives and textile art: A research example from the Colombian peace process. Stitched Voices Blog. Retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://stitchedvoices.wordpress.com/2019/08/15/biographical-narratives-and-textile-art-colombia/>.
- Bryan-Wilson, J. (2017). Fray: Art and Textile Politics, 1970s–1990s. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Cole, L. (2019). Textile testimonies and gender-based violence. Stitched Voices Blog. Retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://stitchedvoices.wordpress.com/2019/12/16/textile-testimonies-and-gender-based-violence/>.
- Conflict Textiles. (2020). Mi Guernica/My Gernika. Retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://cain.ulster.ac.uk/conflicttextiles/search-quilts2/fulltextiles1/?id=406>
- Confortini, C. C. (2006). Galtung, violence, and gender: The case for a peace studies/feminism Alliance. Peace & Change, 31(3), 333–367.
- Craig, G. (2010). Patterns of change: Transitions in Hmong textile language. Hmong Studies Journal, 11(1), 1–48.
- Deacon, D. A., & Calvin, P. E. (2014). War Imagery in Women's Textiles: An International Study of Weaving, Knitting, Sewing, Quilting, Rug Making and Other Fabric Arts. Jefferson: MacFarlands.
- Doolan, E. (2019). Digital Resources: Conflict Textiles. Oxford Research Encyclopaedia of Latin American History. Retrieved 14 March from <https://oxfordre.com/latinamericanhistory/view/10.1093/acrefore/9780199366439.001.0001/acrefore-9780199366439-e-796>
- Engelkamp, S., Roepstorff, K., & Spencer, A. (2020). Visualizing peace: The state of the art. Peace & Change, 45(1), 5–27.
- Franger, G. (2014). Survival – Empowerment – Courage: Insights into the history and developments of Peruvian Arpilleras. In M. Agosin (Ed.), Stitching Resistance: Women, Creativity, and Fiber Arts (pp. 101–118). Kent: Solis Press.
- Galtung, J. (1964). An Editorial. Journal of Peace Research, 1(1), 1–4.
- Garlock, L. R. (2016). Stories in the cloth: Art therapy and narrative textiles. Art Therapy, 33(2), 58–66.
- Gauntlett, D. (2018). Making is Connecting: The social power of creativity, from craft and knitting to digital everything. Cambridge: Polity.
- Greer, B. (2014). Craftivism: The Art of Craft and Activism. Vancouver: Arsenal Pulp Press.
- Guillaume, X., Andersen, R. S., & Vuori, J. A. (2015). Paint it black: Colours and the social meaning of the battlefield. European Journal of International Relations 22(1), 49–71.
- Hamilton, C. (2019). Exploring the potential of the popular culture and world politics agenda: Actors, artefacts and the everyday. Australian Journal of Political Science, 54(4), 573–584.
- Hassel, C. J. (1984). Creating Pa nDau Appliqué: A New Approach to an Ancient Art Form. Illinois: Wallace Homestead Book Company.
- Hemmings, J. (2011). Postcolonial textiles: Negotiating dialogue. In J. Gohrisch & E. Grünkemeier (Eds.), Postcolonial Studies Across the Disciplines (pp. 23–50). Brill: Leiden.
- Hendrickson, H. (1996). Bodies and flags: The representation of Herero identity in colonial Namibia. In H. Hendrickson (Ed.), Clothing and Difference: Embodied Identities in Colonial and Postcolonial Africa (pp. 213–244). Durham: Duke University Press.
- House, D. (2019). In Search of Presence: Disappearance and Memory in Mexico. PhD Thesis, Aberystwyth University.
- Hunter, C. (2019). Threads of Life: A History of the World Through the Eye of a Needle. London: Sceptre.
- Jabri, V. (2013). Peacebuilding, the local and the international: A colonial or a postcolonial rationality? Peacebuilding, 1(1), 3–16.
- MacDowell, M. (1991). Stories in Thread: Hmong Pictorial Embroideries. East Lansing: Michigan State University press.
- MacGinty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue, 45(6), 548–564.
- McEwan, C. (2003). Building a postcolonial archive? Gender, collective memory and citizenship in post-apartheid South Africa. Journal of Southern African Studies, 29(3), 739–757.
- Möller, F. (2020). Peace aesthetics: A patchwork. Peace & Change, 45(1), 28–54.
- Naughten, J. (2013). Conflict and Costume: The Herero Tribe of Namibia. London: Merrell.
- Ndlovu-Gatsveni, S. J. (2015). The Decolonial Mandela: Embodiment of peace, justice, and humanism. Journal of Developing Societies, 31(3), 305–332.
- Nowell, C. (2020). In Chile, Women Use Traditional Embroidery to Urge Political Change. PRI's The World. Retrieved 14 March 2020 from https://www.pri.org/stories/2020-02-21/chile-women-use-traditional-embroidery-urge-political-change?utm_source=the-week&utm_medium=referral&utm_campaign=partnership
- Pardo, J. (2017). Collective art as resistance and activism: The arpillera “We Are Seeds”. Stitched Voices Blog. Retrieved 14 March 2020 from <https://stitchedvoices.wordpress.com/2017/11/24/collective-art-as-resistance-and-activism-the-arpillera-we-are-seeds/>
- Parker, R. (2010). The Subversive Stitch: Embroidery and the Making of the Feminine (3rd ed.). London: I.B. Tauris.
- Pershing, L. (1996). The Ribbon Around the Pentagon: Peace by Piecemakers. Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press.

- Premaratna, N., & Bleiker, R. (2016). Arts and theatre for peacebuilding. In O. Richmond, S. Pogodda, & J. Ramović (Eds.), The Palgrave Handbook of Disciplinary and Regional Approaches to Peace (pp. 82–94). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Robertson, K. (2009). Threads of Hope: The living healing quilt project. English Studies in Canada, 35(1), 85–107.
- St Clair, K. (2019). The Golden Thread: How Fabric Changed History. London: John Murray.
- Tidy, J. (2019). War craft: The embodied politics of making war. Security Dialogue, 50(3), 220–238.
- Väyrynen, T. (2019). Corporeal Peacebuilding: Mundane Bodies and Temporal Transitions. Cham: Palgrave.
- Voionmaa Tanner, L. F. (2012). Arpilleras: Arte Poblacional como Testimonio y Símbolo. In Arpilleras: Colección del Museo de la Memoria y los Derechos Humanos (pp. 9–15). Santiago de Chile: Ocho Libros Editores.
- Wedderburn, A. (2019). The appropriation of an icon: Guernica, remade. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 21(3), 480–487.
- Wibben, A., Confortini, C. C., Roohi, S., Aharoni, S. B., Vastapuu, L., & Vaittinen, T. (2019). Collective discussion: Piecing-up feminist peace research. International Political Sociology, 18(1), 86–107.
- Woodward, S. (2020). Material Methods: Researching and Thinking with Things. London: Sage.
- Zeltin Cooke, A., & MacDowell, M. (2005). Weavings of War: Fabrics of Memory. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press.

The Balkans

- ▶ Balkan as a Concept
- ▶ Balkanization

The Korean Peace Process

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

Theatre

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Theatre and Peacebuilding

Theatre and Peacebuilding

Nilanjana Premaratna
Umeå University, Umeå, Sweden

Synonyms

Art; Conflict transformation; Peacebuilding; Theatre

Description

Theatre for peacebuilding is increasingly gaining scholarly and practitioner interest as an approach for peacebuilding. Often found within critical and developing agendas in peace and conflict studies, it is seen to offer a possible platform to creatively engage with conflict narratives and emotional cultures of conflict. The range of theatre forms used for peacebuilding that encompass professional and participatory theatre aimed at personal healing, relationship building, dialogue, peace education, coexistence, and resistance illustrate the versatility of theatre as an approach. Prevailing peacebuilding can benefit from the broader repertoires of communication, representation, and participation offered within the theatre space. The entry provides a discussion of theatre forms used for peacebuilding and the contributions theatre can offer to peacebuilding. In conclusion, it identifies areas for further research.

Introduction

Theatre has historically been noted for its political relevance. Plato perceives the stage to be capable of disrupting established structures and hierarchies in the polis. People's movements across the world provide evidence for theatre's capacity to rearticulate politics. Attempts at legislative control of theatre in colonial India such as the Dramatic Performances Act of 1876 and the role of theatre as a space for expressing dissent during an oppressive regime in Sri Lanka during the 1980s (Obeyesekere 1999) are examples. Thus, while not being necessarily peaceful nor violent in and of itself, theatre has historically been an avenue to engage with and shape politics at ground level.

This entry draws from two previous works: Premaratna and Bleiker (2016) and Premaratna (2018).

The scholarly interest in the study of theatre for peacebuilding is relatively recent. It is often found within critical and developing agendas in peace and conflict studies where peacebuilding is understood as a nuanced nonlinear process. Discussions on everyday peace, agonistic peace, and feminist peace research that take peacebuilding beyond state-centric conceptualizations are of particular relevance here. Their shared emphasis on inclusion, representation, and participation of multiple voices provide an appropriate ground where theatre can locate itself as an accessible, versatile approach for peacebuilding.

Organized in two sections and supported by empirical evidence where relevant, this entry provides an overview of theatre's role in peacebuilding: firstly, it reviews literature on theatre forms used for peacebuilding. Secondly, it analyzes key contributions theatre can offer to peacebuilding.

Theatre Forms

Two overarching vantage points can be identified among various theatre forms developed and used for peacebuilding: theatre forms with a therapeutic take that focus on personal healing and reconciliation and theatre forms that adopt a broader, explicitly socio-political, and/or didactic lens. While these categories overlap and are by no means comprehensive, they provide an introductory grasp of the subfield.

Theatre forms developed for therapeutic purposes work for healing and reconciliation at the individual or small group level. Expression and reflexivity are prioritized over didactic goals. Depending on the issues processed, effective peacebuilding through these theatre forms call for qualified, trained practitioners. Psychodrama, drama therapy, and playback theatre are popular examples. Playback theatre where a small group of actors enact personal stories volunteered from the audience is especially noted for its capacity to facilitate individual and small group reconciliation (Fox 2006; Hutt and Hosking 2004). Expression and empathy that could occur through the process can result in mutual healing and closer relationships (Cohen 2005; Salas 2009).

Theatre forms that are developed or used for political engagement, in comparison, focus on issues at a broader societal level. Socio-political critique and educating play a primary role and the emphasis on shared issues and mobilization for transformation are other possible common features. Theatre of the Oppressed where the key focus is empowerment (Boal 2006) and Applied Theatre which gathers together a broad range of theatre forms produced to initiate change through a process of participation (Balme 2008; Nicholson 2014; Hughes and Nicholson 2016; Prentki and Preston 2009) are cases in point. Verbatim theatre and documentary theatre that perform testimonies and documented stories can be of particular relevance to engage with postwar memory and transitional justice (Simić 2017). The performance space and formats in theatre forms developed for political engagement can vary from street theatre to proscenium stage and community theatre to professional theatre. Often there is space during or immediately after the performance to discuss the play or the issues raised therein in public. Such theatre forms are commonly used for peacebuilding at a practitioner level given their broader applicability.

Contributions to Peacebuilding

Theatre can contribute to peacebuilding by broadening the parameters of prevailing approaches. Literature points in three directions: theatre can expand boundaries of communication for peacebuilding, offer a context-specific approach for peacebuilding, and encourage multivocality in place of seemingly definitive binary answers (Premaratna and Bleiker 2016).

Theatre allows us to go beyond the largely rational discourse within which prevailing approaches to peacebuilding operate, by offering alternative means of communication and the possibility to engage with emotions. Conflict dynamics insinuate into our regular language and conversational habits and create a lingering obstacle to peacebuilding (Cohen 2003; Diamond and McDonald 1996). Feminist peace research consistently highlights the need to take into account the corporeal aspects of peacebuilding (Väyrynen 2019; McLeod and O'Reilly 2019). Theatre as an embodied approach offers a wide repertoire of communication beyond that of the verbal and thereby opens up the possibility of overcoming or sidestepping some challenges with the mainstream approaches. The space for imagination and creativity to be exercised through a range of art forms can allow theatre an artistic freedom that can transcend boundaries of regular discourse. Thus, using theatre, practitioners can choose whether to avoid confronting divisive issues or delve into inevitable ambivalences in conflict narratives as appropriate. Doing so could provide alternative lenses into political strife (Bleiker 2009) and encourage people to engage in novel ways with each other. Such reinterpretations as Cobb (2003) argues can be of particular relevance to transform authoritarian narratives in identity conflicts.

Engaging with emotional cultures of trauma is another prerequisite for conflict transformation. Scholars highlight the role emotions play in civil life and conflict (Bleiker and Hutchison 2008; Nussbaum 2013) and critique peacebuilding for its inability to adequately address emotional cultures of conflict (Hutchison and Bleiker 2008, 2013). Here too, theatre with its ability to engage with emotions makes a significant contribution to the predominantly rational discourse on peacebuilding. Theatre as immediate, embodied interactive performance art can humanize conflict dynamics. Personalization and subsequent emotional engagement with the performance can open us up to relating to and empathizing with the other. Feelings evoked in performances and participant responses can go beyond rational cognition (Gallagher and Service 2010). Both qualitative and quantitative studies suggest that performances motivated by social change effectively changes audience attitudes and perceptions (Hawes 2007). By utilizing a range of communication that goes beyond the rational discourse, theatre can highlight alternative narratives or reshape existing one to be more conducive to peacebuilding.

An empirical example for how theatre seeks to go beyond the dominant political discourse on peacebuilding is the Nepalese theatre group Sarwanam. Sarwanam's minimalistic theatre style is characterized by limited dialogue and amplified body movement. These features enhance the accessibility of the group's plays across a range of ethno-linguistic groups in Nepal. Plays such as Remaining Pages of History capture and highlight emotional costs of the conflict and legacies of unresolved trauma from a grassroots perspective. Performed feelings of pain, fear, loss, and despair in the play are highly evocative and intense due to the particular theatre style and encourage the audience to empathize at a level difficult to reach through rational political discourse.

Theatre also contributes to broaden boundaries of prevailing peacebuilding through its capacity to engage with local context. Prevalent peacebuilding is critiqued for largely remaining within international and local elite networks and top-down frameworks, resulting in a disregard of local specificities (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Paffenholz 2015; Richmond 2012). When it is in tune with local culture, theatre being an art form can offer socio-culturally appropriate ways to engage with and transform local politics and everyday life. Theatre for peacebuilding can consequently draw from ground level resources such as culture and people's lived experience to offer alternative perspectives into conflict dynamics and peace processes. Theatre is also an accessible, collaborative, public activity that can physically bring people together. As such, it can become a platform where relationships are repaired or formed anew across conflict divides. These narratives integrate into the meaning-making process of communities. When used in conjunction with a peace process, theatre for peacebuilding can therefore act as a conduit between the grassroots and a formal political process, to elicit context-appropriate solutions.

Jana Karaliya is an example for a case that draws from local insights and culture to develop a tailored, context-specific peacebuilding approach through theatre. Initiated in 2002 during the cease-fire agreement between the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam and the Sri Lankan government, Jana Karaliya brings together youth from Sinhala and Tamil communities to form a multiethnic, bilingual mobile theatre group. Being multiethnic and bilingual addresses conflict polarities. The group enacts peaceful coexistence through the mobile theatre element and plays. Performances incorporate both Sinhala and Tamil music, theatre, and dance styles. The narrative of coexistence the group performs is therefore rooted within local cultures and traditions. Adopting theatre as an approach enabled the group to tailor their peacebuilding to the local context, resulting in offering a resilient strand of peacebuilding that survived challenging phases in the Sri Lankan conflict.

Theatre can make a significant contribution to peacebuilding by facilitating the expression and inclusion of multiple voices. Prevailing emphasis on liberal peacebuilding is critiqued for its inability to incorporate the diverse—often minority—voices from the ground (McLeod and O'Reilly 2019; Wibben et al. 2019), as introducing democratic procedures early on in postwar transition can negatively affect heterogeneity at ground (Fisher 2000; Franks and Richmond 2008; Jarstad 2016). Adequately listening to and incorporating minority voices is central for sustaining peace. Theatre has capacity for both. As an inclusive approach, it can bring out multiple and at times contradictory voices within the same platform. The medium's versatility and adaptability allow theatre to facilitate dialogue among and between such diverse and peripheral voices. Scholars highlight Greek tragedy as particularly relevant here for the democratic potential of the genre (Chou 2012; Mastrorarde 2010). Tragedy portrays the inherent disjuncture and contradictions in the world and reveals multiple coexisting realities and actions. Others perceive theatre as "one of the most powerful mediums for creating live contact between individuals from opposing sides of a conflict" (Cohen et al. 2011, p. 42). If integrated into the public discourse on peacebuilding, these multiple voices can open up the discussion beyond conflict polarities and metanarratives. Creative engagement with each other and the exercise of "moral imagination" as offered through art-based approaches such as theatre can result in experiences of collaboration and coexistence upon which alternative, hopefully peaceful futures can be envisioned (Lederach 2005). Theatre's ability to communicate in ways that go beyond everyday verbal language, liminality, and the transient nature of the performance all work to make the space safer and more appropriate for expressing what may be risky to express or censored elsewhere. When appropriately designed and utilized, theatre can thrive in and elicit dissent even in sensitive political situations.

Jana Sanskriti from India is an example for theatre's multivocality. The group works with communities in rural West Bengal and uses forum theatre to engage with conflicts and issues of structural violence (Ganguly 2010). Jana Sanskriti's core group is mostly made up of members that live and perform in their village level theatre groups. Storylines for scripts drawing from everyday realities are developed and fine-tuned through an inclusive, consultative process between the core group and village groups, tailored to reflect local contexts (Ganguly 2017; Premaratna 2018). Space for different voices to emerge is built into the process at each stage. The forum theatre format takes the multivocality further by allowing the audience to interrupt the play if they see an opportunity to change the narrative for the better at any point. The creative imaginary of theatre provides a platform where members can rehearse what may seem insurmountable in real life, in preparation for everyday activism and transformation. Jana Sanskriti's use of theatre therefore allows the expression of multiple, often silenced voices within a public platform and the integration of these into possible real-life solutions.

Summary and Conclusion

Despite a longstanding recognition of theatre's political relevance, scholarly interest in theatre for peacebuilding emerges with relatively recent calls for a nondualistic, nuanced understanding of peace and peacebuilding (Aggestam et al. 2015; Björkdahl and Mannergren Selimovic 2016; Mac Ginty and Firchow 2016; Söderström et al. 2019; McLeod and O'Reilly 2019). The local turn in peacebuilding, feminist peace research, and the more recent focus on the role of affect and emotions in politics significantly contribute to establish theatre's relevance. The range of theatre forms used for peacebuilding that encompass both personal and public engagement illustrate the versatility of theatre as an approach. Prevailing peacebuilding can benefit from the broader repertoires of communication, representation, and participation offered within the theatre space. It is important to reiterate two points here: theatre itself is neither peaceful nor violent and theatre's impact depends on its use and interpretation. While theatre for peacebuilding can facilitate eliciting voices from and conveying a peace process to the ground and vice versa, there needs to be an overarching political process and frameworks in place that can adequately utilize this potential. Challenges for future research come in three directions: empirical studies, conceptualization, and application. In-depth empirical studies on theatre for peacebuilding initiatives in various situations are needed to facilitate further conceptualization of how theatre works for peacebuilding, and both of these are prerequisites to develop tools for the effective designing, implementation, and impact assessment of the application of theatre for peacebuilding.

Cross-References

- ▶ Art and Reconciliation
- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Street Art and Peace
- ▶ Women's International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\)

Acknowledgments I thank the Varieties of Peace program and Umeå University for providing a stimulating intellectual environment where aspects of this work was discussed; Lars Waldorf for his insightful comments on an earlier draft; and Roland Bleiker for his many contributions to the previous work and research that this entry draws from.

References

- Aggestam, K., Cristiano, F., & Strömbom, L. (2015). Towards agonistic peacebuilding? Exploring the antagonism–agonism nexus in the middle east peace process. Third World Quarterly, 36(9), 1736–1753.
- Balme, C. B. (2008). The Cambridge introduction to theatre studies. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Björkdahl, A., & Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2016). A tale of three bridges: Agency and agonism in peace building. Third World Quarterly, 37(2), 321–335.
- Bleiker, R. (2009). Aesthetics and world politics. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bleiker, R., & Hutchison, E. (2008). Fear no more: Emotions and world politics. Review of International Studies, 34(S1), 115–135.
- Boal, A. (2006). The aesthetics of the oppressed. London: Routledge.
- Chou, M. (2012). Greek tragedy and contemporary democracy. New York: Bloomsbury.
- Cobb, S. (2003). Fostering coexistence in identity-based conflicts: Towards a narrative approach. In A. Chayes & M. Minow (Eds.), Imagine coexistence (pp. 294–310). San Francisco: Jossey Bass.
- Cohen, C. E. (2003). Engaging with the arts to promote coexistence. In M. Minow & A. Chayes (Eds.), Imagine coexistence: Restoring humanity after violent ethnic conflict. Hoboken: Jossey-Bass.
- Cohen, C. (2005). Creative approaches to reconciliation. In M. Fitzduff & C. E. Stout (Eds.), The psychology of resolving global conflicts: From war to peace. Westport: Greenwood Publishing Group.
- Cohen, C. E., Varea, R. G., & Walker, P. O. (Eds.). (2011). Acting together: Performance and the creative transformation of conflict: volume 1: Resistance and reconciliation in regions of violence. Oakland: New Village Press.
- Diamond, L., & McDonald, J. W. (1996). Multi-trace diplomacy: A systems approach to peace. West Hartford: Kumarian Press.
- Fisher, M. (2000). The liberal peace: Ethical, historical, and philosophical aspects. Paper presented at the BCSIA discussion paper 2000-07, Kennedy School of Government.
- Fox, J. (2006). Drumming and playback theatre: Partners for peace. A working paper of recasting reconciliation through culture and the arts: International Centre for Ethics, Justice, and Public Life, Brandeis University. Retrieved from <https://www.brandeis.edu/ethics/peacebuildingarts/pdfs/drummingplaybackfox.pdf>
- Franks, J., & Richmond, O. P. (2008). Coopting liberal peace-building: Untying the Gordian knot in Kosovo. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(1), 81–103.
- Gallagher, K., & Service, I. (2010). Applied theatre at the heart of educational reform: An impact and sustainability analysis. Research in Drama Education: The Journal of Applied Theatre and Performance, 15(2), 235–253.

- Ganguly, S. (2010). Jana Sanskriti: Forum theatre and democracy in India. New York: Routledge.
- Ganguly, S. (2017). From Boal to Jana Sanskriti: Practice and principles. New York: Routledge.
- Hawes, D. L. (2007). Crucial narratives: Performance art and peace building. International Journal of Peace Studies, 12(2), 17–29.
- Hughes, J., & Nicholson, H. (Eds.). (2016). Critical perspectives on applied theatre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hutchison, E., & Bleiker, R. (2008). Emotional reconciliation: Reconstituting identity and community after trauma. European Journal of Social Theory, 11(3), 385–403.
- Hutchison, E., & Bleiker, R. (2013). Reconciliation. In R. Mac Ginty (Ed.), Routledge handbook of peacebuilding. New York: Routledge.
- Hutt, J., & Hosking, B. (2004). Playback theatre: a creative resource for reconciliation. Working paper of recasting reconciliation through culture and the arts: International Centre for Ethics, Justice, and Public Life, Brandeis University. Retrieved from <https://www.brandeis.edu/ethics/peacebuildingarts/pdfs/HuttHoskingPlayback.pdf>
- Jarstad, A. (2016). Democratization after civil war: Timing and sequencing of peacebuilding reforms. In A. Langer & G. K. Brown (Eds.), Building sustainable peace: Timing and sequencing of post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding (pp. 87–109). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (2005). The moral imagination: The art and soul of building peace. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Firchow, P. (2016). Top-down and bottom-up narratives of peace and conflict. Politics, 36(3), 308–323.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- Mastrorarde, D. J. (2010). The art of Euripides: Dramatic technique and social context. Cambridge, UK: Cambridge University Press.
- McLeod, L., & O'Reilly, M. (2019). Critical peace and conflict studies: Feminist interventions. Peacebuilding, 7(2), 127–145.
- Nicholson, H. (2014). Applied Drama: The gift of theatre (2nd ed.). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Nussbaum, M. C. (2013). Political emotions: Why love matters for justice. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press.
- Obeyesekere, R. (1999). Sri Lankan theatre in a time of terror: Political satire in a permitted space. New Delhi: Sage.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874.
- Premaratna, N. (2018). Theatre for peacebuilding: The role of arts in conflict transformation in South Asia. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Premaratna, N., & Bleiker, R. (2016). Art and theatre for peacebuilding. In O. Richmond, S. Pogodda, & J. Ramović (Eds.), Dimensions of peace: Disciplinary and regional approaches (pp. 82–94). Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Prentki, T., & Preston, S. (Eds.). (2009). The applied theatre reader. New York: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2012). Beyond local ownership in the architecture of international peacebuilding. Ethnopolitics, 11(4), 354–375.
- Salas, J. (2009). Playback theatre: A frame for healing. In D. R. Johnson & R. Emunah (Eds.), Current approaches in drama therapy (pp. 445–460). Springfield: Charles C Thomas Publisher.
- Simić, O. (2017). Arts and transitional justice. In O. Simić (Ed.), An introduction to transitional justice (pp. 223–248). New York: Routledge.
- Söderström, J., Åkebo, M., & Jarstad, A. (2019). Friends, fellows and foes: A new framework for studying relational peace (Umeå working papers in peace and conflict studies). Umeå: Department of Political Science, Umeå University. Retrieved from <http://urn.kb.se/resolve?urn=urn:nbn:se:umu:diva-157430>
- Väyrynen, T. (2019). Corporeal peacebuilding: Mundane bodies and temporal transitions. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Wibben, A. T. R., Confortini, C. C., Roohi, S., Aharoni, S. B., Vastapu, L., & Vaitinen, T. (2019). Collective discussion: Piecing-up feminist peace research. International Political Sociology, 13(1), 86–107.

Third-Party Intervention

► UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Thomas Aquinas

► Just War Theory Across Time and Culture

Timor Lorosa'e

► Post-Conflict Timor-Leste

Track II Diplomacy

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

Track Two Diplomacy

- ▶ Peacebuilding and Korean Civil Society

Traditional Peace Approaches

- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Transdisciplinary

- ▶ Feminist Peace Research

Transformation of Conflict

- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Transitional International Order

- ▶ Liberal Peacebuilding in a Transitional International Order

Transitional Justice

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Reconciliation in Northern Ireland
- ▶ Silence and Peacebuilding

Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding

Eric Hoddy¹ and Paul Gready²

¹Department of Urban Studies and Planning,
The University of Sheffield, Sheffield, UK

²Centre for Applied Human Rights,
University of York, York, UK

Definition

Societies transitioning away from conflict or repression will often initiate processes of transitional justice for holding perpetrators of violence to account and providing redress for victims. The core transitional justice mechanisms include criminal trials, truth commissions, and reparations, which have been applied mainly in Global South settings and under the broad mission of addressing violent pasts and laying the foundations for future peace and stability. Post-conflict peacebuilding on the other hand refers to work designed to prevent the recurrence of violence, addressing the underlying causes of conflict and helping people resolve their differences peacefully. In practice, it includes work around conflict transformation, rule of law promotion, and economic development, and involves a wide range of activities such as DDR, institution building, and community dialogue. It is distinct from transitional justice as a field of practice and scholarship, although transitional justice is often described as a component of peacebuilding. Like transitional justice, it is concerned to support the development of more peaceful societies.

Introduction

Transitional justice and peacebuilding are two traditions that deal in different ways with violence in post-conflict settings and laying the groundwork for peace. The origins of contemporary transitional justice are traced back to the so-called “third wave” of democratization in Latin America and Eastern Europe in the 1980s and 1990s, when new governments sought ways of responding to abuses under the former regimes (Mihir 2016; Arthur 2009). Truth commissions, which perhaps most symbolize transitional justice, were developed during the Latin American transitions for examining and documenting human rights violations under the military dictatorships and for making recommendations about redress and preventing future violations. Around the same time, an expansion in the range of legal mechanisms and regimes available to transitional justice for prosecuting perpetrators of violence (Lawther and Moffett 2017) paved the way for the creation of the International Criminal Court, which began functioning in 2002 for dealing with international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes. Increasingly, transitional justice has become applied in post-conflict settings and unfolds through a range of judicial and non-judicial instruments and mechanisms, including reparations, memorials, and security sector reform alongside criminal trials and truth commissions. The United Nations identifies four pillars of transitional justice: truth, justice, reparation, and guarantees of nonrecurrence. Transitional justice processes are initiated by governments in post-conflict settings and are backed by intergovernmental organizations, NGOs, and supported through large-scale funding from Western donors.

Post-conflict peacebuilding emerged and developed around this same period, reflecting new expectations at the end of the Cold War around the role of international actors in addressing civil conflicts and new beliefs about the conditional nature of state sovereignty (see “► Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality” in the chapter by Chandler, this volume). The UN secretary general’s Agenda for Peace report in 1992 defined peacebuilding as efforts to “identify and support structures which will tend to consolidate peace and advance a sense of confidence and wellbeing among people.” Over the next few decades, peacebuilding activities came to incorporate a broad range of interventions in the political, economic, and social spheres of post-conflict societies. These would include the monitoring of elections, penal and judicial reform, tackling corruption, and promoting conflict resolution and reconciliation (UN 1992, 2000). A “statebuilding” agenda under a good governance framework became central in the 2000s, and prioritized activities for creating and strengthening state institutions as a prerequisite for building towards democracy and economic reform.

Transitional justice and peacebuilding may appear to share a great deal in common. Transitional justice has become included in mandates of a number of UN peacekeeping operations and it is often described as a component of peacebuilding. At the same time, these traditions have “not always been seen as part of the same enterprise and linkages between them have not generally received a great deal of attention by scholars” (Sharp 2013, p. 167; Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik 2016). This entry discusses the underexamined relationship between the two traditions and work that has sought to close this gap. The entry also reflects on the transitional justice–peacebuilding “nexus” in light of several developments within, and critiques of, mainstream scholarship and practice in each tradition. These include the liberal peace assumptions that underpin both traditions; a lack of attention to socioeconomic issues, such as inequality and marginalization; the imported and top-down approaches to justice and peace; and a number of “local turns” that seek to refocus transitional justice and peacebuilding around communities and local justice and peace initiatives. Emerging through these critiques are agendas for more transformative and emancipatory modes of practice in both traditions that share a common emphasis on local priorities and resources and the transformation of relationships and structures. The entry suggests there is a more radical nexus at the intersection of “transformative justice” and “emancipatory peacebuilding” and it identifies several potential points of connection.

From “Peace Versus Justice” to Integration and Coordination

The relationship between transitional justice and peacebuilding remains underexamined, even though both traditions have been in regular contact over the recent two decades. The “peace versus justice” debate which began in the late 1990s brought both together, but in a relationship characterized by tension rather than synergy. Those prioritizing justice point to the importance of accountability for strengthening the legitimacy of new governments and enhancing a belief in the rule of law among national populations. Advocates of peace on the other hand take a pragmatic approach that considers the political context in which prosecutions and other accountability initiatives take place. Retributive justice is viewed as frequently at odds with peacebuilding activities such as where transitional justice processes divert resources away from securing peace, provoke negative responses from perpetrators, prologue wars, and risk destabilizing fragile peace settlements.

Disagreements over this question seem to reflect the different objectives, strategies, roles, desired outcomes, and principles guiding the work of practitioners and academics in these traditions (Parlevliet 2010; Simpson 2017). The emergence of a “peace with justice” understanding attempted to solve the dilemma by acknowledging the multidimensional nature of justice, and by shifting attention towards how peace and justice could be pursued together and in terms of challenges “that need to be addressed on a case by case basis, taking into consideration a range of factors including context, time frame and developing international standards” (Parlevliet 2010, p. 4). The 2004 UN secretary general’s report on transitional justice contributed to this reframing, describing justice, peace, and democracy “not [as] mutually exclusive objectives, but rather mutually reinforcing imperatives” (UN 2004, p. 1). Though some have raised doubts about whether this reorientation resolved the debate, it nevertheless repositioned justice promotion and peacebuilding on more favorable terms with the potential for cross-fertilization of ideas and synergies in policy and practice. The emergence of a “positive peace” commitment in peacebuilding would later move the debate in similar directions by shifting away from the “negative peace” parameters that have defined the justice versus peace dilemma (Sharp 2014). “Positive peace” expands the “negative peace” understanding, that connote the absence of direct violence, in favor of a perspective on peace as absence of indirect and structural violence and by conditions of social justice that alleviate or remove the underlying causes of conflict.

In terms of this reorientation, a number of contributions have examined what role transitional justice might play in post-conflict peacebuilding and how transitional justice might be better integrated or coordinated with peacebuilding activities on the ground. Areas for enhancing integration or coordination have included SSR and DDR, for example, which are often viewed as in tension with transitional justice. For instance, the focus of transitional justice and DDR on different constituencies has been suggested as the main source of tension between the two: the former focusing on victims and the pursuit of justice, and the latter on ex-combatants and preventing the return to violence. One risk with accountability initiatives is that they might dissuade combatants from demobilizing, such as happened during negotiations with the Lord’s Resistance Army in Uganda, or that they may lead perpetrators to seek guarantees of non-prosecution. On the other hand, truth commissions have been suggested as having the potential to support reintegration, for example, by facilitating discussions of the past that result in communities beginning to acknowledge and accept the return of combatants who were also perpetrators (Sriram and Herman 2009). In addition, reparations may result in victims feeling less aggrieved about ex-combatants receiving DDR benefits (Bryden et al. 2005; Waldorf 2009, 2013; Sriram and Herman 2009; Sriram et al. 2013). Support for local-level justice processes are also suggested as potentially significant, such as happened in Sierra Leone where local cleansing and healing rituals were part of the reintegration of large numbers of former child soldiers or accompanying personnel (Sriram 2013).

Tensions between peace and justice also characterize the transitional justice–SSR relationship in some settings. In El Salvador for instance, reform efforts were put in jeopardy by a report from the truth commission which threatened to name perpetrators (Sriram 2004). Security sector institutions may also be destabilized by having expertise removed and spoilers placed in wider society, such as happened in Iraq (Sedra 2007). In other settings there may be synergies, however. Reform may comprise a form of reparations with the purpose of guaranteeing the nonrepetition of human rights violations. Prosecuting leaders of security forces or armed groups may assist with the departure of perpetrators acting as obstacles to reform (Bryden et al. 2005). Truth commissions might be another way of facilitating reform. In South Africa, for example, the work of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission led to abuses coming to light and the subsequent departure of many senior officers (van Zyl 2005; Mobekk 2006; Barr 2011). Transitional justice may also support rule of law assistance as part of larger peacebuilding initiatives, such as by restoring confidence in the justice sector, enhancing trust (Herman et al. 2012), and by facilitating a procedural respect for the rule of law (McAuliffe 2013).

Commonalities and Critiques

In setting out a framework for linking transitional justice and peacebuilding, Sharp (2013, p. 169) warned of the dangers of overlooking the critiques that have been leveled against each and the risk of transitional justice coming “to be seen as yet one more box to tick on the ‘post-conflict checklist,’ a routine part of the template deployed in the context of post-conflict peace operations.” Recent efforts to examine the nexus between transitional justice and peacebuilding have drawn on critical studies to identify the commonalities between the two traditions, with the overall aim of improving policy and practice (Sharp 2013) and enhancing understanding of both fields (Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik 2016). In terms of the academic interchange between both traditions, Millar and Lecy’s (2016) examination of the academic literature revealed a large gap. According to the authors, each tradition “march[es] along largely engaged with their own conceptions of the needs and demands of post-conflict societies and individuals, but rarely taking proper note of what the other is saying” (Millar and Lecy 2016, p. 316). This gap is also reflected in practice, where transitional justice and peacebuilding practitioners remain underexposed to each other’s issues, opportunities, and disciplines (Simpson 2017). For McAuliffe (2017), peacebuilding’s lack of engagement with transitional justice should not be all that surprising, however, as it reflects the multidimensional nature of liberal peacebuilding where transitional justice is marginal to its core focus.

Four main overlaps or similarities between transitional justice and peacebuilding are identified: a rootedness of each in liberal peace assumptions; a common blindness to social and economic issues; the imported and top-down nature of transitional justice and peacebuilding activities; and “local turns” and a concern for enhancing participation in both traditions.

Liberal Peace Assumptions

In the first instance, transitional justice and peacebuilding are suggested as sharing a common rootedness in liberal peace assumptions. These critiques emerged through an interrogation of the “liberal peacebuilding” project, whose core assumption is “that the surest foundation for peace, both within and between states, is market democracy, that is, a liberal democratic polity and a market-oriented economy” (Paris 1997, p. 56). The critique of liberal peacebuilding maintains that its emphasis on free markets and developing democratic institutions in post-conflict interventions risks destabilizing societies and returning them to situations of conflict. Vulnerabilities can include social inequalities, weak state capacity, and heterogeneity, which become more volatile and polarized as political and economic systems liberalize (Newman 2009). For instance, elites may resist change where they stand to lose from democratization. Electoral politics may also exacerbate social tensions between groups. In contexts where inequalities and social grievances are high, privatization and reductions in public expenditure may run contrary to the urgent need for poverty alleviation and employment generation.

Applying the liberal peace critique to transitional justice, Sriram (2007, p. 579) suggests transitional justice processes “are increasingly part of broader peacebuilding strategies, and share a faith that other key goods—democracy, ‘justice’—can essentially stand in for, and necessarily create, peace.” As an integral part of peacebuilding, these “goods” can be destabilizing however, such as where new governance structures are too weak to deal with instability arising from resistance to domestic accountability processes. The transitional justice focus on civil and political issues reflects a liberal focus on rights and an approach to dealing with the past that ignores or neglects economic, social, and cultural concerns. While transitional justice has not directly challenged economic liberalization, there remain links to the economy such as the high costs associated with transitional justice processes may put developing economies under strain. Addressing social and economic issues through transitional justice may be made more difficult by having it more deeply embedded in peacebuilding (Sriram 2014).

Socioeconomic Issues

Second, the practice of peacebuilding and transitional justice has generally given scant attention to socioeconomic issues, such as income inequality, socioeconomic marginalization, and unemployment, that are linked to the effects of conflict (Baker and Obradovic-Wochnik 2016; Richmond 2014). While material deprivation, inequality, and competition over resources are all recognized as playing a role in conflict formation, the focus in peacebuilding on free markets and “economic growth” may mean past grievances over resource distribution are left unaddressed (see “► Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding” in the chapter by Lai, this volume; Sriram 2014). Processes of liberalization may see new grievances emerge and old ones revived. In Nicaragua, El Salvador, and Guatemala, for example, rapid marketization has been suggested as reproducing some of the socioeconomic conditions that fueled unrest in these societies in the first place (Paris 2004). In transitional justice, economic and social rights (ES) violations have been generally ignored. Its core focus has remained on civil and political rights violations despite it being a long-accepted principle in international law that ES rights are indivisible from civil and political ones. Where ES rights are acknowledged, such as in the reports of truth commissions, it is usually as “background information [...] which is setting the context for what are perceived as more serious violations of civil and political rights” (Cahill-Ripley 2014, p. 184). A failure in practice to treat these rights indivisibly reflects perhaps some of the ambivalence towards ES rights within the international human rights movement during the tradition’s formative years and lingering questions about their justiciability (Sharp 2014).

Imported and Top-Down Approaches to Peace and Justice

Third, traditions have been charged with being insensitive to context and ignoring local voice. Interventions may also lack local legitimacy. In peacebuilding, these problems have reflected the tradition’s “emphasis on top-down institution building, external trusteeship and administration, and the importation of liberal values, as well as political, social, economic and development models by an epistemic community of peacebuilders who focus on blue-print institutions” (Richmond 2009, p. 153). In transitional justice, preferences among Western governments and associated institutions has been for “precisely the type of legalised accountability familiar to Western court systems” which may not be appropriate to political, legal, and cultural contexts (Sriram 2007, p. 589). Transitional justice has been criticized for being dominated by legal professionals with a particular legal discourse and practice that widens the gap between practitioners and communities (e.g., Robins 2012). Other transitional justice initiatives and mechanisms have been criticized for being implemented as part of a toolkit or template (Duthie and Seils 2017; Lundy and McGovern 2008).

Critics suggest the tendency towards blueprint institutions and top-down institution building is rendered through a presentation of peacebuilding and transitional justice initiatives as technical and politically neutral affairs. Local context and voice are backgrounded through a conception of free markets, elections, and other peacebuilding elements as nonnegotiable and as “principles true in every country” (Mitchell 2002, cited in Sending 2009, p. 5). For critics, the representation of both traditions as technical and politically neutral obfuscates the difficult trade-offs that need to be made for advancing post-conflict objectives (Sharp 2013) and shuts out questions of welfare, social justice, and other ways of organizing post-conflict societies and economies (Sharp 2013; Franzki and Olarte 2014). As discussed below, recognition of these problems has driven agendas in both traditions towards cultivating local, bottom-up, and hybrid processes of peace and approaches to justice that encompass communities and victims and their needs and priorities, and local knowledges, institutions, and norms.

Local Turns and Participation

Finally, both traditions have seen the emergence of agendas for local peace and justice initiatives over the recent two decades. In peacebuilding, which has gone further than transitional justice in investigating and critiquing ideas such as hybridity, the local turn has signified a departure from the liberal peacebuilding project, in particular from the imported and top-down nature of its interventions. The first “local turn” in peacebuilding began in the 1990s in the context of failed international efforts to support sustainable peace in places like Somalia and Rwanda. These failures showed that, alongside the occasional lack of political will among the international community, “the UN’s peace intervention toolbox – including diplomacy, peace-making, peacekeeping and peacebuilding strategies – was ill-equipped for managing intrastate conflicts” (Leonardsson and Rudd 2015). At the same time, the recently established conflict transformation school was emphasizing the importance of empowering local people as the main architects of peace (Rupesinghe 1995). It suggested the role of external peacebuilders should become more limited and focused instead on supporting local processes of peacebuilding while respecting local traditions and cultural practices.

A second “local turn” arose in the 2000s in response to the disappointing or ambiguous results of the first. Despite the uptake of a local agenda, “the core of international programmes remains the same [...] the local is securitised and modernised in Western liberal and neoliberal terms, rather than supported in its local struggle for peace” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013, p. 776; also Mac Ginty 2015). Located within critiques of the universalist ideas of peace, the second local turn emphasizes local, everyday experiences of violence and community understandings of how to respond to these. Peacebuilding initiatives may be contested or resisted locally, where the “local” refers to “locally based agencies present within a conflict and post-conflict environment, some of which are aimed at identifying and creating the necessary processes for peace, perhaps with or without international help, and framed in a way in which legitimacy in local and international terms converges” (Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013, p. 769). Community-based peace initiatives are prioritized in practice, such as local dispute and conflict resolution mechanisms, local dialogue and education initiatives, and advocacy work that seeks to bring about policy changes. The fostering of hybrid political orders has also been advocated as an alternative to liberal templates, where state institutions and customary institutions, and new notions of citizenship and civil society are combined “in networks of governance that are not introduced from the outside, but embedded in the societal structures on the ground (Boege et al. 2009, p. 20).”

Transitional justice’s “local turn” (Kochanski 2018), meanwhile, has been driven by concerns about the lack of local legitimacy and “ownership,” and by practitioner concerns about the limited ways participation has been operationalized in transitional justice mechanisms. The ad hoc tribunals in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda for instance garnered criticism for being distant and isolated. Nationals in both regions were excluded from holding high-level positions in favor of prosecutors and judges who were in many cases “almost totally ignorant about local history and culture” (Sharp 2014, p. 87). A shift in focus would ensue “from high courts to hybrid court and traditional justice systems, and from internationally influenced TRCs to more locally dominated ones” that could be more sensitive to cultural norms and practices (Triponel and Pearson 2010, p. 120; also Sharp 2013; Shaw and Waldorf 2010). The idea was that effective, legitimate, and sustainable interventions were assured through greater participation of domestic institutions and actors (Sharp 2018). A further development in this direction was the increasing attention given to victim participation in transitional justice from around the middle of the 2000s. It entered through discussions about approaches to reparations mechanisms and through the development of “victims’ rights” as a body of norms within international human rights law, international criminal law, and international humanitarian law (Correa et al. 2009; García-Godos 2016). These developments provided normative reasons for adopting participatory approaches in addition to the need for interventions that are sustainable. Transitional justice mechanisms such as truth commissions were recast as “victim oriented” or “victim centred,” and victims given more space to participate in international criminal justice institutions and processes.

Much like in peacebuilding, critics suggest that the toolkit approach still dominates in transitional justice and that this approach remains problematic. Where participation has been operationalized, it has tended to be of the consultative and information-sharing kind and therefore limited in scope (e.g., Lundy and McGovern 2008). Responses have come in the form of renewed calls for widening the scope of participation further through more “bottom-up” initiatives, driven by civil society actors in the main and organized informally outside of – but usually in relation to – formal transitional justice mechanisms and processes (McEvoy and McGregor 2008; Tsai and Robins 2018). Such processes may provide “effective participation in formal transitional justice processes” and “broaden the transformative impact of transitional justice processes” (Tsai and Robins 2018, p. 33). Examples of “local-level processes” may include judicial processes and dispute resolution; local truth telling and memorialization, such as the Ardoyne Commemoration Project in Northern Ireland; documentation of violations and forensic investigations; support to victims; advocacy and social movements, such as the Khulumani Survivor Support Group in South Africa that promotes individual and community reconciliation; and traditional ritual and healing.

Looking Forward: Transformation and Emancipation

These critiques have framed emerging agendas in both transitional justice and peacebuilding for more “transformative” or “emancipatory” alternatives. In transitional justice, an agenda on “transformative justice” is centered around “transformative change that emphasises local agency and resources, the prioritisation of process rather than preconceived outcomes, and the challenging of unequal and intersecting power relationships and structures of exclusion at both local and global levels” (Greedy and Robins 2014, p. 2). It emphasizes social and political processes over legal ones; responses to structural and systemic violence, which are often prioritized by communities and populations; and local empowerment and participation as correctives to the top-down and toolkit approach of mainstream practice. The field is yet to decide whether transformative justice amounts to reforming transitional justice or replacing it entirely.

In peacebuilding, the notion of “emancipatory peacebuilding” has been around for longer and there are at least two distinct approaches to it. Both approaches are marked by a sensitivity to local justice issues and a perspective of justice as “constituent to supporting meaningful peace” (Byrne and Thiessen 2019). While most critics of liberal peacebuilding such as Roland Paris are committed to a reformed liberal project, emancipatory peacebuilding agendas may in some respects depart from it. The first approach is represented by Oliver Richmond’s (2012, pp. 3–4) conception of an “emancipatory peace” which refers to “an everyday form of peace, offering care, respecting but also mediating culture and identity, institutions, and custom, providing for needs, and assisting the most marginalised in their local, state, regional and international contexts.” Building this peace involves a focus on grassroots and bottom-up projects that engage with marginalized and excluded groups and issues of social justice, and which involve social movements and other social actors (Lidén 2009). It entails a practice of “provocation or creation of local peacebuilding agency, allow[ing] it space to contest the liberal peace and represent its own contextual dynamics, and [which] ultimately through a local and transnational political process, leads to hybrid forms of peace” (Richmond 2012, p. 4; see also “► Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace” in the chapter by Boege, this volume). The second approach focuses on indigenous peacebuilding practices and mechanisms that are frequently overlooked by mainstream peacebuilding and which concentrate on truth-telling, reconciliation, and the reestablishment of relationships (Mac Ginty 2008). This particular approach underscores how indigenous methods may achieve legitimacy that is absent from mainstream tools and practices, and that it may be a source of alternative visions of peace.

Both agendas have developed largely in isolation from one another although they share many of the same concerns and critiques of mainstream practice in respective fields. What follows is an outline of a more radical nexus at the intersection of “transformative justice” and “emancipatory peacebuilding” that comprises several potential points of connection.

Structural Violence and Root Causes

“Transformative justice” and “emancipatory peacebuilding” may converge around an understanding of justice and peace that recognizes the indivisibility of economic, social, cultural, civil, and political concerns. This indivisibility at the heart of both agendas is acquired by bringing to bear a focus on structural violence and the structural roots of poverty and conflict. The convergence is assisted by recasting the peace versus justice debate in “positive peace” and “positive justice” terms, where we are encouraged to think “of peace as an expansive concept able to connect with everyday needs and aspirations. Similarly, positive justice is an expansive concept that encompasses and that goes beyond the formal and judicial to recast justice as people in post-conflict context having access to resources” (Firchow and Mac Ginty 2019, p. 279).

Justice initiatives that act on this indivisibility may support emancipatory peacebuilding, for example, by having structural violence and the structural roots of poverty and conflict investigated through formal or informal mechanisms. Reparations may provide a way of addressing violence and its roots. While traditionally reparations have been conceived as a process for returning victims to their original condition, it has been argued they may be designed to provide transformative redress rather than restitution, so as not to return victims to the conditions of structural discrimination that characterized the past. Transformative reparations have been considered in relation to women’s experiences of conflict in particular (e.g., Boesten 2019). Weber’s (2017) grassroots work with women in Colombia for instance points to a role for reparations in restructuring social relations around education, organizational skills, and income-generating projects that might enhance women’s social and economic agency and autonomy. Brett and Malagon (2013) suggest at least three ways transformative reparations can contribute to emancipatory peacebuilding: (1) by addressing and redressing the root causes of conflict; (2) by addressing and redressing civil and political rights grievances in tandem with the socioeconomic and structural conditions for conflict; and (3) by promoting the participation of victims in the reparations process and their ownership over that process.

Social and Economic Development

Responding to structural violence and root causes also entails a commitment to a notion of development that goes beyond a narrow growth paradigm to connect with local needs and issues of inequality and welfare. Research in transitional and post-conflict settings routinely finds communities prioritizing socioeconomic needs and concerns, highlighting again the disconnect between mainstream practice in both traditions and communities (e.g., Vinck and Pham 2014). An “indicators of peace” project in Northern Uganda, for example, has seen communities develop indicators around issues of lack of food, work, and access to land, and indicators that link to state provision such as access to medicine and money for school fees. At the same time, there was a lack of enthusiasm for transitional justice with an emphasis on civil and political interventions (Firchow and Mac Ginty 2019). Alternatives to the neoliberal template may be inspired or served by local systems of welfare and welfare provision in post-conflict settings, and other state models such as social democratic and welfare-based models (Richmond 2012). Social and economic development may be usefully recast in terms of “development alternatives” or “alternatives to development” (e.g., Lang and Mokrani 2013) that center around local agencies and resources, and local culture and knowledges. Justice initiatives may support emancipatory peacebuilding here, such as by having truth commissions contribute to broad national debates about new economic models, in particular, where “economic injustices are endemic and economic differences fuelled conflict in the past” (Gready and Robins 2014, p. 356). Truth-telling may shed light on structures and mechanisms of exclusion at the global level, not least on those that are manifest in the international political economy and in historic North–South hierarchies.

Supporting Local Agencies

Finally, there is a shared commitment to supporting local agencies for pursuing justice and peace and an understanding that these need to be experienced by communities in order to be meaningful. In this vein, local turns and participation in both traditions have yielded community-based justice initiatives, initiatives for peace, and hybrid political orders that contest the logic of imported and top-down approaches to peace and justice, as discussed above. Transformative justice may assist emancipatory peacebuilding by cultivating local agencies in more participatory transitional justice processes and for advocacy work around the design of new or more responsive institutions, policies, and programs, such as agrarian reform or access to services. Local agencies may seek to harness the law and legal processes strategically, such as where litigation raises the public profile of socioeconomic issues in post-conflict/transition settings. Tentative excursions in the scholarship have also been made around transitional justice and the mechanisms of participatory governance, such as Zurba’s (2014) treatment of collaborative governance around natural resources as a means of reconciliation and addressing structural violence. Supporting local agencies may be usefully conceived of as part of a broader justice “assemblage” (Reading 2019, p. 236) that comprises clusters of practices involving “unfinished processes and interventions that operate across a number of domains” and scales, and which seek to consolidate particular justice goals over time. As well as judicial and political domains, such as represented through truth commissions and institutional apologies, and the economic domain (e.g., return of property), these may include the symbolic (e.g., cultural and creative acts), spiritual (such as local ceremonies), and affective (for example, individual and group therapy) acts and stories involving and driven by victims and survivors.

Summary

Transitional justice and peacebuilding deal in different ways with violence in post-conflict settings and laying the groundwork for peace. While they may appear to share a lot in common, the connections between them are only beginning to be understood. This entry has discussed some recent contributions seeking to close this gap that emphasize enhanced coordination and integration between transitional justice mechanisms and peacebuilding activities. The entry also moved from a discussion of this “mainstream” nexus towards a more radical nexus that draws on developments within, and critiques of, mainstream scholarship and practice in each tradition: liberal peace assumptions that underpin both traditions; the neglect of socioeconomic issues; the imported and top-down nature of interventions; and several “local turns” that shift focus towards local justice and peace initiatives. Looking forward, the entry began providing an outline of a more radical nexus between transformative justice and emancipatory peacebuilding that comprises a common commitment towards addressing structural violence and the root causes of conflict and violence; a focus on social and economic development; and supporting local agencies.

Cross-References

- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Peacebuilding: Utopia and Reality
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding

References

- Arthur, P. (2009). How transitions reshaped human rights: A conceptual history of transitional justice. Human Rights Quarterly, 31, 321–367.
- Baker, C., & Obradovic-Wochnik, J. (2016). Mapping the nexus of transitional justice and peacebuilding. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 281–301.
- Barr, C. (2011). Making connections: Bridging transitional justice and security sector reform to confront conflict-related sexual and gender-based violence. The Fletcher Journal of Human Security, 26, 5–23.
- Boege, V., Brown, M. A., & Clements, K. P. (2009). Hybrid political orders, not fragile states. Peace Review, 21(1), 13–21.
- Boesten, J. (2019). Recalling violence: Gender and memory work in contemporary post-conflict Peru. In R. Shackel & L. Fiske (Eds.), Rethinking transitional gender justice (pp. 165–185). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Brett, R., & Malagon, L. (2013). Overcoming the original sin of the “original condition.” How reparations may contribute to emancipatory peacebuilding. Human Rights Review, 14(3), 257–271.
- Bryden, A., Donais, T., & Hänggi, H. (2005). Shaping a security governance agenda in post-conflict peacebuilding. Geneva: Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces.
- Byrne, S., & Thiessen, C. (2019). Foreign peacebuilding intervention and emancipatory local agency for social justice. In S. Byrne, T. Matyok, I. M. Scott, & J. Senehi (Eds.), Routledge companion to peace and conflict studies (pp. 131–141). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Cahill-Ripley, A. (2014). Foregrounding socioeconomic rights in transitional justice: Realising justice for violations of economic and social rights. Netherlands Quarterly of Human Rights, 32(2), 183–213.
- Correa, C., Guillerot, J., & Magarrell, L. (2009). Reparations and victim participation: A look at the truth commission experience. In C. Ferstman, M. Goetz, & A. Stephens (Eds.), Reparations for victims of genocide, war crimes and crimes against humanity (pp. 383–414). Leiden: Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.
- Duthie, R., & Seils, P. (Eds.). (2017). Justice mosaics: How context shapes transitional justice in fractured societies. New York: International Centre for Transitional Justice.
- Firchow, P., & Mac Ginty, R. (2019). Indivisibility as a way of life: Transformation in micro-processes of peace in northern Uganda. In P. Gready & S. Robins (Eds.), From transitional to transformative justice (pp. 261–280). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Franzki, H., & Olarte, M. C. (2014). Understanding the political economy of transitional justice: A critical theory perspective. In S. Buckley-Zistel, T. Koloma Beck, C. Braun, & F. Mieth (Eds.), Transitional justice theories (pp. 201–221). Abingdon: Routledge.
- García-Godos, J. (2016). Victims in focus. The International Journal of Transitional Justice, 10(2), 350–358.
- Gready, P., & Robins, S. (2014). From transitional to transformative justice: A new agenda for practice. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 8(3), 339–361.
- Herman, J., Martin-Ortega, O., & Sriram, C. L. (2012). Beyond justice versus peace: Transitional justice and peacebuilding strategies. In K. Aggestam & A. Björkdahl (Eds.), Rethinking peacebuilding (pp. 58–73). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Kochanski, A. (2018). The “local turn” in transitional justice: Curb the enthusiasm. International Studies Review, 22(1), 26–50.
- Lang, M., & Mokrani, D. (2013). Beyond development: Alternative visions from Latin America. Amsterdam: Rosa Luxemburg Foundation and Transnational Institute.
- Lawther, C., & Moffett, L. (2017). Introduction – Researching transitional justice: The highs, the lows and the expansion of the field. In C. Lawther, L. Moffett, & D. Jacobs (Eds.), Research handbook on transitional justice (pp. 1–7). Cheltenham: Edward Elgar Publishing.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 825–839.
- Lidén, K. (2009). Building peace between global and local politics: The cosmopolitical ethics of liberal peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 16(5), 616–634.
- Lundy, P., & McGovern, M. (2008). Whose justice? Rethinking transitional justice from the bottom up. Journal of Law and Society, 35(2), 265–292.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2008). Indigenous peace-making versus the liberal peace. Cooperation and Conflict, 43(2), 139–163.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2015). Where is the local? Critical localism and peacebuilding. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 840–856.

- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783.
- McAuliffe, P. (2013). Transitional justice and rule of law reconstruction: A contentious relationship. Abingdon: Routledge.
- McAuliffe, P. (2017). The marginality of transitional justice within liberal peacebuilding: Causes and consequences. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 9(1), 91–103.
- McEvoy, K., & McGregor, L. (Eds.). (2008). Transitional justice from below: Grassroots activism and the struggle for change. Oxford: Hart Publishing.
- Milr, A. (2016). An introduction to transitional justice. In O. Simić (Ed.), An introduction to transitional justice (pp. 1–28). Abingdon: Routledge.
- Millar, G., & Lecy, J. (2016). Disciplinary divides in post-conflict justice and peace: Tracking if and how we share ideas. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 302–320.
- Mobekk, E. (2006). Transitional justice and security sector reform: Enabling sustainable peace. Geneva: Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces.
- Newman, E. (2009). “Liberal” peacebuilding debates. In E. Newman, R. Paris, & O. P. Richmond (Eds.), New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding (pp. 26–53). Tokyo: United Nations University.
- Paris, R. (1997). Peacebuilding and the limits of liberal internationalism. International Security, 22(2), 54–89.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Parlevliet, M. (2010). Human rights and conflict transformation: Towards a more integrated approach. In Berghof Foundation (Ed.), The Berghof handbook of conflict transformation. Opladen/Framington Hills: Barbara Budrich Publishers.
- Reading, A. (2019). The restitutive assemblage: The art of transformative justice at Parramatta Girls Home, Australia. In P. Gready & S. Robins (Eds.), From transitional to transformative justice (pp. 235–260). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Richmond, O. P. (2009). The romanticisation of the local: Welfare, culture and peacebuilding. The International Spectator, 44(1), 149–169.
- Richmond, O. (2012). A post-liberal peace. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Richmond, O. P. (2014). The impact of socio-economic inequality on peacebuilding and statebuilding. Civil Wars, 16(4), 449–467.
- Robins, S. (2012). Transitional justice as an elite discourse: Human rights practice where the global meets the local in post-conflict Nepal. Critical Asian Studies, 44(1), 3–30.
- Rupesinghe, K. (Ed.). (1995). Conflict transformation. New York: St. Martin's Press.
- Sedra, M. (2007). Security sector reform in Afghanistan and Iraq: Exposing a concept in crisis. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 3(2), 7–23.
- Sending, O. J. (2009). Why peacebuilders fail to secure ownership and be sensitive to context (NUPI working paper 755). Oslo: Norwegian Institute of International Affairs.
- Sharp, D. N. (2013). Beyond the post-conflict checklist: Linking peacebuilding and transitional justice through the lens of critique. Chicago Journal of International Law, 14, 165–196.
- Sharp, D. N. (2014). Introduction: Addressing economic violence in times of transition. In D. N. Sharp (Ed.), Justice and economic violence in transition (pp. 1–26). New York: Springer.
- Sharp, D. (2018). Rethinking transitional justice for the twenty-first century. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Shaw, R., & Waldorf, L. (2010). Introduction, localizing transitional justice. In R. Shaw, L. Waldorf, & P. Hazan (Eds.), Localizing transitional justice: Interventions and priorities after mass violence (pp. 3–16). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Simpson, G. (2017). ‘From the normative to the transformative’: Defining and promoting justice and human rights as part of violent conflict prevention and peacebuilding. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 9(3), 379–400.
- Sriram, C. L. (2004). Confronting past human rights violations. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Sriram, C. L. (2007). Justice as peace? Liberal peacebuilding and strategies of transitional justice. Global Society, 21(4), 579–591.
- Sriram, C. L. (2013). Globalizing justice for mass atrocities: A revolution in accountability. London: Routledge.
- Sriram, C. L. (2014). Liberal peacebuilding and transitional justice: What place for socioeconomic concerns? In D. N. Sharp (Ed.), Justice and economic violence in transition (pp. 27–49). New York: Springer.
- Sriram, C. L., & Herman, J. (2009). DDR and transitional justice: Bridging the divide? Conflict, Security & Development, 9(4), 455–474.
- Sriram, C. L., Garcia-Godos, J., Herman, J., & Martin-Ortega, O. (Eds.). (2013). Transitional justice and peacebuilding on the ground: Victims and ex-combatants. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Triponel, A., & Pearson, S. (2010). What do you think should happen-public participation in transitional justice. Pace International Law Review, 22, 103–144.
- Tsai, J., & Robins, S. (2018). Strengthening participation in local-level and national transitional justice processes: A guide for practitioners. New York: International Coalition for Sites of Conscience.
- United Nations. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking and peace-keeping: Report of the Secretary-General. New York: United Nations.
- United Nations. (2000). Millennium report of the secretary-general, “we the peoples”: The role of the United Nations in the 21st century. New York: United Nations.

- United Nations. (2004). The rule of law and transitional justice in conflict and post-conflict societies: Report of the Secretary-General. New York: United Nations.
- Van Zyl, P. (2005). Promoting transitional justice in post-conflict societies. In A. Bryden & H. Hanggi (Eds.), Security governance in post-conflict peacebuilding (pp. 209–231). Geneva: DCAF.
- Vinck, P., & Pham, P. (2014). Searching for lasting peace: Population-based survey on perceptions and attitudes about peace, security and justice in Eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo. Cambridge, MA: Harvard Humanitarian Initiative and United Nations Development Programme.
- Waldorf, L. (2009). Ex-combatants and truth commissions. In A. C. Patel, P. De Grief, & L. Waldorf (Eds.), Disarming the past: Transitional justice and ex-combatants (pp. 108–131). New York: Social Science Research Council.
- Waldorf, L. (2013). Just Peace? Integrating DDR and Transitional Justice. In C. L. Sriram, J. Garcia-Godos, J. Herman and O. Martin-Ortega (Eds.), Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding on the Ground: Victims and Ex-Combatants. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Weber, S. (2017). From victims and mothers to citizens: Gender-just transformative reparations and the need for public and private transitions. International Journal of Transitional Justice, 12(1), 88–107.
- Zurba, M. (2014). Leveling the playing field: Fostering collaborative governance towards on-going reconciliation. Environmental Policy and Governance, 24(2), 134–146.

the 1990s. The conflict, commonly referred to as the Homeland War, provided the foundation of the modern Croatian state, nation, and identity. The narrative surrounding it, of Croatia and Croats as victims of Greater Serbian aggression who only acted in self-defense, is universally accepted. It is quasi-legally enshrined, and to question it is to question the legitimacy of the Croatian nation and state. The transitional justice process can be observed in four key areas: the legacy of war crimes, international relations, civil society, and minority rights. The legacy of war crimes has been judicially dealt with both internationally and domestically, but these trials have failed to instill a better understanding of human rights in the public. The transitional justice process has shaped Croatia's foreign policy because European Union and NATO accession were closely tied to cooperation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY). This resulted in domestic political elites complying with international demands but simultaneously questioning and challenging them before a domestic audience. The sanctity of the dominant understanding of the 1991–1995 conflict has marginalized civil society groups that deal with human rights abuses and has given war veterans' associations a prominent and politicized role. Finally, the Serb minority's rights have been curtailed because they are defined in terms of security.

Transitional Justice in Croatia

Ivor Sokolić
European Institute, London School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK

Synonyms

Civil society; International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia \(ICTY\); Minority rights; Reconciliation; War crimes trials; War veterans; Yugoslavia

Definition

Transitional justice in Croatia dealing with the 1991–1995 conflict has defined much of Croatian politics, society, and international relations since

Introduction

Transitional justice is an ambiguous and multifaceted concept in Croatia. Since the dissolution of the former Yugoslavia in the 1990s, Croatia experienced concurrent transitions from conflict to peace, from Communism to neoliberalism, and from authoritarianism to competitive authoritarianism and then to democracy. The legacy of human rights abuses committed by repressive regimes extends beyond the wars that followed Yugoslavia's dissolution. Crimes committed during the Second World War (1941–1945), during Yugoslavia (1945–1991), and during the conflicts in Croatia (1991–1995) and Bosnia-Herzegovina (1992–1995) are all deemed as unresolved in Croatia and continue to define much of Croatian politics and society.

The transitional justice process dealing with the 1991–1995 conflict, known as the Homeland War (Domovinski rat), stands out due to the conflict's central role in Croatia's nation-building and state-building projects since the 1990s. Even this term, the Homeland War, is loaded since it represents only the Croat side of the conflict, but it is nevertheless commonly used in Croatian politics, culture, education, and media (Jović 2009). The Homeland War is considered the foundation of the modern Croatian state and it is a cornerstone of Croatian national identity. The narrative surrounding it, of Croatia and Croats as victims of Greater Serbian aggression who only acted in self-defense, is universally accepted. This version of history is quasi-legally inscribed in two parliamentary declarations (Deklaracija o Domovinskom Ratu and Deklaracija o Oluji), and questioning it is sanctioned.

This section examines how the Croatian state and society engaged with the legacy of war crimes and serious human rights violations dealing with the 1991–1995 conflict (Teitel 2000). The scope of this process in Croatia is vast. It predominantly concerns members of the majority Croat and minority Serb ethnic groups in the country. This covers almost the entire population, but it is worth noting that other politically active ethnic groups rarely deal with transitional justice issues directly. The geographic scope of transitional justice efforts is on the other hand much broader, since Croatian interests in the realm of transitional justice also concern Bosnia-Herzegovina, Serbia, and Montenegro. Similarly, the process' influence on state institutions is extensive. Certain government bodies deal directly with transitional justice issues (e.g. the Croatian Ministry of Veterans' Affairs and specialized war crimes chambers of the Croatian judiciary), while many others, from language institutions to economic bodies, frequently find that the legacy of conflict influences their work.

It is also debatable how “transitional” Croatia is. The conflict ended in 1995. Since then, Croatia has transitioned to liberal democracy and joined the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) and the European Union (EU). It is difficult to imagine armed conflict breaking out in Croatia at any point in the near future. Nevertheless, ethnic tensions persist and reconciliation between formerly opposed groups has not occurred.

Historical Context

The conflict in Croatia began in 1991, following a heating up of tensions during the dissolution of Yugoslavia and a brief armed conflict in Slovenia. By the time it ended in 1995, it had left 13,000–16,000 dead (the exact figure remains disputed, see Ivo Goldstein 1999 and Živić 2003) and 500,000 internally or externally displaced (Cruvellier and Valinas 2006), and much of the country's infrastructure destroyed (e.g. up to 30% of industrial infrastructure; Tanner 2001, p. 278). The conflict was marked by the frequent targeting of civilians and civilian structures, the destruction of cultural landmarks, and numerous human rights abuses. The city of Vukovar was almost completely destroyed, while the UNESCO World Heritage Site of Dubrovnik was bombed. Over 2,000 individuals remain missing to this day, and many of the over two million mines laid in the country are yet to be demined. The conflict ended following two Croatian military offensives, Operation Flash and Operation Storm, and the peaceful reintegration of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium.

A large part of the population witnessed violence of some sort during the war and had first-hand experience of the conflict. The conflict also had an international nature. Trials and judgments at the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY) have shown that Bosnian Croat forces operating in Bosnia-Herzegovina had continuous and significant military support from the armed forces of Croatia. A chain of command existed, official or unofficial, between Zagreb and armed forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina. The war in Croatia, as well as in the rest of the former Yugoslavia, was unique because they were the first to have an international criminal tribunal overseeing their conduct. They were also the first conflicts that took place in the context of an international human rights rhetoric where civil society had considerable international reach.

Croatia's first post-Yugoslav and post-Communist regime was the competitive authoritarian regime of President Franjo Tuđman and the HDZ (Hrvatska demokratska zajednica or Croatian Democratic Union). Formal democratic institutions were used by Tuđman's HDZ to gain and maintain political authority, and conventional standards of democracy were not met (Levitsky and Way 2002, p. 52). Media and judicial freedoms were neither fully repressed, nor were they completely free. Tuđman died in 1999, and the HDZ lost the parliamentary elections in 2000 to a center-left coalition that began Croatia's process of transition to liberal democracy in earnest. At this point the transitional justice process in Croatia was also allowed to gain traction, and cooperation with the ICTY began. The overriding goal of successive Croatian governments since 2000 was NATO and EU integration. Croatia joined NATO in 2009 and the EU in 2013.

Key Issues

The legacy of the 1991–1995 conflict and issues of transitional justice define much of the Croatian domestic political scene, judiciary, foreign policy, and cultural space (see Jović 2017; Sokolić 2019). Four key issues, however, stand out in terms of transitional justice: the legacy of war crimes; international relations, especially the effect of conditionality; civil society; and minority rights.

War Crimes Legacy

Several judicial and nonjudicial mechanisms have dealt with, and some continue to deal with, the legacy of war crimes in Croatia. The most visible of these was the ICTY, which in great part defined Croatia's transitional justice process. The particular circumstances of the Croatian state since 2000, especially the eagerness for Euro-Atlantic integration, meant that the ICTY was relatively successful in Croatia (Subotić 2009; Nettelfield 2010). By 2005 all indicted Croatian citizens had been transferred to The Hague, except Janko Bobetko who died shortly after his indictment. Bobetko was Chief of the General Staff of the Croatian Army from 1992 until 1995. Other cases were transferred to domestic courts by the ICTY, such as those of Mirko Norac, the first Croatian Army General to be found guilty by a domestic court for the killings of ethnic Serbs in Gospić and during Operation Medak Pocket, and Rahim Ademi. Ademi held several senior positions in the Croatian Army during the war and was accused of committing crimes against humanity during Operation Medak Pocket but was acquitted of all charges. Crucially, this does not account for the numerous individuals who would have been indicted had the Tribunal acted more quickly, most notably the likely indictment of President Tuđman.

By the time the ICTY had ended its work, no Croats had been sentenced for crimes committed in Croatia. Croats were only sentenced for crimes committed in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Croatian courts have sentenced Croats for crimes committed in Croatia, including individuals transferred from the ICTY (such as Mirko Norac), but this has nevertheless provided an opportunity for individuals and organizations to bolster the Croatian narrative of victimhood and innocence. Throughout its time of operation, Tribunal indictments and verdicts were interpreted as a potential threat to the legitimacy of the Croatian nation and state. Decisions that ran counter to the dominant Croatian understanding of the war as purely defensive were perceived to criminalize the entire Homeland War and thereby the foundation of the nation and the state. Major indictments and verdicts were met with mass protests and celebrations. In 2001, 120,000–150,000 people demonstrated the indictments against Norac and Gotovina (Cruvellier and Valinas 2006). The acquittals of Ante Gotovina and Mladen Markač in 2012, on the other hand, saw 100,000 take to the streets of Zagreb to greet them on their return to Croatia. Gotovina and Markač were Croatian generals who helped coordinate the controversial Operation Storm. In 2011 they were convicted and sentenced for war crimes and crimes against humanity, but in 2012 they were acquitted on appeal and immediately released. The case of Gotovina, in particular, has consistently resulted in the strongest public reactions in Croatia and also led to the most serious tensions with the ICTY. More than any other case or individual, this one has been emblematic of the nexus of politics, symbols, rituals, and collective memory in Croatia (Pavlaković 2010).

The Croatian public's relationship with the ICTY was defined by key trials and specific dramatic moments in those trials. The ICTY's popularity has ebbed and flowed with these moments, but it has for the most part remained unpopular with the Croatian public (e.g., see the Belgrade Human Rights Centre 2011 survey). Most significant was the trial of Ante Gotovina and Mladen Markač (including their indictment), Gotovina's capture, their guilty verdict, and subsequent acquittal. Second to this was the televised in-court suicide of Slobodan Praljak, a former general of Croat forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina, who drank a vial of poison while his sentence was read out. Other noteworthy trials, although far less present in the eyes of the Croatian media or public, were the trials of major Serbian leaders, such as Slobodan Milošević and Vojislav Šešelj.

The ICTY failed to instill a better understanding of human rights in the population or to achieve any sort of reconciliation (Sokolić 2019). Croatia, much like its neighbors in the former Yugoslavia, exemplifies how the implementation of transitional justice mechanisms does not necessarily result in shared visions of the past. Moreover, the Croatian public remains unaware of the role of Croatian forces in Bosnia-Herzegovina, and the dominant narrative remains one of exclusive defense within Croatia's borders (Sokolić 2017a).

War crimes trials in Croatian domestic courts were in comparison to the ICTY far less advertised, although much more numerous. By 2014, when figures were last officially collated, 3,553 individuals had been tried for war crimes in domestic courts, and 589 had been sentenced (the Croatian State's Attorney Office provides these figures; see www.dorh.hr/fgs.axd?id=1841). These processes have continued and are still ongoing. The trials have not consistently upheld principles of legal fairness: most cases have taken place in the lower courts where judge bias is problematic; participation of the accused in the war as a member of the Croatian police or armed forces is often used as a mitigating circumstance in sentencing; and the vast majority of cases have been against ethnic Serb in absentia (Rangelov 2014, p. 150). Moreover, the public remains relatively poorly acquainted with the work of domestic courts, and the media give these trials little space, if any at all.

Responses to the war crimes legacy in Croatia are not purely judicial; civil society organizations also work on these issues, mainly through documentation and fact-finding efforts. This is a highly contested space, where government funding is limited and provided to organizations that more readily uphold the dominant understanding of the recent past. The most prominent example is the Croatian Memorial and Documentation Centre for the Homeland War, which collects information on the 1991–1995 conflict, publishes research on it, and gives lectures to the public and in schools. Their publications have overt political messages and use loaded terms extensively, all connected to the dominant ethnic understanding of the conflict. Other fact-finding organizations, most notably Documenta, that portray both sides of the conflict and have questioned dominant narratives about the conflict, have also found themselves operating in a hostile environment, where government funding is limited or nonexistent and threats to staff are commonplace. This has limited nonjudicial responses to those that the state supports.

International Relations

The transitional justice process has in great part defined Croatia's foreign policy. This is due to the powerful effect of ICTY conditionality. NATO and the EU made cooperation with the ICTY a condition for integration into their organizations. Croatian political elites felt compelled to comply with this conditionality in order to achieve their vision of Croatian identity as a member of the Western democratic nexus of states (Zambelli 2010, p. 1673). In order to maintain this identity, the state needed to prove that it cooperated with the ICTY and that it was able to try criminals domestically (Zambelli 2010). This meant that transitional justice, and the performance of a specific instrument of justice, became a greater priority in Croatia's foreign policy than other domestic and EU factors (Brodersen 2014). Moreover, it stymied the development of a culture of law, and it fostered negative perceptions of the ICTY and the international community more broadly (Brodersen 2014; Hagan and Ivković 2006).

Domestic political elites manipulated this situation for their own purposes. Governments would accept demands from the Tribunal but also occasionally mount legal challenges to specific indictments, all the while encouraging a narrative of resistance to a domestic audience (Lamont 2010). Prime Minister Ivo Sanader, for example, viewed compliance as unavoidable but challenged the Gotovina indictment before a domestic audience. Strategic compliance with conditionality allowed governments to fulfill their international obligations and continue along the route to Euro-Atlantic integration while also contesting the legitimacy of the ICTY.

Transitional justice remains a key issue in Croatia's relations with its neighbors. In 2015 the International Court of Justice ruled on the cases that Croatia and Serbia had presented to the body, accusing each other of genocide (both cases were dismissed). Croatia continues to comment on domestic Bosnian politics, often to the frustration of the Bosnian government (less so to the Croatian entity in the government). The Croatian public and elites still view Croatian involvement in the Bosnian conflict as positive, in terms of Croatia welcoming Bosniak refugees and providing military assistance to protect it from Serbia, while negative aspects are marginalized or ignored (Sokolić 2017a).

Civil Society

The legacy of the war continues to significantly affect Croatian civil society. Civil society has consistently provided pressure for democratization and has generally functioned without significant impediments, as long as it has not challenged the dominant understanding of the 1991–1995 conflict. This has marginalized organizations that deal with the human rights abuses committed by Croatian forces during the war or that support Serb victims of the war (Sokolić 2019). It has also given war veterans' associations a prominent and politicized role in Croatian civil society since the 1990s, often at the expense of victims' associations.

War veterans' associations have had nearly exclusive access to state funding because they have remained closely aligned with the nation-building and state-building projects. They have been able to employ symbols of the conflict and of their sacrifice to further their political aims, which have often been ideological rather than narrowly connected to war veterans' concerns (Sokolić 2019). The implication is that these associations prioritize their political aims over their therapeutic aims. Their close relationship with the government has also made the needs of victims' associations secondary to those of veterans. The Croatian experience highlights the need for social justice in the aftermath of conflict, which can create social divisions if neglected (Cocozzelli 2009; Ströhle 2013). This also highlights how in Croatia organizations have to be aligned with the dominant understanding of the conflict in order to access policy-making and funding.

Minority Rights

The rights of the largest ethnic minority in Croatia, the Serbs, remain curtailed due to the legacy of the war. Serbs are the "radical other" in modern Croat identity and in the modern Croatian nation (Zambelli 2010, p. 1664). Serbs are presented by elites and by the media and parts of the public discourse as oppressors of Croats and Croatia throughout history (MacDonald 2002). As a result, the Serb minority is defined in terms of security (Jović 2017). This is best exemplified by the curtailment of language rights for Serbs in Croatia and specifically the city of Vukovar, where according to the 2011 census Serbs comprise over one third of the population. The city was therefore legally required to put up bilingual Cyrillic signs, but this resulted in a series of demonstrations in 2013 in Vukovar and other Croatian cities. The proposal frustrated war veterans and much of the public due to the wartime experience of the city and due to its symbolic position in the 1991–1995 conflict. Signatures were also collected across the country for a referendum to change the law on minority rights and bilingualism. The result is that Serbs are tolerated, but their rights are consistently curtailed (Sokolić 2017b).

Existing Research

Croatia remains an understudied case of transitional justice in comparison to Bosnia-Herzegovina and Serbia. Few authors have used it as a single case study to examine transitional justice and its mechanisms. Jović (2017, in Croatian), Lamont (2010), and Sokolić (2019) are exceptions to this. All of them examine the effect that the war and war crimes trials, domestic or international, have had on Croatian politics and society. In particular, they have examined why international human rights norms advocated by institutions such as the ICTY have struggled to take root in Croatia or why they became distorted when they did reach the public. This puzzle has also been the focus of several comparative studies of transitional justice, where the Croatian case was analyzed. Subotić (2009) argues that in Croatia, norms did not spread since domestic norm believers were not willing to take the lead in norm change. Rangelov (2014) uses the Croatian case to show how deliberation can be a key outcome of transitional justice processes.

Almost all studies of Croatian society also examine transitional justice, since the process is so ubiquitous. A number of authors examine topics closely related to transitional justice, such as identity, civil society, and narratives of the recent past. Banjeglav (2012), Pavlaković (2014), Pavlaković and Pauković (2019), and Peskin and Boduszynski (2003) all outline and analyze how the narrative of the 1991–1995 conflict is constructed based on the themes of struggle, survival, victimhood, and defense.

Koren (2011) outlines how this narrative has become semilegally enshrined. These works show the importance of this narrative and that to challenge its legitimacy is also to challenge the legitimacy of political elites. Finally, Clark (2012) examines how war veterans have integrated into Croatian post-conflict society, by focusing on the themes of identity and trauma.

Direction of Future Research

Research on Croatia would currently benefit from mimicking what has been done elsewhere in the former Yugoslav region, especially in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Serbia. Research that complements current studies can help result in comparative insights into transitional justice processes. Some of these studies are following the newest trends in the scholarship that explore thus far overlooked actors and structures in transitional justice. For example, the roles of diasporas (Karabegović 2019) and of socioeconomic issues (Lai 2016) have been investigated in Bosnia-Herzegovina, but less so regionally. A comparative approach would address the regional nature of the conflict and of conflict structures in the former Yugoslavia, which require regional approaches and solutions.

Future research on Croatia would also benefit from following general trends in the transitional justice scholarship. There remains a lack of understanding of what caused the conflict in Croatia and, more generally and theoretically, of what causes conflicts. Consequently, many areas of transitional justice remain unexplored and potentially undealt with (Kostovicova 2019). Longitudinal studies examining the longer-term effects of transitional justice are lacking, even more so in Croatia since the focus of the scholarship has moved to different regions. This is despite that the process' true effect may only become apparent in the longer term and despite that the new generation, born after the war, is seeing an increase in social distance between ethnic groups. In Croatia, the longitudinal element has further dimensions. First, no one has examined the effect of EU accession on the transitional justice process. Second, studies have yet to comparatively examine how the current transitional justice process has become implicated with the legacy of the Second World War in Croatia. Methodologically, studies of transitional justice in Croatia are dominated by ethnographic or ethnographically sensible (Simmons and Smith 2017) approaches. These have provided a number of insights into the process but would benefit from methodological innovation to supplement their findings and to allow for more universal theory building.

Summary

Transitional justice in Croatia, dealing with the 1991–1995 conflict, defines much of Croatian politics, society, and international relations. The conflict is the cornerstone of the modern Croatian state, nation, and national identity. The narrative surrounding it, of Croatia and ethnic Croats as victims of Serbian aggression who only acted in self-defense, is universally accepted. The most visible mechanism of transitional justice in Croatia was the ICTY, and it significantly defined Croatia's process of transitional justice. The process can be most acutely observed in four areas: the legacy of war crimes, international relations (in particular conditionality), civil society, and minority rights.

Croatia is an understudied case of transitional justice when compared to other countries in the former Yugoslavia, most notably Bosnia-Herzegovina and Serbia. It is rarely used as a single case study of transitional justice and is featured more frequently in comparative analyses. Most studies of Croatian society, however, also include some examination of transitional justice, since the process is so pervasive in Croatian society (e.g., in studies of identity, civil society, and narratives of the recent past). Future research on Croatia would benefit from replicating regional studies that could result in comparative insights that better address the regional nature of the conflict and conflict structures in the former Yugoslavia.

Cross-References

► Hybrid Courts and Transitional Justice

References

- Banjeglav, T. (2012). Conflicting memories, competing narratives and contested histories in Croatia's postwar commemorative practices. Politička Misao, 49, 7–31.
- Belgrade Human Rights Centre. (2011). Informisanost i stavovi građana Hrvatske prema Haškom tribunalu i suđenjima za ratne zločine pred sudovima u Hrvatskoj [Awareness and attitudes of the citizens of Croatia towards the ICTY and war crimes trials in Croatia]. Belgrade (Serbia): The Belgrade Human Rights Centre.
- Brodersen, K. H. (2014). The ICTY's conditionality dilemma. European Journal of Crime, Criminal Law and Criminal Justice, 22, 219–248.
- Clark, J. N. (2012). The ICTY and reconciliation in Croatia: A case study of Vukovar. Journal of International Criminal Justice, 10, 397–417.
- Cocozzelli, F. P. (2009). War and social welfare: Reconstruction after conflict. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Cruvellier, T., & Valinas, M. (2006). Croatia: Selected developments in transitional justice. New York: International Center for Transitional Justice.
- Goldstein, I. (1999). Croatia: A history. London: Hurst & Co..
- Hagan, J., & Ivković, S. K. (2006). War crimes, democracy, and the rule of law in Belgrade, the former Yugoslavia, and beyond. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 605, 130–151.
- Jović, D. (2009). Croatia after Tudjman: The ICTY and issues of transitional justice. Chaillot Paper, 116, 13–27.
- Jović, D. (2017). Rat i mit: Politika identiteta u suvremenoj Hrvatskoj [War and myth: The politics of identity in contemporary Croatia]. Zagreb: Fraktura.
- Karabegović, D. (2019). Who chooses to remember? Diaspora participation in memorialization initiatives. Ethnic and Racial Studies, 42(11), 1911–1929.
- Koren, S. (2011). "Korisna prošlost"? Ratovi devetdesetih u deklaracijama hrvatskog sabora (Useful past? The wars of the nineties in the declarations of the Croatian Sabor). In T. Cipek (Ed.), Kultura sjećanja: 1991. Povijesni lomovi i svladanje prošlosti (Culture of memory: 1991. Historical breaks and overcoming the past) (pp. 123–156). Zagreb: Disput.
- Kostovicova, D. (2019). Transitional justice and conflict studies: Bridging the divide. Journal of Global Security Studies, 4(2), 273–278.
- Lai, D. (2016). Transitional justice and its discontents: Socioeconomic justice in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the limits of international intervention. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 10(3), 361–381.

- Lamont, C. K. (2010). International criminal justice and the politics of compliance. Farnham: Ashgate.
- Levitsky, S., & Way, L. (2002). The rise of competitive authoritarianism. Journal of Democracy, 13, 51–65.
- MacDonald, D. B. (2002). Balkan holocausts? Serbian and Croatian victim-centred propaganda and the war in Yugoslavia. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Nettelfield, L. J. (2010). Courting democracy in Bosnia and Herzegovina: The Hague tribunal's impact in a postwar state. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.
- Pavlaković, V. (2010). Croatia, the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, and general Gotovina as a political symbol. Europe-Asia Studies, 62, 1707–1740.
- Pavlaković, V. (2014). Fulfilling the thousand-year-old dream: Strategies of symbolic nation-building in Croatia. In P. Kolstø (Ed.), Strategies of symbolic nation-building in south eastern Europe (pp. 19–50). Farnham: Ashgate.
- Pavlaković, V., & Pauković, D. (2019). Framing the nation and collective identities: Political rituals and cultural memory of the twentieth-century traumas in Croatia. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Peskin, V., & Boduszynski, M. (2003). International justice and domestic politics: Post-Tudjman Croatia and the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Europe-Asia Studies, 55, 1117–1142.
- Rangelov, I. (2014). Nationalism and the rule of law: Lessons from the Balkans and beyond. Cambridge, MA: Cambridge University Press.
- Simmons, E., & Smith, N. (2017). Comparison with an ethnographic sensibility. PS: Political Science & Politics, 50(1), 126–130.
- Sokolić, I. (2017a). Denying the unknown: Everyday narratives about Croatian involvement in the 1992–1995 Bosnian conflict. Südosteuropa, 65, 632–653.
- Sokolić, I. (2017b). My neighbour, the criminal: How memories of the 1991–1995 conflict in Croatia affect attitudes towards the Serb minority. Nations and Nationalism, 23(4), 790–814.
- Sokolić, I. (2019). International courts and mass atrocity: Narratives of war and justice in Croatia. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ströhle, I. (2013). Kosovo Liberation Army veterans' politics and contentious citizenship in post-war Kosovo. In S. Pavlović & M. Živković (Eds.), Transcending fratricide: Political mythologies, reconciliations, and the uncertain future in the former Yugoslavia (pp. 243–264). Baden-Baden: Nomos.
- Subotić, J. (2009). Hijacked justice: Dealing with the past in the Balkans. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Tanner, M. (2001). Croatia: A nation forged in war. New Haven: Yale Nota Bene.
- Teitel, R. G. (2000). Transitional justice. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Zambelli, N. (2010). A journey westward: A post-structuralist analysis of Croatia's identity and the problem of cooperation with the international criminal tribunal for the former Yugoslavia. Europe-Asia Studies, 62, 1661–1682.

- Živić, D. (2003). Demografske odrednice i posljedice starenja stanovništva Hrvatske [Demographic determinants and consequences of the ageing of Croatia's population]. Revija za socijalnu politiku, 10, 307–319.

Transnational

- Feminist Peace Research

Transnationalism

- Diasporas in Peace and Conflict

Transversal Politics

- Feminist Peace Research

Trauma

- Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict

Treaty

- Stalled Peacebuilding: Dealing with the Violence of Colonization and Its Legacy

Tribalism

- Balkanization

Triple Nexus

► Conflicts and Natural Disasters

Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict

Donnacha Ó Beacháin
School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Disintegration; Disunity; Division; Fragmentation; Ireland; Secession; Separation

Definition

Northern Ireland is a divided society. The key source of discord is the divergent views on the constitutional future of the region, between those who wish to remain in the United Kingdom (“unionists”) and those who seek a united Ireland (“nationalists”). Although most unionists have traditionally been Protestants and most nationalists have been Catholics, the root cause of the conflict is not theological. Rather, the quarrel has centered on power. Protestant unionists exercised it for centuries and Catholics/nationalists have sought a more equitable share. With the support of the British Government in London, unionists exercised untrammelled power, firstly over the majority Irish Catholic population and, after the partition of the country, within Northern Ireland over the minority nationalist/republican community. The inability of the Northern Ireland regime to accommodate nationalist demands for equality led to a quarter century of violent upheaval euphemistically known as the “Troubles.” As the conflagration engulfed the region, Northern Ireland’s unionist regime collapsed in 1972. Proposals that might simultaneously mollify nationalist and unionist aspirations proved elusive. The obstacles to a negotiated settlement appeared insurmountable, but in the 1990s a sustainable peace process was inaugurated. After several false starts, an accord based on power sharing, popularly known as the Good Friday Agreement (GFA), was negotiated on April 10, 1998 and was further consolidated with the signing of the St. Andrews’ Agreement in 2006. As a result, violent conflict in Northern Ireland has abated although societal divisions remain.

Background: A Place Apart

For several centuries, Ireland has been an arena of violent conflict. It is no coincidence that the destiny of so many British colonies, such as India, Cyprus, Palestine, and Ireland, has been partitioned. These outcomes resulted from the traditional British policy of divide et impera (from Latin: divide and rule), of fostering antagonisms between different groups in an effort to preserve hegemony. England’s conversion to Protestantism coincided with its growth as an imperial power, and when Irish chieftains finally acknowledged defeat in 1603, Britain embarked on an intensive policy of colonial plantation, particularly in the north of the country, which had been the center of Gaelic resistance (O’Leary 2019, vol I, pp. 118–120). Under British tutelage, the task of administering Ireland and quelling the inevitable dissent of the disempowered and subordinated indigenous inhabitants was delegated to the settler population supported by a large standing army. These settlers, mainly English Anglicans and Scottish Presbyterians, are the ancestors of today’s unionist population in Northern Ireland. Ireland remained predominantly Catholic, however, and almost every generation witnessed a major rebellion against British rule.

The slow democratization of the British polity allowed an Irish nationalist parliamentary movement to develop while the physical force tradition continued to attract a substantial body of adherents. When the separatist Sinn Féin party gained a majority of Irish seats at Westminster in 1918, it declared the country independent and established a parliament in Dublin. To complement these political endeavors, the Irish Republican Army (IRA) conducted a war for independence against the British regime in Ireland (Ó Beacháin 2010, pp. 2–9).

When insurgency in Ireland threatened British rule, the country was partitioned in 1920 by a unilateral act of the Westminster Parliament. Partition satisfied unionist preferences and London's strategic objectives (Moore 2019). Two new political regimes were created: the Irish Free State (now the Republic of Ireland) which was overwhelmingly nationalist and opposed to partition and Northern Ireland, which contained a two-thirds unionist majority. More than half the area under the control of the new unionist regime in Northern Ireland was nationalist in sentiment, including the counties of Fermanagh and Tyrone and the region's second largest city, Derry. The forcible incorporation of so many nationalists, a decision motivated by a desire to secure the maximum amount of territory possible for the new unionist regime, sowed the seeds of future strife and condemned Northern Ireland to persistent volatility. Nationalists north and south of the border rejected partition as a device to prevent the exercise of self-determination in Ireland given that the vast majority of people on the island (approximately 82%) were opposed to the new order (Ó Beacháin 2010, pp. 1–2; Moore 2019, pp. 16–29).

British support for unionists in the north of Ireland continued for decades but the unwillingness of nationalists to recognize the legitimacy of the Northern Ireland state was a cause of instability. Northern Ireland possessed the formal features of a parliamentary democracy but, with an inbuilt unionist majority, was in reality a one-party state. The unionist regime enshrined anti-Catholic discrimination as official policy, establishing an apparatus of economic hegemony that excluded nationalists from political, social, and economic power. Complementing this system, the state invoked a series of repressive laws administered by a paramilitary police force that was almost entirely Protestant in composition (Farrell 1983; O'Leary 2019, vol II, pp. 17–60).

The Troubles

Although Northern Ireland remained part of the United Kingdom, British Government interest and knowledge of Irish affairs rapidly declined following partition. This trend was briefly arrested during World War Two and in its immediate aftermath, when Northern Ireland proved to be of vital strategic importance, especially when contrasted with the neutral stance adopted by the Irish state governed from Dublin. During the 1960s, however, as the region teetered on the brink of violent upheaval, there was not a single official employed full time in London to keep briefed on developments in Northern Ireland. The conventional wisdom in British government circles was that problems in Northern Ireland were generally of short duration and intensity and resolved themselves without British intervention (Ó Beacháin 2018a, pp. 80–81).

During the late 1960s, a combination of political and social forces, not least the expansion of third-level education and the advent of television, facilitated the establishment of a civil rights movement that sought a number of basic freedoms including an end to gerrymandering and the repeal of permanent security legislation (Ó Beacháin 2010, pp. 267–268; O'Leary 2019, vol II, p. 170). The Northern Ireland Civil Rights Association also highlighted major inequalities in voting rights; in the most egregious cases, businessmen (disproportionally Protestant) were entitled to cast six ballots whereas non-ratepayers (disproportionately Catholic) were deprived of the vote. Gerrymandering in local government had knock-on effects when it came to the distribution of jobs and houses. The Northern Ireland state, based in Stormont, could not accommodate the peaceful campaign for civil liberties as its very raison d'être was unionist supremacy in perpetuity. The violent response of state security forces and civilian irregulars to the civil rights movement precipitated a social conflagration and an armed nationalist insurgency that propelled society downwards into a spiral of violence, euphemistically known as “the Troubles,” which would last for decades.

A sequence of military debacles during the early 1970s transformed the conflict to the level of a full-scale conflagration (Mulroe 2017). These included the British army's imposition of a curfew on the nationalist stronghold of the Falls Road in July 1970, which resulted in five fatalities and scores of injuries. The reintroduction of internment of suspected nationalists on August 9, 1971 rejuvenated the civil rights movement (Ó Beacháin 2010, pp. 317–326). During an anti-internment march, on January 30, 1972, British troops opened fire on protesters killing 14 civilians and injuring over a hundred in a massacre quickly dubbed “Bloody Sunday” (McKittrick and McVea 2012, pp. 88–90). The British Government prorogued the unionist administration at Stormont in March 1972 and imposed direct rule from London. The Northern Ireland one-party government would never be reestablished, but the violence continued to escalate. In 1970, 13 people had been killed; in 1972 there were 467 deaths and over 10,000 recorded shooting incidents. At this time, Northern Ireland's population was just 1.5 million, out of a UK total of over 55 million people (Ó Beacháin 2018a, pp. 105, 115).

Direct rule from Westminster was never considered anything other than a stop-gap solution until a more durable form of devolved government could be established. Following the abolition of Stormont and the failure of repressive military measures, the British government adopted several different approaches including negotiations with the IRA (1972, 1975), a constitutional convention (1974–75), limited devolved power (1982–86), and the Anglo-Irish Agreement (1985). The most promising, perhaps, was the Sunningdale Agreement which came into effect on January 1, 1974. Under the terms of the agreement, power was to be shared between moderate representatives of the unionist and nationalist communities in a new Northern Ireland executive while a Council of Ireland would provide a legislative link between the Irish Government in Dublin and the new cabinet in Belfast (Ó Beacháin 2018a pp. 122–132; O’Leary 2019, vol III, pp. 59–65). The executive, however, provided a unifying focus for dissent, enabling unionist politicians, paramilitaries, and proletarians to form a potent, if transient, alliance that would halt the erosion of Protestant privilege. The electricity supply – which was in militant Protestant control – was cut and, aided by British Government inertia and widespread intimidation, the executive collapsed after only 5 months (Fisk 1975; O’Leary and McGarry 1995, p. 160). Twenty-five years would pass before a similar power-sharing executive could be established again.

Why Conflict Endured

Psychological and emotional factors (e.g., fear, anger, mutual distrust) inhibited conflict resolution as unionists and nationalists fixated on fears generated by past events that sometimes led to preemptive aggression. Loss aversion was another key barrier to overcoming conflict as parties frequently attached much greater significance to a potential loss than to a potential gain, particularly when future gains (e.g., peace, prosperity) were uncertain and in the long term, while “losses” (e.g., accepting legitimacy/position of opponents) were immediate and certain. This meant that the conflicting parties were often unwilling to take risks in situations where they could make significant gains. Protagonists often viewed gains simply as entitlements but were slow to accept a loss. This frequently led to disagreements between parties over the value of concessions, reinforcing feelings of suspicion and mistrust, and further hindering efforts designed to transform the conflict dynamic.

Given the duration and intensity of the conflict, it is not surprising that the quest for “justice” inhibited mediation efforts, as negotiating parties felt entitled to receive some sort of recompense for past events. This expectation stemmed from the belief on both sides that it was they who had acted the most honorably in the past and who had suffered the most. In such a scenario, both parties were likely to believe that what to outside observers might seem like a fair deal gave their side less than it deserved and was too generous to their traditional foes.

Protagonists in Northern Ireland prided themselves on their unwillingness to compromise on fundamental principles. The two most common unionist slogans have been “No Surrender” and “Not an Inch” (of territory). When the IRA was asked to decommission their explosives and weapons, graffiti appeared on Belfast walls declaring “Not an ounce, not a bullet.” Such intransigence made brokering agreements difficult, as protagonists tended to view political developments in zero-sum terms, whereby any gain by the other side is seen as a loss to their own.

The relationship between political leaders and their followers/supporters, and the competing interests of different political actors within a single community, also acted as barriers to conflict resolution. Many political representatives, most notably the Democratic Unionist Party (DUP) leader, Ian Paisley, publicly announced their unwillingness to compromise, sometimes as a negotiating device or because of an inability to reach mutually beneficial settlements. This in turn induced their electorates to adopt similar trenchant positions, which further limited maneuverability in negotiations. A popular aphorism coined by Ian Paisley provided a salutary warning to those who might flirt with compromise: a bridge builder and a traitor were the same, he claimed, because they both go over to the other side (Moloney 2008, p. 100).

Exiting the Violence

During the “Troubles,” academics and politicians sought to identify a middle way between the unionist wish to remain within the United Kingdom and the nationalist desire for a united Ireland. However, any solution that was not negotiated between all the major players and/or which was imposed at a time of war had little chance of success. By the 1990s, the British Army and the IRA had reached a stalemate whereby neither had defeated the other and neither could attain outright military victory. After several false starts, the Belfast (or Good Friday) Agreement was negotiated on April 10, 1998 and a second pact, designed to reenergize the peace process, was agreed at St Andrews in October 2006 (Powell 2008, pp. 90–107, 281–289; Ahern 2009, pp. 210–230)

The Good Friday Agreement (GFA) provides for a three-stranded process, which centers first and foremost on power sharing between unionists and nationalists within Northern Ireland (strand 1), combined with institutional links between Northern Ireland and Ireland (strand 2) and between Ireland and the United Kingdom (strand 3) (Department of Foreign Affairs 1998). A guarantee of equal rights and an open-ended constitutional future have also been at the heart of the peace agreements. As part of strand one, an Assembly (initially 108-seats but since reduced to 90 members) is elected by proportional representation, and a First and Deputy First Minister are selected from the two communities. Seats in the executive are allocated, in accordance with the d’Hondt divisor, in proportion to the number of seats parties have in the Assembly (O’Leary 2019, vol III, pp. 182–197). Key decisions are made on a cross-community basis. Provision is made for a referendum (frequently termed a “border poll”) to be held in Northern Ireland to determine periodically the constitutional preferences of the people. If a majority of people in Northern Ireland express a wish to unify with the Republic of Ireland, the British Government is required to legislate for this preference. The initiative for holding such a poll rests with the British Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Although the GFA is similar to that negotiated at Sunningdale in 1973, its chances for success were greater as it attracted the support of both the IRA and the loyalist paramilitaries, which had destroyed the power-sharing institutions established in 1974. The concept of ripeness, that conflicts reach a point where they are ready for resolution, is relevant here. William Zartman maintains that protagonists will only seek mediation once they have exhausted all their resources and recognize that they enjoy negligible chances of achieving victory. In such circumstances, the cost of maintaining the mutually hurting stalemate is so great for all parties that protagonists begin to entertain less-maximalist approaches (Connolly and Doyle 2018). The institutional structures of the GFA are interlinked, and they stand or fall together. The price of a devolved administration in Northern Ireland was that power must be shared with nationalists and republicans. Nationalists attained an institutional link to the Republic of Ireland, but Northern Ireland was to remain within the United Kingdom for the foreseeable future. No party attained everything it wanted, but each secured a minimum set of guarantees.

Reasons for the Breakthrough

The fact that the 1990s peace process took place under the tutelage of two sovereign democratic governments, Ireland and the United Kingdom, was central to its ultimate success. A cooperative Anglo-Irish partnership had frequently been absent during previous decades. Indeed, for much of the time since the partition of Ireland and throughout most of the Troubles, there had been no meeting of minds between the governments in London and Dublin as to what constituted the causes of conflict in Northern Ireland, let alone unanimity on how to resolve the imbroglio. Moreover, for decades successive British Governments refused to countenance external mediation on the basis that this would infringe upon their sovereignty.

The British and Irish governments did much of the running throughout the peace process and proved vital in maintaining momentum when relationships broke down within Northern Ireland. Both administrations played a full role in the negotiations, allowing each side of the conflict in Northern Ireland to believe that they had an external guarantor that represented their interests (Powell 2008; Ahern 2009; Reynolds 2009). Crucially, Dublin and London appointed a political figure from outside the region, former US Senator George Mitchell, to chair the negotiations. Irish diplomacy and diasporans kept Ireland higher up the list of US priorities than would otherwise have been the case. The goodwill and interventions of the Clinton administration in the United States along with the prospect of EU funding to underpin aspects of the peace process also provided favorable conditions for a settlement (Sanders 2019, pp. 207–257). International involvement, including external mediation and facilitation, proved vital in providing a mechanism whereby the disposal of weapons belonging to nonstate actors could be verified and conducted in a manner that minimized the stigma of surrender.

The peace process also enjoyed a favorable international context. It chimed with the prevailing optimistic zeitgeist of the early and mid-1990s. Communism had collapsed throughout Europe during the dying months of the 1980s, culminating in the dismantling of the Berlin Wall, the reunification of Germany, and the end of the Cold War (Cox 1998). Nelson Mandela was freed from prison in South Africa and apartheid quickly replaced by majority rule. Initially, the Oslo peace accords in the Middle East also generated optimism before quickly becoming a parable of what can go wrong in a peace process. Moreover, the establishment of legislatures in Scotland and Wales, following referenda in those countries, made devolution within Northern Ireland easier for unionists to digest. No longer did it necessarily signify that Northern Ireland was a place apart requiring exceptional treatment but, rather, it could be presented as part of an ongoing process of decentralization within the United Kingdom.

In addition to the ongoing support of the Irish and British governments, the peace process includes all major parties in Northern Ireland, including the late converts of the DUP, and this inclusivity has been an essential reason for its success. Moreover, as part of the GFA, all prisoners whose militant organizations had signed up to the peace process were quickly released. Previous initiatives had been opposed by the IRA, the organization responsible for the majority of fatalities during the conflict, and this rejection put a ceiling on expectations. The peace process received an early boost when aspects of the GFA were approved in a referendum by 71% in Northern Ireland and by 95% in the Republic of Ireland (Ó Beacháin 2018a, pp. 240–241). Having the vote in both parts of Ireland on the same day was also significant, simultaneously undermining the positions of dissident republicans and recalcitrant unionists.

Decommissioning, Demilitarization, and Policing

Decommissioning IRA weapons was central to the peace process and imbued with symbolism for both sides. But as Tony Blair and Bertie Ahern realized, getting the republican movement to sign up to the principle of majority consent within Northern Ireland being a prerequisite for a united Ireland was far more significant in the long term than dispensing with the IRA's armory. Decommissioned weapons could be easily replaced. Far more difficult to acquire was the degree of trust and cooperation necessary to convince combatants that military means were undesirable (Ó Beacháin 2018a, pp. 246–248).

Making decommissioning a precondition for Sinn Féin's participation in negotiations, as the British Government initially tried to do, risked derailing the peace process. Opposing protagonists engaged in a circular argument whereby the IRA used the British Army presence to justify a leisurely approach to decommissioning, whereas this in turn was cited as a reason for maintaining a substantial British military force in Northern Ireland. Armed conflict, Sinn Féin argued, was a product and not the cause of the deep divisions in society and only maintaining a sustainable and inclusive government could help banish the gun from Irish politics.

Ultimately, the process of decommissioning would have to be internationalized to be successful. An Independent International Commission on Decommissioning (IICD), composed of respected military and diplomatic figures and chaired by Canadian General John de Chastelain, was established to oversee the process. Former President of Finland, Martti Ahtisaari, and African National Congress leader Cyril Ramaphosa were appointed to inspect IRA weapons dumps in order to facilitate the decommissioning of firearms, ammunition, and explosives. The IRA finally completed decommissioning their military arsenal on September 26, 2005 (O'Leary 2019, vol III, pp. 236–243). British army demilitarization – the removal of British troops from Northern Ireland and the destruction of much of the British army military infrastructure such as bases and watchtowers – also continued apace until September 2007. However, while the decommissioning of weapons was a process that took several years to negotiate, the dismantling of sectarian mindsets would take much longer.

Allied to decommissioning and demilitarization was the task of making policing acceptable to both communities in Northern Ireland (Doyle 2010). As Tony Blair's Chief of Staff, Jonathan Powell, noted "the IRA couldn't police the community any more, yet they wouldn't let the police do so either" (Powell 2008, p. 275). Chris Patten, a former senior Conservative Party figure and the last Governor of Hong Kong, was entrusted with the task of chairing the commission to review the future of the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC), and his report on September 9, 1999 advocated a radical overhaul of the composition, ethos, training, and structure of the police (Patten 1999; Ahern 2009, pp. 264–265). The report recommended that the RUC be given a more neutral name – the Northern Ireland Police Service – and that half of all new recruits would be drawn from the nationalist community with the aim of eventually reaching parity. The police force could not be drawn exclusively from the unionist community so that, as in the past, one side of the conflict was, at government expense, policing the other. Patten and his supporters were guided by the objective of depoliticizing the police and sought to facilitate a move away from policing during a state of armed conflict to a form of community policing with a strong emphasis on impartiality and human rights.

Tradeoffs

A major barrier to conflict resolution in Northern Ireland has been the unwillingness of protagonists to recognize or acknowledge the basic rights of the other side. As denial of civil rights had fuelled the "Troubles" during the late 1960s, a peaceful transition from protracted conflict required parity of esteem for both nationalists and unionists within Northern Ireland. The GFA guarantees equality of political, civil, social, and cultural rights. Consent was designed to be a two-way street so that neither unionists nor nationalists would be able to achieve much in Northern Ireland without first securing the agreement of their former adversaries with whom they now shared government power.

Ultimately, Sinn Féin accepted a formula that involved a right to self-determination for Northern Ireland that the party had previously dismissed as “the unionist veto.” Reaching consensus on defining the political unit that might benefit from self-determination was a major breakthrough. The GFA included the unwieldy formula that it was for the Irish people alone, by agreement between the two parts respectively and without external impediment, to exercise their right of self-determination but reiterated that majority consent from Northern Ireland’s electorate was a prerequisite. The birth right of all of Northern Ireland’s people to identify themselves as Irish, British, or both was recognized and this right could not be affected by any change to the constitutional status of the North. Significantly, the Government in Dublin agreed to reformulate Articles 2 and 3 of the Irish constitution so that it moderated what was perceived by unionists to be a “territorial claim” on Northern Ireland. The revised constitutional provision shifted the emphasis away from the rights to territory toward the rights of people (Ó Beacháin 2002).

Until the mid-1990s, it had been assumed that any power-sharing system of government within Northern Ireland would be between “moderate” nationalists and unionists, in other words the Social Democratic and Labour Party (SDLP) and the Ulster Unionist Party (UUP). However, while the power-sharing executive was initially based on these two factions, the more “radical” DUP and Sinn Féin eclipsed the SDLP and UUP in the early years of the twenty-first century and have formed the bedrock of Northern Ireland’s power-sharing administration. Indeed, the first power-sharing government established after the St. Andrew’s Agreement was led by erstwhile fundamentalist Ian Paisley and the former IRA military commander Martin McGuinness (O’Leary 2019, vol III, pp. 254–257).

Neither the Good Friday nor St. Andrews Agreements was presented as a final settlement.

Rather, the peace process allows for an open-ended constitutional development. The GFA acknowledged that a majority of people on the island of Ireland wished for a united Ireland, and that this included a substantial section within Northern Ireland, but emphasized that a majority in the six counties, freely exercised and legitimate, supported the status quo. In deference to nationalist aspirations, it was affirmed that should a majority within Northern Ireland opt for a united Ireland, it would be a binding obligation for both governments to introduce legislation to give effect to that wish. Had the GFA been presented as an end in itself, without leaving open the possibility of a united Ireland at some point in the future, it is most unlikely that it would have been accepted by nationalists within Northern Ireland or, indeed, by the Irish Government.

Brexit

Brexit introduced profound uncertainty into Anglo-Irish relations, damaged intercommunity relations within Northern Ireland, and undermined many of the certainties and assumptions on which the peace process had been predicated (Ó Beacháin 2018a, pp. 257–262). It immediately raised several important questions regarding Northern Ireland’s status within the UK and its relationship with the rest of the island. A majority of people in Northern Ireland (56%) voted to remain in the European Union and many feared that Brexit would undermine the work of reconciliation as well as destabilize the region (Murphy 2018). Moreover, the reintroduction of a physical border between the north and south of Ireland could have a negative impact on the peace process (Doyle and Connolly 2019). Following the Brexit referendum, Taoiseach Enda Kenny and the President of the European Commission, Jean-Claude Juncker, jointly agreed that, in the event of Irish reunification, the North would be able to rejoin the EU, in a manner similar to East Germany’s accession in 1990 (Ó Beacháin 2018a, p. 259).

Consent is at the heart of the GFA, particularly the principle that there could be no change in the constitutional status of Northern Ireland without a majority agreeing to such a change. Brexit now threatened to fundamentally alter Northern Ireland's status against the explicit wishes of the majority that had indicated a wish to stay within the EU. As the people of Northern Ireland are by birth right entitled to be Irish citizens, it is unclear how their rights as EU citizens can be protected post-Brexit.

Following its failure to win the snap election of June 2017, the ruling Conservative Party entered into a pact with the DUP, the only party within Northern Ireland to have supported Brexit during the referendum campaign. As the British Government depended on the DUP for its survival, it weakened London's ability to be "rigorously impartial" in its dealings with Northern Ireland, as required by the GFA (Ó Beacháin 2018b, p. 319). When the Conservative Party under Boris Johnson won a clear majority of seats in the December 2019 general election, it eliminated this dependence on the DUP but failed to resolve the tension between the UK diverging from the EU and the need to avoid a hard border on the island of Ireland. During the same month, the Northern Ireland assembly and power-sharing executive were reconstituted after a 3-year hiatus, occasioned by the "cash for ash" scandal, a failed renewable energy incentive scheme that had cost the Exchequer up to half a billion pounds (McBride 2019). The challenges to reestablishing the executive were accentuated by the DUP's centrality in propping up the Conservative Government and its hostility to the enactment of an act that would enhance the rights of Irish Language speakers in Northern Ireland. In the February 2020 general election, Sinn Féin attracted the largest number of votes in the Republic of Ireland for the first time since partition. The prospect of Sinn Féin being in government in both parts of Ireland is likely to enhance calls for a referendum on Irish unity.

Conclusion

Though it has occasionally faltered, the Northern Ireland peace process has endured for decades.

The implementation of the Good Friday and St. Andrews Agreements has fundamentally altered day-to-day life in Northern Ireland. Violence has abated and erstwhile antagonists have shared power, supported by the British and Irish Governments. While remaining within the United Kingdom, provision has been made for Northern Ireland to unite with the rest of Ireland at some point in the future. In Northern Ireland today, the population is evenly divided between nationalists and unionists. In the 2017 elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly, unionist and nationalist parties each won exactly 39 seats. As a result of the Westminster election of December 2019, Northern Ireland elected 9 nationalists (7 Sinn Féin, 2 SDLP), 8 unionists (all DUP), and 1 non-aligned (Alliance Party) (Ó Beacháin 2018b, p. 328; 2020).

The agreements constitute a successful attempt at conflict management, but it is perhaps too big a leap to say that what has been achieved is conflict resolution, let alone conflict transformation. Northern Ireland retains the scars of prolonged misrule. Society remains segregated in the most fundamental of ways, with nationalists and unionists living apart, going to separate schools and churches, reading rival communal newspapers, playing different sports, and so on. Segregation is both a symptom and a cause of conflict. The GFA respected the integrity of the conflict by institutionalizing it to an extent where it is difficult to conceive of a form of government that is not a coalition of opposites composed of unionists and nationalists who have little in common beyond a mandate to rule bestowed by the peace agreements. One can perhaps say that such a form of government is the worst for Northern Ireland except for the realistic alternatives.

Summary

In Northern Ireland today, the population is almost evenly divided between unionists and nationalists. Unionists (who wish for Northern Ireland to remain part of the United Kingdom) are in general from a Protestant family or ancestral background, while nationalists (who seek a united Ireland) are much more likely to be the descendants of those Catholics displaced during the colonial project. The fundamental source of division, however, is not theological; the conflict centers on issues of power and identity. For centuries, and with the support of the British Government in London, unionists exercised control over the majority Irish Catholic population, which triggered numerous rebellions and uprisings. London's strategic objectives, allied with unionist preferences, resulted in the partition of Ireland in 1921 by a unilateral act of the British Parliament. Two new political regimes were created, a 26-county state (now the Republic of Ireland), which was almost homogeneously nationalist, and the much smaller 6-county Northern Ireland, which constituted less than 17% of the island of Ireland, where unionists outnumbered nationalists by two to one. While a constituent part of the United Kingdom, and subsidized by the British exchequer, the unionist regime in Northern Ireland enjoyed virtually unrestricted powers. From the beginning, Northern Ireland was a one-party state that excluded Catholics and nationalists from economic and political power. The hostile response of state security forces and armed irregulars to the civil rights campaign during the late 1960s precipitated a series of violent events, quickly dubbed "the Troubles," which would last for almost three decades. The core of the conflict was a triangular struggle that pitted nationalist insurgents against the British army and unionist paramilitary forces. The majority of fatalities, however, were non-combatants.

The Good Friday and St Andrews Agreements have institutionalized a peace process that has fundamentally altered day-to-day life in Northern Ireland. Violence has abated, and unionists and nationalists have shared power, supported by the British and Irish governments. While remaining within the United Kingdom, provision has been made for Northern Ireland to unite with the rest of Ireland at some point in the future should a majority of the electorate, by means of a border poll, express this preference.

Cross-References

- ▶ Balkanization
- ▶ Georgian-Abkhaz Conflict
- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict

Funding This research was supported by an award from DCU's Faculty of Humanities and Social Sciences Staff Journal Publication Scheme.

References

- Ahern, B. (2009). The autobiography. London: Hutchinson.
- Connolly, E., & Doyle, J. (2018). Ripe moments for exiting political violence: An analysis of the Northern Ireland case. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 29, 147–162.
- Cox, M. (1998). Northern Ireland: The war that came in from the cold. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 9, 73–84.
- Department of Foreign Affairs. (1998). The agreement. Available at <https://www.dfa.ie/media/dfa/alldfaweb/sitemedia/ourrolesandpolicies/northernireland/good-friday-agreement.pdf>
- Doyle, J. (2010). Policing the narrow ground: Lessons from the transformation of policing in Northern Ireland. Dublin: Royal Irish Academy.
- Doyle, J., & Connolly, E. (2019). The effects of Brexit on the Good Friday Agreement and the Northern Ireland peace process. In C. Baciu & J. Doyle (Eds.), Peace, security and defence cooperation in post-Brexit Europe (pp. 79–95). New York: Springer.
- Farrell, M. (1983). Arming the Protestants: The formation of the Ulster special constabulary and the Royal Ulster Constabulary, 1920–7. London: Pluto.
- Fisk, R. (1975). The point of no return: The strike which broke the British in Ulster. London: André Deutsch.
- McBride, S. (2019). Burned: The inside story of the 'cash-for-ash' scandal and Northern Ireland's secretive new elite. Newbridge: Merrion Press.
- McKittrick, D., & McVea, D. (2012). Making sense of the troubles: The story of the Northern Ireland conflict. London: Penguin.
- Moloney, E. (2008). Paisley: From demagogue to democrat? Dublin: Poolbeg.
- Moore, C. (2019). Birth of the border: The impact of partition in Ireland. Newbridge: Merrion Press.
- Mulroe, P. (2017). Bombs, bullets and the border: Ireland's frontier: Irish security policy, 1969–1978. Newbridge: Irish Academic Press.
- Murphy, M. C. (2018). Europe and Northern Ireland's future: Negotiating Brexit's unique case. Newcastle upon Tyne: Agenda.

- Ó Beacháin, D. (2002). Ireland amends its constitution. In M. Rehn (Ed.), Great events of the 20th century (Vol. 8, pp. 3120–3122). New York: Salem Press.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2010). Destiny of the soldiers: Fianna fail, Irish republicanism and the IRA 1926–1973. Dublin: Gill and Macmillan.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2018a). From partition to Brexit: The Irish government and Northern Ireland. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2018b). Ireland's foreign relations in 2017. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 29, 311–339.
- Ó Beacháin, D. (2020). Ireland's foreign relations in 2019. Irish Studies in International Affairs, 31, 297–321.
- O'Leary, B. (2019). A treatise on Northern Ireland (3 volumes). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- O'Leary, B., & McGarry, J. (1995). Explaining Northern Ireland. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Patten, C. (1999). A new beginning: Policing in Northern Ireland: The report of the independent commission on policing for Northern Ireland [Patten Report]. HMSO.
- Powell, J. (2008). Great hatred, little room: Making peace in Northern Ireland. London: Random House.
- Reynolds, A. (2009). My autobiography. London: Transworld Ireland.
- Sanders, A. (2019). The long peace process: The United States of America and Northern Ireland, 1960–2008. Liverpool: Liverpool University Press.

Truth and Reconciliation Commissions

- ▶ Textiles Making Peace

Truth Commissions

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

U

Ubuntu system

- ▶ Armed Conflicts in Africa and Indigenous Conflict Resolution

UN

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict

UN Intervention

- ▶ UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia

UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia

Renata Summa
Pontifical Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil

Synonyms

International intervention; UN intervention

Definition

During the 1990s and early 2000s, the ex-Yugoslavia region experienced a series of conflicts following the breakup of the country. The United Nations (UN) provided the main institutional response to the wars that erupted in ex-Yugoslavia from 1991 to 1999, deploying peacekeeping missions in Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), and Macedonia and participating on a mission in Kosovo. At the same time, the ex-Yugoslavia region became a site that shaped the future of UN missions and established parameters for “success” and “failure.” Episodes like the genocide in Srebrenica, which had been declared a “safe area” by the UN forces in BiH, drove the organization into reshaping its doctrines and strategies for future peacekeeping engagements. Moreover, the UN also got involved in bolder initiatives of statebuilding following the wars in BiH and Kosovo.

The UN Missions in Light of the Yugoslavian Dissolution

The wars that erupted in ex-Yugoslavia from 1991 to 1999 were considered the most serious security crisis in Europe since the end of Second World War. The conflicts in Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Kosovo caused the death of approximately 140,000 people (Baker 2015, p. 1) and were marked by massive human rights violations. The United Nations provided the main institutional response in face of the crisis in the region.

The 1990s were a crucial decade for the United Nations. While Yugoslavia was dissolved into new countries, the UN was experiencing a reformulation of its role in international issues, most specifically in what regards peace operations. Indeed, the end of the Cold War was marked by an increasing number of peace operations, most especially those led and authorized by the United Nations. That decade registered the highest number of UN missions ever created. An important aspect is the deployment of such missions inside the European continent, an unprecedented development since the 1940s (Belamy and Williams 2015).

As we discuss in the following sections, the ex-Yugoslavia region became a site that shaped the future of UN missions and established parameters for “success” and “failure.” Through the years that the UN was involved in the region, the operation mandates became wider and more complex – in an attempt to respond to the growing complexity of the conflicts. Following critical episodes in which the UN peacekeepers failed to protect local population, the role of the UN peacekeeping institution came under scrutiny, forcing UN to reformulate its doctrines and strategies for future engagements. Moreover, in Europe, the UN was disregarded as the main peace actor in the ground as other organizations such as the European Union (EU) and the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO) gained strength on that matter following the Yugoslav wars.

In the meanwhile, however, the UN deployed several peacekeeping missions in the region: United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR – 1992), United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation (UNCRO – 1995), United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH – 1995), UN Preventive Deployment Mission in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (UNPREDEP – 1995), United Nations International Police Task Force (IPTF – 1995), United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP – 1996), United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES – 1996), and United Nations Police Support Group (UNPSG – 1998) (see Table 1).

At times, those missions acted along or were replaced by other forces from regional organizations or by NATO, such as European Community Monitoring Mission (ECMM-EUMM – 1991),

UN Missions in Ex-Yugoslavia, Table 1 UN missions in ex-Yugoslavia in the 1990s

| Name of the UN mission | Acronym | Year of deployment | Country where it has been deployed |
|---|----------|--------------------|--|
| United Nations Protection Force | UNPROFOR | 1992 | Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia |
| United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation | UNCRO | 1995 | Croatia |
| United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka | UNMOP | 1996 | Croatia |
| United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium | UNTAES | 1996 | Croatia |
| United Nations Police Support Group | UNPSG | 1998 | Croatia |
| United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina | UNMIBH | 1995 | Bosnia and Herzegovina |
| United Nations International Police Task Force | IPTF | 1995 | Bosnia and Herzegovina |
| UN Preventive Deployment Mission in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia | UNPREDEP | 1995 | Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia |

Implementation Force (IFOR – 1995), Stabilization Force (SFOR – 1996), European Union Force Bosnia and Herzegovina (through Operation Concordia – 2003 and Operation Althea – 2004), Operation Essential Harvest (TFH – 2001) among others. Here, our focus will rely only on the UN-led missions (Bellamy and Williams 2015) in ex-Yugoslavia, even though at times we will mention how they relate to other actors.

In what follows, we analyze the UN missions within the context for which they have been deployed. As such, the analysis will be made by country, an organizational choice that allows for exploring the connections among the different actors in play and the developments and successions from one mission to another.

The UN Missions in Croatia

In February 1992, after 6 months of internal conflicts in Croatia between the Serbian minority and Croats, the United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR) was authorized by the UN Security Council (UNSC), as an “interim arrangement to create the conditions of peace and security required for the negotiation of an overall settlement of the Yugoslav crisis” (UN, p. 145). The Secretary-General, in his report of 15 February 1992 to the Security Council, stated that “the [I]mmediate UN deployment is the only remaining hope for avoiding an even more destructive civil war than that which prevailed during the second half of 1991” (Nambiar 2011). It was thus seen as an essential tool to prevent further conflict in the region and to restore peace, especially after Western Europe had failed to provide a response to the conflicts in Croatia.

The UNPROFOR was created according to the Vance Plan, which foresaw the deployment of UN troops and police monitors in certain areas of Croatia, designated as “United Nations Protected Areas” (UNPAs). These were areas constituted by a majority of Serbs and, therefore, judged more vulnerable by the Secretary-General. Due to the tensions between the two communities (Croats and Serbs), the UNPAs needed special arrangements to reach or consolidate a cease-fire. The plan established three UNPAs in Croatia: Eastern Slavonia, Western Slavonia, and Krajina (UN 1991). It was part of the UNPROFOR mandate to ensure that these areas would be demilitarized, and that armed attacks would be avoided. Moreover, the mission counted with police monitors, who would assure that local forces would not discriminate against persons of any nationality or perpetrate human right abuses. Also, the UNPROFOR would help to relocate all Yugoslav National Army (JNA) forces still in Croatia to other parts of Yugoslavia. Finally, the mission would assist UN humanitarian agencies dealing with displaced persons (UN 1991).

UNPROFOR was deployed in May 1992 in Eastern Slavonia and by the end of June, it had already assumed its role in all set regions. However, the mission had some problems in certain areas of Croatia which were controlled by the JNA and inhabited mostly by Serbs. Most of these areas laid outside the UNPAs agreed boundaries. While Belgrade wanted these areas to be part of the UNPAs, the Croatian government was against increasing these areas. Nevertheless, through that year, UNPROFOR’s mandate also demarcated the “pink zones,” vulnerable areas outside of the UNPAs.

This was the first of many incremental expansions of the mission beyond its original scope, a process that has been called “mission creep” and which has been considered one of the main problems the UN missions faced in ex-Yugoslavia. Faced with the outbreak of war in Bosnia and Herzegovina and the rise of tensions in Macedonia, the UNPROFOR extended its mandate not only in terms of scope but also geographically.

It is important to stress that UNPROFOR in Croatia, unlike most UN missions deployed in the post-Cold War, was more similar to a traditional peacekeeping operation (those which were conducted during the Cold War) and, despite its “mission creep,” had limited capacity of action. Indeed, initially, UNPROFOR was essentially a Chapter VI (of the UN Charter) operation aimed at supervising a cease-fire, i.e., “freezing” the situation on the ground while political developments would be led by diplomatic efforts (Tardy 2014b). Although the United States and the European Commission wanted the operation, from the beginning, to take place under the provisions of Chapter VII, India and China had opposed the idea (Shrivastava and Agarwal 2003). Being a Chapter VI operation means that the mission is allowed to use force in self-defense only, while Chapter VII operations are allowed to use all necessary means to restore peace.

Although UNPROFOR achieved some of its goals, it is usually dismissed and disapproved for its passive posture. Among its achievements, Tardy (2014b) lists: (1) the attainment of a relative stabilization of the UNPAs during the period the UNPROFOR was active in those areas, its mediating role among the two sides of the conflict and the negotiation of a partial withdrawal of the JNA from the UNPAs; (2) the avoidance of a renewal of violence in 1995, when it was replaced by United Nations Confidence Restoration Operation (UNCRO), which operated from March 1995 to January 1996; and (3) the UN claimed it has “played a major role in protecting the rights of minorities in the protected areas and the Croat population there has been relatively stable since the ceasefire agreement.”

However, the shortcomings outnumber the mission’s achievements. Tardy (2014b) also lists the failures that UNPROFOR endured in Croatia: (1) It reinforced the stalemate on the ground – the mission was accused of having consolidated and frozen Serbian territorial achievements in Croatia; (2) despite its mandate, the mission was not able to facilitate the return of minorities to the areas they monitored, and the UNPAs were never fully demilitarized; (3) UNPROFOR in Croatia was considered a “weak” mission since it lacked a strong support from the UN Security Council; and (4) the deployment of Operation Storm by the Croatian government, which violently seized the areas controlled by Serbian forces, and was a consequence of UNPROFOR’s failure in stabilizing the situation on the ground.

UN in Croatia After UNPROFOR

In 1995, UNPROFOR was replaced by UNCRO, a smaller and less powerful mission compared to its predecessor. UNCRO lasted less than a year and was dissolved into two new missions: United Nations Transitional Administration for Eastern Slavonia, Baranja and Western Sirmium (UNTAES) and United Nations Mission of Observers in Prevlaka (UNMOP). UNTAES was then a third successive UN mission deployed to Croatia. Established by the Security Council through Resolution 1037 (1996), UNTAES’ main objective was to reintegrate the region of Eastern Slavonia, Baranja, and Western Sirmium peacefully into Croatia’s legal and constitutional system (<https://documents-dds-ny.un.org/doc/UNDOC/GEN/N96/007/55/PDF/N9600755.pdf?OpenElement>). The region – majorly inhabited by Serbs – had broken out along other parts of Croatia in 1990 to form the Republic of Serbian Krajina. The latter was dissolved in 1995 with the end of the war in Croatia. The region, however, was only reintegrated in 1998.

In contrast to UNPROFOR and UNCRO, UNTAES is considered to have successfully fulfilled its mandate. A few important factors have contributed to this positive evaluation. The mission was deployed in an already more stabilized and favorable political and military context: the wars in Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina had reached an end through the Dayton Agreement; there was stronger national and international support for the mission, and the region to be reintegrated was more isolated and experiencing growing economic crisis. The question of support here seems crucial: the mission has been endorsed by the Security Council and the Contact Group. The Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) and Serbian authorities in Croatia also sought to cooperate, especially when the latter understood they would not be annexed by the former (Simonović and Nimać 1999).

Another crucial aspect relies on the nature of the mission’s mandate. While UNPROFOR’s and UNCRO’s mandate were considered too ambitious – encompassing the aim of “achieving a political solution” – UNTAES had a more achievable one. UNTAES’ mandate encompassed both civil and military aspects, such as the emission of 154,443 certificates of citizenship and the demilitarization through a “weapon buy-back scheme” (Idem). When the mandate was concluded, in 1998, UNTAES made a transition towards the United Nations Police Support Group (UNPSG) (resolution 1145/1997). UNPSG's aim was "to continue monitoring the performance of the Croatian police in the Danube region, particularly with respect to the return of displaced persons, for a single nine-month period" (UN 1997). In October 1998, after 9 months, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) took over the police monitoring responsibilities from UNPSG.

Another region of concern for the UN was the strategic Prevlaka peninsula, under dispute between Croatia and then FRY (nowadays, Montenegro). The Peninsula, located in the very south of Croatia, used to be a Yugoslav military base in the Yugoslav years. In 1992, Croatia and FRY agreed to demilitarize it and put it under the monitoring of UNPROFOR (Kajosevic 2020) through Resolution 779 (1992). The same functions were carried out by UNCRO once it took place. By the end of UNCRO's mandate, in 1996, the Security Council approved the deployment of more military forces to continue patrolling the area. UNMOP was thus created, according to Resolution 1038 (1996) (UN). Although small in numbers, UNMOP was in place for many years. The mission came to an end in 2002, when both Croatia and (now) Montenegro signed a protocol on an interim regime, according to which the peninsula remained in Croatia while Montenegro obtained the rights over the surrounding waters. While UNMOP managed to avoid physical violence in the area, the disputes around Prevlaka peninsula are still in place today (Kajosevic 2020).

UN Missions in Bosnia and Herzegovina

The UNPROFOR intervention in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) started without an official mandate to operate in the newly independent country. However, as the conflict in BiH became more violent and widespread, UNPROFOR extended its action to Croatia's neighboring country, following a request by (then) Bosnian president, Alija Izetbegović. Indeed, the situation on the ground had much deteriorated since BiH held a plebiscite, on 20 February 1992, to establish its independence from the Yugoslavian federation – which was boycotted by the Bosnian Serbs. With 99.4% of votes pro-independence, Izetbegović declared BiH an independent state on 3 March 1992, triggering clashes between Serbs and Muslims in many parts of the country, Sarajevo included (Baker 2015; Shrivastava and Agarwal 2003). The JNA intervened along local Bosnian Serb forces and very quickly captured 70% of the territory, promoting ethnic cleansing campaigns in areas populated mostly by Muslims, especially in the North and East of BiH (Toal and Dahlman 2011; Shrivastava and Agarwal 2003).

But it was only on the 30 May 1992, amidst the upsurge of violence in Sarajevo, that the UN Security Council approved Resolution 757, which officially extended UNPROFOR's mission to BiH. Resolution 757 called for economic sanctions against Yugoslavia and established that UNPROFOR's main duty was the provision of humanitarian assistance to the Bosnian population. It also expressed concern with UNPROFOR blue helmets and humanitarian agents, which were being targeted by the JNA and pro-Serbs paramilitary groups in BiH while establishing "a security zone encompassing Sarajevo and its airport" (UN Resolution 757).

That was only the beginning of the bloodiest conflict in ex-Yugoslavia and the main theatre of war for UNPROFOR. However, the UN operation in BiH also experienced a "mission creep" which was not followed by matching efforts and sufficient means to accomplish its mandate. The government of Bosnia and Herzegovina accused the UN of doing very little to help, while calling for a military operation in the country. This lack of resources was also felt by the UNPROFOR. In the first 15 months on the ground, the mission lost 53 personnel and 542 were wounded (Shrivastava and Agarwal 2003). As the conflict advanced, the UN blue helmets systematically became targets of Bosnian Serb forces and, in various occasions, were held hostage and demoralized.

In 1993, the UN Security Council changed its strategy in the region, adopting a "deterrent" approach instead of a humanitarian one (Halilović 2016). It established the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY), which undertook the prosecution and adjudication of four types of crimes during the wars in the region (crimes against humanity, genocide, violations of the laws or customs of war, grave breaches of the Geneva Convention). The ICTY operated until 2017, charging over 160 persons. Moreover, the UN officially established six “safe areas” in BiH: Bihać, Goražde, Sarajevo, Srebrenica, Tuzla, and Žepa (Shrivastava and Agarwal 2003). At that point, those cities or villages had received thousands of Muslims from areas that were “ethnically cleansed” by Serbs. The UN promised to protect those “safe areas” following two rules: no weapons within and no entry of weapons from outside (Nambiar 2011). Most of them were located in areas controlled by the Serbs and, therefore, their safety was at minimum fragile and, in some cases, it was never actually established (such as in Sarajevo). Chenicheri Satish Nambiar, who was the first Force Commander and Head of Mission of UNPROFOR between 1992 and 1993, states that “it was also made clear that to ensure the implementation of this requirement (the safe areas), a ‘muscular’ deployment of UN forces was essential” (p. 178). Ironically, due to the lack of resources and political will to protect them, “safe areas” such as Sarajevo, Srebrenica, Goražde, and Žepa staged some of the most brutal atrocities of the war in Bosnia (Halilović 2016).

Furthermore, the Security Council left unclear whether the UNPROFOR could use force to protect the civilian population in the enclaves or only for their own self-defense. A subsequent resolution (resolution 836) clarified the issue, asserting that the blue helmets had a mandate to use force to “deter attacks against the safe areas.” However, as the Human Rights Watch reports, the UN estimated that it would need 34,000 troops “to ensure full respect for the safe areas” but only 3,500 were eventually deployed (Human Rights Watch 1995).

The most infamous event involving the UNPROFOR in BiH happened precisely in one of the UN safe areas: the genocide in Srebrenica. In July 1995, the Bosnian-Serbian forces commanded by general Ratko Mladic overran Srebrenica – which used to be a village of 8,000 inhabitants, but, at that time, it counted 50,000 people, mostly displaced Muslims who were suffering from lack of food and other basic goods (Human Rights Watch 1995). Faced with the imminent attack, over 15,000 Muslim men in military age ran through the mountains, while other thousands sought protection at the Potočari compound, where the Dutch UN forces were stationed. Amidst the escalation of threats and being surrendered by Ratko Mladic’s troops, the blue helmets helped to organize the deportation of around 28,000 people in exchange for the release of 14 Dutch peacekeepers held by Bosnian Serbs. What followed caused one of the worst stains on the UN image. Muslim men were separated from women and children, inspected by the UN troops in search for sharp objects and handed to their enemies – the Bosnian Serb Army. Then, they were taken to several locations nearby, such as stadiums and warehouses, brutally murdered, and then buried into mass graves (Ó Tuathail 1999). Women and children were gathered in buses and taken to Muslim territory – many of them were terrorized, raped, beaten, and robbed along the way (Human Rights Watch 1995). Footage from these scenes shows UNPROFOR as completely submissive to Mladic’s troops while cooperating to evacuate Muslim refugees.

The Srebrenica genocide – where over 8,372 Muslims were killed – was labelled as the “UN darkest hour” (Waterfield apud Halilović 2016) and became one of the central points in classifying the mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina a failure (Kenkel 2013; Nambiar 2011; Simić 2013). In addition, it has prompted questions about whether the UN could have liability and be held responsible for actions and/or outcomes in the international political system (Hasanbasić 2014; Lang 2003). In 2014, in a legal case involving a group of victims called Mothers of Srebrenica against the Dutch State, a District Court of the Hague dismissed the UN as party to the suit, cementing the concept of UN’s “absolute immunity” while shifting a heavy portion of the liability for peacekeeper behavior onto Member States’ contributing troops (Hasanbasić 2014). The Court found that Dutch peacekeepers bear some amount of liability in what regards the fate of 350 men who were hidden in the Potočari compound and of whom the Bosnian Serbs were unaware. The Court judged that “Dutchbat failed to offer these 350 male refugees the choice to stay where they were, even though that would have been possible” (Karasz 2019). Instead, they were handed to Bosnian Serbs.

UNPROFOR’s performance in BiH also raised concern to the use of force and the partnership with other organizations – most especially, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Already in 1992, NATO took part on the conflicts by assuring the implementation of economic embargoes and a no-fly zone over BiH (Kaufman 2002). It was also NATO that undertook the most muscular attacks against the Bosnian Serb Army, which prompted the parts to sit at the peace negotiation table and agree upon the signature of the Dayton Peace Accords. NATO was also responsible for the implementation of the military part of Dayton, and sent 55,000 troops to BiH to make the transition from war to peace (see ► “NATO’s Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding”).

UN in Postwar BiH

The developments of UNPROFOR in BiH deeply shaped the future of the peace missions both in the region and in other places. In the following years, Western powers, most especially the USA, developed a doctrine of “liberal interventionism.” NATO-led mission in Kosovo in 1999 is a result of such policy (Halilović 2016).

The Dayton Peace Agreement, signed on 14 December 1995, established the end of the war in BiH. Soon after that, on 20 December, NATO-commanded Implementation Force (IFOR) took over from UNPROFOR and, on the next day, the Security Council established the United Nations International Police Task Force (IPTF) and a United Nations civilian office under the name of United Nations Mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina (UNMIBH) (through Resolution 1035). UNMIBH’s mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina differed widely from its predecessor in scope. Acting in a postwar state, it held a statebuilding role and it was responsible for assuring law and order, promoting the reconstruction of Bosnian economy and addressing the question of refugees and internally displaced persons. Besides, UNMIBH was only one actor among a broader ensemble of peace building organizations in Bosnia, such as NATO, the EU, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, and even UN agencies such as the UN Refugee Agency (UNHCR).

Therefore, the UNMIBH was part of a transnational government in BiH as an effort to promote wider international participation in rebuilding the state. This kind of international intervention – that was also implemented later in Kosovo and East Timor – is considered to be a response to the criticism against the UN and the international community more widely for failing to protect civilians especially in Bosnia, Rwanda, and Somalia. Such approach was, however, deemed a sort of neocolonialism, and the transnational government, a benevolent autocracy (Williams 2005).

Another important tendency regards the role the UN played in such missions. Indeed, from that point on, other organizations gained a much more prominent role in peace missions and peace and statebuilding in the region. A special mention must be made to NATO, which would lead military operations in Serbia and Kosovo a few years later, and to the EU, which has replaced both the UN and NATO in BiH in both civilian and military tasks in the 2000s.

UN Missions in North Macedonia

A third development of UNPROFOR took place in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (nowadays, North Macedonia), which became independent from Yugoslavia in 8 September 1991. Due to tensions that erupted in the Macedonian society – composed officially of 67% Macedonians, 23% Albanians (a number which is contested) and 10% Turks, Serbs, Vlachs, Roma, and other – and fearing spillovers from other conflicts in the region, the UN deployed to the country its first preventive military operation (Tardy 2014a). The UN Security Council Resolution 795 established the mission in Macedonia on 11 December 1992. It was a traditional peace operation, deployed upon the request of the Macedonian government and under Chapter VI, which foresees the non-resort to force unless in case of self-defense (Kenkel 2013).

Unlike the missions in Croatia and BiH, UNPROFOR in Macedonia was considered a success. It started by patrolling Macedonian borders and, in March 1994, as the scope of the mission was enlarged to address also internal tensions, it has succeeded in maintaining the country's stability and not letting any conflict to scale up. In 1995, the year when UNPROFOR's mandate ended, the Secretary-General reported that Macedonia faced "no current military threat" (Tardy 2014a).

UNPROFOR was replaced by the UN Preventive Deployment Mission in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (UNPREDEP). On its first years, UNPREDEP faced two external challenges: the eruption of the pyramid economic crisis in Albania, in 1997 – which was followed by large waves of people trying to leave that country – and the intensification of conflicts in Kosovo on the following year. At this occasion, the mission received additional tasks such as monitoring and reporting on illicit arms flows and other prohibited activities (Resolution 1186, 21 July 1998). Moreover, the mission was performing statebuilding activities such as institution building and the promotion of good governance and rule of law (Tardy 2014a).

UNPREDEP had a strange end, at least in what concerns the timing. The mission reached its end on 25 February 1999, after a veto from China on the Security Council to renew its mandate (Ibid.). A month later, on 24 March 1999, NATO launched an air operation against Yugoslavia – which lasted 78 days and produced around 229,300 Kosovar refugees in Macedonia, corresponding to 11% of the population at that time (International Crisis Group 1999). The UN mission, however, was also not there in 2001, when the Albanian National Army launched an insurgency to claim more political, social, and cultural rights to Albanians in Macedonia. In fact, the conflict, which resulted in the Ohrid Agreements, was brokered by NATO – an organization that gained more influence in the region due to the role it played in Bosnia and Herzegovina.

The UN Mission in Kosovo

Differently from Croatia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, and Macedonia, the UN mission to Kosovo was deployed only after the conflict had erupted and was close to the end. The United Nation Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) was established by the UNSC Resolution 1244 on June 1999, after Yugoslavia agreed to withdrawal its forces from Kosovo, amidst a bombing campaign led by NATO. While the military mission in the region was attributed to NATO, through the Kosovo Force (KFOR), the UN became responsible to "provide an interim administration for Kosovo under which the people of Kosovo can enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia" (UNSC Resolution 1244). The mission's mandate operated under chapter VII and had an unprecedented depth, giving the United Nations full power to function as an interim government and to administrate a state territory (Stahn 2001).

The UN Secretary-General was represented through the figure of the Special Representative and the mission worked closely with other organizations and UN agencies. Indeed, UNMIK was organized in four pillars, each one of them led by a different agency: (1) Humanitarian Assistance (UNHCR); (2) Civil Administration (UN Department of Peacekeeping Operations); (3) Elections (OSCE); and (4) Economic Reconstruction (EU) (Friedrich 2005; Gow 2009). The presence of multiple organizations and UN bodies was a crucial aspect of the postwar period in Kosovo. The organizations, however, not always reached agreements, and the lack of coordination among them has influenced the results of their work, especially in what concerns issues related to minorities.

Moreover, NATO's role was redefined during the Kosovo intervention to become increasingly associated to a humanitarian organization (Huysmans 2002). NATO started dealing with refugees, even though it lacked the skills to do so and in competition and lack of cooperation with UNHCR. At the same time, the UNHCR feared working closely with NATO – which was also a part of the military conflict – given that it could undermine its impartiality and neutrality. UNMIK and NATO also acted under different legal settings. The Ombudsperson, institutionally set up in 2000, could hold UNMIK accountable for their actions, while KFOR has refused to allow the body to monitor its actions (Caruso 2007). The UNMIK also had difficulties coordinating its actions with the OSCE, especially regarding communication and media efforts (Ibid.).

On 17 February 2008, Kosovo declared independence from Yugoslavia. UNMIK thus assumed a status-neutral approach, but continued on the ground implementing its mandate. At the same time, it allowed the deployment of European Union Rule of Law Mission (EULEX). Overtime, the UN became increasingly marginalized within Kosovo, with its new leaders overseeing it as an administrative authority (Yannis 2004. See also ► “United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)” on this issue). At the same time, the Western Balkans became a key priority for the European Union since the future of this region was largely associated to the integration in the EU. The European bloc utilized the promise of membership as a vital tool to exert its influence upon Kosovo (Braniff 2011). As such, peace became more associated with the integration to the European Union and a common market, than to the presence of the UN.

Summary

The ex-Yugoslavia region was an important site for the development of new practices regarding UN peacekeeping missions in the 1990s and early 2000s. With the Security Council more prone to approve such missions than during the Cold War times, the UN played a crucial role in the region. The UN experiences in ex-Yugoslavia shaped the future of UN missions and established parameters for “success” and “failure.” The UN held a more traditional role in Croatia with UNPROFOR and, already at that point, it faced hostilities from local forces and shortcomings on assuring its mandate. However, when UNPROFOR was extended to Bosnia and Herzegovina, the challenges became even more substantial. While the mandate was enlarged and encompassed great responsibilities – such as the creation of “safe areas” – UNPROFOR did not have the resources to protect neither the civilians in those areas nor themselves. The blue helmets were systematically targeted and made hostage by Serbian forces. Moreover, the UN image got stained in the Srebrenica genocide, when the blue helmets not only watched Mladic’s men separate Muslim men from women and children but also cooperated with them and helped them to organize those actions.

UNPROFOR in Bosnia and Herzegovina became known as one of the biggest failures involving the UN in terms of peace operations in the 1990s. On the other hand, smaller missions with less ambitious mandates and greater international and local support, such as in Croatia and (North) Macedonia, proved to help the local population and to prevent tensions from escalating.

Besides, organizations such as NATO, the OSCE, and the European Union gained prominence and took on a more active role in peace operations. This can be noted during the postwar period, especially in Bosnia and Herzegovina and in Kosovo. The cooperation between the UN and other regional or international organizations became a tendency due to the growing complexity of such missions, which involve a great range of actors, very ambitious mandates, and the enormous task of administering a state. However, this cooperation is not always easy and effective, and there are disagreements and lack of collaboration among them.

Cross-References

- Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- NATO’s Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo

- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)

References

- Baker, C. (2015). The Yugoslav wars of the 1990s. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Bellamy, A., & Williams, P. (2015). Trends in peace operations, 1947–2013. In J. Kooops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Braniff, M. (2011). Integrating the Balkans: Conflict resolution and the impact of EU expansion. London/New York: I.B. Tauris.
- Caruso, U. (2007). The interplay between the Council of Europe, OSCE, EU and NATO. Bolzano: European Academy.
- Friedrich, J. (2005). UNMIK in Kosovo: Struggling with uncertainty. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 9, 225–293.
- Gow, J. (2009). Kosovo – The final frontier? From transitional administration to transitional statehood. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 3(2), 239–257.
- Halilović, H. (2016). Lessons from Srebrenica: The United Nations after Bosnia. In D. Mayersen (Ed.), The United Nations and genocide. Houndmills/Basingstoke/Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hasanbasić, J. (2014). Liability in peacekeeping missions: A civil cause of action for the mothers of Srebrenica against the Dutch government and the United Nations. Emory International Law Review, 29(2), 415–449.
- Human Rights Watch. (1995). The fall of Srebrenica and the failure of UN peacekeeping, 7(13). <https://www.hrw.org/sites/default/files/reports/bosnia1095web.pdf>
- Huysmans, J. (2002). Shape-shifting NATO: Humanitarian action and the Kosovo refugee crisis. Review of International Studies, 28, 599–618.
- International Crisis Group. (1999). Macedonia: Towards destabilisation? The Kosovo crisis takes its toll on Macedonia. <https://reliefweb.int/report/serbia/macedonia-towards-destabilisation-kosovo-crisis-takes-its-toll-macedonia>
- Kajosevic, S. (2020). Montenegro pushes for arbitration over Prevlaka dispute with Croatia. Balkan Insight, Oct 5. <https://balkaninsight.com/2020/10/05/montenegro-pushes-for-arbitration-over-prevlaka-dispute-with-croatia/>
- Karasz, P. (2019). Netherlands was 10 percent liable in Srebrenica deaths, Top Dutch Court finds. The New York Times, 19 July.
- Kaufman, J. (2002). NATO and the former Yugoslavia: Crisis, conflict, and the Atlantic alliance. New York: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
- Kenkel, K. (2013). Five generations of peace operations: From the “thin blue line” to “painting a country blue”. Revista Brasileira de Política Internacional, 56(1), 122–143.
- Lang, A. (2003). The United Nations and the fall of Srebrenica. In T. Erskine (Ed.), Can institutions have responsibilities? London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Nambiar, S. (2011). UN peacekeeping operations in the former Yugoslavia – From UNPROFOR to Kosovo. In R. Thakur & A. Schnabel (Eds.), United Nations peacekeeping operations: Ad hoc missions, permanent engagement. Tokyo/New York/Paris: United Nations University Press.
- Ó Tuathail, G. (1999). The ethnic cleansing of a safe area: The fall of Srebrenica and the ethics of UN-governmentality. In D. Smith & J. Proctor (Eds.), Geography and ethics. London: Routledge.
- Shrivastava, B. K., & Agarwal, M. (2003). Politics of intervention and the Bosnia-Herzegovina conflict. International Studies, 40(1), 69–84.
- Simić, O. (2013). Pillar of shame?: Civil society, UN accountability and genocide in Srebrenica. In O. Simić & Z. Volčić (Eds.), Transitional justice and civil society in the Balkans. New York: Springer.
- Simonović, I., & Nimać, I. (1999). UNTAES: A case study. Croatian International Relations Review, 5(14), 5–10.
- Stahn, C. (2001). The United Nations transitional administrations in Kosovo and East Timor: A first analysis. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 5, 105–183.
- Tardy, T. (2014a). United Nations Preventive Deployment Force (UNPREDEP-Macedonia). In J. Kooops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Tardy, T. (2014b). United Nations Protection Force (UNPROFOR – Croatia). In J. Kooops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Toal, G., & Dahlman, C. (2011). Bosnia remade: Ethnic cleansing and its reversal. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- United Nations. (1991). The Vance Plan. <https://www.peaceagreements.org/view/1173>
- United Nations Security Council. (1992). <http://unscr.com/en/resolutions/757>
- United Nations Security Council. (1997). Resolution 1145. <https://undocs.org/S/RES/1145> (1997).
- United Nations Security Council. (1998). Resolution 1186 (1998). <http://unscr.com/en/resolutions/1186>
- United Nations Security Council. (1999). Resolution 1244 (1999). https://peacemaker.un.org/sites/peacemaker.un.org/files/990610_SCR1244%281999%29.pdf
- Williams, P. (2005). Review article: International peacekeeping: The challenges of state-building and regionalization. International Affairs, 81(1), 163–174.
- Yannis, A. (2004). The UN as government in Kosovo. Global Governance, 10, 67–81.

UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

Sophia Dawkins
Yale University, New Haven, CT, USA

Synonyms

Peace mediation; Peacekeeping; Peacemaking; Political missions; Political settlements; Third-party intervention

Definition

Sudan and South Sudan offer a unique laboratory for understanding the logistical, political, and ethical dilemmas of peace missions. Over two decades, these territories have hosted eight missions, four of which were actively deployed and one of which began drawing down in January 2021. These range from small bands of military observers, to multidimensional missions with combat-ready contingents that have robustly used force, to purely civilian political missions. Most of these missions fly the UN flag, while others are hybrid or regional deployments. But the UN has mandated, coordinated with or exercised command over all these missions. To understand UN missions in Sudan and South Sudan, it is necessary to grasp how all these missions interact in the same conflict theatre. This entry describes the operational context peace missions confront in Sudan and South Sudan, along with a brief political history. Then, it offers an overview of the eight peace missions that have deployed in this vast territory since the turn of the millennium. Lastly, the entry explores three peacekeeping and peacemaking themes that missions in Sudan and South Sudan throw into stark relief: the complications of managing host state consent; the ethical dilemmas missions face when they implement civilian protection mandates; and the challenges of regional cooperation in mission sequencing.

Introduction

Sudan and South Sudan offer a unique laboratory for understanding the logistical, political, and ethical dilemmas of peace missions. Over two decades, these territories have hosted eight missions, four of which were actively deployed and one of which began drawing down in January 2021. These range from small bands of military observers, to multidimensional missions with combat-ready contingents that have robustly used force, to purely civilian political missions. Most of these missions fly the UN flag, while others are hybrid or regional deployments. But the UN has mandated, coordinated with or exercised command over all these missions. To understand UN missions in Sudan and South Sudan, it is necessary to grasp how all these missions interact in the same conflict theatre.

This entry begins, first, by describing the operational context peace missions confront in Sudan and South Sudan, along with a brief political history. Secondly, it offers an overview of the eight peace missions that have deployed in this vast territory since the turn of the millennium. Thirdly, the entry explores three peacekeeping and peacemaking themes that missions in Sudan and South Sudan throw into stark relief: the complications of managing host state consent; the ethical dilemmas missions face when they implement civilian protection mandates; and the challenges of regional cooperation in mission sequencing.

Context

Sudan is not really a country at all, but many. A composite of layers, like a genetic fingerprint of memories that were once fluid, but have since crystallized out from the crucible of possibility. Jamal Mahjoub, Sudanese novelist (Copnall 2014: 10)

Before South Sudan became an independent country in July 2011, the former Sudan was the largest sovereign state by area in Africa. The territory (Figs. 1 and 2) encompasses immense ethnolinguistic diversity across a varied topography, dominated by the Nile basin. Together, Sudan and South Sudan border nine countries, all of which in recent history have intervened militarily or politically, and exchanged flows of displaced people.

UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan, Fig. 1 Sudan, March 2012 (based on UN map)

term contested areas refers to territorial areas with disputed sovereignty and borders, such as the Abyei Area.

Referring to Sudan and South Sudan
 For the purposes of this entry, the terms Sudan and Sudanese refer to the territory and citizens of the former Sudan before July 2011, and of contemporary Sudan afterwards. The terms southern Sudan and southern Sudanese refer to the territory in the former Sudan that eventually became South Sudan and Sudanese citizens who, before July 2011, asserted a southern identity. South Sudan and South Sudanese refer to the territory and citizens of South Sudan after independence in July 2011. The

Some trace Sudan and South Sudan’s conflicts to 1956, when Sudan became the first British-administered country to receive independence after WWII (Johnson 2003: 21). Southerners had long felt marginalized by Ottoman, Egyptian, and British colonial rulers, who had neglected territory below the tenth degree parallel, where Sudan’s deserts give way to unnavigable bush. In the first half of the twentieth century, the Nile valley around Khartoum received roads, health centers, high schools, and higher education, while southern Sudan received army outposts and Christian missionaries (Johnson 2003: 17–19).

UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan, Fig. 2 South Sudan, October 2011 (based on UN map)

These inequities continued when a military coup toppled Sudan’s first postcolonial civilian government in 1958. Aggrieved southern politicians and exiled civil servants formed the Anyanya I (“snake venom”) rebel militia, which expanded to an armed opposition movement in 1963 (Thomas 2015: 170). Anyanya went dormant after a peace deal with the government in 1972, to reappear in 1983 as the Sudan People’s Liberation Movement/Army (SPLM/A), led by Dr. John Garang de Mabior. The SPLM/A’s prime objective was power in Khartoum. But the movement splintered in 1992, when Garang’s deputies, Riek Machar and Lam Akol, mutinied.

As Sudan’s civil war intensified in the 1990s, its neighbor, Ethiopia, looked on from its own disorder. In 1991, Meles Zenawi overthrew Mengistu Haile Mariam, who had ruled Ethiopia for 14 years through a violent military junta. Meles championed economic growth, devolution and self-determination (De Waal 2015). In Sudan, he saw an ideological mission, a security challenge, and an opportunity to establish a reputation as a benign regional hegemon. Thus, Meles worked through the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) to take the reins of a peace process. Founded in 1986, originally to fight drought, IGAD’s members included Djibouti, Ethiopia, Somalia, Sudan, Uganda, and Kenya. Shaped by Meles, its mission progressively grew to encompass development and security issues. His first act under the IGAD-led peace process was to frame the negotiations in terms of a Declaration of Principles, which included the right for southern Sudanese self-determination (De Waal 2016).

At the turn of the millennium, international pressure for peace intensified. First, the Organization of African Unity, which had lost credibility through corruption scandals, reconfigured as the African Union with an ambitious vision. Its Constitutive Act established an African Union Commission and a Peace and Security Council, mandated to intervene in African conflicts, and conduct its own peace support activities (see Article 4h, Constitutive Act of the African Union, 2000). This gave unprecedented momentum to African regional organizations to lead peace processes and design peace missions without reliance on the United Nations or former colonial powers.

In parallel to the African Union's renaissance, the war on terror and the opening of Sudan's oil wells made resolution of Sudan's civil war an American priority (Osama Bin Laden had lived in Khartoum). These developments accelerated the IGAD-mediated negotiations, yielding the 2005 Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA), which stipulated a referendum on southern independence. In 2011, southern Sudanese voted and seceded.

To make an agreement possible in 2005, the CPA's mediators bracketed issues that threatened to stall negotiations. These included the conflict in Darfur, and the rifts within southern Sudan. IGAD sought to mediate a separate Darfur peace settlement, yielding an agreement in 2006 between the Government of Sudan (GoS) and only one of several insurgent groups. Peace talks continued in Doha, producing a framework agreement in 2010. While the deadliness of the conflict in Darfur dropped, it festered on without definitive resolution.

Meanwhile, South Sudan experienced a troubled transition to independence. In December 2013, the government and army fragmented, and civil war swept the country. This unleashed a flurry of IGAD-mediated peacemaking. The belligerents signed cycles of ceasefires and peace agreements that failed. IGAD would repeatedly resuscitate peace talks, sometimes mobilizing authoritarian neighbors such as Sudan's President Bashir, who mediated negotiations in July 2018. Milestones included the August 2015 Agreement to Resolve the Conflict in South Sudan (ARCSS) – which fell apart as violence erupted anew, in July 2016 – and the September 2018 Revitalized Agreement on the Resolution of the Conflict in South Sudan (R-ARCSS).

Sudan faced its own turmoil. After South Sudanese independence, it lost a large part of its oil revenue, triggering an economic crisis. Citizens engaged in waves of protests amidst rising food and oil prices, and restrictions to civil freedoms. State security forces often met these protests with violence, while generals started to waver in their loyalty to the president. In April 2019, the military ousted President Bashir, installing a Transitional Military Council (TMC). Citizens groups continued to protest, urging a full transition to civilian power.

In June 2019, members of the TMC deployed the Rapid Support Forces (RSF) on the streets of Khartoum to attack and abduct protestors. The creation of former President Bashir, the RSF was a Darfurian paramilitary unit originally known as "janjaweed." The RSF's deployment drew international condemnation and gave further momentum to a coalition of civilian groups, the Forces of Freedom and Change (FFC). The FFC negotiated a political agreement with the TMC to appoint a civilian-led transitional government. In August 2019, the former UN economist, Abdalla Hamdok, became Prime Minister. While navigating dissent within the military and an assassination attempt in 2020, Prime Minister Hamdok began to normalize relations with the USA and other countries that had treated Sudan as a pariah.

Missions Overview

As their shared political history illustrates, Sudan and South Sudan have encompassed a series of interlocking conflicts. The countries' relations with each other, their neighbors and regional organizations have driven a host of peace initiatives. These generated eight peace missions that deployed over two decades.

Defining Peace Missions

By peace mission, this entry refers to political missions and peacekeeping missions. Political missions consist of civilian personnel that work with a sovereign government to support political transitions and prevent conflict. UN special political missions sit under the purview of the Department of Political and Peacebuilding Affairs (DPPA), and before that, were under the Department of Political Affairs (DPA). Peacekeeping missions consist of both military and civilian personnel. They receive mandates to perform diverse tasks that have spanned monitoring ceasefires, active military action, administration of entire territories, civilian protection, statebuilding activities, and quick impact projects that restore infrastructure. UN peacekeeping missions sit under the purview of the Department of Peace Operations (DPO), and before that, were under the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO). Reflecting this diversity of purpose, the military contingents of peacekeeping missions range from being armed for robust use of force, to being primarily equipped for patrols and engineering activities; only a small proportion of troops in an operation will be combat-ready.

It is important to note that this definition of peace missions excludes sanctions monitoring committees (often referred to as panels of experts), commissions of inquiry into human rights abuses, and many ceasefire monitoring mechanisms. For example, when the GoS and SPLM/A signed the Nuba Mountains Ceasefire in 2002, they agreed to the formation of a small group of unarmed military observers to monitor the ceasefire under the Joint Military Commission (JMC). The JMC was mandated only by the parties to the agreement (De Waal 2016). While other analysts might include operations such as the JMC under a broader definition of peace missions, this entry excludes them in order to focus on missions that have had direct UN involvement through command and control or UN Security Council (UNSC) mandating. However, it is important to note that these other types of peace support activity – ceasefire monitoring, commissions of inquiry, and sanctions monitoring – have been numerous in Sudan and South Sudan, interacting in critical ways with the missions this entry analyses.

Peace missions may be designed, staffed, and mandated at the level of the United Nations, or a regional organization, such as the African Union or IGAD. However, all missions that use force must be mandated by the UNSC under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, regardless of command and control. Chapter VIII of the Charter specifies that regional organizations that mandate missions to use force must expressly seek this authorization from the UNSC, while Article 103 supports this requirement by establishing that the UN Charter prevails over all other international agreements. In practice, this means the African Union Peace and Security Council may mandate a peacekeeping mission to use force, but before deployment, must seek UNSC authorization as a matter of international law.

Once authorized in this way, peace missions may fly the UN flag or that of another organization, such as the African Union, depending on command and control. Sudan and South Sudan have hosted both types of peacekeeping mission, including those that have “rehabbed.” For example, in 2007, the African Union Mission in Sudan traded its green African Union helmets for blue UN helmets, as it merged into the African Union – UN Hybrid Operation in Darfur.

Eight Missions in Two Decades

Peace missions have played a central role in political processes and peace agreement implementation in Sudan and South Sudan. This has entrenched these interventions in the governance of the two states (De Waal 2009). This section presents an overview of these missions.

Sudan, up to July 2011

In 2004, the CPA negotiation process neared conclusion, accompanying two divergent conflict trajectories. On the one hand, the peace talks between the GoS and SPLM/A promised at least a partial settlement between the government and southern armed groups. On the other hand, violence escalated between the GoS and Darfuri rebel groups, who had been excluded from the CPA negotiations. This led to contrasting peace support needs.

To safeguard the CPA, the USA, UK, and Norway convinced the conflict parties to accept deployment of a UN peacekeeping mission that would oversee implementation and political transition. In June 2004, the UNSC began by mandating a special political mission to prepare the ground for a multidimensional peacekeeping operation (see UN doc. S/RES/1547 (2004)). The UN Advanced Mission in Sudan (UNAMIS, 2004–2005) deployed to Khartoum with a support office in Addis Ababa under the leadership of Special Representative of the Secretary-General (SRSG), Jan Pronk.

Meanwhile, in August 2004, the African Union deployed 150 Rwandan troops to Darfur to protect ceasefire monitors. The African Union Mission in Sudan (AMIS, 2004–2007) deployed under severe budget constraints, recognizing from the start that it would face pressures to expand. By October, the African Union had managed to deploy a further 2191 troops and 815 civilian police. While the UN member states and secretariat struggled to back AMIS with UN-hatted troops, the UNSC added to the UNAMIS mandate so that it could engage politically in the Darfuri conflict, to support humanitarian operations and peace talks in Abuja, Nigeria (see UN doc. S/RES/1556 (2004)).

In January 2005, GoS and the SPLM/A signed the “chapeau” of the CPA. The peace agreement contained complicated security provisions for joint patrols at the border and security sector reform, while creating a semiautonomous region in southern Sudan under a new federal arrangement. The UNSC followed in March by transitioning UNAMIS to a multidimensional peacekeeping operation, the UN Mission in Sudan (UNMIS, 2005–2011). Initially consisting of 10,000 military personnel and 715 civilian police, with further civilian staff support, UNMIS had a complex mandate (see UN doc. S/RES/1590 (2005)). Tasks ranged from supporting implementation of the CPA’s provisions, to refugee returns, mine clearance, and overseeing the South Sudan secession referendum.

The SRSG, Jan Pronk, remained intensely involved in the Darfur situation and committed to ensuring UNMIS could carry out protection activities in the region. The UNSC continued discussions with the African Union about a timetable for transitioning AMIS to a UN operation. However, as UNMIS tried to expand its activities to cover Darfur, it faced perpetual barriers and restrictions to movement from the GoS. In October 2006, the GoS expelled Jan Pronk from the country due to his condemnation of the government for human rights abuses in Darfur.

Amidst this acrimonious relationship between the UN and GoS, the UNSC and African Union engaged in intensive diplomacy with the government. This resulted in eventual acceptance of an African Union – UN Hybrid Operation in Darfur (UNAMID, 2007–2020), augmenting AMIS. Initially mandated to deploy 25,987 uniformed personnel, UNAMID was charged with complex conflict prevention tasks (see UN doc. S/RES/1769 (2007)). These included protecting civilians, supporting humanitarian aid delivery and mediating community conflicts.

Contested Area: Abyei

One of UNMIS’s milestone achievements was to facilitate a peaceful referendum in January 2011, when southern Sudanese voted overwhelmingly to break away from Sudan. As South Sudan’s independence approached in July 2011, several unresolved conflict issues came to a head, including the unresolved statuses of Abyei, Southern Kordofan, and Blue Nile State, and the continued operation of SPLM/A rebels in the Nuba Mountains. The relationship between the GoS and UN became even more conflictual. By July, GoS had withdrawn consent for a UN multidimensional peacekeeping force to remain on Sudanese soil, which the UNSC and DPKO had believed to be prerequisite for managing outstanding disputes at what would become the North-South border.

In May 2011, the SPLM/A and Sudan Armed Forces (SAF) clashed in the contested Abyei Area. This small region, bordering South Darfur, was of strategic significance as the location of a valuable oil well, the homeland of some of the SPLM/A’s most influential generals, and a critical transit point on the annual cattle migration of the Misseriya nomadic group, whose elite was politically influential in Khartoum. Tens of thousands of civilians fled, and SAF occupied Abyei Town. In response, the African Union mediated a peace agreement in Addis Ababa between GoS and the SPLM/A, which agreed to the deployment of the United Nations Interim Security Force for Abyei (UNISFA, 2011–present).

UNISFA was unique in several ways (De Waal 2016). First, the parties to the conflict specified its mandate in a peace agreement, and then passed it to the UNSC for authorization; mandating of UN missions is usually top down (see UN doc. S/RES/1990 (2011)). Secondly, UNISFA consisted entirely of Ethiopian troops, initially at a capacity of 4200 military and 50 police. This allowed for focused command and control. Thirdly, when it first deployed, UNISFA had almost no civilian staff to support it due to difficulties obtaining visas. This forced military personnel to engage in de-escalation activities related to border and land disputes, which would have otherwise been the responsibility of civil affairs staff at UNMIS, had it been able to remain in Sudan after July 2011. Some observers judge that the Ethiopian military proved strikingly successful in dispensing these tasks (Osterrieder et al. 2015). UNISFA managed to de-escalate tensions on several notable occasions. In May 2013, for example, Misseriya from the North attacked a UNISFA convoy, killing a peacekeeping and the powerful Ngok Dinka Paramount Chief, Deng Kuol Deng (the Ngok Dinka are sedentary pastoralists resident in Abyei that regard themselves as South Sudanese). While mission exit remained elusive in 2021, UNISFA had presided over 10 years without a major renewal of conflict between Sudan and South Sudan in Abyei.

South Sudan, After Independence

On July 9, 2011, South Sudanese raised the country's flag and sung their national anthem for the first time. A less reported dimension of independence week was the arrival in South Sudan's capital, Juba, of UN planes from Khartoum, full of bewildered UNMIS civilian staff with nowhere to sleep and uncertain final destinations. Up to this moment, the UNSC and DPKO had hoped to negotiate an extension of UNMIS. When GoS consent failed to materialize, the mission had to evacuate from the North almost overnight.

In UNMIS's place, the new Government of South Sudan (GoSS) consented to deployment of the UN Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS, 2011–present). UNMISS had a multidimensional mandate, with tasks that ranged from peacebuilding activities to supporting the GoSS with building the institutions and infrastructure of a new sovereign state (see UN doc. S/RES/1996 (2011)). The UNSC initially authorized it to deploy 7000 military, 900 police, and a civilian component. The immediate focus was to equip the GoSS to rule autonomously. Thus, UNMISS focused on logistics over engaging in politics and sought to decentralize its operations from Juba by building new bases in remote areas of the country.

South Sudan's fortunes changed dramatically in December 2013. As violence swept the country, civilians ran to UN bases for protection. The mission leadership took the decision to open UNMISS's gates. Within months, 200,000 civilians took refuge at these UN Protection of Civilians (PoC) sites, many of whom remained 8 years later. Some of these civilians had fled ethnically targeted killings. GoSS alleged that UNMISS was supporting the rebels by allowing protection for insurgents, whom they claimed traded uniforms for civilian clothes to enter the PoC sites. The relationship between the government and mission broke down, with the GoSS evicting senior officials involved in civil affairs and ceasefire monitoring from the country.

In July 2016, the situation deteriorated further. IGAD had brokered the ARCSS in August 2015, but the agreement had faltered in implementation. This came to a head a year later as violence again swept Juba, when government and rebel forces who had deployed together as part of the peace agreement turned on each other. Troops murdered and raped aid workers and citizens. During a notorious incident at the Terrain Hotel in Juba, UNMISS failed to respond to calls for help. These events led to an internal UN inquiry, further tensions with the GoSS over accusations of its own failure to protect civilians, and criticism from international humanitarian actors.

IGAD responded by proposing that it deploy the Regional Protection Force (RPF, 2017–present) to separate government and rebel troops. The UNSC backed this proposal, authorizing the deployment of 4000 military drawn from the region, tasking them primarily with securing Juba (see UN doc. S/RES/2304 (2016)). The idea was that the RPF would have a distinct mandate but deploy under UNMISS command and control. The RPF was slow to materialize, in part due to struggles over financing and its relationship to UNMISS (Williams 2016). Its first troops, a contingent of 120 Rwandan soldiers, eventually deployed in August 2017.

Sudan, After the 2019 Revolution

Sudan's 2019 revolution created the most conducive environment in decades for multilateralism and UN diplomacy. In 2020, discussions progressed about the drawdown of UNAMID, leading to the end of its mandate in December. Sudan's new civilian government also consented to the deployment of a special political mission to assist with the transition towards elections (see UN doc. S/RES/2524 (2020)). In August 2020, a small advanced mission arrived in Khartoum to set up the United Nations Integrated Transition Assistance Mission in Sudan (UNITAMS, 2020–present) under the purview of DPPA. Mandated during the global Covid-19 pandemic, UNITAMS became the first UN mission to be planned predominantly online (Table 1).

Themes

Sudan and South Sudan present a unique case for policy makers and conflict scholars to learn about peace mission dilemmas. This entry concludes by reflecting on three that have dominated mission operations in this context.

Consent Management

The first dilemma is that missions rely on host state consent to deploy and accomplish their mandates. This consent is relational: Over time, it can wax and wane, and be withdrawn as fast as it is given (Johnstone 2011). Host state consent demands careful diplomatic management over the course of a peace mission's life.

Sudan and South Sudan illustrate a range of challenges UN missions can face in managing consent. While UNMIS garnered limited consent to deploy a large, multidimensional operation, it struggled to implement its mandate across Sudan. The GoS was able to restrict the mission's movement, especially in Darfur, and expel its leadership when it wanted to block criticism. Consent withdrawal took many forms, from small acts like refusing flight clearances and staff visas, to the eviction of the entire mission in July 2011 (Duursma 2020).

The UN's diplomatic influence in Sudan was limited by parallel political developments over which it also had limited control. President Bashir had hoped that the USA and other UNSC permanent members would reciprocate information exchanges with the US Central Intelligence Agency and concessions during the CPA negotiations by easing sanctions and removing it from the list of State Sponsors of Terror. That did not happen. Furthermore, the ICC prosecutor issued an arrest warrant for Bashir, putting UNMIS in the cross-fire between pressures for establishing peace and justice in Sudan. These developments removed GoS incentives for cooperation and made the regime intensely suspicious of any international presence on its soil; the government had limited interests in maintaining good relations with UNSC members.

UNISFA offers a contrast. While GoS occasionally obstructed the mission through staff visa denials, and had accomplished core military objectives in Abyei, it allowed UNISFA much more freedom of movement than UNMIS. This was partly possible because both GoS and GoSS maintained strong interests in good relations with Ethiopia. Also, the military staffing of the mission by one country meant a unified political and diplomatic strategy, without the contradictions in objective that emerged among UNSC members during UNMIS's lifetime (for further discussion on the consequences of mission composition, see Bove et al. 2020). UNISFA's success confronts it with the opposite problem to UNMIS: Its exit remains elusive.

Civilian Protection

The second dilemma is that UN peacekeeping missions frequently have mandates to protect civilians under imminent threat of physical attack,

UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan, Table 1 Peace Missions in Sudan and South Sudan

| Year | | | Political events | Mission deployment/ exit | |
|-----------|---------------------------|-----------------------------|---|---|--------------|
| 1956 | | | Sudanese independence from Great Britain | | |
| 1963 | First Sudanese Civil War | | The Ananya I (snake venom) rebel group, which later becomes the SPLM/A, launches an insurgency | | |
| 1972 | | | Addis Ababa peace agreement ends insurgency | | |
| 1972–1983 | | | Decade without war | | |
| 1983 | Second Sudanese Civil War | | Dr. John Garang de Mabior takes over leadership of the SPLM/A and relaunches an insurgency | | |
| 1985 | | | Mainly driven by civil society, peace negotiations to end the civil war start and proceed sporadically for the next two decades | | |
| 1989 | | | In a military coup, Omar al-Bashir seizes power from the democratically elected prime minister, Sadiq al-Mahdi | | |
| 1992 | | | Riek Machar and Lam Akol mutiny against Dr. John Garang, splitting the SPLM/A; Sudanese civil war accelerates in deadliness throughout 1990s | | |
| 2001 | | | IGAD restarts peace talks between the GoS and SPLM/A, supported by the USA, UK, and Norway | | |
| 2002 | | | February: Nuba Mountains Ceasefire | | |
| | | | July: Machakos Protocol, which forms the basis of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) that eventually ends the Second Sudanese Civil War | | |
| 2003 | | Height of Darfur crisis | | Darfurian rebel groups announce their existence and launch attacks against government targets | |
| 2004 | | | | January: Army attacks anti-government groups in western Darfur. | |
| | | | | April: Humanitarian Ceasefire Agreement for Darfur | AMIS deploys |
| | | | June: UNSC mandates a special political mission to prepare for a future UN operation | UNAMIS deploys | |
| 2005 | | | January: GoS and SPLM/A sign the CPA chapeau, ending the Second Sudanese Civil War March: UNSC refers Darfur to the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court for investigation | UNAMIS transitions to UNMIS | |
| 2006 | | May: Darfur Peace Agreement | | | |
| 2007 | | | AMIS transitions to UNAMID | | |
| 2008 | | | May: SAF clash with SPLM/A in contested Abyei Area | | |
| 2009 | | | March: ICC prosecutor issues arrest warrant for Omar al-Bashir for crimes in Darfur, including genocide | | |
| 2010 | | | March: Framework agreement to resolve conflict in Darfur between GoS and one rebel group (Justice and Equality Movement), includes ceasefire April: General election across Sudan | | |

(continued)

UN Missions in Sudan and South Sudan, Table 1 (continued)

| Year | | | Political events | Mission deployment/ exit |
|------|--------------------------------|--|---|-------------------------------|
| 2011 | | | January: Self-determination referendum; 98.83% of southern Sudanese vote for independence | |
| | | | May: SAF and SPLA clash in contested Abyei Area, and Sudan occupies Abyei Town | |
| | | | June: Temporary agreement on Abyei, which specified creation of an Interim Security Force for Abyei; UNSC authorizes this force as UNISFA | UNISFA deploys |
| | | | July: South Sudanese independence; GoS withdraws consent for UN force on its territory to continue or succeed UNMIS | UNMIS exits UNMISS deploys |
| | | | July: Doha Document for Peace in Darfur provides framework for ongoing peace negotiations on Darfur crisis | |
| 2012 | | | Tensions between Sudan and South Sudan: South Sudan shuts down oil production in dispute over transit fee with Sudan (February); South Sudan occupies Heglig oil field (April); two governments sign series of agreements to resolve post-referendum issues (September) | |
| 2013 | South Sudanese Civil War | | December 2013: South Sudanese civil war erupts | |
| 2014 | | | | |
| 2015 | | | August: Agreement to Resolve the Conflict in South Sudan | |
| 2016 | | | July: Resurgence of violence in Juba | |
| 2017 | | | | RPF deploys |
| 2018 | | | September: Revitalized Agreement to Resolve the Conflict in South Sudan | |
| 2019 | | | April: Sudanese military oust President Bashir, ending his 30-year rule, and installing a Transitional Military Council (TMC) | |
| | | | August: Civilian-led transitional government takes over from TMC to rule Sudan, led by Prime Minister Abdalla Hamdok | |
| 2020 | | | June: UN mandates a special political mission to assist Sudanese government with transition | UNITAMS deploys |
| | | | December: UNAMID mandate ends | |

but the problems of host state consent and capacity constraints often limit their capacity to do so.

From their inceptions, UNAMID and UNMISS had substantial civilian protection mandates. In Darfur, GoS frequently targeted UNAMID contingents with restrictions that ranged from denying staff visas to obstructing vehicles at checkpoints. These actions aggregated to disable the mission from dispensing its protection responsibilities (Duursma 2020; Müller 2020). UNMISS initially had more freedom to operate than UNAMID. This made possible a swift decision to allow civilians to take refuge on its bases when violence swept the country in December 2013. This saved many thousands of lives. However, capacity limitations and GoSS accusations that UNMISS had taken sides in the conflict prevented the mission from providing effective civilian protection outside its bases. This, in turn, undermined efforts to establish a security environment where PoC site residents could return to their homes. In 2020, UNMISS remained in a bind: while mission leadership declared efforts to transition the PoC sites to non-UN-administered Internally Displaced People camps, more than 180,000 people remained on the bases (Craze and Pendle 2020). These site residents continued to face credible threats to their lives outside the camps, as UNMISS struggled to mitigate a resurgence in civilian killings (Stimson Center 2020).

Regional Cooperation and Sequencing

The third dilemma is that missions deploy amidst webs of regional interests and military interventions, and have to grapple with the legacies of predecessor operations. Therefore, regional cooperation and coordinated sequencing are critical to mission success. UNAMID and the RPF illustrate both the challenges and benefits of UN-regional relationships.

AMIS faced acute capacity constraints when it deployed because UN support did not materialize as quickly as the African Union had hoped. This, in part, had roots in the UN's conflictual relations with GoS. However, as a hybrid mission, UNAMID offered a creative model for circumventing these problems. The mission provided a blueprint for UN and African Union shared financing and command and control. By contrast, in the RPF's first 3 years, IGAD and the UN struggled to establish productive coordination modalities so that the force could dispense its mandate. This led to symbolic deployment of RPF troops, which modestly supplemented UNMISS instead of establishing a force that could accomplish distinct security goals.

Summary

Sudan and South Sudan offer a unique context for studying peace missions' most challenging ethical and operational dilemmas. Since the turn of the millennium, eight missions have deployed across this vast territory, mandated with critical political and security functions dispensed during immense turbulence in both countries. This turbulence has included the secession of South Sudan, the escalation of violence in Darfur, the outbreak of protracted civil war in newly independent South Sudan, and a revolution in Sudan that has sought an end to military rule. Missions have assumed many forms, from multidimensional peacekeeping operations with dozens of troop-contributing countries, like UNMIS and UNMISS, to hybrid UN and African Union operations, like UNAMID, to political missions like UNITAMS. The Sudan and South Sudan have hosted peacekeeping innovations, such as the deployment of small missions with streamlined command and control that have effectively provided security at volatile flashpoints, and the creation of PoC sites on UN bases. They have also witnessed acute mission failures, such as UNMISS's inability to protect civilians outside those bases, including aid workers at the Terrain Hotel in Juba. In January 2021, four of the eight missions remained deployed, while UNAMID began to draw down. These missions may provide lessons for peace operation policy makers and scholars for decades to come.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Civil Wars in Sudan and South Sudan
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ International Peace Architecture, Blockages, and Counter-Peace
- ▶ Intractable Conflict
- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Measuring Peace
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peace and Political Unsettling
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Peacebuilding in Africa: The African Union's Evolving Approach
- ▶ Protection of Civilians
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Bove, V., Ruffa, C., & Ruggeri, A. (2020). Composing peace: Mission composition in UN peacekeeping. In Composing Peace. Oxford University Press. <https://oxford.universitypressscholarship.com/view/10.1093/oso/9780198790655.001.0001/oso-9780198790655>
- Copnall, J. (2014). A poisonous thorn in our hearts: Sudan and South Sudan's bitter and incomplete divorce (1st ed.). London: Hurst.
- Craze, J., & Pendle, N. (2020, September 23). A fantasy of finality: The UN impasse at the protection of civilian sites in South Sudan. African Arguments. <https://africanarguments.org/2020/09/23/a-fantasy-of-finality-the-un-impasse-at-the-protection-of-civilian-sites-in-south-sudan/>
- De Waal, A. (2009). Mission without end? Peacekeeping in the African political marketplace. International Affairs, 85(1), 99–113.
- De Waal, A. (2015). The real politics of the horn of Africa: Money, war and the business of power (1st ed.). Cambridge: Polity.
- De Waal, A. (2016). Peace Missions in Sudan, 2002–2012 (Summary paper from the program on African peace missions paper No. 7; African Politics, African peace). World Peace Foundation, Tufts University. <http://fletcher.tufts.edu/~media/Fletcher/Microsites/African%20Peace%20Missions/Research/7%20Peace%20Missions%20in%20Sudan%20de%20Waal.pdf>
- Duursma, A. (2020). Pinioning the peacekeepers: Sovereignty, host-state resistance against peacekeeping missions, and violence against civilians. International Studies Review, viaa063. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isr/viaa063>.
- Johnson, D. H. (2003). Root causes of Sudan's civil wars. Oxford: James Currey.
- Johnstone, I. (2011). Managing consent in contemporary peacekeeping operations. International Peacekeeping, 18(2), 168–182. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2011.546091>.
- Müller, T. R. (2020). Protection of civilians mandates and 'collateral damage' of UN peacekeeping missions: Histories of refugees from Darfur. International Peacekeeping, 27(5), 760–784. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2020.1803745>.
- Osterrieder, H., Lehne, J., & Kmec, V. (2015). United Nations interim security force for Abyei (UNISFA). In J. A. Koops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. D. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordhb/9780199686049.001.0001>.
- Stimson Center. (2020, October 13). Data overview: Violence against civilians in South Sudan • Stimson Center. Stimson Center. <https://www.stimson.org/2020/data-overview-violence-against-civilians-in-south-sudan/>
- Thomas, E. (2015). South Sudan: A slow liberation. London: Zed Books Ltd.
- Williams, P. D. (2016, September 12). Key questions for South Sudan's new protection force. IPI Global Observatory. <https://theglobalobservatory.org/2016/09/south-sudan-regional-protection-force-kiir-unmiss/>

UN Peacebuilding in Timor-Leste

Norrie MacQueen

University of St. Andrews, St. Andrews, UK

The Setting

For a country with a population of not much more than one million and a land area of only about 15,000 km², Timor-Leste (East Timor) has been the focus of a disproportionate level of international intervention. Since 1999 four major UN missions, in parallel with two UN-approved military coalitions, have been deployed in the territory.

| Mission | Dates |
|--|------------------------------|
| UN Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) | June–September 1999 |
| International Force for East Timor (INTERFET) | September 1999–February 2000 |
| UN Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET) | October 1999–May 2002 |
| UN Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISSET) | May 2002–May 2005 |
| UN Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT)/International Stabilization Force (ISF) | August 2006–December 2012 |

These peace operations were essentially a response to a protracted and sequential process of decolonization, first from Portugal, then from Indonesia, followed by the consolidation of statehood. The Portuguese occupation of Timor-Leste lasted from the early sixteenth century to the late twentieth century. With the independence of Indonesia in the 1940s, the Portuguese colonial state shared the island of Timor with the new state which had displaced the Netherlands from the western part. For Portugal, the situation was similar to that in India where its enclave of Goa remained after British withdrawal until it was extinguished by an Indian invasion in 1961. But Indonesia, unlike India, had been generally content to accept the territorial arrangement. The small half-island colony amidst the vast Indonesian archipelago thus continued in a state of more or less benign stagnation. Its social structures and religious identity contrasted with surrounding Indonesia. Over the centuries Portuguese religious missionaries in Timor-Leste had ensured that more than 90% of the population were practicing Catholics. This made a special bond with the imperial metropole for a colony nested within a predominantly Muslim region. There was minimal anticolonial activism in Timor-Leste, at least compared with Portugal's continental African territories where, by the end of the 1960s, protracted wars of liberation were underway.

Things changed dramatically for Timor-Leste following the overthrow of the colonial regime in Lisbon in 1974. A pro-independence grouping now emerged – the Revolutionary Front of Independent East Timor (Fretilin – Frente Revolucionária do Timor-Leste Independente). Fretilin was largely a movement of young, educated activists with a strong mestiço (Portuguese-Timorese mixed race) element in its leadership. Its influences were drawn from the Marxist liberation movements in Portugal's African colonies as well as the radical Armed Forces Movement in the metropole itself, which had deposed the old regime.

Fretilin's independence program was not uncontested in the territory. Rival parties agitated for either continued links with Portugal or absorption by Indonesia. In the critical interregnum between the Lisbon coup in April 1974 and the end of 1975, the changing post-coup governments in Portugal were preoccupied with the more immediate problems of disentanglement from Africa. The small Portuguese administration in the colonial capital Dili was sympathetic to the Fretilin position but had little agency. This power vacuum, with its threat of a radical outcome, was seen as a danger by the authoritarian, anti-communist regime in Indonesia. Consequently, following a unilateral declaration of independence by Fretilin, and with the apparent if tacit approval of the United States, Indonesian forces invaded and annexed the territory in December 1975. Six months later, Timor-Leste was declared an Indonesian province. In effect, one form of imperial occupation had been replaced by another.

There now began a long and brutal guerrilla war against the occupation conducted by Fretilin's military wing – the Armed Forces for the National Liberation of East Timor (Falintil – Forças Armadas da Libertação Nacional de Timor-Leste). Between the initial invasion and Indonesia's withdrawal in 1999, around 200,000 (approximately a quarter of the population) died as a direct or indirect result of the armed struggle.

Reacting to the Indonesian invasion, the UN Security Council initially affirmed Timor-Leste's right to self-determination under the Charter (United Nations Security Council resolution [UNSCR] S/RES/384, 22 December 1975). Legally, by the terms of the UN Charter, it remained a "non-self-governing territory" under Portuguese administration (Charter of the United Nations, art. 73). This was plainly a fiction, however, and nothing effective was done to press for an Indonesian withdrawal. From the early 1980s annual reports were prepared for the General Assembly by successive UN secretaries-general, but this was little more than ritual. If anything, the possibility of a UN-driven solution became even more remote as time passed and the limited détente of the 1970s gave way to intensified cold war polarization in the Security Council.

By the mid-1990s, however, the first signs of change in the international position began to emerge. Indonesia, in common with other authoritarian regimes which had once served the West's interests and enjoyed support in return, found itself with diminishing leverage. Its brutalities in Timor-Leste now came under increasing scrutiny abroad. At the same time, the once vice-like grip on power of the regime in Indonesia as a whole rapidly weakened. It was finally broken in 1998 with the removal of the veteran dictator General Suharto. His successor, B. J. Habibie, encouraged by Kofi Annan the UN secretary-general, agreed to a referendum on the future of the territory to be held in 1999 ([United Nations Security Council document \[UNSCD\] S/1999/513, 5 May 1999](#)). Full independence was to be one of the options.

1999–2002: UNAMET and UNTAET

Kofi Annan's activism in securing the 1999 referendum reflected the central role now adopted by the United Nations. The UN was to organize and supervise the vote, and the Mission in East Timor (UNAMET) was established to this end (UNSCR S/RES/1246, 11 June 1999). But crucially, the engagement did not extend to the provision of physical security. In a fatal miscalculation this was left to the Indonesian authorities. In the poll, held at the end of August, 98% of the 450,000 registered voters participated and 78.5% of them opted for independence. In response, the Indonesian military, which had always opposed Habibie's agreement to the referendum, embarked on a scorched earth strategy. The violence involved local Timorese pro-Indonesian "militias" whose activities both widened existing internal divisions and created new ones. More than a 1000 died in the referendum violence and about a quarter of a million refugees moved – or were coerced into moving – across the border to Indonesian West Timor (Wigglesworth 2012, pp. 8–10).

UNAMET's Mandate (Security Council Resolution 1246, 11 June 1999)

- Organize and conduct a popular consultation based on a direct, secret and universal ballot to decide between autonomous status within Indonesia or national independence.
- Deploy up to 280 civilian police officers to act as advisers to the Indonesian Police in the discharge of their duties and, at the time of the consultation, to supervise the handling of the ballot
- Deployment 50 military liaison officers to maintain contact with the Indonesian Armed Forces.

UNAMET's active peacebuilding involvement with local populations and structures was limited. In part this was due simply to a mandate focused on the rapid and efficient creation of electoral machinery. But it was also an inevitable consequence of having to operate in the unstable and unpredictable environment created by the violence unleashed by the Indonesian military and their local proxies. Liaison was maintained with both the Indonesian authorities and the organized pro-independence movement. But grassroots engagement by UNAMET was restricted largely to the process of voter registration. A consultative commission composed of local stakeholders was planned to follow immediately on the referendum, but this fell victim in the short-term to the prevailing chaos (Martin and Mayer-Rieckh 2005, p. 129).

Condemnation of the Indonesian forces and their local proxies was more or less universal and pressure for a decisive international intervention became irresistible (Wheeler and Dunne 2001, p. 818). The UN, however, faced multiple obstacles to effective action. For one thing, by 1999 the organization's peacekeeping capacities were close to exhaustion as a result of the post-cold war surge in operations. Most immediately, there would be obvious problems in recruiting troop contributing countries willing to intervene in an active and unpredictable conflict. And, even if this could be negotiated, there would be major problems in deploying a UN force with sufficient speed.

The answer lay in an UN-approved but primarily regional coalition of the willing with Australia as the "lead nation." Although not initially enthusiastic, the Australian government was driven on by public anger. The flow of brutal images of the violence just 700 km across the Timor Sea created a groundswell of public pressure for intervention (Dee 2001, p. 16). But to minimize the sense of the venture as an "external" incursion into a south-east Asian crisis, the International Force for East Timor (INTERFET), as the formation was to be called, drew contributors from Malaysia, Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand (Ryan 2002, pp. 23–44).

In the event, INTERFET was able to suppress the violence with little difficulty in the short-term. But it was fundamentally a military operation; practically and politically it could make little contribution to the broader process of peacebuilding. This was the responsibility of the United Nations. How was it to address the quite daunting problems of peace-making and capacity-building in a territory which had just asserted its independence but which had few of the essential tools to consolidate it?

The way forward, in Kofi Annan's view, lay in the creation of what was effectively a UN protectorate which would govern the territory pending its emergence as a sovereign state (UNSCD S/1999/1024, 4 October 1999). The organizational structure for this was the Temporary Administration for East Timor (UNTAET). A similar arrangement had been put in place for Kosovo the previous June but there were earlier precursors as well. A UN authority had administered nearby West New Guinea in 1962–1963, for example (another conflict involving Indonesia). Earlier still, the UN's predecessor the League of Nations had governed the Saar territory in the heart of western Europe for 15 years between the two World Wars.

UNTAET was to be: “endowed with overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor and . . . empowered to exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice.” It was also to develop social services and build capacity for self-government. It was to include “personnel with appropriate training in international humanitarian, human rights . . . including child and gender-related provisions, negotiation and communication skills, cultural awareness and civilian-military coordination” (UNSCR S/RES/1272, 25 October 1999). The Temporary Administration would also replace INTERFET with its own force of nearly 12,000 troops, military observers, and civilian police. It was therefore to be both a peacekeeping force and a peacebuilding mission. The entire venture, with its wide responsibilities and powers, was to be headed the Brazilian UN official Sérgio Vieira de Melo who had led the UN Mission in Kosovo.

UNTAET's Mandate (Security Council Resolution 1272, 25 October 1999)

- Have overall responsibility for the administration of East Timor.
- Exercise all legislative and executive authority, including the administration of justice.
- Provide security and maintain law and order throughout the territory of East Timor. Establish an effective administration.
- Assist in the development of civil and social services.
- Ensure the coordination and delivery of humanitarian assistance.
- Support capacity-building for self-government.
- Assist in the establishment of conditions for sustainable development.

At the outset, UNTAET's main military challenges lay on the border with West Timor where refugees and fugitive militia members were intermixed. Within the territory itself the security situation was largely under control thanks to the initial INTERFET intervention. This did not mean, however, that the peacebuilding process surged ahead trouble-free; it was to prove highly fraught. Within the UN's organizational structure UNTAET was a Department of Peacekeeping Operations undertaking. There was a view that this tilted its culture and activities in an overly militarized direction. In this perspective, the peacebuilding effort would have been better served if UNTAET had been under the supervision of the UN's Department of Political Affairs. Vieira de Melo himself was criticized, even by some of his own senior officials. One of these accused him of a “preoccupation with control at the expense of the local community's involvement in government,” arguing that UNTAET risked becoming “merely another form of authoritarianism” (Chopra 2000, pp. 27–33).

The issue goes to the heart of a dilemma faced by many contemporary peace operations. During the cold war the constraints of bipolarity meant that mandates were usually limited to tasks of interposition and observation. But those constraints weakened in the 1990s. Now, more ambitious, multifunctional undertakings blending physical enforcement with social and political development tasks were possible. But this brought its own problems. The risk of over-weening interventionism in these situations has been described as “neo-trusteeship” or even “post-modern imperialism” (Butler 2011, pp. 2–4). There are obvious difficulties in managing the tension between pragmatic managerialism and deeper peacebuilding.

Richmond and Franks have proposed three types of liberal peace-making. Firstly, the “conservative” approach involves imposition of external models, perhaps with recourse to military force. Secondly, the “orthodox” formulation is similarly concerned with the importation of structures and values but with more sensitivity to local conditions. The last approach is the “emancipatory one.” This involves ownership of the peace-making process by the local actors. This framework embodies the main argument between the dominant UNTAET approach – which according to the authors was a blend of “conservative” and the “orthodox” thinking – and the emancipatory one championed by the UN’s critics (Richmond and Franks 2008, pp. 187–189). UNTAET, as a governing authority, had to determine how to divide effort and resources between “peacekeeping” (implicitly “conservative”) and “peacebuilding” (ideally “emancipatory”). Should it focus on providing – even imposing – efficient administration and social control in order to create the basic conditions for early independence? Or should it take things more slowly and painstakingly? Would a protracted process of local capacity-building and social, development give a better chance of ensuring long-term equity and stability?

The answer was not as clear cut as some might have liked to think. The UN was under real financial stringency at the turn of the millennium which limited the range and complexity of its peacebuilding projects. It would also have been criticized if it were seen to be drawing out an “imperial” role in a territory aspiring to independence. In short, there was a “tension between the ‘logic of peacekeeping’ and the ‘logic of development’ ... a persistent predicament throughout UNTAET’s existence” (Martin and Mayer-Rieckh 2005, p. 136).

Yet within these constraints, UNTAET made real advances in peacebuilding during its two-and-a-half-year mandate. Before the end of 1999 it had formed a National Consultative Council (CCN: Conselho Consultivo Nacional) which brought together different political, regional, and civil society groupings (UNSCD S/2000/53, 26 January 2000). The Council worked with and learned from UNTAET officials across the range of state-building areas including the security and justice sectors (embracing both the military and police components), and taxation and budgets. Within a year, members of the 36 strong Council held 5 of UNTAET’s 9 cabinet portfolios. In October 2000, the CNN became the National Council (CN: Conselho Nacional). The CN had 36 members and was in effect the embryo of a future national legislature. Although UNTAET operated at arm’s-length in the process, it also facilitated the emergence of a political party system, a prerequisite for the parliamentary structure which would come with independence.

Inescapably, however, the extent of UNTAET’s engagement with, and encouragement of, the peacebuilding process at grassroots level was limited. The balance of its approach, for better or worse, lay towards the top-down rather than the bottom-up. But, in fairness, whether this was indeed for “better” or for “worse” can be genuinely debated. On one side, the UN’s approach on the ground at this time could be seen as a squandered opportunity for embedding the peacebuilding process in Timorese society. In this view, it was a failure for which a high price would be paid in the coming years. Alternatively, though, it might be argued that peacebuilding was most effectively pursued hand-in-hand with state-building. That is to say, it should come after rather than before national independence. In this contrary view, the primary focus during the UNTAET period was, correctly, on capacity-building.

2002–2005: UNMISET

Independence finally came in May 2002. At this point the Security Council authorized a successor operation, the Mission of Support in East Timor (UNMISET). Initially, UNMISET was planned as a 2 year commitment. Although now without governmental powers, UNMISET was mandated to continue with many UNTAET projects. It had, however, a stronger focus on the peace-making rather than the peacekeeping role. To an extent this was simply a necessity: UNMISET's military capacity was much reduced from that of UNTAET. The primary focus of the new venture was civilian: to "provide assistance to the core administrative structures critical to the viability and political stability of East Timor" (UNSCR S/RES/1410, 17 May 2002). The resources made available for this, however, were limited, the challenges having perhaps been underestimated in the drive for the rapid establishment of statehood. UNMISET pursued three principal programs. Firstly, it was to build capacity for national administration. Secondly, it was to develop law enforcement capacity. Thirdly, it was to assist with national security.

UNMISET's Mandate (Security Council Resolution 1410, 17 May 2002)

- Provide assistance to core administrative structures critical to the viability and political stability of East Timor.
- Provide interim law enforcement and public security and to assist in the development of a new law enforcement agency.
- Contribute to the maintenance of the external and internal security.
- Deploy a civilian police component initially comprised of 1250 officers.
- Deploy a military component with an initial strength of up to 5000 troops.

The challenges in supporting the creation of effective administrative machinery in the new state were daunting. There were scant human resources to build on. Portugal's highly centralized colonial administration had ended more than a quarter of a century earlier and those involved with the machinery of Indonesian rule were inevitably compromised. Reflecting the dilemma already faced in the UN temporary administration period, UNMISET's specialist Civilian Support Group (CSG) had to take on direct operational responsibility for administration while at the same time training and mentoring local staff. It was not always a comfortable dual role. Areas highlighted by UN planners as being particularly problematic included finance and, most significantly, justice. There was neither a national judicial system nor a corpus of qualified Timorese lawyers. Consequently, the post-independence president, the former Fretilin resistance leader Xanana Gusmão, agreed to maintain the UNTAET arrangement by which law was administered primarily by international staff (Ishizuka 2003, p. 50).

A full year into UNMISET's deployment the CSG was still directly responsible for the day-to-day work of 15 ministries because of the "scarcity of essential skills and capacity" (UNSCD S/2003/449, 21 April 2003). Six months later Kofi Annan warned that it was "clear that it will not be possible for Timor-Leste to achieve self-sufficiency in certain key areas of the mandate" in the medium-term (UNSCD S/2003/944, 6 October 2003).

This circumstance of split roles and protracted international control was particularly problematic in the area of policing. UNMISET's international police (UNPOL) had to carry out routine operational duties while working to train the local Polícia Nacional de Timor-Leste (PNTL). By November 2002, UNMISET had handed over primary responsibility for policing to the PNTL in only four of the country's 13 administrative districts. UNMISET's initial planning assumption had been that the PNTL would have full national control by the end of 2002 (UNSCD S/2004/888, 9 November 2004). In matters of policing, of course, the problem of "tainting" by association with the Indonesian administration was particularly sensitive. Although routine crime in Timor-Leste was relatively low, there were periodic episodes of public disorder as various interest groups asserted themselves in the new state. The predicament here was that UNMISSET was wary of taking on a direct operational role in such politically charged matters while the PNTL had neither the credibility nor the experience to do so effectively.

Surprisingly, perhaps, the third area of UNMISSET's peacebuilding mandate, national security, was probably the least fraught. Despite the recent history of bitter conflict, the new state quickly established a broadly cordial and constructive relationship with Indonesia. UNMISSET worked with the Indonesian military on the West Timor side of the border where thousands of refugees from the 1999 violence still remained. It provided an important link between the new Timorese national army, the Forças de Defesa de Timor-Leste – FDTL) which had grown out of the anti-Indonesian guerrilla movement Falintil and its former enemies from the liberation struggle.

Beyond these transnational advances, however, progress on the development of independent local structures and capacities continued to move much more slowly than envisaged when the original 2 year timescale for UNMISSET was fixed. With this in view, Kofi Annan urged the Security Council in March 2003 to significantly expand UNMISSET's mandate. This would have delayed planned personnel reductions and eased the time constraints on the operation as a whole. But only limited adjustments were agreed by the Council which was determined to reduce the UN's presence on the ground at a time of intense global demand for peacekeeping resources. Working closely with the Fretilin prime minister Mari Alkatari, Annan eventually succeeded in winning an extension of UNMISSET until April 2005 for "consolidation" purposes (UNSCD S/2003/243, 3 March 2003). The reality was that there was very little ready to be consolidated but the Security Council showed no inclination for further latitude. At the end of UNMISSET's extended mandate in 2005, the UN presence would be drastically reduced to an Office in Timor-Leste (UNOTIL) which would be staffed by a small group of civilian advisers (UNSCR S/RES/1599, 28 April 2005).

Annan and other senior figures in the UN system were in no doubt that the UNMISSET phase of UN peacebuilding in Timor-Leste had ended prematurely. While the threat from border insecurity had been greatly reduced during the period of the mandate, the domestic challenges of peacebuilding had been met only fitfully during UNMISSET's 3 year deployment. Moreover, the most glaring shortcomings lay in the critical areas of policing and justice. Against this unpromising background, the depth of still unresolved problems within Timorese society would soon emerge.

2006–2012: UNMIT

Despite the generally cohesive nature of Timor-Leste society, the years of armed struggle between 1975 and 1999 had opened certain cleavages. The fact that a significant number of Timorese joined with the Indonesian military in opposing the outcome of the independence referendum had highlighted this. Although not a sharply regionalized nation, there was a broad perception that different geographical areas had varying levels of commitment to the national liberation struggle. For a critical period after independence, the peacebuilding process was threatened by an incipient split between the east and west of the country. Many easterners – the "Lorosae" – felt themselves to have been more invested in the liberation struggle than westerners – the "Loromonu" – whose geographical and cultural proximity to Indonesian West Timor supposedly diluted their commitment.

In March 2006, the Fretilin-dominated government demobilized almost half of the 1400-strong FDTL, ostensibly on economic grounds. The majority of the soldiers dismissed by the eastern Lorosae-dominated high command were western Loromonu. Violent protests soon broke out in Dili and western parts of the country (Braithwaite et al. 2012, pp. 139–141). The shortcomings of UNMISSET's efforts to create an effective local police force to replace the UNPOL presence now became starkly obvious.

Beyond questions of police capability, there were additional toxifying elements in the mix. One was an underlying rivalry between the army and the police (a not uncommon phenomenon in newly emerging states). This now turned into open conflict as the PNTL was accused by the military of bias in favor of the protesting Loromonu. More broadly, the entire crisis took place against an unstable national political background as Fretilin, the dominant party in government, was itself weakened by in-fighting (Wigglesworth 2012, pp. 12–14).

As the situation deteriorated into a general breakdown in order, the government appealed for international intervention. In the short term this was met by what was basically a recreation of 1999's INTERFET in the form of another coalition of the willing. With Australia once again as the lead nation, the International Stabilization Force (ISF) imposed a tense peace in the worst affected areas. The UN Security Council, evidently repenting of its haste to draw down UNMISSET, now agreed to Kofi Annan's plea for a new large-scale "multidimensional, integrated mission in Timor-Leste" (UNSCD S/2006/628, 8 August 2006). The UN Integrated Mission in Timor-Leste (UNMIT) was mandated to resume the interrupted peacebuilding efforts of UNMISSET. UNPOLs would be deployed once again on operational duties and would resume their training and mentoring efforts with the PNTL.

The UN would take over the organization of upcoming presidential and parliamentary elections. The campaigns around these would pose an immediate threat to public order, as would the possibility of a contested outcome (UNSCR S/RES/1704, 25 August 2006).

UNMIT's Mandate (Security Council Resolution 1704, 25 August 2006)

- Deploy a civilian component, including up to 1608 police personnel, and an initial component of up to 34 military liaison and staff officers.
- Support the government and relevant institutions to consolidate stability, enhance a culture of democratic governance, and facilitate political dialogue.

- Support Timor-Leste in all aspects of the 2007 presidential and parliamentary electoral process.
- Ensure, through the presence of United Nations police, the restoration and maintenance of public security in Timor-Leste through the provision of support to the Timorese national police.
- Assist in further building capacity in areas where specialized expertise is required, such as in the justice sector.
- Assist in strengthening the national institutional and societal capacity and mechanisms for the monitoring, promoting and protecting of human rights and for promoting justice and reconciliation.
- Facilitate the provision of relief and recovery assistance.

The apprehension of continuing insecurity and violence was well-founded. Although the ISF did the necessary "heavy lifting" of stabilization, serious difficulties continued in various parts of the country. UNMIT's first head (the Special Representative of the Secretary-General), Atul Khare, cast a cold eye on the situation. The violence, he said, "revealed the institutional fragility in coping with a crisis and structures for conflict resolution within these institutions were not well developed" (UN Peacekeeping Operations Review 2007, p. 37).

Despite the recent violence and disorder, the 2007 elections were largely successful. The process was organized, policed, and supervised by UNMIT and was an important step forward in the peacebuilding process. Fretilin remained the largest party but it was pushed into opposition by a broad coalition of other groupings. The intra-party factionalism that had weakened Fretilin – and therefore the national government – during the violence of 2006 had led to the departure from the party of its two best-known figures, Xanana Gusmão and the Nobel laureate José Ramos Horta. They now took the positions of, respectively, head of government and head of state in the new coalition.

This apparent new stability was misleading, however. Major threats to the peacebuilding effort remained. In February 2008, assassination attempts were made on both Gusmão and Ramos-Horta, carried out by a rump of Loromonu dissidents based in the hills outside of Dili. The attempt almost succeeded against Ramos-Horta who was severely wounded. UNMIT police and ISF troops now went on to high alert against the possibility of major disorder. This “militarization” of the intervention inevitably impeded for a time UNMIT’s civil projects. However, persuasion and mediation by UNMIT led the government to agree a financial compensation package for the soldiers whose dismissal in 2006 had precipitated the long, divisive crisis (UN Peacekeeping Operations Review 2008, p. 31). The crisis then slowly receded. But the UN’s efforts at the “localization” of the police and justice sectors – where UNMISSET had faced its greatest challenges – continued to advance only slowly. Kofi Annan remained cautious about the process; a stance shared by Ban Ki-moon who replaced him as secretary-general in 2008. Both were aware of the potentially grave consequences of a premature transfer of powers from the UN police to the PNTL (UNSCD S/2010/522, 13 October 2010).

While the concerns around the police related to training and discipline, the problems of the judicial sector were if anything more intractable. There was a fundamental shortage of Timorese with legal training. Additionally, the government insisted on maintaining Portuguese as the language of the courts. Although the new state opted for Portuguese as an official language, it is not widely spoken or understood in the country. The lingua franca is Tetum, a composite language of many influences (Wigglesworth 2012, pp. 16–17). Portuguese is largely restricted to older, more educated Timorese who were schooled during the Portuguese colonial era. This element, with its residual attachment to Portuguese, was strongly represented in the original Fretilin leadership which initially dominated decision-making in the new state. During this critical period of capacity-building, the language issue not only obstructed the transfer of responsibilities to the already scant pool of local lawyers, it also meant that international support could be drawn only from a relatively narrow base.

The judicial system was the location of another area of difficulty, one in which there was a divergence of interest between external agencies involved in the peacebuilding process and those whose peace was supposedly being built. The UN intervention in Timor-Leste, reflecting the new international norms of the time, prioritized the prosecution of those involved in the violence of 1999. But national authorities in contrast were wary of the dangers to fragile community cohesion in being too energetic in the matter. There was also a fear for the construction of good relations with Indonesia, a key component of Timor-Leste’s emerging foreign policy. As a result, government agencies were often slow to act against those guilty of historic crimes, and showed a marked tendency to leniency when they did. The UN, both in the field and in New York, saw this as undermining a broader global agenda against impunity, embodied in the new International Criminal Court and the special courts for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda. Ban Ki-moon was concerned at the questions the Dili government’s position raised about the “violation . . . of international standards and principles” (UNSCD S/2009/504, 2 October 2009).

2012 and Beyond

The endgame for the UN in Timor-Leste, and a vital test of its peacebuilding effort, was to be the electoral process of 2012. Effective, free and fair presidential and legislative elections would, so to speak, provide the necessary passport out of Timor-Leste for the UN operation. In contrast to the previous process in 2007, when UNMIT was responsible for the organization and conduct of the elections, the responsibility would lie primarily with the Timor-Leste government. The UN would provide logistical support and a security backstop, but in essence it was to be a “national” project.

In the event, the rounds of the presidential poll, held in March and April, and the legislative contest in July, were successfully organized and conducted by the central and district-level Timorese authorities. Heavily monitored by international bodies, the elections were judged to be effective and legitimate (UNSCD S/2012/765, 15 October 2012). José Ramos-Horta unexpectedly failed to be re-elected as president, though Xanana Gusmão remained prime minister at the head of a multi-party coalition. It was the peaceful outcome the UN had hoped for, and the mandates of both UNMIT and the Stabilization Force duly ended in December 2012. A small UN office remained after the end of UNMIT in the same way as UNOTIL after UNMISSET in 2005. Now, however, this proved sufficient, and there was no need for any international redeployment as there was in 2006.

Fears about the social and economic impact of the withdrawal of the major UN presence after a virtually unbroken 13-year presence proved largely unfounded. The Timor-Leste state has proved able to navigate the “post-UN era.” National politics has not been without incident, but the conflicts have for the most part been contained within the constitutional system. The ongoing process of national peacebuilding has been aided by Timor-Leste’s offshore oil and gas resources. These have provided a financial safety system in the form of a substantial sovereign wealth fund. This in itself carries its own risks, of course. Corruption, a classic symptom of the “resource curse,” is now clearly present in Timorese public life. But it would be frankly naive to argue that this could have been reduced in any meaningful way by UN efforts during its intervention.

Interestingly, Timor-Leste itself has become a contributor to UN peace operations. PNTL officers have been deployed as UNPOLs in Guinea-Bissau, and a contingent of the FDTL has served under the umbrella of the Portuguese contingent in the UN Interim Force in Lebanon (Bernardino and Moreira dos Santos 2018). The country has therefore moved from “peacekept” to peacekeeper.

Since 1999 the UN’s peacebuilding role in Timor-Leste has covered the spectrum of interventionist roles from quasi-governmental authority to light touch presence. At times, the UN presence has been plainly inadequate. The communal violence around the independence referendum in 1999 might have been moderated, if not avoided entirely, had UNAMET been provided with even limited policing and enforcement powers. Similarly, the Security Council’s determination to end the UN’s major role in Timor-Leste in 2005 by withdrawing UNMISSET merely led to the necessity for an even greater commitment in the form of UNMIT and the ISF.

In the last weeks of UNMIT in 2012, a UN paper exploring the organization’s global peacebuilding efforts was unusually critical in respect of Timor-Leste. It regretted the “early departure of the initial United Nations Transitional Administration mission from Timor-Leste, and the rapid succession of two additional United Nations missions” which “led to a lack of continuity in expertise and investment to support nascent national institutions” (UNSCD S/2012/746, 8 October 2012). This criticism might be justified with hindsight. But the contemporary realities, both local and international, in which these critical decisions were taken surely allow for a more sympathetic view. Timor-Leste was a small, socially and culturally cohesive state which after the initial trauma of 1999 seemed to successfully navigate its immediate post-conflict phase. Continuing shortcomings in national administrative, policing, and judicial capacity were evident. But against the generally favorable prevailing conditions, these remaining difficulties for peacebuilding would not at the time have appeared as grave as they eventually revealed themselves to be.

The UN intervention in Timor-Leste certainly focused new attention on important conceptual debates about the fundamental nature of the peacebuilding project. What is the “correct” balance between straightforward capacity-building for rapid self-government and longer-term “emancipatory” processes designed to embed enduring social cohesion? Does coercion have a role in peacebuilding – or is it to be avoided in all circumstances? Should “progressive” global notions of justice and accountability be imposed on local settings where they might be counterproductive? None of these questions was satisfactorily answered during the UN years in Timor-Leste, but they were certainly brought under active discussion. In an odd sense, the relative stability of the country during the UN presence (excepting the crises of 2006–2007) may itself have facilitated Timor-Leste's role as a kind of "laboratory" for the exploration of such issues. In the chronicles of UN intervention, Timor-Leste was very far from being a Bosnia or a Somalia or a Rwanda. Whatever the practical shortcomings and conceptual missteps of UN peacebuilding in Timor-Leste, in contrast to those near contemporary catastrophes of intervention, the UN's efforts were far from unsuccessful.

Cross-References

- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Emancipatory Peace
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Participatory Constitution-making and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Post-conflict Elections
- ▶ Post-conflict Timor-Leste
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions
- ▶ United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo \(UNMIK\)

References

- Bernardino, L. M. B., & Moreira dos Santos, A. A. (2018). The Portuguese contribution to the creation of the Falantil – Defence forces of East Timor. Journal of the Spanish Institute for Strategic Studies, 12. <http://revista.ieee.es/article/view/747/1368>
- Braithwaite, J., Charlesworth, H., & Soares, A. (2012). Networked governance of freedom and tyranny: Peace in Timor-Leste. Canberra: ANU Press. www.jstor.org/stable/j.ctt24h2jz (open access).
- Butler, M. J. (2011). Ten years after: (Re)Assessing neo-trusteeship and UN state-building in Timor-Leste. International Studies Perspectives, 12, 1–20.
- Charter of the United Nations. <https://www.un.org/en/charter-united-nations/>
- Chopra, J. (2000). The UN's kingdom of East Timor. Survival, 42(3), 27–39.

- Dee, M. (2001). "Coalitions of the willing" and humanitarian intervention: Australia's involvement with INTERFET. International Peacekeeping, 8(3), 1–20.
- Ishizuka, K. (2003). Peacekeeping in East Timor: The experience of UNMISSET. International Peacekeeping, 10(3), 44–59.
- Martin, I., & Mayer-Rieckh, A. (2005). The United Nations in East Timor: From self-determination to state-building. International Peacekeeping, 12(1), 125–145.
- Richmond, O. P., & Franks, J. (2008). Liberal peacebuilding in Timor Leste: The emperor's new clothes? International Peacekeeping, 15(2), 185–200.
- Ryan, A. (2002). The Strong Lead-nation Model in an ad hoc coalition of the willing: Operation stabilise in East Timor. International Peacekeeping, 9(1), 23–44.
- United Nations Peacekeeping Operations Year in Review 2007 (UN Department of Public Information). <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/year-review-2007>
- United Nations Peacekeeping Operations Year in Review 2008 (UN Department of Public Information). <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/year-review-2008>
- United Nations Security Council Documents – Reports of the Secretary-General. <https://www.un.org/securitycouncil/content/secretary-general-reports>
- United Nations Security Council Documents – Resolutions. <https://www.un.org/securitycouncil/content/resolutions>
- Wheeler, N. J., & Dunne, T. (2001). East Timor and the new humanitarian intervention. International Affairs, 77(4), 805–827.
- Wigglesworth, A. (2012). The growth of civil society in Timor-Leste: Three moments of activism. Journal of Contemporary Asia, 43(1), 51–74.

UN Security Council and International Interventions

Holger Niemann

Institute for Peace Research and Security Policy at the University of Hamburg (IFSH), Hamburg, Germany

Synonyms

Humanitarian intervention; Military intervention; Use of force

Definition

International interventions are a frequent yet challenging issue for the United Nations (UN). While often justified with the need to use military means for humanitarian purposes, they question the normative and legal foundations of the UN, most importantly the principle of state sovereignty and the prohibition of the use of force. The UN Security Council (UNSC) has unique instruments available to maintain international peace and security on behalf of the UN members, including the sole authority to legitimize the use of force. This chapter sheds light on how the UNSC deals with the challenges international interventions pose for the UN. Looking at actual practice reveals variation in UNSC responses to these challenges. While the UNSC had long remained rather reluctant to deal with intervention, it has become actively involved in the issue since the end of the Cold War. However, the blurring of lines between UN peacekeeping and international interventions, some of them conducted by the UN itself, demonstrate not only the inconsistency, but also the flexibility that has shaped the UNSC's account of international interventions. Key issues regarding their legality and legitimacy, however, remain disputed.

Introduction

Few issues in global politics are as contentious as international interventions. Often defined as external military action in the domestic sphere of a state for humanitarian reasons (Hehir 2010, p. 20; MacQueen 2011, p. 1; Weiss 2016, p. 7), intervention represents a fundamental tension of competing principles of the UN. Justified by moral obligations to protect civilians, intervention violates the principle of state sovereignty and the prohibition of the use of force. The inconsistent response to mass atrocities questions not only the motives for intervention, but also the relevance of the underlying moral and legal principles. How intervention actually unfolds in practice can also differ very much in scope and range, from attempts at short-term regime change to long-term state- and peacebuilding efforts (Schroeder 2018, p. 139).

Therefore, intervention has long been discussed controversially, both in academia and in politics. As Reus-Smit observes, all interventions have a number of widely acknowledged structural features: (1) interventions have been ubiquitous in past and present world politics, (2) interventions represent asymmetric relations of power and material capabilities, and (3) interventions are violations of jurisdictional boundaries and spheres of authority (Reus-Smit 2013, p. 1060). However, their legitimacy and legality has been subject of much debate (Nardin 2002; Pattison 2008; Tesón 1997). Considerable attention is also given to the role of interventions in the emergence of new norms and the challenges they bring to existing international legal and political orders (Chesterman 2001; Finnemore 2003; Hurd 2011; Welsh 2004). It is a widely held view that the nature of intervention has undergone significant changes, especially since 1990 (Bellamy and McLoughlin 2018; Weiss 2016). The effects of this post-1990 “liberal interventionism” and the merging of security and development issues have been critically analyzed (Chandler 2010; Duffield 2014; Paris 2004). Interventions hardly ever occur out of altruistic motives alone (Chesterman 2002, p. 302; Weiss 2016, pp. 8–9). On the contrary, scholars emphasize that they often serve as an instrument of powerful states revealing their double standards about the principles of the international community (Ayooob 2002; Menon 2016). Research on the operative level of interventions highlights the prevalence of technocratic policies that are often too narrowly focused on traditional notions of state sovereignty. This literature argues instead for the need to shift attention to the social and spatial effects of interventions on the local level as well as on the increasing interdependences between international and local actors in hybrid spaces (Chandler 2015; Hameiri et al. 2017; Schroeder 2018).

Intervention questions the normative and legal foundations of the UN. Therefore, the issue cannot be discussed without taking into consideration the role of the UNSC as the UN's principal organ responsible for the maintenance of international peace and security (Berdal and Economides 2008; Binder 2017; Einsiedel et al. 2016; Lowe et al. 2008b). While the UNSC is often seen as the obvious authority for deciding about interventions (Hehir 2010, p. 135), its current role in dealing with intervention was not anticipated when the UN was founded. Instead, the UNSC's approach was – and still is – driven by incremental practice rather than by clearly defined and formalized responsibilities. Although this has resulted in inconsistent decision-making by the UNSC, it also demonstrates its flexibility in dealing with intervention. This chapter demonstrates that while traditionally focused on preventing intervention, the UNSC has increasingly conducted interventions itself since 1990. Its incremental practice has also reframed the meaning of intervention and changed its broader normative framework, which provides grounds for both the justification and politicization of interventions. Key issues regarding their legality and legitimacy, however, remain disputed.

Conflicting Principles of Maintaining International Peace and Security

The UN Charter defines a system of collective security designed to promote international peace and security, to protect state sovereignty and to uphold the principle of non-intervention. For this, it prohibits the use of force except for cases of individual and collective self-defense. The principles and purposes of the UN, however, are in tension with each other. While protecting state sovereignty requires the UNSC to adopt measures to prevent intervention and to prohibit the use of force, the maintenance of international peace and security may require the exact opposite. Whether interventions are or should be an imperative for the UN is, therefore, the subject of much debate (Holzgrefe and Keohane 2003; Wheeler 2002).

The UNSC is the key institution realizing these conflicting principles of the UN and has unique instruments available for doing so, including the authority to authorize the use of force (Cronin and Hurd 2008, p. 3; Welsh and Zaum 2013, p. 66). The UNSC has “wide latitude” to use its power (Luck 2006, p. 23): it decides what actions it should take, not by applying clearly defined legal thresholds, but by coming to a political agreement among its members. Decisions are usually made on a case-by-case basis. Heavily affected by inequalities between the ten elected members (E10) and the five permanent members (P5), this often creates a gap between the theory and practice of using the instruments available to the UNSC (Hurd 2007, p. 5; Thakur 2017, p. 33). The UNSC, therefore, has acted quite differently in realizing the conflicting principles of the UN Charter. Nevertheless, over the decades a pattern has emerged that, though inconsistent, gradually legitimizes interventions as a means for realizing the UN’s principles. During the Cold War the UNSC’s scope of action was significantly constrained, but since 1990 it has become actively involved in the conduct of interventions, indicating a normative shift from sovereignty to protection as a rationale for action. However, post-Cold War UNSC decision-making on humanitarian crises is highly selective, which undermines the UNSC’s legitimacy (Binder 2017). As much of its power results from UN members being willing to execute UNSC action, such a lack of legitimacy is ultimately a threat to UNSC authority (Hehir 2010, p. 135). Key issues regarding the legality and feasibility of interventions also remain contested (Weiss 2016, p. 75). Most importantly, the UNSC’s legal framework has not been adapted to the changing landscapes of international security, including the emergence of new actors and types of violent conflict. None of the instruments currently available to the UNSC are therefore “directly intended to enable the UN to carry out humanitarian interventions in the sense of that term understood today” (MacQueen 2011, p. 13). How the UNSC deals with interventions, therefore, is best understood by focusing on actual practice and its incremental and at times contradictory change of the underlying normative framework.

Preventing Intervention

For most of the Cold War, the UNSC was primarily concerned with preventing intervention. Notable exceptions, such as UN-authorized military action in the Korean War (1950–1953) and the UN peace operation in the Congo (1960–1964), demonstrated the UNSC’s ability to become actively involved in interventions. The UNSC also discussed military invasions that were explicitly justified with reference to humanitarian imperatives several times, such as Vietnam's intervention in Kampuchea 1978–1979 and Tanzania's 1979 intervention in Uganda. Yet, overall, UNSC practice during the Cold War was largely aimed at preventing interventions. If the UNSC became active, it was primarily by authorizing "traditional" peacekeeping missions, i.e., peace operations that were based on consent by the conflict parties and often limited to observer missions in peace processes (Bellamy et al. 2010, p. 173). The growing power equilibrium between the USA and USSR in later decades furthered the reluctance to authorize the use of force (Morris 2015, p. 404).

Preventing intervention is deeply built into the UN's system of collective security. Article 2 of the UN Charter not only states that the UN is organized around the equality of its members (Art. 2.1), but more importantly prohibits the use of force (Art. 2.4) and asserts the principle of non-intervention into domestic affairs (Art. 2.7). These principles are reflected in Article 51 on the use of force for collective or individual self-defense. Upholding the principles of the UN is a key part of the UNSC's "primary responsibility" for international peace and security (Art. 24). Of special importance are the provisions on action regarding threats to the peace in Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Article 39 grants the UNSC exclusive authority to determine whether a situation constitutes a threat to the peace and to subsequently decide whether to use measures other than the use of force (Art. 41) or those involving the use of force (Art. 42). However, many of the instruments available to the UNSC are directed at the prevention of violent conflict. Chapter VI of the UN Charter defines instruments for the peaceful settlement of conflict by the UNSC, such as negotiation, mediation, and the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice. The UNSC can also delegate the maintenance of international peace and security to regional organizations (Chapter VIII). In addition, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC) authorizes the UNSC to refer cases to the ICC. While often considered less important than the coercive measures of Chapter VII, instruments of peaceful settlement and prevention of conflict provide the UNSC with far-reaching powers to decide itself when and how to become involved in conflicts (Lowe et al. 2008a, pp. 6–7; Luck 2006, p. 22).

The P5 have "special responsibilities" in the prevention of intervention, not only because they have (material) resources exclusively available to them, but also because they face expectations to commit themselves to realizing the principles and purposes of the UN (Clark and Reus-Smit 2013; Morris 2015). The UN was created to provide a forum for cooperation among them to prevent further threats and aggressions (Hehir 2010, p. 140; Luck 2006, p. 11). Their consent to establish the UN could only be achieved by giving them special powers and privileges (Hehir 2010, p. 140), most importantly the right to veto. The veto was instituted to ensure coordinated action by the P5 and to prevent unilateral interventions by any one of them (Buchanan and Keohane 2011, p. 47). In practice, however, it is often used as an instrument for realizing their national interests. Therefore, the veto remains a source of criticism undermining the UNSC's legitimacy. This became especially important at the end of the Cold War when changing security landscapes challenged established policies of the UNSC.

Conducting Intervention

In the early 1990s intervention increasingly became a practice of the UNSC. While traditional UN peacekeeping had dominated before, the early 1990s led to a surge of military operations authorized by the UNSC (Doyle and Sambanis 2006, pp. 144–145). This so-called "new interventionism" (Berdal and Economides 2008) changed UN peace operations significantly, both in terms of their numbers as well as in their quality. Grounds for this new type of UN peace operation were provided by the changing nature of peacekeeping operations in the late 1980s. Missions in Namibia, Mozambique, and Cambodia were tasked among others with state-building, election monitoring, and humanitarian assistance (Bellamy et al. 2010, p. 93; Thakur 2017, p. 41). It also reflected a changing relationship among P5 members during the late years of the Cold War that saw a greater spirit of cooperation (Mayall 2008, p. 11). The unparalleled number of UNSC resolutions and meetings in the early 1990s demonstrated that this spirit was translated into new activities (MacQueen 2011, p. 63). Most importantly, however, the 1990s were also driven by an increasing number of violent intrastate conflicts, the rise of violent nonstate actors, and a surge of internally displaced persons and changing technologies of modern warfare (for example, small arms and light weapons), creating a need to adapt established UN peace operation practices to changing security landscapes (Weiss 2016, p. 90).

As a consequence, the UNSC began authorizing the use of force for humanitarian causes differently. Resolution 688 on the situation in northern Iraq from 1991 is often referred to as the starting point of these activities, but especially UN peace operations in Somalia and Bosnia since 1992 are widely considered exemplary of such interventionist activities (Doyle and Sambanis 2006, p. 145; Thakur 2017, p. 43). Indicators such as the number of deployed peacekeepers, the UN's peacekeeping budget, the number of peace operations, as well as the number of fatalities among UN peacekeepers all demonstrate that the first half of the 1990s was very much a turning point for the UNSC in its conducting of interventions (Luck 2006 p. 37; Thakur 2017, p. 44). However, effective implementation of this new role proved to be already challenging in Somalia and Bosnia (MacQueen 2011, p. 148). Failures to prevent mass atrocities in Rwanda in 1994 and Srebrenica in 1995 demonstrated in particular the limited abilities of the UN to align its proactive engagement for humanitarian purposes with the available resources, the scope of mandates, and the political will of UN members. NATO's unauthorized 1999 Kosovo intervention demonstrated how paralysis affects the UNSC's abilities to conduct intervention. It was widely interpreted as a "defining moment" (Hehir 2010, p. 201) for the post-Cold War UNSC, underlining the peculiarities of its interventionist practices.

The challenges in shifting UN peace operations toward intervention during the 1990s partly resulted from the fact that the UN Charter only indirectly refers to when and how the UNSC can authorize interventions. Therefore, actual UNSC practice, rather than rules and regulations, define the boundaries between intervention and other UN peace operations. In theory, (traditional) peacekeeping can be clearly differentiated from more robust types of operations by the principles of consent by the parties, neutrality, and non-use of force (except in situations of self-defense). As UNSC practice demonstrates, however, these boundaries have become increasingly blurred. While many of the UNSC's operations cannot easily be categorized as interventions in a narrow understanding of military action without the government's consent, they represent gradual shifts in the conduct of peace operations. As the famous concept of "Chapter VI ½" operations demonstrates, this is hardly a new development. On the contrary, it has shaped UNSC practice from early on. However, as Fig. 1 illustrates, UNSC practice since 1990 has created an array of different types of peace operations. While many of them are still mandated under Chapter VI, the most notable development is the authorization of operations under Chapter VII. These include robust UN peace operations, that is, military interventions by the UN such as in Somalia 1992 and non-UN missions authorized under Chapter VII, such as the Australian-led intervention in East Timor 1999–2000, which was carried out with the "strategic consent" of the government (Weiss 2015, p. 83). The UNSC also authorizes more traditional peacekeeping missions, whose mandates were adapted to worsening situations, such as the UN mission in Cote d'Ivoire since 2004. As the missions in Mali since 2013 and Central African Republic since 2014 demonstrate, so-called stabilization missions were recently used by some governments to fight against rebels (Karlsrud 2018, p. 20). Fig. 1 also demonstrates the continuing importance of interventions carried out outside of the UN framework, for example, by regional security organizations such as NATO. Overall, it has become increasingly difficult to distinguish the various types of UN peace operations from interventions (Karlsrud 2018, p. 21; Weiss 2016, p. 81).

Aside from unclear formal boundaries, the conduct of such operations by the UN was and still is

UN Security Council and International Interventions, Fig. 1 The UNSC and Intervention Over Time. (Based on data from the Military and Non-Military Interventions Dataset (MILINDA). MILINDA defines intervention broadly as military and nonmilitary operations that are characterized by functional problems. Increasingly complex mandates lack the necessary resources and operations often reveal discrepancies between policies and their actual implementation in the field. Furthermore, UN personnel have engaged in misconduct and “exploit and abuse those whom they are entrusted to protect” (Karlsrud 2018, p. 19). UN interventions have also had unintended outcomes, such as the suffering of civilians or the conduct of war crimes by conflict parties (Roberts 2016, p. 362). Therefore, scholars tend to emphasize that given its expertise and capacities the UN would benefit from drawing a sharper boundary between situations calling for intervention and those requiring peacekeeping operations (Fortna and Howard 2008, p. 290).

“explicitly designed as peace operations” and characterized by the “expeditionary use of uniformed personnel” (Jetschke and Schlipphak 2019, pp. 610–612), including peacekeeping and observer missions.)

Reframing Intervention

The UNSC’s failures to respond appropriately to situations of mass atrocities in the late 1990s caused much criticism of the UN’s inability to protect human rights effectively. The UNSC faced an increasing gap between the discourse and practice of intervention, creating a need to determine whether to retain its principles and practices or modify them (Karlsrud 2018, p. 16). This initiated a process of normative change aimed at aligning the principles and discourses of UN human rights protection with the actual conduct of intervention. Normative change was also necessary to provide better grounds for responding to the changing demands of more complex and transnational security threats. After a hiatus in the early 2000s, therefore, UN peace operations again grew strongly in the number of missions as well as the number of deployed troops around 2005 (Karlsrud 2018, p. 17).

Normative change was nothing new for the UN’s dealing with interventions, though. Early on in 1992, Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali’s An Agenda for Peace laid out a vision for UN peacekeeping activities suitable for the challenges and expectations of the post-Cold War era. Then, in 2000 the Report of the Panel on United Nations Peace Operations was published under the leadership of Lakhdar Brahimi. It contained several recommendations for aligning UN peace operations to the realities of complex conflict constellations. The report emphasized the need to reevaluate the principle of political neutrality, which was constitutive for differentiating traditional peacekeeping operations from interventions: “Impartiality should not translate into complicity with evil” (Thakur 2017, p. 47). While both reports made important recommendations for more robust UN peace operations, they also made clear that the UN should refrain from all too interventionist activities (Karlsrud 2018, p. 20; Weiss 2016, p. 12). Subsequent reports furthered these debates, most notably the 2008 Principles and Guidelines for UN Peace Operations (Capstone Doctrine) on the impartiality and neutrality of UN peacekeepers and the 2015 Report of the High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations (HIPPO) on the problem of insufficient resources of missions and the need for tailored responses instead of templated ones. In 2018 the UN Secretary-General sought the support of UN members for a more comprehensive approach to UN peace operations in his Action for Peacekeeping initiative (A4P).

The most important normative development was probably to establish the Responsibility to Protect (R2P), which reframed intervention from a matter of violating state sovereignty to a matter of protecting people at risk (Bellamy 2009; Evans 2008; Thakur and Weiss 2009). One of the aims of the International Commission on Intervention and State Sovereignty (ICISS) that published the accompanying report in 2001 was to develop ways out of UNSC deadlock situations. The 1999 Kosovo crisis, for example, demonstrated not only the inability of the UNSC to fulfill its mandate, but also the instrumentalization of humanitarian arguments to justify unauthorized military intervention (Thakur 2017, pp. 280–281). Although the ICISS report included proposals on how to circumvent the UNSC in deadlock situations, its formal endorsement by the UN at the 2005 World Summit clarified the strong and leading role of the UNSC in protecting people at risk (Bellamy 2016, p. 253). The official endorsement by the UN was an important step toward recognition of R2P, but critics point to the lack of clear criteria and thresholds for action stemming from this concept (Bellamy 2008, p. 623). UNSC decision-making since 2005 has also demonstrated that the recognition of a concept does not automatically ensure its application in actual practice. Inaction in light of mass atrocities in Darfur, and also crises in Kenya, eastern Congo, and elsewhere underlined that there was considerable reluctance, especially among the P5, to actually apply R2P (Bellamy 2016, p. 258). At the same time, UNSC debates on the humanitarian crisis following the cyclone Nargis in 2008 and attempts by the Russian government to legitimize military action against Georgia as a case of protecting its people abroad spurred controversies over what would precisely constitute a case of R2P (Badescu and Bergholm 2009 p. 289; Badescu and Weiss 2010, p. 364). Authorizing military action against the Libyan government by resolutions 1970 and 1973 in 2011 then became a much awaited break with the UNSC’s previous handling of R2P (Bellamy and Williams 2011). The inability of the UNSC to come to a similar conclusion about the war in Syria, however, underlines the volatility of these developments and the UNSC’s latitude in dealing with such situations.

While R2P focuses on changing the legal framework and language of interventions, UNSC decision-making has also spurred normative change by emphasizing the vulnerabilities of groups of people in need of protection. The so-called “protection agendas” on the Protection of Civilians (POC), Children and Armed Conflict (CAAC), and on Women, Peace, and Security (WPS) have contributed to a more nuanced understanding of the UNSC’s mandate. While these agendas do not address intervention explicitly, they change the normative framework within which interventions are carried out. Often the result of deliberate efforts by civil society organizations to initiate norm change, UNSC decision-making on these issues has contributed greatly to these changes.

The protection agendas are an important element of a larger normative shift of the UNSC’s agenda from state action to people in need of protection. Focusing on the victims of violent conflict does not resolve conceptual ambiguities of intervention, but makes a significant difference for actual practice. Fig. 2 demonstrates that, while not a linear process, references to these protection agendas in UNSC resolutions have with different degrees become a continuous and stable pattern. Research on POC suggests that UN peace operations actually do aim at their implementation (Hultman 2013). Moreover, converging effects are found in the consideration of POC in peace operations by regional security organizations (Dembinski and Schott 2013). The UNSC has thus contributed greatly not only to changing how traditional UN peace operations are carried out, but also to profound changes in the normative framework of international interventions more generally.

Justifying Intervention

The normative change generated by the shift from sovereignty to protection provides grounds for establishing so-called “stabilization missions” in recent years (Karlsrud 2019). At the same time, crises in the UNSC concerning the situations in Libya and Syria emphasize that such normative change, especially related to R2P, has not alleviated the need to justify interventions, even those with UNSC authorization. NATO’s 2011 Libya intervention was hailed as a confirmation of R2P that would shape the conduct of future interventions (Bellamy and Williams 2011, p. 845). However, some UNSC members criticized that NATO’s intervention aimed at unauthorized regime change rather than the protection of people from atrocities. This dispute caused faction among the P5 and led to an unparalleled number of vetoes cast to prevent UNSC action on Syria. Hence, the decision to authorize NATO intervention in Libya has significantly affected the UNSC's ability to respond to the war in Syria (Morris 2013, p. 1275).

UN Security Council and International Interventions, Fig. 2 References to protection agendas in UNSC resolutions on country-specific or regional situations. (Based on data from United Nations 2019, 2020)

As Martha Finnemore observes, "every intervention leaves a long trail of justification" (Finnemore 2003, p. 15). Such processes demonstrate that the UNSC is credited not only with formal, but also with normative authority. Although the UNSC is often understood as an institution designed to facilitate decision-making among the great powers, scholars have emphasized its deliberative and legitimizing function (Hurd 2007; Johnstone 2003). In this understanding, the UNSC is "the forum of choice for debating and deciding on collective action requiring the use of force" (Thakur 2007, p. 387). These processes of justifying intervention are highly controversial, though. They rely on supposedly shared norms and values that are in fact contested and ambiguous (Niemann 2019). As "rhetorical resources" (Hurd 2007, p. 206) these norms and values are subject to strategic instrumentalization for different purposes rather than shared understandings with fixed meanings. Hence, justifications do not always produce the expected outcome.

The impetus to justify intervention in the UNSC emphasizes the importance of normative arguments for the conduct of interventions. It seems that states demonstrate "deference toward Security Council action as a necessary first step in gaining approval for this highly sensitive use of force" (Kahler 2011, p. 32). Such arguments also demonstrate that interventions are usually accompanied by politicization and contestation. At the same time, they take place in an institutional environment designed primarily around the privileges and interests of the P5.

more involved in interventions in different ways. These developments demonstrate how much actual practice has changed the UNSC's role on interventions over the course of the last decades. It has generated new types of peace operations, such as stabilization missions, normative change regarding state sovereignty and the prevention of large-scale human suffering, and rhetorical shifts toward the language of responsibility and protection. This has not been a linear process, though. Instead, to cope with the enduring contestation about the issue of intervention, the UNSC is in constant need of aligning actual practice with a changing political context and an often outdated legal framework. Most importantly, these changes have not allowed the UNSC to resolve the fundamental tension between the principle of protecting the sovereignty of UN member states and that of protecting people from mass atrocities.

The developments of the last 20 years have only furthered expectations for more coherent UNSC action. Ignoring overt gross human rights violations and atrocities increasingly undermines the UNSC's legitimacy. Moreover, UNSC actions take place in more and more complex environments, which increases the risk of mission creep (Clark and Reus-Smit 2013, p. 39). Proper responses require appropriate mandates, sufficient resources, and sustainable working relations of all involved stakeholders, but they also raise fundamental questions about the general role and mission of the UNSC. In the face of criticism of its inability to prevent interventions or to conduct them properly for the sake of a greater humanitarian good, the UNSC will most likely continue responding to mass atrocities with great flexibility and selectivity.

Summary

The UN was established as a system of collective security under the leadership of the great powers (Hurd 2011, p. 295). Interventions were considered, if at all, a potential threat to the post-World War order rather than a humanitarian imperative for responding to the large-scale suffering of civilians. Since then, however, the UNSC became more and

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Collective Security and Collective Responsibility in International Interventions
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Evolution of Practice in United Nations Peacekeeping Operations
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations

- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions
- ▶ Use of Force in Peace Operations

References

- Ayoob, M. (2002). Humanitarian intervention and state sovereignty. The International Journal of Human Rights, 6(1), 81–102. <https://doi.org/10.1080/714003751>.
- Badescu, C. G., & Bergholm, L. (2009). The responsibility to protect and the conflict in darfur: The big let-down. Security Dialogue, 40(3), 287–309. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010609336198>.
- Badescu, C. G., & Weiss, T. G. (2010). Misrepresenting R2P and advancing norms: An alternative spiral? International Studies Perspectives, 11(4), 354–374. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1528-3585.2010.00412.x>.
- Bellamy, A. (2008). The responsibility to protect and the problem of military intervention. International Affairs, 84(4), 615–639. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1468-2346.2008.00729.x>.
- Bellamy, A. (2009). Responsibility to protect. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Bellamy, A. J. (2016). UN Security Council. In A. J. Bellamy & T. Dunne (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of the responsibility to protect (pp. 249–268). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Bellamy, A., & McLoughlin, S. (2018). Rethinking humanitarian intervention. London: Palgrave.
- Bellamy, A., & Williams, P. D. (2011). The new politics of protection? Côte d'Ivoire, Libya and the responsibility to protect. International Affairs, 87(4), 825–850. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1468-2346.2011.01006.x>.
- Bellamy, A., Williams, P., & Griffin, S. (2010). Understanding peacekeeping (2nd ed.). Cambridge: Polity.
- Berdal, M. R., & Economides, S. (Eds.). (2008). United Nations interventionism, 1991–2004. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Binder, M. (2017). The United Nations and the politics of selective humanitarian intervention. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Buchanan, A., & Keohane, R. O. (2011). Precommitment regimes for intervention: Supplementing the Security Council. Ethics & International Affairs, 25(1), 41–63. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0892679410000018>.
- Chandler, D. (2010). International statebuilding: The rise of post-liberal governance. London/New York: Routledge.
- Chandler, D. (2015). Reconceptualizing international intervention: Statebuilding, 'organic processes' and the limits of causal knowledge. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 9(1), 70–88. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17502977.2015.1015247>.
- Chesterman, S. (2001). Just war or just peace? Humanitarian intervention and international law. Oxford/New York: Oxford University Press.
- Chesterman, S. (2002). Legality versus legitimacy: Humanitarian intervention, the security council, and the rule of law. Security Dialogue, 33(3), 293–307.
- Clark, I., & Reus-Smit, C. (2013). Liberal internationalism, the practice of special responsibilities and evolving politics of the Security Council. International Politics, 50(1), 38–56. <https://doi.org/10.1057/ip.2012.27>.
- Cronin, B., & Hurd, I. (2008). Introduction. In B. Cronin & I. Hurd (Eds.), The UN Security Council and the politics of international authority (pp. 3–22). London: Routledge.
- Dembinski, M., & Schott, B. (2013). Converging around global norms? Protection of civilians in African Union and European Union Peacekeeping in Africa. African Security, 6(3-4), 276–296. <https://doi.org/10.1080/19392206.2013.854085>.
- Doyle, M. W., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Duffield, M. (2014). Global governance and the new wars: The merging of development and security (2nd ed.). London: Zed Books.
- Einsiedel, S., von Malone, D., & Stagno Ugarte, B. (Eds.). (2016). The UN Security Council in the twenty-first century. Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Evans, G. J. (2008). The responsibility to protect: Ending mass atrocity crimes once and for all. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution Press.
- Finnemore, M. (2003). The purpose of intervention: Changing beliefs about the use of force. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Fortna, V. P., & Howard, L. M. (2008). Pitfalls and prospects in the peacekeeping literature. Annual Review of Political Science, 11(1), 283–301. <https://doi.org/10.1146/annurev.polisci.9.041205.103022>.
- Hameiri, S., Hughes, C., & Scarpello, F. (2017). International intervention and local politics. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hehir, A. (2010). Humanitarian intervention: An introduction. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Holzgrefe, J. L., & Keohane, R. O. (Eds.). (2003). Humanitarian intervention: Ethical, legal, and political dilemmas. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Hultman, L. (2013). UN peace operations and protection of civilians. Journal of Peace Research, 50(1), 59–73. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343312461662>.
- Hurd, I. (2007). After anarchy: Legitimacy and power in the United Nations Security Council. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Hurd, I. (2011). Is humanitarian intervention legal? The rule of law in an incoherent world. Ethics & International Affairs, 25(3), 293–313.
- Jetschke, A., & Schlipphak, B. (2019). MILINDA: A new dataset on United Nations-led and non-united Nations-led peace operations. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 37(5), 605–629. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0738894218821044>.

- Johnstone, I. (2003). Security Council deliberations: The power of the better argument. European Journal of International Law, 14(3), 437–480.
- Kahler, M. (2011). Legitimacy, humanitarian intervention, and international institutions. Politics, Philosophy & Economics, 10(1), 20–45. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1470594X10386570>.
- Karlsrud, J. (2018). The UN at war: Peace operations in a new era. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan. <https://doi.org/10.1007/978-3-319-62858-5>.
- Karlsrud, J. (2019). United Nations stabilization operations: Chapter seven and a half. Ethnopolitics, 18(5), 494–508. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2019.1640507>.
- Lowe, V., Roberts, A., Welsh, J., & Zaum, D. (2008a). Introduction. In V. R. A. Lowe, J. Welsh, & D. Zaum (Eds.), The United Nations Security Council and war: The evolution of thought and practice since 1945 (pp. 1–58). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Lowe, V. R. A., Welsh, J., & Zaum, D. (Eds.). (2008b). The United Nations Security Council and war: The evolution of thought and practice since 1945. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Luck, E. C. (2006). UN Security Council: Practice and promise. Abingdon: Routledge.
- MacQueen, N. (2011). Humanitarian intervention and the United Nations. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Mayall, J. (2008). Introduction. In M. R. Berdal & S. Economides (Eds.), United Nations interventionism, 1991–2004 (pp. 1–31). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Menon, R. (2016). The conceit of humanitarian intervention. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Morris, J. (2013). Libya and Syria: R2P and the spectre of the swinging pendulum. International Affairs, 89(5), 1265–1283. <https://doi.org/10.1111/1468-2346.12071>.
- Morris, J. (2015). The responsibility to protect and the great powers: The tensions of dual responsibility. Global Responsibility to Protect, 7(3–4), 398–421. <https://doi.org/10.1163/1875984X-00704009>.
- Nardin, T. (2002). The moral basis of humanitarian intervention. Ethics & International Affairs, 16(1), 57–70. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1747-7093.2002.tb00375.x>.
- Niemann, H. (2019). The justification of responsibility in the UN Security Council: Practices of normative ordering in international relations. London: Routledge.
- Paris, R. (2004). At war's end: Building peace after civil conflict. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Pattison, J. (2008). Legitimacy and humanitarian intervention: Who should intervene? The International Journal of Human Rights, 12(3), 395–413. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13642980802069658>.
- Reus-Smit, C. (2013). The concept of intervention. Review of International Studies, 39(5), 1057–1076. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S0260210513000296>.
- Roberts, A. (2016). The use of force: A system of selective security. In S. von Einsiedel, D. Malone, & B. Stagno Ugarte (Eds.), The UN Security Council in the twenty-first century (pp. 349–371). Boulder: Lynne Rienner.
- Schroeder, U. C. (2018). Introduction: Decentring the study of international interventions. Cooperation and Conflict, 53(2), 139–153. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836718768642>.
- Tesón, F. R. (1997). Humanitarian intervention: An inquiry into law and morality (2nd ed.). Ardsley: Transnational Publishers.
- Thakur, R. (2007). Humanitarian intervention. In T. G. Weiss & S. Daws (Eds.), The Oxford handbook on the United Nations (pp. 387–403). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Thakur, R. (2017). The United Nations, peace and security: From collective security to the responsibility to protect. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Thakur, R., & Weiss, T. G. (2009). R2P: From idea to norm—and action? Global Responsibility to Protect, 1(1), 22–53. <https://doi.org/10.1163/187598409X405460>.
- United Nations. (2019). Highlights of Security Council practices 2018. New York. <https://unite.un.org/sites/unite.un.org/files/app-schhighlights-2018/index.html>. Accessed 30 July 2020.
- United Nations. (2020). Highlights of Security Council practices 2019. New York. <https://www.un.org/securitycouncil/content/highlights-2019>. Accessed 30 July 2020.
- Weiss, T. G. (2015). Peace operations and humanitarian interventions. In J. A. Koops, N. MacQueen, T. Tardy, & P. D. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations (pp. 78–92). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Weiss, T. G. (2016). Humanitarian intervention: Ideas in action. Cambridge: Polity.
- Welsh, J. M. (Ed.). (2004). Humanitarian intervention and international relations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Welsh, J., & Zaum, D. (2013). Legitimation and the UN Security Council. In D. Zaum (Ed.), Legitimizing international organizations (pp. 65–87). Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Wheeler, N. J. (2002). Saving strangers: Humanitarian intervention in international society. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Unarmed Bodyguards

► Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Unarmed Civilian Peacekeeping

► Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Unarmed Civilian Protection

► Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

Unarmed Civilian Protection/ Peacekeeping

Berit Bliesemann de Guevara¹, Ellen Furnari² and Rachel Julian³

¹Department of International Politics,
Aberystwyth University, Aberystwyth, UK

²Pleasant Hill, CA, USA

³Leeds Beckett University, Leeds, UK

Synonyms

Accompaniment; Community self-protection; Nonviolent peacekeeping; Nonviolent protection; Peace communities; Peace zones; Protective accompaniment; Unarmed bodyguards; Unarmed civilian peacekeeping; Unarmed civilian protection

Definition

Unarmed civilian protection/peacekeeping (UCP), also known as (protective) accompaniment among other synonyms, provides effective nonviolent, civilian-to-civilian alternatives to police- and military-based protection. It can be described as “the practice of civilians protecting other civilians in situations of imminent, ongoing, or recent violent conflict. It involves trained international civilians protecting local civilians, local civilians protecting each other, and even local civilians protecting international or non-local civilians” (Oldenhuis et al. 2021, p. 5). Peace Brigades International, Nonviolent Peaceforce, Meta Peace Team, and Operation Dove are examples of international UCP organizations. Local protection organizations include Bantay Ceasefire in the Philippines, Bear Clan Patrol in Canada, and Cure Violence in the USA, while the Indigenous Guards of Colombia and the Women Protection Teams in South Sudan are examples of manifold forms of nonviolent community self-protection. All UCP is characterized by physical presence in communities experiencing violence and by the deployment of nonviolent strategies with the aim to protect specific individuals, groups, and/or whole communities from physical harm. Key principles of UCP include nonviolence, the primacy of local actors, and independence. For many organizations, nonpartisanship is also central; others rather emphasize solidarity with the oppressed. Key legal pillars include international human rights and humanitarian law. Numerous evaluations and studies have demonstrated UCP’s effectiveness, and some recent UN reports and declarations have called for an increased use of UCP. Yet there is also debate within the UCP community of practice in how far an extension in scale and/or scope is possible or desirable.

Introduction

It is estimated that 2 billion people today live in fragile and conflict-affected areas of the world, where they are impacted by violence and natural disasters – a number likely to grow in the future due to population growth and the impacts of climate chaos (UNOCHA 2019). In these areas, civilians are faced with a wide variety of human rights violations, such as killings, torture, sexual abuse, and forced displacement. In many countries, individuals are forcibly recruited into armed groups, trafficked for sexual exploitation, or imprisoned or killed for their environmental or human rights activism or their social leadership. Recognizing the overwhelming need for the protection of civilians, former UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon insisted that “human protection is a defining purpose of the United Nations in the twenty-first century” (Ki-Moon 2012). Since 1999, UN peace operations have increasingly included protection of civilians (PoC) mandates. However, there are many situations of war and violent conflict where UN peace operations cannot be deployed or are ineffective, and where government actors are not willing or able to provide protection to some or all civilians. In some situations, the government itself is a, or the, main source of violence against civilians. The international community has struggled, in theory and in practice, with the question of its responsibility to protect civilians within the territory of sovereign states as well as in the face of the scale and complexity of protection challenges in violent conflicts around the world (O'Callaghan and Pantuliano 2007).

By building local protection infrastructures for and with communities and individuals threatened by violence and forced displacement, unarmed civilian protection/peacekeeping (UCP) offers a bottom-up approach to complement or substitute state-led, top-down (armed) protection approaches. Civilians have protected themselves nonviolently across all cultures and times and, since the early twentieth century, have increasingly used nonviolent strategies known as interpositioning (between warring factions) and accompaniment (of people under threat) (Julian and Schweitzer 2015; Schirch 2006; Weber 2000). Famously, in Gandhi's later years he called for the creation of a Shanti Sena – a peace army – to go to areas of conflict between Hindus and Muslims within India and position themselves between combatants (Weber 1996). Threads like these came together in the founding of Peace Brigades International (pbi) in 1981, the oldest international nonviolent UCP organization currently in operation. From the beginning, pbi fielded teams of international volunteers focused on protecting human rights defenders and other social activists threatened with death for their activities. To date, the organization has had projects in 13 countries, including Mexico, Colombia, Indonesia, and Kenya (<https://www.peacebrigades.org>).

Since 1981, numerous other organizations have fielded international teams going to places of overt or covert violence to protect communities, specific organizations, or individuals. They include organizations such as Christian Peacemaker Teams (<https://cpt.org>), the Ecumenic Accompaniment Program in Palestine and Israel (<https://eappi.org/en>), Nonviolent Peaceforce (<https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org>), Meta Peace Team (<https://www.metapeaceteam.org>), Peace Watch Switzerland (<https://www.peacewatch.ch>), and many more. According to the Selkirk College UCP database, UCP has been provided at times by over 60 organizations in the three decades between 1990 and 2020 (Selkirk College 2020). In addition, more and more national and local organizations have formed in the Global North and South, including Cure Violence (<http://cureviolence.org>) and DC Peace Team (<https://dcpeaceteam.com>) in the USA, Bear Clan Patrol in Canada (<https://bearclanpatrol.org>), Bantay Ceasefire in the Philippines (<http://www.eprpinformation.org/files/peaceprocesses/ceasefires/What-is-Bantay-Ceasefire.pdf>), and UDEFEGUA in Guatemala (<https://udefegua.org>). Not least, there are also numerous unarmed community guards, peace communities, humanitarian and weapon-free zones, and other nonviolent grassroots self-protection initiatives around the globe (e.g., Kaplan 2016; Krause 2017, 2018; Moser-Puangsuwan 1996; Mouly et al. 2015).

Understanding the Place of UCP Within Peace Studies

Within the triad of peacemaking, peacekeeping, and peacebuilding, peacekeeping is the prevention and reduction of direct violence with the consent of the parties involved. Military peacekeeping, which relies on (the threat of) the use of force to change the behavior of armed actors to comply with agreements or protect civilians, remains the dominant method used and studied. However, unarmed civilian peacekeeping/protection also changes the behavior of armed actors to protect civilians. It challenges the widely held assumption that armed actors only yield to the threat of violence, which has been proven to be untrue. UCP therefore presents a practical critique of traditional peacekeeping by challenging the latter's underlying assumptions. This places UCP within the field of critical peacekeeping studies, such as Pugh's (2004) work, which uses critical theory to show how military peacekeeping fits within the global political order that benefits powerful states, and Cunliffe's (2013) study, which suggests imperialism as a lens through which we need to understand multilaterally sponsored armed peacekeeping.

There is a growing body of research on UCP which argues that nonviolent, unarmed strategies are effective in protecting civilians without relying on or reproducing the militarized global order. Using case study material from NGOs, Julian and Gasser (2019), for instance, show how most of the tasks of peacekeeping can be done by unarmed civilians and demonstrate that the military are not essential to peacekeeping. Julian (2020) therefore argues that nonviolence challenges the belief that violence or the threat thereof is necessary for peacekeeping, enabling us to develop new theories and understandings of how peacekeeping works. Wallace (2017) similarly argues that nonviolence challenges the false choice "do nothing or take military action" when civilians are threatened by violence and shows how civilian protection can be carried out using nonviolence. Drawing on evidence of successful nonviolent protection, she demonstrates how using unarmed strategies can provide new approaches in civilian protection. So, although UCP and military peacekeeping do many of the same tasks, they do so from a completely different understanding of power and relationships (Furnari 2015, 2018). By employing a critique of military peacekeeping, UCP thus enables us to explore assumptions which are made within peacekeeping.

In recent years, there has indeed been a growing recognition of the importance of unarmed strategies among policymakers. It has been noted, among others, in the report of the UN High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations (HIPPO) 2015, which accepted that unarmed strategies are also useful in peace operations and peacekeeping (UN 2015). Yet, while UCP is many times less expensive than military interventions, since it harnesses the power of nonviolence and civilians, it remains generally poorly funded, and there has been a tendency to dub all sorts of unarmed activities by state actors "UCP," which has raised concerns about a hollowing out of the approach. Rather than being a "toolbox" that protection actors can borrow single instruments from, UCP is a holistic approach that rests on indivisible elements such as nonviolence, relationship-building, and primacy of the local.

In addition to nonviolence, UCP draws on feminist approaches to understanding the relationship between militarism and protection. Military peacekeeping depends on a masculine view of protection that Enloe (2014) argues is about "power over," the myth of men protecting women, and the normalization of militarism which imagines that armed actors can only be tackled by increasing military threat. Feminism shows the importance of the interconnections between people and their experience, that power is more varied than just "power over," and that protection is a multilevel multifaceted activity (Oakley 2020).

Finally, UCP also engages with the local turn in critical peacebuilding studies (Khamidov et al. 2017). While UN peacekeeping talks about engagement with local communities, this is different to both local ownership and transformative peacebuilding, in which local communities lead the efforts for peace. One of the core principles of UCP is the primacy of the local, which means that protection activities and programs engage local people in the planning and implementation of the projects. This ranges from everyday meetings and working together between locals and internationals, to groups and community efforts entirely run by local people (for example, the South Sudanese Women Protection Teams, see below). Of course, "local" is a complicated identifier. UCP interventions by international organizations must assess thoughtfully the divergent interests, agendas, and identities in those considered local.

Delineating Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping

UCP's foremost focus is on the reduction or prevention of physical violence. Just as with all peacekeeping, UCP works where there is consent of parties to the conflict. Another similarity are the limitations – neither UCP nor military peacekeeping does or can work in all contexts. Yet different from armed peacekeeping, UCP is based on core principles of nonviolence, primacy of the local, and either nonpartisanship (“humanitarian” UCP organizations) or solidarity with the oppressed (“activist” UCP organizations) (for a discussion of the two models, see Schweitzer 2019b, pp. 78–79, cf. Coy 2012). Much of the UCP literature has concentrated on international UCP organizations and evaluated their strategies and effectiveness. Such studies by academics and practitioners show that UCP organizations have successfully worked in a range of violent political conflicts of different types and intensities on all continents and encompassing countries and regions such as the Balkans (Schweitzer and Clark 2002), Bougainville (Gehrman et al. 2015), Colombia (Koopman 2014; Lindsay-Poland and Weintraub 2016), Georgia, Guatemala, Iraq, Mexico (Weaver 2002), Palestine (McCarthy and Pinckney 2016), the Philippines (Furnari 2016a; Gündüz and Torralba 2014), Sri Lanka (Coy 2001), South Sudan (Easthom 2013, 2015; Furnari 2016b), and the USA (Butts et al. 2015; McCarthy 2012), to name but a few. The examples testify to UCP’s versatility to adapt to very different contexts and types of political violence (cf. also Schweitzer 2018a, b, 2019a, b, 2020).

In addition to the reduction and prevention of physical violence, it has also been argued that UCP can make significant contributions to peacebuilding and positive peace, by breaking cycles of revenge and providing alternative conflict resolution models (Furnari et al. 2021) and by “creat[ing] a safer environment, or a ‘safer space’, for civilians to address their own needs, solve their own conflicts, and protect vulnerable individuals and populations in their midst” (Furnari et al. 2015, p. 30). Increasing attention has therefore also been paid to local protection infrastructures consisting of both the numerous local organizations and movements for self-protection in areas of conflict, which range from peace communities and weapons-free zones to forms of nonviolent engagement with armed actors. Where such local (self-)protection initiatives use nonviolent strategies, they need to be seen as an essential part of the UCP field of practice (see Alther 2006; Engelbrecht and Kaushik 2015; Garcia 1997; Gorur 2013; Hancock 2016; Jose and Medie 2016; Kaplan 2013, 2016; Krause 2018; Macaspac 2018; Mitchell and Allen Nan 1997; Moser-Puangsuan 1996).

The range of experiences of nonviolent self-protection upends the idea of the protection of civilians from violence as necessarily an “outside protection” and shows ways in which communities have prevented, interrupted, and reduced violence at the local level. International and national organizations who see their main task in supporting, or “being with,” such grassroots initiatives, therefore, usually prefer the term “accompaniment” over “protection” and count “solidarity” rather than “nonpartisanship” among their core principles, to emphasize the central role of communities and local actors (Schweitzer 2019b, 2020). This is also seen by many within the UCP community as a way to address the problem inherent in the use of white privilege or Global North privilege as a primary form of deterrence in international protection, which has resulted in a call to continuously work on the decolonization of UCP (Boothe and Smithey 2007; Coy 2011; Koopman 2013).

The different objectives, levels, and interconnections of UCP are illustrated in Fig. 1, taken from a UCP training manual by Oldenhuis et al. (2021).

A defining feature of all UCP is that its activities typically take place at the grassroots level of communities in conflicted-affected areas and are sustained over longer periods of time. Unlike their armed counterparts who often live in bunkerized compounds apart from the population they are to protect (Duffield 2010), unarmed civilian protectors/peacekeepers usually live in the communities they work with, which allows them to be attuned to the dynamics at the local level and to seek the involvement of local actors in their work. They see this as taking the principle of the primacy of the local seriously in their situational and conflict analyses and their program planning, as living and working in the community contributes directly to timely situational analysis and relationship-building. Living in local communities may not always be possible for all staff members or volunteers, however, for example, due to travel restrictions for international companions by the host country’s government (as is the case in Myanmar) or due to violence being directed specifically at UCP personnel (as was the case in Mindanao, Philippines, during a period of time). In these contexts, UCP organizations generally seek for other ways to work directly with grassroots communities, for example, by deploying national staff to whom travel restrictions do not apply or by training communities to self-protect where outside presence is impossible, while also using their national and international connections for advocacy work and trying to contribute to sustainable local protection infrastructures that will outlive the international presence.

Unarmed Civilian Protection/Peacekeeping, Fig. 1 Goals and objectives of UCP. (Source: Oldenhuis et al. 2021)

How UCP Works

UCP provides a range of nonviolent strategies across five areas of activity: proactive engagement (e.g., interpositioning, protective accompaniment, and protective presence), monitoring (e.g., ceasefire monitoring, rumor control, and early warning – early response), relationship building (e.g., confidence-building, multitrack dialogue), capacity enhancement (e.g., through training, supporting the building of local protection infrastructures), and advocacy (at different levels from local to international). Underpinning these different strategies are three different ways in which UCP is working: through deterrence, the strength of relationships, and proactive presence.

Deterrence works by increasing the cost of carrying out violence – making the perpetrators more visible and making it harder for them to attack human rights defenders, for instance. Protective companions, or “unarmed bodyguards,” use their presence, visibility, strong relationships, and a responsive network to make threats visible and deter them from being carried out. This widens the space for human rights and peace activity to occur (Mahony and Eguren 1997). Protective accompaniment of human rights defenders is probably the most classic example of strategies of deterrence of violence by international UCP organizations, employed in many countries around the world. By watching – including monitoring, investigating, and reporting – both those who are threatened by violence and those who threaten and perpetrate violence and being visible in this watchful presence, UCP raises the stakes for violent actors to harm civilians. In this way, the behavior of perpetrators is changed at checkpoints, along paths women take to collect water, when people are farming, during demonstrations, during evictions, and at meetings.

For UCP organizations, building good working relationships is essential (Furnari 2014, 2015, 2018). Being perceived as independent and unarmed is seen by most organizations as conducive to this. For organizations of the “humanitarian” type, this usually means engaging with most parties to a conflict. With regard to the armed actors, good working relationships ideally include groups on all sides (state military, insurgent groups, militias, etc.) and at all levels (from commanders to rank and file members), though this is not always possible. With regard to unarmed actors, relationship building takes place with and within the local communities who are to be protected as well as with stakeholders at regional and national levels. Good relationships with as broad a spectrum of actors as possible, i.e., ideally with all state and nonstate armed groups, authorities at different levels, other relevant local stakeholders, as well as the violence-affected communities and different groups within them, will enable UCP organizations to carry out their work, or to carry it out more easily. For example, in places as different as Indonesia and Colombia, pbi volunteers have found that developing good relationships with soldiers at various checkpoints makes it possible to move more smoothly through the checkpoints with those they are accompanying. In Kachin state, Myanmar, local civilian conflict monitors used their network of established relationships with the Burmese army, the Kachin rebel group, and politicians to negotiate the safe passage of internally displaced persons, who had fled from aerial bombings to the forest, into the nearest city, and to reclaim youth that had been forcibly recruited into the armed groups. In addition to good relationships enabling UCP organizations to engage in direct protection tasks, they can also mobilize these networks to connect different groups of society, facilitate communication and dialogue, and contribute to multitrack processes of mediation and negotiation by linking local communities to higher levels of politics or other international intervening organizations.

Proactive presence takes the principle of “presence” a step forward (Wallis 2010). UCP practitioners are present in areas of conflict, potential conflict, and threats. Yet they are generally not a passive presence but rather, as described above, are actively engaged in building relationships and networks, connecting with diverse social sectors. In many contexts (other than providing protection at a demonstration, for instance, which is very short-term), they are present in communities for many years, or as local people may live there. They are often also actively engaged in working with people in communities (including their own communities) to develop early warning – early response plans, reaching out to the military with training in International Humanitarian Law, accompanying people to courts or other government institutions, and other manifestations of active engagement. Accurate and frequent context analysis is critical for the effectiveness of UCP and can only be accomplished through frequent, lengthy, local interactions which depend on proactive presence.

Finally, whatever methods are being used, they are all based in the primacy of local actors through discussions with local people, to understand the strengths and existing strategies being used, and the unmet protection needs as expressed by diverse groups within a community or by the specific individuals needing protection. The challenge for UCP actors here is to navigate the complexity of local communities, where different sectors may have different perspectives and needs. What they share is a commitment to constant reflection on these difficulties.

Three Examples of UCP in Practice

The following are three examples from the wide range of existing UCP, accompaniment, and self-protection projects and initiatives, which serve to illustrate the variety of work in the UCP field of practice: international protective accompaniment and local self-protection in Colombia, UCP in the Philippines, and local protection provided by Women Protection Teams in South Sudan.

International Protective Accompaniment in Colombia

Colombia has witnessed a range of political and other violences for many decades. The state military as well as paramilitary and guerrilla groups have been engaged in violent conflict for many decades, and although some have signed peace agreements, other groups have carried on. International drug trafficking cartels, increasing violence instigated by multinational corporations, and high levels of targeted killings and general criminal violence have added to the picture. In this context, international and national civilians, human rights defenders, and different types of peace communities in Colombia have been using nonviolent protection strategies for over 35 years. Colombia is an interesting case for the study of UCP because there are possibly more organizations doing UCP and community self-protection in Colombia than there are in any other country. There are both local and international organizations, many of which are networked together to support one another and local civilians as well as a range of peace communities, humanitarian zones, Indigenous and peasant guards, and many other nonviolent grassroots initiatives (Alther 2006; Koopman 2014; Lefebvre 2018; Lindsay-Poland and Weintraub 2016; Mouly et al. 2015; Schweitzer 2020).

International accompaniment organizations such as Peace Brigades International (pbi) and Operation Dove have run programs in Colombia to accompany human rights defenders as well as local self-protection initiatives. Lindsay-Poland and Weintraub (2016, p. 61) give the following example of a pbi protection: “There is also the case of Mario Calixto in the town of Sabana de Torres in 1997. He was accompanied by PBI, and when two paramilitaries entered his house to take him away, the PBI members managed to interposition themselves between the armed men and Mario, explaining their work and their presence. Calixto took advantage of the distraction to escape, and the paramilitaries left the house. A short while later, Calixto left the town with PBI accompaniment.”

Kaplan (2013) discusses the case of the Association of Peasant Workers of the Carare (ATCC) that developed its own system of investigation and justice, in order to prevent militias and military forces from committing violence in the name of justice. In this way, when an allegation of cooperating with guerrilla forces was presented, the community itself carried out the investigation and decided on the appropriate consequences, if any, if indeed cooperation was found. This prevented disappearances and extrajudicial killings as well as providing encouragement for community members to noncooperate with any armed actors. In this way, a community developed effective self-protection mechanisms.

Unarmed Civilian Peacekeeping in Mindanao, the Philippines

Civilians in Mindanao experience different levels and types of violence, ranging from political violence by armed groups, now partly subject to a peace agreement, to “rido” or community violence. The work of the unarmed civilian protection teams in Mindanao has included tasks and strategies as diverse as rumor control and de-escalating community violence, preventing the displacement of people in villages near barracks, and helping with the safe return of internally displaced persons (IDPs). They have monitored and investigated incidents and trained local people in UCP (Furnari 2016a).

UCP in Mindanao has three main characteristics that make it particularly interesting to study. First, it is the first time UCP has been written into a peace agreement as the monitoring mechanism. When an Agreement of Peace was negotiated between the Government of the Philippines and the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF), the tasks of monitoring and investigating breaches of the agreement were given to a team of civilians who used UCP to proactively engage with armed actors and local communities (International Monitoring Team – Civilian Protection Component; see OPAPP n.d.). As well as being “on the ground” to de-escalate violence, they trained thousands of people in human rights, violence reduction, and relationship-building. Those people have then become active in their own communities and have built new mechanisms for making their communities safer (Gündüz and Torralba 2014).

Second, UCP in Mindanao is based on an interrelationship between local and international civilians. Bantay Ceasefire began violence monitoring and reduction work in Mindanao and was joined by international groups, especially Nonviolent Peaceforce (<https://nonviolentpeaceforce.org/program-locations/philippines>). Local and international groups have successfully built mixed teams, combining the essential context knowledge of local team members with the international links and relationships of the international organizations.

Third, UCP in Mindanao developed Community Early Warning and Early Response (CEWER), which is a mechanism through which local communities meet and learn to understand the early warning signs of imminent violence, such as armed actors changing their behavior or people starting to gather in a particular place. Community Early Warning and Early Response involves working with local communities to understand the threats, the indicators that threats are developing, and appropriate responses they can take to ensure community and civilian protection. CEWER enables communities to plan what they will do if they see changes that might lead to violence, such as reporting it and calling someone to help, or identifying a specific protection activity (flee, negotiate, confront, etc.) to be carried out. These responses are under the control of the community, meaning that people can take action themselves and are not dependent on external actors (Engelbrecht and Kaushik 2015; cf. Macaspac 2018).

UCP and Local Women Protection Teams in South Sudan

South Sudan is so far the only place in the world where a large UCP mission (by Nonviolent Peaceforce, <https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/what-we-do/program-location/south-sudan>) and other local UCP actors are operating in the same country as a UN peacekeeping mission, making it a great case for comparisons between (the effectiveness of) different forms of peacekeeping and protection of civilians in a country with high levels of political and other forms of violence. UCP teams in South Sudan are able to operate in remote rural areas by having good relationships with communities and armed groups, particularly relying on local knowledge to understand the threats people face, their existing capacities and ways of self-protection, and opportunities for improving civilian safety. While people most often already have protection capacity – they know to flee, confront, negotiate, or hide, for example (Gorur 2013) – UCP enhances their capacity by providing new communication and relationship-building strategies, visibility, or creating the safer space in which new conflict resolution mechanisms can be established by the communities (Easthom 2013, 2015; Furnari 2016b).

South Sudan is also one of the few cases in which an international UCP organization has specifically trained local women to form Women Protection Teams (WPTs) (Nonviolent Peaceforce 2015). Thousands of women have been trained in UCP and work in their local communities to reduce violence. The WPTs are visible – the women wear bright pink shirts – and work in groups in their local area where they meet, are a constant presence for civilian safety, and train others in building local protection responses. For example, women might go to talk to a group of young people who are threatening others and intervene to halt violence, or they might work with other Women Protection Teams to tackle gender-based violence by different armed groups at checkpoints. Another example relates to cycles of revenge killings that in many communities have been going on for generations. In some communities, the WPTs have intervened after a killing, with the relatives of the deceased, to find other ways of responding than further killing. The women are motivated by concern for their own families, but also understanding how very local cycles can lead to much larger cycles of killing and other violences. The emphasis of all these activities is on enhancing local capacity and enabling civilian safety and protection to be carried out at community level.

Summary

In summary, approaches of unarmed civilian protection/peacekeeping and (protective) accompaniment, broadly conceived, can improve civilian safety and protect civilians from armed conflict and other forms of violence. Unlike armed peacekeeping and other police- and military-based forms of protection, it does so without the use, or threat of use, of violence. Thereby, UCP de-militarizes protection. UCP is locally rooted, thus embodying and actualizing the ubiquitous call for “local leadership” or for protection and peacebuilding efforts being “locally-led.” Generally, UCP efforts are based in local capacities and needs, rather than driven by (neo)liberal or other outsider agendas. UCP is able to respond to different contexts and types of violence, enhances capacity of existing protection measures, and is equally carried out by local people as well as internationals, and often in collaboration. UCP is a mechanism that depends on presence, relationships, communication, and visibility, and people can be trained to use UCP. The embeddedness of this nonviolent type of protection from physical harm in the actions and strategies of unarmed civilians contributes to long-term peacebuilding and reduces the impact of militarism, by creating safer space for civil society actors to work on resolutions to local conflicts and by breaking cycles of violence and power based on force. This makes UCP both a critique of and a viable alternative to dominant security orders locally, nationally, and internationally.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Resistance for Peace and Conflict Management, Role of
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- ▶ Pacifism and Peace
- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine
- ▶ Zones of Peace

References

- Alther, G. (2006). Colombian peace communities: The role of NGOs in supporting resistance to violence and oppression. Development in Practice, 16(3–4), 278–291.
- Boothe, L., & Smithey, L. A. (2007). Privilege, empowerment, and nonviolent intervention. Peace and Change, 32(1), 39–61.
- Butts, J. A., Gouvis Roman, C., Bostwick, L., & Porter, J. A. (2015). Cure violence: A public health model to reduce gun violence. Annual Review of Public Health, 36, 39–53.
- Coy, P. G. (2001). Shared risks and research dilemmas in a peace brigades international team in Sri Lanka. Journal of Contemporary Ethnography, 30(5), 575–606.
- Coy, P. G. (2011). The privilege problematic in international nonviolent accompaniment’s early decades: Peace brigades international confronts the use of racism. Journal of Religion, Conflict and Peace, 4(2). <http://www.religionconflictpeace.org/volume-4-issue-2-spring-2011/privilege-problematic-international-non-violent-accompaniment's-early>.
- Coy, P. G. (2012). Nonpartisanship, interventionism and legality in accompaniment: Comparative analyses of peace brigades international, Christian peacemaker teams, and the international solidarity movement. The International Journal of Human Rights, 16(7), 963–981.
- Cunliffe, P. (2013). Legions of peace: UN peacekeepers from the global south. London: Hurst.
- Duffield, M. (2010). Risk-management and the fortified aid compound: Everyday life in post-interventionary society. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 4(4), 453–474.
- Easthom, T. (2013). Unarmed civilian protection and peacekeeping in South Sudan: A case study in stabilization. Brussels: Nonviolent Peaceforce.
- Easthom, T. (2015). The South Sudan weapons free zone. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 27(1), 31–36.
- Engelbrecht, G., & Kaushik, V. (2015). Community-based protection mechanisms. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 27(1), 43–51.
- Enloe, C. (2014). Bananas, beaches and bases: Making feminist sense of international politics (2nd ed.). Berkeley/Los Angeles/London: University of California Press.
- Furnari, E. (2014). Understanding effectiveness in peacekeeping operations: Exploring the perspectives of frontline peacekeepers. PhD thesis, Dunedin: University of Otago. <http://hdl.handle.net/10523/4765>
- Furnari, E. (2015). Relationships are critical for peacekeeping. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 27(1), 25–30.
- Furnari, E. (2016a). Unarmed civilian protection/peacekeeping in Mindanao, Philippines. In E. Furnari (Ed.), Wielding nonviolence in the midst of violence

- (pp. 136–174). Norderstedt: Institute for Peace Work and Nonviolent Conflict Transformation.
- Furnari, E. (2016b). Unarmed civilian protection South Sudan: Emerging good practices in the midst of civil war. In E. Furnari (Ed.), Wielding nonviolence in the midst of violence (pp. 175–235). Norderstedt: Institute for Peace Work and Nonviolent Conflict Transformation.
- Furnari, E., Oldenhuis, H., & Julian, R. (2015). Securing space for local peacebuilding: The role of international and national civilian peacekeepers. Peacebuilding, 3(3), 297–313.
- Furnari, E. (2018). The role of relationships in the emergence of peace. In P. Verbeek, & B. A. Peters (Eds.), peace ethology: Behavioral processes and systems of peace (pp. 133–152). Hoboken, NJ and Chichester: Wiley Blackwell.
- Furnari, E., Bliesemann de Guevara, B., & Julian, R. (2021). Unarmed civilian peacekeeping. In K. Standish, H. Devere, A. Suazo, & R. Rafferty (Eds.), Springer handbook on positive peace. Cham: Springer. (forthcoming).
- Garcia, E. (1997). Filipino zones of peace. Peace Review, 9(2), 221–224.
- Gehrmann, R., Grant, M., & Rose, S. (2015). Australian unarmed peacekeepers on Bougainville, 1997–2003. Peace Review, 27(1), 52–60.
- Gorur, A. (2013). Community self-protection strategies. Washington, DC: Stimson Centre.
- Gündüz, C., & Torralba, R. (2014). Evaluation of the nonviolent Peaceforce project with the civilian protection component of the international monitoring team in Mindanao, Philippines. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/publications/mediatEUr_IID_NP_Mindanao_evaluation_report_final_06May14.pdf
- Hancock, L. E. (2016). Agency and peacebuilding: The promise of local zones of peace. Peacebuilding, 5(3), 255–269.
- Jose, B., & Medie, P. A. (2016). Civilian self-protection and civilian targeting in armed conflicts: Who protects civilians? Oxford Research Encyclopedia Politics. <https://doi.org/10.1093/acrefore/9780190228637.013.216>.
- Julian, R. (2020). The transformative impact of unarmed civilian peacekeeping. Global Society, 34(1), 99–111.
- Julian, R., & Gasser, R. (2019). Soldiers, civilians and peacekeeping – Evidence and false assumptions. International Peacekeeping, 26(1), 22–54.
- Julian, R., & Schweitzer, C. (2015). The origins and development of unarmed civilian peacekeeping. Peace Review, 27(1), 1–8.
- Kaplan, O. (2013). Protecting civilians in civil war: The institution of the ATCC in Colombia. Journal of Peace Research, 50(3), 351–367.
- Kaplan, O. (2016). Resisting war: How communities protect themselves. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Khamidov, A., Megoran, N., & Heathershaw, J. (2017). Bottom-up peacekeeping in southern Kyrgyzstan: How local actors managed to prevent the spread of violence from Osh/Jalal-Abad to Aravan, June 2010. Nationalities Papers, 45(6), 1118–1134.
- Ki-Moon, B. (2012). Keynote address to Stanley Foundation conference on the Responsibility to Protect. <https://www.un.org/sg/en/content/sg/speeches/2012-01-18/address-stanley-foundation-conference-responsibility-protect>
- Koopman, S. (2013). The racialization of accompaniment: Can privilege be used transparently? FOR Peace Presence. <https://peacepresence.org/2013/08/31/the-racialization-of-accompaniment/>
- Koopman, S. (2014). Making space for peace: International protective accompaniment in Colombia. In F. McConnell, N. Megoran, & P. Williams (Eds.), Geographies of peace: New approaches to boundaries, diplomacy and conflict resolution (pp. 109–130). London/New York: IB Tauris.
- Krause, J. (2017). Non-violence and civilian agency in communal war: Evidence from Jos, Nigeria. African Affairs, 116(463), 261–283.
- Krause, J. (2018). Resilient communities: Non-violence and civilian agency in communal war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Lefebvre, S. (2018). Making the territory: The spatial politics of peasant communities. Human Rights Defender Hub Working Paper 5, York: HRD Hub.
- Lindsay-Poland, J., & Weintraub, M. (2016). To be by your side: Unarmed protection and accompaniment in Colombia. In E. Furnari (Ed.), Wielding nonviolence in the midst of violence (pp. 25–67). Norderstedt: Institute for Peace Work and Nonviolent Conflict Transformation.
- Macaspac, N. (2018). Insurgent peace: Community-led peacebuilding of indigenous peoples in Sagada, Philippines. Geopolitics. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14650045.2018.1521803>.
- Mahony, L., & Eguren, L. E. (1997). Unarmed bodyguards: International accompaniment for the protection of human rights. West Hartford: Kumarian Press.
- McCarthy, E. (2012). “Will you really protect us without a gun?” unarmed civilian peacekeeping in the U.S. Journal for Peace and Justice Studies, 22(2), 29–48.
- McCarthy, E., & Pinckney, J. (2016). Unarmed civilian protection in the Israeli and Palestinian conflict. In E. Furnari (Ed.), Wielding nonviolence in the midst of violence (pp. 68–135). Norderstedt: Institute for Peace Work and Nonviolent Conflict Transformation.
- Mitchell, C., & Allen Nan, S. (1997). Local peace zones as institutionalized conflict. Peace Review, 9(2), 159–162.
- Moser-Puangsuwan, Y. (1996). Grassroots initiatives in unarmed peacekeeping. Peace Review: A Journal of Social Justice, 8(4), 569–577.
- Mouly, C., Idler, A., & Garrido, B. (2015). Zones of peace in Colombia’s borderland. International Journal of Peace Studies, 20(1), 51–63.
- Nonviolent Peaceforce. (2015). Meet the all-women peacekeeping force of South Sudan. <https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/blog/english-press-clips/534-meet-the-all-women-protection-force-of-south-sudan>

- O'Callaghan, S., & Pantuliano, S. (2007). Protective action: Incorporating civilian protection into humanitarian response. HPG report 26. London: Humanitarian Policy Group.
- Oakley, D. (2020). What is the relationship between the situated learning of Unarmed Civilian Protection workers and gendered power dynamics? PhD thesis, Lancaster University. <https://doi.org/10.17635/lancaster/thesis/1043>
- Oldenhuis, H., Furnari, E., Carriere, R., Wagstrom, T., Frisch, A., & Duncan, M. (2021). Unarmed civilian protection: Strengthening civilian capacities to protect civilians against violence. An introductory course in 5 modules (2nd ed.). Geneva: Nonviolent Peaceforce.
- OPAPP. (n.d.). Terms of reference of the international monitoring team (IMT). Manila: Office of the Presidential Advisor on the Peace Process (OPAPP).
- Pugh, M. (2004). Peacekeeping and critical theory. International Peacekeeping, 11(1), 39–58.
- Schirch, L. (2006). Civilian peacekeeping preventing violence and making space for democracy. Uppsala: Life & Peace Institute.
- Schweitzer, C. (2018a). Good practices in nonviolent, unarmed, civilian to civilian protection: Documentation of the workshop in Manila, 7–9 December, 2017. Hamburg: Nonviolent Peaceforce. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/Documentation_Manila_20170220-final.pdf
- Schweitzer, C. (2018b). Good practices in nonviolent, unarmed, civilian to civilian protection: Documentation of the workshop in Beirut, 18–20 June, 2018. Hamburg: Nonviolent Peaceforce. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/Good_Practices/UCP-in-the-Middle-East-Documentation_Final.pdf
- Schweitzer, C. (2019a). Good Practices in nonviolent, unarmed, civilian to civilian protection. Documentation of the workshop in Nairobi, 12–14 November, 2018. Hamburg: Nonviolent Peaceforce. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/Nairobi_2018_Good_Practices.pdf
- Schweitzer, C. (2019b). Good Practices in nonviolent, unarmed, civilian to civilian protection. Documentation of the workshop in Paynesville, Minnesota, 21–23 October 2019. Hamburg: Nonviolent Peaceforce. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/Good_Practices/Paynesville_2019-10_final.pdf
- Schweitzer, C. (2020). Good Practices in nonviolent, unarmed, civilian to civilian protection and protective accompaniment. Documentation of the workshop in Bogotá (Colombia), 13–15 January 2020. Hamburg: Nonviolent Peaceforce. https://www.nonviolentpeaceforce.org/images/Good_Practices/Documentation_Bogota_2020_Full_version_final.pdf
- Schweitzer, C., & Clark, H. (2002). Balkan peace team – International e.V.: A final assessment of its functioning and activities. https://www.wri-irg.org/sites/default/files/public_files/bpt-11-en.pdf
- Selkirk College. (2020). List of UCP organizations in operation: 1990–2020. <https://selkirk.ca/sites/default/files/Mir/UCP/Comprehensive%20list%20of%20UCP%20organizations%20and%20countries%20since%201990%20-%202020.pdf>
- UN. (2015). Report of the high-Level independent panel on peace operations on uniting our strengths for peace: Politics, partnership and people. https://www.un.org/en/ga/search/view_doc.asp?symbol=S/2015/446
- UNOCHA. (2019). Global humanitarian overview 2019. Geneva/New York: UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs. <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/GHO2019.pdf>
- Wallace, M. (2017). Security without weapons: Rethinking violence, nonviolent action, and civilian protection. Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- Wallis, T. (2010). Best practice in nonviolent peacekeeping. In C. Schweitzer (Ed.), Civilian peacekeeping – A barely tapped resource (pp. 25–34). Belm Vehrte: Institute for Peace Work and Nonviolent Conflict Transformation.
- Weaver, P. N. (2002). Restoring the balance: Peace teams and violence reduction in Chiapas, Mexico. PhD thesis. University of St. Thomas, Minneapolis Minnesota. <https://www.researchgate.net/publication/35733421>
- Weber, T. (1996). Gandhi's peace army: Shanti Sena and unarmed peacekeeping. Syracuse: Syracuse University Press.
- Weber, T. (2000). A history of nonviolent interpositions and accompaniment. In Y. Moser-Puangsuwan & T. Weber (Eds.), Nonviolent intervention across borders: A recurrent vision (pp. 15–41). Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.

Unarmed Resistance

- ▶ Popular Protest in Palestine

Uncertainty

- ▶ Insights from Complexity Theory for Peace and Conflict Studies

Unexpected

- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Unintended

► Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers

Natalia Rayol Fontoura
University of Florida, Gainesville, FL, USA

Synonyms

Abuse; Aid; Assistance; Collateral; Conflict; Consequences; Effects; Humanitarian; International; Intervention; Military; Peace; Peacekeeping; Results; Sexual; Unexpected; Unintended; Violence

Definition

The formulation and implementation of military and civilian humanitarian and peace-building policies by international or nongovernmental organizations frequently trigger unexpected and frequently counter-productive social and political results. These unpredicted outcomes are what is commonly referred to, in Peace Studies, as “unintended consequences.” All international policies – such as United Nations (UN) peacekeeping operations – that intend to support politically unstable countries in their path to achieve sustainable peace and economic development have the potential to provoke such unintended effects. It is fundamental to emphasize that these unforeseen political reactions are not desired by the actors who formulate and implement international humanitarian and peacebuilding strategies. Once such processes are in place, they very often form a rapidly increasing chain of negative outcomes, which transforms the prediction, management, and containment of these accidental processes into a complex challenge. For example, international assistance can, through the provision of food or other resources, inadvertently enhance the power of certain groups, incentivizing more violence between combatants and even prolonging the conflict and worsening the already precarious living conditions of a certain population. Within the context of UN peace operations, for instance, many negative side effects, that could hinder the construction of sustainable peace, have been witnessed in the last decades, such as cases of sexual misconduct by peacekeepers. The political consequences of such cases are specially damaging and spread much beyond the suffering of the victims: sexual misconduct can even erode local support towards the mission, fundamental for the efficient implementation of its goals.

Introduction

What Are “Unintended Consequences”?

Contemporary peace operations are certainly one of the most complex political strategies in the construction of long-term peace and stability: it often involves the implementation of a plethora of distinct military and civilian functions and the presence of numerous political actors, such as United Nations (UN) employees and peacekeepers, within a context that is, most of the time, characterized by economic failure and political division. This intricate combination makes it very hard to predict the various consequences a peace operation can have, especially for the so-called host-society. These unpredicted results are called “unintended consequences”: outcomes that are not intentional, or desired, by the designers of a certain peace operation, and that, at the same time, are extremely hard to predict, and therefore to manage and contain (Aoi et al. 2007). More importantly, these unintended effects can represent, many times, the opposite of the pre-established goals of a mission, frequently harming exactly the individuals and groups who were meant to benefit from the presence of the UN in the field.

The concept of unintended consequences is not limited to the study of the various effects of the presence of UN peace operations but is also central to the analysis of the influence of a broad range of different military and nonmilitary strategies that aim to provide humanitarian assistance and help countries dominated by conflict in constructing sustainable peace and economic development. The focus on the systematic analysis of the many negative side effects of international aid – a subject that started to gain more space within Peace Studies since the 1990s – allowed policymakers to understand that international assistance, even when formulated and implemented with the best of intentions, can very frequently have contrary and damaging results, to the point of even exacerbate and prolong political instability and violence (Anderson 1999).

The ways by which international aid can produce such negative outcomes are quite varied, but they always form a complex and vicious chain process, whose ultimate effect is hard to predict. Some examples of these consequences can be considered as more direct or visible, such as when goods distributed by an organization are stolen by a certain group of rebels or paramilitaries, who can, for instance, exchange it for armaments, therefore increasing their power. Other negative results are sensed in a more structural or indirect way: for example, a large influx of food (for instance, rice), distributed by an international NGO, can dramatically decrease the prices of this same good in the local market, therefore damaging small-scale agricultural producers, and at the same time economically “incentivizing” individuals – who could otherwise benefit from a potential local economic development – to remain involved in criminal activities. The final result might be a completely counter-productive situation in terms of constructing sustainable peace: the lack of local economic development (many times due to the dependency on international donations) and the high levels of poverty in a certain state might be intimately linked to the widespread use of violence against civilians – a strategy used by warring parties to obtain financial resources. The final result of a well-intentioned international assistance might, ultimately, be the possible perpetuation of the conflict (and of the suffering of civilians) and a higher probability of its recurrence in the unlikely event that any kind of peace might be reached at some point.

Before policy-makers and scholars brought to light these potential negative consequences of humanitarian and developmental assistance, the simple idea that international aid could be detrimental seemed not only unfeasible but almost illogical. How can policies devised specifically to aid a certain population have such detrimental results? The answer lies in the political encounter between humanitarian workers and peacekeepers and the highly complex and unstable settings where assistance policies will be implemented. In this sense, any sort of international assistance strategy cannot be seen as an exogenous factor that enters a certain system solely to perform a predefined goal: Once aid policies take place in a context of political instability, struggle for resources, plurality of actors, and high levels of violence, humanitarian actors inexorably become an active part of the conflict – despite the strong desire of many donors, policy-makers, and peace workers to remain apolitical or detached from the complexity of the conflict itself (Keen 2008).

The Unintended Consequences of Constructing Peace in the Context of Contemporary Conflicts

Indeed, the occurrence of such unintended consequences, and the necessary formulation of ways to prevent their occurrence have definitely become more complex in the last decades, when organized violence, according to many authors (Kaldor 2007; Duffield 2001; Keen 2008, 2012; Hoffman 2007), has changed in significant ways. According to these authors, post-Cold War political rivalries became complex humanitarian crises that, even if present within the borders of a certain state, seriously threaten international peace and security, as also asserted by many UN documents (DPKO 2012). Mary Kaldor, probably the most cited author when it comes to the systematization and analysis of this post-Cold War type of war, names these “complex, prevalent and intractable” (Keen 2012, p. 11) conflicts as “new wars” (2007). Recent conflicts in Sierra Leone, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan, the Balkans, Colombia, among many other states (Polman 2010; Keen 2012) share important similarities regarding political goals, methods of warfare and financial support. Each of these traits, that constitute this unprecedented logic of warfare, creates new challenges for the provision of international aid and for the prevention of a whole plethora of potential non-predicted consequences that might strongly impact a state’s short and long-term political stability and economic development.

In these transnational wars (Kaldor 2007) – that challenge definitions of intra and inter-state violence – the plurality of actors involved significantly complexifies any attempt to provide international assistance without indirectly influencing the balance of power formed by a mix of state forces, rebels, counterinsurgent groups, members of private security companies, paramilitaries, foreign forces, and other actors who struggle for the scarce resources existent. Within this intricate setting, clear distinctions between ordinary criminals, official combatants, and civilians become blurred, which offers another level of difficulty for humanitarian workers who are faced with the difficult task of separating civilians from rebels or criminals. Also, despite the presence of so many actors, the battleground is not the place where winners and losers are defined. Violence (in its most horrendous forms) is now mainly directed at the civilian population – a common strategy employed to displace entire communities, therefore guaranteeing social and political control of certain territories (Kaldor 2007, 2013; Duffield 2001). Any strategy of humanitarian assistance or development employed, then, carries the risk of indirectly increasing the suffering of civilians. In summary, the logic of these “new wars” – based on the blurring between war and crime, the plurality of actors involved and high levels of human rights violations – increases the urgency and the difficulty of the formulation and implementation of peacebuilding policies.

For instance, take the example of the (potentially damaging) relation between international assistance, local economic context, and contemporary conflicts. Differently from Kaldor’s “old wars,” commonly financed by their governments (2007), the financial sources of contemporary conflicts come from a plethora of (local and international) actors and places, and strongly rely on the revenue produced by internal and transnational criminal activities. The political context existent during violent conflicts – commonly characterized by weak state institutions (or the complete absence thereof), especially regarding police and judiciary systems – allows, and even incentivizes, the free engagement of many individuals in a series of criminal activities, such as extortion, drug and human trafficking, illicit arms trade, spoliation, and control and exploitation of natural resources, among many other unlawful enterprises. Such permanent source of economic funds creates a vicious cycle: It financially supports many actors involved in the conflict by providing them the monetary means to continually engage in violence and in the quest for power; at the same time, combatants also benefit individually from the context of widespread impunity that never-ending and each time more recurrent wars provide. According to the Uppsala Conflict Data Program (2016), of the 259 armed conflicts identified by the study since 1946, 159 recurred (around 60% of the cases). This pattern, nevertheless, increased significantly since the 1990s. According to the UCDP report, the beginning of the 2000s witnessed, at the same time, the lowest number of new conflicts starting, and the highest number of recurrences – a trend that continues to deepen continually (PRIO 2016). Also, from an individual standpoint, many combatants financially benefit more from war than from demobilizing and reintegrating into civilian life. In this sense, despite the unprecedented level of destruction and violence involved, certain individuals and groups achieve a level of financial resources and power they would probably not have during peaceful times (Keen 2008). In this sense, any type of international assistance will not only help civilians in need but also directly interfere with the different benefits that many combatants (or criminals) derive from war. These groups are then expected to react – politically and militarily – to compensate for their financial and political loss. Willingly or not, humanitarian workers and peace soldiers, by interfering in this complex system, open endless inter-connected possibilities of unintended consequences.

The seriousness of these side-effects should not be underestimated. Ultimately, through a chain of events, some of these unintended consequences can have significant influence in the outcome of the conflict. For instance, resources brought by humanitarian aid can become an important financial source for a certain combatant group (who can either “tax” the donations, by charging humanitarian workers a certain amount of money to allow goods to reach those in need, or by simply stealing them), inadvertently shifting the balance of power between the (many) parts of the conflict (Polman 2010). This addition of power might strengthen a rebel group that was previously weaker vis-à-vis other groups, therefore prolonging the conflict by diminishing the gap between combatants. The use of humanitarian aid by one warring part as a financial resource can be used, for instance, to obtain more armament, resulting in more violence, more refugees, and the possibility of spreading the instability to neighboring countries. Opposite groups can also respond with the intensification of violence against civilians, in an attempt to regain their position of power. The use of force can also be intensified by fighting parts, as rebel groups or even state forces, as a protesting “response” to the presence of international humanitarian workers or foreign soldiers. Even the end of a consistent period of influx of international donations might result in the recurrence of violence, as non-state groups could try to compensate for the loss by attacking the government or reengaging in criminal activities (Nielsen et al. 2011). As the concepts of civilian and combatant become blurred in contemporary conflicts, humanitarian aid might even directly provide resources for warring parties, who are considered as civilians by humanitarian workers (Anderson 1999), inducing a violent response from other groups. At the end, the sole presence of humanitarian workers and peacekeepers might be enough to enhance criminal activities, as drug trafficking and prostitution, due to the sudden flooding of money that follows the arrival of a large number of peacekeepers.

The goal of understanding the effects of potential unintended consequences of international aid and peace construction efforts is not to “prove” that international assistance is damaging to its beneficiaries and their communities and should therefore be altogether eliminated. Unintended consequences, even the most damaging ones, are not representative of the majority of cases nor the sole causal factor of the recurrence of conflicts – a deeply complex, multicausal process, in which many other political, cultural and social factors play an important role. Moreover, there is vast evidence that when UN peacekeepers or humanitarian workers closely follow the full implementation of peace agreements and support the execution of development policies, the probability of conflict recurrence becomes much lower (PRIO 2016). If policy-makers commit to keep a constant focus on how peace construction and more immediate international assistance can exacerbate conflicts (despite their best intentions), through the systematic analysis of past and current missions, it is possible to identify, many times, situations in which side effects are more likely to occur. Such study can also help devise initiatives that can prevent, or at least soften, damaging unintended consequences that could hinder the construction of sustainable peace and further harm populations that already have to live with unprecedented levels of violence in all its most horrendous forms.

The Possible Collateral Effects of United Nations Peace Operations

Within the context of UN peace operations, unintended consequences work very similarly, in a systemic and nondesired way, with the exception of cases in which peacekeepers purposely engage in actions that could not only damage the local population but also erode the efforts implemented by the mission. The opposite of the so-called “unintended consequences” of a peace operation is its expected or desired results: for instance, the establishment of democratic and nonviolent political systems, the recovery of the local economy or the implementation of more equal gender policies – goals not only desired by designers and participants of a mission, but previously established in the mandate. In the same way that desired outcomes established in the mandate end up by creating an environment that continually benefits the host-society on long-term, in the form of a cyclical system (for instance, efficient democratic institutions enhance political stability; and more political stability consolidates even more those institutions, spurring other positive effects), unintended consequences create a chain of harmful events that makes their prediction and containment very challenging. The results of cases of sexual misconduct by peacekeepers, for example, go much beyond the harm done to the victims: it can raise the incidence of Sexually Transmitted Diseases (STDs), marginalize women in their own societies, erode local support, damage the image of the UN in the region, and spur critiques by nongovernmental organizations.

The difficulties in predicting the emergence and the end results of unintended consequences derive also from their societal complexity: undesired results can have a political, economic, social, or cultural nature; frequently though, all these factors merge together, creating an intersectional phenomenon whose resolution and control represents a challenge to UN employees, peacekeepers, and analysts alike. The rapid rise of inflation and of salary disparities among the local population, the higher incidence of STDs, the increase in cases of corruption and criminal activities (such as prostitution or drug trafficking) and in criminal behavior committed by peacekeepers, such as executions, torture, bribery, and sexual abuse are just a few examples of consequences that touch every sphere of a certain society, harming the UN, the mission, state institutions, communitarian organs, communities, groups, and individuals. In this sense, due to its continuous effects and increasing damaging power, unintended consequences can represent a fundamental factor in the success or failure of a peace operation.

In order to understand the contextual traits that explain, or at least facilitate, the increasing development of undesired results within the context of peace missions, it is necessary to emphasize some fundamental characteristics of contemporary peace operations. As vastly explained by various experts in peace operations (Bellamy et al. 2004; Doyle and Sambanis 2006), these missions go through significant changes in the after Cold War world. The character of intrastate violence, specially, changes so significantly that what was previously considered as “internal conflicts” start to be seen as “complex crises” that, in the language of the UN Chart, threaten international peace and security. It seems to be only natural that, within this modified context of numerous crises that require urgent response, peace operations reach unprecedented numbers – in number of missions and in the size of the military contingents employed. Differently from the so-called “classic” or “first generation” of peace operations (Bellamy et al. 2004), the contemporary model is based on the idea of directly using military, police, and civilian personnel in the construction of political stability and security. Peacekeepers and UN employees, then, start to engage in a series of tasks, such as protection of civilians, implementation of disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration (DDR) of former combatants, organization of elections, monitoring of human rights, reforms of police and judiciary sectors, refugees repatriation, distribution of food, construction of infrastructure (Doyle and Sambanis 2006), among many other functions.

The common trait among all these distinct tasks today exercised by civilian employees and peacekeepers alike is the fact that they all require an intense and constant interaction with the local population. In this sense, the political complexity of contemporary missions (especially regarding its different functions), the large number of peacekeepers and UN employees employed, as well as the constant contact between these actors and the society that receives the mission creates a context in which unintended consequences are almost always to be expected. There are still other circumstances, linked to the political and social context in which contemporary peace missions are embedded, that also fuel the surge of damaging unpredicted consequences. Characteristics proper of the host-society, as the lack of effective legal and police systems and unequal gender cultures, combined with other circumstances, such as the immunities given to peacekeepers, and the sudden presence of large amounts of financial and material goods in a collapsed economy, that is frequently based on economic informality, culminates in an environment of survival needs and impunity – the perfect environment for the free flow of the most diverse unexpected consequences (Freedman 2018; Pallen 2003; Allred 2006; Tripodi and Patel 2002).

For example, the influx of financial and material goods that come along the arrival of peacekeepers (who not only have the financial means to engage in sex commerce but are also immune to the host-state's jurisdiction, even for serious crimes) into a society that lacks proper legal and police structure often spurs an increase in local sexual commerce (which many times is already linked to unequal gender norms, economic collapse, and the prevalence of sexual violence during conflict). This increase in prostitution might result in a higher incidence of STDs and in possible children that will not receive proper financial support from their fathers, among other negative consequences that can, ironically, strengthen exactly the environment of impunity that the mission in place was supposed to revert. In this context, the potential failure of the goals established in the resolution that gives birth to these operations can harm local individuals and groups and weaken, in an international level, the political legitimacy and image of peace operations (potentially affecting even troop and budget contributing countries, who might become more wary to see themselves involved with a political strategy linked to several scandals).

One of the most prominent, damaging, and politically complex types of undesired consequences in the context of peace missions are cases of sexual misconduct (as the UN regularly refers to cases of rape, prostitution, sexual abuse and exploitation) by military peacekeepers in relation to members of the host-society (usually women and children) – a complex phenomenon that is interconnected with the economic, social, cultural, and gender relations of the environment in which peacekeepers and victims are embedded.

Sexual Misconduct by Peacekeepers: A Complex and Challenging Unintended Consequence

A Brief Overview of Sexual Abuse in Peace Operations

Although the concept of Sexual Abuse and Exploitation (SEA) has been formalized quite recently, in 2003, the first reports of cases of sexual misconduct by peacekeepers date to the 1990s, when the increase in the number of troops in peacekeeping operations and the more intense interaction with the local population becomes a fundamental trait of these contemporary missions (Simic 2012; Simm 2013). Despite the presence of many news accounts regarding cases of sexual abuse in the UN missions in Cambodia and Somalia (Pallen 2003; Allred 2006), the first time the subject appears in an official UN document is in 1996, when a report of the expert of the Secretary-General denounced that children were getting involved in prostitution upon the arrival of peacekeepers (General Assembly 1996), who were engaging regularly in sexual relations with these minors. Within the next years, cases of sexual abuse by military peacekeepers were widely publicized by the international media, especially in the UN Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of Congo (MONUC) and in the UN Stabilisation Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) – two of the largest and most high-profile missions deployed by the UN until today (Simic 2012; Simm 2013).

Confronted with increasingly pressing media accounts regarding sexual violence committed by peacekeepers in different countries, the subject gains a profile within UN policies with the introduction of a series of measures to combat “sexual misconduct.” In 2003, the UN finally releases a comprehensive document on the subject, in which it defines the concept of sexual abuse and exploitation to be adopted by the organization. According to the UN concept (United Nations 2003), “sexual abuse” is defined as “the actual or threatened physical intrusion of a sexual nature, whether by force or under unequal or coercive conditions.” Sexual misconduct would include, thus, not only forced sexual relations but also prostitution and the abuse of power by peacekeepers in exchange of sexual favors. It means that the exchange of sex for food or any other items and the exploitation of local prostitution are also considered inappropriate conduct. Many missions, in this sense, simplify the concept by implementing a zero-sex policy on the ground between peacekeepers and their beneficiaries.

This specific understanding of sexual abuse and exploitation designed by the UN derives from the idea that the difference of power and resources between UN personnel and local women would make genuine consent impossible or difficult to discern (Simic 2012), blurring the concept of autonomous choice. Although most scholars and analysts have accepted the idea of inequality of power as an obstacle to sexual autonomy, some authors have claimed that the concept of sexual abuse and exploitation of the UN is not only confusing, but paternalistic and blind to the notion of female agency. Gabrielle Simm, in Sex in Peace Operations (2013), engages with feminist theories to propose that, instead of being completely banned, sex between peacekeepers and local women should be better, more effectively, regulated, in a way that can potentially give more space to female choices and autonomy and to the diversity of sexual relations established between local women and peacekeepers. Olivera Simic, in Regulation of Sexual Conduct in UN Peacekeeping Operations (2012), also proposes a “rethinking” of the concept of sexual abuse and exploitation as defined by the UN, by calling attention to the paternalistic and sexist elements of the zero tolerance policy instituted by the Organization, and by critically engaging in a discussion about the concept of female agency within the context of peacekeeping missions. Despite such criticisms, the UN, and specially the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO), continues to use this umbrella-concept that includes rape, exploitative relations, and prostitution and that sees the power gap between peacekeepers and “beneficiaries” as an obstacle to the possibility of sexual autonomy.

The 2003 document that defined the concept of sexual abuse and exploitation also gave birth to the so-called zero tolerance policy: an assembly of policies implemented by the DPKO and/or suggested to troop-contributing countries in order to strengthen mechanisms of prevention, report and remedial actions. Prevention would be enhanced specially through predeployment, early mission specific induction and mission ongoing training (in the language used by the DPKO) and formulation of awareness campaigns that emphasize peacekeeper’s standards of conduct. The document also highlights the urgent need for the enhancement of safe and efficient mechanisms of allegations for victims, such as hotlines, investigation teams, and Conduct and Discipline Units. In terms of enforcement, prosecution, and remedial action, the resolution suggests a series of possibilities, as the negotiation of a series of agreements between the UN and the DPKO and troop-contributing countries regarding repatriation, financial compensation, and prosecution of peacekeepers in their home countries (given their immunities). Despite the actual implementation of many of these zero-tolerance policies in the last years, the subject of sexual misconduct lost the urgency of 2003 and was rarely discussed in the reports produced either by the DPKO, either by the Secretariat, regarding peace operations.

Actually, accounts of cases of sexual abuse and exploitation by peacekeepers never disappeared from the media. But it is only in 2015 that the issue starts to regain space in UN documents and policies, right around the same time that accounts of cases of sexual violence that included sex with children, gang rape, and exchange of sex for food in the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the Central African Republic (MINUSCA) (see Wolfe 2015; UN News 2016; Sieff 2016. The Washington Post also published a long news story about cases of rape by peacekeepers in Central African Republic) were widely publicized by the international media and by Nongovernmental Organizations (NGOs) such as Human Rights Watch (UN 2016) and Amnesty International (CAR 2015), consolidating the impression that the UN frequently acts in regards to sexual misconduct in a reactive way, through a sort of seasonal policy of damage containment.

Indeed, following the allegations in the MINUSCA, in the year of 2016, several actions were taken in an attempt to prevent more cases of sexual abuse and exploitation: within the space of a few months, Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon appoints a “Special Coordinator on improving the United Nations response to sexual exploitation and abuse,” with the sole function of improving the responses regarding the issue; the Security Council requests legal authorization to repatriate peacekeepers accused, with “sufficient evidence,” of sexual abuse and exploitation; the UN launches a Trust Fund to financially support “victims” of sexual exploitation and abuse; and an online course on prevention of sexual exploitation and abuse is formulated for peacekeepers on the ground. (Timeline on Conduct and Discipline. Conduct in UN Field Missions. Available at <https://conduct.unmissions.org/timeline>) Also, in 2016, the Secretary-General, through his annual report on special measures for protection from sexual exploitation and abuse (General Assembly 2016), publicizes, for the first time, information regarding the nationalities of the perpetrators of the abuses – certainly a breaking point for the UN that was always wary of diplomatic conflicts with troop contributing-countries. According to the data presented by the DPKO, cases of sexual misconduct continue, nevertheless, to occur. (Recent data on sexual misconduct by peacekeepers are made public by the DPKO through the website of Preventing Sexual Exploitation and Abuse. <https://www.un.org/preventing-sexual-exploitation-and-abuse/>)

Despite all the political initiatives implemented by the UN, the general sense among analysts and experts who deal with the subject is that the policies implemented are still deficient in terms of effective prevention and prosecution (Freedman 2018; Neudorfer 2014a; Simm 2013), which should be seen, by the DPKO, as an urgent concern, once sexual misconduct is undoubtedly one of the most damaging unintended consequence within the context of peace operations. First, it is detrimental to the victims in numerous ways:

peacekeepers that engage in those exploitative and abusive sexual relations are exposing women and girls (and ultimately themselves) to the risk of contamination by HIV and other STDs, to the possible marginalization in their own communities, and to further economic dependency. In addition, cases of SEA can represent serious obstacles to the effectiveness of the operations, since they jeopardize the construction of an environment of trust and stability, necessary for state reconstruction and long-lasting peace. Lastly, it erodes international credibility of the mission in place, of the United Nations in general and more specifically of the DPKO vis-à-vis other organizations and troop and resources contributing countries that might doubt the ability of UN peace operations to help countries in need without exacerbating their already complex problems.

Several authors have attempted to envision more effective solutions and ways to prevent cases of sexual misconduct by proposing legal, political, and logistical changes in the local systems of investigation and prosecution, in the immunities granted to peacekeepers, in the training programs offered by the DPKO, and the specific policies regarding sexual misconduct implemented in specific missions. Experts have also systematically tried to emphasize and delineate the most relevant factors in understanding the development of these cases in order to devise more effective strategies. Kelly Neudorfer, in Sexual Exploitation and Abuse in UN Peacekeeping: An Analysis of Risk and Prevention Factors (2014a), analyzes, through a variety of theories of criminology, the most important (political and logistical) contributing factors to sexual abuse and exploitation and which UN policies are most effective in controlling such cases. Neudorfer claims that the implementation of Conduct and Discipline Units (CDU) in missions is “negatively and significantly correlated with the number of SEA allegations” (2014b, p. 623). Deterrence measures, or the certainty of punishment, concludes Neudorfer, are also effective in the reduction of SEA. In Criminalising Peacekeepers: Modernising National Approaches to Sexual Exploitation and Abuse (2017), Melanie O’Brien builds a series of propositions as to how contributing-countries can prosecute, through their domestic laws, their own soldiers for crimes committed abroad. In another work (2011), O'Brien brings the idea that the International Criminal Court could be a third neutral place (besides host-countries and countries of origin of peacekeepers) where these crimes could be prosecuted. As Neudorfer, O'Brien's approach is based on the idea that the change to a more efficient system of prosecution of cases (that could work despite the immunities granted), and of accountability would probably have a positive deterrent effect in medium and long term. Other authors propose a completely new approach to the prevention and prosecution of cases of sexual abuse and exploitation: Freedman (2018), for instance, proposes a "new holistic approach" centered on the victims (instead of on perpetrators), on human rights (rather than state sovereignty), and on truth and reconciliation. This new system, nevertheless, would also be based on more transparent accountability strategies. In this sense, it is possible to realize that the more efficient policies against sexual misconduct are quite clear: transparent rules, effective training of troops, the establishment of properly equipped Conduct and Discipline Units, accountability and the certainty of punishment. The systematic implementation of these strategies requires, nevertheless, political will (by the DPKO and by troop contributing countries) and proper financial resources.

Are "Unintended Consequences" Really Unpredictable?

The literature on UN peace operations, that includes scholars, analysts, and policy-makers from universities, international organizations, NGOs, and many research institutes, include studies on an enormous number of different subjects. In the specific case of academic production, Peace Operations Studies is a highly intersectional field that benefits from theoretical tools and analysis from many academic areas. Despite this fertility, there are visible limitations and unexplored avenues of analysis in the conceptualization, systematic study, and formulation of policies regarding the idea of "unintended consequences" within the context of peace operations. In order to start investigating such analytical absences, it is necessary to uncover some of the political assumptions of the concept itself: seeing certain results of peace operations as unexpected effects takes the focus away from the agency and responsibility of the peace mission, or of the UN, in their occurrence. On the other hand, the concept assumes the ability to prevent, fix, and contain such problems, improving the effectiveness of the present model of peace missions. In other words, fixing the system by which peace operations are implemented is enough to contain those collateral effects. There is a different set of authors, nevertheless, that understands the damaging effects of peace operations not as problems to be studied and fixed, but as symptoms of a wider and deeper question: the adequacy and legitimacy of the liberal model of peace operations purposely implemented by the United Nations, which brings, in its core, completely expected negative effects (Pugh 2000; Newman et al. 2009; Jabri 2010).

These more critical theories on the negative effects of peace missions contribute specially by opening three unexplored lines of analysis: First, they systematically problematize the political and normative assumptions of the contemporary model of peace operations; second, they emphasize the importance of considering individuals and groups (and not just the stability of the state or its government) in the analysis of the success or failure of a mission; and third, they include questions of ethics and normativity in their understanding of the negative effects of operations (versus a more rational approach that tends to see unintended consequences as problems that require specific adjustments). Indeed, several authors have formulated vast critiques (with theoretical and analytical differences nevertheless) regarding the model of peacekeeping and peacebuilding implemented today, with a focus on questions of power and imperialism, the negative effects of these missions over communities, and individuals and the normative and political implications of the contemporary design of peace operations in philosophical, but also political, terms. For instance, in New Perspectives on Liberal Peacebuilding (2009), Newman, Paris, and Richmond claim that contemporary peace operations are based on a monolithic liberal prototype that ignores local specificities and needs. Such one-size-fits-all model, more frequently than not, ends up by reinforcing the levels of poverty and violence in communities and states that the missions were supposed to support. In other words, within this critique, unintended consequences would actually be the expected results of a model that is misguided in its source.

Beyond the discussion regarding the strengths and weaknesses of such literature, these more “critical” readings bring to the forefront fundamental questions regarding unintended consequences that, despite its fundamental importance, remain subanalyzed: How to politically and normatively frame, explain, or read the numerous cases of abuses and misconduct committed by military peacekeepers in UN peace operations? More importantly, how to understand the persistent presence of such occurrences across so many missions? Are these, and other damaging results, a problem of the model itself that consequently needs to be entirely replaced or a fixable and containable issue through the implementation of the right policies? Are unintended consequences really the best concept to understand such negative effects of peace missions given that their occurrence is so systematic that it becomes almost entirely predictable? In this sense, this critical literature regarding UN peace operations is able to reveal important aspects of the normalized political assumptions of these missions, thereby constructing fundamental critiques that should be taken into account by policy makers and scholars, even if the conclusion of such analysis does not support the arguments formulated by such authors.

Summary

Unintended consequences are not only limited to international policies of humanitarian assistance. Damaging unpredicted results – effects that are not predicted nor desired – are also present in the implementation of peacekeeping operations, especially in missions that involve a high number of United Nations (UN) employees and military peacekeepers. Such intricate operations normally take place in the complex and unstable context of contemporary conflicts (or in the immediate post-conflict), in which violence is brutally employed by a plurality of combatant groups within a setting of formal economic failure, illegal financial activities, and deep political divisions. When the goals established in the mandate of an operation are effectively reached, these outcomes end up by creating a positive cyclical system that continually benefits the host-society, as in the connection between democratic institutions and political stability, or economic development and lower levels of violence. In the same way, negative unintended consequences create a chain of harmful events, as in cases of sexual misconduct by military peacekeepers.

The intricate combination between holistic peace operations and contemporary conflicts makes it extremely hard for policy-makers to predict the various consequences a peace operation can have, especially for the so-called host-society. Limiting these collateral results once they are already in place represents an even more challenging task. Political actors have, nevertheless, an incredibly rich source of knowledge in the systematic analysis of past and current peace missions that can, and should, be used in the understanding of relevant predictive factors (for instance, the existence of unequal gender norms) and in the formulation and examination of effective policies to predict and contain such negative effects. For instance, because sexual abuse and exploitation by peacekeepers is such a widespread occurrence across missions, it is possible to perceive numerous relevant correlations that help in the understanding of what incentivizes or contains unintended consequences – such as the negative correlation between awareness campaigns and predeployment training and sexual misconduct – which allow analysts to predict in which cases the occurrence of negative effects is more likely. The careful, focused, and systematic analysis of past and present missions is also useful to measure the effectiveness of a series of policies implemented by the UN throughout the years.

This assembly of useful information, produced by the UN and the DPKO (that could actually improve substantially the collection of data in the field) and by many scholars, is essential in learning how to deal with unexpected negative effects. Nevertheless, policy-makers, especially actors directly involved with the formulation of peace missions, should actively commit to use this important source of knowledge, instead of continuously acting in a reactive and inefficient way. Despite all difficulties regarding the understanding and containment of unintended consequences, it is fundamental that UN diplomats and staff, military representatives and officials, civilian and military peacekeepers, representatives of troop contributing-countries and of donors display genuine political will to effectively deal with the problem, by systematically engaging in initiatives necessary to increase the success rate of UN peace operations. In this sense, policy-makers responsible for peace operations should (again, through the invaluable source of knowledge the analysis of current and past operations represent):

1. Be always conscious, during the formulation of a mission, that unintended consequences are not an exception to the rule, given the complexity today's conflicts and peace missions, requiring policy-makers to predict possible unexpected scenarios and to devise ways to prevent it.
2. Fully understand the damaging effects unintended consequences can potentially have on the host-society and for the accomplishment of the mission's goals once they occur, and how it can spiral to other spheres of society.
3. Identify the most likely unintended consequences in a certain setting before the deployment of a mission and formulate specific policies or strategies to prevent them.
4. Once these negative effects are in place, military and civilian policy-makers must employ (preferably pre-design) ways to contain, or at least soften, these damaging consequences before they spiral into an uncontrollable situation that could hinder the construction of sustainable peace and further harm populations that already have to endure unprecedented levels of violence.

These political initiatives are essential to the survival and success of UN peace operations, to the construction of local support, to regional and international stability, and especially to the wellbeing of the individuals and communities that suffer the most with widespread violence and high levels of violations of human rights so typical of contemporary conflicts. Unintended consequences are certainly not included in the goals of a certain policy or mandate, but they should never come as a surprise: in a time in which United Nations missions are deployed primarily to highly complex and violent contexts, it is time for the organization to focus on past and current operations in order to formulate, test, and systematize effective policies to prevent and contain unintended consequences.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Liberal Peace in Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding

References

- Allred, K. (2006). Peacekeepers and prostitutes: How deployed forces fuel the demand for trafficked women and new hope for stopping it. Armed Forces and Society, 33(5), 5–23.
- Anderson, M. (1999). Do no harm: How aid can support peace or war. Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Aoi, C., Coning, C., & Thakur, R. (Eds.). (2007). Unintended consequences of peacekeeping operations. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Bellamy, A., Williams, P., & Griffin, S. (Eds.). (2004). Understanding peacekeeping. Malden: Polity Press.
- CAR. (2015, August 11). UN troops implicated in rape of girl and indiscriminate killings must be investigated. Amnesty International. Retrieved from <https://www.amnesty.org/en/latest/news/2015/08/car-un-troops-implicated-in-rape-of-girl-and-indiscriminate-killings-must-be-investigated/>
- Doyle, M., & Sambanis, N. (2006). Making war and building peace: United Nations peace operations. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- DPKO. (2012). United Nations peace operations: Year in review – 2012. Retrieved from <http://www.un.org/en/peacekeeping/publications/yir/yir2012.pdf>

- Duffield, M. (2001). Global governance and the new wars: The merging of development and security. London: Zed Books.
- Freedman, R. (2018). UNaccountable: A new approach to peacekeepers and sexual abuse. European Journal of International Law, 29(3), 961–985.
- General Assembly. (1996, August 16). Report of the expert of the Secretary-General, Ms. Graça Machel. Document number A/51/306.
- General Assembly. (2016, February 16). Special measure for protection from sexual exploitation and abuse: Report of the Secretary General. Document number A/70/729.
- Hoffman, F. (2007). Conflict in the 21st century; The rise of hybrid wars. Arlington: Potomac Institute for Policy Studies.
- Jabri, V. (2010). War, government, politics: A critical response to the hegemony of the liberal peace. In O. Richmond (Ed.), Advances in peacebuilding. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kaldor, M. (2007). New and old wars: Organized violence in a global era (3rd ed.). Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Kaldor, M. (2013). In defense of new wars. Stability: International Journal of Security and Development, 2(1), Art. 4.
- Keen, D. (2008). Complex emergencies. Malden: Polity Press.
- Keen, D. (2012). Useful enemies: When waging wars is more important than winning them. New Haven: Yale University Press.
- Neudorfer, K. (2014a). Sexual exploitation and abuse in UN peacekeeping: An analysis of risk and prevention factors. Lexington: Lexington Books.
- Neudorfer, K. (2014b). Reducing sexual exploitation and abuse: Does deterrence work to prevent SEAs in UN peacekeeping missions? International Peacekeeping, 21(5), 623–641.
- Newman, E., Paris, R., & Richmond, O. (2009). New perspectives on liberal peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations University Press.
- Nielsen, R. A., et al. (2011). Foreign aid shocks as a cause of violent armed conflict. American Journal of Political Science, 55(2), 219–232.
- O'Brien, M. (2011). Sexual exploitation and beyond: Using the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court to prosecute UN peacekeepers for gender-based crimes. International Criminal Law Review, 11(4), 803–827.
- O'Brien, M. (2017). Criminalising peacekeepers: Modernising national approaches to sexual exploitation and abuse. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Pallen, D. (2003). Sexual slavery in Bosnia: The negative externality of the market for peace. Swords & Ploughshares, 13(1), 27–43, Spring.
- Polman, L. (2010). The crisis caravan. What's wrong with humanitarian aid? New York: Metropolitan Books.
- PRIO. (2016). Conflict recurrence. In Conflict trends. Retrieved from <https://www.prio.org/utility/DownloadFile.ashx?id=9&type=publicationfile>
- Pugh, M. (2000). Regeneration of war-torn societies. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Sieff, K. (2016, February 27). Sometimes when I'm alone with my baby I think about killing him. He reminds me of the man who raped me. Retrieved from https://www.washingtonpost.com/sf/world/2016/02/27/peacekeepers/?utm_term=.0994f2ccc6ed
- Simic, O. (2012). Regulation of sexual conduct in UN peacekeeping operations. Berlin: Springer.
- Simm, G. (2013). Sex in peace operations. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Tripodi, P., & Patel, P. (2002). The global impact of HIV/AIDS on peace support operations. International Peacekeeping, 9(3), 51–66.
- UN. (2016, March 04). Stop sexual abuse by peacekeepers. Human Rights Watch. Retrieved from <https://www.hrw.org/news/2016/03/04/un-stop-sexual-abuse-peacekeepers>
- UN News. (2016, July 06). Reports of sexual abuse by peacekeepers 'shocked' UN in CAR. Retrieved from <https://news.un.org/en/audio/2017/07/630242>
- United Nations. (2003, October 09). Secretary-General's Bulletin. Special measure for protection from sexual exploitation and abuse. Document number ST/SGB/2003/13.
- Wolfe, L. (2015, August 13). The U.N. is not serious about its peacekeeper rape problem. Foreign Affairs. Retrieved from <https://foreignpolicy.com/2015/08/13/bangui-un-car-minusca-sexual-violence-rape/>

United Kingdom

► Reconciliation in Northern Ireland

United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK)

Robert Muharremi
Public Policy and Governance, Rochester Institute of Technology – Kosovo Campus, Prishtina, Kosovo

Definition

UNMIK, established on 10 June 1999, is a subsidiary body of the UN Security Council established by UN Security Council Resolution 1244 (1999) (Resolution 1244) under Chapter VII of the UN Charter. Pursuant to Resolution 1244, UNMIK has the mandate to provide an interim administration for Kosovo until an agreement is reached on its political status.

UNMIK, together with the United Nations Transitional Administration in East Timor (UNTAET), were the first UN missions vested with full executive and legislative authority for the administration of state territory (Stahn 2001). As noted by Stahn (2001), “the scope and depth of the mandate, vesting the United Nations with the task of acting fully as an interim government for a war-torn society, marks a novelty in the history of United Nations peacekeeping.” In addition to territorial administration in form of an interim government, both UNMIK and UNTAET were responsible for preparing and facilitating a political settlement of the international legal status of the territory under their administration (Stahn 2001). This form of territorial administration is different from the mandate system under the League of Nations and the United Nations Trusteeship system as territorial administration under Chapter VII of the UN Charter is an instrument of “conflict resolution for the maintenance of international peace and security” (Stahn 2001). Territorial administration also differs from state-building and military occupation. According to Caplan (2005), “state-building refers to efforts to reconstruct, or in some cases to establish for the first time, effective and autonomous structures of governance in a state or territory where no such capacity exists or where it has been seriously eroded.” While in Kosovo territorial administration included state-building, this is not always the case, such as the interim administration of Eastern Slavonia (Caplan 2005). Military occupation means the occupation of the territory of a sovereign state without the consent of the “host” state, while UN territorial administration is based on an authorization under the UN Charter (Caplan 2005).

Introduction

The United Nations (UN) Security Council established the United Nations Interim

Administration Mission in Kosovo (UNMIK) in 1999. UNMIK is one of the largest UN missions entrusted with the administration of a territory. Despite Kosovo’s declaration of independence in 2008, UNMIK still maintains a presence in Kosovo with limited administrative capacity and increasing demands by Kosovo’s government and other international actors to end its mission.

The following will outline the background to the Kosovo conflict, which led to the establishment of UNMIK. It will also discuss the structure of UNMIK and how it evolved to ensure first of all self-government for Kosovo under UN authority and then to adjust to Kosovo’s unilateral declaration of independence in 2008, as the Security Council failed to endorse the Comprehensive Proposal for a Kosovo Status Settlement, which recommended (temporarily supervised) independence for Kosovo. The political impact of UNMIK as well as current problems associated with UNMIK’s role and function in Kosovo, which does not recognize UNMIK’s exclusive legislative and executive mandate, will also be addressed.

Key Issues

Background to the Kosovo Conflict

The Kosovo conflict is a conflict between Albanians and Serbs about sovereignty over Kosovo (Visoka 2017). While Kosovo claims independence from Serbia, Serbia still considers Kosovo to be part of its territory. Kosovo has significant symbolic meaning for Albanians and Serbs. Serbs see Kosovo as the cradle of their culture and nation. The Battle of Kosovo (1389) is a key element of the Serb national narrative, which forms the core of the Serb national identity (Friedrich 2005). For Albanians, Kosovo is associated with the anti-Ottoman movement of the League of Prizren (1878), which set the national foundations for Albania’s liberation from the Ottoman Empire. While Albania became independent in 1912, Kosovo, which at that time had a significant Albanian population, remained under the Kingdom of Serbia (1912), which in 1918 changed to the Kingdom of Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes. Following World War II, Kosovo remained part of Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (SFRY). The SFRY was composed of six Republics (Slovenia, Croatia, Serbia, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Montenegro and Macedonia) and two autonomous provinces (Vojvodina and Kosovo), which were formally part of the Republic of Serbia. Under the 1974 SFRY Constitution, Kosovo obtained a very high degree of autonomy, with its own government institutions, the authority to pass legislation, to adopt and change its own constitution, and to be represented in the federal organs of the SFRY (Malcolm 1999).

During the 1980s, following the death of SFRY leader Josip Broz Tito, nationalist sentiments and political tensions increased throughout the SFRY (Malcolm 1999). In 1989 Serbia suspended the autonomy of Kosovo in view of growing tensions between Albanians and Serbs. In reaction to that, the Albanian members of the Kosovo parliament declared in 1990 Kosovo as an independent Republic within the SFRY. In response, Serbia dissolved Kosovo's parliament and government and established direct rule over it. In 1991, a parallel Assembly of Kosovo declared the independence of the Republic of Kosovo, which established a government in exile and a parallel health and school system in Kosovo (Malcolm 1999; Glenny 1999; Petritsch et al. 1999; Visoka 2018). The early 1990's were characterized by a peaceful Albanian resistance movement against Serbia's direct rule. During this time, Albanians were subjected to a systematic denial of their basic human rights, including discrimination, exclusion from the legislative, administrative and judicial branches of government, summary executions, acts of violence and arbitrary arrests, discriminatory dismissals from public institutions, and the banning of the use of the Albanian language (General Assembly 1995).

The continuing repression of Kosovo Albanians and disappointment that the Dayton Accords (1995) did not address the Kosovo problem triggered an armed resistance which culminated in the creation of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA). As of 1998, clashes between Serb forces and the KLA intensified, and Serbia's attempts to oust the KLA led to expulsion, killings of civilians, and destruction of private property.

The Rambouillet Accords of February 1999, facilitated by the United States and European countries, proposed an interim democratic self-government of Kosovo within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (the SFRY ceased to exist in 1992 and Serbia and Montenegro formed the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia). Kosovo would have the option to hold a referendum for a final settlement of Kosovo's status and Serb forces in Kosovo would be replaced by an international military force (Muharremi 2008). The Rambouillet Accords were accepted by the Albanians but were rejected by Serbia. Following increased armed conflict and ethnic cleansing after the failure of the Rambouillet Accords, NATO started on 24 March 1999 a military air campaign against the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) (Weller 2009).

On 2 June 1999, FRY agreed to the withdrawal from Kosovo of all military, police, and paramilitary forces and the deployment of international civil and security presences under the authority of the UN. This agreement was endorsed by the Security Council on 10 June 1999 in form of Resolution 1244.

UNMIK's Mandate

Resolution 1244 established an international civil presence and an international military presence in Kosovo.

The international security presence is the NATO led Kosovo Force (KFOR). Its mandate is to:

- Deter renewed hostilities and ensure the withdrawal and preventing the return into Kosovo of Federal and Republic military, police, and paramilitary forces
- Demilitarize the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups
- Establish a secure environment and public safety in Kosovo
- Supervise demining, conduct border monitoring, and ensure the protection and freedom of movement of the international civil presence

The international civil presence, known as UNMIK, operates under the authority of the Secretary-General, who is represented in Kosovo by a Special Representative (SRSG). UNMIK's mandate under Resolution 1244 is:

to provide an interim administration for Kosovo under which the people of Kosovo can enjoy substantial autonomy within the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, and which will provide transitional administration while establishing and overseeing the development of provisional democratic self-governing institutions to ensure conditions for a peaceful and normal life for all inhabitants of Kosovo. (United Nations Security Council 1999)

Resolution 1244 includes a roadmap for the implementation of UNMIK's mandate. UNMIK would initially perform basic civilian administrative functions, including police and justice, and in parallel organize and oversee the development of provisional institutions for democratic and autonomous self-government pending a political settlement. Once the provisional institutions were established, UNMIK would transfer its administrative responsibilities to these institutions and then facilitate a political process to determine Kosovo's future status. In a final stage, UNMIK would oversee the transfer of authority from Kosovo's provisional institutions to the institutions established under a political settlement. UNMIK would have no role in determining the political status of Kosovo.

UNMIK was initially organized in four pillars, each of them headed by a specific international organization responsible to the Secretary-General:

- Pillar I (humanitarian assistance): (Lead agency: United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR))
- Pillar II (civil administration): (Lead agency: United Nations – Department of Peacekeeping Operations (UN DPKO))
- Pillar III (elections): (Lead agency: Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE))
- Pillar IV (economic reconstruction): (Lead agency: European Union (EU))

The pillar structure remained in place until Kosovo's declaration of independence, with the exception that Pillar (I) was transferred to the UN with responsibility for police and justice.

UNMIK's mandate for the administration of Kosovo is considered extensive. All legislative and executive authority with respect to Kosovo, including the administration of the judiciary, is vested in UNMIK and exercised by the SRSG (UNMIK Regulation 1999/1). UNMIK is responsible for the administration of movable and immovable state and socially owned property. UNMIK is authorized to issue legislative acts in the form of regulations, which prevail over any other law in Kosovo (UNMIK Regulation 1999/1).

UNMIK initially determined that the law applicable in Kosovo, except of UNMIK regulations, would be the laws, which were applicable in the territory of Kosovo prior to 24 March 1999 (UNMIK Regulation 1999/1). Due to resistance by Albanian judges and prosecutors, UNMIK determined that the law applicable would be the law in force in Kosovo on 22 March 1989 (UNMIK Regulation 1999/24), i.e., the law in force prior to the suspension of Kosovo's autonomy and which. This meant a return to the laws of the socialist Yugoslav system that existed at that time. The laws adopted between 1989 and 1999 could be applied if a subject matter was not regulated by the laws of 1989 and the law was in accordance with international human rights standards. UNMIK created a complex legal system composed of UNMIK regulations and former Yugoslav laws, which very often caused legal uncertainty and confusion. Between 1999 and 2008, UNMIK adopted more than 440 regulations transforming the entire institutional and legal framework of Kosovo with a view to transitioning Kosovo from a socialist to a liberal-democratic regime.

Kosovo's Self-Government Under UNMIK

Between June 1999 and January 2000, UNMIK's priority was to deploy as a mission, to gradually establish control over Kosovo and to disintegrate parallel government structures, such as the "Provisional Government of Kosovo" and "Presidency of the Republic of Kosovo," which had emerged during the armed conflict and which claimed to be the legitimate government of Kosovo.

In January 2000, UNMIK established the Joint Interim Administrative Structure (JIAS) to dissolve the parallel government structures and to allow for an inclusive representation of all Kosovo political forces in governance structures that operate under UNMIK's authority. The JIAS was composed of a Kosovo Transitional Council (KTC) and an Interim Administrative Council (IAC). The KTC, which reflected Kosovo's ethnic composition, had a consultative function, while the IAC was responsible for making policy and legislative recommendations to the SRSG. The IAC was composed of the four international pillar heads and four Kosovo representatives. UNMIK also established administrative departments which were led by one international and one local head and which were responsible to the IAC. The entire JIAS structure operated under the authority of the SRSG who remained the final political and legislative authority.

In 2001 UNMIK adopted the Constitutional Framework for Provisional Self-Government (UNMIK Regulation 2001/9) which established the Provisional Institutions of Self-Government (PISG) for democratic and autonomous self-government pending a political settlement as required by Resolution 1244. The governance structure of the Constitutional Framework remained in place until 2008 when Kosovo declared independence from former Yugoslavia.

The PISG included the:

- Assembly
- President of Kosovo
- Government
- Courts
- Other bodies and institutions established by the Constitutional Framework

The Constitutional Framework defined Kosovo as an entity under interim international administration which has unique historical, legal, cultural, and linguistic attributes. Kosovo would be governed democratically through legislative, executive, and judicial bodies, and institutions in accordance with the Constitutional Framework and Resolution 1244.

The Constitutional Framework very clearly established that the PISG functioned under the authority of UNMIK. Certain government responsibilities were transferred to the PISG, such as economic and financial policy; education, science, and technology; youth and sport; culture; health; environmental protection; labor; and social welfare. The Government and Assembly as part of the PISG could prepare laws in the area of transferred responsibilities but their entry into force was subject to approval and promulgation by UNMIK. UNMIK's powers included so-called "reserved powers," such as the final approval of the Kosovo budget, monetary policy, appointment of judges and prosecutors, police, Kosovo Protection Corps (a civilian emergency preparedness organization), foreign relations and international agreements, and state and socially owned property and enterprises. UNMIK's powers included the authority to dissolve the Assembly if it acted in violation of Resolution 1244 or the Constitutional Framework. UNMIK could also amend the Constitutional Framework at any time and without the consent of the PISG. UNMIK also appointed the local judges and prosecutors to Kosovo's new court and prosecutorial system, and established hybrid tribunals for the prosecution and adjudication of international and serious crimes. A special chamber of the Supreme Court of Kosovo to decide cases related to the privatization process was established where international judges were in majority.

The Constitutional Framework established a legal mechanism for the protection of human rights and minority rights. The PISG was required to respect certain international human rights instruments, even though Kosovo was not formally party to them, such as the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms.

The PISG were required to respect the European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages and the Council of Europe's Framework Convention for the Protection of National Minorities. The Constitutional Framework avoided the term "minorities" and instead used the term "communities," which was defined as "inhabitants belonging to the same ethnic or religious or linguistic group." Communities included not only minorities living in Kosovo but extended also to the majority Albanian population. All communities had certain rights to preserve, protect, and express their ethnic, cultural, religious, and linguistic identities. These rights included the right to use of their language and alphabets, to receive education in their own language, to enjoy access to information in their own language, to enjoy equal opportunity with respect to employment in public bodies, to provide schooling in their own language and alphabet, and to operate religious institutions.

Despite the transfer of responsibilities from UNMIK to the PISG, the status issue remained unaddressed. In December 2003, the Security Council adopted a “Standards for Kosovo” policy. Under this policy, the PISG had to achieve certain standards before final status of Kosovo could be addressed (Security Council 2003). The eight standards under the policy were functioning democratic institutions, rule of law, freedom of movement, returns and reintegration, economy, property rights, dialogue with Belgrade, and the Kosovo Protection Corps. A review mechanism co-chaired by UNMIK and the PISG would review the PISG’s progress under the eight standards, set benchmarks, and specific policy measures to be taken before talks on the political status of Kosovo could be opened (Secretary-General 2004).

UNMIK and Kosovo’s Declaration of Independence

The March 2004 riots in Kosovo showed that the unresolved status question was causing frustration among Kosovo’s communities and that there was a growing risk of inter-ethnic violence (Vrieze 2004). Following completion of a “standards before status” process, the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General, Kai Eide, concluded in 2005 that the circumstances were established to begin a political process for determining Kosovo’s status. In November 2005, the Secretary-General appointed Martti Ahtisaari, former President of Finland, as his Special Envoy to facilitate talks between Kosovo and Serbia. The appointment was endorsed by the Security Council (International Court of Justice 2010) and the Contact Group (an informal grouping of States formed in 1994 to address the situation in the Balkans and composed of France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, and the United States).

Between February and September 2006, Ahtisaari facilitated several rounds of negotiations, but no agreement could be reached. In February 2007, Ahtisaari submitted a draft Comprehensive Proposal for the Kosovo Status Settlement (the “Proposal”) to Kosovo and Serbia. In March 2007, a final round of negotiations was held in Vienna to discuss the Proposal, but no agreement was reached. On 26 March 2007, the Secretary-General submitted the Proposal to the Security Council.

The Proposal provided that that “the only viable option for Kosovo is independence, to be supervised for an initial period by the international community.” A return of Kosovo to Serbia would not be a feasible option as Serbia had irreversibly lost control of Kosovo as a result of years of separate governance since 1999. A continued administration by UNMIK would also not be a realistic option. However, to ensure that an independent Kosovo would respect the interests of its minority communities, especially the Serb community, the Proposal provided for robust constitutional and legal safeguards for the protection of such minorities, including community rights, decentralization, and the protection of religious institutions. Kosovo would be supervised by an International Civilian Representative (ICR), who would have the final authority in Kosovo regarding the interpretation and implementation of the Proposal. The ICR would be responsible to an International Steering Group (composed of France, Germany, Italy, the Russian Federation, the United Kingdom, the United States, the European Union, and NATO). The Proposal provided for an expiry of UNMIK’s mandate after a transition period, after which all legislative and executive authority vested in UNMIK would be transferred to the governing authorities of Kosovo (International Court of Justice 2010).

A draft resolution sponsored by Belgium, France, Germany, Italy, the United Kingdom, and the United States endorsing the Proposal was withdrawn when it became clear that it would not be adopted by the Security Council due to Russia's and China's threat with a veto.

Between August and December 2007, a Troika comprising representatives of the European Union, the Russian Federation and the United States held further negotiations on the status of Kosovo. In December 2007, the Troika reported to the Secretary-General that "the parties were unable to reach an agreement on Kosovo's status" and none of them "was willing to yield on the basic question of sovereignty" (International Court of Justice 2010).

In view of the failure of the Security Council to endorse the Proposal, Kosovo declared independence on 17 February 2008. The declaration of independence was coordinated with the United States and most of the EU member states, which immediately extended recognition to Kosovo (Weller 2009; Gow 2009). In its declaration of independence, Kosovo unilaterally accepted all obligations contained in the Proposal, including an international supervision. Kosovo also accepted the deployment of an EU rule of law mission (EULEX) as well as KFOR to continue with its mandate as set out in Resolution 1244. The Declaration of Independence did not provide for any authority for UNMIK. The states that initially recognized Kosovo formed an International Steering Group (ISG) as required by the Proposal and appointed an International Civilian Representative (ICR) with the powers set out in the Proposal.

In June 2008, the Secretary-General announced that UNMIK would continue implementing Resolution 1244 subject to a major reconfiguration. EULEX would be included under Resolution 1244 and UNMIK's administrative functions would be significantly reduced. The Secretary-General acknowledged that Kosovo's declaration of independence had created a new reality on the ground and that the UN would follow a status-neutral approach in view of implementing its mandate under Resolution 1244. UNMIK would hereafter focus on:

- Monitoring and reporting
- Facilitating international agreements for Kosovo
- Facilitating dialogue between Pristina and Belgrade (Security Council Report 2008)

UNMIK continued to exercise some governmental functions, primarily in Serb majority areas, but over time UNMIK was marginalized as an administrative authority, especially since the end of supervised independence in 2012. Kosovo's government institutions do not recognize UNMIK as a lawful and legitimate authority and cooperation is reduced to a minimum and where necessary, such as cooperation with INTERPOL, where Kosovo is still represented by UNMIK. For Serbia, which does not recognize the Republic of Kosovo, UNMIK is still the administrative authority in Kosovo.

The Advisory Opinion of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) of 2010 confirmed that despite Kosovo's declaration of independence, Resolution 1244 would remain in force (International Court of Justice 2010). However, Kosovo's declaration of independence would not be in violation of international law, as neither general international law nor Resolution 1244 prohibited such declaration. The ICJ remained silent on questions regarding self-determination of peoples, remedial secession, and whether Kosovo was a state (Muharremi 2010). The ICJ interpretation allowed for the existence of two parallel legal systems in respect of Kosovo, one under Resolution 1244 and other under the Constitution of the Republic of Kosovo, which operates outside the framework of Resolution 1244.

As of 2018, the United States and the United Kingdom increasingly insist in closing down UNMIK, while Russia and China still demand its continuation. In 2019, Kosovo's Ambassador to the United States stated in the Security Council that "UNMIK has no role and no longer has a mandate in Kosovo" (United Nations 2019). The arrest of an UNMIK official in 2019 for allegedly hindering a Kosovo police operation in a Serb majority area further increased tensions between Kosovo and UNMIK.

Assessing the Effectiveness and Impact of Transitional Administration

International Territorial Administration

UNMIK and UNTAET, the UN's administration mission in East Timor, are the largest UN missions so far entrusted with the administration of a territory (Wilde 2000). Since UN missions were usually limited to peacekeeping operations, the administration of a territory is a novelty (Yannis 2004). Territorial administration is covered by Chapter VII of the UN Charter. It is generally accepted that Chapter VII provides a legal basis for a territorial administration by the UN (Friedrich 2005). The argument in support of this interpretation is that the term "peace" in Article 39 UN Charter includes the establishment of long-term and sustainable peace and is not limited to absence of violence (Friedrich 2005). To the extent that territorial administration is necessary to fulfill this task, the Security Council has the power to authorize such administrations (Friedrich 2005).

UNMIK's Political Impact

UNMIK's main challenge was to operate under conditions of political uncertainty. On the one hand, UNMIK had to govern Kosovo, to establish institutions and make reforms for the development of the country. On the other hand, UNMIK had to make sure that governing and reforming Kosovo would not violate Serbia's sovereignty. A continuous political balancing act was required and involved numerous local international actors, which added to the complexity of the policy environment within which UNMIK operated. Very often, individual states tried to use UNMIK and other international organizations involved in the administration of Kosovo to further their political interests at the expense of a coordinated international approach (Eckhard and Dijkstra 2017). According to Visoka (2017, p. 38), "UNMIK did not have a clear and consistent policy of peace-building in Kosovo". UNMIK was caught between "Kosovo Albanian claims for independent statehood and Serbian aims at preventing independence" (Visoka 2017, p. 38). As a result, "UNMIK chose a policy of incremental improvisation that was guided not by rational policy-making or the political will of Kosovo citizens, but by the interests of major powers and an international agenda of peacebuilding and state-building" (Visoka 2017, p. 38).

Despite such complex circumstances, UNMIK incrementally changed Kosovo's legal and institutional framework so fundamentally that over time Kosovo's governance institutions became fully separated and different from Serbia. The changes made by UNMIK to Kosovo's governance system were so profound that Ahtisaari concluded that Serbia's loss of factual control over Kosovo was irreversible. It was therefore UNMIK which, from an institutional perspective, created the conditions for Kosovo's independence.

Regardless of large international support and direct international administration, Kosovo is still plagued by weak governance, rule of law and economic development. With a population of around 1.8 million, Kosovo has a GDP per capita of 3877 US$ (2017), one of the lowest in Europe, and an unemployment rate of 29% (2019), the highest in the Western Balkans. Kosovo's economy is characterized by a persistent trade deficit, a weak production base, informal economy, and reliance on remittances. According to Capussela (2015, p. 12), "after the 1999 conflict Kosovo received from the international community 50 times more peacekeeping troops and 25 times more funds than Afghanistan did after the 2001 war." The EU alone has provided more than 4 billion EUR in aid, which is the largest annual per capita contribution ever provided to a third country (Capussela 2015). However, a large amount of the financial assistance to Kosovo was diverted outside Kosovo to finance international consultancy firms employed by international organizations involved in the administration of Kosovo, including for the purchase of goods and services outside of Kosovo.

A key point of criticism is that the present situation in Kosovo is considerably the result of the institutions that UNMIK established and which were perpetuated by Kosovo after independence. Lack of cultural sensitivity when designing policies and institutions (Lemay-Hebert 2009); neglect of law enforcement and arrangements with and empowerment of local strongmen to main peace and order in return for impunity, diverging interests of different countries, which were involved in the design of UNMIK's policies; and limited accountability of UNMIK are seen as the main shortcomings of UNMIK, which have contributed to the creation of weak institutions (Capussela 2015). The institutions created by UNMIK, which reflected particular historical contingencies at the time, led to a path dependency that still influences governance in Kosovo (Capussela 2015), which is still far from sustainable peace (Visoka and Richmond 2017).

UNMIK Accountability and Human Rights

While Resolution 1244 vests in UNMIK the authority of a government, UNMIK is continuously criticized for lack of accountability (Benedek 2015), especially for human rights violations in the course of the exercise of its administrative authority. A Human Rights Advisory Panel, established by UNMIK, determined that UNMIK had violated human rights, including the right to life, when it failed to provide safe shelter to displaced Roma families (Human Rights Advisory Panel 2016). UNMIK had knowingly kept the Roma families on contaminated soil which had led to serious health damage and the death of a Roma child. Despite the determination of the Human Rights Advisory Panel, the UN still refuses to pay compensation to the victims. Due to UN having immunity under international law and Kosovo law, the victims cannot claim compensation before regular courts and have no other access to legal remedies. In 2017 the UN established a voluntary Trust Fund that would fund projects which address specific health and educational needs of individual victims and their families but it would not include the compensation of victims (Rudic 2019). The Fund has so far received no contributions from any country (Rudic 2019).

Other complaints against UNMIK about human rights violations include arbitrary detention, sexual and other criminal misconduct, and failure to protect minorities (Human Rights Watch 2007). A lack of independent mechanisms for oversight of UNMIK is a key point of criticism (Human Rights Watch 2007). UNMIK's internal oversight structures would be dysfunctional as they would either not perform their function or have too limited jurisdiction to provide for effective legal remedies (Human Rights Watch 2007).

The absence of effective accountability would damage the reputation and legitimacy of international territorial administration (Visoka 2012; Human Rights Watch 2007).

Summary

While territorial administration by the UN is a legitimate instrument for the maintenance international peace and security, the main challenges are related to its implementation and how to avoid unintended negative consequences which may adversely affect the future development of the territory under the UN's administration. Separating the administrative aspects from the political, as was the case with UNMIK, is not a viable option, since administrative decisions have political consequences and lasting effects. Different and uncoordinated, and very often competitive, national interests pursued by UN member states under the cloak of an international mission compromise the effectiveness and legitimacy of such UN missions. UN missions must also address criticism related to lack of effective accountability mechanisms and compromise solutions with powerful local actors, which seem to bring stability in the short term but harm the long-term development of the territory and the prospects of its people to establish good governance.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Great Power Involvement in Peace Operations
- ▶ NATO's Approach to Peace Operations and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peacemaking and Peace Agreements on Kosovo

References

- Benedek, W. (2015). Kosovo – UNMIK accountability: Human Rights Advisory Panel finds discrimination in privatization cases. Austrian Law Journal, 2(2), 277–284.

- Caplan, R. (2005). International governance of war-torn territories. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Capussela, A. (2015). State-building in Kosovo. London/ New York: I.B. Tauris.
- Eckhard, S., & Dijkstra, H. (2017). Contested implementation: The unilateral influence of member states on peacebuilding policy in Kosovo. Global Policy, 8(5), 102–112.
- Friedrich, J. (2005). UNMIK in Kosovo: Struggling with uncertainty. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 9, 225–293.
- General Assembly. (1995). Situation of human rights in Kosovo (A/RES/50/190). <https://www.un.org/documents/ga/res/50/a50r190.htm>
- Glenny, M. (1999). The Balkans. New York: Viking Penguin.
- Gow, J. (2009). Kosovo – The final frontier? From transitional administration to transitional statehood. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 3(2), 239–257.
- Human Rights Advisory Panel. (2016). N.M. and Others v. UNMIK, Case No. 26/08. <http://www.unmikonline.org/hrap/Eng/Cases%20Eng/26-08%20NM%20etal%20Opinion%20FINAL%2026feb16.pdf>
- Human Rights Watch. (2007). Better late than never – Enhancing the accountability of international institutions in Kosovo. <https://www.hrw.org/report/2007/06/14/better-late-never/enhancing-accountability-international-institutions-kosovo>
- International Court of Justice. (2010). Advisory opinion of 22 July 2010. <https://www.icj-cij.org/files/case-related/141/141-20100722-ADV-01-00-EN.pdf>
- Lemay-Hebert, N. (2009). State-building from the outside-in: UNMIK and its paradox. Journal of Public and International Affairs, 20, 65–86.
- Malcolm, N. (1999). Kosovo: A short history. New York: University Press.
- Muharremi, R. (2008). Kosovo's declaration of independence: Self-determination and sovereignty revisited. Review of Central and East European Law, 33, 401–435.
- Muharremi, R. (2010). A note on the ICJ advisory opinion. German Law Journal, 11(8), 867–880.
- Petritsch, W., Kaser, K., & Pichler, R. (1999). Kosovo – Kosova – Mythen, Daten, Fakten. Klagenfurt/Celovec: Wieser Verlag.
- Rudic, F. (2019). UN fund for Kosovo poisoning victims receives no contributions. <https://balkaninsight.com/2019/02/01/un-fund-for-kosovo-poisoning-victims-receives-no-contributions-02-01-2019/>
- Secretary-General. (2004). Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo of 26 January 2004. <https://undocs.org/S/2004/71>
- Security Council. (2003). Presidential statement of 12 December 2003. <https://www.un.org/press/en/2003/sc7951.doc.htm>
- Security Council Report. (2008). Update report no. 5: Kosovo. https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/update-report/lookup_c_glkwlemtisg_b_4201481.php
- Stahn, C. (2001). The United Nations transitional administrations in Kosovo and East Timor: A first analysis. Max Planck Yearbook of United Nations Law, 5, 105–183.
- United Nations. (2019). Antagonistic gestures, accusations prevailing over efforts to resume Kosovo talks, Special Representative tells Security Council. <https://www.un.org/press/en/2019/sc13693.doc.htm>
- United Nations Security Council. (1999). Resolution 1244 (1999). https://peacemaker.un.org/sites/peacemaker.un.org/files/990610_SCR1244%281999%29.pdf
- Visoka, G. (2012). The 'Kafkaesque accountability' of international governance in Kosovo. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 6(2), 189–212.
- Visoka, G. (2017). Shaping peace in Kosovo: The politics of peacebuilding and statehood. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Visoka, G. (2018). Acting like a state. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Visoka, G., & Richmond, O. (2017). After liberal peace? From failed state-building to an emancipatory peace in Kosovo. International Studies Perspectives, 18(1), 110–129.
- Vrieze, F. (2004). Kosovo after the March 2004 crisis. Helsinki Monitor, 15(3), 147–159.
- Weller, M. (2009). Contested statehood: Kosovo's struggle for independence. Oxford: Oxford University.
- Wilde, R. (2000). From Bosnia to Kosovo and East Timor: The changing role of the United Nations in the administration of territory. ISLA Journal of International and Comparative Law, 6, 467–471.
- Yannis, A. (2004). The UN as government in Kosovo. Global Governance, 10, 67–81.

United Nations Missions in Haiti

Athena R. Kolbe

School of Social Work, College of Health and Human Services, University of North Carolina Wilmington, Wilmington, NC, USA

Synonyms

MINUJUSTH; MINUSTAH; MIPONUH; UNMIH; UNSMIH; UNTMIH

The author would like to disclose a potential conflict of interest. Between 2010 and 2016 the author led and consulted on a number of research projects in Haiti, which received funding from United Nations missions in Haiti and/or from United Nations agencies.

Correspondence concerning this article should be addressed to: Athena R. Kolbe, University of North Carolina Wilmington, 601 S. College Rd., Wilmington, NC 28403; email: kolbea@uncw.edu

Definition

The United Nations missions in Haiti generally refer to the six peacekeeping missions following the country's rocky transition to democracy in the early 1990s through the conclusion of the most recent mission in October 2019. These include: (1) the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) which operated from 1993 to 1996; (2) the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) which was open for 1 year ending July 1997; (3) the United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH) which was open from August to November 1997; (4) the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH) from 1997 to 2000; (5) the United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH) from 2004 to 2017; and (6) the United Nations Mission for Justice Support in Haiti (MINUJUSTH) from 2017 to 2019 (see Fig. 1).

Concurrent with the early peacekeeping missions was the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH), a joint operation of the United Nations and the Organization of American States created in 1993 to monitor and promote human rights and support efforts to build and expand democratic institutions in the country. MICIVIH was succeeded by the International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti (MICAH). Though not a civilian or a peacekeeping mission, the current United Nations Integrated Office in Haiti (known by its French acronym, BINUH) is widely seen by Haitians as a continued United Nations mission in their country.

Introduction

The history of Haiti from precolonial times to the present nascent democracy has been marked by foreign military occupation and intervention, abuse of human rights, economic and political instability, and conflict based on class and/or skin color. Since the country won its independence in 1804, when kidnapped Africans and their descendants overthrew the French colonialists who had enslaved them, foreign intervention – political, military, and economic – has hampered the ability of Haitians to govern themselves. This has led to a complicated relationship between Haitian citizens and the international community and has influenced how Haitians view democracy, the process of their own transition to democratization, as well as the role of the United Nations and the troop-sending countries that support its peacekeeping missions.

Emergence of a Prodemocracy Movement

Despite being the first independent Black republic in the world, Haiti did not see hints of democracy until a popular uprising overthrew the father-son Duvalier regime in the 1980s. This prodemocracy movement, the leaders of which who would later take on positions of national and international significance, would influence the country's political trajectory through the current day. For two decades (ending in 1934), a brutal and oppressive force of American marines occupied Haiti. American marines established forced labor brigades by kidnapping and enslaving Haitian men to build infrastructure including a national highway system. Those who refused to work or escaped from the brigades were beaten, tortured, and sometimes killed. Before leaving Haiti in 1934 as a part of President Roosevelt's "good neighbor" policy, the occupying American forces installed a succession of puppet leaders, all from the mulatto class.

A series of coups and military dictatorships marked the period immediately following the American's withdrawal from a physical presence in Haiti (the US government retained control of Haiti's finances until 1947). In September 1956, Dr. François Duvalier seized power in a military coup, and a year later was elected president. Duvalier, known as "Papa Doc," declared himself "president for life" (Abbott 1988) and established what is widely viewed as one of the most brutal and repressive dictatorships in modern human history.

It was Duvalier who established the feared Tonton Macoute death squads. The macoutes carried out tens of thousands of politically motivated executions, beatings, kidnappings, and disappearances each year. While the vast majority of Haitians lived in crippling poverty, Duvalier won support with some elements of the middle class, however, by establishing public works programs in their neighborhoods, promoting tourism (which

| | |
|------------------|--|
| Feb. 1986 | Popular prodemocracy protest forces Jean-Claude Duvalier into exile |
| Dec. 1990 | Presidential elections (Jean Bertrand Aristide) |
| Sep. 1991 | Coup d'état led by Lieutenant-General Raoul Cédras overthrows the elected government |
| Feb. 1993 | MICIVIH opens |
| Jun. 1993 | Haitian government in exile appeals to UNSC requesting an embargo and naval blockade of Haiti |
| Jun. – Jul. 1993 | Governor Islands Agreement negotiations and signing |
| Jul. 1993 | Robert Malval appointed prime minister, a key step in realization of the Governor Islands Agreement |
| Jul. – Aug. 1993 | FRAPH death squads created by Emmanuel Constant |
| Sep. 1993 | UNMIH opens |
| Oct. 1993 | USS Harlan County prevented from docking by a small crowd of armed protestors; peacekeeper do not disembark; Minister of Justice Guy Malary ambushed and killed by FRAPH; MICIVIH staff evacuated to the Dominican Republic |
| Apr. 1994 | Massacre of Raboteau residents by FADH and FRAPH members |
| Sep. 1994 | MNF deployed to Haiti; former US president Jimmy Carter negotiates amnesty for the military junta and US visas for some of the coup leaders in exchange for a peaceful surrender |
| Oct. 1994 | Elected government including Pres. Aristide return to Haiti |
| Nov. 1994 | MICIVIH mandated extended to include institution building |
| Mar. 1995 | UNSMIH assumes full functions within Haiti and MNF closes operations |
| Jun. 1995 | HNP founded |
| Dec. 1995 | Presidential Election (Rene Preval) |
| Jun. 1996 | UNMIH closes |
| Jul. 1996 | UNSMIH opens |
| Jul. 1997 | UNSMIH closes; UNTMIH opens |
| Nov. 1997 | UNTMH closes |
| Nov. 2000 | Presidential elections (Jean Bertrand Aristide) |
| Feb. 2004 | US marines take over key government sites in the greater Port-au-Prince area, President Aristide is removed from office; the United States, France and Canada create the MNF; Boniface Alexandre takes office as provisional president |
| Jun. 2004 | MINUSTAH opens |
| Feb. 2006 | Presidential elections (Rene Preval) |
| Jan. 2010 | Magnitude 7.0 earthquake struck 25 km southwest of Port-au-Prince causing widespread damages and the deaths of at least 140,000 people |
| Mar. 2011 | Presidential elections (Michel Martelly) |
| Feb. 2016 | Jocelerme Privert takes office as provisional president |
| Nov. 2016 | Presidential elections (Jovenel Moïse) |
| Oct. 2016 | Matthew, a category 5 hurricane, struck southwestern Haiti near Les Anglais, causing $2.8 billion in damages |
| Oct. 2017 | MINUSTAH closes and MINUJUSTH opens |
| Oct. 2018 | A magnitude 5.9 earthquake struck 19 kilometers northwest of Port-de-Paix, Haiti, causing the building damage and the deaths of at least 18 people. |
| Oct. 2019 | MINUJUSTH closes |
| Jul. 2021 | President Jovenel Moïse assassinated; Claude Joseph, acting prime minister, takes control of the country before resigning and handing power over to Ariel Henry of the Council of Ministers |
| Aug. 2021 | A magnitude 7.2 earthquake struck the Tiburon Peninsula in the Caribbean nation of Haiti killing 2200 people. |

United Nations Missions in Haiti, Fig. 1 Timeline of Important Events Related to the UN Missions in Haiti

improved the economy overall), and by setting up industries such as assembly factories, which middle class professionals could run.

When François Duvalier died in April 1971, the office of president was passed on to his son, 19-year-old Jean Claude Duvalier who was known as “Baby Doc.” Under Jean Claude Duvalier’s rule, conditions in Haiti worsened for ordinary citizens. Repression became so bad that in 1983 rebellion spread throughout the country with mass demonstrations being held regularly by Haitians who were demanding the establishment of a democracy. After 3 years of protests, in February 1986, the Haitian army pressured Jean Claude Duvalier to resign, and he left the country for exile in France.

From the departure of Duvalier through 1990, Haiti was ruled by a series of provisional governments. Human rights abuses continued to be widespread. The Macoute death squads were never disbanded, and they continued to be a source of violent enforcement of government authoritarianism. During several high-profile incidents, citizens were executed while waiting in line to vote in a series of unsuccessful presidential elections. A prodemocracy movement called Lavalas (Haitian Creole for “the flood”) grew more powerful and denounced the continuation of what they called “Duvalierism after Duvalier” (Aristide 1996).

One significant development of the time was that a new constitution was written, which provided for an elected local government, parliament, elected president and an appointed prime minister, Supreme Court, and cabinet ministers. The new constitution set the stage for an eventual transition into a democratic government. In December 1990, the country had an election that was deemed free and fair by international observers. Jean Bertrand Aristide, a populist priest who was one of the leaders of the Lavalas movement, was elected with 67% of the popular vote and took office on February 8, 1991.

Seven months into his term, a violent coup led by Lt. General Raoul Cedras and other officers from the Haitian army (known by the acronym FADH) deposed Aristide, who was forced into exile first in Venezuela and later in Washington, DC. The coup was carried out by the Haitian military but supported or perhaps directed (depending on the accounts) by Haiti’s business elite. The coup had tacit “behind the scenes” approval from the United States, which had become increasingly disturbed by President Aristide’s policies and their potential impact on US business interests in Haiti but perhaps did not anticipate the violence that would ensue.

Unlike previous coups in Haiti, this time there was mass resistance to the overthrow of the elected president, and Haitians took to the streets in protest. Thousands of ordinary citizens were executed for demanding a return to the democratic government. The death squads were out in full force, rounding up suspected Lavalas members and brazenly executing them in the streets, occasionally in the presence of international human rights observers and the news media (Human Rights Watch 1993).

The coup regime was in power for 3 years, from 1991 to 1994. During that time, though officially opposed to the overthrow of the elected government, the United States covertly supported the military junta. One of those who was on the US payroll was Emmanuel “Toto” Constant. According to Constant, shortly after Aristide’s ouster, Colonel Patrick Collins, a US Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) attaché who was stationed in Haiti from 1989 to 1992, pressured him to organize a front that could oppose the Lavalas movement and do intelligence work against it. In response, Constant set up a brutal paramilitary group known as the Front for the Advancement and Progress of Haiti (FRAPH) to terrorize supporters of exiled president Jean-Bertrand Aristide (Dupuy 2005; Nairn 1994; Sprague 2012; Whitney 1996).

Constant was paid by the CIA from 1992 to 1994, as were several other leading members of the military junta. According to the US officials, he provided information to the agency in exchange for about $500 a month. During this time, Constant and the FRAPH paramilitary death squads were responsible for more than 4000 extrajudicial murders and thousands more sexual assaults, kidnappings, beatings, and acts of terror (Sprague 2012; Whitney 1996).

Context of the UN Involvement in Haiti

Under mounting international pressure, the United States and other members of the UN Security Council were forced to intervene. Their first step was the creation of the International Civilian Mission in Haiti (MICIVIH) in February 1993 as a joint diplomatic effort with the Organization of American States (OAS) at the request of president-in-exile Jean Bertrand Aristide. This was the UN's first joint mission with a regional organization. The mission's mandate was to promote human rights and strengthen judicial, police, and prison institutions important for the promotion and protection of human rights.

MICIVIH staff struggled in their attempts to fulfill this mandate as violence by both state and nonstate actors created an increasingly dangerous situation. MICIVIH was authorized to investigate and record alleged human rights violations, to verify case facts with Haitian institutions, and to make recommendations to Haitian authorities. However, alleged victims who reported abuses were targeted by the agents of the de facto regime, and a general climate of impunity made investigations and advising challenging. The UN and OAS had both enacted interactional economic sanctions against the coup government to persuade them reduce violence against citizens and to engage in peaceful negotiations. But the civilian mission had no power to enforce their recommendations or to protect Haitians who were still being beaten, tortured, and executed by military forces and the death squads.

Governor Islands Agreement

On June 7, 1993, President Aristide made a formal request to the UN Security Council that they decree a mandatory embargo and a naval blockade against Haiti. This was resisted by some OAS members, including Brazil, which was able to convince the other council members to discard plans for a naval blockade. However, an embargo against importation of arms and fuel was approved and adopted on June 16 (UN Security Council Resolution 841, 1993).

Succumbing to the pressures of the embargo along with a crippled economy, Cedras agreed to meet with a UN mediator, former Argentine Foreign Minister Dante Caputo, on the conditions under which he would peacefully step down and allow the elected president to return to office (Malone 1997). After 7 days of negotiations, an accord was signed on July 4, 1993, by Lt. General Cedras on behalf of the military and President Aristide on behalf of the elected Haitian government. Dubbed the Governor Island Agreement, it was viewed within Haiti as a negotiation between Haiti's oligarchy/their military enforcers and the US president Bill Clinton (who was facing internal criticism regarding his response to boatloads of Haitian refugees heading to US shores). Though President Aristide did sign the agreement, he had little say in its terms, which were unfavorable toward the interests of the Haitian citizens and those who had been victimized by the military junta.

In exchange for amnesty and maintaining the Haitian army, the coup regime agreed to step down within 4 months. Marrack Goulding, then head of peacekeeping at the UN, encouraged Aristide to sign the agreement, saying that 4 months lead time was necessary to recruit and deploy a UN policing mission to serve as a buffer force for Aristide's return. Under the agreement, the military leaders would be allowed to retire or be transferred but would not be held accountable for overthrowing the elected government or their violent repression of the prodemocracy movement (Klarreich 1993; Meisler 1993). The elected government, including President Aristide, was to return by October 30, 1993.

United Nations Mission in Haiti (September 1993 to June 1996)

Implementation of the Governor Islands Agreement proved challenging. In accordance with the agreement, a new prime minister, Robert Malval, took office in July. In response, sanctions were suspended the following month (UNSCR 861, 1993). As outlined during the Governor's Island Agreement, the UN Security Council authorized the United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH) on September 23, 1993, with the mandate of securing the transition back to the constitutional government by modernizing the armed forces of Haiti and establishing a new police force (Security Council resolution 867). That same day the UNSC approved deploying the 700 military and 600 police personnel of the United Nations Mission in Haiti. Within a week, 80 American and Canadian staff had arrived Port-au-Prince.

However, the Haitian military had already begun violating their agreement. Violence against citizens throughout the country intensified. On September 11, 1993, prodemocracy businessman Antonio Izmerly was grabbed from church during mass and executed in front of both a crowd of parishioners and an international news crew as uniformed police looked on (French 1993). The military refused to step down as promised, and by mid-October 1993, the MICIVIH staff were evacuated to the Dominican Republic (Ramalho and de Souza Neto 2014). (In January 1994, a small contingent from MICIVIH would return before being expelled by the Haitian military in July 1994.)

The event that led to the evacuation of the MICIVIH and UNMIH staff occurred on October 11, 1993, when a group of approximately 100 armed FRAPH members, reportedly backed by FADH and police, blocked a contingent of US and Canadian peacekeepers from disembarking the USS Harlan County at the Port-au-Prince seaport. Accompanying the civilian MICIVIH and UNMIH staff and diplomats were 193 US marines and 25 Canadian troops who had arrived in the country in advance of the UN's projected deployment of 1300 peacekeepers. The UN and OAS peacekeepers, staff, and diplomats at the port were surrounded by military irregulars who fired weapons into the air, threw rocks, and beat the windows of their vehicles. Several fishing vessels and a Haitian coast guard cutter further blocked the USS Harlan County from approaching the port (Farah and Tarr 1993).

In the end, the ship did not dock. Without consulting the security council, and without a clear military justification for withdrawing, the USS Harlan turned around and left. Canada followed suite, withdrawing their troops. On October 14, 1993, Minister of Justice Guy Malary, who was critical of the military junta leadership, was ambushed and killed by FRAPH death squads (Weisbrot 1997). And 2 days later, MICIVIH staff were evacuated to the Dominican Republic. It would be another year before Haitians would see an end to the de facto military regime (Granderson 1998; Ramalho and de Souza Neto 2014).

During the military's final year in power, the abuse of human rights and violence against citizens continued to escalate. One notable event was the Raboteau Massacre. Raboteau, an impoverished seaside neighborhood in the city of Gonaïves had resisted the military junta for since the coup first occurred. Residents held rallies opposing the de facto military junta's leaders. On April 22, 1994, FADH soldiers and FRAPH paramilitary forces raided the neighborhood shortly before dawn. Going house to house, they beat and arrested residents, including children, elderly people, and people with disabilities. Residents were made to lie down in open sewers and those who ran were shot. A group of residents who had been out gathering firewood were indiscriminately fired upon. Soldiers also commandeered rowboats from the residents and used them to attack men who were fishing offshore during the massacre. Afterward, the FADH soldiers prevented families from collecting the bodies of the dead, making an exact count of the dead impossible. Estimates of deaths range from 8 to 30 individuals with more than 100 residents of all ages reporting serious injuries. (Concannon 2018; Cynn 2008; Girard 2005; Henry 2020; Marshall 1995; Stoelting et al. 2001; Suárez 2003).

These events, and a mass exodus of Haitian refugees to the shores of the United States and neighboring countries, made it impossible for the international community to continue promoting a diplomatic resolution to the conflict. UN Security Council resolution 940 (1994) authorized the creation of a multinational peacekeeping force (MNF), which began deployment on September 19, 1994, as Operation Uphold Democracy. In a last-minute deal brokered by former US President Jimmy Carter, the military coup leaders agreed to leave Haiti for exile in the United States. Among them was FRAPH commander Emmanuel Constant.

On October 15, 1994, the constitutionally elected government returned to Haiti (Kretchik 2016; Kreps 2007). MICIVIH was reestablished in Haiti, reaching full force by October 16, 1994, with new responsibilities including assisting with the repatriation and resettlement of displaced persons, providing medical and social assistance to victims of torture and other human rights abuses, providing civic education, and expanding responsibility for democratic institution-building (Kretchik 2003; Solomon 1999). Similarly, UNMIH's mandate was also expanded; the new goals of the mission included assisting the elected government to sustain a stable environment, protecting international personnel and key installations, and assisting the legitimate constitutional authorities in creating an environment conducive to free and fair elections (Security Council resolutions 940 [1994] and 975 [1995]). UNMIH assumed its full functions on March 31, 1995 (Kreps 2007; Solomon 1999).

Upon returning to the country, Aristide immediately took steps to disband the Haitian Army and to create an independent civilian police force. He emphasized the importance of investigating and prosecuting those who had violated human rights during the coup period – a stance that was not always supported by the UN and OAS, or by the US diplomats who had helped restore him to power. In late 1994, Aristide established a council to investigate the human rights crimes committed by the army and by private citizens during the coup. This process was hampered, however, by the United States decision to have MNF soldiers confiscate more than 10,000 pages of documents from the offices of the coup leaders. Requests from the Haitian government through diplomatic channels to retrieve these records were initially unsuccessful.

Peaceful democratic elections were held for the legislative branch in summer 1995 and for the presidency in December of that same year. In 1996, for the first time in Haitian history, power was peacefully transferred from one elected president to another. Rene Preval, an agronomist, had been elected with 88% of the vote. During Preval's first term, the general human rights situation continued to improve. A court decision finally forced the United States to return the documents US marines from the MNF had seized during the initial invasion of Haiti, and these were used to prosecute members of the FADH, FRAPH, and the military junta for ordering and carrying out executions of political dissidents. Eventually dozens, including FRAPH leader Emmanuel Constant, were convicted of human rights crimes and many were imprisoned (Girard 2005).

United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (July 1996 to July 1997)

While UNMIH had decidedly been a peacemaking and peacekeeping mission designed to transition the country from coup-leadership to democracy (while preventing further political violence against the population), the United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH) was a peacebuilding mission created to foster the conditions for future stability (Siman and Galoumian 2015). This was to be accomplished through the creation of a national police force. Prior to the intervention of UNMIH, Haiti's internal security had been tied to both the military and system of official and unofficial government-endorsed paramilitary groups and death squads. When the elected leadership was restored to power in October 1994, one of first steps President Aristide made was to abolish military-controlled police and commit to the creation of a nonpartisan national police force, which would uphold international human rights standards. One of UNSMIH key mandates was to support this goal through the training of a new national police force (United Nations Security Council resolution 1063).

Beginning June 28, 1996, the mission initially consisted of limited forces. UN Civilian Police (CIVPOL) were concentrated in the greater Port-au-Prince area, typically working at larger police stations, prisons or jails, and the newly formed police academy (Harston 2001; Meharg 1996). In addition to CIVPOL activities, the mission was also charged with continuing to support the maintenance of internal security, institution-building (particularly related to the justice system), national reconciliation, and economic revitalization. CIVPOL focused on training senior and midlevel police officers to professionalize the new police force. They also created training curricula and oversaw nearly all of the training for new recruits, created a system for vetting officers to weed out those with criminal backgrounds and involvement in gross human rights abuses, and introduced techniques to promote respect for human rights in general, such as nonlethal crowd control procedures and the verbal interrogation of suspects without the use of torture (Harston 2001).

Overall, the mission was well-received by both the Haitian government and Haitian citizens, as there was widespread support for the move to a civilian-controlled police force. However, the mission faced some significant hurdles. The uncertainty of the mission's tenure made long-term planning a challenge and creating a disquieting climate of insecurity in both the mission and the Haitian National Police (HNP) (Blair 1997; Knight 2001). CIVPOL officers frequently rotated in and out, leading to confusion as new policies and procedures were created and hampering institutional memory (Knight 2001; Kolbe and Muggah 2011). And a serious economic crisis throughout Haiti heightened national tensions and slowed realization of expected economic developments mandated by the mission.

During the mission tenure, free speech was guaranteed and political demonstrations on all sides of the spectrum took place unimpeded by government agents. But the individual soldiers from the disbanded Haitian army had never been disarmed. Caches of weapons were established in strategic locations throughout the country, and members of the disbanded army, along with the mulatto elite, began to agitate for the return of Duvalier and the removal of Preval. The security situation deteriorated somewhat during the summer of 1996 when ex-soldiers from the disbanded FADH attacked several police stations, including one in Port-au-Prince. The newly trained HNP was barely able to repel the attacks and it was clear that further training and support was needed. In April 1997, legislative elections for one-third of the assembly seats and most of the local assemblies were called into question and led to a political impasse, as Preval's government was unable to organize a second parliamentary election.

United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (August to November 1997)

In November 1996, anticipating that end of UNSMIH, President Preval expressed concerns that the Haitian National Police were not yet at full capacity and that the fragile security sector would be unable to survive a UN exit (then planned for early 1997). Other reforms expected under UNSMIH, particularly economic improvements and the building and creation of internal government supports and structures, had been slow to materialize. In response, the Secretary General advocated for an extension of the UN's support with the creation of a limited-focus mission of 4 months in duration. The United Nations Transition Mission in Haiti (UNTMIH) began in July and ended in November 1997. Civilian police concentrated their efforts on continuing to build institutional capacity and expertise of the HNP, particular in the areas of presidential security, crowd control, and the use of specialized police units (Harston 2001).

United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (December 1997 to March 2000)

By December 1997, it was clear that Haiti's newly created national police force had yet to reach the capacity needed to provide internal security. President Preval requested continued assistance, and the UN responded with the United Nations Civilian Police Mission in Haiti (MIPONUH). Its main task was to assist the Government of Haiti in the professionalization of the Haitian National Police (Harston 2001).

MIPONUH, which succeeded the previous United Nations Missions in Haiti in December 1997, focused on leadership and supervisory level training as well as the training of specialized police units to respond to gangs, civil unrest, and to protect government institutions. Other tasks included accompanying police officers in their day-to-day duties and facilitating coordination with technical advisers to the Haitian National Police funded by the United Nations Development Programme and bilateral donors. MIPONUH's special police unit was tasked with providing assistance to MIPONUH personnel and protecting its property (Donais 2005; Harston 2001).

While significant gains were made on improving and expanding the new civilian police force, security sector reforms related to the justice system and courts were slower to materialize, effectively undermining the gains made by improved policing (Donais 2005; Iwata 1999). The judicial system lacked basic institutional capacity to carry out its mandate. Records, all on paper, were scattered and disorganized. Individuals who were detained were not presented to a judge within 48 h as mandated by the constitution. Courts lacked computers, phones, electricity, and even toilet facilities. Prisoners were sometimes held in makeshift facilities such as shipping containers and closets within police stations. People who were arrested were often held and released arbitrarily. The disorder within the justice system was systemic to the Haitian government overall. Despite international support and technical advising, efforts to build institutional capacity were slow (Iwata 1999; Roy 1999).

International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti (March 2000 to February 2001)

Both MIPONUH and MICIVIH concluded their activities on March 15, 2000. They were succeeded by the International Civilian Support Mission in Haiti (MICAH) approved by the General Assembly of the UN in December 1999 (General Assembly resolution A/54/193 of December 17, 1999). MICAH's mandate was to consolidate the gains achieved by MICIVIH and MIPONUH, promote human rights, support the Haitian police and justice system in solidifying institutional improvements, and facilitate dialogue between the international community and Haiti's complicated collection of political and social actors (Donais 2005).

In May 2000, new legislative elections were finally held and, in an election, hailed by international observers as free and fair, more than 60% of registered voters went to the polls. The prodemocracy party, Lavalas, won a large number of seats in both the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate. The political opposition, which had regrouped and solidified itself in a coalition of 17 opposition parties known as the Democratic Convergence, claimed the elections were fraudulent and demanded Preval step down and be replaced with a provisional government. Preval refused and the Democratic Convergence threatened to boycott the upcoming November 2000 presidential elections. On November 26, with only an estimated 20% of Haiti's 4.8 million registered voters coming to the polls, Aristide won a bid for his second term as president with 96% of the vote. The Democratic Convergence refused to recognize Aristide as president but conceded that even if they had participated in the elections he still would have won.

The Destabilization of Haiti's Nascent Democracy

Aristide's second term in office was marked by both a declining standard of living and rampant political conflict. From the moment he was elected, leaders of the Democratic Convergence agitated for Aristide's removal from office. In 2001, two failed coup attempts reportedly orchestrated by demobilized Haitian soldiers left 16 dead. An international aid embargo from November 2000 to February 2004 blocked more than $500 in international loans and foreign aid to Haiti. This included a $146 million dollar loan from the Inter-American Development Bank that was earmarked for literacy programs, improvements in rural transportation, health clinics, and the distribution of potable water.

Under intense international pressure, the US government signed an agreement in September 2002 to release the funds. The agreement, negotiated by the OAS, required the Haitian government implement structural adjustment programs and eliminate government subsidies on gasoline and required Haiti to pay $66 million in arrears for debts incurred by previous governments, primarily the Duvalier governments and the military juntas, which ruled Haiti in the 1980s, before receiving any loans. Even after the Haitian government complied, the funds were not distributed for nearly a year.

While government reserves shrunk 50% from 2001 to 2004, the cost of living rose 40%, gasoline prices doubled, and many ordinary citizens were no longer able to afford basic necessities. Hunger, malnutrition, and deaths from preventable illness became widespread between 2001 and 2004, particularly among the urban poor. Political conflict grew as members of the disbanded Haitian army reformed and reorganized themselves in the countryside, eventually staging an armed rebellion. Between November 2003 and February 2004, several hundred ex-soldiers who had been living and training in the Dominican Republic crossed over the border into Haiti. During January 2004, sporadic reports of military activity in the rural North were reported, and numerous peasants claimed that armed men in battle dress were raiding farms, patrolling the mountains in heavily armed pickup trucks, and traveling in from the Dominican Republic by helicopter.

On February 5, 2004, a contingent of former soldiers led by ex-military officer Guy Philippe attacked the port city of Gonaïves, killing dozens, including at least eight police officers. On February 7, the rebels, as they referred to themselves, took over the nearby city of St. Marc, killing an unknown number of police officers and bystanders in the battle. The next day a force of 150 police officers attempted to retake Gonaïves but failed. Lacking adequate weaponry and unfairly matched against seasoned soldiers, the police officers were quickly repelled. By nightfall 14 officers had been killed, and the rest retreated without retaking Gonaïves. The officers were more successful in St. Marc, which they recaptured on February 10. At the same time, a second battalion of rebels in the south began to march on the city of Grand Goâve, which they captured on February 9. Again, a contingent of reinforcements from the Haitian National Police was successful in overcoming the rebels and retaking the city.

The success of rebel activity in the North created panic throughout Haiti. Tens of thousands fled from the countryside into Port-au-Prince to escape fighting and avoid rebels on maneuvers in their area. Meanwhile, residents of Northern cities fled from the urban areas into the countryside or south to Port-au-Prince. Human rights workers reported that, as cities and towns were taken, members of the local government, including public school teachers and employees of government health clinics, were summarily executed and their homes destroyed. During the next 2 weeks, several towns in the north and the south were taken, lost and retaken again by the rebels.

The Haitian government requested international assistance, and several countries responded, including South Africa, which dispatched a plane of weapons and materials. However, the United States and Canada, two of Haiti's main benefactors since the departure of Duvalier, did not intervene. Speaking to the press February 26, US Secretary of State Colin Powell blamed the violence on Aristide and urged him to step down.

On February 19, Buteur Mètayer, leader of the Cannibal Army (an urban gang that joined forces with the demobilized soldiers and renamed itself the "National Revolutionary Front for the Liberation of Haiti"), declared himself president of Haiti with Guy Philippe as commander of the newly reformed Haitian Army. Mètayer's leadership included Jean Pierre Baptiste (also known as Jean Tatoune), a former leader of the FRAPH death squads. Tatoune was convicted of human rights violations and murder for his actions in the April 22, 1994, Raboteau Massacre. In July 2004, Tatoune escaped from a Gonaïves prison and emerged as one of the leaders of the Cannibal Army (Girard 2005).

Rebel forces continued to advance toward the capital during the end of February 2004. On February 28, a contingent of US marines arrived in Haiti without invitation from the Haitian government. They secured the U.S. Embassy, the U.S. Consulate, and later that same day took control of the Port-au-Prince International Airport and the National Palace. While marines were securing a perimeter around the National Palace, a convoy of diplomats and marines traveled to Aristide's home in Tabbarre, 15 miles away. Aristide and his wife were forced into exile, first in the Central African Republic, then Jamaica, and later in South Africa.

United Nations Stabilization Mission in Haiti (June 2004 to October 2017)

The days immediately following the departure of Aristide were tumultuous. There was no formal UN presence in Haiti; US, French, and Canadian troops occupied the country as part of a US-led Multinational Interim Force (MIF), and they were widely viewed by Haitian citizens as supporting the overthrow of democracy and violence against the prodemocracy movement. Rebel forces broke into the National Penitentiary, freeing thousands of criminals and convicted human rights violators such as Carl Dorelien, who after being deported by US immigration authorities in January 2003, was sentenced to life in prison for his role in the Raboteau massacre. Many of the newly freed men joined forces with the rebels, patrolling the countryside and the cities, appointing themselves as mayors, police chiefs, and judges throughout the country (Hallward 2008; Lindsay 2006).

Boniface Alexandre, chief justice of Haiti's supreme court, succeeded Aristide. The sitting prime minister, Yvon Neptune, stepped down and immediately went into hiding. A council of "wise men" convened at the OAS office in Port-au-Prince and chose Gerald Latortue, a former UN official of Haitian American descent, to be the new prime minister of Haiti. Latortue accepted and immediately moved from his home in Boca Raton, Florida, to Haiti. Most government officials and many government employees, including a significant number of police officers, went into hiding or left Haiti for exile in the Dominican Republic, Cuba, Venezuela, or other countries in the Americas.

In the first few months after the departure of Aristide, Amnesty International investigators (2005) described the situation in Haiti as "chaotic" and found widespread evidence of both judicial and police misconduct. They reported that insurgents controlled the countryside where they had taken over police stations and set up their own road blocks. Louis-Jodel Chamblain, a convicted criminal who was deported from the United States on the basis of his human rights crimes, was observed presiding over impromptu "trials" against Lavalas supporters in Haiti's Northern Department. Throughout February and March 2004, rebel forces and their supporters engineered numerous prison breaks that freed more than 3000 convicted criminals in Port-au-Prince alone. Riot conditions were reported in major cities during the first few weeks of March 2004, including looting and the destruction of government property and the personal property of suspected Lavalas members.

MINUSTAH took over from the MIF in June 2004 with an initial deployment of 4800 troops. MINUSTAH's presence in the country was established by UN Security Council resolution 1542, passed April 30, 2004, which provided for the deployment of peacekeeping troops to reestablish law and help create the conditions under which a successful presidential election could be held. A key focus was on security sector reform and improvements to the HNP (Donais 2005; Lindsay 2006).

Despite the circumstances surrounding the interim government's establishment, the international community stepped in to support it with a stated goal of reshaping the fragile security sector. Much like the US-led de-Baathization process in Iraq, the HNP was purged of 60% of its officers, many of whom fled to other areas of the country or to the Dominican Republic, fearing that remnants of the rebel army might exact revenge. Some 540 members of the rebel army, many of whom had been soldiers in Haiti's long demobilized armed forces, were integrated into the "new" HNP during demobilization. Few of them, if any, were required to undergo the formal training and graduation from the police academy required of new recruits (Hallward 2008; IGC 2005; Lindsay 2006; Mendelson-Forman 2006).

After four postponements, presidential elections were held February 7, 2006. The Fanmi Lavalas party was initially barred from registering a candidate by the Provisional Electoral Council, which later backed down. However, the favored Lavalas candidate, Father Gerald Jean-Juste was arrested (Dupuy 2005; Regan 2005). Named a "prisoner of conscience" by Amnesty International, Jean-Juste was imprisoned without charge during the presidential nomination period and for 8 months afterward. When Lavalas officials approached the Provisional Electoral Council to register him, they were told he was ineligible because he was in prison and could not come to their office personally (Dupuy 2006).

Eventually Rene Preval, who served as president from 1995 to 2000 as a Lavalas member, formed his own party, Lespwa (Kreyol for “hope”), and registered as a candidate. Marc Bazin, a former presidential candidate who was backed by the United States during the 1990 elections, registered himself as a Lavalas candidate for president, even though he was not a member of the Lavalas party. Other presidential candidates included former president Leslie Manigat who served as president for a few months in 1998 before being overthrown in a military coup, and Charles Henri Baker, a businessman from Group 184 who holds US residency.

Rene Preval won the election with just over 51% of the vote. Manigat received approximately 12% of the vote, and Baker received 8% of the votes. All the remaining candidates, including rebel leader Guy Philippe, won less than 5%. The election also included voting for 129 members of Haiti’s parliament. The results of these votes were disputed. President Preval began his second 5-year term as Haiti’s president on May 14, 2006.

MINUSTAH’s Response to Armed Groups

Membership in Haiti’s armed groups has vacillated over the years. In the early 2000s, when armed ex-FADH groups first launched their insurgency, many urban gangs took sides in the conflict aligning themselves with the prodemocracy and Lavalas movements or the anti-Lavalas movement and insurgency. After the insurgency was successful in early 2004, leaders of the interim Haitian government hailed the ex-FADH and their allies as “freedom fighters” and a period of increased political repression against the Lavalas movement began (Hallward 2008). During this 3-year period of political repression, membership in armed groups across the spectrum increased. Both pro- and anti-Lavalas gangs actively sought funding and members. When ex-FADH supported anti-Lavalas gangs and attacked pro-Lavalas gangs, it only fueled the membership drive and accelerated violence. Crime, committed by both political actors and crime committed by opportunistic criminals, increased. This complicated efforts by both the MIF and MINUSTAH to disarm and demobilize armed groups.

In Haiti, the demobilization, disarmament, and reintegration (DDR) process did not include disarmament. It is likely that ceremonial disarmament, in which armed groups give up weapons during a public ceremony on the order of their commanders, was absent from Haiti’s process because there was no peace process involved in the postcoup period. The international community refused to respond to insurgents until after they had nearly overthrown the elected government. Foreign support for the insurgents also complicated matters. At the time of the 2004 coup, the part of Jean Bertrand Aristide was supported by roughly half of the population. The multinational forces then, were seen as invaders who came under UN Security Council authorization, not to establish or keep the peace, but to complete the coup d’état (dos Santos Parra 2019; Kolbe 2020; Schuberth 2017; Sprague 2012; Von Einsiedel and Malone 2006).

With MINUSTAH came the first efforts at DDR. However, the UN, MIF, and other actors disagreed on who was to be disarmed. Rural armed insurgents affiliated with the anti-Lavalas side and supported by the MIF were not labeled by the MIF as insurgents, while armed urban gangs that had (for the most part) not engaged in any action against the government were labeled as insurgents and targeted with indiscriminate violence by both the MIF and the HNP. MINUSTAH inherited a difficult DDR situation. With competing policies and ideas about who should be demobilized, bias against prodemocracy and Lavalas-supporting armed groups, and political pressure to avoid disarming the rural anti-democracy insurgents, the DDR faltered from the beginning (dos Santos Parra 2019; Kolbe 2013, 2020; Sprague 2012).

There was no formal peace process. The DDR leaders lacked credible carrots and/or sticks to persuade armed groups to enter into the process. Misinformation about who was armed and who wasn't, lack of accurate information about the scope and nature of the armed conflict, and lack of political will within the UN system and from the main MINUSTAH funders hampered DDR activities and the creation of a DDR process. Eventually, foreign DDR staffers found themselves negotiating, through Haitian staff intermediaries who themselves had competing interests, with individual armed gangs to try to get them to join the DDR program. No large-scale or formalized disarmament ever took place.

From the creation of MINUSTAH in 2004 through 2007, reintegration efforts were coordinated at the national level by a committee and were administered from a centralized DDR office. Beginning in 2007, the national DDR committee was disbanded and its work was absorbed into the Brazilian NGO Viva Rio and UN-related DDR efforts were officially coordinated by the newly created Community Violence Reduction (CVR) office located at Camp Charlie on the outskirts of Port-au-Prince. CVR was officially part of the Department of Peacekeeping Operations (DPKO).

Within MINUSTAH, CVR was widely acknowledged as an important contributor to development and reconstruction efforts. Rather than invest only in traditional, individual-level interventions common with the DDR programs of the 1980s and 1990s, the MINUSTAH's CVR program emphasized a community-based approach toward reducing violence in Haiti's most marginalized urban areas. Demobilized individuals from armed groups received the same vocationally focused services they did in the past, but the agency also invested a great deal of money and time in efforts to improve the neighborhoods where violence most frequently occurred. By improving the community in which demobilized men were living, the hope was that individuals would be able to integrate into lawful employment and that communities would be addressing neighborhood- and state-level problems such as lack of employment, social marginalization, and political disenfranchisement, which may have previously prevented demobilized individuals from successfully reintegrating (Muggah 2009).

Security Sector Reform

Despite its origins and relationship to a movement that overthrew of the democratically elected government, MINUSTAH slowly began to make some inroads and gain the confidence of some parts of Haitian society. Along with CVR, one of its more well-received efforts included the training and professionalization of the Haitian National Police. Beginning in earnest in 2005, efforts to train the HNP and bring them to full capacity were funded as part of an extension of MINUSTAH's mandate. Within the National Police Academy, CIVPOL officers and MINUSTAH technical advisors focused on capacity building for Haitian instructors, curriculum development, administration, and the reinforcement of international standards and norms including respect for human rights. By 2009, there was growing confidence among international actors in the potential of the HNP to provide security, with the UN Security Council acknowledging key gaps but also citing real improvements (Kolbe and Muggah 2011).

In January 2010, an earthquake struck Haiti, killing 158,000 people; among those were 96 peacekeepers (Kolbe et al. 2010). A MINUSTAH facility collapsed, trapping many inside and killing Hédi Annabi, the UN's special representative to Haiti. The disaster was a severe blow to both the mission and to the country, which already was contending with fragile political and economic stability. Through the next few months, it became apparent that, though many UN efforts to improve Haiti's democratic institutions had not succeeded, the Haitian National Police were surprisingly successful at maintaining internal security and assisting in the recovery and reconstruction effort (Kolbe and Muggah 2012). By 2010, more than two-thirds of Haitians surveyed said that the HNP should be the primary security provider for the country (Kolbe and Muggah 2011). However, the success of the HNP continued to be precarious (Kolbe 2020).

Controversies and Criticism of MINUSTAH

No peacekeeping mission is without controversy or criticism; however, the UN missions in Haiti have, because of the context, decisions by leaders, and influences from troop-sending countries faced a number of unique controversies during the UN's tenure in Haiti. These have included concerns regarding the missions' support for democracy and interference by foreign powers, leakages, and distribution of arms and ammunition to the public, the direct and indirect support of violence and overuse of force, the cholera epidemic, and complaints of sexual exploitation and abuse of Haitian citizens by peacekeepers (James 2010; Kolbe 2020; Korson 2015; McDougal et al. 2019; Pinget 2018; Reisman 1995; Russell 2013; Schuller 2012). In years to come, it is most likely that MINUSTAH will be remembered by Haitians for two things: creating a cholera epidemic and sexual abuse by peacekeepers.

Sexual Exploitation and Abuse

MINUSTAH has always had a perception problem. A portion of that problem was inherited from the MIF and the rest of the problem was created by individuals within MINUSTAH and by the behavior of groups of peacekeepers. During the 1991–1994 military junta, FRAPH, police officers, and soldiers engaged in politically motivated sexual assaults, including mass rapes, of people known or suspected of supporting the prodemocracy movement Cynn 2008). This tactic was adopted again during the 2002–2004 insurgency by some, but not all, of the armed groups involved in the overthrow of the elected government (James 2010). Sexual assaults by both state and nonstate actors continued to happen with alarming frequency after the MIF invasion on February 28, 2004.

Between February 2004 and December 2005, a period that included the entire tenure of the MIF as well as the first 7 months of MINUSTAH, an estimated 35,000 women and girls (95% CI: 28,000–41,000 females) were sexually assaulted in the greater Port-au-Prince area (Kolbe and Hutson 2006). While the majority of the sexual assaults recorded by Kolbe and Hutson (2006) were by criminals or unknown perpetrators, 13.8% (95% CI: 6.3–21.3%) were committed by officers from the Haitian National Police force. Ex-soldiers from the disbanded Haitian army committed 3.2% of the assaults, while members of armed anti-Lavalas groups and partisans of anti-Lavalas groups committed 10.6% and 1.1%, respectively, of these sexual assaults.

Given the historic use of sexual assault as a political tool and the involvement of HNP officers, including some police officers newly inducted from the ex-FADH groups involved in the insurgency under the MIF and MINUSTAH in sexual assaults after the overthrow of the elected government, it was inevitable that rape and sexual assault would continue to be a contentious issue during MINUSTAH's term. While there is no evidence of systemic sexual abuse or exploitation of Haitian civilians by foreign peacekeepers, MINUSTAH's tenure included a number of sexual exploitation and abuse scandals.

When MINUSTAH took over from the MIF in 2004, they were initially unable to curtail sexual abuse, harassment, and assaults by HNP officers as part of the SSR efforts. The mission itself then became embroiled in controversy when accusations of sexual abuse, prostitution scandals, and a child sexual exploitation case that led to the expulsion of 114 of the 950 Sri Lankan peacekeepers then serving in the mission. In 2006, a BBC reporter (2006) interviewed an 11-year-old child who was living on the streets near the National Palace who said she had been sexually molested by peacekeepers. That same reporter also located a 14-year-old girl who claimed to have been abducted and taken to a UN base where she had been sexually assaulted. Though neither claim was acted on by UN investigators, other complaints of sexual abuse and assault were substantiated.

In November 2007, the Sri Lankan government ordered 114 of their peacekeepers to be immediately repatriated after a news radio stations in Haiti reported that three officers in the contingent had organized a "child sex" brothel in an impoverished neighborhood of Port-au-Prince. The removal of the accused perpetrators meant that Haitian police authorities were prevented from concluding their investigation of the case. However, early reports had circulated accusing the peacekeepers of criminal sexual abuse and rape of children as young as 7 years old. While some of the children had been forced, others had been coerced into the brothel with promises of food, money for school fees, clothing, and cell phones in exchange for sexual acts. (Dodds 2017).

Eventually UN investigators substantiated some of the children's claims, though no peacekeepers were ever held criminally responsible.

In 2011, the city of Port Salut erupted in street protests after the audio from leaked cell phone video footage taken by a Uruguayan peacekeeper was played on the local radio station. The video shows the four uniformed peacekeepers sexually assaulting a high school student inside of their barracks. The boy could be heard crying as soldiers restrained his arms and forced him faced own on a mattress. The teenager who had been assaulted eventually traveled with his mother to Montevideo to testify against his attackers in court.

In 2012, three Pakistani peacekeepers serving as military police in the city of Gonaïves were court martialled for the sexual abuse of a 13-year-old boy with cognitive impairments. Sentenced to a year of hard labor and dismissed from the military, they were repatriated to serve their jail sentences at home (Al Jazeera 2012; Dodds 2017).

During MINUSTAH's tenure, there were fewer than 200 cases of sexual abuse or exploitation reported to the UN. However, those cases which did occur received both media attention and became an impetus for local anger at the mission. Though not widespread or as common as in other peace-kept locations, the history of politically motivated rape in Haiti along with local discontent over the mission and its role in the overthrow of the democratically elected government made every allegation against MINUSTAH particularly potent. Of particular frustration to local advocates has been the treatment of sexual assault survivors who have struggled to find justice within the UN reporting system.

Numerous reports have also highlighted the difficulties that women who have given birth to children with peacekeepers have experienced in asserting their legal rights, obtaining child support, and holding the fathers accountable legally and economically for their children. In MINUSTAH's 13 years, dozens of women gave birth to children fathered by peacekeepers. While many were in romantic relationships with the peacekeeper, some of these births resulted from sexual assaults, prostitution, or transactional sex (in which the woman or girl was given food, jobs, or other items in exchange for sex). More than a dozen women have pursued paternity cases against peacekeepers who refused to support their children after returning to their home countries. Few have received support, despite judgments in their favor within the Haitian court system. In early 2017, women's advocates in Haiti reported a rare victory when UN officials announced that a one-time financial payment of USD $45,243 had been made to a woman living in Leogane who gave birth to a child fathered by a commander from the 16th Sri Lanka Peacekeeping Battalion (Dodds 2017). Though the woman was not raped, she was vulnerable due to her financial and social position, which made the relationship exploitative, and led to the commander being dismissed from the Sri Lankan military.

The Costs of Cholera

MINUSTAH's other legacy was the cholera epidemic. Cholera was unheard of in Haiti before an outbreak in October 2010, linked to poor sewage disposal practices at a United Nations base in the Artibonite department, located along the Meille River (Katz 2016; Tappero and Tauxe 2011; Piarroux et al. 2011). Though cholera was initially discovered in rural areas, within a month of the epidemic being identified it had spread into urban Haiti, as rural dwellers came to urban centers seeking medical attention, and as rain and flooding became worse during the rainy season, the situation became more critical (Burgess and Waananen 2013; Katz 2010). Highly populated urban neighborhoods with poor sanitation, shared pit toilets, and inadequate municipal services such as water delivery and rubbish removal quickly became breeding grounds for cholera infections (Barzilay et al. 2013; Schaaf 2010).

Within the first year, the United States Center for Disease Control (CDC) reported more than 470,000 cases of cholera in Haiti with 6631 deaths as a consequence (Centers for Disease Control and Prevention 2011). This was believed to an underestimation of the extent of the epidemic (Luquero et al. 2016). The cholera epidemic was primarily surveyed through information collected in and by clinics or hospitals, which are part of Haiti's infrastructurally weak health care system; vulnerable populations including rural residents, those who were too poor to afford care, and those who did not have access to information about the seriousness of the disease may not have accessed care, leading to an undercount of deaths. Six years into the epidemic it was reported that more than nearly 800,000 individuals had been infected with cholera, with the number of deaths as a consequence of the disease exceeding 10,000 (Katz 2016; Russell 2013). Luquero et al. (2016) estimated a 2.9-fold increase in deaths in four sites (two urban and two rural) impacted by the epidemic.

Epidemiology studies into the origin of the Haiti cholera outbreak concluded that a strain of Vibrio cholerae was introduced into the country through human activity thus resulting in the epidemic. Results, although politically controversial, indicated a correlation between the arrival of a Nepalese battalion originating from an area suffering a cholera outbreak in Nepal and the appearance of the illness in Haiti. There were also allegations of the same troops illegally dumping waste tank contents into rivers, which are used for bathing and washing, which further led to the spread of the infection (Chin et al. 2011; Hendriksen et al. 2011; Piarroux et al. 2011). MINUSTAH was slow to take responsibility for the epidemic's origin, which contributed to a growing national sentiment against the mission.

Data from a longitudinal survey of Haitian households between 2011 and 2016 showed overwhelming economic and social costs of the epidemic.¹ In this study of 3000 households throughout Haiti, residents of popular zones were disproportionately affected by cholera; they were 6.66 times more likely to die of cholera than a resident of another zone (95% CI: 3.88–11.42). Popular zone residents were 1.99 times (95% CI: 1.73–2.29) more likely to report a cholera illness than those not living in popular zones. In addition to living in densely populated neighborhoods with few municipal services and poor sewage disposal, residents of these low-income zones were also more likely than residents of other zones to report that a family member or friend from the provinces stayed in their home while seeking treatment for cholera.

Of all households surveyed, more than three-quarters (n=2280; 76.0%) lacked regular access to potable drinking water. Access to clean water was an even greater problem in popular zones where only one of every ten households said they had regular access to treated drinking water during the previous month. Handwashing after using the toilet was practiced less than 15% of residents surveyed in 2011; though this increased to 18.6% of respondents by June of 2016. Residents of all urban areas said they struggled to access health care services to diagnose or treat cholera. Nearly one-third of those who reported confirmed cases of cholera reported that the clinical diagnosis was delayed for 12 h or more after exhibiting serious symptoms because the household had no money to pay for medical care and/or transportation to see a medical professional.

The Direct Costs of Cholera

The costs of cholera included a number of expenses: medical care, home treatment, lost wages, transportation, care for children of ill or deceased caregivers, changes in household hygiene practices, funeral expenses, and paying for ill individuals and others in the household to repeat missed school terms. Most popular zone residents with cholera reported receiving medical care at a free or reduced-price clinic or hospital (66.7%), while residents of other zones were more likely to receive care from private doctors, clinics, or hospitals (85.0%). Few cholera sufferers reported being hospitalized for treatment; most were cared for in their own homes by family members. Figure 2 outlines the average costs incurred by households due to cholera illness or death.

Households with deceased members suffered the greatest economic costs. One man, whose wife died of cholera, put it this way: "I borrowed to pay for her to go to the clinic, for her medication, and for her funeral. I've sold all I have, and I have nothing left to sell. They might as well have tied a stone around my neck and thrown me in the ocean." Many respondents expressed fears that they would not be able to recover from the monetary costs associated with the individual's illness.

| | Mean Cost | SD | % of Average Monthly Household Income ($110.04) |
|---|-----------|---------|--|
| Clinic/Doctor Fees, Tests & Supplies (including hospitalization) ¹ | $131.88 | $95.01 | 119.85% |
| Traditional medicine services ² | $22.65 | $7.50 | 20.58% |
| Transportation for treatment | $29.26 | $14.33 | 26.59% |
| Treating water (prevent spread to uninfected household members) | $40.93 | $30.12 | 37.20% |
| Medication, special foods/liquids, extra food to regain weight post-illness | $60.02 | $29.75 | 54.54% |

United Nations Missions in Haiti, Fig. 2 Average costs paid by households for cholera treatment per individual in US dollars

Funerals were by far the highest expense listed by respondents with respondents describing this cost as “crushing.” Funeral and burial costs averaged USD $5491.34 (SD: $3014.87). In addition to funeral costs, households reported paying for ambulance services to transport the body, formal and informal fees for paperwork and death certificates, costs for religious services after the death (in addition to the funeral; these services were often provided by traditional religious leaders), and transportation of family members to attend the burial. The average number of work or school days missed by ill individuals was 30.5 days (SD: 17.8 days). The average number of work or school days missed by adult caregivers of ill individuals was 19.4 days (SD: 15.1 days), while the average number of school days missed by children who cared for ill household members was 112.4 days (SD: 40.6 days).

Indirect Costs of Cholera on Haitian Households

Cholera-impacted households also experienced other indirect costs – financial, social, medical, and quality of life-related costs – resulting from the epidemic. Some populations, such as children, displaced families with limited social ties to their current geographic area of residence, and those renting homes without yards in the poorest urban neighborhoods, were all particularly vulnerable to these negative impacts. Overall, individuals from cholera-impacted households were more likely to report other physical health and mental health problems, more likely to experience family dysfunction, more likely to report symptoms of depression, more likely to have poor nutrition, and less likely to report that children aged 5–18 were attending school than other households with children in the same age group.

Of particular concern is the food security of cholera-impacted households. When examining the food consumption of these households, it is clear that households which experienced a cholera illness were more likely to be food insecure and have inadequate nutrition in the 60–90 day period after the illness was first reported. This is likely due to the fact that cholera-impacted households reduced food expenditures by an average of 57.1% after the first cholera case in their household; the mean number of days that cholera-impacted households reduced food expenditures was 95 days post-illness. In addition, food budgets for other household members may have been reduced because special or extra food was purchased for ill household members. Additional or special foods, along with medications, teas, and herbal remedies prescribed by traditional medicine practitioners averaged $60.02 (SD: $29.75). This amounted to more than half (54.54%) of the mean monthly household income of respondents.

Not only did the cholera epidemic cause financial problems for its victims, but it has also caused numerous social problems to those affected as well as to their household members. Primarily, adults experienced fears of not being able to recover from the financial strain imposed on them. Children and adult students were forced to leave school to care for ill relatives. Families were required to go into debt equal to nearly 5 years of the average household income to cover the costs of burial expenses. And families of cholera patients – whether the patient lived or died – had to make the difficult decision of paying for food or for the cholera-related expenses; food insecurity among families touched by the cholera epidemic was shockingly high.

These findings highlight the clear economic, social, and psychological consequences to Haitian households affected by the cholera epidemic. Though MINUSTAH did eventually take responsibility for the epidemic, efforts to provide financial redress focused on supporting institutional and government efforts to combat the epidemic. No payments were ever made to the families of those who died (Bode 2015; Concannon 2018; Pan American Health Organisation 2013; Walton and Ivers 2011).

United Nations Mission for Justice Support in Haiti (October 2017 to October 2019)

Following the closure of MINUSTAH in 2017, the United Nations Mission for Justice Support in Haiti (MINUJUSTH) was created with an objective of completing MINUSTAH's mandate (Security Council Resolution 2350, 2017). The drawdown from MINUSTAH to MINUJUSTH was stark; the new mission had 351 civilian staff, 980 military police and staff, and 295 CIVPOL. Initially the mission was approved for only 6 months and was to end on April 15, 2018. Like MINUSTAH, MINUJUSTH's mission was to assist the Haitian government in security sector reform while promoting and protecting human rights. The new mission was welcomed by President Jovenel Moïse but rejected by actors from across the political spectrum.

Peyi Lok: From Football to Fuel

In 1993, it was a fuel crisis caused by international sanctions that had provided the impetus to force the military junta to the negotiation table, but in 2018, it was another fuel crisis that led to widespread civil unrest and delayed the conclusion of the MINUJUSTH mission. In February 2018, the Haitian government under the leadership of Jovenel Moïse, signed a comprehensive voluntary agreement to improve tax collection and reduce government expenditures by, among other things, eliminating a national subsidy on fuel. This decision, made with the approval of the president, emerged from the March 2017 “roadmap” of priorities presented to government ministers by the prime minister in consultation with the president and MINUSTAH advisors.

The officials involved in the decision, notably the Minister of Finance, and the Minister of Commerce and Industry, announced the agreement but declined to announce the date on which government fuel subsidies would end. The International Monetary Fund (IMF) agreement received little attention in the press and most Haitians were unaware of pending changes or how it would impact their daily lives. Electricity in Haiti is provided by a centralized government run utility company, Electricité d'Haïti (EDH), and most people live in homes which do not receive any electricity. Even those homes that are connected to EDH do not receive predictable or abundant electricity. Electricity is turned on in rotating grids for 4–8 h per day with some rare neighborhoods receiving priority for additional electricity and others going without any electricity at all for weeks or months at a time.

Haitians cope with the limited access to power by using alternative sources. Though use of wind and solar power is rare, it is increasing. Most homes are lit with glass kerosene lamps, the fuel for which was subsidized at 51% under the current system. Families and businesses which can afford to do so opt for gas or diesel generators which they connect to cobbled-together (and frequently dangerous) electrical systems that use an inverter to charge a series of car batteries. Depending on the quality and quantity of the batteries and the inverter, and strength of the generator, a gallon of gas or diesel in the generator can provide 2–10 h of electricity for lights, a refrigerator, charging phones, or running a fan. The price of gasoline would increase by 38% without the subsidy that was in place at the time, while the cost of diesel would go up by 47%.

The price of fuel at the pump, which includes taxes and fees, is set by the Haitian government each year and included in the national budget. In 2006, then President Rene Prèval signed the PetroCaribe agreement under which Venezuela met most of Haiti's petroleum needs, paying for 60% of the cost of the fuel upfront and the remainder over 25 years at 1% interest. The Haitian government then acts as a broker, reselling the fuel to the four major companies that in turn supply the country's gas stations and airports. The private companies pay upfront from the fuel they are receiving and resell it at set prices.

The funds generated by the PetroCaribe agreement were to be used by the central government for infrastructure and development projects and under Prèval they were, with most being earmarked for education, health care, and disaster preparedness and response. Observers noted that PetroCaribe funds were easier and faster to disperse after the January 2010 earthquake, while foreign funding took months or years to arrive and primarily to NGOs or foreign entities, rather than Haiti's central government.

However, in 2012, after Rene Prèval's term ended, the ease with which the funds could be used led to a national scandal when the new president, Michel Joseph Martelly, was accused of receiving kickbacks totaling more than $2.5 million, in exchange for awarding construction and development contracts which were supposed to have been subject to competitive bidding. Despite this, the Haitian government continued to rely heavily on PetroCaribe to supply most of the country's petroleum-based fuels through 2016, when the program became less active due to economic changes in Venezuela.

This was not the first time in recent years that Haitians had protested the cost of fuel. In February 2015, a national transportation strike shut the country down for 2 days as protestors demanded a decrease in government-set prices for fuel. At the time, gasoline was USD$4.50 a gallon and diesel was USD$3.55 a gallon. Then Prime Minister Evans Paul initially refused to change fuel prices saying the government "cannot lower the price of petrol. It's not that we do not want to, it's because we are not able to." However, after intervention from abroad and prodding from MINUSTAH technical advisors, he later relented and announced a reduction in the price of gas and diesel by USD$0.25 and USD$0.20 respectively.

The price of fuel has long been associated with the high cost of living, or lavi chè, as it is referred to in Haitian Creole. In 2015, fuel prices were one of several bones of contention leading to national protests, along with concerns about delayed and irregular national elections that left the Martelly government ruling by decree. Elections were eventually held and Martelly's handpicked successor, Jovenel Moïse, became president in February 2017. Moïse, a businessman from Trou-du-Nord, pledged to balance the national budget and directed cabinet ministers to cooperate with international partners, including the IMF, in implementing structural changes to make Haiti more attractive to foreign investors. One of those steps, outlined in President Moïse's March 2017 roadmap of priorities, was the cooperation with the IMF and technical advising from MINUSTAH, including elimination of the fuel subsidies.

Knowing the incendiary potential of a public announcement that fuel prices would increase 38–51% overnight, the Ministers of Finance and Commerce decided to release the news during the July 6 World Cup quarter final game between Brazil and Belgium. Brazil's football team is wildly popular in Haiti; many businesses closed for the World Cup games with banks and government ministries closing for an extended lunch period so employees could watch the game. But the game ended unexpectedly early and news announcements about the fuel price increase directly followed on most radio and television stations. Within hours, the streets were filled with protestors and makeshift roadblocks had been erected by residents across all major highways. Four months of protests followed. Schools and businesses remained closed. Periods of protest with demonstrations and violence-enforced strikes, called "peyi lok" (roughly translated as "countrywide lockdown" in Haitian Creole), continued through the following year. The protests expanded to include concerns about the economy, democratic rule, the departure of the UN mission, and concerns about government corruption. By the time

MINUJUSTH closed in 2019, 42 people had been killed in the protests, 17 of whom died in the 5 weeks preceding the closure of the mission (IFRC 2020).

Progress Toward Mission Mandates

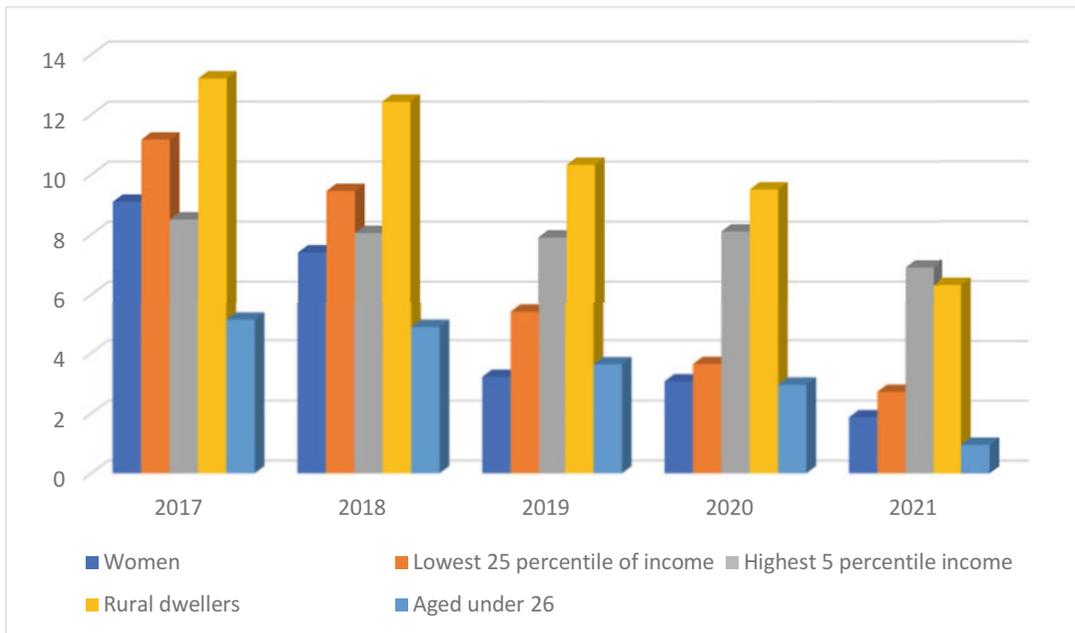

While the first UN mission in Haiti had been state-centric and designed to restore democracy through state institutions, MINUSTAH, and by extension MINUJUSTH were decidedly more diffuse in their approach to accomplishing their mandates. Resources were intentionally decentralized and often directed away from the Haitian state. In the case of CVR, this led to a wide portfolio of interventions that effectively reached some of the country’s more marginalized people. But as a road toward strengthening democratic institutions, at the end of the UN’s tenure, the Haitian people were particularly convinced that their country was a functioning democracy.

Longitudinal data from public opinion polls between 2018 and 2020 demonstrate decreased agreement with the statement “Right now, Haiti is a democracy” (see Fig. 3). Similarly, citizens were not confident that the HNP would be available to help them if they were needed protection (see Fig. 4). It appears that, from the perspective of ordinary Haitians, MINUJUSTH was unsuccessful in meeting its goals. MINUJUSTH closed 15 continuous years of UN peacekeeping presence in Haiti on October 15, 2019.

Notes

1. A longitudinal survey was conducted in Haiti using random sampling methods. Beginning in August 2011, representatives of households residing in urban areas of Port-au-Prince, Les Cayes, Cap Haitien, Gonaives, St. Marc, Jacmel, and Leogane were randomly selected and surveyed about their experiences with crime, their quality of life, and their ability to access basic human services such as health care. Respondents were then recontacted and interviewed monthly for 1 year. Households who reported a member or members who experienced cholera were interviewed every 6 months between August 2013 and August 2016. This section presents data from an assessment that applied a random GPS coordinate sampling approach to surveying local

United Nations Missions in Haiti, Fig. 3 Percentage of citizens agreeing with the statement “Right now, Haiti is a democracy”

United Nations Missions in Haiti, Fig. 4 Percentage of citizens who were confident that the HNP would be available to help them if they needed protection populations. Specifically, households in urban areas of Haiti were selected for inclusion in the assessment. A total of 3000 households participated in 6 surveys, each 30 days apart, with a response rate of 90.4%. Participants included 1255 households in the greater Port-au-Prince area, 532 in Cap Haitien, 201 in Jacmel, 212 in St. Marc, 298 in Gonaives, 243 in Leogane, and 259 in Les Cayes. A two-member research team visited the selected home and randomly selected an adult over the age of 18 to interview. The same adult was subsequently contacted on a monthly basis for follow-up interviews via telephone through May 17, 2013. Households with a member who contracted cholera were then contacted and interviewed via telephone every 6 months thereafter through June 10, 2016.

Summary

The controversial and often violent United Nations peacekeeping interventions in Haiti spanned several decades, beginning with the country's rocky transition to democracy in the 1980s, skipping through several coups, and finally ending with a short justice system- and policing-focused mission in 2019.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conflicts and Natural Disasters
- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Human Security
- ▶ Peacebuilding–Development Nexus
- ▶ Police Reform and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Post-conflict Nation-building
- ▶ Rule of Law as a Component of Peace Operations
- ▶ Security Sector Reform After Armed Conflict
- ▶ Socioeconomic Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ Urban Violence and Crime

References

- Abbott, E. (1988). Haiti: the Duvaliers and their legacy. New York: McGraw-Hill.
- Al Jazeera. (2012, March 14). UN Pakistani troops convicted in Haiti trial. <https://www.aljazeera.com/news/2012/3/14/un-pakistani-troops-convicted-in-haiti-trial>
- Aristide, J. B. (1996). Dignity. University of Virginia Press.
- Barzilay, E. J., Schaad, N., Magloire, R., Mung, K. S., Boney, J., Dahourou, G. A., Mintz, E. D., Steenland, M. W., Vertefeuille, J. F., & Tappero, J. W. (2013). Cholera surveillance during the Haiti epidemic—The first 2 years. The New England Journal of Medicine, 368(7), 599–609.
- BBC. (2006, November 30). UN troops face child abuse claims. <http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/americas/6195830.stm>
- Blair, S. A. (1997). What kind of mission for Haiti? Peacekeeping & International Relations, 26(3), 1.
- Bode, T. G. (2015). Cholera in Haiti: United Nations immunity and accountability. Georgetown Journal of International Law, 47, 759.
- Burgess, J., & Waananen, L. (2013, March 31). How the cholera epidemic spread. The New York Times. <http://www.nytimes.com/interactive/2012/03/31/world/americas/how-the-haiti-cholera-epidemic-spread.html>
- Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. (2011). Cholera in Haiti: One year later. http://www.cdc.gov/haiticholera/haiti_cholera.htm
- Chin, C., Sorenson, J., Harris, J. B., Robins, W. P., Charles, R. C., Jean-Charles, R. R., Bullard, J., Webster, D. R., Kasarskis, A., Peluso, P., Paxinos, E. E., Yamaichi, Y., Calderwood, S. B., Mekalanos, J. J., Schadt, E. E., & Waldor, M. K. (2011). The origin of the Haitian cholera outbreak strain. The New England Journal of Medicine, 364(1), 33–42.
- Concannon, B. (2018). JISB interview: Cholera, accountability, and the UN in Haiti. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 12(1), 142–154.
- Cynn, C. (2008). Nou Mande Jistis!(we demand justice!): Reconstituting community and victimhood in Raboteau, Haiti. Women's Studies Quarterly, 36(1/2), 42–57.
- Dodds, P. (2017, April 12). UN child sex ring left victims but no arrests. Associated Press. <https://apnews.com/article/e6ebc331460345c5abd4f57d77f535c1>
- Donais, T. (2005). Back to square one: The politics of police reform in Haiti. Civil Wars, 7(3), 270–287.
- dos Santos Parra, M. (2019). Minustah's legitimacy and the 'security-first' approach: Reassessing statebuilding and its violent features in the case of Haiti. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 13(4), 480–502.
- Dupuy, A. (2005). From Jean-Bertrand Aristide to Gerard Latortue: The unending crisis of democratization in Haiti. The Journal of Latin American and Caribbean Anthropology, 10(1), 186.
- Dupuy, A. (2006). Haiti election 2006: A pyrrhic victory for René Préval? Latin American Perspectives, 33(3), 132–141.
- Farah, D., & Tarr, M. (1993, October 12). Haitians block US troop arrival. Washington Post. <https://www.washingtonpost.com/archive/politics/1993/10/12/haitians-block-us-troop-arrival/ad1839e7-c4e2-4ae0-9104-c43d66d4d60b/>
- French, H.W. (1993, September 22). Haiti in turmoil as it awaits Aristide. New York Times, Section A, Page 3. <https://www.nytimes.com/1993/09/22/world/haiti-in-turmoil-as-it-awaits-aristide.html>
- Girard, P. R. (2005). Epilogue: Where are they now? In Paradise lost (pp. 214–216). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Granderson, C. (1998). Military-humanitarian ambiguities in Haiti. In J. Moore (Ed.), Hard choices: Moral dilemmas in humanitarian intervention (pp. 99–118). Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
- Hallward, P. (2008). Damming the flood: Haiti, Aristide, and the politics of containment. New York: Verso.
- Harston, J. (2001). The civilian police element in UN peacekeeping: The case of Haiti. In W. A. Knight (Ed.), Adapting the United Nations to a postmodern era (pp. 140–149). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hendriksen, R. S., Price, L. B., Schupp, J. M., Gillece, J. D., Kaas, R. S., Engelthaler, D. M., Bortolaia, V., Pearson, T., Waters, A. E., Upadhyay, B. P., Shrestha, S. D., Adhikari, S., Shakya, G., Keim, P. S., & Aarestrup, F. M. (2011). Population genomics of Vibrio cholera from Nepal in 2010: Evidence on the origin of the Haitian outbreak. American Society for Microbiology, 2(4), 157–111.
- Henry, F. (2020). The slow rise of social movement organizations for memorialization in Haiti: Lutte Contre Impunite, Devoire de memoire-Haiti and digitizing the record on atrocities. In Mass violence and memory in the digital age (pp. 175–196). Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Human Rights Watch. (1993, January 1). Human Rights Watch World Report 1993 – Haiti. <https://www.refworld.org/docid/467fca651f.html>
- IFRC. (2020). DREF final report: Haiti civil unrest. <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/MDRHT017fr.pdf>
- IGC. (2005). Spoiling Security in Haiti. <https://www.crisisgroup.org/latin-america-caribbean/haiti/spoiling-security-haiti>
- Iwata, T. (1999). The extension of MIPONUH and Haiti's democratization process. Peacekeeping & International Relations, 28(1), 8.
- James, E. C. (2010). Democratic insecurities: Violence, trauma, and intervention in Haiti (Vol. 22). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Katz, J. M. (2010, November 9). Surge of cholera feared in Haiti's crowded capital. Associated Press. Retrieved from <http://phys.org/news/2010-11-surge-cholera-haiti-crowded-capital.html>

- Katz, J. M. (2016, August 17) Facing stern report, U.N. admits role in Haiti's cholera outbreak. New York Times. Page A1. <http://nyti.ms/2byZjZU>
- Klarreich, K. (1993, November 8). Conditions deteriorate in Haiti as military boycotts latest talks. Christian Science Monitor. <https://www.csmonitor.com/1993/1108/08031.html>
- Knight, W. A. (2001). Adapting the United Nations to a postmodern era: Lessons learned. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kolbe, A. R. (2013). Revisiting Haiti's gangs and organized violence. Rio de Janeiro: HASOW.
- Kolbe, A. R. (2020). Prospects for post-Minustah security in Haiti. International Peacekeeping, 27(1), 44–57.
- Kolbe, A. R. & Hutson, R. A. (2006) Human Rights Abuses and Other Criminal Violations in Port-au-Prince, Haiti: A Random Survey of Households. Lancet 368(9538), 864–873.
- Kolbe, A. R., & Muggah, R. (2011). Securing the state: Haiti before and after the earthquake. In G. McDonald (Ed.), Small arms survey 2011: States of security. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kolbe, A. R., & Muggah, R. (2012). Haiti's urban crime wave: Results from Monthly Household Surveys (August 2011–February 2012). Igarape Institute. <https://igarape.org.br/wp-content/uploads/2015/05/Haitis-Urban-Crime-Wave.pdf>
- Kolbe, A. R., Hutson, R. A., Shannon, H., Trzcinski, E., Miles, B., Levitz, N., et al. (2010). Mortality, crime and access to basic needs before and after the Haiti earthquake: A random survey of Port-au-Prince households. Medicine, Conflict and Survival, 26(4), 281–297.
- Korson, C. (2015). Framing peace: The role of media, perceptions, and United Nations peacekeeping operations in Haiti and cote d'Ivoire. Geopolitics, 20(2), 354–380.
- Kreps, S. E. (2007). The 1994 Haiti intervention: A unilateral operation in multilateral clothes. Journal of Strategic Studies, 30(3), 449–474.
- Kretchik, W. E. (2003). Multinational staff effectiveness in UN peace operations: The case of the US army and UNMIH, 1994–1995. Armed Forces & Society, 29(3), 393–413.
- Kretchik, W. E. (2016). Eyewitness to chaos: Personal accounts of the intervention in Haiti, 1994. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press.
- Lindsay, R. (2006). Peace despite the peacekeepers in Haiti. NACLA Report on the Americas, 39(6), 31–36.
- Luquero, F. J., Rondy, M., Boncy, J., Munger, A., Mekaoui, H., Rymshaw, E., et al. (2016). Mortality rates during cholera epidemic, Haiti, 2010–2011. Emerging Infectious Disease 22(3). Accessed online August 24, 2016 from http://wwwnc.cdc.gov/eid/article/22/3/14-1970_article.
- Malone, D. (1997). Haiti and the international community: A case study. Survival, 39(2), 126–146.
- Marshall, E. (1995). International experts probe Haiti's bloody past. Science, 269(5232), 1812–1814.
- McDougal, T. L., Kolbe, A., Muggah, R., & Marsh, N. (2019). Ammunition leakage from military to civilian markets: Market price evidence from Haiti, 2004–2012. Defence and Peace Economics, 30(7), 799–812.
- Meharg, S. J. (1996). Haiti. Peacekeeping & International Relations, 25(6), 16.
- Meisler, S. (1993, 4 July). Haiti rivals sign pact to restore Aristide to power: Caribbean: Under intense international pressure, hesitant president joins army chief in approving U.N. accord. Deal would return the ousted leader by Oct. 30. Los Angeles Times. <https://www.latimes.com/archives/la-xpm-1993-07-04-mn-9957-story.html>
- Mendelson-Forman, J. (2006). Security sector reform in Haiti. International Peacekeeping, 13(1), 14–27.
- Muggah, R. (Ed.). (2009). Security and post-conflict reconstruction. New York: Routledge.
- Nairn, A. (1994). Behind Haiti's paramilitaries: Our man in FRAPH. The Nation, 24, 458–463.
- Pan American Health Organisation. (2013). PAHO/WHO to support Haiti with $500,000 for water and sanitation connections in health centers. Press release distributed 5 March 2013.
- Piarroux, R., Barrais, R., Faucher, B., Haus, R., Piarroux, M., Gaudart, J., Magloire, R., & Raoult, D. (2011). Understanding the cholera epidemic, Haiti. Emerging Infectious Diseases, 17(7), 1161–1168.
- Pingeot, L. (2018). United Nations peace operations as international practices: Revisiting the UN mission's armed raids against gangs in Haiti. European Journal of International Security, 3(3), 364–381.
- Ramalho, A., & de Souza Neto, D. M. (2014). United Nations Mission in Haiti (UNMIH). In J. A. Koops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. D. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Regan, J. (2005). Haiti: In bondage to history? NACLA Report on the Americas, 38(4), 4–7.
- Reisman, W. M. (1995). Haiti and the validity of international action. The American Journal of International Law, 89(1), 82–84.
- Roy, T. (1999). Did the absence of a Haitian strategy mean repeating history? Peacekeeping & International Relations, 28(1), 8.
- Russell, G. (2013, May 23). As renewed Haiti cholera crisis looms, UN blamed for inadequate effort. Fox News. <http://www.foxnews.com/world/2013/05/23/as-renewed-haiti-cholera-crisis-looms-un-blamed-for-inadequate-effort/>
- Schaaf, B. (2010, October 29). Cholera, water, and recovery in Haiti. Innovation Haiti. <http://haitiinnovation.org/en/2010/10/29/cholera-water-and-recovery-haiti>
- Schuberth, M. (2017). Disarmament, demobilization and reintegration in unconventional settings: The case of MINUSTAH's community violence reduction. International Peacekeeping, 24(3), 410–433.
- Schuller, M. (2012). Killing with kindness: Haiti, international aid, and NGOs. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.

- Siman, M., & Galoumian, V. (2015). United Nations Support Mission in Haiti (UNSMIH). In J. A. Koops, T. Tardy, N. MacQueen, & P. D. Williams (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of United Nations peacekeeping operations. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Solomon, B. (1999). The economic analysis for a peacekeeping mission: A summary paper. Peace Economics, Peace Science and Public Policy, 5(1). <https://doi.org/10.2202/1554-8597.1017>.
- Sprague, J. (2012). Paramilitarism and the assault on democracy in Haiti. New York: NYU Press.
- Stoelting, D., Schense, J., Washburn, J. L., Shenk, M. D., Newquist, B. J., Stone, L., et al. (2001). International criminal law. The International Lawyer, 35(2), 613–647.
- Suárez, L. M. (2003). Breath, eyes, memory: Rape, memory, and denunciation. Journal of Haitian Studies, 9, 111–125.
- Tappero, J. W., & Tauxe, R. V. (2011). Lessons learned during public health response to cholera epidemic in Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Emerging Infectious Diseases, 17(11), 2087–2093.
- Von Einsiedel, S., & Malone, D. M. (2006). Peace and democracy for Haiti: A UN mission impossible? International Relations, 20(2), 153–174.
- Walton, D. A., & Ivers, L. C. (2011). Responding to cholera in post-earthquake Haiti. New England Journal of Medicine, 364(1), 3–5.
- Weisbrot, M. (1997). Structural adjustment in Haiti. Monthly Review, 48(8), 25.
- Whitney, K. M. (1996). SIN, FRAPH, and the CIA: US covert action in Haiti. Southwestern Journal of Law and Trade in the Americas, 3, 303.

UNMIH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

Unrecognised State

- ▶ Moldova-Transnistria Conflict

UNSCR 1325

- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

UNSCR1325

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

UNSMIH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

UNTMIH

- ▶ United Nations Missions in Haiti

Urban Gangs

- ▶ Urban Violence and Crime

Urban Peacebuilding

Annika Björkdahl

Department of Political Science, Lund University, Lund, Sweden

Introduction

This chapter is concerned with processes of peace that are situated within and constitutive of the cityscape. In particular, it locates peacebuilding in conflict-affected cities where divisions and barriers separate communities and bring about ruptures in the urban dynamic. Often these divides remain regardless of peace processes, national peace accords, and international efforts at peacebuilding. Cities like Nicosia, Mostar, and Belfast have proved remarkably resistant to liberal peacebuilding efforts aimed at reconstruction, reintegration, and reconciliation (Bollens 2011; Nagle 2009; Brand and Fregonese 2013). Here physical separation of communities has emerged as a short-sighted and counterproductive solution to violent conflicts. These divided cities demonstrate the importance of the urban to peacebuilding and show how urban conditions can dictate the ability to build peace. Thus, the urban is proposed as a prism through which to view and understand peacebuilding processes localized in the city and describe whereby the urban conditions the construction, maintenance, or resistance to peace.

To rethink and re-theorize where peace takes place, the urban dimension needs to be added in order to ground peacebuilding in the city. This chapter suggests that peacebuilding needs to be rescaled to the urban and that such urbanized peacebuilding is better able to address causes of conflict at the urban scale, mitigate tensions in the urban dynamics and counter spatial practices in the city that uphold divisions and conflict, and resist reconciliation. The urban peacebuilding approach is situated in broader critical peacebuilding theory and at the same time hinges on conditions pertaining at the urban scale (Bollens 2011; Björkdahl 2013).

Urban peacebuilding is not peacebuilding in miniature. There is something distinctive about urban peacebuilding beyond merely general peacebuilding adapted to scale. Rather the urban focus creates a particular kind of peacebuilding paradigm that is not a mirror image of liberal peacebuilding at the state level. Instead it challenges the logic of peacebuilding as statebuilding and provides a pertinent critique of state-centrism and Westphalian territoriality as it raises new questions about the city as subordinate to the state and the principle that the world is divided into sovereign states. The city, where urban peacebuilding unfolds, is a political entity that is heterogeneous, densely populated, and open and permeable. As such, it occupies a central position within its wider sociopolitical context, and functions through mixing, conflict, accommodation, creativity, and fragmentation (see Brenner 2014; Lefebvre 1996; Sassen 2013). The divided city, which can be seen as a host to differences and conflict where identities become mutually exclusive and the basis for politics. However, the city is also a site where difference can be negotiated and transcended. Thus, these characteristics of the city condition peacebuilding, and peace takes specific urban forms when being built in the city.

Emplacing Peace and Peacebuilding in the Urban

This chapter unpacks the multidimensionality of peacebuilding, emplaces peace and peacebuilding in the urban, and conceptually develops the notion of urban peacebuilding. By marrying critical peacebuilding literature and urban studies peace is connected with the urban, where the everyday unfolds, and thus provides a complementary lens through which to analyze peace and peacebuilding. Three concepts – the urban, urban peace, and urban peacebuilding – provide key interlinked, conceptual building blocks to situate peacebuilding in the urban.

The Urban

Rescaling to the urban means to disentangle the urban from the rural and the global. The urban is an umbrella concept embracing both the city and city life. It is associated with (1) the materiality of the cityscape; (2) urban dynamics, i.e., the relational aspect of city life; as well as (3) a spatial scale of operation.

The materiality of the cityscape captures urban places such as material barriers, peace walls, buffer zones as well as crossings, and open public places such as squares, streets, bridges, cafes, sports arenas, and shopping malls. In the divided Cypriot capital Nicosia, the material and political legacy of the conflict prevent peace from being built across the divide. In response to interethnic violence in Nicosia, a Green Line was drawn through the capital and across the island separating the two communities while creating a buffer zone on each side guarded by UN peacekeepers (Papadakis 2005; Papadakis et al. 2006). In Nicosia the division continues to run through the city center, and freedom of movement is restricted as there is still a requirement to formally check out on one side and then check in to the other side by using one's passport (Bakshi 2015). The zone between the checkpoints is often referred to as the "dead zone," "no man's land," or "UN land" (Papadakis 2005).

The urban also describes actor interactions within the closeness of the urban space (Magnuson 2011). Urban dynamics embraces aspects of human interactions and subjectivity, everyday life, and the performances of multiple dimensions of identity that are central to understandings of social life and relationships. In Nicosia, for example, an unexpected political decision to open some of the checkpoints in 2003 paved way for crossing the border between the Southern and the Northern part of Nicosia and facilitated the ambitions to increase mobility between the two sides. Yet, the communities continue to be separated along the lines of the zone, and the presence of “the other” in one’s everyday is rare. Crossings remain irregular, and the buffer zone retains its militarized character with the presence of peacekeepers, barb wire, and control stations. The bicomunal movement has built a home for cooperation in the buffer zone trying to create a shared space, but the bicomunal activities undertaken often fail to reach out to other sectors of society, and many Cypriots today show a reclining interest in interacting with the other, co-construct shared spaces and cross to the other side.

Like social interactions, politics operate differently at the urban scale (Murtagh 2002). Central to urban politics is the notion of propinquity, which does not apply at other scales (John 2003), but describes a particular political practice where the political leadership is close to its diverse constituencies and to what it administers and where politics, and thus peace and peacebuilding, extend way beyond the formal institutions into the realms of everyday life. In the late 1970s, the two mayors of Nicosia, Lellos Demetriades representing the Greek Cypriots in the South part of the divided city and Mustafa Akinci representing the Turkish Cypriots in the North, struggled to connect the two sides of the city. While both leaders looked for a solution to the political situation, they realized they also needed to deal with the immediate everyday problems of the city, reversing the decay and centrifugal growth of the city and ensuring that the collaboration on the sewage system would continue despite the frozen conflict (Demetriades, cited in Björkdahl and Kappler 2017; Akinci, cited in Björkdahl and Kappler 2017). Being close to their respective constituencies, they had a better grasp of the urban dwellers’ everyday struggles in the divided city, and they were able to use practical solutions to everyday problems as means of building trust and foster collaboration that proved useful for further collaboration to challenge the divisions in the city.

Urban Peacebuilding

Urban peacebuilding involves a number of place-based and people-related processes such as mediating intergroup competition over territory and resources; constructing safe, shared public spaces; limiting the spatial expression of conflictual discourses; opening up the city; and dismantling material barriers in order to build positive relationships, heal wounds, reconcile antagonistic differences, restore esteem, respect rights, meet basic needs, enhance equality, instill feelings of security, and empower the disempowered (Bollens 2011; Lederach and Appleby 2010). The post-conflict city is the arena on which urban peacebuilding unfolds.

Urban peacebuilding strategies address the urban scale of operation, and as such they focus on material places and structures, urban politics and institutions, and urban dynamics. Thus, urban peacebuilding aims to transform material places by grounding peace; to alter the dynamic of social interactions toward peaceful cooperation, integration, and reconciliation; and to change spatial practices in order to enhance mobility while realizing that the urban scale of operation is messy and difficult to disentangle from other scales and that peace is both multi-scalar and trans-scalar. More practically urban peacebuilding is realizing the peace dividend to the urban dwellers. Shared public spaces are regarded a core feature of cities, and they offer potential for peacebuilding as such spaces can stimulate social interaction to overcome divisions by assuming “a right of inclusion for all” (cf. Murtagh and Keaveney 2006; Shirlow and Murtagh 2004). Urban peacebuilding strategies interact with and are mediated by various forms of material and immaterial urban structures. Urban structures stress the functional character of spatial elements such as borders, boundaries, frontiers, and their effect on cooperation and coordination of the partitioned entity in matters concerning the whole urban area.

The Nicosia Master Plan (NMP) is an urban peacebuilding strategy developed in collaboration between Greek and Turkish Cypriot urban planners to restore and revitalize the city as a city for all, both Greek Cypriots and Turkish Cypriots (Bakshi 2015). Almost 100 local NMP projects committed to contributing to the revitalization of Nicosia as a whole including the restoration of churches and mosques on both sides of the Green Line have now been completed.

To alter the urban dynamics and spatial practices in the divided city, the urban planners launched the bicomunal Nicosia Master Plan Walk with the aim to increase mobility, unify the city, and enable its user to experience the city as one in its structure across both sides of the city. It is a municipality-based initiative that cuts across the buffer zone and to create a common space for people to walk in the city of Nicosia (Bakshi 2015; Demetriou 2007). Through material symbols along the pathway that guide the walker, the Nicosia Master Plan Walk brings the city together into a whole for the ones that choose to follow the path (Papadopoulou, cited in Björkdahl and Kappler 2017). It enables people to criss-cross from the South of Nicosia via the opened checkpoints at Ledra Street and walk through the UN-patrolled buffer zone into the Turkish Cypriot Northern part of the city where Ledra Street changes its name to Lokomaci street. The Nicosia Master Plan Walk takes the walker to a number of urban projects. Many of the projects are about preserving the historic architecture of the city within the Venetian walls, but the Nicosia Master Plan Walk also highlights two major residential rehabilitation projects: the Chrysaliniotissa and Arab Ahmet areas located on either side of the buffer zone. These two neighborhoods have long been neglected because of their proximity to the buffer zone, and they housed a large percentage of low-income households. As a consequence, the urban peacebuilding initiatives to improve the housing conditions and the provisions of community facilities have contributed to the revitalization of Nicosia on both sides of the Green Line. The Nicosia Master Plan has had profound implications for the urban order in Nicosia and made the Old City more attractive and economically more thriving (Bakshi 2015).

Moreover, the opening of the Ledra Street crossing has made an impact on the urban dynamics. According to a survey, 57% of Greek Cypriots said that they visit the Old City more frequently since the opening. However, only 34% of Turkish Cypriots reported the same (Jacobson et al. 2009: 17). Thus, there have been some changes in spatial practices with the opening of the crossings. In that sense, the Nicosia Master Plan Walk can be regarded as a successful urban peacebuilding initiative as it made use of the mobility offered by the opening of the checkpoints to overcome both the material and immaterial barriers between the North and the South of the city.

Urban Peace

Without being based in concrete places, peace is simply an abstraction. Thus, peace conceived and achieved on a small scale is contextualized and tangible. The relational combined with the spatial is the core of an understanding of urban peace. Thus, urban peace is about socio-spatial relations that are always made and re-made. Clearly, the organization of place and space is central to the structure and function of peace.

Urban peace is closely aligned with plural forms of peace and emplaced in the urban. The concept of urban peace offers a positive epistemology raising the possibility of post-sovereign ontologies of peace and develops an understanding of alternative social, political, and spatial ontologies of peace (and barriers to them) (Rasmussen 2003; Richmond 2008). This concept of peace relates to an emancipatory project, reflecting both agency and the everyday. Such peace is understood as ever “becoming” and best characterized as a process – not an outcome. Urban peace is shaped by the locality in which it finds itself (see, e.g., Björkdahl and Buckley-Zistel 2016). This is evident when it comes to how peace is playing out in the city. The interplay between the city and in how it is constituted and how it functions “urbanizes” peace and efforts to build peace. The urban peace is an emplaced peace that deals with issues that have “real” consequences to the urban dwellers, such as employment, housing, and local investments. Urban peace is about everyday practices that may transcend negative peace and that speaks to the ideal of the positive peace. Adopting an urban peace, however, must mean rejecting the universalist claims of positive peace, because the urban peace is a type of peace that is invested with contextual characteristics. By being contextualized urban peace may provide a particular space and horizon of transformation from war to peace.

The Nicosia Master Plan Walk helps highlighting the achievements of urban planners to build an urban peace, enplace the peace in the urban, and help materialize the abstract notion of peace. The Walk thus represents some steps toward the realization of an urban peace as it connects the two parts of the Old City together through the spatial practice of walking and it creates a presence as well as movement that challenges the infrastructure of the divided city. It almost makes the checkpoints irrelevant through its deliberate decision to make the process of crossing a part of the Walk and decreases the relevance of the visible and invisible borders to movement. However, the Walk is not used by the majority of the local citizens and is therefore restricted in visibility and not part of everyday practices. Nevertheless, it creates a key avenue to a process, which transforms the infrastructure of the city and, with this, the ways in which peace is perceived by the urban dwellers.

What Lessons Can Be Learned from Urban Peacebuilding in Nicosia?

The liberal peacebuilding efforts in Cyprus in general have not been calibrated to address persistent conflict dynamics in the city and the material legacy of conflict, and most of the efforts undertaken have not managed to reconcile the divide. One reason is that the efforts have been guided by a liberal peacebuilding approach which is based on a statist ontology and as such it has rarely managed to grasp and address the material manifestation of conflict in the urban space or the everyday issues that conditions the building of peace. Manifestations of the conflict in terms of, for example, buffer zones freeze the conflict, and frozen conflicts evoke an intricate relation between conflict dynamics and urban dynamics, including sociocultural and subjective, spatial and temporal, as well as political dimensions of power that urban peacebuilding must address. In Nicosia the UN buffer zone and physical walls of separation contribute to the persistence of conflict and intercommunal tensions and stimulate oppressive political discourses, which polarize intercommunal relations. To transform the buffer zone has proved to be a real challenge as people’s everyday practices and perceptions have proved hard to change. Moreover, state-centric liberal peacebuilding initiatives often fail to connect to the place-based, everyday issues such as infrastructure, housing, and schooling and to improve the conditions of everyday life in multiple deprived areas such as the low-income household areas close to the buffer zone in Nicosia.

In contrast, and as the empirical examples of urban peacebuilding in Nicosia show, peacebuilding rescaled to the urban can better address urban conflict-generating practices such as political polarization and ethnic segregation and their material manifestations such as barb wire and sand bags that function as walls of separation that produce ethno-nationalist enclaves. Moreover, urban peacebuilding can better utilize urban peace-enhancing practices such as collaborative urban planning initiatives, movement cross divides, and bicomunal cooperation across conflict lines to generate a positive urban dynamic helpful to build a sustainable peace (Bollens 1999; Gaffikin and Morrissey 2011). As demonstrated in Nicosia, the urban peace depicts the dynamic relationship between peace and place, including sociocultural tolerance, diversity, and spatial, temporal, as well as political dimensions of power. In a sense, the urban peace has much in common with the cosmopolitan city, which stands in contrast to the conflict-affected and divided city. Urban peacebuilding, as illustrated by the initiatives in Nicosia, is a transformative strategy, which seeks to transform power relations expressed and represented in the urban landscape. When successful, urban peacebuilding changes spatial practices and contributes to urban dynamics that enhance mobility, seeing the other in one's everyday, and access to space and politics. It is about encouraging wider social change through transforming the antagonistic relationship between the parties to the conflict and by negotiating the identity of urban communities in relation to place. It zooms in on processes of peace, which are situated within and constitutive of different spaces and places. Such strategies build peace where peace actually "takes place," addressing place production in identity politics and the spatialization of identity-based conflict.

Summary

Here a spatial perspective as a set of analytical tools has been mobilized to bring analytical clarity and purchase on where peace and peacebuilding are situated. It is because of the traction that such tools give to peace and conflict research they are central to the project of urbanizing peacebuilding. By rescaling peacebuilding to the urban, we are able to better understand how the urban conditions processes of peace and conflict dynamics. It has helped rework some key assumptions about peace and conflict and their relation to space and place. For example, it is possible to think of a spatially divided peace, i.e., two peace(s) co-existing in a divided city like Nicosia. A spatially divided peace challenges the idea of peace as undivided.

Through the prism of the urban, it has been possible to identify and map peace activities that frequently are under the radar of peacebuilding researchers, such as regeneration programs, opening up of boarders and barriers stimulating mobility, and everyday cooperation driven by pragmatic concerns. Urban peacebuilding, as shown here, transforms the cityscape, alters perceptions of space, and changes the spatial practices of urban dwellers. Urban peacebuilding is, as we can see from the empirical example of Nicosia, rooted in place-based politics and in local institutions that may provide a forum for negotiations across differences. In that sense, peacebuilding grounded in urban politics offers new possibilities for bringing together multiple political trajectories and stimulates co-existence of different groups. Urban peacebuilding is thus related to the city as it comprises cosmopolitan spaces of tolerance and civility and where a shared civic identity can be developed. Moreover, it is possible to conceive of an urban peace as a potential incubator for large transformations of society and governance toward a multi-scalar and sustainable peace. While urban peacebuilding may offer a path to peace in some cases, it is not a panacea. In promoting an orientation that connects peace with urban space, the ambition is not only to critically examine existing peacebuilding practices and theories but also to provide a complementary approach through which to expand the conduct of peacebuilding.

Cross-References

- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Human Geography and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Bakshi, A. (2015). Nicosia Master Plan: Planning across the divide. In A. Björkdahl & L. Strömbom (Eds.), Divided cities: Governing diversity. Lund: Nordic Academic Press.
- Björkdahl, A. (2013). Urban peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 1(2), 207–221.
- Björkdahl, A., & Buckley-Zistel, S. (Eds.). (2016). Spatialising peace and conflict: Mapping the production of place, sites and scales of violence. Basingstoke/New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Björkdahl, A., & Kappler, S. (2017). Peacebuilding and spatial transformation. Peace, space and place. Abingdon/New York: Routledge.
- Bollens, S. (1999). Urban peacebuilding in divided societies: Belfast and Johannesburg. Boulder: Westview Press.
- Bollens, S. (2011). City and soul in divided societies. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Brand, R., & Fregonese, S. (2013). The radicals' city: Urban environment, polarisation, cohesion. Surrey: Ashgate.
- Brenner, N. (2014). Implosions/explosions: Towards a study of planetary urbanization. Berlin: Jovis.
- Demetriou, O. (2007). Freedom Square: The unspoken of a divided city. Hagar Studies in Culture, Polity, and Identities, 7(1), 55–77.
- Gaffikin, F., & Morrissey, M. (2011). Planning in divided cities. Hoboken: Wiley-Blackwell Pub.
- Jacobson, D., Musyck, B., Orphanides, S., & Webster, C. (2009). The opening of Ledra Street/Lokmaci crossing in April 2008. Nicosia: PRIO Cyprus Centre Report.

- John, P. (2003). Methodologies and research methods in urban political science. In H. Baldersheim & H. Wollmann (Eds.), The comparative study of local government and politics: Overview and synthesis (pp. 67–82). Opladen: Barbara Budrich Publishers.
- Lederach, J. P., & Appleby, S. (2010). Strategic peacebuilding: An overview. In D. Philpott & F. Gerard (Eds.), Powers strategies of peace: Transforming conflict in a violent world (pp. 19–44). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Lefebvre, H. (1996). Writings on cities. Oxford: Blackwell Publishing.
- Magnuson, W. (2011). Politics of urbanism. Seeing like a city. London/New York: Routledge.
- Murtagh, B. (2002). The politics of territory. Basingstoke: Palgrave.
- Murtagh, B., & Keaveney, K. (2006). Policy and conflict transformation in the ethnocentric city. Space and Polity, 10(2), 187–202.
- Nagle, J. (2009). Sites of social centrality and segregation: Lefebvre in Belfast, a “divided city”. Antipode, 41(2), 326–347.
- Papadakis, Y. (2005). Echoes from the dead zone. London: IB Tauris.
- Papadakis, Y., Peristianis, N., & Welz, G. (Eds.). (2006). Divided Cyprus: Modernity, history and an island in conflict. Bloomington/Indianapolis: Indiana University Press.
- Rasmussen, M. (2003). The west, civil society and the construction of peace. London: Palgrave.
- Richmond, O. (2008). Peace in international relations. Milton Park: Routledge.
- Sassen, S. (2013). Does the city have speech? Public Culture, 25(2), 209–221.
- Shirlow, P., & Murtagh, B. (2004). Capacity-building, representation and intracommunity conflict. Urban Studies, 41(1), 57–70.

Urban Violence

- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Urban Violence and Crime

Marcos Alan Ferreira
 Department of International Relations, Federal University of Paraiba (UFPB), Joao Pessoa, Brazil

Synonyms

Favelas; Slums; Urban Gangs; Violence in Poor Neighborhoods

Definition

The definition of urban violence can have multiple meanings (Moser 2004; Pavoni and Tulumello 2018) – as expected in all discussions concerned to analyze violence – but for this entry, we follow the definition that urban violence “as the interplay between representations and the reality that people experience in certain urban environments. In other words, the city is generally referred to as a dangerous place because, the discourse says, dangerous populations live there in dangerous neighborhoods and make life unbearable for others” (Body-Gendrot 1995, p. 525). This definition is seconded by Pavoni and Tulumello (2018, p. 12) because “it can provide a further challenge to the ‘urban age’ thesis and its reductionist characterization of the urban as a mere question of (human) inhabitation” opening the analysis for a “whole array of other entities, practices, and relations that constitute the urban,” including the manifestation of violent crime. In particular, violent crime is a key obstacle to peace in some countries, like Brazil, El Salvador, and South Africa. Those latter cases will be better examined in this entry.

Introduction

Complementary to the approaches offered in the entries ▶ “Divided Cities” and ▶ “Urban Peacebuilding”, the focus here is the social violence related to criminality experienced in urban areas, as seen in countries like Brazil, El Salvador, and South Africa. In these cases, we find a puzzling scenario of nonwar neither peace, in which coexist the rule of law, democratic institutions, an active civil society, but also violence index equivalent to zones of war in some urban areas. Also, are patent in those societies elements of structural violence (e.g., high inequality, mortality rates higher in suburban areas, limited public representation of low-income classes) and cultural violence (e.g., prejudice against minorities, blacks, natives, and also patriarchal values that depreciate the role of women in the society).

At the beginning of the twenty-first century, more precisely in 2007, demographic data was reversed decisively on the planet: the urban population exceeded the rural population worldwide. Thirteen years later, 55% of the population lives in urban areas and in some countries these numbers reach more than 90%, as are the cases in Argentina and Japan (Ritchie and Roser 2020). This movement of populations to cities brings significant challenges for states in a setting of continuing high rates of population growth, in which young people are deprived of socioeconomic structures to develop their basic human needs (Brennan-Galvin 2002). When done in a disorderly mode, the rural-urban migration brings with it high levels of poverty, social inequality, and chaotic urbanization (Briceño-León 2008).

Those factors can contribute to growing crime rates in regions like Latin America and South Africa. If added here factors dependent of each country background like segregation related to cultural violence against some ethnic groups and state violence against poor populations, the urban violence can reach levels equivalent to zones of war, as explored in the entries ► “Peace and Conflict in Brazil” and ► “Youth Gang Violence in Honduras” in this Encyclopedia.

Giving the factors enumerated above would be insufficient to understand urban violence just as the manifestation of direct violence, often manifested through violent criminal offenses. The urban violence and crime are an “interplay between representations and the reality that people experience in certain urban environments” (Body-Gendrot 1995, p. 525). On the one hand, direct violence represents this “reality that people experience” in the cities, like seen in acts like robbery, rape, or homicide. On the other hand, the representations can be found in the cultural and structural violence experienced by disadvantaged in urban settings, as seen for example in the segregation of poor in slum areas, the gender violence, and the increased exposure to direct violence by the black and native population in Latin America and South Africa.

Caroline Moser reminds us that accelerating rates of violence and crime are by no means an urban specific problem; however, they are particularly challenging in urban areas (Moser 2004, p.

6). Besides, in general, it is in the “low-income urban areas that everyday violence is most prolific, and within these areas, some social groups are more at risk from certain types of violence than others” (Winton 2004, p. 166). The scale of violence in the poor areas or slums has become normalized, making millions of people to have routinized an everyday violation of their basic human needs (Moser 2004, p. 6).

Not surprisingly, the discussion on the effects on urban violence and crime on peace is more prolific in Latin America and South Africa, largely because of the interest of many scholars specializing in the study of violence in these contexts (see Winton 2004, p. 165; Moser 2004; Imbusch et al. 2011; Ferreira 2019b).

Given this setting, two aspects of urban violence and crime are explored in the following pages: first, urban violence and crime in post-conflict societies, followed by a subsection that explores the case study of El Salvador; second, the urban violence seen in nonwar neither peace settings (as also explored in the entry ► “Violent Conflicts in South America” in this Encyclopedia), as seen in countries like Brazil, Mexico, and South Africa.

Urban Violence and Crime in Post-Conflict Societies

While urban violence and crime are dependent on socioeconomic structural context “in terms of its manifestations, relative levels and the actors involved,” in the “post-conflict” or transitional societies these structures are disrupted or weakened more acutely. Consequently, such disruption witnesses an increased risk of “reactive” violence (Winton 2004, p. 179).

One of the central problems in post-conflict societies has been the reintegration of former combatants into society. When the state or international actors fail in the process of reintegration, what is seen is the immersion of former combatants in organized crime, resulting in a singular impact on large cities. This can be particularly seen recently in Colombia, in which the recent investigations show that former combatants not involved in reintegration programs are more prone to be engaged in homicide and robbery activities (Peña and Dorussen 2020).

In this regard, Latin America is regrettably an example of how challenging can be urban violence when neglected structural factors to reintegrate former combatants. The region experienced several outbreaks of conflict during the Cold War, in which states and guerrilla groups served as proxy for USSR and US interests. Where the former guerrillas laid down their weapons peacefully in the peace processes in the 1980s to 2000s, the difficulty of being inserted into a market economy made them take up their arms again, but this time to achieve economic gain from illegal activities (Sampaio 2014; Themner 2013). In South America, several of these men joined the economic drug chain, as seen with the guerrilla groups FARC (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia) and AUC (Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia) in Colombia and the Shining Path in Peru.

In Latin America – and also beyond – the liberal peacebuilding process grounded in neoliberal policies neglected major adjustments toward the reduction of inequalities (Richmond 2015). The focus on reconstruction of democratic institutions and the rule of law, in addition to the ineffective adoption of neoliberal adjustment policies, has created the environment for the development of complex crime networks in urban areas. Consequently, a mass of young unemployed Latin Americans formerly engaged in armed conflicts found an alternative path to survive: to continue with guns on hands, not for political reasons, but economic survival.

In a seminal study, Nazih Richani (2010) adds the importance of dealing with structural violence to struggle against the difficulties of urban violence and crime in post-conflict settings. According to him, “states recovering from civil wars have limited capacities, and these capacities are further weakened arguably in the ‘short term’ by economic policies of structural adjustments (such as decreases in expenditures on public education and health and on food subsidies)” (Richani 2010, p. 451).

Furthermore, the proliferation of urban criminal and youth gang violence are hand by hand with “violent forces that accompany the geographic and qualitative advancement of global neoliberalism” (Hristov 2014, p. 34), which obscures that a considerable part of the rural-to-urban migration “is actually an intentional product of displacement (whether direct/forced or indirect)” (Ibid., 9). While the case of Colombia is extensively explored in the last years (see Taylor et al. 2015; Pearce 2020; Peña and Dorussen 2020), El Salvador’s case illustrates how a peace process that neglect the economic aspirations of the population can boost crime and urban violence, as analyzed in the following subsection.

El Salvador Case

El Salvador’s case – a country that in 2019 is ranked in first place in homicide rates worldwide, according to UNODC (2019, p. 17) – demonstrates the destructive relationship between a peacebuilding process that neglects structural factors and the violence in urban areas. In a search for reaching legitimacy, when El Salvador emerged from their 12-year civil war it was introduced representative democracy process to reincorporate former guerrillas into politics. With a focus on institutional adjustments, few investments were committed to improving living conditions in urban areas and the “peace accords did not redress the socio-economic inequalities that contributed to the onslaught of the war” (Wade 2008, p. 29).

After the peaceful (political) settlement in 1992, thousands of El Salvadorians searching for better life conditions migrated to the USA, reaching 1.2 million people in the 2000s. Nevertheless, the high unemployment among Latin immigrants in the USA created the conditions for a share of these people to engage in criminal activities. Between 1993 and 2003, the USA deported more than 130,000 people, 43,000 of them with a criminal record (Richani 2010). Divided into two large gangs, MS-13 (short for Mara Salvatrucha, a reference to the Salvadorian descent) and the 18th Street gang (M18), the mass of young people without socioeconomic perspectives created a complex criminal ecosystem, based on drug trafficking, extortion, and violent governance in areas neglected by state – mostly, urban slums areas.

The results of this complex urban crime organization are shocking. As summarized by Richani (2010, p. 439), “in light of the rampant underemployment and the minimum wages, El Salvador’s system of violence serves as a mechanism of income redistribution through protection rents and robberies. In 2003, an estimated $307m was transferred through robberies. The system of violence also provides business opportunities to the security commodity to which about $411m is invested by private enterprises and individuals.” Not surprisingly, in El Salvador’s cities can easily be found vigilantes protecting shops and private properties with guns commonly used in war-scenarios, like rifles and guns caliber 0.12.

The gangs control through extortion productive chains that are key for El Salvadorian cities. The public transportation system – mostly informal in this developing country – is a key revenue for gangs, in which drivers and owners of small bus/van companies are demanded to pay weekly or monthly for M18 and MS-13 to continue to operate. Those who refuse to pay are murdered – as were 1,000 transport employees from 2004 to 2015 – or have their vehicles burned (Economist, May 21, 2016). The total cost of violence is nearly 16% of GDP, the highest level in Central America (Ibid.).

As can be noticed analyzing El Salvador’s case, the difficult situation experienced by the country with urban violence and crime can be understood within a historical background that covers a setting of socioeconomic marginalization, rising inequality, lack of access to quality education, a culture of violence, and the availability of arms (Wade 2008, p. 30). Added to these factors, the country had a peacebuilding process that gave little or no importance to the socioeconomic demands of the population. Furthermore, El Salvador’s case shows that the political peace process without policies to address structural violence can develop as a side effect a complex set of urban violence and crime, letting sustainable peace far from most of El Salvadorian citizens.

Urban Violence and Crime in Democratic Societies

Cases like El Salvador and Colombia can demonstrate the associations between political violence and urban violence. However, other important countries with high levels of violence and crime in urban areas present different characteristics: they are nations with consolidated institutions, representative democracy – albeit with some specific problems like low political participation of woman –, absence both of formal conflicts and armed groups contesting the status quo. Brazil and South Africa, just to enumerate a few, are some of the countries with these features.

While both countries do not experience war or formal conflict, their historical background and demographic changes can give us some clues on why they have such violent urban settings. In all cases we are referring to countries with high inequality, rapid changes in the movement of populations from rural areas to cities and significant background of violence and social breakdown.

The largest share of intentional homicides in the past 25 years – most of them in urban areas – were registered in the Americas and Africa (UNODC 2019). Related to this data, the World Bank found a positive correlation between the annual pace of urbanization and city homicide rates in a study of 50 countries (Nowak 2012, p. 2). In this regard, “marginalized and segregated communities suffer the most from the incidence of violence” (Nowak 2012, p. 3), being this social violence not only homicides. Armed robberies and assaults with firearms are also common in these cities, reaching in the cases of Rio de Janeiro (Brazil) and Johannesburg (South Africa) more than 10% of the population held at gunpoint in some moment of their lives (Nowak 2012: Fig. 1).

In the particular case of South Africa, the steady increase in the homicide rate in the twentieth century corresponds to a period of rapid urbanization and industrialization. Such social change “generated major social disruption, as millions moved from traditional, rural contexts to urban townships organized around different values and structures of authority” (UNODC 2019, p. 25). A similar context is experienced in Brazil, which witnessed in the twentieth century growing poverty and inequality in urban areas like Rio de Janeiro and Sao Paulo. Just to give an example of this radical social change, Sao Paulo had a dramatic demographic change from 2.1 million to 11.2 million people in the city from 1950 to 2010.

Besides the demographic change that brings together social disruption and chaotic urbanization, the escalation of violence in countries like Brazil and South Africa also reflects the impact of cultural violence (“the symbolic dimension that legitimizes the effective and affective impact of direct or structural violence,” according to Pavoni and Tulumello (2018, p. 5)) manifested in prejudice, segregation, and selectiveness in use of force by state.

In South Africa the state’s apartheid policies of enforced racial segregation put in motion forcible removals that “destroyed communities and social networks, caused widespread trauma and entrenched poor conditions and spatial exclusion” (UNODC 2019, p. 25). In Brazil, repression is historically stronger in poor areas, as better developed in the entry ► “Peace and Conflict in Brazil”. There is a clear criminalization of poverty and securitization of poor areas (FBSP 2016, p. 21; Gledhill 2015), seen in the repressive policing by the state that violates human rights, increases the incarceration of black and poor population, and reproduces the structural violence (Ferreira 2019b). Moreover, in the particular case of Brazil, we have a police structure developed during the military dictatorship (1964–1985), in which the police have a militarized hierarchy and motto which reproduces authoritarian values in their daily routines.

To change a scenario of high violence and crime is key for countries like Brazil, Colombia, and South Africa the “realign of the population’s allegiance toward the state and away from the non-state criminal entities” (Felbab-Brown 2011, p. 5). The inadequate state presence opens room for illicit economies, such as the drug trade and even criminal governance.

Criminal organizations operating in urban areas, mainly in Latin America, have developed a kind of governance that evolves according to the progress of the criminal business. In general, this development starts with a focus on the control and imposition of norms for managing illicit activities with a perverse alliance with the state through the corruption of state officers. In a second stage, such groups become more autonomous as they achieve control and impose norms that challenge the dominance of the state in a given social space, as seen in the development of Primeiro Comando da Capital operations in Brazil (Ferreira 2019a).

Given this complex setting, there is no easy response to overcome violence and crime in the cities. Analysts and policymakers can work on developing new strategies not only for new approaches toward direct violence but also to reduce the structural and cultural violence that divide cities and social groups. To insist on mano dura approaches – as seen in Brazil, Philippines, and Colombia – is innocuous and only reproduces the violence against the poor and disadvantaged in historically unequal societies.

Summary

In a world that 14% of violent deaths occur in areas of armed conflict, 8% are non-intentional homicide, 4% are legal interventions, and 74% occurred intentionally – with significant share in urban areas (Geneva Declaration 2015, pp. 51–53) – new conceptualizations and analysis are demanded to address the challenge of urban violence and crime. This entry offers only a starting point to examine this important and emerging topic in Peace and Conflict Studies agenda.

Given that insecurity results from complex factors associated with structural violence, chaotic urbanization, and lack of social cohesion, “approaches to reducing urban crime and violence must be intersectoral and interdisciplinary in nature” (Alvarado and Muggah 2018, p. 57). This involves approaches that deal simultaneously with economic responses to illicit networks, development of public health, and also public policies dedicated to strengthening social bonds. Moreover, “reforming repressive and politicized institutions and changing cultural norms are vital components of any peace-building exercise” (Wade 2008, p. 29). The problem of urban violence and crime demands new ways to think urbanization and inclusion policies to foster peace formation, learning from good practices and initiatives connecting civil society organizations and the state. In a world that is expected to 7 billion people living in urban areas in 2050 (Ritchie and Roser 2020), this learning process is key to build sustainable urban peace with a significant reduction of crime for future generations.

Cross-References

- ▶ Divided Cities
- ▶ Peace and Conflict in Brazil
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding
- ▶ Violent Conflicts in South America
- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

References

- Alvarado, N., & Muggah, R. (2018). Crimen y violencia: Un obstáculo para el desarrollo de las ciudades de América Latina y el Caribe. New York: IDB. <https://doi.org/10.18235/0001440>.
- Body-Gendrot, S. (1995). Urban violence: A quest for meaning. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 21(4), 525–536. <https://doi.org/10.1080/1369183X.1995.9976510>.
- Brennan-Galvin, E. (2002). Crime and violence in an urbanizing world. Journal of International Affairs, 56(1), 123–145. Retrieved 24 Feb 2020 from www.jstor.org/stable/24357886.
- Briceño-León, R. (2008). La violencia homicida en América Latina. América Latina Hoy (in Spanish, English summary), 50, 103–116.
- Economist. (2016). The gangs that cost 16% of GDP. The Economist. Retrieved 24 Feb 2020 from <https://www.economist.com/the-americas/2016/05/21/the-gangs-that-cost-16-of-gdp>
- Felbab-Brown, V. (2011). Bringing the state to the slum: Confronting organized crime and urban violence in Latin America lessons for law enforcement and policymakers. Washington, DC: Brookings Institute.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2019a). Brazilian criminal organizations as transnational violent non-state actors: A case study of the Primeiro Comando da Capital (PCC). Trends in Organized Crime, 22(2), 148–165.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2019b). Transnational organized crime and structural violence in Brazil. In C. Atieno & C. Robinson (Eds.), Post-conflict security, peace and development (pp. 37–54). Cham: Springer.
- Fórum Brasileiro de Segurança Pública (FBSP). (2016). Anuário Brasileiro de Segurança Pública 2016. São Paulo: FBSP.
- Geneva Declaration. (2015). Global burden of armed violence 2015: Lethal encounters. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Gledhill, J. (2015). The new war on the poor: The production of insecurity in Latin America. London: Zed Books.
- Hristov, J. (2014). Paramilitarism and neoliberalism: Violent systems of capital accumulation in Colombia and beyond. London: Pluto Press.
- Imbusch, P., Misse, M., & Carrión, F. (2011). Violence research in Latin America and the Caribbean: A literature review. International Journal of Conflict and Violence, 5(1), 87–154.
- Moser, C. O. N. (2004). Urban violence and insecurity: An introductory roadmap. Environment and Urbanization, 16(2), 3–16. <https://doi.org/10.1177/095624780401600220>.
- Nowak, M. (2012). Urban armed violence (Research note no. 23, Armed violence). Geneva: Small Arms Survey and GD Secretariat.
- Pavoni, A., & Tulumello, S. (2018). What is urban violence? Progress in Human Geography, 44(1), 49–76. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0309132518810432>.
- Pearce, J. (2020). Politics without violence? Towards a post-Weberian enlightenment. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Peña, A. G., & Dorussen, H. (2020). The reintegration of ex-combatants and post-conflict violence. An analysis of municipal crime levels in Colombia. Conflict Management and Peace Science. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0738894219894701>.
- Richani, N. (2010). State capacity in Postconflict settings: Explaining criminal violence in El Salvador and Guatemala. Civil Wars, 12(4), 431–455. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2010.534630>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2015). The impact of socio-economic inequality on peacebuilding and statebuilding. Civil Wars. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698249.2014.985876>.
- Ritchie, H., & Roser, M. (2020). Urbanization. Published online at OurWorldInData.org, University of Oxford. Retrieved from: <https://ourworldindata.org/urbanization>. Online Resource.
- Sampaio, A. (2014, March). Guerrillas, criminals and something in between, IISS voices. Available in: <https://www.iiss.org/en/iiss%20voices/blogsections/iiss-voices-2014-b4d9/march-2014-cd5b/guerrilla-criminals-fl93>. Accessed 24 Feb 2020.
- Taylor, L., Nilsson, M., & Amezcua-Castro, B. (2015). Reconstructing the social fabric amid ongoing violence: Attitudes toward reconciliation and structural transformation in Colombia. Peacebuilding. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2015.1094909>.

- Themner, A. (2013). A leap of faith: When and how ex-combatants resort to violence. Security Studies, 22(2), 295–329.
- United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC). (2019). Global study on homicide: Homicide: Extent, patterns, trends and criminal justice response. Booklet 2. Vienna: UNODC.
- Wade, C. (2008). El Salvador: Contradictions of neoliberalism and building sustainable peace. International Journal of Peace Studies, 13(2), 15–32.
- Winton, A. (2004). Urban violence: A guide to the literature. Environment and Urbanization, 16(2), 165–184. <https://doi.org/10.1177/095624780401600208>.

Use of Force

- ▶ UN Security Council and International Interventions

Use of Force in Peace Operations

Ingvild Bode
University of Kent, Canterbury, UK

Definition

How and whether to integrate the use of force into United Nations (UN) peace operations opens up fundamental questions about their overall purpose. During the Cold War period, UN peace operations were only mandated to use force in self-defense and were lightly armed in their main role as providing “buffers” deployed to monitor cease-fires in interstate wars. However, when peace operations were deployed in internal wars, this attitude toward using force became harder to maintain, especially in the face of violence committed against civilians under UN watch. Since the late 1990s, the use of force has therefore become a firm part of peacekeeping doctrine as a last resort to protect civilians. Despite this, it remains inconsistently applied in practice. More fundamental questions pertain to resorting to offensive force in efforts to deter spoilers of peace processes, often referred to as peace enforcement. Although first experiments in this direction in the 1990s failed and the practice was abandoned, it has resurfaced in the 2010s in the form of stabilization missions. Yet, doubts about the extent to which targeting specific conflict parties is tantamount to the UN giving up its impartiality, and therefore convening power as a world organization, linger unresolved.

Introduction

For long, their differing relationship to the use of force has provided the dividing line between peace operations (originally conceived of as peacekeeping, later also as peacebuilding) and peace enforcement. But since the 2000s, this line has become more blurry through the inclusion of more and more complex tasks into peace operations’ portfolio, such as protecting civilians. Emerging from the UN’s political practice rather than from the UN Charter, peace operations exist in the space between the peaceful resolution of disputes of Chapter VI and the enforcement measures of Chapter VII. This location is typically referred to as “Chapter VI ½” and is defined by three fundamental peacekeeping principles: consent of parties to the conflict, neutrality/impartiality, and the use of force in self-defense. While these principles were coined in relation to peacekeeping of the 1950s, they continue to set the contours for peace operations today, where they provide a flexible arrangement rather than a rigid structure. Perhaps not surprisingly, all three principles have encountered significant challenges as peace operations diversified to include more tasks, but especially so the use of force.

The Long Journey to the Use of Force

Attitudes toward how and whether the use of force should be integrated into UN peace operations have changed significantly. This has not been a linear development, but rather a relationship characterized by greater and further proximity. The first peace operation under UN mandate, the UN Truce Supervision Organization (UNTSO) in Israel/Palestine (1948), only featured unarmed military observers. Even as peace operations became more formalized as a significant practice with the preparation of the first major peacekeeping mission in response to the 1956 Suez Canal Crisis (UN Emergency Force, UNEF I), peacekeepers remained lightly armed and were only mandated to use force in self-defense. The use of force was simply not thought of as a task to be performed by peacekeepers – not least because their deployment depends on host state consent and therefore strict adherence to the principle of non-intervention (see Article 2(7) of the UN Charter). This also neatly describes the core (and clearly limited) logic underlying peace operations during the Cold War period: conflict management. Peacekeeping was supposed to be taken literally as operations were deployed where there was peace to keep. Essentially, peacekeepers were in the field after a cease-fire agreement had been reached to create a buffer zone between warring factions and ensure that the agreement held via performing monitoring functions.

The lack of a use of force element as part of this traditional version of UN peacekeeping made these rather unique missions for its military personnel. This is captured by former Secretary-General Dag Hammarskjöld's quote that "peacekeeping is not a job for soldiers but only soldiers can do it." Peacekeeping's military tasks therefore require a change of mind-set: Brian Urquhart, one of the practice's founding fathers at the UN Secretariat, noted that peacekeepers do not have "[...] enemies [...] just a series of difficult and sometimes homicidal clients" (Urquhart 1991, 293; see also Levine 2014). Initially, peace operations were seen as a restricted and limited UN activity, and their lack of a use of force component contributed to peacekeeping being perceived as largely a low-risk exercise. A traditional UN definition reflects this, referring to peacekeeping as "an operation involving military personnel, but without enforcement powers, undertaken by the United Nations to help maintain and restore international peace and security in areas of conflict" (United Nations 1996, 4). The first peacekeeping brochure published by the UN in 1987 underlines this perception by featuring a picture of a peacekeeper in uniform with a blue beret prominent on his head and a sparrow sitting on his outstretched hand (United Nations Department of Public Information 1987).

Yet, as conceptions of what peacekeepers were supposed to do altered, so did perspectives on the use of force. Crucial to this is a fundamentally different sense of purpose that entered peace operations in the late 1980s/early 1990s. So-called multidimensional/multifunctional operations, such as the UN Transition Administration Group (UNTAG) in Namibia, were not merely designed to manage a conflict or to "keep the peace." Rather, as can be seen by their increasingly long list of functions that included the organization of elections, human rights monitoring, and even temporary international administration, UN peace operations were now in the business of conflict resolution. These peacebuilding components did not automatically include the use of force. But its logic paved the way for the use of force becoming a bigger factor as UN peacebuilders began to be perceived as an integral part of resolving conflict situations.

The first key UN document to allocate the use of force a different place in a more diversified array of peace operations was an Agenda for Peace, authored under Secretary-General Boutros Boutros-Ghali in 1992. This document came at a period when the "new international atmosphere" represented by the end of the Cold War "[...] provided a concrete opportunity for the United Nations to play an even broader role in the system of collective security" (United Nations 1988, 19). An Agenda for Peace defined a range of mission options the UN could engage in to further international peace, distinguishing between peace enforcement and peacekeeping. Incidentally, peace enforcement is discussed under the heading of peace-making, separate to a discussion of peacekeeping in the subsequent section. Insightfully, an Agenda for Peace defines peacekeeping as "[...] the deployment of United Nations presence in the field, hitherto with the consent of all parties involved" (Secretary-General 1992, para. 20 own emphasis). In fact, the principle of the consent of all parties involved over time increasingly turned into host state consent only, creating an opening for the use of force to enter peace operations vis-à-vis non-state actors.

In practical terms, the UN's first foray(s) into combining peace operations with a peace enforcement component, although kept somewhat separately from the main mission, ended in disaster. In Somalia, Security Council Resolution 794 endorsed a peace enforcement element as offered by the United States: "[...] action under Chapter VII should be taken in order to establish a secure environment for humanitarian relief operations in Somalia" (UN Security Council 1992, para. 7). While the majority of peace enforcement tasks were supposed to be undertaken by the US-led Unified Task Force (UNITAF), the Chapter VII mandate to use force in response to violations of the peace also referred to the UN Operation in Somalia (UNOSOM II). In fact, UNOSOM II peacekeepers targeted specific conflict actors, notably warlord Mohamed Farrah Aidid, thereby departing from the neutrality principle (Macqueen 2006, 218). As a consequence, both UNOSOM II peacekeepers and US military personnel "[...] came under fire and were killed" (Baehr and Gordenker 1999, 84). While the infamous Mogadishu raid that led to the killing of 18 US Special Forces and hundreds of Somalis had been carried out under US rather than UN command, the general conclusion of integrating use of force (peace enforcement) elements as part of UN peace operations was resoundingly negative. For many commentators, such as Thakur, the offensive use of force threatened the very foundation that peace operations are built on as the UN risks losing its role as an impartial arbiter between conflicting parties: "[I]t is better in the long run for the organisation to leave with its reputation intact and capable of intervention elsewhere with the consent of all parties, than to turn into a factional participant, part of the problem instead of the solution, the object of armed reprisals and street demonstrations" (Thakur 1994, 410).

By the mid-1990s, the UN had abandoned the inclusion of peace enforcement elements into peace operations. Doctrinally, Secretary-General Boutros-Ghali reflected on this explicitly in his 1995 supplement to an Agenda for Peace. This document pointed to peacekeeping's problematic capacity limitations as the reason, but also to a more fundamental incongruence of using force while retaining the UN's neutral role:

[...] Nothing is more dangerous for a peace-keeping operation than to ask it to use force when its existing composition, armament, logistic support and deployment deny it the capacity to do so. The logic of peace-keeping flows from political and military premises that are quite distinct from those of enforcement; and the dynamics of the latter are incompatible with the political process that peace-keeping is intended to facilitate. (Secretary-General 1995, para. 35)

The failures of peace operations in Somalia and later Rwanda pushed the practice into crisis. But even the doctrinal turnaround on peace enforcement elements "[...] left tensions unaddressed and other questions unanswered" (Berdal and Ucko 2015, 7). Indeed, UN peacekeepers remained deployed in situations when agreed cease-fires were not adhered to and without meaningful political processes leading toward conflict resolution. The case of the UN Protection Force (UNPROFOR) in Bosnia Herzegovina illustrates this. It was deployed in 1992 with only a tenuous cease-fire in place, which most parties to the conflict did little to adhere to, let alone respect. Still, the UN Security Council kept expanding UNPROFOR's mandate multiple times in its first year of operation alone and included not only the protection of humanitarian convoys but also the creation of so-called safe zones, "a new- and undefined concept" (Netherlands Institute for War Documentation 2002b).

The creation of safe zones raised justified protection expectations among the civilian population, which the UN peace operation was both unable, in terms of its overall size and personnel, and unwilling to fulfil. The fall of the "safe" area of Srebrenica became the epitome of the UN's failures and highlights peace operations' deeply problematic relationship to the use of force:

[...] The UNPROFOR troops in Srebrenica never fired at the attacking Serbs. [...] Had they engaged the attacking Serbs directly it is possible that events would have unfolded differently. At the same time, it must be recognized that the 150 fighting men of

Dutchbat were lightly armed and in indefensible positions, and were faced with 2,000 Serbs advancing with support of armor and artillery. (General Assembly 1999, para. 272)

This quote illustrates how the limited military capabilities of typical peacekeeping forces made using “robust force” tenuous. But the unwillingness to use force was further connected to understandings of neutrality, another of the three peacekeeping principles. Here, the non-use of force was seen as a means to avoid being perceived as a party to the conflict, with UNPROFOR’s strict adherence to neutrality frequently mentioned in the Dutch review of the Srebrenica massacre (e.g., Netherlands Institute for War Documentation 2002a, 1099, 1134, 1156).

In sum, there were two main, and potentially contradictory, lessons learned from the use of force in UN peace operations of the early 1990s. First, including significant peace enforcement elements into UN peace operations is not only not viable but actually risks the very foundation of the practice. Second, future peace operations need to include more robust force mandates to protect civilians under the peacekeepers’ care in order to avoid another Rwanda or another Srebrenica.

The Protection of Civilians

Use of force considerations were prominent in the UN’s rethinking exercise culminating in the Brahimi Report published in 2000. Among its calls for a focus on prevention, more realistic deployments, and restricted and achievable mandates, the report also highlighted more robust use of force mandates to protect civilians. These passages are clearly written in direct response to the lack of such protection civilians in Srebrenica or Rwanda experienced under the very eyes of peace operations: “[. . .] United Nations peacekeepers — troops or police — who witness violence against civilians should be presumed to be authorized to stop it, within their means, in support of basic United Nations principles” (United Nations 2000, para. X). The recommendations included in the Brahimi report, while still adhering to peacekeeping’s holy trinity of fundamental principles, connected the use of force to the protection of civilians as a new, emerging principle of peace operations. Importantly, the Brahimi report rethought neutrality as impartiality, understood as the adherence to unbiased rules, such as the basic principles of the UN Charter, “not passivity in the face of violence perpetrated by one of the parties” (Oksamytna and Karlsrud 2020, 5). As the report argues: “In some cases, local parties consist not of moral equals but of obvious aggressors and victims, and peacekeepers may not only be operationally justified in using force but morally compelled to do so” (United Nations 2000, para. 50). If UN peace operations acted impartially in fulfilling their mandate vis-à-vis all conflict parties, e.g., in protecting civilians, their integrity as a non-party to the conflict should still be preserved.

The UN Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) in 1999 was the first peace operation to explicitly include the protection of civilians among its tasks, and most operations mandated since then have included protection of civilians mandates (Bode and Karlsrud 2019; Breakey 2014; Hultman et al. 2013). While the protection of civilians also includes unarmed options, it rests on the military capability to deliver on protection expectations (United Nations 2015b, 28). Protection of civilians mandates therefore typically include variations of the following standard phrasing: “[a]cting under Chapter VII of the Charter of the United Nations, decides that in the discharge of its mandate UNAMSIL may take the necessary action [. . .] to afford protection to civilians under imminent threat of physical violence” (Security Council 1999, para. 14). Arguably, the fact that all new UN peace operations after 1990 were deployed in intra-state conflicts also eased the introduction of the use force, at least on a doctrinal level. UN peace operations remain state-centric, being situated within an international system that still follows this logic, and securing host state consent (however tenuous at times) remains a key principle for the deployment of peacekeepers.

The integration of using force as a last resort to protect civilians has continued consistently on a doctrinal level. Most recently, the Report of the High-Level Independent Panel on Peace Operations (HIPPO) even elevated the protection of civilians to, at least, the same level as the “traditional” peacekeeping principles: “[...] these principles must be interpreted progressively and with flexibility in the face of new challenges, and they should never be an excuse for failure to protect civilians or to defend the mission proactively” (United Nations 2015b, X). Indeed, the years since the Brahimi report have also seen various efforts (United Nations 2015a, 2017) to ensure the effective implementation of protection of civilians mandates by “removing confusion and conflicting understandings” (Bode and Karlsrud 2019, 459).

But all of this does not mean that the use of force has been regularly applied in the practice of peace operations. In fact, a 2014 internal UN report argued that “the use of force [...] appears to have been routinely avoided as an option by peacekeeping operations” (General Assembly 2014, 1). Looking more closely at specific UN peace operations, for example, the UN Mission in South Sudan (UNMISS), underlines the uneasy place that the use of force still holds.

Since its creation in 2011, UNMISS resolutions have consistently referred to acting under Chapter VII of the UN Charter, the enforcement chapter, for their protection mandate. Yet, over time, drafters of the resolutions have found it necessary to re-iterate much more explicitly the connection to the protection of civilians. While Security Council resolution 1996 (2011) therefore “[a]uthorizes UNMISS to use all necessary means [...] to carry out its protection mandate” (Security Council 2011, para. 4), Security Council resolution 2187 (2014) introduces the protection of civilians as a new sub-heading immediately following the reference to Chapter VII and specifies to “[...] protect civilians under threat of physical violence, irrespective of the source of such violence, within its capacity and areas of deployment” (Security Council 2014, para. 4). Moreover, Security Council resolution 2187 (and all resolutions that follow thereafter) “emphasizes that protection of civilians, as described in paragraph 4 (a), must be given priority in decisions about the use of available capacity and resources within the Mission” (Security Council 2014, para. 5). This greater, clarified emphasis as the mandate evolved signifies a felt necessity to make even more explicit the use of force to protect civilians – all necessary means in UN language – given that it had only been used reluctantly in UNMISS at that point.

The integration of the use of force to protect civilians has therefore resolved the issue of protection expectations in doctrine but not in practice. The reasons for UN peace operations’ continued failure to offer proper protection to civilians are manifold: they include, among others, a lacking capacity to fulfil expectations, deployment in increasingly complex and volatile situations featuring a plethora of non-state armed actors, unreliable state partners, having to cover vast swathes of territory, and also uneven understandings among troop contributors about what are the appropriate means of using force (Bode and Karlsrud 2019). As this list demonstrates, many of the factors that hamper the protection of civilians have plagued UN peace operations that included the use of force since the failed mandates of the early 1990s. Despite these practical difficulties, UN peace operations began to include even more significant use of force elements in the form of so-called stabilization missions.

Stabilization Missions

Stabilization missions are a more contested form of peace operation to follow on from the robust turn in the late 1990s and have seen use of force elements become more integral. Such missions involve the deployment of peacekeepers into hostile and volatile situations and include authorizations for using offensive force to neutralize specific armed groups. These armed groups are non-state in nature, given the backdrop of host state consent that still continues to hold as a key principle of peace operations. Stabilization missions are thus “[...] deployed in active support of extending state authority to areas controlled by violent extremists and terrorist groups” (Karlsrud 2017, 2).

The first peace operation to include a stabilization element was the UN Stabilization Mission in Haiti (MINUSTAH 2007–2009), but stabilization began to feature more prominently from 2011 onward in missions such as the UN Multi-dimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA). The Force Intervention Brigade (FIB) deployed in March 2013 as part of the UN Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo (MONUSCO) is another connected development. Having been established in 2010 with a protection of civilians mandate, MONUSCO was heavily criticized for not doing enough to fulfil this, epitomized by the operation's failure to even respond to widespread rapes in direct vicinity of its military bases (Security Council 2010, paras. 8, 13, 36). Events such as these threatened the overall legitimacy of MONUSCO in the middle of a further deteriorating security situation, exemplified by the M23's seizure of Goma with little resistance by peacekeepers (Murphy 2016, 225). As a direct response, a renewed MONUSCO mandate in March 2013 included the FIB "with the responsibility of neutralizing armed groups [...] and the objectives of contributing to reducing the threat posed by armed groups to state authority and civilian security in eastern DRC and to make space for stabilization activities" (Security Council 2013a, 6). Composed of around 3,000 military personnel from Tanzania, Malawi, and South Africa, the FIB was characterized as a new, unprecedented step in UN peacekeeping activities at the time (Boissoneault 2013). We can clearly see how the FIB logic has seeped into stabilization missions. In the Security Council's 2013 authorization for MINUSMA in Mali, it specified that the peace operation should act "in support of the transitional authorities of Mali, to stabilize the key population centers [...], to deter threats and take active steps to prevent the return of armed elements to those areas" (Security Council 2013b, para. 16 ia).

This integration of using force offensively to target spoilers of peace processes has triggered significant discussions about its rightful place within peace operations on both practical and fundamental accounts. Practically, peacekeeping troops are not equipped for these mandates in terms of capacity and rules of engagement. With stabilization mission mandates, the violent targeting of peacekeepers has increased: from 2013 to 2017, "[...] 195 personnel in United Nations peacekeeping missions have been killed by acts of violence, more than during any other 5-year period in history" (Dos Santos Cruz et al. 2017, executive summary). MINUSMA stands out with 208 fatalities from 2013 to 2019 (United Nations 2019), while many peacekeepers in Mali have been killed in so-called malicious attacks "[...] involving improvised road bombs and targeted attacks" (van der Lijn and Smit 2015, 8). A well-publicized report co-authored by a former UN force commander used these numbers to argue for the necessity of more significant use of force postures in UN peace operations: "unfortunately, hostile forces do not understand a language other than force" (Dos Santos Cruz et al. 2017, executive summary). Of course, presenting this as the only natural consequence has been vigorously disputed – not only because it may imperil peacekeepers' lives even further but also because it may jeopardize the UN's role in facilitating political progress (Hunt 2018).

Fundamentally, military contingents of peace operations that use offensive force against "spoilers" of the peace process risk the UN's independence and impartiality and therefore the bedrock of the world organization's convening power. Acting in this way, the UN might increasingly be perceived as a party to the conflict taking sides rather than as an impartial force – and events in connection to MINUSMA already point in this direction (Karlsrud 2015). These debates are remarkably similar to the first inclusion of peace enforcement elements in the mid-1990s, therefore pointing to intractable questions pertaining to including use of force in this way.

A particularly controversial use of force aspect concerns the blending of counterterrorist elements into stabilization missions. Key doctrinal documents for UN peace operations, such as the 2015 HIPPO report and the 2018 report of the Special Committee on Peace Operations (C34) clearly affirm "[...] that United Nations peacekeeping missions are neither suited for nor equipped to engage in counter-terrorist operations” (United Nations 2018, para. 68). Still, it is notable that in a period of increased competition among the permanent five members of the UN Security Council from 2011 onward, the organ still established five new peace operations from 2011 to 2013. Most of these operations, in particular MONUSCO, MINUSMA, and the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the Central African Republic (MINUSCA), include stabilization and peace enforcement approaches, as well as counterterrorist elements. This triggers three observations, especially vis-à-vis counterterrorism aspects: First, it seems logical, from a UN Security Council decision-making perspective, that peace operations have seen the introduction of counterterrorism issues as this is one of the few thematic areas where the P-5 appear to share interests (Gowan 2018; Wiuff Moe and Stepputat 2018). Second, the return of “traditional” troop contributing countries such as small and middle powers like Canada, Norway, or Denmark also pushes UN peace operations in the direction of a strategic shift toward counterterrorism (Karlsrud 2019). Third, and looking beyond the mid-2010s, in a period of budget constraints, not least because of the growing restraint, there may be financial incentives to align peace operations more closely with the counterterrorism agenda to secure additional sources of funding. Taken together, these observations signal firmer alignment of use of force mandates into peace operations for the time being.

Summary

The use of force has gone through various forms of doctrinal rethinking in relation to its place within the broader practice of UN peace operations. While peace operations started off with a focus on minimal force as well as its restriction to self-defense purposes only, it has become integrated in its offensive form in the latest type of peace operations, stabilization mission. Generally, and despite decisive setbacks of peace enforcement approaches in the mid-1990s, the doctrinal development has moved toward an official integration of the use of force since the late 1990s and then primarily in connection to the protection of civilians. But this does not mean that the discussion on whether the use of force should be part of peace operations has been settled. In fact, fundamental questions remain, both doctrinally and practically. Many contingents in peace operations still remain reluctant to use force to protect civilians, even when they are clearly mandated to do so. Moreover, offensive use of force mandates of the type seen in stabilization operations have led to a more fundamental rethinking about the viable direction (and future) of peace operations as a whole.

Cross-References

- ▶ Conceptual Evolution of Peace Operations
- ▶ Peace Operations, Principles, and Doctrine
- ▶ Stabilization Operations and Their Relationship to Liberal Peacebuilding Missions

References

- Baehr, P. R., & Gordenker, L. (1999). The United Nations at the end of the 1990s (3rd ed.). Basingstoke: Macmillan Press.
- Berdal, M., & Ucko, D. H. (2015). The use of force in UN peacekeeping operations. The RUSI Journal, 160 (1), 6–12.
- Bode, I., & Karlsrud, J. (2019). Implementation in practice: The use of force to protect civilians in United Nations peacekeeping. European Journal of International Relations, 25(2), 458–485.
- Boissoneault, L. (2013). A new UN Brigade will make combat moves in Congo. Pass Blue: Independent Coverage of the UN. <http://www.passblue.com/2013/04/11/a-new-un-brigade-will-make-offensive-moves-in-congo/>
- Breakey, H. (2014). Protection of civilians and law making in the Security Council. In V. Popovski & T. Fraser (Eds.), The Security Council as global legislator (pp. 202–223). London: Routledge.
- Dos Santos Cruz, C. A., Phillips, W. R., & Cusimano, S. (2017). Improving security of United Nations peacekeepers: We need to change the way we are doing business. https://peacekeeping.un.org/sites/default/files/improving_security_of_united_nations_peacekeepers_report.pdf. 22 Feb 2018.
- General Assembly. (1999). Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to General Assembly Resolution 53/35. The fall of Srebrenica. UN Document No. A/54/549.

- General Assembly. (2014). Evaluation of the implementation and results of protection of civilians mandates in United Nations peacekeeping operations. Report of the Office of Internal Oversight Services. UN Document A/68/787.
- Gowan, R. (2018). Minimum order: The role of the Security Council in an era of major power competition. New York: United Nations University, Centre for Policy Research.
- Hultman, L., Kathman, J., & Shannon, M. (2013). United Nations peacekeeping and civilian protection in civil war. American Journal of Political Science, 57(4), 875–891.
- Hunt, C. T. (2018). Protecting peacekeepers requires better politics, not more force. IPI Global Observatory. <https://theglobalobservatory.org/2018/02/protecting-peacekeepers-better-politics/>
- Karlsrud, J. (2015). The UN at war: Examining the consequences of peace-enforcement mandates for the UN peacekeeping operations in the CAR, the DRC and Mali. Third World Quarterly, 36(1), 40–54.
- Karlsrud, J. (2017). Towards UN counter-terrorism operations? Third World Quarterly, 38(6), 1215–1231.
- Karlsrud, J. (2019). For the greater good? “Good states” turning UN peacekeeping towards counterterrorism. International Journal, 74(1), 65–83.
- Levine, D. H. (2014). The morality of peacekeeping. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- MacQueen, N. (2006). Peacekeeping and the international system. London: Routledge.
- Murphy, R. (2016). UN Peacekeeping in the Democratic Republic of the Congo and the Protection of Civilians. Journal of Conflict and Security Law, 21(2), 209–246.
- Netherlands Institute for War Documentation. (2002a). Srebrenica. Reconstruction, background, consequences and analyses of the fall of a ‘safe’ area. <https://www.niod.nl/en/srebrenica-report/report>
- Netherlands Institute for War Documentation. (2002b). Srebrenica report. Summary for the press. <https://www.niod.nl/en/srebrenica-report/summary-press>
- Oksamytna, K., & Karlsrud, J. (2020). Introduction. In K. Oksamytna & J. Karlsrud (Eds.), United Nations peace operations and international relations theory (pp. 1–34). Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Secretary-General. (1992). An agenda for peace: Preventive diplomacy, peacemaking, and peacekeeping. Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to the statement adopted by the summit meeting of the Security Council on 31 January 1992. UN Document A/47/277 – S/24111.
- Secretary-General. (1995). Supplement to an agenda for peace. Position paper of the Secretary-General on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the United Nations. UN Document A/50/60; S/1995/1.
- Security Council. (1999). Security Council resolution. UN Document S/RES/1270. http://unipsil.unmissions.org/portals/unipsil/media/documents/scres/SCRes_1270_1999.pdf. 5 Dec 2014.
- Security Council. (2010). Report of the Secretary-General on the United Nations Organization Stabilization Mission in the Democratic Republic of the Congo. UN Document No. S/2010/512.
- Security Council. (2011). Resolution 1996. UN Document No. S/RES/1996.
- Security Council. (2013a). Resolution 2098 Democratic Republic of the Congo. S/RES/2098.
- Security Council. (2013b). Security Council resolution 2100. Mali. UN Document No. S/RES/2100.
- Security Council. (2014). Resolution 2187. UN Document No. S/RES/2187.
- Thakur, R. (1994). From peacekeeping to peace enforcement: The UN operation in Somalia. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 32(3), 387–410.
- UN Security Council. (1992). Resolution 794 Somalia. UN Document No. S/RES/794.
- United Nations. (1988). Yearbook of the United Nations 1988. New York: United Nations, Office of Public Information.
- United Nations. (1996). The blue helmets: A review of United Nations peace-keeping (3rd ed.). New York: UN Department of Public Information.
- United Nations. (2000). Report of the panel on peacekeeping operations. UN Document A/55/305-S/2000/809.
- United Nations. (2015a). Protection of civilians: Implementation guidelines for military components in United Nations peacekeeping missions. Ref. 2015.02.
- United Nations. (2015b). Report of the high-level independent panel on peace operations (HIPPO) on uniting our strengths for peace: Politics, partnership and people. UN Document No. A/70/95 – S/2015/446.
- United Nations. (2017). DPKO/DFS policy: The protection of civilians in United Nations peacekeeping. Ref. 2015.07.
- United Nations. (2018). Report of the Special Committee on Peacekeeping Operations. 2018 Substantive Session (New York, 12 February - 9 March 2018). UN Document No. A/72/19.
- United Nations. (2019). Fatalities. United Nations Peacekeeping. <https://peacekeeping.un.org/en/fatalities>
- United Nations Department of Public Information. (1987). United Nations peacekeepers. Flyer.
- Urquhart, B. (1991). A life in peace and war. New York: Norton.
- van der Lijn, J., & Smit, T. (2015). Peacekeepers under threat? Fatality trends in UN peace operations (SIPRI policy brief). Solna: SIPRI.
- Wiuff Moe, L., & Stepputat, F. (2018). Introduction: Peacebuilding in an era of pragmatism. International Affairs (London), 94(2), 293–399.

V

Vanuatu

- ▶ Sources of Peace in a Developing Island State

Violence

- ▶ Ethnic Conflict in North Macedonia
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Masculinity and Conflict
- ▶ Unintended Consequences of Peace Operations/Sexual Abuse and Exploitation by Peacekeepers
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia
- ▶ Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Violence in Poor Neighborhoods

- ▶ Urban Violence and Crime

Violent Conflict

- ▶ Identity and Political Violence

Violent Conflicts in South America

Marcos Alan Ferreira
Department of International Relations, Federal University of Paraiba (UFPB), Joao Pessoa, Brazil

Definition

South America is a sub-continent of the Americas that comprises 12 sovereign states (Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, Guyana, Paraguay, Peru, Suriname, Uruguay, and Venezuela), the British overseas territory Falkland Islands (disputed by Argentina), and a French overseas department, French Guyana. Despite a nineteenth century mostly built on independence wars and social conflicts, currently the sub-continent is seen by some analysts and international organizations as a peaceful region, especially in terms of the low number of inter-state conflicts in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries (Kacowicz 1998; Holsti 1996; UNGA 2003; see also Kurtenbach 2019). However, if violence is studied beyond inter-state tensions and we focus on armed social violence (Pearce 2012), it becomes clear that the absence of conflicts between states does not mean a peaceful environment (Pearce and Perea 2019; Perea 2019; Kurtenbach 2019). Indicators such as homicide and violent deaths by firearms are very high and equivalent to war zones, according to several studies of the UN agencies and specialized institutes (Ferreira 2017; HIIK 2019; UNODC 2019). This scenario is interconnected with a violent background from the colonization period (sixteenth to twentieth century), as well as the structural and cultural violence that put Afro-Americans, natives, and white European descendants in opposition. Moreover, international variables such as drug and arms trafficking trigger clashes between the state and organized crime and also victimize ordinary citizens.

Historical Background

After a violent colonization that enslaved Africans, killed millions of natives, and created a long-term social inequality between European descendants, natives, and Afro-Americans, in the nineteenth century, South American countries were established through wars and social conflicts. Libertadores (liberators) – mostly military local-born European descendants like José San Martín, Simón Bolívar, Manuel Belgrano, and Bernardo O’Higgins – led the independence from Spain and gradually defeated the royalist forces. In Brazil, the moving of Portugal’s royal family to Rio de Janeiro in 1808 to escape from Napoleonic troops paved the path for a peaceful independence in 1822. However, soon the country experienced social convulsions like Cabanagem, Sabinada, and Malê Revolt (see entry ► “Peace and Conflict in Brazil”).

Moreover, the nineteenth century also witnessed bloody and brutal wars in the sub-continent. Some of these shaped new borders and significantly shaped the region’s history. The Cisplatine War (1825–1828), in which Brazil and the United Provinces of the River Plate (currently Argentina and Uruguay) were opposed, resulted in a defeated Brazil and the independence of the Republic of Uruguay. Decades later, the Paraguayan War (1864–1870), fought between Paraguay and the Triple Alliance (composed of Brazil, Argentina, and Uruguay), resulted in more than 350,000 dead, 80% of these being Paraguayans. Lastly, the War of the Pacific (1879–1883) pitted Bolivia and Peru against Chile over border and sea control. While Chilean forces won and landlocked Bolivia, the latter demanded the neighbor country in the International Court of Justice. A decision was only made on this in October 2018, whereby Chile was not forced to negotiate a Bolivian exit to the sea (Van den Berg and Laing 2018).

Currently the sub-continent is seen by some analysts and international organizations as a peaceful region, especially in terms of the low number of inter-state conflicts in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries (Kacowicz 1998; Holsti 1996; UNGA 2003; see also Kurtenbach 2019). While the region experienced cases of tensions, such as between Colombia and Ecuador in 2008, the Peru-Chile maritime dispute, and the Beagle Channel dispute between Chile and Argentina in 1978, there have only been three conflicts or military disputes between countries in the region since the 1930s: the Chaco War between Paraguay and Bolivia (1932–1935), the war between Peru and Ecuador (1941, with short conflicts also in 1981 and 1995), and the Falklands War (1982). In the latter, there was a conflict of a South American country with an external actor, Great Britain (Kurtenbach 2019). This context creates a perception that the region is a zone of peace. Such zones are characterized by the absence of direct violence between states, since they share a degree of mutual trust that allows the prolongation of dialogue channels as the primary tool for solving tensions (Kacowicz 1998; Holsti 1996; UNGA 2003).

However, if violence is studied beyond inter-state tensions, it becomes clear that the absence of conflicts between states does not mean a peaceful environment. Indicators such as homicide and violent deaths by firearms are very high in South America and are equivalent to war zones (Ferreira 2017; HIIK 2019; Perea 2019; UNODC 2019). This violence is regularly linked to social inequality and is alleged to be driven by international factors such as drug and arms trafficking, setting up a transnational and structural problem domestically. This scenario contributes to a violent social setting, resulting in violent deaths and high criminality rates. In the following sections, we will focus on the contemporary violence and conflict setting in South America. First, we will explain how the absence of political conflicts does not mean peace in the region. Subsequently, we will explore the cases of Colombia, Brazil, and Venezuela, three nations that share in common non-war neither peace societies.

Social Violence and Conflict in Today's South America

While Latin America's understanding of peace by governments highlights the peace between countries and the democratic character of politics in the region (Kurtenbach 2019, p. 11), to assert that South America is a zone of peace seems illogical when such statement is compared with the indicators related to the region's levels of violence.

As Jenny Pearce, one of the main Peace and Conflict Studies in Latin America researchers, states, when we regard the region, it is "increasingly difficult to 'name' its violences; they are violences outside of war, but with comparably high levels of casualties[. . .]." Regarding these violences, she explains that "some talk of armed social violence or non-conventional violence. More than any other region, Latin American violences require us to think about the meanings that our 'naming' of violence seeks to clarify and why" (Pearce 2020, p. 8). Furthermore, the annual death toll far exceeds those on conventional battlefields (Perea 2019), which constitute a key obstacle to the development of the region (Heinemann and Verner 2006, p. 2; Ferreira 2017).

Supported by chaotic urbanization and high levels of poverty (Briceño-León 2008; Imbusch et al. 2011), the homicide rate in South America stands out as the highest among all regions of the globe, together with Central America (UNODC 2019, booklet 2, 11). The homicide rate among males aged 15–29 in South America and Central America is more than four times the global average for that age/sex group (UNODC 2019, booklet 4, 34). Furthermore, the increase of almost 20% in per capita income has not influenced the homicide rate, which has remained virtually static since 1995 at an alarming average of 25 homicides per 100,000 inhabitants (UNODC 2011, p. 35, 2019).

While the homicide rates are quite different among the South American countries, the statistics regarding the high presence of diverse kinds of violence are clear. ("While homicide data is typically more accessible than other types of armed violence measures, it does not reflect non-fatal types of violence and crime, such as armed robberies, kidnappings, assaults, sexual violence, or non-fatal firearm injuries [. . .]. Furthermore, homicides are rarely recorded as such if the body is not found[. . .]. Thus, although homicide rates are useful proxies, they frequently under-count the actual numbers of deaths and only provide a partial picture of armed violence victimization" (Small Arms Survey 2012, p. 10).) According to UNODC, at one extreme, we can find Brazil, Colombia, and Venezuela figuring strongly in the top homicide rates. In the middle, but with higher rates than the global average, there are Bolivia, Ecuador, Guyana, Paraguay, and Suriname. The countries of Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, and Peru present lower homicide rates, slightly below or around the global average (UNODC 2019, booklet 2, pp. 26–27).

Even if we regard countries with low homicide rates in the region, like Argentina and Chile, criminal violence is growing consistently according to indicators like robbery and car theft (UNDP 2013, pp. 52–67). The perception that violence is present in daily lives is also rising, reaching almost 50% of the population (UNDP 2013, p. 70). Moreover, as explained by Perea (2019, p. 255), the rates of armed robbery are the highest in the world. In his surveys on victimization, "65% mentioned violence against women and 63% against girls and boys." Perea estimates that this security crisis requires that "3.5% of Gross National Product be used to combat violences' lethal effects on collective life in the region." Thus, it is clear Latin America confronts a serious problem of violence that goes beyond direct violence.

This setting may indicate the need for understanding the region in terms of the concept of structural and cultural violence, as introduced in the 1960s and 1990s by Johan Galtung (Galtung 1969, 1990). On one hand, there was an uncontrolled growth of urbanization, going from 20% to over 80% in some countries in the last 50 years. Moreover, the Gini index that measures social inequality shows that an increasing income did not align with less structural violence. This ratio remained stable or even decreased in some countries from 1990 to the present day. Therefore, the unequal growth of income only maintained the high rate of violent deaths. Thus, social inequality clearly has a robust link to criminal and social violence (Adams 2017, p. 12; Kurtenbach 2019, p. 10; Kassab and Rosen 2019, p. 123).

At the same time, state violence is very significant, beginning from the very first years of European colonization and hampering the public's confidence in political institutions. Police officers have responded to criminality through the unwarranted use of lethal force (Adams 2017; Huggins 2002; HRW 2009). Torture and beatings are common in prisons even in countries with low homicide rates, like Chile and Peru. As Rodriguez (2014) comments, "[t]he region's prisons are notoriously brutal and overcrowded. The homicide rate in prisons in Latin America is three times higher than it is in the general population."

The social violence in the sub-continent is interconnected with another global phenomenon: the international trafficking of narcotics and humans (Kassab and Rosen 2019; UNDP 2013, p. 44). In the 1990s, it was not only lawful activities that gained momentum due to economic globalization but also criminal groups trying to develop several illicit activities, such as the trafficking of drugs, arms, and humans (Zabyelina 2009). Monica Herz argues that the tension between the domestic and the international levels reproduced by the Westphalian system promotes the notion that the region is peaceful. The domestic front, however, is marked "(. . .) by intra-state war and transnational criminality. The reality is insulated from the peaceful international realm where peace prevails. The region thus is peaceful as an international space" (Herz 2010, p. 603), but not domestically in the daily lives of most of South Americans. In this regard, the drug trafficking crisis has a key role.

Besides the high degree of social inequality and the normalization of violence generated by historical reasons such as a violent colonization, the region also has favorable climatic conditions and extensive farmland for the cultivation of the raw material for two of the most commonly used drugs in the world: cocaine and marijuana. Adding the deprivation to which these groups are subjected and the result could not be different. The growth of crime operates in a supply chain model, starting with the producer of coca or marijuana leaf, passes through to purchase of illegal weapons, uses the fragility of borders to get into different countries, and culminates with the consumption of a new addict or the death of another youth linked to the drug war (Ferreira 2019).

In this chain of violence, there are a significant number of financial flows feeding the crime. According to UNODC, US$72 billion – the equivalent to 320 tons of cocaine – is moving annually from South America to Europe and North America. While the estimated numbers of arms smuggling are scarce, it is known that US$20 million in small arms are trafficked every year to Mexico (UNODC 2011), and a growing market remains strong in countries like Argentina, Colombia, Brazil, and Mexico (Kassab and Rosen 2019, pp. 139–140). Most of these are light weapons employed daily in organized crime (Geneva Declaration 2011).

The combination of these elements creates in the region a zone with several outbreaks of conflict. The Heidelberg Institute for International Conflict Research (HIIK) has shown that the inter-state and subnational conflicts have been ascending annually over the last decade (HIIK 2019). Among the countries in South America, only Suriname and Uruguay have not presented a relevant social conflict. In all others, there are indicators of violent crisis, and two countries (Brazil and Colombia) have limited war (HIIK 2019), while Venezuela shows alarming violence indexes according to more recent analysis on South America violence (Perea 2019; Perea and Pearce 2019; Kurtenbach 2019; Pearce 2020).

The data presented here not only indicate the barriers to reaching peace in the sub-continent, they also demonstrate how the flow of drugs, weapons, and money linked to transnational crime are important for understanding the atmosphere of conflict existing in countless suburbs of South America. To comprehend the conflict linked to transnational issues and impelled by structural and cultural violence can be a new step to grasp the patterns of violent conflict seen in some corners of the planet and, in particular, the long path ahead for the peacebuilding in South America. In this sense, Pearce and Perea (2019, p. 6) highlight the importance of perspectives not often taken into account by peace scholars, such as “reducing violence and addressing the conditions of its reproduction, including the criminal economies that have emerged in the region and deeply penetrated many social and political as well as economic spheres of life, generating violences of all kinds.” Furthermore, as indicated by Jordan Ryan, new conceptualizations are required to understand cases like South America, given that conflict has changed and needs to be reflected in the future development agenda (Ryan 2013).

Non-war Neither Peace Societies: The Cases of Colombia, Brazil, and Venezuela

Another key element to understanding the violence in the region is the overlap between politically motivated violence and organized crime that began during the Cold War (Moser and McIlwaine 2006; Rubio and Ortiz 2005). Albeit with different degrees of violence and contexts, the clash between right-wing dictatorships supported by the US and guerrilla or insurgent groups with logistical and financial support from USSR was common in Latin America in the 1960s to 1980s. In some cases, the logic was reversed, and political left-wing entities were confronted by right-wing guerrillas – as was the case with the Autodefensas Unidas in Colombia.

Later, the end of the bipolar era and the recent transition to democracy in several countries provided as an outcome a contingent of thousands of armed men aware of their power and the possibilities that power unlocked for new illegal businesses. Soon these men entered the economic drug chain, as seen with the Shining Path in Peru and FARC-EP (Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia – Ejército del Pueblo) in Colombia. Where the former left-wing guerrillas lay down their weapons peacefully, the difficulty they faced in rejoining the market economy led them to return to their arms but this time to achieve economic gain from illegal activities (see more about this in Themner 2013; Sampaio 2014; Ferreira 2019; Peña and Dorussen 2020).

In this sense, the Colombia is a sui generis (unique) case. The country lived in civil conflict from the period of the Cold War (1960s) until a Peace Accord was signed in November 2016. It still struggles against high chronic violence today. It is clear that, currently, organized crime related to drug and arms trafficking is interconnected with guerrillas’ activities, as well as with demobilized troops, creating an environment of limited war (HIIK 2019). While the FARC-EP is engaged in easing drug trafficking, the former Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia (AUC) is the main group engaged in violence that is cooperating with drug cartels (HIIK 2015, p. 97). Furthermore, in 2014, neo-paramilitary groups like AUC were responsible for about one quarter of the country’s internal displaced persons, which totaled nearly 100,000 (HIIK 2015, p. 97).

More recent data shows no changes. While in Colombia the homicide rates declined after the Peace Accord, 130 demobilized FARC-EP combatants, and 300 social leaders were killed (Pearce 2020, p. 8). In an in-depth analysis conducted by Peña and Dorussen (2020) into the links between reintegration programs of former combatants and crime rates, they found that “the presence of former paramilitaries [mostly AUC members] who are not in a reintegration program is linked with increased homicide and robbery rates,” while “former guerillas, regardless of whether they are in or out of a reintegration program, are associated with increased robberies, but when they are in reintegration, guerrillas are associated with fewer homicides” (Peña and Dorussen 2020, p. 18).

However, beyond the cases of civil conflict – as seen in the clashes between FARC, ELN, paramilitary groups, and/or the Colombian government, as well as between Shining Path and the Peruvian state in the 1980s – the main factor victimizing thousands of people in South America is organized crime-related violence. Among them, Colombia, Venezuela, and Brazil have the higher homicide rates in the region.

In Venezuela's case, the country is first in homicide rates in the world (Kurtenbach 2019, Table 1), experiencing both criminal and political violence for different reasons. First, historically, there is a spillover from Colombian drug production into the country, in which the porosity of Amazon borders allows criminal organizations to enter into Venezuela to hide from authorities and to expand illicit networks. Moreover, Venezuela is also an exit point for Colombian production (Perea 2019), which over the years has triggered a better structuration of criminal organizations and an increase in their activities (OVV 2015, p. 3). The involvement of paramilitaries or their former members not involved in reintegration programs is also an important variable for detecting the extent of deterioration of the social fabric in the country. This is because groups comprising such individuals often use coercive means to perform drug trafficking business, as seen in the killing of eight people in November 2014 in Zulia state.

Second, the radicalization of Venezuelan politics, with clashes between leftist government supporters and right-wing groups, added more victims to the violence statistics, with more than 40 people dead and 675 injured in 2014 (HIIK 2015, p. 106). Just 3 years later, the violence between government and opposition worsened, reaching 120 killings in 2017; 15,890 deaths were related to delinquent and police violence (Pearce 2020, pp. 7–8). Despite its polarization and social crisis, Venezuela is not in a sustained armed confrontation between state and opposition groups (Perea 2019, p. 5).

Similar to the Venezuelan case, violence in Brazilian is complex and has multidimensional justifications. In the 1970s, the contact between criminals and political prisoners allowed for an exchange of experiences within the cells. Political prisoners were converted to organized crime, making possible the success of gangs like the Comando Vermelho – one of the most powerful Brazilian criminal groups that controls drug trafficking in parts of the country and even coordinates shipments abroad. Today, Comando Vermelho continues to be powerful, but other groups have emerged and compete for drug trafficking in border areas, such as Primeiro Comando da Capital – currently the most powerful criminal organization in South America, with branches in Paraguay, Bolivia, and Peru – and Família do Norte (see Ferreira and Framento 2019). This emerging violence in the last three decades had generated clashes not only in urban areas but also in areas that had previously low violence rates.

One of the most comprehensive reports about violence in Brazil is the Mapa da Violência [Map of Violence], published annually by the Presidency of Brazil. According to the report, there are new configurations of violence beyond subnational capitals and metropolitan areas (Waiselfisz 2015, p. 55) that continue to contribute more significantly to criminal rates.

First, new economic growth areas attract investments to the countryside, but law enforcement resources do not increase at the same pace, leading to gaps for criminal individuals and drug trafficking gangs to exploit. Second, municipalities in border areas are located in areas that are strategically important for drug, arms, and smuggling activities. Third, cities in the arc of Amazon deforestation experience social challenges due to conflicts between native people and landowners, modern forms of slavery, and illegal timbers that create an atmosphere for violence and homicides. Fourth, predatory tourism in coastal cities provides a context for sex work and the drug market. And fifth, traditional violence persists in areas like the “polygon of marijuana” (located in the limits of the Pernambuco and Bahia states) (Waiselfisz 2015, pp. 55–56).

As seen above, while the violence concentrates in urban areas, a comprehensive analysis of Brazil's social violence indicates a more complex scenario, in which variables like inequality, crime, and deprivation are key to understanding the country (Schwarz 2019). Consequently, the statistics also reveal numbers similar to war zones. A study commissioned by the Brazilian government covering the period between 2001 and 2011 shows that, in that country alone, there were an alarming number of homicides – more than 500,000 – most of them linked to organized crime (Waiselfisz 2013). Brazil, which comprises half of South America's population, currently still presents a brutal homicide index: 65,602 killings in 2017, according to the Brazilian Forum of Public Security and Institute for Applied Economic Research (FBSP/IPEA 2019).

Beyond non-war neither peace scenarios, in the cases of Venezuela, Colombia, and Brazil, elements of both the liberal and the authoritarian approaches can be found, in which elections are more or less fair and free but coexist "alongside high levels of impunity and clientele politics, corruption and discourses of fear" (Kurtenbach 2019, pp. 8–9). Political settings like this, in addition to creating high levels of social violence, lead to societies that experience non-war neither peace scenarios that are plagued by a chronic violence – a violence that not only "reproduces through all those spaces in lethal and non-lethal forms, but the levels of homicide are at least double the global average for five years or more" (Pearce and Perea 2019, p. 2).

Summary

Regarded in some academic literature as a zone of peace, due to its low incidence of armed conflicts and civil wars in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, the nations of South America in fact experience a paradoxical context of non-war neither peace. Rule of law, democratization, and free elections do not guarantee a peaceful society with reduced violence levels. In some countries like Chile and Uruguay, the direct violence indexes (like homicides) are low; however, the sense of security and the violence against women and other minorities are high (Perea 2019, p. 255). In particular, Brazil, Colombia, and Venezuela are cases that present a blend of high direct, structural, and cultural violences that results in thousands of deaths every year.

In this context, a strict adherence to traditional assumptions of conflict circumscribed to political violence can cause a limited view of South America, in which the sub-continent can be considered as a zone of peace (Kacowicz 1998; Holsti 1996). The inequality, direct violence, and authoritarian rule by some states actually indicates the opposite. In fact, the violent conflict in the region is not traditional, involving belligerent armies or groups, but is grounded in social inequality. The "zone of peace" perspective can generate imprecise analysis and the absence of more research on violence and conflict in non-war scenarios like South America. Moreover, it also affects the building of international public policies to overcome a social context of chronic violence.

Thus, while the peace among nations is a fact empirically demonstrated if violence is only regarded as being between South American states, we cannot neglect the perspective of everyday violence seen in urban and rural areas, stimulated both by a historical background of structural violence and transnational variables such as arms and drug trafficking. One cannot ignore the necessity of devising tools to build peace in this scenario, even if it is not configured as an environment of conflict in the traditional sense. Unfortunately, we all have a lot to learn about South America in this regard.

The quest for a positive peace is a dynamic process to overcome the structural violence; it will take decades – perhaps centuries – to reach a fair society. It cannot be settled abruptly through formulaic approaches but must be considered within the social context of South America. In an analysis that covers also Latin America, Perea (2019, p. 14) is precise in affirming that "the very unequal distribution of material and symbolic goods feeds violence, conflictivity and criminality in Latin America. The networks of illegality offer money, opportunities and status (amongst peers), which an unjust and unequal society cannot. Inequality feeds a profound sense of injustice."

To comprehend this kind of conflict linked to transnational issues and impelled by inequality, it is necessary to grasp the long path ahead for peacebuilding in South America. While the concept of peacebuilding can be regarded as out of context when the main concern is criminal violence, the statistics show a violence toll higher or equivalent to that of war zones. This leads to demands for the use of peace studies concepts in the study of violences like crime and endemic homicides (Banfield 2014; Kurtenbach 2019). In this context, thorough interpretative analysis and ethnographies of violences are key to providing responses for a comprehensive peacebuilding for more than 400 million South Americans.

Cross-References

- ▶ Colombian Peace Agreement 2016
- ▶ Peace and Conflict in Brazil
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Postcolonial Subject
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Social Capital and Peace
- ▶ Urban Peacebuilding

References

- Adams, T. (2017). How chronic violence affects human development, social relations, and the practice of citizenship: A systematic framework for action (no. 36). Washington, DC: Woodrow Wilson Centre. <https://www.wilsoncenter.org/publication/how-chronic-violence-affects-human-development-social-relations-and-the-practice>
- Banfield, J. (2014). Crime and Conflict: the new challenge for peacebuilding. London: International Alert.
- Briceño-León, R. (2008). La violencia homicida en América Latina. América Latina Hoy (in Spanish, English summary), 50, 103–116.
- FBSP – Forum Brasileiro de Segurança Pública, & IPEA – Instituto de Pesquisas Econômicas Aplicadas. (2019). Homicídios. In: FBSP and IPEA. Atlas da Violência. Available at: <http://www.ipea.gov.br/atlasviolencia/dados-series/17>
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2017). Criminality and violence in South America: The challenges for peace and UNASUR's response. International Studies Perspectives, 18(1), 64–80.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V. (2019). Transnational organized crime and structural violence in Brazil. In C. Atieno & C. Robinson (Eds.), Post-conflict security, peace and development (Springer briefs in environment, security, development and peace) (Vol. 13). Cham: Springer.
- Ferreira, M. A. S. V., & Framento, R. (2019). Degradação da Paz no Norte do Brasil: O Conflito Entre Primeiro Comando da Capital (PCC) e Família do Norte (FDN). Revista Brasileira de Políticas Públicas e Internacionais, 4(2), 91–114.
- Galtung, J. (1969). Violence, peace and peace research. Journal of Peace Research, 6(3), 167–191.
- Galtung, J. (1990). Cultural violence. Journal of Peace Research, 27(3), 291–305.
- Geneva Declaration (2011). Global Burden of Armed Violence 2011: Lethal Encounters. Cambridge Univ. Press: Cambridge.
- Heinemann, A., & Verner, D. (2006). Crime and violence in development: A literature review of Latin America and the Caribbean (Policy research working paper, 4041). Washington, DC: World Bank.
- Herz, M. (2010). Concepts of security in South America. International Peacekeeping, 17(5), 598–612.
- HIK – Heidelberg Institute for International Conflict Research. (2015). Conflict barometer 2015: Disputes, non-violent crisis, violent crisis, limited wars, wars. Heidelberg: HIK.
- HIK – Heidelberg Institute for International Conflict Research. (2019). Conflict barometer 2018. Heidelberg: HIK.
- Holsti, K. J. (1996). The state, war and the state of war. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- HRW – Human Rights Watch. (2009). Lethal force: Police violence and public security in Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo. New York: HRW.
- Huggins, M. (2002). State violence in Brazil: The professional morality of torturers. In S. Rotker & K. Goldman (Eds.), Citizens of fear: Urban violence in Latin America. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Imbusch, P., Misse, M., & Carrión, F. (2011). Violence research in Latin America and the Caribbean: A literature review. International Journal of Conflict and Violence, 5(1), 87–154.
- Kacowicz, A. (1998). Zones of peace in the third world: South America and West Africa in comparative perspective. Albany: State of New York Press.
- Kassab, H. S., & Rosen, J. D. (2019). Illicit markets, organized crime, and global security. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Kurtenbach, S. (2019). The limits of peace in Latin America. Peacebuilding. <http://sci-hub.tw/10.1080/21647259.2019.1618518>.
- Moser, C., & McIlwaine, C. (2006). Latin America urban violence as development concern: Towards a framework for violence reduction. World Development, 34(1), 89–112.
- OVV-Observatorio Venezolano de la Violencia. (2015). Informe 2014. Caracas: OVV.
- Pearce, J. (2012). The “violence turn” in peace studies and practice. In B. Unger, V. Dudouet, M. Dressler, & B. Austin (Eds.), Undeclared wars – Exploring a peacebuilding approach to armed social violence (pp. 1–10). Berlin: Berghof Foundation.
- Pearce, J. (2020). Politics without violence? Towards a post-Weberian enlightenment. Cham: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Peña, A. G., & Dorussen, H. (2020). The reintegration of ex-combatants and post-conflict violence. An analysis of municipal crime levels in Colombia. Conflict Management and Peace Science. <http://sci-hub.tw/10.1177/0738894219894701>.
- Perea, C. M. (2019). Extreme violence without war and its social reproduction implications for building peace in - Latin America. Peacebuilding, 1–14. <http://sci-hub.tw/10.1080/21647259.2019.1633105>.

- Perea, C. M., & Pearce, J. (2019). Post war and non war violences: Learning about peace and peacebuilding from Latin America. Peacebuilding. <http://sci-hub.tw/10.1080/21647259.2019.1632057>.
- Rodriguez, P. (2014). Crime in Latin America: A broken system. Economist, July 12. <http://www.economist.com/news/americas/21606864-citizens-security-regions-biggest-problem-time-improvecriminal-justice-broken>
- Rubio, M., & Ortiz, R. (2005). Organized crime in Latin America. In P. Reichel (Ed.), Handbook of transnational crime and justice. Thousand Oaks: Sage.
- Ryan, J. (2013). Conflict has changed, and this needs to be reflected in the future development agenda. UNDP. Available in: <http://www.undp.org/content/undp/en/home/ourperspective/ourperspectivearticles/2013/08/02/conflict-has-changed-and-this-needs-to-be-reflected-in-the-future-development-agenda-jordan-ryan.html>. Accessed 5 Nov 2014.
- Sampaio, A. (2014). Guerrillas, criminals and something in between. IISS Voices, March 2014. Available at: <https://www.iiss.org/en/iiss%20voices/blogsections/iiss-voices-2014-b4d9/march-2014-cd5b/guerrilla-criminals-fl93>. Accessed 16 Nov 2014.
- Schwarz, L. (2019). Sobre o Autoritarismo Brasileiro. São Paulo: Companhia das Letras.
- Small Arms Survey, Graduate Institute of International and Development Studies. (2012). Small arms survey 2012. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Themmer, A. (2013). A leap of faith: When and how ex-combatants resort to violence. Security Studies, 22(2), 295–329.
- UNDP – United Nations Development Program. (2013). Seguridad Ciudadana con Rostro Humano: diagnóstico y propuestas Para América Latina [Security citizen with human face: Diagnostics and proposals for Latin America]. New York: UNDP.
- UNGA – United Nations General Assembly. (2003). South American zone of peace and cooperation. Resolution adopted by the General Assembly 57/13, 8 Jan 2003.
- UNODC – United Nations Office for Drugs and Crime. (2019). Global study on homicide. Vienna: UNODC.
- UNODC – United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime. (2011). Estimating illicit financial flows resulting from drug trafficking and other transnational organized crimes. Vienna: UNODC.
- Van den Berg, S., & Laing, A. (2018). World Court: Chile not forced to negotiate over Bolivia sea access. Reuters, 1 Oct 2018.
- Waiselfisz, J. (2013). Homicídios e Juventude no Brasil. Brasília: Secretaria Geral da Presidência da República.
- Waiselfisz, J. (2015). Mapa da violência 2016: Homicídios por armas de fogo no Brasil. Rio de Janeiro: FLACSO/Cebela.
- Zabyelina, Y. (2009). Transnational organized crime in international relations. Central European Journal of International and Security Studies, 3(1):11–22.

Visual Peace and Conflict Research

- ▶ Auto-photography

Voting Methods

- ▶ Voting Systems

Voting Systems

David Churchman

California State University Dominguez Hills,
California State University, Carson, CA, USA

Synonyms

Electoral manipulation and prevention; Electoral methods; Electoral systems; Refugee voting; Voting methods

Definition

A voting system specifies when, how, and for what purposes elections are conducted and how winners are determined.

Voting systems are procedures specified for conducting and determining results of elections and referendums primarily but not limited to selecting among candidates for office in governments, organizations, and companies. They specify when elections occur, for what purposes, how ballots are cast and counted, qualifications for candidacy and for voting (such as age, citizenship or organizational membership, identification, and residency), and details such as campaign spending, contribution limits, compulsory vs. voluntary voting, selection and responsibilities of observers, absentee or proxy voting, polling locations, access, electoral security and integrity, auditing, certification of results, and protests (Churchman 2013; Colomer 2004; Encyclopedia Britannica 1966 Vols 8 and 23; O’Conner and Robertson 2002).

Most voters want elections to be “fair” – but what does that mean? Apart from the obvious such as counting every legitimate ballot, Marquis de Condorcet (1785) suggested that a fair election winner should be able to defeat all other candidates one-on-one. Consider three voters choosing among three candidates for a single office:

Voter 1: Prefers the Candidates in A B C order

Voter 2: Prefers the Candidates in B C A order

Voter 3: Prefers the Candidates in C A B order

In this situation, there is no clear winner nor a way to reduce the candidates for a runoff election – the “Condorcet paradox.” Of course, such an outcome is unlikely in an election with a substantial number of voters, but it leads to a widely accepted definition of fairness that no method of determining winners should result in the defeat of a Condorcet winner.

Kenneth Arrow (1950) demonstrated that election results can change depending on how elections are conducted. Furthermore, when there are more than two voters and three candidates for a single position, it is impossible to design a voting system that meets all five criteria he proposes for rationality and fairness:

- The vote must assign all candidates the same rank no matter how votes are counted.
- Each vote should have equal weight.
- Every [serious] candidate should have a chance to win.
- A voter should not be able to hurt one candidate by promoting another.
- If every voter prefers a certain candidate, so must the result.

The conclusion follows that there is no single perfect system for conducting a fair vote. This explains at least in part why several major systems and variations have evolved, each with its own strengths and weaknesses (Brams 1982, Nurmi 1987; Saul and Johnson 2017).

Approval voting requires voters to rate each candidate either as “acceptable” or “unacceptable” or in some systems to abstain from voting either way on some candidates. Depending on the scoring method, either the candidate with the most “acceptable” votes wins or the candidate with the highest median score wins. It is easy to understand and use and works on existing voting machines. It eliminates the dilemma faced by members of minor parties of wasting their vote to express their true opinion. Claims that it will reduce negative campaigning or increase voter turnout are unproven, the opposite seeming equally plausible. It may produce a profusion of candidates, such as the California 2003 gubernatorial recall election with over 200 candidates, most running only in hope of gaining a little publicity and ego-gratification. It increases the chance of a tie. The most prominent use is the selection of the United Nations Secretary General.

Cumulative voting gives each voter a fixed number of votes, usually equal to the number of seats at stake, to distribute among candidates in any way desired, including giving all of one’s votes to a single candidate. Cumulative voting offers minorities the potential for proportional representation without creating special districts, but the complexities of real life do not ensure that result, primarily because everyone is the member not of one but of many groups (e.g., age, education, ethnicity, occupation, political viewpoint, religion, sexual orientation, and wealth). The only existing examples identified are in Delaware corporations that have specifically adopted the system in their charter.

Majority voting has two main forms: single transferable vote (see below) and the more common two-round system that requires a winning candidate to have a predetermined number of votes cast to win, most often, 50% + 1 of the votes cast. In some cases, a “double majority” is required both of the number voting and the number of votes required to win. Sometimes, usually for specific issues such as taxes or removal from office, supermajorities usually of 60% or 66.66% of votes cast are required to win. If no candidate receives the required majority in the first round, a runoff election occurs with a predetermined number of candidates (usually the top two). Strategic voting (see below) in the first round is common. Majority voting is used in over 80 countries for electing a president and in 20 countries for electing the legislature.

Ordinal voting requires voters to rank candidates from most to least preferred. Calculating a winner can be complicated. One method was devised by Jean-Charles de Borda (1781) for electing members to the French Academy of Sciences. Each voter assigns 1 point to the least preferred candidate, 2 to the second lowest, and so on up to C points for the top candidate where C is the number of candidates. Points are summed and the candidate with the highest total wins. The method is particularly useful if there is a need to order all the candidates, such as the items for a meeting agenda, or simultaneously determining both membership and leadership of a board of directors. The Borda method tends to select generally acceptable candidates rather than the Condorcet winner. Voters are likely to rank candidates strategically by giving their lowest ranking to the most powerful rival of their preferred candidate. It is used to elect the Heisman Trophy recipient in American college football and to select the Most Valuable Player in American professional baseball.

Plurality voting, also known as first past the post, requires a winning candidate to have more votes than any other candidate, but not necessarily a majority. Unless there is a tie, it produces a winner in the first round every time regardless of the number of candidates. In multicandidate elections, approval voting (see above) is more likely than plurality voting to select the Condorcet winner. Fifty-eight countries use the system to elect their national legislatures, 19 use it to select their president, and it is common in US elections at all levels of government.

Range voting, also known as ranked voting, requires voters to rate each candidate by assigning each a score within a predetermined range from lowest to highest approval such as 0–5. The voter may give the same rating to several candidates. Range voting has potential for reducing two-party domination, eliminates cloning, and can run on many existing voting machines. Some argue ranking will increase voter turnout and some that the complexity will reduce it. It increases the advantage of strategic voting (see below) and becomes confusing to voters as the number of candidates and allowable ratings increase. In some versions, voters may express no opinion about a candidate. This both makes ballot manipulation (see below) possible and necessitates establishing quorums to prevent a candidate with a few high scores and a large number of abstentions from winning. Common approaches include mean score, median score, and number of top ratings received. Abstentions either are ignored or included. Eleven additional, potentially contradictory, scoring methods have been used at one time or another. Range voting is used in Olympic diving and gymnastic competitions.

Single transferable vote, also known as instant runoff, is a scoring system applied to ordinal voting devised by Carl Andrae in 1855 and by Thomas Hare in 1857. It often is used when at-large votes are held for multiple seats. Election requires surpassing a quota determined only after all votes have been cast using a preset formula. The most common, the Droop quota, is $1 + \text{votes}/(\text{seats} + 1)$. For example, if 1000 votes were cast for 9 seats, winning would require $1 + 1000/(9 + 1)$ or 101 votes. A predetermined number of low-ranked candidates then are eliminated, and all of their votes are transferred to the first-round totals of the remaining unelected candidates based on the rank indicated by each voter. All candidates who now have 101 votes are elected. The process is repeated until all seats are filled. Party-controlled strategic voting is unlikely because the calculations required are complex and the needed control of voters unlikely. In some versions, all votes in each round above the number needed to win a seat are transferred to the remaining candidates. Which ballots are selected for the transfer seems ripe for corruption. First tried in Denmark in 1856, it now is used for some elections in Australia, Fiji, Malta, Nauru, Northern Ireland, Papua New Guinea, and the Republic of Ireland.

Weighted voting, also known as statutory voting, similar to cumulative voting, gives each voter one or more votes based on some predetermined qualification. Results usually are determined by either majority or plurality rule. Corporate election in which individuals get one vote for each share of stock held is a form of weighted voting as is that in the UN Security Council, in which each member has one vote but any of the five permanent members can veto all the rest.

Electoral Manipulation and Its Prevention

Before an election, manipulation may involve redrawing electoral district boundaries either to concentrate or to diffuse the vote of the other party so that it wins fewer offices. “Cracking” aims to divide it among several electoral districts. “Packing” aims to put most of their voters into the smallest possible number of districts. Eliminating or imposing requirements such as literacy, requiring proof of eligibility and identity, and simplifying or complicating absentee voting or poll taxes have been used for the same purpose (Ellis 2007). Voting can be made more or less convenient by where polling places are located or even distributing false information about the times or places of polling.

During elections individuals may vote strategically to encourage a major party to take up a cause (Social Security and prohibition started that way in the United States) or, particularly in primary elections, to vote so as to weaken the opposition party in the general election. This becomes more likely when one party has an uncontested and another party a contested primary, whether by crossover voting if allowed or by encouraging party members to temporarily change their registration for the purpose. This is the potential flaw in allowing nonpartisan or crossover participation in primaries (Tideman 1987).

Voters often of an identifiable group such as a particular race or religion may be threatened physically or with legislative reprisals. Polling places in an area known to support a particular party or candidate may be vandalized or destroyed. Some voters may be intimidated by real or implied authority figures who suggest that they have no right to vote and will be imprisoned or deported if they try. Attempts can be made to buy votes with offers of clothing, food, money, or a job, although ensuring people vote as paid often is difficult. There have been cases of retirement home residents being helped to fill out “absentee voter” forms, a practice known in Great Britain as “granny farming.” Such electoral corruption is common if government resources are dispensed through state patronage.

Turnout buying by providing transportation to and from polls and get-out-the-vote [GOTV] campaigns by political parties that consist primarily of phone calls to registered voters without suggesting how to vote are more ambiguous, perhaps politically neutral, perhaps designed to give voters a feeling of obligation to the party helping or encouraging them. Blind, illiterate, or otherwise handicapped voters who require assistance to cast their votes are vulnerable to having their votes miscast.

After the vote but before the counting, a candidate’s total can be reduced by marking some ballots for more candidates than allowed, spoiling them in some other fashion, or by destroying ballots completely. Its opposite, inflating the vote for a favored candidate sometimes is achieved by ballot stuffing or by individuals voting multiple times at different polling places while posing as voters still on the rolls despite having moved to another jurisdiction or by persons with a supply of falsified ballots and access to unwatched ballot boxes. Where votes are recorded through electronic or mechanical means, the voting machinery may be altered so that a predetermined percentage of the votes for a candidate are not recorded or are changed. Election results that are sent over the Internet to a center for counting are vulnerable to diversion to an intermediate website where votes are flipped and then forwarded to the counting center.

During the counting, selected ballots can be declared invalid or miscounted. In dictatorships and corrupt regimes, the voting process may be nothing more than a sham, officials announcing whatever results they want, sometimes without counting the votes.

Defenses against electoral manipulation of varied efficacy are available (Rominee 2018). They begin by cultivating a communal culture intolerant of and willing to report suspected electoral corruption. Secret ballots reduce the effectiveness of intimidation and vote buying. Transparency and strict custody at each phase of the election process from nomination of candidates to tabulation of votes are vital, and exit polls can serve as a deterrent to electoral fraud despite their imprecision, some voters being reluctant to admit how they voted. Not just totals but results from each polling place including numbers of invalidated ballots should be available for review using statistical methods available to identify results warranting investigation. National or international observers at polling places or during ballot counting help prevent fraud and reassure voters, although they are unlikely to spot voter suppression or manipulation of voting machine software. Machine accuracy can be tested using a simulated set of ballots before and after an election, and code signing can identify changes made to the software. Running several independent simulations can verify the integrity of those testing the machines.

Elections in War-Torn Countries

Participation in free and fair elections is widely if not universally recognized as a fundamental human right but is highly problematic for refugees who have fled their country or become internally displaced persons [IDP] because of war. Refugee and IDP right to vote in their country of origin regardless of location are recognized by 172 countries that have ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights [ICCPR]. Beyond being a right, voting reaffirms citizenship, maintains individual interest in the home country, improves the odds of their eventual return, and increases confidence in the likelihood of a stable peace (Goldsmith n.d.; Mandal 2003; Milner 2009; Shacknove 1985; Zolberg 1989).

Conducting refugee and IDP elections often faces unusual difficulties. Fighting often has damaged or destroyed the physical and administrative infrastructure necessary to conduct elections – which in some cases never existed. Voting in person offers a clear target to any remaining dissident groups. Instead of bringing people together, elections sometimes exacerbate differences and prove harmful to peacemaking processes (Fisher 2007; Grace and Mooney 2009; Koser 2009).

Refugee and IDP voting rights stem partly from having been forced to flee rather than depart voluntarily. However, it is not always easy to distinguish them from voluntary migrants with less of a claim to vote in their former home country. The extent the right to vote rests upon intent to return to the home country or for how long intent qualifies a refugee to vote is unsettled. Elections for national office are far easier than subnational ones to organize because the latter require getting different ballots to different voters. Two solutions are common. First, refugees can be treated as a distinct constituency with its own representatives, risking creation of a special interest group at odds with the need to reintegrate those displaced and those who remained and depending on the nature of the refugees some possibility of entrenching ethnic, linguistic, or religious divisions (Kumar 1988; Lacy 2004). Second is doing everything possible to connect refugees to their home municipality, often without the customary documentation required. The number of polling stations required, their locations, and staffing them properly are problems to be solved given the number of refugees of a particular conflict and the number of countries hosting them. Finally, the refugees must be informed in advance of registration as to who may access their personal information and provided access to all campaign materials from all competing parties and candidates.

Some states hosting refugees may lack their own democratic traditions and contest the very notion of popular sovereignty. They may fear that providing voting rights to foreign nationals not offered to their own citizens may fuel unrest among their own citizens. Other hosts may seek to influence election outcomes based on their own national interests.

Summary

Voting using one of the systems discussed above is an excellent tool for making choices by groups ranging in size from a few people to many millions. It is intuitively understandable and results usually are accepted even by the losers. It has desirable side effects such as encouraging constituent interest and involvement in all levels of government. Election campaigns often provide new ideas and interpretations that improve government responsiveness, legitimize its actions, and thus improve its stability. These same effects extend beyond government to corporate, labor union, civic, nonprofit, and social organization elections.

However, voting is not suitable for all decisions, particularly those requiring technical expertise, privacy, rapidity, or matters that do not warrant the time, effort, and expense involved in holding an election. Among them are personnel decisions such as whom to hire, promote, or fire, whom to care for first in mass casualty emergencies, and routine managerial decisions such as purchase of customary supplies or maintenance, repair, or replacement of equipment.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Post-Conflict Elections
- ▶ Secession and Self-Determination

References

- Arrow, K. (1950). A difficulty in the concept of social welfare. Journal of Political Economy, 58, 328–346.
- Borda, J. (1781). Memoire sur les elections au scrutiny. Paris: Histoire de l'Academie Royale des Sciences.
- Brams, S. (1982). Approval voting: One candidate, one vote. In B. Grofman et al. (Eds.), Representation and redistricting issues. Lexington: Lexington Books.
- Churchman, D. (2013). Political C\onflict. In D. Churchman (Ed.), Why we fight: The origins, nature, and management of human conflict (2nd ed.). Lanham: University Press of America.
- Colomer, J. (2004). Handbook of electoral system choice. Houndmills: Palgrave Macmillan.
- de Condorcet, M. (1785). Essai sur l'application de l'analyse a la probabilité des decisions rendues la pluralite des voix. Paris: De l'Imprimerie Royale.
- Ellis, A. (2007). The international IDEA handbook: Voting from abroad. Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance [IDEA].
- Encyclopædia Britannica. (1966a). Voting behaviour. Encyclopedia Britannica, 23, 259–260.
- Encyclopædia Britannica. (1966b). Electoral systems. Encyclopedia Britannica, 8(120–5), 676.
- Fisher, J. (2007). The political rights of refugees and displaced persons: Enfranchisement and participation. In A. Ellis et al. (Eds.), The international IDEA handbook: Voting from abroad. Stockholm: International IDEA.
- Goldsmith, B. (n.d.). Out of country voting in post-conflict elections. www.aceproject.org.
- Grace, J., & Mooney, E. (2009). Peacebuilding through the electoral participation of displaced populations. Refugee Survey Quarterly, 28(1), 95–121.
- Hare, T. (2017). Treatise on the election of representatives: Parliamentary and municipal. Miami: HardPress
- Koser, K. (2009). Integrating displacement in peace processes and peace building. Refugee Survey Quarterly, 28, 1.
- Kumar, K. (Ed.). (1988). Post-conflict elections, democratization and international assistance. Boulder: Lynne Reiner.
- Lacy, B. (2004). Building accountability, legitimacy, and peace: Refugees, internally displaced persons, and the right to political participation. Arlington: International Foundation for Electoral Systems.
- Long, K. (2010). Voting with their feet. <https://www.unhcr.org/research/evalreports/4ca08d249/voting-feet-review-refugee-participation-role-unhcr-country-origin-election-s.html>.
- Mandal, R. (2003). Political rights of refugees. Geneva: UNHCR.
- Milner, J. (2009). Refugees and the regional dynamics of peacebuilding. Refugee Survey Quarterly, 28, 1.
- Nurmi, H. (1987). Comparing voting systems. Dordrecht: Reidel.
- O'Connor, J., & Robertson, E. (2002). The history of voting MacTutor history of mathematics archive. <http://www-history.mcs.st-andrews.ac.uk/HistTopics/Voting.html>.
- Rominee, C. (2018). US senate testimony. <https://www.nist.gov/speech-testimony/election-security-preparations-federal-and-vendor-perspectives>.
- Saul, S., & Johnson, P. (2017). Voting systems: Mathematics old and new. Mineola: Dover Books on Mathematics.
- Shacknove, A. (1985). Who is a refugee? Ethics, 95, 274–284.
- Tideman, T. (1987). Independence of clones as a criterion for voting rules. Social Choice and Welfare, 4(3), 185–206.
- Zolberg, A., et al. (1989). Escape from violence: Conflict and the refugee crisis in the developing world. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Vote Counting Methods (All Accessed January 2019)

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Coomb's_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Copeland's_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Dodgson's_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Kemeny-Young_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Maximal_lotteries.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Minimax_Condorcet_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Nanson's_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Positional_voting.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Ranked_pairs.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Schulze_method.

en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Thorvald_N._Thiel.

W

Waithood

- ▶ Youth Bulge and Conflict

War

- ▶ Different Layers of the Afghan Conflict
- ▶ Peace Journalism

War and Peace in Somalia

Israel Nyaburi Nyadera^{1,2}, Mohamed Salah Ahmed² and Michael Otieno Kisaka³

¹University of Macau, Macau, China

²Ankara Yildirim Beyazit University, Ankara, Turkey

³Hacettepe University, Ankara, Turkey

Synonyms

Civil war; Conflict resolution; Counterterrorism; Organized crime; Peacebuilding; Traditional peace approaches; Transformation of conflict; Violence; Xeer

Definition/Description

This chapter examines how and why peace has remained elusive in the Somali crisis following the events that marked the collapse of Siad Barre's regime in 1991. Although several studies have been undertaken on this case and a number of recommendations suggested, limited attention has been placed on the transformation of the conflict and the need to modify some of the peacebuilding strategies to cope with the changes. This study discusses how the conflict in Somalia has evolved, weaknesses in the previous peace efforts, and provides recommendations. It looks at the traditional Xeer practices in Somalia and its relevance in solving contemporary conflict.

Introduction

In 1960, Somalia (Jamhuuriyadda Soomaaliyeed) joined the category of the first African countries to gain independence following the unification of the previous State of Somaliland (Controlled by the British) and the Trust Territory of Somaliland (previously under the Italians) (Reyner 1960, p. 247; Lewis et al. 2008). The new state experienced a blowing wind of hope for new dawn after approximately seven decades of European imperialism. The early years after independence were marked by blossoming political, economic, and social growth. However, this would be short-lived as the impact of uniting the previously divided regions, colonial legacies, and the emerging economic challenges facing the new state combined with other political and social factors laid the foundations for preceding disasters.

In 1969, a successful military coup was orchestrated by General Mohammed Siyad Barre, who took control of the country and plunged it to further crisis (Ingiriis 2016; Ghalib 1995; Mazrui 1997, p. 6; Knight 1998). During his rule, Siad Barre made enemies both at home and abroad. He did not only emerge as a ruthless dictator known for fiercely dealing with anyone threatening his grip on power but also, Siyad Barre thrust Somalia into three major conflicts (Greenfield 1987, p. 65; Clark 1992, p. 110). These include the Ogaden war (1977-78) with Ethiopia, the Somali national government forces against Somali National Movement in 1988, and intense conflicts between several liberation movements composed of different clans and the Somalian national government between 1978 and 1991. Internationally, Barre's government was conspicuously involved in the Cold War rivalry between the Soviets and the United States. By 1991, a civil war erupted leading to his overthrow and the subsequent collapse of the Somalia government. Some scholars believe that Barre played a significant role in the events that followed his removal from power and the civil war (Ingiriis 2016; Doornbos and Markakis 1994).

Since 1991, the conflict in Somalia has evolved in nature, actors, strategies, and even objectives (World Bank 2005; Lewis 2008, p. 72). Such transformations have hindered peacebuilding efforts and continue to elevate the suffering of millions inside the country and across the Horn of Africa (Menkhaus 1996, pp. 43–45; Menkhaus 2009; Nyadera and Bincof 2019; Bowd and Chikwanha 2010). From the onset, militia groups from various clans have been engaged in the conflict, foremost against the government, and later after the disintegration of state institutions, civilian violence has been witnessed between clans with very severe impacts on the majority of the civilians.

The scramble for the limited state resources left behind after the collapse of the government in 1991 has created an environment whereby only the strongest can survive. Consequently, this paved the way for the rapid expansion of organized crime with new areas continuously being explored (Shortland and Varese 2016, p. 811).

Over the last two decades, Somalia has been on the spotlight for being a hub for terrorism, piracy, kidnappings, smuggling, child soldiers, and assassinations. Various local and foreign-based groups continue to profit from the instability. Territorial control, hijacking relief products, and illegal taxation have characterized the contemporary Somali society and became an important source of projecting one's power among the nonstate actors (Møller 2009, p. 12). While economic, political, and material stakes are high in the Somali crisis, clan alignment is still visible in the way the war is being perpetuated today. The chart below indicates that over 11,000 acts of violence carried out by different actors between 1995 and 2019.

From the second half of the 1990s to date, there have been changes in nature of the conflict in the form of a shift from the sporadic attacks between different clans and subclans, to a state of lawlessness and disorder. This has been facilitated by the infiltration by criminal groups who use the less governed territories to launch local and regional attacks (Shortland and Varese 2016, pp. 811–814; Menkhaus 2003, p. 406). During certain periods, regions such as south-central part of Somalia witnessed prolonged stability with the introduction of the Sharia courts which had been founded on Islamic teachings and principles as alternative to the mainstream judicial system (Møller 2009, p. 13; Barnes and Hassan 2007, p. 152; Murphy 2011). However, with time, the same Islamic Courts and its leaders became leading actors in the country's struggle for power (Lewis 2008, p. 85; ICG 2008, p. 2; Shay 2017). By the year 2010, a vast part of Somalia became subjected to the sphere of influence of radical militia wings previously affiliated with the Islamic Courts such as the Hizbul Islam and al-Shabaab but who opted to use force in implementing the Sharia Law (Dersso 2009, p. 6; Floudiotis 2010).

During the 2000s, increased efforts by regional and international actors saw the establishment of a Somali government referred to as the Transitional Federal Government (TFG) with the hope that a central authority which had been lacking since 1991 would help restore stability to the war-torn state. The mandate of the TFG was envisioned to extend through 2012 to establish some fundamental institutions such as the Federal Parliament, an Executive, Public Service Commission, and others. The federal government was not however able to impose its authority in the whole country as the Islamic Courts which controlled the Southern parts of the country were reluctant to surrender power to the central government. In fact, it was the attempt by the TFG with the support of the United States, Ethiopia, and African Union troops to forcefully overrule the sharia law-controlled parts of Somalia that saw militia groups such as the al-Shabab emerge (Shay 2017, pp. 21–26; Mwangi 2010, pp. 88–90).

In 2008, there was a coalition government formed after a peace talk was brokered by former UN envoy, Ahmedou Abdallah. This agreement saw representatives of the moderate Islamist group; Alliance for the Re-liberation of Somalia and the government representatives agree to expand parliament to 550 members and provide room for ARS representatives and allow for the appointment of Sheikh Sharif Ahmed as the president and the appointment of Abdirashid Ali, as Prime minister. In 2009 an announcement was made by the government regarding its intention to reintroduce Sharia law as the basis upon which the official Judiciary would be founded. Despite this announcement, the violence did not stop in the Southern part of Somalia, which was under the control of radical militia groups that were in support of Sharia law. The government lost 80% of the territory; it was previously controlling in South-Central Somalia to different warlords and militias (Nyadera and Salah 2019).

As a provision in the “Roadmap for the End of Transition,” the transitional government paved the way for institutionalization of the Federal Government together with permanent institutions of governance (Bryden 2013; Hesse 2010, pp. 245–248; Cornwell 2006). The parliament was given the mandate to elect the president, and since 2012, two presidential elections have been conducted. Despite the impressive efforts that have seen Somalia establish a government today, attempts to end the conflict have not been very successful as the country continues to be involved in an intense intrastate cycle of conflict (Nyadera et al. 2019). Between 2011 and 2018, there have been two presidential elections, efforts to reconstruct the national army ongoing, significant loss of territory by al-Shabab as well as other institutional reconstructions. Nonetheless, despite these efforts, attacks on key state installations have continued, calls for independence by some starts have persisted, civilians continue to be attacked in major cities, and governments operations are yet to be fully felt.

Key Peacemaking Efforts in Somalia

The conflict in Somalia has not gone unnoticed and has attracted the attention of both local, regional, and international actors who have embarked on several efforts to broker peace among the warring parties. However, these efforts have largely been unsuccessful as a result of several reasons some of which include the top-down approach that does not include the people, the failure of these agreements to address the root causes of the conflict as well as their inability to provide deals that all clans feel satisfied. Similarly, the peace efforts were marred by mistrust and lack of compromise among the different clan representatives. Below are some of the efforts made to bring the warring factions on the chart to discuss peace.

Djibouti Peace Conference (1991)

When delegates representing different groups sat on 1991 in Djibouti, marking the first peace efforts, many were optimistic that peace was on the horizon. The Djibouti Peace Conference was convened by the Djiboutian government to mitigate on militia activities in Mogadishu between the factions of General Aideed and Ali Mahdi. The conflict between these factions is estimated to have claimed 14,000 lives at the time, and 42,000 people were maimed (Lewis (2002, p. 264). Egypt, Italy, and other states in the Horn of Africa provided support in different capacities to the Djiboutian government (Lyons and Samatar 1995, p. 29). However, diplomacy reached hiatus when the peace conference was held, and this was attributed to the militia war between General Aideed and Ali Mahdi and an absence of a strategic framework addressing the conflict between the two Hawiye militia leaders in Mogadishu.

Moreover, Mogadishu was thrown to the abyss due to the full-scale civil war driven by the militia leader who did circumvent the law because he was not accountable to any government institution. Indeed, the absence of government structures was a haven for impunity among the third-generation civil militia groups. Due to the nonexistence of a social contract between the state and its citizens, the Somali state disintegrated and completely collapsed, and a banana republic is sprouting.

Djibouti Peace Conference did abort because of the failed framework and principles of mediation. The mediation process did breach the elementary rule of mediation, which clearly states that mediation should not quest to promote one person or group's interests at the expense of another (Mayer 2004, p. 85). Fundamentally, the conflict had not reached Mutually Hurting Stalemate (MHS) where actors involved in the conflict see no chance of victory, yet the current situation is causing pain for both parties (Zartman and Berman 1982; Zartman 1983; Touval and Zartman 1985). General Aideed was still hoping to win the war, thus making it difficult for the process to achieve sustainable peace (Bercovitch et al. 2008, p. 54). The timing of the peace conference was not the best given that some actors (General Aideed) were still hopeful of a military victory against Ali Mahdi and forces loyal to Siad Barre. General Aideed had no incentives to attend a peace conference that could reduce his political, military, and economic influence in the civil militia conflict (Zartman 2000, p. 291).

Mogadishu was at that stage Balkanized into political and military fiefdoms of Third Generation Militia Groups, with General Aideed controlling a large part of the capital city. The Djibouti Peace Conference lacked credibility both within Somalia and internationally. Djibouti process did not have the aegis from Somalis who were polarized along with clan militia affiliations; some militia groups saw it as a plateau before initiating the next stage of the conflict. The international community was not ready to underwrite the peace process politically as reflected in Sahnoun's (1994, p. 10) argument that when the government of Djibouti requested UN's support for the peace process, it was refused with no explanation except that the matter of Somalia was too complicated.

The Addis Ababa Peace Conference (1993)

The Addis Ababa Conference (1993) on National Reconciliation was convened by the UN based on what Bradbury (1994, p. 22) contends was an analysis of the ORH dramatic changes in Somalia brought about by the US Military presence. Lewis (2005, p. 270; 2010, p. 129) goes further and suggests that the UN Secretary-General at that time, Boutros Boutros-Ghali, took advantage of the relative lull in fighting which the US presence had produced and pressed ahead with the so-called "reconciliation" process. This analysis presumes that the Addis Ababa peace conference did not emanate from rational diagnostics of the conflict because the decision was informed by UN expediency. The failure of this peace initiative could have been sowed from the beginning. First, the arbitrary manner in which delegates to the conference were selected, which resulted in a dominant representation of the Mudug region, there was disagreement between the UN and the militia on the selection of delegates. This isolated General Aideed from the peace process, although his group controlled a larger part of Somalia. The remaining 15 militia groups signed a peace agreement that saw the creation of the Transitional National Authority.

The Transitional National Authority did not last long as the Addis Ababa process failure to place the root causes of the conflict on the negotiation table with issues, such as the fight over grazing land in the Mudug region, were not taken into consideration in favor of political expediency owing to the establishment of a central government. Conversely, an agreement on a ceasefire without a clear structural framework for the implementation was a shortcoming of the process; the peace process should have developed concise modalities for the cantonment of militia groups. A strategy of the cantonment and eventual disarmament should have been negotiated with all the militia leaders, taking into account the security dilemma among the clan affiliated militia groups, and clan elders would have played a pivotal role in this regard. The approach ought to have been different from the tactics of isolating and marginalizing General Aideed's militia group (Lewis 2010, p. 132; Adam 2008, p. 99; Rutherford 2008, p. 146).

The Cairo Peace Conference (1997)

The governments of Egypt, Libya, and Yemen did co-sponsor the Cairo peace conference and was attended by 28 warlords and factional leaders. Elmi and Barise (2006, p. 40) observe that at the time, Somalia's warlords and factional leaders were separated into two groups: The Ethiopian-supported Somali Salvation Alliance (SSA), which consisted of 15 factions and the Somali National Alliance (SNA), which consisted of 13 factions and received limited support from Libya (Elmi and Barise 2006, pp. 42–46).

Ali Mahdi and Hussein Mohammed Aideed led the SSA and the SNA, respectively. The main objective of the Cairo peace process was to re-establish the nonexistent central government. The form and type of a future Somali government was a bone of contestation space by the international community, and no due consideration was given to Somalis. Elmi and Barise (2006, p. 40) allege that the act of walking out of the conference and rejecting its outcomes by Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed and General Adam Abdullahi Nur was motivated by Ethiopia. These two militia leaders were deemed to be critical role-players at the conference. These actions led to the collapse of the conference.

The Arta Peace Conference (2000)

The Arta Peace Conference was held against the background of the successive failures of the Addis Ababa and Cairo peace processes, and the hacking of the Somali state by a plethora of militia groups often supported by their clansmen. Ismail Omar Guelle, President of Djibouti, in January 2000 embarked on what Lewis (2002, p. 291) describes as a more ambitious, new and in many respects novel Somali peace plan. It was well received by the IGAD countries and was endorsed by the USA, Italy, Egypt, and Libya. The peace process was named Arta, after a city in Djibouti.

It is estimated that 60% of the 245 members of the Transitional National Assembly came from Siad Barre's former members of parliament (Lewis (2008, p. 82). The legitimacy of the Arta process was questioned before its implementation began owing to several dynamics. Both the TNG and TNA did lack the support of the Somalis, recalcitrant warlords, such as Mohammed Qanyere Afrah, Musa Saudi, Ali Osman Atto, Hussein Aideed, Mohammed Dhere, and Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed. The parochial clan political focus of the TNG had been attested to be a phenomenon in its failure and reinforced by the perception that the TNG serves the interests of the subclan that gave it political backing (Dagne 2009, pp. 95–98).

The crumble of the Arta peace process lay in its lack of focus on conflict resolution and failure to create a mechanism to ensure that the underlying causes of the conflict were addressed systematically and coherently. The conference's central government creation before the resolution phase of the conflict was a short-sighted approach to the resolution of an intractable conflict which had shown resistance to military resolution. The conceptual framework for creating a government before making peace has become a defining feature of international diplomacy in the resolution of the conflict since the Arta Peace Conference, despite its shortcomings and failures in the Somali context.

The Mbagathi Peace Conference (2004)

The Mbagathi Peace Process sponsored by the IGAD was convened due to the failure of the Arta Peace Conference (2000). Lewis (2008, p. 91) observes that the Mbagathi process had repeated all the major mistakes made during similar and unproductive Somali peace processes. The most critical mistake was the unavailability of a roadmap for tranquility and reconciliations before the establishment of a central government. The Mbagathi process took place in a period of challenging international security threats posed by global terror groups, characterized by the 11th September 2001 attacks on the USA. The fact that Somalia terrorist groups had begun taking advantage of the instability in Somalia to set up bases meant the US government would have an interest in the direction of the peace process was going, mainly due to the Bush Administration's global strategy and the war on terror.

Menkhaus (2003, p. 19) argues that for external actors, conventional wisdom holds that a responsible and effective state is an essential prerequisite for development and peace, a reasonable position enshrined in virtually all World Bank and UN strategies on development. For Somalis, the state is an instrument for accumulation and domination, enriching and empowering those who control it, while exploiting and harassing the rest of the population (Menkhaus 2003). Møller (2009, p. 14) observes that the relentless quest for state-building in the Somali conflict resolution process is predicated on the entire international system constructed around states to such an extent that it cannot handle stateless territories inhabited by people who cannot be classified as citizens of any state. Somali's case can be solved from a bottom-up approach where the unity needs to be forged among the people before embarking on state building. Somalia has relevant historical structures such as the diya – paying system that can be useful towards this course.

The Mbagathi peace process was compromised by a relentless emphasis on clan formula representation in the process. Innocuous clan identity became a cornerstone of instrumentalist politicians in their quest to occupy positions with the perceived proximate to wealth accumulation because ethnic conflict is all about political, economic, social, cultural, or territorial issues between two or more ethnic communities (Brown 2001, p. 211).

Several Scholars have attributed a number of factors as having led to the failed peace efforts. Nyadera et al. (2019) identify clan interest as a big obstacle to peace in Somalia. They opine that as long as clans continue to exercise the narrative of, we against they with no room for consensus then peace will remain elusive. Menkhaus (2010) argues that the Transitional Federal Government failure to take advantage of local structures established between 2002 and 2006 also weakened the peace process as those institutions (including the Sharia courts) played an important role in enforcing peace at the local level. Other scholars have argued that the lack of funding to implement peace agreements in Somalia is also a serious challenge to the successful peacebuilding. Emphasis on top-down approach to peace is also poses a challenge in the Somali peace process as most view the efforts as externally imposed and not homegrown. This makes the locals less committed to the peace efforts.

The Promise of Traditional Peacemaking Approaches in Somalia

In several societies, the role of the tribal socio-economic, political, and cultural systems or community elders has been very critical and instrumental in solving and mediating a variety of social problems and disputes between local communities (Avruch 1998; Holt and DeVore 2005; Deutsch et al. 2011). The role of clan elders has been identified as a human source and a great advantage throughout history (Brock-Utne 2001). Equally, Tadesse et al. (2010) and Jama (2010) suggest that other members of society, particularly women, can also play a vital role in conflict resolution.

Indeed, the traditional Somali approach to mediation and conflict resolution, known as Xeer (customary law), has a long history and existed before the modern laws were introduced to Somalia during the colonial era. Since then, the traditional model of mediation (Xeer) has been identified by many scholars and within the Somali communities as the paramount justice system suitable for Somalia given the current orientations whereby the clan has become the main political organization unit, and the authority of the state has been lost. Xeer is an unwritten law which focuses on creating a long-lasting relationship among the communities by providing alternatives solutions to conflicts (Aden 2011; Prunier 2015). It is a unique yet very effective way of conflict resolution dating back several thousand years (Loubser and Solomon 2014; Hofmann 2002). However, the traditional approach of mediation is one option for stateless societies due to the absence of formal law to address specific circumstances (Abdile 2012; 88). Given the complexity of the current circumstances in Somalia, customary law may be able to offer some critical contributions to solve and mediate the conflict, for instance, the case of Somaliland which unilaterally declared its independence from the rest of Somalia and Puntland an autonomous administration but claims to be a member of the federal state (Aden 2011; 3; Nyadera 2018).

In this section, the role of traditional or clan elders, their effectiveness in solving socio-economic and legal conflicts, as well as the mechanisms employed by the traditional elders to deal with these dispute processes will be examined. Sorts of conflicts and how (traditional elders) interpret and construe these unwritten laws will be extensively analyzed. Nevertheless, as the topic of this chapter highlights, we will also examine how this traditional approach helps to overcome the current conflict and their role in reestablishing such key norms such as trust and cooperation which are very fundamental in the establishment of an inclusive and more comprehensive Somali state.

The Configuration of Somali Traditional Structure

Existing literature on Somali society considers Somali people as one of the most homogenous societies in Africa characterized by one ethnicity, culture, common language (Somali), history, and the Sunni-Islam religious orientation (Aden 2011, p. 5). For this reason, many scholars and writers who studied Somalia during the period of trusteeship from the 1950s to 1960s argue and ostensibly believe that Somalis had a golden opportunity to establish one of the strongest and stout nation-states in Africa (Davidson 1975). Unfortunately, this has not come to pass. Since the collapse of state institutions, the indigenous instruments and mechanisms of conflict resolution and management have been in place and have saved the lives of many people. However, why these methods have been effective and did not collapse in conjunction with state institutions seems to be a legitimate question that needs to be addressed profoundly. Understanding the traditional Somali societal structures, therefore, might help us find an answer to a part of the question.

According to British anthropologist, Lewis (1999), his studies on the Somali culture and history pointed out that the traditional structure of Somalis is systematically divided into three core features: clan (traditional social structure), customary law (Xeer), and clan elders (traditional authorities). These three are interconnected and interrelated with each other. Clans are the main source of traditional authority, which means each clan has its traditional elders or authority, while customary law stands as the common law which these elders or traditional authority use to solve disputes and conflict among the clans. However, it is important to point out that this three-fold traditional justice system existed before the arrival of the Europeans and has endured since then primarily because of their critical role in the lives of ordinary people. Before the introduction of colonialism, Somalis were a nomadic society in nature and with a simple life. Every person and family belonged to a certain clan, which was ensured survival in a nomadic atmosphere and culture. Clannism, therefore, stands as the definitive source of both identity and security. It is important and essential to many Somalis for security and social welfare. Hence, it is compulsory and obligatory to the member of the clan to safeguard and protect the dignity and honor of the clan (Putman and Noor 1993).

The clan unit has remained the most important bond and basis for identity among Somalis living in the rural and urban areas. Gundel (2009, p. 21) argues that the nomadic way of life creates a strong conscious and sense of attachment to kinship as they see this as a prerequisite to overcome existing and unforeseen challenges. It is this same way of life that also necessitates constant movement in search for grazing fields, pastures, and water, increasing the possibility of conflict between different clans. In order to ensure that such potential for conflict is regulated, traditional conflict prevention and resolution strategies were put in place. These traditional mechanisms are based on traditional authorities and unwritten laws that ensured not only prevention of conflict but also punishment and justice for perpetuates and victims of violence respectively. Additionally, traditional approaches to peace in Somalia allowed for the formation of coalitions (gaanshaabuur) between weak or minority clans or the protection of minority clans by the dominant ones in exchange for loyalty (Gundel 2009, p. 22). Some scholars have also argued that clans facilitate not only one's sense of identity but also enable people to trace their decedent and primary lineage. In Somalia, this is done by following the male line from their father's name. The clan structure in Somalia is illustrated below;

Among these categories, the Mag-paying group is the most relevant to the ordinary individual's social and political life. This category stands as the organizational basis of lineage members that provides and ensures economic viability, social security, and physical protection. Additionally, it is the most stable and permanent unit in the traditional social system with the existence of an informal and unwritten contractual understanding among its members regarding payments such as fines and compensations. They tend to support each other in these sorts of payments, usually in the form of camels without conversing with whomsoever it is levied. The general principles and rules of mag-paying are known and fixed throughout clans and aim at maintaining and guiding the conduct of the members of the clan. For instance, the fine or payment for killing a man is a hundred camels, and that for killing a woman is 50 camels. Every member of the clan is obligated to obey the mag-paying system. It is a collective action, and compensations are paid collectively. The customary law (Xeer), carried out by traditional authorities or elders, is the main source and reference of this mag-paying system that governs and guides the norms, conducts, and interactions within and beyond the mag-paying community.

The Xeer System

The Xeer is defined as socially constructed norms aimed at safeguarding the social justice and security of Somalis including those in the diaspora (Fox 1999, p. 13) and essentially has commonly recognized principles that emphasize on protecting individual rights and requirements to family and clan (Notten 2005, p. 375). The Xeer is mainly instigated as a mechanism to control and manage social relations and has two main units: xeer guud (generally accepted laws that has nation-wide applicability) and xeer sokeye (kin law that is employed and adopted by individuals or members of certain clans or subclans). Nevertheless, Xeer aims to provide law and order, to manage issues related to marriage, to establish reasons for war and peace, and most importantly, to establish agreements between families and clans that can facilitate the distribution and allocation of resources peacefully.

However, Xeer is supplementary with blood compensation (diya), and as such, both provide rules and regulations of punishment for misconduct (Leeson 2007). In the meantime, these principles and rules are obeyed by all Somali families and clans as a mechanism to overcome and end traditional disputes and conflicts between clans and for blood compensation (Kusow and Mohamud 2006). However, it is indisputable that Xeer has been and yet remains a core principle in forming social norms, obligation, and most importantly, expectations of the Somalis before and during the processes of state formation. Nevertheless, Xeer, along with Islamic laws, has remained the only legal structure in place for a long time in Somalia (Zartman 2000, p. 186; Notten 2005, p. 375). It is believed that previously, Xeer was secular, but has greatly been influenced by the arrival of Islam over time and now included various Islamic legal codes, principles, values, and norms.

Considering the maturity of Xeer and how it has been practiced, as well as its main principles and values, its origin can be traced to the Somali history or custom locally known as (dhaqan), cultural habits and behavior, and Islam. Furthermore, since its formation, Xeer has succeeded to maintain its two primary enactors: traditional authority (odayaal) and wise man (waxgarad). For a long time, these two institutions have had the responsibility and power of enacting Xeer laws (Abdile 2012, p. 88). In the first epoch of the nineteenth century, Xeer institution came under threat and begun weakening for three reasons; first, the arrival of the European colonialization as they introduced western laws and rules meant to replace Xeer which also impacted the status and power of the institution. Secondly, the formation of the modern state in Somalia, particularly the creation of modern courts which have taken over the powers and duties of all customary institutions, including Xeer. The odayaal and waxgarad were replaced by contemporary judges. Thirdly, the continuing competition between Xeer and Sharia laws have also significantly challenged Xeer legitimacy and debilitated its lawfulness within the Somali society. However, the collapse of military state and government institutions such as the legal system in 1991 has brought about the rebirth and revitalization of the customary institution once again to fill the power vacuum and replace the modern laws.

Henceforth, the Xeer system has been regaining its power and status and has become the central tenet for law and order in some parts of Somalia. This revitalization marked a transition of the Somali social and political structure from modern systems of law to traditional version anchored in the Xeer system. For that reason, Xeer is the only source of justice that all Somalis agree upon, therefore, can be significantly influential and decisive when dealing with the current conflicts in Somalia (Zuin 2008, p. 94).

Xeer as an institution of conflict management and resolution offers three models to deal with any encounter: negotiation, mediation, and arbitration. Often, traditional meetings meant to solve customary disputes take place under the tree, and all the male adults in the clan can attend as the audience. However, negotiations involve straight communications or direct talks between the disputing groups without any interference from the third party and are intended to avoid further traditional conflict resolution meetings (Farah and Lewis 1997). If this fails, the Xeer system allows the involvement of a third party to mediate an end to the dispute and prevent further conflicts (Moore 1996, p. 15). Should there be any further need to break the deadlock in conflict resolution, then the parties can move to an arbitrary model of solving their dispute, and together, decide a tribunal which commences the arbitration from scratch. New terms of engagement in the dispute, the mechanism for choosing the arbitrators, and the procedure of the arbitral tribunal are outlined before a new commencement for dispute arbitration (Zartman 2007, p. 199). Nevertheless, arbitration seems to be the most widely used in Somalia to deal with disputes and conflicts between families and communities, yet this has not received enough scholarly attention within the Somali studies (Abdile 2012, p. 90).

Conceptually speaking, these three traditional conflict resolutions mechanisms have both similarities and differences. In terms of similarities, foremost, they are voluntary (Moore 1996), negotiations and mediation share the same outcome which is nonbinding (Wall and Lynn 1993), and all three mechanisms share similarities regarding producers, responsibilities, and duties of the arbitrators and mediators. More comprehensively, these mechanisms, therefore, allow parties to enter into solutions and agreements freely, as well as implement compensations and fines voluntarily. Despite these similarities, there are also some distinctive differences. Arbitration is distinct from the other two models (negotiation and mediation) both which require that discussions be conducted smoothly and simply. On the contrary, arbitrators are tasked with establishing solutions to the conflict, which makes their job harder and difficult.

The uniqueness of the Xeer system is that it is guided by clan agreements, an oral agreement memorized and passed on from one generation to the other through different ways such as poems (maanso), songs (gabayo), proverbs (mahmahyo), and storytelling (sheekoyin). Consequently, the Xeer mechanism remains very significant in conflict management and resolution method in Somalia. The survival and endurance of the Xeer system is founded on several reasons. Foremost, the conservative nature of Somali society and societal structure which makes family and kinship ties the basis of building sustained relationships, alliance, and friendship. Secondly, there is a lack of confidence for modern secular laws and the modern state's failure to govern society and ensure justice, which depends on compensation and reconciliation. Thirdly, is the previous failure of the colonial powers to adopt modern laws in large parts of Somalia, specifically in rural and remote areas in which the Xeer institution was the only recognized system of providing justice. Fourth, there is a belief among Somalis that their culture is superior to the white Christian culture. The term "white Christian" itself is a deliberate sign of resistance against the modern laws and portrays Xeer system as being under attack from western culture. More significantly, it promotes the institutionalization of cultural differences and portrays what can be Somali and what cannot be. Despite Xeer's survival in contemporary Somalia, it encounters several challenges and limitations among these: the lack of central power or authority; it diminishes individual rights and an overemphasis on societal order and lacks adequate and effective conflict prevention and enforcement methods and mechanisms (Abdile 2012, p. 107).

Summary

This entry sought to revisit a conflict in the Horn of Africa that has overstayed its time even in the standards of a region vulnerable to conflict. The Somali conflict is now nearly three decades old, with very little progress in terms of sustainable peace. The chapter examined why and what can be done to achieve peace and stability in the violent ridden nation. It examined the background of the conflict, how it has transformed over time, and some of the previous peace efforts. It establishes that the crisis in Somalia in 2019 has very little semblance to what it was in 1991 in terms of actors, objectives, and strategies. However, what remains constant in the two periods is that they both have inflicted huge suffering and misery on the people of Somalia. The legacy of this conflict has left thousands killed, millions displaced, and economic instabilities and hopelessness, especially among the young people, have left them with little choice than to join criminal gangs.

The chapter also establishes that the previous peace efforts have fallen short of bringing peace in the country because of failing to address some pertinent issues such as legitimacy, unity, inclusivity in the process and focusing more on a top-down state-building approach without ensuring the people on the ground are well consulted and deep-rooted grievances addressed. In other words, the previous peace efforts appear to have rewarded only top-ranking members of the groups involved in the conflict with government positions without a clear blueprint on how justice, economic equality, good governance practices, as well as organized crime will be tackled. The result has been continued violence, destruction, and suffering. That is why this chapter suggests that where the crisis in Somalia has reached, peacebuilding efforts will need to be robust, address broader aspects of the situation, and adopt multidimensional strategies to address the root causes of the conflict as well as the emerging criminal activities.

One of these strategies is to reflect on traditional conflict resolution strategies and modify them to fit into the contemporary setting. Xeer is one of the most promising approaches that we recommend because it tackles microchallenges that other resolution strategies have not addressed. Secondly, in the spirit of Xeer, a conducive environment from which other conflict resolution strategies can be implemented will be created. Some of the current problems facing Somalia today emanate from clan settings. Xeer has the required tools to reach deeper into the society and act as a catalyst in solving the crisis. More specifically are the attributes of consensus building, transformational aspects, and forgiveness that Xeer brings forth will play an important role in the peacebuilding process. Xeer will also influence other factors such as the success of a potential truth and reconciliation process, new constitution writing, and the construction of a Somalia national identity. This chapter, therefore, hopes to encourage stakeholders to look at multiple sources for a solution to the crisis. This approach, we believe will take more time, will need more commitment from the citizens and actors involved in the peace process but will have a significant impact over time.

Cross-References

- ▶ Assessment of Peace Operations
- ▶ Negotiation
- ▶ Peacebuilding and Spatial Transformation
- ▶ Search for Peace, the

References

- Abdile, M. (2012). Customary dispute resolution in Somalia. African Conflict and Peace building Review, 2(1), 87–110.
- Adam, H. M. (2008). From tyranny to anarchy: The Somali experience. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press.
- Aden, A. M. (2011). Xeer: Traditional Mediation in Somalia. Boston MA: University of Massachusetts Press.
- Avruch, K. (1998). Culture and Conflict Resolution. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press.
- Barnes, C., & Hassan, H. (2007). The rise and fall of Mogadishu's Islamic courts. Journal of Eastern African Studies, 1(2), 151–160.
- Bowd, R., & Chikwanha, A. B. (2010). Understanding Africa's contemporary conflicts: Origins, challenges and peacebuilding. Institute for Security Studies Monographs, 2010(173), 281.
- Bradbury, M. (1999). The Somali conflict: Prospects for peace. Oxford England: Oxfam.
- Brock-Utne, B. (2001). Indigenous conflict resolution in Africa. In A draft presented to a weekend seminar on indigenous solutions to conflicts held at the University of Oslo, Institute of Educational Research (pp. 23–24).
- Brown, M. E. (2001). Ethnic and Internal Conflict: Causes and Implications. In Crocker, C.A., Hampson, F.O. & Aall, P. (eds). Turbulent Peace: The Challenges of Managing International Conflict. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace Press, pp. 209–226.
- Bryden, M. (2013). Somalia redux?: Assessing the new Somali federal government. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield.
- Clark, J. (1992). The debacle in Somalia. Foreign Affairs, 72, 109.
- Cornwell, R. (2006). Somalia: Distorting reality? African Security Studies, 15(2), 75–78.
- Dagne, T. (2009). Somalia: Prospects for lasting peace. Mediterranean Quarterly, 20(2), 95–112.
- Dersso, S. (2009). The Somalia Conflict – Implications for peacemaking and peacekeeping efforts, ISS Paper 198. Pretoria: Institute for Security Studies
- Deutsch, M., Coleman, P. T., & Marcus, E. C. (Eds.). (2011). The handbook of conflict resolution: Theory and practice. Wiley.
- Doornbos, M. & Markakis J. (1994). Society and State in Crisis: What Went Wrong in Somalia? Review of African Political Economy, 21, (59) (1), 82–88.
- Elmi, A. A. and Barise, A. (2006). The Somali Conflict: Root causes, obstacles, and peace-building strategies. African Security Studies, 15(1), 32–54.
- Farah, A. Y., & Lewis, I. M. (1997). Making peace in Somaliland. Cahiers d'études africaines, XXXVII (2): 349–377.
- Floudiotis, A. (2010). “Al-Shabaab: Troubling Youth”, News Blaze, 14 May. [online] <http://newsblaze.com/story/20100514130442iis.nb/topstory.html>
- Fox, M. J. (1999). Somalia divided: The African Cerberus (considerations on political culture). Civil Wars, 2(1), 1–34.
- Ghalib, J. M. (1995). The cost of dictatorship: The Somali experience. L. Barber Press.
- Greenfield, R. (1987). An Embattled Barre. Africa Report, 32(3), 65.
- Gundel, J. (2009). Clans in Somalia. Austrian Red Cross, Vienna. http://www.ecoi.net/file_upload/90_1261130976_accord-report-clans-in-somalia-revised-edition-20091215.pdf. Accessed 18 Mar 2019.
- Hesse, B. J. (2010). Introduction: The myth of ‘Somalia’. Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 28(3), 247–259.
- Hofmann, S. (2002). The divergent paths of Somalia and Somaliland: The effects of centralization on indigenous institutions of self-governance and post-collapse reconciliation and state-building. In Institutional analysis and development mini-conference on April (pp. 27–29).
- Holt, J. L., & DeVore, C. J. (2005). Culture, gender, organizational role, and stylthe es of conflict resolution: A meta-analysis. International Journal of Intercultural Relations, 29(2), 165–196.
- ICG (International Crisis Group) (2008). Somalia: To Move Beyond the Failed State. Africa Report No. 147, 23 December 2008. [online] Available: <http://www.crisisgroup.org/en/regions/africa/horn-of-africa/somalia/147-somalia-to-movebeyond-the-failed-state.aspx> (7 January 2020).
- Ingiriis, M. H. (2016). The suicidal state in Somalia: The rise and fall of the Siad Barre regime, 1969–1991. Lanham, MD: University Press of America.
- Jama, F. (2010). “Somali Women and Peace-Building.” In Bradbury, and D. Healy (eds) Whose Peace Is It Anyway? Connecting Somali and International Peacemaking, 62–65. London: Conciliation Resources.
- Knight, W. A. (1998). Establishing political authority in peace-maintenance. Global Governance, 4, 19.
- Kuperman A. (2015). Constitutions and conflict Management in Africa: Preventing civil war through institutional design. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Kusow, A. M., & Mohamud, A. S. (2006). Why Somalia continues to remain a failed state. African Renaissance, 3(5), 13–23.
- Leeson, P. T. (2007). Better off stateless: Somalia before and after government collapse. Journal of Comparative Economics, 35(4), 689–710.
- Lewis, I. M. (2005). A modern history of the Somali: Nation and state in the Horn of Africa. Oxford: James Currey.

- Lewis, I. M. (2008). Understanding Somalia and Somaliland – Culture, history, society. London: Hurst Publishers Ltd.
- Lewis, I. M. (1999). A Pastoral Democracy: a study of pastoralism and politics among the northern Somali of the Horn of Africa. Oxford: James Currey Publishers.
- Lewis, I. M. (2010). Making and breaking states in Africa: The Somali Experience. Trenton, NJ: Red Sea Press.
- Lewis, I. M., Lewis, I., ASCAP, & Dwyer, M. J. (2008). Understanding Somalia and Somaliland: Culture, history, society. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Loubser, H. M., & Solomon, H. (2014). Responding to state failure in Somalia. Africa Review, 6(1), 1–17.
- Lyons, T. & Samatar, A. I. (2010). Somalia: State collapse, multilateral intervention, and strategies for political reconstruction. Massachusetts: Brookings Institution Press.
- Mazrui, A. A. (1997). Crisis in Somalia: From tyranny to anarchy. In Mending rips in the sky: Options for Somali communities in the 21st century (pp. 5–12). Lawrenceville: The Red Sea Press.
- Menkhaus, K. (1996). International peacebuilding and the dynamics of local and national reconciliation in Somalia. International Peacekeeping, 3(1), 42–67.
- Menkhaus, K. (2003). State collapse in Somalia: Second thoughts. Review of African Political Economy, 30(97), 405–422.
- Menkhaus, K. (2009). Somalia: ‘They created a desert and called it peace (building)’. Review of African Political Economy, 36(120), 223–233.
- Menkhaus, K. (2010). Somalia: What went wrong? The RUSI Journal, 154(4), 6–12.
- Møller, B. (2009). The Somali conflict: The role of external actors (No. 2009: 03). DIIS Reports/Danish Institute for International Studies.
- Moore, C. (Ed.). (1996). The mediation process: Practical strategies for resolving conflict. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass Publishers.
- Murphy, M. N. (2011). Somalia, the new barbary?: Piracy and Islam in the horn of Africa. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Mwangi, O. G. (2010). The union of Islamic courts and security governance in Somalia. African Security Review, 19(1), 88–94.
- Nyadera, I. N., & Bincof, M. O. (2019). Human security, terrorism, and counterterrorism: Boko Haram and the Taliban. International Journal on World Peace, 36(1): 7–32.
- Nyadera, I. N. (2018). South Sudan conflict from 2013 to 2018: Rethinking the causes, situation and solutions. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 18(2), 59–86.
- Nyadera, I., Ahmed, M., & Agwanda, B. (2019). Transformation of the Somali civil-war and reflections for a post-conflict social contract. Gaziantep University Journal of Social Sciences, 18(4), 1346–1366. <https://doi.org/10.21547/jss.536203>.
- Prunier, G. (2015). British Somaliland: An administrative history, 1920–1960 by Brock Millman: Routledge studies in middle eastern history. London/New York: Routledge.
- Putman, D. B., & Noor, M. C. (1993). The Somalis: Their history and culture, refugee [Fact sheet no. 9]. International Rescue Committee.
- Reyner, A. S. (1960). Somalia: The problems of independence. The Middle East Journal, 247–255.
- Rutherford, K. (2008). Humanitarianism Under Fire. Sterling: Kumarian Press.
- Shay, S. (2017). Somalia between jihad and restoration. New York: Routledge.
- Shortland, A., & Varese, F. (2016). State-building, informal governance, and organized crime: The case of Somali piracy. Political Studies, 64(4), 811–831.
- Tadesse, B., Tesfaye, Y., & Beyene, F. (2010). Women in conflict and indigenous conflict resolution among the Issa and Gurgura clans of Somali in Eastern Ethiopia. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 10(1): 85–110.
- Touval, S. and Zartman, I.W. eds. (1985). International mediation in theory and practice. Westview Press with the Foreign Policy Institute, School of Advanced International Studies, Johns Hopkins University.
- Van Notten, M. (2005). The law of the Somalis: A stable foundation for economic development in the Horn of Africa. Trenton: Red Sea Press.
- Wall, J. A., & Lynn, A. (1993). Mediation: A current review. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 37, 160–194.
- Zartman, I. W. (1983). The political economy of Nigeria. New York: Praeger Publishers.
- Zartman, I. W. (Ed.). (2000). Traditional cures for modern conflicts: African conflict “medicine”. Boulder, CO: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Zartman, I. W. (Ed.). (2007). Peacemaking in international conflict: Methods & techniques. Washington, DC: US Institute of Peace Press.
- Zartman, I. W. and Berman, M. R. (1982). The practical negotiator. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Zuin, M. (2008). A model of transitional justice for Somalia. PRAXIS: The Fletcher Journal of Human Security, 23, 89–108.

War and Peace in Yemen

► Yemen Conflict

War Crimes

- Conflict and Hunger
- R2P and Prevention

War Crimes Trials

- Transitional Justice in Croatia

War on Terror

- ▶ Kenya's War on Terror

War Veterans

- ▶ Transitional Justice in Croatia

Ways of Knowing

- ▶ Textile-Making as Research Method

Weapons Governance

- ▶ Humanitarian Disarmament and the Era of Disarmament Without Disarmament

Western Interventions

- ▶ Deconstruction in International Interventions

Win-Lose Negotiation (see Distributive Negotiation)

- ▶ Negotiation

Win-Win Negotiation (see Integrative Negotiation)

- ▶ Negotiation

Women

- ▶ Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy

Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus

Olga Demetriou¹ and Maria Hadjipavlou²

¹School of Government and International Affairs, Durham University, Durham, UK

²Department of Social and Political Sciences, University of Cyprus, Nicosia, Cyprus

Synonyms

Cypriot women in peacebuilding; Cyprus UNSCR 1325; Feminist agenda in the Cypriot peace negotiations; Gender and peacebuilding in Cyprus; Gender in the negotiations in Cyprus

Introduction/Definition

Conflict is a gendered phenomenon and affects women and men differently. This is true of the Cyprus conflict as well, where men have dominated the political sphere in conflict and peace times throughout the island's modern history. Attempts to resolve conflict, through political negotiation and peacebuilding efforts, are also gendered, as men and women involved in them tend to have different roles. In Cyprus, all the negotiators at the highest official levels in the last decades have been men, but women have begun taking on roles in negotiating teams since the 2000s. While official negotiations consisted of male majorities on the whole, the peacebuilding work that was carried out after the end of hostilities in 1974 was more inclusive of women. This developed into more coherent groups and structures in the 1980s and 1990s and was recognized as "track II" diplomacy. The proliferation of these groups also allowed room for a greater spectrum of themes to be addressed, among them gender concerns. However, effective implementation of the parameters of UNSCR 1325 which require substantive representation and meaningful participation of women in peace processes remains a major concern for Cypriot women's organizations and international observers.

Women and the Conflict in Cyprus

In ethno-national conflicts, like the Cyprus conflict, populations of opposing sides are called upon – through dominant national narratives, which are patriarchal, militaristic, and oversimplified – to choose their side and locate themselves on the conflict map (Hadjipavlou 2006, 2010). In the case of Cyprus, events that have marked different conflict stages, according to the dominant narratives, are mostly those of violent confrontation (Anthias 1989). December 1963 marks the time when Turkish-Cypriot parliamentarians protested against the Greek-Cypriot president's amendments to the constitution to diminish their rights and withdrew from office. Segregation ensued and violence spread when Greek-Cypriot police killed a Turkish-Cypriot man and a Turkish-Cypriot woman during an identity check in a mixed urban area. In 1967, violence flared again, and a Greek-Cypriot paramilitary commander was ordered to leave the island. The Greek junta with the Greek-Cypriot National Guard carried out a coup in July 1974, and Turkey intervened by invading the island and capturing its northern part, into which Turkish-Cypriots were encouraged or forced to move. The Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus was unilaterally declared in November 1983, but it has failed to gain recognition by the UN since then. These events are contested and form the bedrock of differential readings of history, which mire the negotiations for a peace settlement to this day (Vassiliadou 1997). These negotiations have taken different forms over the decades but have been carried out officially under a UN mandate since 1974. They have thus far yielded high-level agreements in 1977 and 1979, which aim at setting up a bizonal bicomunal federation on the island, and a comprehensive peace plan (known as the Annan Plan) with detailed power-sharing arrangements, which was signed in March 2004 but rejected at referendum by the Greek-Cypriots the following month.

Women have largely been written out of these accounts of history, except for their roles as victims of the conflict and aides to military men (Agathangelou 2004). In the anti-colonial struggle that preceded the conflict (1955–1959) and which was waged by the Greek-Cypriot nationalist organization EOKA (Ethniki Orghánosi Kypriou Aghonistón), women in secondary roles served as helpers, carrying messages and hiding men in their houses, and exceptionally as officers in the organization. Turkish-Cypriot women were similarly involved in support roles in the Turkish-Cypriot paramilitary organization TMT (Türk Mukavemet Teşkilatı) which fought for the division of the island in the wake of EOKA's call for union with Greece. During this first period of violence, large numbers of the population across the ethnic and gender divides faced physical insecurity and economic hardship. Leftists were particularly targeted and inter-ethnic relations were viewed as undesirable. This was also a period, however, when women's education became valued, they began to enter the labor force after the WWII, and family structures modernized, especially following independence in 1960. Feminist discourses also arose in this period, mostly in the field of education and the letters, and were separated across the ethnic binary. This continued in the 1960s, when inter-ethnic violence perpetuated a general insecurity and communal separation.

In the war of 1974, the experiences of men and women were highly differentiated, most military casualties being men, while women fled their homes and were tasked with making new homes in refugeehood. Conflict imagery in Cyprus centers heavily still on the feminization of victimhood on both sides, depicting strong images of women in desperation mourning their husbands, and sons, or looking for relatives who went missing (Roussou 1986). This imagery accentuated a concept of female vulnerability that was often belied by the strength that women had to exhibit in rebuilding their lives postwar and becoming wage earners in the conditions of impoverishment that ensued: in the south because of the loss of the north and in the north because of international isolation.

The impact of the conflict on gender equality is evident in two particular examples of legislation: the marriage clauses of the Constitution of the Republic (1960) and the abortion law of 1974. The first stipulate that married women belong to the community of their husbands and that family life is the domain of Communal Chambers which regulated community affairs before 1963. Effectively, until 1990 when civil marriages were recognized, only religious marriages were allowed, and initially civil marriages were recognized only among Greek-Cypriots. The law on abortion, on the other hand, was passed in November 1974 as an emergency measure to stop pregnancies coming to term that had been the result of war rapes and is pervaded by a discourse of “honor and shame.” It was only amended in 2018, which allowed abortions under more lenient terms and on the basis of women’s human rights (Demetriou 2018).

In effect, the conflict has had a profound impact on women’s lives in Cyprus, affecting not only their social positions and the roles they have performed as homemakers and workers but also their legal rights as citizens of the Republic. Turkish-Cypriot women and minority women were multiply affected by this situation, since they have had to face intersectional forms of discrimination (Vassiliadou 2002; Lisaniler and Bhatti 2005).

Women and Peacebuilding

Women’s peace efforts have taken multiple forms over the years and have encompassed variable understandings of “peace” (Hadjipavlou 2010). Since the de facto division of the island into north and south, there have been different independent women’s initiatives aimed at raising women’s voices and desires for peace and demilitarization and expressing the desire to “return home.” One of the first such groups was the “Women Walk Home” march organized by educated, mainly middle-class women from the Greek-Cypriot community. The first “Walk” along the dividing line in the spring of 1975 was organized soon after the war and partition of 1974 and articulated the desire of Greek-Cypriot women to return to their homes peacefully, now within the zone occupied by the Turkish military. This was the first women’s peaceful resistance to the division of the island. Thousands of Greek-Cypriot women and many invited female personalities from abroad participated in that first Walk (Kamenou 2019). The Walk grabbed the attention of international media and was followed by other Walks, in 1977, in 1987 (June and November), and in March 1989. After that, the group became inactive as different political parties tried to appropriate it. Yet, many of the women who participated continued to take an active part in politics, either as members of political parties or as civil society actors. Perhaps the most well-known follow-up activity from the Walk was the lawsuit against Turkey at the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR), brought by Titina Loizidou, a woman who had been detained and ill-treated by Turkish police during the Walk, after she attempted to access her house. The Loizidou v. Turkey case is a landmark case in litigation on property rights and on the responsibility to protect in refugee legislation.

From the late 1990s onward, other women’s groups began to appear, which were intercommunal and more focused on rapprochement and cooperation. They included the “Metamorphosis Cypriot Women’s Group” established in 2000 by professional women, which worked on joint projects and produced an important video of ordinary women from both communities who had struggled to bring about social change and challenge social and cultural taboos in their communities.

“Hands Across the Divide” (HAD) was another such group, established officially in 2001. It was the first organization to bring UNSC Resolution 1325 to the attention of the Cypriot leaders and talk about the relevance of the Resolution to the peace process. HAD works for reconciliation and social justice at the grassroots level. HAD was unique in its establishment because it registered officially as an NGO in the UK, at a time when there were legal barriers in being recognized on both sides. It also made a point of holding frequent, face-to-face meetings in locations where women from both sides could meet (the village of Pyla). The group has a dual goal: (i) political intervention, bringing out statements on the process of the negotiations and holding activities and events at crucial points before and after the Annan Plan referendum, and (ii) providing a safe space for women to share their thoughts, feelings, and experiences, about the effects of patriarchal and nationalist dynamics on their own lives (Hadjipavlou and Mertan 2019).

FEMA is a Turkish-Cypriot feminist organization working on gender equality and against gender-based violence in the Turkish-Cypriot community, as well as on reconciliation and peace but through focusing its work in the northern part of the island and lobbying authorities there. FEMA has a keen interest in engaging women to claim their rights. It has organized workshops and training events focused on education, empowerment, and activism. It has also produced a journal, Gaile, with the aim of reaching a wider audience. Its view has often been internationalist in scope, making connections between global and local realities. FEMA has crucially been a key collaborator with women's organizations on the other side of the divide.

The "Gender Advisory Team" (GAT), which was established in 2009, was the first to focus exclusively on UNSC Resolution 1325 and its implementation in Cyprus and, more specifically, in the Cyprus peace process (Demetriou and Hadjipavlou 2016).

Women's Participation in Politics and the Negotiations

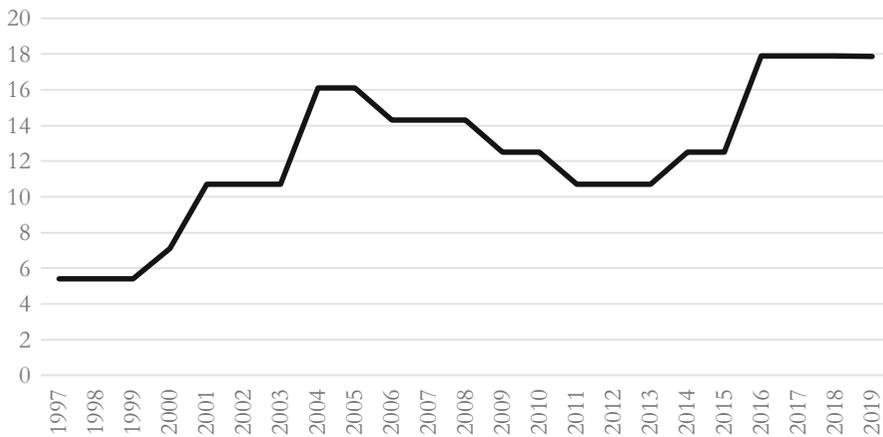

On both sides of Cyprus, women's participation in political life is noticeably low. Suffice it to say that the first female member of parliament in the Republic was elected in 1982, while Turkish-Cypriot Kadriye Hacıbulgur was the only woman to be elected to the Turkish-Cypriot Communal Chamber in 1960. In the Republic of Cyprus, according to World Bank statistics, women's participation percentage in parliament ranged between 5% and 18% since 1997. In the north in 2018, there were 9 out of 50, equaling 18% up from 8% in previous years. The single time in which a woman held the highest post was in 2013 in the north, when the ruling Turkish-Cypriot party appointed a governmental council for a short pre-election period, headed by Sibel Siber. In 2013, Praxoulla Antoniadou contested the Republic's presidential elections unsuccessfully, and in 2015 Sibel Siber did so in the north. Women ministers have been appointed sparingly since the 1960s, reaching a percentage of 18% in the late 2010s on both sides. Such appointments have tended to be in ministries for issues considered gender-relevant or secondary, such as social welfare, health, education, and transport, except in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where Erato Kozakou-Marcoullis has served twice. Emine Çolak was appointed to a parallel post in the north between 2015 and 2016. Two women have occupied Cypriot MEP positions among seventeen men since accession in 2004, Antigoni Papadopoulou and Eleni Theocharous, and two have been appointed EU Commissioners out of four Cypriot Commissioners in the same period: Androulla Vassiliou (2008–2014) and Stella Kyriakidou (2020). All of the major parties on both sides have women's branches, and there has often been criticism of their work from feminist circles. Such criticism focuses on the sphere of priorities of these organizations, which remain secondary to the activities of the "main," male-dominated party machinery.

Stella Soulioti (1920–2012) was the first woman to participate in the negotiations for a political settlement to the conflict, in an advising role to Archbishop Makarios since 1968, while she also held the position of Minister of Justice (1960–1970) and Minister of Health (1963–1970). She was Adviser to the President on the Cyprus issue since 1975, and she retained a Special Adviser role to all presidents of the Republic until 2008, serving also for parts of that period as Law Commissioner and Attorney General. Within a revised negotiation frame after 2008, women were appointed to a number of

| | |
|-------|--|
| 1960s | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Negotiations held with view to manage inter-ethnic violence • Female Minister of Justice also acting as adviser to President |
| 1970s | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Negotiations post-1974 yield 1977 and 1979 agreements on Bizonal Bicomunal Federation • Female chief adviser on Cyprus issue in Republic's MFA |
| 1980s | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Peace talks freeze and climate worsens after unilateral declaration of independence of the north (TRNC) • Peace efforts become difficult, particularly for women |
| 1990s | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Agreement is initially reached in 1992 over a UNSG frame (Ghali Set of Ideas) as basis for settlement but eventually rejected • No substantial inclusion of gender concerns or women in the talks |
| 2004 | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Negotiations yielded Annan Plan with minimal explicit attention to gender aspects • Technical Committees working on provisions of the plan included one woman in senior role |
| 2006 | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • New frame for negotiations agreed without timeframe and based on local ownership • Structure of working groups and technical committees set up but with little gender balance |
| 2008 | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Direct talks initiated between leaders • Women's civil society stepped up lobbying efforts for women's inclusion |
| 2015 | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • New Technical Committees set up in efforts to include peacebuilding civil society • Technical Committee on Gender Equality appointed |
| 2017- | <ul style="list-style-type: none"> • Negotiation round failed but structures remained in place • Funds for Technical Committee work released but gender mandate remains unclear |

Women's presence in Cyprus negotiation phases

Proportion of seats held by women in the Republic of Cyprus parliament (%) technical committees and working groups that evolved from older structures set up in the early 2000s in the framework of developing the Annan Plan. Leading among them was Erato Marcoullis who headed the Greek-Cypriot working group on property.

Until the early 2010s, gender had not been addressed as an issue in the negotiations, even though women's groups had raised concerns over this omission at least a decade earlier.

These calls were noticed by international scholars and practitioners, and over the next years, efforts were made to support the budding women's peacebuilding civil society, which coalesced around a small group of professionals and activists, Hands Across the Divide (Cockburn 2004). In 2008, the UN mission on the island engaged a conflict assessment and participation expert, Joyce Neu, to report on the situation on gender inclusion in Cyprus. A wide range of political actors were engaged, and some of the women who came together in these meetings formed the Gender Advisory Team (GAT), an informal network of academics and experts that provided recommendations on gender inclusion in the negotiations in 2012 and 2014. The issue gained further prominence through references to reports of the UN Secretary General on Cyprus, while other civil society organizations took up the call and conducted research (SeeD, FES, MIGS, AHDR). In 2015, the Technical Committee on Gender Equality was set up to provide formal feedback to negotiators and act as a bridge with civil society. However, since the breakdown of the negotiations in 2017, opportunities for intervention and input have been minimized. Meanwhile, the Mediterranean Women Mediators' Network established an antenna group in Cyprus in 2019, with the goal of highlighting and bolstering women's mediation efforts in regard to a political settlement.

Women's Inclusion in the Peace Process and the Negotiations

The calls for inclusion of women and gender perspectives in the peace process and the negotiations have varied over the years and have encompassed different issues and agendas (Demetriou and Hadjipavlou 2018). On a minimum level, they have agreed on the need for women to be present at the negotiating table, in visible roles, and with decision-making powers. Whether an explicitly feminist negotiation agenda is pursued by such women or not is a moot point, as is the question of which women would be suitable candidates for such roles and who should decide. A number of proposals for including women in the negotiations have also raised the issue of equitable representation, calling, for example, for all teams related to the negotiations (including technical committees, working groups, advisers, consultants, etc.) to be gender balanced, a minimum ratio of 1/3, and to include gender focal points to ensure that all measures, policies, and suggestions take account of gender implications. Yet other proposals have centered on the need to take account of women's needs across the island who are marginalized and not at the center of attention by peacebuilding efforts; these include minority women, women who are migrants, women who live away from urban centers, women in poverty, young women, women with disabilities, and women subject to multiple forms of discrimination (Aliefendioglu 2012). Various initiatives have sought to record the views of such groups, focusing primarily on geographical distinctions thus far, e.g., women in rural communities. However, as of 2020, concrete proposals about ensuring representation or regarding specific demands and concerns have not been put forth.

GAT's recommendations remain one of the most concrete set of suggestions for integrating gender-sensitive provisions in a future peace plan and constitution. They contain suggestions in the areas of governance, property, economy, and citizenship. On governance, the recommendations center on integrating up-to-date best practices into the legal instruments that will arise and on introducing gender quotas throughout the governance structures and setting up monitoring systems. On property, they aim at gender proofing property rights clauses by paying attention to property clauses in family law, considering specific needs of displaced and resettled women, and taking into account women's perspectives on communal property including of minority groups and on ensuring women's representation in wealth management institutions and in wider post-agreement reconstruction and development initiatives. On economy, they aim to ensure gender-sensitive economic planning and resource allocation post-agreement and on implementing gender budgeting. On citizenship, they suggest disentangling citizenship rights from ethnically determined power-sharing so that voting is disentangled from other rights, including residency; the general philosophy behind this is that citizenship rights are not treated as a unitary bundle but as transferable between the two constituent states, which is a novel way to conceptualize citizenship in Cyprus and one that has not thus far been part of negotiation discussions.

These recommendations build on longer efforts to bring about a transition from a patriarchal, nationalist, and militarist culture to a peace culture, in which many women have been involved, yet without articulating an explicitly feminist agenda. Intersections in these efforts exist in the call to reform the military or disband it altogether, to revise the educational system, and to reposition the role of religion and the Church in social and political life. All these recommendations, which were also shared with the UN Good Offices personnel in Cyprus and references to which appeared in the UN Secretary General's reports on Cyprus, cover a broad spectrum of political positions, ranging from accepted liberal equality standards to more radical demands for changing local traditional structures and adopting feminist principles.

In other words, women's inclusion in the negotiation process and in post-conflict reconstruction in Cyprus has been interpreted in very different ways, from minimal demands for presence to maximalist demands for an overhaul to the conceptual premises on which the negotiations are conducted. Within this range of possibilities, concrete steps for inclusion have been rudimentary until 2020 and have focused mainly on presence at the fringes of the negotiations in the form of the Technical Committee on Gender Equality. However, this limitation must be understood within a wider context of successive failures of the negotiation process to deliver a concrete agreement and a general sense of resignation among both politicians and the population that it can do so. Consequently, it is more likely for the negotiation process to be affected from efforts and processes external to it, rather than arising and nurtured within it.

Summary

The Cyprus case exemplifies some of the key issues that surround the implementation of the Women, Peace, and Security agenda that has developed since UNSCR 1325. It shows that the adoption of UNSCR 1325 has created opportunities for inclusion of women and for women's civil society to be recognized. It also shows, however, that the limitations of UNSCR 1325 and its follow-up resolutions are bound to the wider environment within which negotiations are conducted. Radical change is impossible to effect in a climate of distrust and stalemate, and it is very difficult to effect in situations where key parameters of an agreement (such as citizenship) have already been fixed. It is possible, however, to create structures (committees, consultative bodies, etc.) that remain alert to the situation and the issues and that can be mobilized once the negotiation dynamics improve. In other words, UNSCR 1325 is not about putting women in the driving seat but about involving them in processes already in train (Table 1).

In terms of mobilization, the case of Cyprus also holds lessons for women's solidarity strategies within the Women, Peace, and Security agenda. It shows that while disagreements on the scope of the agenda and demands within it can enrich the landscape of women's activism, it is only baseline demands around which everyone coalesces, and which also enjoy the support of international actors (such as presence of women at the table), which are more likely to be answered. From then on, solidarity behind specific goals can make the difference between what is taken up and what is not, while hints of fractures in those solidarities can gravely undermine goals. This means that structurally, there is a higher premium on consensus demanded of women's civil society than of other groups seeking representation (youth, religious groups, minorities, etc.).

Within this landscape, perhaps the biggest obstacle facing women's effective inclusion in the Cyprus peace process today, barring the indigenous problems of the process itself, is resourcing. This stifles progress on the other two fronts because it means that women across various groups do not have the resources to engage in an in-depth and sustained exchange to formulate the content and structure of their demands and to build a platform on which all concerns will be taken into account and a consensual strategy built on addressing those concerns in a post-agreement environment as well as the post-conflict situation that pertains today.

Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus, Table 1 Application of UNSCR 1325 to the case of Cyprus

| Pillar | UNSCR 1325 article | Main implementers (Cypriot negotiators and politicians/UN) | Cyprus applications | Progress (yes/no/some) |
|---------------------|-----------------------|--|---|----------------------------|
| Participation | 1, 2, 8b | CY | (i) Women in key positions at negotiations (ii) Consideration of input on gender dimensions by negotiators (iii) Quota systems in make-up of negotiating teams (iv) Direct consultation channel between women's civil society and negotiators | N N N S |
| | 3, 4, 5 | UN | (i) Appointment of women to top positions in UNFICYP and UN Good Offices missions (ii) Appointment of gender focal points for coordination with civil society and across the mission (iii) Appointment of gender and law experts in facilitation teams | Y Y N |
| Protection | 5, 6, 7 | UN | (i) Direct communication of peacekeepers with women's civil society and individual women on the ground (ii) Involvement of Cypriot women in UN training | N N |
| | 8c | CY | (i) Use of gender-sensitive language in the constitution (ii) Inclusion of gender-balanced articles in all areas, for example, special measures in governance, flexibility on internal citizenship, uniformity in family law, coordination of all authorities under federal umbrella, coordination in prosecuting gender crimes (iii) Centralization and reach of gender equality mechanisms in a system that is both networked (from grassroots to government) and coordinated (through a single top-level federal body like a ministry) | N N N |
| Prevention | 1, 9 | CY | (i) Fostering of a peace cultures and support of peace initiatives in education and public discourse (ii) Awareness raising about gender equality, women's rights, and sexual rights | S S |
| | 7, 14, 15 | UN | (i) Support for awareness raising and peace initiatives with a gender perspective (ii) Support for coordination activities between women's groups | N N |
| Relief and recovery | 7 | UN | (i) Support of UN bodies for Cypriot initiatives in relevant areas (box below) | S |
| | 8a, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13 | CY | (i) Investigation and prosecution of gender crimes in the history of the conflict (ii) Measures for women refugees (iii) Coordination of justice and police mechanisms to deal with gender crime (iv) Gender balance and women's effective representation in reconstruction bodies (v) Gender balance and women's effective representation in economic development institutions | N S N N S N |

(continued)

Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus, Table 1 (continued)

| Pillar | UNSCR 1325 article | Main implementers (Cypriot negotiators and politicians/UN) | Cyprus applications | Progress (yes/no/some) |
|--------|--------------------|--|---|------------------------|
| | | | (vi) Monitoring and combating of situation in relation to trafficking (vii) Inclusion of minority women in decision-making structures on communal property | |
| All | 16–18 | UN | (i) Systematic research, reporting, and monitoring on all of the above | N |

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Human Security
- ▶ Liberal Peace
- ▶ UNSCR 1325

References

Agathangelou, A. (2004). The global political economy of sex: Desire, violence, and insecurity in Mediterranean nation states. London: Palgrave.

Aliefendioglu, H. (2012). Migrant women workers in Cyprus: A literature review. International Journal of Business and Globalisation, 8(4), 491–502.

Anthias, F. (1989). Women and nationalism in Cyprus. In Woman-nation-state (pp. 150–167). London: Palgrave Macmillan.

Cockburn, C. (2004). The line: Women, partition and the gender order in Cyprus. London: Zed Books.

Demetriou, O. M. (2018). Refugeehood and the post-conflict subject: Reconsidering minor losses. Albany: State University of New York Press.

Demetriou, O., & Hadjipavlou, M. (2016). Engendering the post-liberal peace in Cyprus: UNSC resolution 1325 as a tool. In O. Richmond & S. Pogodda (Eds.), Post-liberal peace transitions: Between peace formation and state formation. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.

Demetriou, O., & Hadjipavlou, M. (2018). The impact of women’s activism on the peace negotiations in Cyprus. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(1), 50–65.

Hadjipavlou, M. (2006). No permission to cross: Cypriot women’s dialogue across the divide. Gender, Place and Culture, 13(4), 329–351.

Hadjipavlou, M. (2010). Women and change in Cyprus: Feminism, gender and conflict. London and New York: I.B. Tauris.

Hadjipavlou, M., & Mertan, E. B. (2019). A multilevel intervention: The case of the Cyprus Gender Advisory Team (GAT) achievements and challenges. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 14(2), 125–137.

Kamenou, N. (2019). Feminism in Cyprus: Women’s agency, gender, and peace in the shadow of nationalism. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 1–23.

Lisaniler, F. G., & Bhatti, F. (2005). Determinants of female labour force participation: A study of North Cyprus. Review of Social, Economic and Business Studies, 5(6), 209–226.

Roussou, M. (1986). War in Cyprus: Patriarchy and the Penelope myth. In Caught up in conflict (pp. 25–44). London: Palgrave.

Vassiliadou, M. (1997). ‘Herstory’: The missing woman of Cyprus. The Cyprus Review, 9(1), 95–120.

Vassiliadou, M. (2002). Questioning nationalism: The patriarchal and national struggles of Cypriot women within a European context. European Journal of Women’s Studies, 9(4), 459–482.

Women in War

- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Women, Peace and Security Agenda

Maria-Adriana Deiana
Queen’s University Belfast, Belfast, UK

Synonyms

Feminist peace activism; Feminist peace research; Feminist security studies; Gender mainstreaming; Global governance; UNSCR1325; Women in war

Definition

The signing of Resolution 1325 by the UN Security Council on 31 October 2000 has marked the development of the Women, Peace and Security Agenda (WPS). The agenda has emerged as the dominant normative framework for the articulation of a gender perspective in the context of crisis management and security, conflict resolution, and peacebuilding. Essentially the agenda acknowledges that gender matters in conflict and in peace-making and signals commitments to center the role of women in peace and security. It sets out aspirations and recommendations for mainstreaming gender in all aspects of conflict management, prevention, and peacebuilding. These include reform of peacekeeping and other security forces, inclusion of women in all level of decision-making, responses to the diverse impact of conflict on women and men, strategies to address conflict-related sexual violence, to name but a few.

Introduction

The signing of Resolution 1325 by the UN Security Council on 31 October 2000 has seen the development of the so-called Women, Peace and Security (WPS) agenda as the dominant normative framework in which gender dimensions of conflict, crisis management, and peacebuilding gain articulation in the arena of international security.

This entry traces the institutionalization of the agenda through the UN Security Council and its proliferation across national governments and the architecture of international security and peacebuilding. It interrogates the role of feminist activism in initiating and shaping the agenda, as well as the relevance of WPS for feminist efforts “on the ground.” This entry maps out the emergence of a multidisciplinary research agenda in this field and outlines challenges and new directions in the assessment of WPS two decades since the signing of UN resolution 1325 on Women, Peace, and Security. It also traces ongoing critical engagement with the colonial hierarchies and erasures reproduced through the institutionalization of WPS, as well as through academic inquiry.

The signing of UN SCR 1325 was the result of ongoing feminist transnational organizing and advocacy efforts to lobby the UN. It reflected conversations and aspirations expressed in the Beijing Declaration and Platform for Action as well as principles underpinning the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW).

The campaign for the passing of the resolution was led by a coalition of NGOs, which had been meeting informally since 1998 while working on the implementation of the Beijing Platform and its strategic objectives on Women and Armed conflict. As the idea for lobbying the UN Security Council emerged, the Working Group on Women, Peace, and Security was created. The group worked in cooperation with UN agencies and missions to campaign members of the Security Council and proposes the initial draft of the resolution (Cohn et al. 2004).

The signing of UNCSR 1325 is considered as a highly significant moment. Not only was it the first time that the UN Security Council had a session entirely dedicated to discussing the experiences of women in armed conflict and post-conflict settings, but the resolution also set out actions to be taken by the Security Council, UN departments, and member states.

Resolutions on Women, Peace and Security

The Women, Peace and Security Agenda currently comprises of ten UN Security Council Resolutions.

| UN SC Resolution | Overview |
|------------------|---|
| 1325 (2000) | Acknowledgment of disproportionate and unique impact of armed conflict on women; women’s contribution to conflict prevention, peacekeeping, conflict resolution, and peacebuilding; the importance of women’s equal and full participation as active agents in peace and security |

(continued)

| UN SC Resolution | Overview |
|------------------|--|
| 1820 (2008) | Acknowledgment of sexual violence as war crime and setting of legal parameters/calls for training of troops on prevention & response to sexual violence in conflict |
| 1888 (2009) | Strengthening peacekeeping mandate of protection from sexual violence/ Establishment of reporting system |
| 1889 (2009) | Focus on the obstacles for women’s full participation in peace processes and peacebuilding/Establishment of indicators for tracking implementation |
| 1960 (2010) | Affirming the value of collecting, monitoring, and analyzing sex disaggregated data on sexual violence in conflict/Processes for addressing the impunity gap/measures including report to ICC and sanction committee, international condemnation |
| 2106 (2013) | Strengthening and operationalizing measures for addressing impunity and accountability for sexual violence in conflict, including support for recourse to justice |
| 2122 (2013) | Concrete Actions to increase women’s inclusion and participation in governance/inclusion of civil society through integrated approach |
| 2242 (2015) | Deepening implementation and integration across units and contexts/ Women’s roles in Counter Terrorism and Countering Violent Extremism |
| 2467 (2019) | Strengthening actions in prosecution and prevention of sexual violence in conflict, including survivor-centered approach and national accountability |
| 2493 (2019) | Strengthening implementation and accountability measures on women’s full participation/specific mention of funding in support of women’s inclusion |

Source: www.peacewomen.org

The Pillars

The agenda acknowledges the necessity to employ gender-sensitive approaches and expresses a commitment to the inclusion of women as key agents in the context of peace-making and peacebuilding.

These objectives are articulated along four interlinked pillars.

The Participation pillar sets out interventions aimed at increasing women’s participation at all levels of decision-making, for example, in peace negotiations and field missions. The Protection pillar involves actions in the context of sexual and gender-based violence, including in emergency and humanitarian situations, such as in refugee camps. The Prevention pillar envisages intervention strategies in the prevention of violence against women, including prosecution through international law. The Relief and Recovery pillar sets out measures to address the diverse gendered impact of humanitarian emergencies.

The WPS architecture is binding on the UN member states. The implementation of WPS provisions has been operationalized through the use of National Action Plans. Analysis by the ► Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\) illustrates that, as of August 2020, 86 UN Member States have ratified National Actions Plans (NAPs). There are also 11 Regional Actions Plans (RAPs), for example, that ratified by the European Union (source: www.peacewomen.org).

Since its inception, UNCSR 1325 has become a tool for strategic lobbying and organizing for women’s and feminist organizations, see also ► Women’s Organizations in Post-conflict Contexts. Crucially, the Resolution paved the way for the articulation of gender expertise and demands at UN Security council, in field missions and for member states. The signing of successive sister resolutions is an indication of ongoing efforts to express a commitment to gender-sensitive analysis and policymaking in peace and security. Overall, however, there is a sense that the agenda has not yet lived up to its transformative potential. Furthermore, recent developments at the UN Security Council have seen attempts to restrict and water down the agenda. For example, in 2019 the passing of Resolution 2467 on sexual violence was possible only after difficult negotiations which saw the US administration (as well as Russia and China) impose a veto on the inclusion of references to sexual health and reproductive rights, an aspect that it still insufficiently addressed in WPS (Thomson and Pierson 2018). Similarly, in October 2020, the twentieth anniversary of UNSCR 1325, Russia proposed a new resolution deemed as an attempt to reverse some of the WPS commitments. While the resolution did not gain sufficient votes, these instances reflect ongoing threats against women's rights and the rise of anti-gender politics seen globally.

Researching Women, Peace and Security

Welcomed as a landmark moment for women's and peace activism, the institutionalization of the agenda into the architecture of international peace-making has become the focus of intense critical scrutiny (for an up to date overview see: Basu et al. 2020; Davies and True 2019). As the normative framework of WPS proliferates across multiple institutional and activist spaces, a multi-disciplinary research agenda has emerged. Scholars have analyzed different aspects, ranging from its discursive framing and implementation to the actors and institutions involved in shaping and operationalizing the agenda in different contexts.

Underlying this work are ongoing questions about the complex relationship between the emergence of WPS and different ideological feminist perspectives; the location, "ownership," and translations of the agenda, as well as the gaps, silences, and marginalization that work on WPS produces in peace and security practices, as well as in research. Two decades since its inception, scholars and activists alike have highlighted several tensions in the framing and implementation of the WPS agenda that undermine a feminist transformative ethos. More damningly, post-colonial feminist scholars draw attention to the reproduction of colonial logics and neoliberal feminist perspectives through WPS practice and research. Providing a comprehensive overview of the ever-growing field of inquiry on WPS in one single entry would be impossible. Outlined below is a selection of thematic trajectories and debates that underpin research on WPS.

Critically Examining the Resolutions

From the outset, important scholarly contributions have examined the formulation of gender-sensitive actions in UNSCR1325 and the following resolutions. A key theme running through this work has been an underlying tension between the apparent commitment to deploy gender sensitive analysis of conflict and peace-making and the reproduction of essentialist ideas about women's and men's roles in conflict, peace, and security (Puechguirbal 2010; Shepherd 2008). While acknowledging the importance of women's agency, the language of WPS has reproduced familiar scripts that, conceptualizing women as victims of conflict and men as combatants, fail to address gendered complexities of conflict, as well as the multiplicity of roles women play in conflict and peace. Crucially, through this logic, WPS has reproduced gendered hierarchies that frame women as vulnerable individuals, often grouped with children, while envisioning international actors as protectors. One consequence of this framing is that, irrespective of the commitments set out in WPS, a resistance to view women as key actors in conflict or crucial interlocutors in the negotiations of ceasefires and peace settlements is still at play.

While changes in the discursive framing of the agenda since UNSCRs 1888/1889 (2009) and UNSCR 2122 (2013) have seen more references to women as agents of change, these shifts have often paid less attention to the structural inequalities and ideological constraints that must be addressed to create conditions for meaningful participation and political transformation. Women thus have been instrumentalized as untapped resources for peacebuilding (Gibbins 2011) and peacekeeping (Karim and Beardsley 2013) and/or conceived as super heroines tasked with their own salvation, representing others and effect change (Shepherd 2011, 511). For example, strategies envisioned as part of WPS often focus on the logic of capacity building, implying that women must be better equipped to be included in the process, rather than tackling the deep-seated and structural processes leading to gender insecurities and discrimination (Hudson 2012; Deiana and McDonagh 2017). While we might see a more promising lexicon that pays attention to women's active roles in peace and conflict, this articulation implies women as homogeneous groups and does not go far enough to challenge existing gendered structures.

Furthermore, scholars have traced the progressive narrowing down of the agenda's scope to questions such as gender balancing of peacekeeping missions, gender-based violence, and sexual violence in conflict (Kirby and Shepherd 2016; Meger 2016). An assessment of these shifts produces an ambivalent picture. On the one hand, this framing operates to privilege the logic of protection rather than participation and conceptualizes gender mainstreaming as a technical tool that can problematically bolster the role of Western states and international institutions as the "right" interveners. On the other hand, the focus on sexual violence, while disproportionate, has also seen some concrete developments in addressing and preventing the issue, such as commitments to the use of reporting and specific references to sanctions (Basu et al. 2020). Overall, ongoing research and activism on WPS reveal some positive openings for integrating a gender analysis and gender-sensitive measures in international peace and security. At the same time, painful trade-offs have accompanied the intersection between different feminist projects for political transformation attached to WPS and the more stark realities of international security confronting feminist actors involved in policymaking and institutions (Basu et al. 2020).

More damningly, postcolonial and other critical feminist scholars have raised concerns about the hierarchies of knowledge and feminist perspectives produced through the agenda. Researchers have interrogated the feminist norms and visions that were privileged through UNSCR1325 and its subsequent institutionalization, for example, by showing the marginalization of the anti-militarist ideals that were at the core of feminist peace activism (Cohn 2008; Pratt and Richter-Devroe 2011), and the resistance at the UN toward voices that were critical of the politics of international intervention such as during the invasion of Iraq (Gibbins 2011). Feminist scholars have thus complicated celebratory narratives of WPS by drawing attention to the changes in global governance that made UNSCR1325 possible. Such interventions illustrate that the path to WPS grew in parallel with the emergence of the post-Cold War liberal agenda which saw the instrumentalization of women's rights and empowerment as a "benchmark" of progress and civilization and strengthened the role of the USA and other Western allies as democratic leaders and defenders of women's rights (Harrington 2011). As WPS progressively emerged as a global norm, Swati Parashar writes, the Global South has problematically appeared as a space of intractable conflict, as a recipient of norms, best practices, and liberal notions of empowerment, as well as a site for innumerable case studies for WPS researchers and policymakers (Parashar 2019).

While feminist scholars are aware of WPS as an uneasy, yet potentially productive, compromise that can only be imperfectly navigated (for example, see Cohn 2008; Otto 2009; Kirby and Shepherd 2016), there is also some ideological skepticism. For some, the commitment to gender mainstreaming at the core of WPS can be seen as a tool deployed to support the changing scenarios of international security, rather than to transform and challenge security and peace-making practices (Harrington 2011; Pratt and Richter-Devroe 2011). Post 9/11, the invocation of women's rights to support international military intervention raised alarms about the usage of UNSCR1325 in tandem with dominant security practices that furthered the violence of counterterrorism and counterinsurgency measures (Pratt 2013; see also Cohn et al. 2004). These concerns are as valid today particularly as WPS explicitly includes actions on the sphere of Countering Violent Extremism (CVE) with the passing of Resolution 2242 which envisions women's pivotal role in fighting radicalization (Ni Aolain 2016). This development has been met with opposition from women's organizations in the Global South, often the "targets" of CVE interventions, who experience the unintended consequences of such priorities (Coomaraswamy 2015; see also Aroussi 2020). Arguments against this uneasy coupling point out that instrumentalizing women as actors for international security and counterterrorism can contribute to engender further militarization and insecurities for women who navigate complex situations shaped by political violence and competing narratives of conflict, security, and terrorism (Parashar 2019).

Through critical postcolonial insights then, WPS is best understood as “a contested site of feminist political struggles” (Parashar 2019, 837). As Soumita Basu has argued, feminist narratives that locate the conceptual, material, and institutional ownership of the agenda in the Global North erase the contribution of key actors of the Global South in conceptualizing WPS, as well as resisting its neoliberal agenda (Basu 2016). For example, this is attested by the role of states such as Namibia, Vietnam, and Azerbaijan which hold the UN Security Council presidency during the ratification of UNSCR1325 and subsequent resolutions. It is also attested by state actors and organizations that resist the agenda, such as India which holds reservations about international interference by the Security Council. The work of local organizations in both interpreting WPS and resisting pressures to redirect their activities to fit its priorities is another example (Basu 2016). This argument is echoed by Haastrup when showing the influence of African feminists in shaping the agenda from the outset and in its institutionalization and interpretation (Haastrup 2019; see also Hudson 2016). Without an appreciation of the knowledges, practices, and contestations in the Global South, as Basu contends, our understanding of WPS as global currency and multi-sited political terrain will be limited.

Overall, such interventions suggest that interrogating the uneasy entanglements between WPS proponents and international security and making visible actors in the Global South as knowledge producers and political agents of WPS must be at the center of ongoing research and activist efforts.

The Challenges of Implementation

Another research trajectory focuses on the implementation of WPS. Since its emergence, extensive scholarship has highlighted a number of policy failures and tensions ranging from implementation and national ownership, to international peacekeeping, security, and conflict management practices that continue to undercut WPS’ more ambitious and transformative claims (Coomaraswamy 2015; Kirby and Shepherd 2016). Crucially, despite the diffusion of this international framework, a reluctance to see women as co-architects of peace is still at play. Between 1992 and 2019, on average women were 13% of negotiators, 6% of mediators, and 6% of signatories in major peace processes. As of 2019, peace agreements with gender equality provisions increased from 14% in 1995 to only 22% (source: UN Women). Research also indicates that even when women are included through international efforts or National Actions Plans, obstacles remain for their influence in shaping peace agreements (Paffenholz et al. 2016). Furthermore, gendered exclusions, stereotypes, and insecurities in post-conflict scenarios have proved to be resilient, as these are reproduced or emerge anew at different stages of a peace process in spite of institutional commitment to implement WPS (Deiana 2016; George and Shepherd 2016).

On the 15th anniversary of UNSCR1325, the UN launched a global study that assessed and critically reflected on the implementation of the Agenda in response to the Security Council invitation in Resolution 2122. Among its findings, the Global study highlighted the necessity to pay close attention to contextual factors that shape implementation, acknowledging that a one-size-fits-all approach and the transferring of best practices might be counterproductive (Coomaraswamy 2015, 16). As mentioned, National Action Plans (NAPs) are the main mechanism used by member states as well as regional organizations to express commitments to translate WPS into localized actions. While researchers acknowledge the significance of these instruments as important mechanisms of accountability and transparency and norm diffusion (Swaine 2009; True 2016), there are also concerns about the state as key actor for positive change and “owner” of the agenda. As research has shown, National Actions Plans especially of states in the Global North or powerful states in the Global South are mostly outward facing (Shepherd 2016; Motoyama 2018). These often rely on militaristic and interventionist logics and reproduce racialized hierarchies, while lacking sufficient commitment to address WPS in their domestic context (Haastrup and Hagen 2020). For example, the UK NAP is a case in point. Despite the official commitment to a National Action Plan, the British Government does not acknowledge “the Troubles” in Northern Ireland as a case of armed conflict, thus leaving Northern Ireland out of their WPS remit while supporting interventions “conveniently” located “out there” in contexts of the Global South.

Some studies also point out to post-conflict contexts where NAPs have reproduced international driven and technocratic scripts that constrain rather than support meaningful local participation, without addressing structural inequalities and cultural norms that impinge on women’s political agency (Björkdahl and Mannergren Selimovic 2015; Deiana 2018). The case of Liberia and Sierra Leone are illustrative of these tensions. Basini and Ryan (2016) found that, in these contexts, consistent evidence of the women’s movements efforts and localized work on gender equality got lost in the statist and international priorities detailed in the NAPs. While evidence indicates the contribution of women’s organizations to the development of the respective NAPs, the invocation of local ownership in these contexts is driven by a technocratic approach. This logic favored internationally driven ideas and set indicators that are difficult to monitor and realize due to lack of resources, political will, and institutional capacity while meaningful interventions and knowledge at the local level failed to be acknowledged and lifted up.

Overall, research on implementation draws attention to the complexities undercutting the translation of the agenda into actionable plans. In an attempt to enhance accountability for implementation, scholars have also explored opportunities to increase synergies with other international mechanisms, for example, by strengthening linkages with CEDAW (O’Rourke and Swaine 2019) and through the development of a WPS index in connection with the Sustainable Development Goals (Klugman 2019). However, mapping the opportunities, challenges, and trade-offs that the formulation and implementation of WPS in local contexts entails remains ongoing.

The “Global” and the “Local” in WPS

Another thread of research seeks to examine the “localisation” of WPS norms. Since its inception, different scholars have highlighted the need to critically interrogate UNSCR1325 in terms of its applicability to widely different conflict and post-conflict scenarios and in relation to its relevance to women’s activism and everyday life in these contexts (e.g., Farr 2011; McLeod 2011; Hoewer 2013; Deiana 2016). A key contribution emerging from this strand of research is that, while the adoption of the agenda by different institutions and actors might suggest a positive example of norm diffusion, in practice the effects of such translation are more ambivalent, not only as a result of structural constraints but also of different visions of WPS and feminism as political project. At the same time, evidence suggests that feminist activists are mobilizing, reinterpreting, as well as contesting, WPS as a strategic tool for their political demands and activism, see also ► Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus.

For example, Laura McLeod’s research in Serbia has shown antagonist understandings of security and post-conflict figurations that attach different meanings and actions to WPS (McLeod 2011). While anti-militarist feminist activists mobilized WPS as a tool to acknowledge Serbia’s responsibility in the conflict, state actors and other stakeholders involved in the creation of Serbia’s NAP or in its implementation used this opportunity to reframe Serbia as a liberal nation that can contribute to international security or as a nation that can move away from the legacy of conflict through support and capacity-building. McLeod’s article thus underlines the importance of paying attention to multiple and contradictory visions of gender, security, and post-conflict at play in the translation of WPS into localized actions.

On the other hand, Vanessa Farr’s research in the context of Palestine draws attention to the sustained struggle of women’s groups to mobilize in a complex terrain shaped by imbalance of power with the Israeli government, the everyday experiences of occupation and the legacy of local and international patriarchal structures (Farr 2011). Farr highlights how women’s groups have mobilized the language and spirit of UNSCR1325 to articulate their demands. However, the structural inequalities and endless constraints on the ground have undermined the potential of the WPS framework to meaningfully transform women's lived experiences and activism.

More recent interventions continue to draw attention to the persistent gap between the translation of WPS norms and the possibilities to engender change and transformation on the ground (Shepherd 2020). Such contributions reiterate the importance of theorizing that takes seriously local knowledges, contexts, and experiences (see for example: Madsen and Hudson 2020; O'Sullivan and Krulišová 2020; George and Soaki 2020; Drummond and Rebelo 2020; Tamang 2020).

For example, Shweta Singh investigates the obstacles underpinning the realization of WPS' transformative potential in the context of Afghanistan (Singh 2020). These emerge from a complex entanglement between cultural and religious norms, and the legacy of international intervention, conflict, and militarization. As Singh demonstrates, WPS has been mapped onto the institutional context but this move falls short of meaningfully supporting women's agency and transforming their experiences of everyday insecurity. Grounding the analysis in the everyday reveals how women activists and human rights defenders navigate a complex web of cultural, religious, and community practices that regulate gender relations and prescribe norms for women's behavior, for example, through gender segregation. Furthermore, Singh's research illustrates intersecting factors that reproduce women's insecurities and impinge on women's participation irrespective of the national-level institutions tasked with implementation of WPS principles. These include the militarization of communities – a legacy of the conflict and the counterinsurgency efforts led by NATO, the USA and the Afghan government, the effects of demobilization, and the persistence of patriarchal norms. Despite this evidence, Singh argues, the voices and experiences of Afghani women too often remain marginal in ongoing research and institutional fora. As the case of Afghanistan attests, without paying attention to the complex web of insecurities that women navigate in scenarios shaped by conflict and international intervention, WPS research and practice will be limited to tracing processes of translation, rather than meaningful transformation.

Translating WPS into Security Institutions and Practices

As the normative framework of the agenda proliferates across different institutional and policy contexts, another research trajectory has examined how different entities have taken on board and developed WPS. For example, research includes analyses of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (e.g., Wright et al. 2019), the European Union (e.g., Guerrina and Wright 2016), the African Union (e.g., Haastrup 2019; Hendricks 2017), and the Pacific Island Forum (e.g., Rolls and Rolls 2019). While the articulation of the agenda in different organizational territories is an important indicator of multi-sited institutionalization and emerging communities of practice, feminist scholars have also shown that WPS' traveling across the architecture of international peace and security is not a straightforward process.

For example, Toni Haastrup's research on the African Union (AU) complicates linear and unidirectional understandings of norm diffusion from the UN to other institutional contexts (Haastrup 2019). To the contrary, developments around WPS in the African continent reveal the long-standing contribution of activists and institutional actors in the African Union to conceptualize WPS and embed it in regional and localized implementation. By paying attention to the interaction of different knowledges, practices, and actors, it becomes clear that the AU is not merely a recipient of global norms. Rather, Haastrup demonstrates, the AU is a site wherein learning, contestation, and implementation of the different meanings attributed to WPS coexist.

On the other hand, Katharine Wright's research on NATO demonstrates how the adoption of the WPS agenda is translated through an operational language of efficiency that mutes its more radical and transformative aims (Wright 2016). This is echoed in studies of the implementation of WPS in the context of EU security and peacebuilding missions wherein openings for institutional implementation through robust gender mainstreaming mechanisms are also met with a resistance to alter and transform existing security practices (Deiana and McDonagh 2018). In these contexts, arguments about the inclusion of women and/or gender perspectives are made on the grounds of operational effectiveness that eschew wider questions of gender equality and transformation.

Overall, as these studies testify, WPS' articulation across different institutional territories produces a variety of interactions and frameworks that impact implementation in specific contexts, while also running the risk of being diluted and co-opted within practices which might be at odds with feminist principles.

Summary and Future Directions

The signing of UN Security Council Resolution 1325 in October 2000 is considered an important landmark for feminist peace research and activism. The subsequent emergence of the Women, Peace and Security agenda has set in motion opportunities for the articulation of feminist demands for political transformation and for the inclusion of gender-sensitive perspectives in international peace and security practices. At the same time, assessing the development and institutionalization of the agenda across different organizational and activist spaces reveals a complex set of trade-offs and tensions that complicate, and often undermine, a feminist transformative ethos. As this entry has outlined, the WPS agenda has been the catalyst of wide-ranging scholarship and intense critical scrutiny on the strategic interpretations and contested meanings of the agenda, the practices of and failures in implementation, as well as on the global hierarchies reproduced through both research and policymaking. Two decades of intensive feminist study have also opened up new directions for research that are likely to animate ongoing critical engagements with the meanings, potential, and pitfalls of the agenda. For example, these have included analyses of WPS informed by queer scholarship and LGBTQ studies – see also ► LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding, as well as studies that attend to the role of masculinities – see also ► Masculinity and Conflict. Recent interventions also begin to analyze WPS' entanglements with border and asylum regimes and the missed opportunities within (Holvikivi and Reeves 2017; Kirby 2020).

All in all, research on WPS is illustrative of the ongoing and complex journey of feminist ideas into the architecture of international peace and security. At the same time, it is worth acknowledging that feminist engagements with peace are not confined to the study of WPS. While WPS is an important site of analysis, feminist peace research entails a much wider set of methodological and interdisciplinary perspectives that seek to transform and re-imagine established practices of peace and security beyond the institutional realm and statist conventions (Lyytikäinen et al. 2020; Wibben et al. 2019,) see also ► Feminist Peace Research.

Cross-References

- Feminist Peace Research
- LGBTQ Perspectives in Peacebuilding
- Masculinity and Conflict
- Women and Peace Negotiations in Cyprus
- Women's International League for Peace and Freedom \(WILPF\)
- Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

References

- Aroussi, S. (2020). Strange bedfellows: Interrogating the unintended consequences of integrating countering violent extremism with the UN's women, peace, and security agenda in Kenya. Politics & Gender, 1–31. <https://doi.org/10.1017/S1743923X20000124>.
- Basini, H., & Ryan, C., (2016). National Action Plans as an obstacle to meaningful local ownership of UNSCR 1325 in Liberia and Sierra Leone. International Political Science Review, 37(3):390–403. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116636121>
- Basu, S. (2016). The global south writes 1325 (too). International Political Science Review, 37(3), 362–374. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116642616>.

- Basu, S., Kirby, P., & Shepherd, L. J. (2020). New directions in women, peace and security. Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Björkdahl, A., & Mannergren Selimovic, J. (2015). Translating UNSCR 1325 from the global to the national: Protection, representation and participation in the National Action Plans of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Rwanda. Conflict, Security & Development, 15(4), 311–335.
- Cohn, C. (2008). Mainstreaming gender in UN security policy: A path to political transformation? In S. Rai & G. Waylen (Eds.), Global governance (pp. 185–206). Springer. http://link.springer.com/chapter/10.1057/9780230583931_9.
- Cohn, C., Kinsella, H., & Gibbins, S. (2004). Women, peace and security resolution 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 6(1), 130–140.
- Coomaraswamy, R. (2015). Preventing conflict transforming justice securing peace. A global study on the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolution 1325. <http://wps.unwomen.org/en/highlights/global-study-release>.
- Davies, S. E., & True, J. (Eds.). (2019). The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Deiana, M.-A. (2016). To settle for a gendered peace? Spaces for feminist grassroots mobilization in Northern Ireland and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Citizenship Studies, 20(1), 99–114. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13621025.2015.1054790>.
- Deiana, M.-A. (2018). Navigating Consociationalism's afterlives: Women, peace and security in post-Dayton Bosnia-Herzegovina. Nationalism and Ethnic Politics, 24(1), 33–49. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13537113.2017.1422638>.
- Deiana, M.-A., & McDonagh, K. (2017). "It is important, but...": Translating the Women Peace and Security (WPS) agenda into the planning of EU peacekeeping missions. Peacebuilding, 6(1), 34–48. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2017.1303870>.
- Deiana, M.-A., & McDonagh, K. (2018, June). Translating the women, peace and security agenda into EU common security and defence policy: Reflections from EU peacebuilding. Global Society. <https://www.tandfonline.com/doi/abs/10.1080/13600826.2018.1474183>.
- Drumond (she/her/hers), P., & Rebelo, T. (she/her/hers). (2020). Global pathways or local spins? National Action Plans in South America. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 462–484. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1783339>.
- Farr, V. (2011). UNSCR 1325 and Women's peace activism in the occupied Palestinian territory. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 539–556. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611661>.
- George, N., & Shepherd, J. (2016). Women, Peace and Security: Exploring the implementation and integration of UNSCR 1325. International Political Science Review, 37(3):297–306. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116636659>
- George (she/her/hers), N., & Soaki, P. (she/her/hers). (2020). "Our struggle, our cry, our sweat": Challenging the gendered logics of participation and conflict transition in Solomon Islands. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 572–593. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1798798>.
- Gibbins, S. L. (2011). No angry women at the United Nations: Political dreams and the cultural politics of United Nations security council resolution 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 522–538. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611660>.
- Guerrina, R., & Wright, K. A. M. (2016). Gendering normative power Europe: Lessons of the women, peace and security agenda. International Affairs, 92(2), 293–312.
- Haastруп, T. (2019, February 28). WPS and the African Union. The Oxford Handbook of women, peace, and security. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordhb/9780190638276.013.27>.
- Haastруп, T., & Hagen, J. J. (2020). Global racial hierarchies and the limits of localization via National Action Plans. In S. Basu, P. Kirby, & L. J. Shepherd (Eds.), New directions in women, peace and security (pp. 133–152). Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Harrington, C. (2011). Resolution 1325 and post-cold war feminist politics. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 557–575. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611662>.
- Hendricks, C. (2017). Progress and challenges in implementing the women, peace and security agenda in the African Union's peace and security architecture. Africa Development, 42(3), 73–98.
- Hoewer, M. (2013). UN resolution 1325 in Ireland: Limitations and opportunities of the international framework on women, peace and security. Irish Political Studies, 28(3), 450–468.
- Holvikivi, A., & Reeves, A. (2017). The WPS agenda and the 'refugee crisis': missing connections and missed opportunities in Europe. LSE Women, Peace and Security Working Paper Series (6/2017). Centre for Women Peace and Security, London School of Economics and Political Science, London, UK.
- Hudson, H. (2012). A double-edged sword of peace? Reflections on the tension between representation and protection in gendering Liberal Peacebuilding. International Peacekeeping, 19(4), 443–460.
- Hudson, H. (2016). Decolonizing the mainstreaming of gender in peacebuilding: Toward an agenda for Africa. African Peacebuilding Network (APN) Working Paper 8.
- Karim, S., & Beardsley, K. (2013). Female peacekeepers and gender balancing: Token gestures or informed policymaking? International Interactions, 39(4), 461–488.
- Kirby, P. (2020). Sexual violence in the border zone: The EU, the women, peace and security agenda and Carceral humanitarianism in Libya. International Affairs, 96(5), 1209–1226. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ia/iaa097>.
- Kirby, P., & Shepherd, L. J. (2016). Reintroducing women, peace and security. International Affairs, 92(2), 249–254.
- Klugman, J. (2019). Measuring WPS. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. New York: Oxford University Press.

- Lyytikäinen, M., Yadav, P., Wibben, A. T. R., Jauhola, M., & Confortini, C. C. (2020). Unruly wives in the household: Toward feminist genealogies for peace research. Cooperation and Conflict, July, 0010836720938397. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0010836720938397>.
- Madsen (she/her/hers), D. H., & Hudson, H. (she/her/hers). (2020). Temporality and the discursive dynamics of the Rwandan National Action Plans on women, peace and security from 2009 and 2018. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 550–571. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1779600>.
- McLeod, L. (2011). Configurations of post-conflict: Impacts of representations of conflict and post-conflict upon the (political) translations of gender security within UNSCR 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 594–611. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611664>.
- Meger, S. (2016). The Fetishization of sexual violence in international security. International Studies Quarterly, 60(1), 149–159.
- Motoyama, H. (2018). Formulating Japan's UNSCR 1325 National Action Plan and forgetting the “comfort women”. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 20(1), 39–53. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2017.1413582>.
- Ni Aolain, F. (2016). The ‘war on Terror’ and extremism: Assessing the relevance of the women, peace and security agenda. International Affairs, 92(2), 275–291.
- O'Rourke, C., & Swaine, A. (2019). In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. New York: Oxford University Press. <https://doi.org/10.1093/oxfordhb/9780190638276.013.51>.
- O'Sullivan (she/her/hers), M., & Krulišová, K. (she/her/hers). (2020). “This agenda will never be politically popular”: Central Europe's anti-gender mobilization and the Czech women, peace and security agenda. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 526–549. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1796519>.
- Otto, D. (2009). The exile of inclusion: Reflections on gender issues in international law over the last decade. Melbourne Journal of International Law, 10(1) http://papers.ssrn.com/sol3/papers.cfm?abstract_id=1508067.
- Paffenholz, T., Ross, N., Dixon, S., Schluchter, A.-L., & True, J. (2016). Making women count – Not just counting women: Assessing women's inclusion and influence on peace negotiations, 64.
- Parashar, S. (2019). The WPS agenda. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Pratt, N. (2013). Reconceptualizing gender, Reinscribing racial–sexual boundaries in international security: The case of UN security council resolution 1325 on “women, peace and security”. International Studies Quarterly, 57(4), 772–783.
- Pratt, N., & Richter-Devroe, S. (2011). Critically examining UNSCR 1325 on women, peace and security. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 489–503. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611658>.
- Puechguirbal, N. (2010). Discourses on gender, patriarchy and resolution 1325: A textual analysis of UN documents. International Peacekeeping, 17(2), 172–187. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533311003625068>.
- Rolls, S. B., & Rolls, S. (2019). WPS and the Pacific Islands forum. In S. E. Davies & J. True (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of women, peace, and security. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Shepherd, L. J. (2008). Gender, violence and security: Discourse as practice. London: Zed Books.
- Shepherd, L. J. (2011). Sex, security and superhero(in)Es: From 1325 to 1820 and beyond. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 504–521. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2011.611659>.
- Shepherd, L. J. (2016). Making war safe for women? National Action Plans and the militarisation of the women, peace and security agenda. International Political Science Review, 37(3), 324–335. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116629820>.
- Shepherd (she/her/hers), L. J. (2020). Situating women, peace and security: Theorizing from “the local”. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 456–461. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1796262>.
- Singh (she/her/hers), S. (2020). In between the Ulemas and local warlords in Afghanistan: Critical perspectives on the “everyday,” norm translation, and UNSCR 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 504–525. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1810587>.
- Swaine, A. (2009). Assessing the potential of National Action Plans to advance implementation of United Nations security council resolution 1325. Yearbook of International Humanitarian Law, 12, 403–433.
- Tamang (she/her/hers), D. (2020). Rethinking “participation” in women, peace and security discourses: Engaging with “non-participant” Women's movements in the eastern borderlands of India. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 22(4), 485–503. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2020.1803098>.
- Thomson, J., & Pierson, C. (2018). Can abortion rights be integrated into the women, peace and security agenda? International Feminist Journal of Politics, 20(3), 350–365. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14616742.2017.1413583>.
- True, J. (2016). Explaining the global diffusion of the women, peace and security agenda. International Political Science Review, 37(3), 307–323. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116632372>.
- Wibben, A. T. R., Confortini, C. C., Roohi, S., Aharoni, S. B., Vastapu, L., & Vaittinen, T. (2019). Collective discussion: Piecing-up feminist peace research. International Political Sociology, 13(1), 86–107. <https://doi.org/10.1093/ips/oly034>.
- Wright, K. A. M., Hurley, M., & Gil Ruiz, J. I. (2019). NATO, gender and the military: Women organising from within. London: Routledge.
- Wright, K. A. M. (2016). NATO'S adoption of UNSCR 1325 on women, peace and security: Making the agenda a reality. International Political Science Review, 37(3), 350–361. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0192512116638763>.

Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT)

Ibrahim Natil
Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Civil society organizations (CSOs); Empowerment; Human rights; Occupied Palestinian Territories; Peacebuilding; Women's engagement

Description

This chapter discusses women's engagement in community peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT). It also considers the importance of women's community-based and participative education as an agent of peacebuilding. Palestinian women have been subject to various cycles of political violence and remain among the most vulnerable groups confronting domestic and political violence as a serious threat to both their civic engagement and community participation. The chapter also examines the relationship between women leaders and Palestinian civil society organizations (CSOs) in trying to eliminate the phenomenon of domestic violence against women in the OPT. The chapter concludes that the challenges of foreign occupation and political and domestic violence hinder the progress of women's efforts to contribute to community peacebuilding including education development in the OPT.

Introduction

Palestinian women actively participate in popular, community peacebuilding education and collective public activities to try to shape their own future in the context of occupation and colonization (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39). The power of participatory civil society is reflected to meet the vision of engaging women in civic actions and freedom of expression. Their narratives and roles also contribute to the introduction of long-term changes in attitudes, stereotypes, and prejudices and to promote women's rights and foster tolerance and understanding of the "other" by applying lessons learnt from other conflicts in the world (Paffenholz and Spurk 2010, pp. 66–76). Women, however, may view their representation as an outcome of empowerment according to the cultural context of their society. This chapter shares case studies of women with lived experiences of grassroots community peacebuilding education and development activities in the OPT. A teacher, for example, employed peacebuilding education; a specialist/leader employs active listening and mediation to solve family and social problems; and two civil society activists engage in community development and human rights programs, implementing community participatory approaches to grassroots peacebuilding education. These stories of women community peacebuilders, their challenges, and achievements introduce the grassroots approach to civil society peacebuilding rather than top-down formal state institutions (Noma et al. 2012, pp. 7–32).

To what extent women's community peacebuilding programs delivered by local CSOs has altered the ways that women think about their way of life? These programs have made significant headway in changing women's attitudes in terms of grassroots and community peacebuilding. Women contribute to community peacebuilding and education activities, to enhance their participation in decision-making processes and increase their power to decide on future change. The example of women empowerment projects funded by Western donors in the OPT is used to clarify the linkages between women's activities in grassroots community peacebuilding via civil society organizations (CSOs).

Definitions

To understand the active participation and power of women in community peacebuilding activism and engagement, it is essential to study (Aragones and SánchezPagés 2009, pp. 56–72), who define participatory democracy as a process of collective decision-making where citizens have the power to decide on change. Women's active participation and engagement in local organizations, student unions, political groups, movements, and CSOs was a form of "participatory democracy" responding to the shifting political landscape in the OPT. The article also considers the Palestinian civil society organizations (CSOs) in delivering women's community peacebuilding and development activities. The article is based on research which analyzes the role of CSOs in promoting women's contribution to community peacebuilding and development in OPT. Intervention by civil society organizations in community peacebuilding is considered where the core approach of active engagement of women is identified from democracy theory (Paffenholz and Spurk 2010, p. 65).

Activation of participatory democracy of civil society is to promote community peacebuilding engagement. This approach is to draw upon the theory of "participatory democracy" based on "civil society intervention" in order to examine the impact of civil society programs (Paffenholz and Spurk 2010, pp. 66–76). Some Palestinian civil society organizations (CSOs) are involved in promoting citizens' engagement in grassroots activism. Women's engagement and empowerment, however, in OPT have been an important topic for international organizations for several years (Baliamoune Lutz 2016, pp. 320–341). This empowerment can be understood through the lens of security, transformative change, and participation (Porter 2013, pp. 1–14). Women, Michael Porter (2007) writes, have long been distinguished at the forefront of peacebuilding efforts. Their engagement in grassroots peacebuilding is much more visible, while men take part in the formal political process (Potter 2008, pp. 142–143).

The new social media tools and older forms of communication are employed in civil society activities to promote and encourage active participation, tolerance, better understanding, balanced reporting, and objectivity and end the violence against women. Women's community peacebuilding activities of CSOs also aim at rebuilding mutual trust through capacity building, activating marginalized groups of young people, and launching joint development policies and strategies (Paffenholz and Spurk 2010, pp. 66–76).

Practice and engagement take place through a transparent and effective political system where young people can participate and engage freely without any social or political restrictions. Power intervention by civil society organizations is a participatory process reflected by different mechanisms and processes, for example, through CSOs, universities, public institutions, local councils, political parties, and the decision-making process (Paffenholz and Spurk 2010, pp. 66–76).

In the early months of the Oslo Peace Process, CSOs participated in the early days of "state institution building," hoping for peace and prosperity based on human rights and for democracy, justice, and the rule of law. The PA, however, was unable to respond rapidly to the social and economic demands and the needs of desperate residents of the OPT; it was dramatically weakened by Israeli activity as well as by the deteriorating economic situation (Natil 2015). CSOs, on the other hand, proved that they could deliver a model of services managed by professional teams. CSOs have been considered crucial stakeholders in the Palestinian territories, mobilizing and empowering society as key drivers of political and societal change processes. They deliver actions in the fields of human rights, community development, conflict resolution, sports, and women's empowerment (Natil 2014).

This approach is tested by conducting ten interviews with activists who have already worked for and engaged in community peacebuilding activities. Also considered is the existing literature's emphasis on a narrow, classical definition of civil society and young women's activism and participation in community peacebuilding. There are specific studies in the context of civil society activism and peacebuilding in the conflict area (Paffenholz 2010). The author also used participatory observation, in addition to reviewing the existing literature, to enrich the argument and to understand the historical approach of women and their civil society's engagement in community peacebuilding.

Historical and Political Violence Context

The grave situation of women in the OPT has been increasing, owing to the various cycles of violence mentioned above, since the establishment of the Israeli State and the violent expulsion of Palestinians from their homeland in 1948 (Farah 2006, p. 231). The creation of Israel and its ethnic cleansing of more than 750,000 Palestinians from their homes and land forced them into the life of a refugee (Bastaki 2017, p. 5). These Palestinians became refugees in different locations and today are mostly located in the West Bank and East Jerusalem, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, and the Gaza Strip (Hulal 1992, pp. 33–74). The Palestinian refugee population grew up naturally in these locations, and, as the United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) indicates, “some 5 million Palestine refugees are eligible for UNRWA services in its area of operations” (Natil 2016b, pp. 78–82).

Political violence represents a major challenge for women's integration, advancement, and engagement in the development of their society in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT). Violence also limits women's access to resources and prevents them from enjoying their rights as human beings. It obstructs their contribution to development and empowerment. Violence against women is a widespread phenomenon in all countries of the world, owing to a range of cultural, educational, environmental, and economic factors and causes. The UN General Assembly defines violence against women as:

any act of gender-based violence that results in, or is likely to result in, physical, sexual or mental harm or suffering to women, including threats of such acts, coercion or arbitrary deprivation of liberty, whether occurring in public or in private life. (UNGA 1993)

Since this recognition, the UN, as well as several governments, INGOs, and CSOs have increased their efforts toward the elimination of violence against women and gender inequality, highlighting a woman's right to be free from violence. There have been many CSOs supported by some technical support and funding from some international donors that represent a safe place for many victims and marginalized and vulnerable groups including women in many conflict zones. Women living in the OPT, for example, have been subject to various cycles of violence under Israeli occupation as the first Intifada (uprising) (1987–1993), the second Intifada (2000–2004), and three different wars on the Gaza Strip in 2008–2009, 2012, and 2014 (Natil 2015).

Women have remained the most marginalized group confronting violence in the OPT, and it has weakened their civic engagement and community participation (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39). This violence remains a major challenge to women's social and political engagement and empowerment as Randa Siniora general director of the Women's Centre for Legal Aid and Counselling in Palestine said before the UN Security council:

The Israeli occupation and the resulting humanitarian crisis are deeply gendered and exacerbate existing gender inequalities. Women disproportionately endure the violence of occupation borne by all Palestinians, and often with gender-specific consequences. (Ratcliffe 2019)

In addition to the human rights abuses suffered by Palestinian women as a result of Israeli violence, they also are subjected to a system of laws and norms that result in them becoming marginalized within Palestinian society (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39). According to the Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics, about 37% of women who ever been married were exposed to one form of violence by their partner – 29.9% in the West Bank and 51.1% in Gaza Strip (PCBS 2017). This had already made some women to live with their situation and life with their violent intimate partner because of their failure to alter their partner's behavior (Baloushah 2019, pp. 2332–2336). This suffering has increased in the Gaza Strip since the 2014 Israeli war named “Operation Protective Edge.” 26,733 women with their families lost their homes because of the Israeli-wrought destruction (Koek et al. 2015). Nickolay Mladenov, the United Nations Special Coordinator for the Middle East Peace Process, following his first visit to the Gaza Strip on 29 April 2015, said:

No human being who visits can remain untouched by the terrible devastation that one sees here in Gaza, and as shocking as the devastation of the buildings might be, the devastation of people's livelihoods is 10 times more shocking. (UNRWA 2015)

This operation created a new environment of destruction, family displacement, and overloaded surviving families with devastating psychological problems. It damaged or destroyed 17,800 housing units and left 100,000 Gazans displaced and more than 2251 dead (UNOCHA 2017). The majority of those killed were Palestinian civilians, compared with 66 Israeli military fatalities, 5 Israeli civilian casualties, and 1 Thai civilian killed (UNOCHA 2017). Those displaced Palestinians lost not only their homes but also their dignity, when they found themselves without any shelter. In addition, they also suffered from serious psychological problems because of the three large Israeli military offensives that caused a major loss of life and the destruction of an already impoverished infrastructure (Koek et al. 2015).

This created a massive challenge for local CSOs as they struggled to meet citizens' needs and demands, not least because resources are sorely lacking after 13 years of Israeli blockade on the Gaza Strip. The blockade was imposed in response to the election of a Hamas government following Palestinian elections in 2006. A subsequent internal Palestinian feud resulted in Hamas taking control of the Gaza Strip and the Fatah movement of the West Bank (Natil 2015).

Throughout the blockade, CSOs have struggled to deliver a range of services, aimed at the promotion of women's engagement in participatory grassroots processes despite living in a high level of violence under foreign occupation, poverty, and conservatism in the OPT. The Palestinian CSOs represent various spectrums of social, cultural, and political backgrounds that have already delivered a range of actions to eliminate violence against women despite a shifting political landscape. They hope to increase women's resilience and civic engagement via a process of participatory grassroots activities in decision-making to help integrate them into the development of their society. They also try to enhance awareness of citizens in response to violence, in order to assist policy-makers in planning and resource allocation. Some CSOs also cooperate with international organizations and donors to identify possible points of intervention by examining factors associated with a heightened risk of violence. They test and employ tools and information that contribute to evaluation efforts of eliminating violence by peacebuilding education and practices.

Peacebuilding Education

Women are often described as victims and marginalized in leading formal political and institutional processes (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39), but they are powerful agents for community peacebuilding education in the context of conflict (Arostegui 2013, pp. 533–549). Hanan Hroub, a teacher from Dheisheh refugee camp in the West Bank, for example, promoted practices and concepts of peacebuilding education and practices in her class. Education is a significant tool for the Palestinians to struggle peacefully and represent their identity and society in the international arena. The Varkey Foundation, an international organization that supports education worldwide, awarded Hanan Hroub the Global Teacher Prize for her teaching excellence on 14 March 2016. Hroub employed a technique of “play and learn” to provide peace, harmony, and security to her students who had special education needs owing to the long foreign occupation (Natil 2016a).

Based on participatory approaches, the priority of young women and the entire female community in the OPT is now to accommodate and provide the basic needs for their families and children who witnessed the many cycles of violence and subsequent military operations under the occupation of Palestine. They are encouraged to emulate Hanan Al Hroub in her success story of employing new techniques of community peacebuilding. She competed against 8000 international applicants to win the $1 million prize, presented to her at a ceremony in the United Arab Emirates (UAE). She grew up in Dheisheh Refugee Camp, and her family suffered from the violence of occupation when her husband, Omar, and two of her daughters were shot by Israeli soldiers at a checkpoint near Bethlehem. Dheisheh Refugee Camp is located in the West Bank City of Bethlehem. Hanan's husband, a lawyer, was injured in the shoulder, and her daughters were traumatized. She won the global prize, owing to her philosophy to influence the children in her own classroom.

In addition to Hanan's story of success at the international platforms, there have been a number of female teachers who promote values such as tolerance, human rights, and conflict resolution at UNRWA schools in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. UNRWA is the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which was established on 8 December 1949 to support Palestinian refugees. UNRWA manages schools, food aid, clinics, and hospitals as it strives to deliver vital services to refugees (Gunnarsdóttir 2006, pp. 10–12). In order to assist in social healing, UNRWA mentors a network of 104 grassroots centers, managed by volunteers, 63% of whom are women (Gunnarsdóttir 2006, pp. 10–12). These centers continue to deliver support to women refugees in the form of activities related to socializing and culture, and they also provide education and recreation services. UNRWA is mandated to provide social, health, and education services for all Palestinian refugees. It delivers operations under the aegis of its "human development and humanitarian services" (UNRWA 2016).

In 2001, UNRWA introduced its Human Rights, Conflict Resolution and Tolerance (HRCRT) Programme for delivery across all grades and schools in each of UNRWA's five fields of operation in the West Bank, the Gaza Strip, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon. UNRWA developed textbooks that promote concepts of conflict resolution through school programs which teach human rights, tolerance, and conflict resolution. HRCRT relies upon international human rights codes including the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the Convention on the Rights of the Child, and the World Programme for Human Rights Education, which is coordinated by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (Pinto 2014, pp. 57–74). Human rights education (HRE) plays an essential role in establishing the structure and bases needed for a proper transition to a stable society (Bar-Tal and Rosen 2009, pp. 557–575).

Implementation of UNRWA's human rights and conflict resolution program involved the training and hiring of female teachers charged with implementing it in schools (Natil 2016b, pp. 78–82). Despite these strenuous efforts, UNRWA has still drawn criticism from local groups in the Gaza Strip which claim that the program ignores Palestinian suffering. However, despite these challenges, some local CSOs have sought to implement informal grassroots activities of education including training and awareness of community peacebuilding and conflict resolution in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Those organizations have succeeded in working with a number of international organizations and donors to implement community peacebuilding and conflict transformation activities. This was a help to engage young women in community activities that train them in dialogue and peacebuilding (Natil 2016b, pp. 78–82).

Foreign aid remains essential for civil society, peacebuilding, and development programs' implementation (Balioune Lutz 2016, pp. 320–341). UNRWA, however, has been dealing with the most severe financial crisis since its establishment after the Trump administration withdrew its contributions to UNRWA which amounted to $359.3 million in 2017 (Zanotti 2018). This included $231.5 million of 2017 bilateral economic assistance that was originally intended for the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, including $25 million for East Jerusalem hospitals. USAID also ended its assistance to the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip (Zanotti 2018).

This funding cut has had a very serious impact on UNRWA and the local Palestinian CSOs. This cut has increased challenges of CSOs to respond to new massive challenges as they struggle to meet citizens' needs and demands efficiently, not least because resources are sorely lacking after years of blockades in the Gaza Strip (Srouf 2018). As Al samak suggests:

[The] aid cut will increase citizens' suffering and the pressures on the PA, and UNRWA, but the solidarity among various categories of the society may ease pressures for political causes and this may encourage the international community to get engaged once again. (Samak 2018)

UNRWA and CSOs cannot implement its programs or operations without international aid and assistance.

Participatory Approach

UNRWA has particularly implemented programs with a participatory approach to learning which aims to raise women's awareness "with an understanding of their place in the world and a common set of key values, including women's empowerment and gender equality" while also "helping them develop the skills to thrive as adults in an evolving, challenging landscape" (UNRWA 2016).

Local CSOs have implemented civil society activities to target and educate a large number of young women on the values and community education of democracy, human rights, and peacebuilding. Meanwhile, some CSOs are trying to engage young women via a holistic approach which combines discussions and dialogue, coalition-building, interviews, and various interactions between the young people themselves and other stakeholders. These select initiatives are informed by need-based design processes, and so they are responsive to the broader political changes taking place around them and able to adapt to the specific requirements of the younger elements within the population. Politicians often mobilize women and their CSOs to get elected and to achieve very narrow political interests regardless of good governance practices, active grassroots engagement, and community participation (Amer 2018). Women's activists, leaders, and/or CSOs have no real influence over public policies and record a very low level of civic participation. Women who call for change, improving human rights, democracy, and peacebuilding face a number of social and political threats (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39). Women are banned from freedom of expression, media freedom, the right of association, and the right to organize peaceful actions and marches (Siam 2016).

There has been, however, an increasing number of women who challenge the social and cultural context and who are willing to claim their inheritance rights as a result of awareness-raising and assistance through the lawyers of CSOs. Women are entitled to inherit valuables such as money, property, jewelry, etc. from a deceased parent. There have been a number of cases in which women were deprived of their inheritance. The Palestinian Centre for Democracy and Conflict Resolution (PCDCR), for example, uses an approach which fosters mediation and negotiation techniques with women's mukhtars together with legal experts to attempt to resolve community disputes between women and their families (Koek et al. 2015).

Mukhtars is a traditional conflict resolution specialist, not elected, or a professional mediator/arbitrator. These women's initiatives aim to transform conflict through methodologies of education and training, and they seek to empower young people and women by engaging them in community participation actions. Some CSOs use education to promote reconciliation and dialogue within the community between various competing Palestinian groups. Women's involvement in community activities is a core principle of conflict resolution and community peacebuilding approaches which also promote dialogue and other peacebuilding mechanisms and tools (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39).

These CSOs' operations contribute to women's defiance, resilience, and public freedoms, for example, the Society Voice Foundation's project titled "Empowerment of women's civic engagement and public freedoms" funded by a German-based organization, Women's Prayers Committee, and delivered in the Gaza Strip (Amer 2016). This project targeted 120 women aged 22–35 and trained them in the techniques of empowerment and participation such as radio programs, awareness sessions, writing media outlets, and monitoring local councils' activities from a gender perspective (Amer 2016). Fida Amer led the project, and a local evaluator assessed the impact of the project on the target group, which received positive feedback from participants. In 2016, she also led a local project, in partnership with the Human Rights and International Humanitarian Law (IHL) Secretariat, to raise the voices of internally displaced persons (IDPs) who lost their homes during the 2014 war. The project aimed at working with displaced families and understanding their issues. Active listening to displaced women is a crucial point of understanding their needs and voices (Amer 2016).

This project's activities, for example, could provide a real indication of changes occurring in the lives of young women leaders who are empowered in the techniques of leadership capacity with emphasis on freedom of expression, community/voluntary work, elimination of all forms of discrimination against women, and engagement in community peacebuilding. Palestinian society in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank has been living in very severe circumstances with a lack of human security at different levels, owing to the absence of peace process and economic development and internal Palestinian division. Palestinian women, during this period, therefore, have witnessed an unprecedented state of poor public freedoms and sociopolitical deadlock at all levels, owing to the paralyzed political system, social and geographic division, and the hardship of poor economic life (Al Mour 2016). Despite women's engagement in community peacebuilding activities through CSOs, there have been some local criticisms from activists and professionals.

Local Criticism

There have been, however, a number of women activists who believe that international funding has promoted the concept of women's community participation (Samak 2016). Some donors, however, have special agendas and conditions attached to specific community activities and do not support some women's organizations that sympathized with certain political groups (Al Mour 2016). However, there are some donors who have no political or conditional agendas. Foreign aid also made limited contributions to women's political participation because the projects' funding, target groups, and duration were limited (Amer 2016). These projects, however, raised women's awareness of issues during elections such as laws, campaign management, advocacy, and building alliances between various political and social groups of mutual interest (Siam 2016).

Gender awareness has not been a Palestinian priority as it is imported from international donors and CSOs responded to the call of proposals, launched by donors (Murad 2015). It also redirected the priorities of women according to the donors' agenda, and women's organizations wasted time and resources in seeking funding to remain in operation rather than focusing on women's needs (Al Mour 2016).

These concepts enlighten and raise women's awareness of modern issues of empowerment, organizing themselves and participating in social and political activities; however, these women's organizations have been unable to influence marginalized women and introduce a positive change (Al Samak 2016). CSOs have limited capacity to challenge and contribute to the policy-making processes that could tackle poverty alleviation and civil society empowerment, and this is because they face an unstable political environment and funding crises. In addition to these challenges facing CSOs in the field of women's empowerment, major INGOs often control and monopolize resources. For example, both local and INGOs often submit applications in response to the same funding calls made by major international donors such as the European Union (EU), the United States Agency for International Development (USAID), and other governments and agencies (Natil 2016b, pp. 78–82).

INGOs often prove more successful than their local counterparts in bids to secure funding because they can draw on advanced technical capacities and expertise as well as significant established networks of contacts to win over donors. Similarly, it is easier for INGOs to acquire funding for its programs and overheads from donor governments than it is for CSOs to achieve the same results. As a result, many INGOs work directly with the beneficiaries of aid and avoid direct partnership with CSOs, and highly trained staff are recruited from outside the region. This situation weakens the capacity of local CSOs which, when they are involved at all, are treated as subcontractors rather than as partners (Murad 2015).

These challenges influence the sustainability of CSOs, for example, working for women's community peacebuilding and development. They also affect their capacity to provide rapid responses to women's need in general and to cater for women's social and political participation empowerment in particular. Many donors, for example, who pledged to donate $5 billion to the Palestinian territories, of which $3.5 billion intended to support rebuilding the Gaza Strip at the Cairo conference of October 2015 (World Bank 2018). Delays in receiving foreign aid also affected women's humanitarian circumstances who have been waiting to rebuild their houses since 2014. This delay in foreign aid to women CSOs has already negatively affected the capacity of women to influence and participate in political structures. Fida Amer, a civil society activist, said:

the aid cut has already left a negative impact on cooperation between UNRWA and wide spectrums of CSOs and NGOs as thousands of target groups were deprived from services in the refugee camps in the Gaza Strip. (Amer 2016)

Women's CSOs could not take a role in the reconstruction process of the Gaza Strip after the destructive war of 2014, despite the fact that the process was controlled by few officials without the real participation of women (Siam 2016). Major INGOs continue to have a limited impact on women's empowerment and incur high operational expenses. Some INGOs also play a role in weakening the women's movement by relying on international donations and its leaders, despite having aims of promoting the concepts and values of women's social and political participation (Jad 2018, pp. 31–39).

Local women who work on civil society issues as community peacebuilding and development, however, form an integral part of the local context and contribute to the delivery of important developmental and nation-building agendas. It is crucial that local communities endorse women empowerment programming that is designed to help young women to better understand their rights. It is also important that internationally funded projects do not ignore the Middle East conflict's historical and political context and the contribution of women to the Palestinian cause. It is hoped that these programs will provoke the transformation of women into peacebuilders and advocates for human rights practice and education both before and after any comprehensive peace agreement prevails. The funded work with young women will continue to have very limited impact on the peace and development agenda for as long as the occupation and division maintain a status quo that is characterized by violence and fragmentation.

Conclusion

This chapter examined the efforts and endeavors of CSOs to support women's community peacebuilding by organizing activities for capacity building training, community education, monitoring and advocacy, research and field studies, awareness, and media outlets. However, there are still women who have been neglected and excluded from community development and democratic participation including peacebuilding at the formal institutional level.

Sharing information about their achievements and challenges in peacebuilding at the grassroots and national and international context of conflict is relevant to women's social and political empowerment. Documenting and sharing their stories through well-designed platforms at grassroots and international level show how they become agents for empowerment, change, peace-making, and peacebuilding in their own communities. Social cohesion and active political participation in a pluralistic society are essential components of stabilization and peacebuilding. Cultural diversity and the political participation of various social and political actors, including women's engagement, also enrich social cohesion in accountable and transparent political systems of democratic societies. These societies are also arguably strong enough to withstand new challenges and changes. Divided and undemocratic societies, however, are unable to absorb sudden and shocking challenges like those which have occurred in the Occupied Palestinian Territories (OPT) of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank including Jerusalem.

Many Palestinian women, however, have made an exceptional contribution to their society through practices and concepts of community peacebuilding, development, and education. Despite the absence of peace, ongoing foreign occupation, and conservatism, some women still challenge the complicated circumstances to contribute to social change and development process based on community peacebuilding and human rights education and practice. Community peacebuilding, however, involves community and individual grassroots creative initiatives by ordinary people caught in the Palestinian conflict context, and their voices are seldom heard beyond their communities.

This empowerment can be a part of the change process and impact on the coordination and cooperation of women's groups in undertaking effective actions and campaigns, in order to make change a reality in terms of community peacebuilding education, practices, and development. Women have the power to contribute to the development of their society by participating in community education and in nonviolent actions, as well as being part of organizations for nonprofit activities.

The tradition of the policies is to empower women, and the major foreign funding for many civil society organizations is based on women's empowerment in the areas of intervention and delivery. CSOs learn the importance of women's participation, and their taking part in community activities has an impact on the development and social change process. CSOs participate in civic activities to learn about the needs of women, and again their taking part is important because it contributes to the transfer of women's empowerment concepts to male groups, helping to increase support for women in society.

Peace, relief, and development operations of CSOs, therefore, face a variety of serious challenges owing to the highly hostile political environment and absence of peace and human security at all levels. The inhabitants of the Gaza Strip have been living in inhumane circumstances since 2006. The region is isolated from the rest of the world by closure and a complicated range of restrictions on the movements of both people and goods. This environment with escalated violence from time to time has already made women's grassroots participation in empowerment activities impossible, as the local organizations need time to assist women and their families to recover from and accommodate each cycle of violence. CSOs increased the number of women leaders who contributed to their society and achieved a number of successful stories in different fields. Their contributions have already made a huge difference in that they encourage more women "participation" in the development of their society living under the longest occupation in contemporary history.

CSOs have attempted to create a new space for women's social and political engagement by managing community development, post-conflict reconstruction, democracy, and good governance as well as improving humanitarian lives and empathy with other cultures. It has been a huge challenge to run community participation programs in a highly politicized and polarized society, such as that of Palestine. Thus, they seek to use civil society values to enhance engagement of the marginalized groups to gain a voice and participate actively in proposing and implementing public policy agenda. CSOs also aim at promoting local networks among CSOs to stimulate a national debate between young people and decision-makers, focusing on themes of active participation and civic engagement. These community activities have been challenged by a number of internal and external circumstances and factors that have included violence and occupation.

Young women use social media to raise awareness of their problems and rights, bringing them into line with respective international standards, as well as establishing networks of information. Another aim of the CSOs is to promote freedom of expression through new media and advocacy campaigns including preparing, designing, broadcasting, and circulating materials and organizing activities to foster a free press, in order to eliminate technical and cultural obstacles facing women's contributions to a peaceful public life. The activities aim at promoting active participation with emphasis on their freedom of expression. They also aim at strengthening the basis for civil society dialogue, community peacebuilding practices, and democratic discourse, with particular emphasis on women in media environment.

These activities, within which the target groups raise their voices, contribute, therefore, to institutionalize active civic participation, engagement, and good governance practices. For example, young trainees attempt to put their new skills and knowledge of community participation into practice by engaging and leading community actions. They elect their representatives to assess and monitor the performances of local councils in their districts from a community participation perspective. These young women have had a worthwhile opportunity of enhancing civic engagement practices in addition to participating in social accountability campaigns. To this end and in keeping with these principles, many civil society organizations ensure that the implementation of activities remains inclusive and as broad-based as possible.

Women activists also adopt a consensus seeking active participation in implementing the major phases of this process by seeking the input and engagement of young people, grassroots network members, and other partners at the various phases of implementation of community projects. They consider the methodology of active participation that entails understanding the beneficiaries' needs by being on the ground and introducing change incrementally. They sometimes use a holistic approach combining discussions and dialogue, coalition building, interviews, and a variety of interactions with the target groups and other stakeholders. For example, civil society organizations endeavored to make training and campaigning activities as creative and engaging as possible, without duplicating previous efforts.

The international community must, therefore, renew its efforts to increase support for women as agents for peacebuilding and human rights education and practice in the OPT. The international community must exert significant influence over decision-making policy to work creatively to achieve justice and establish human rights which include respect for the rights of women and their movement according to international law. Within the OPT, international donors must prioritize female empowerment that is centered on social and economic development community. In their funding of such initiatives, they should also address the shortage of funding provided to local CSOs that work with women.

References

- Al Mour, T., Journalist, Gaza, interviewed by author, 10 May 2016.
- Al Samak, H., Aid Watch, Gaza, Interviewed by author, 21 April 2016 and 27 March 2018.
- Amer, F., Director, Society Voice Foundation, Gaza. Interviewed by author, 7 May 2016 and 7 February 2018.
- Aragones, E., & SánchezPagés, S. (2009). A theory of participatory democracy based on the real case of Porto Alegre. European Economic Review, 53(1), 56–72.
- Arostegui, J. (2013). Gender, conflict, and peace-building: How conflict can catalyse positive change for women. Gender and Development, 21(3), 533–549. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13552074.2013.846624>.
- Bali moune Lutz, M. (2016). The effectiveness of foreign aid to women's equality organisations in the MENA. Journal of International Development, 28, 320–341. Online library (wileyonlinelibrary.com). <https://doi.org/10.1002/jid.3214>.
- Baloushah, S. (2019). Learn to live with it: Lived experience of Palestinian women suffering from intimate partner violence. Journal of Family Medicine and Primary Care, 8(7), 2332–2336. https://doi.org/10.4103/jfmpe.jfmpe_330_19.
- Bar-Tal, D., & Rosen, Y. (2009). Peace education in societies involved in intractable conflicts: Direct and indirect models. Review of Educational Research, 79, 557–575.
- Bastaki, J. (2017). The legacy of the 1951 refugee convention and Palestinian refugees: Multiple displacements, multiple exclusions. Berk J Middle East & Islamic Law, 8, 1.
- Farah, R. (2006). Palestinian refugees. Interventions, 8(2), 228–252. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13698010600781040>.
- Gunnarsdóttir, G. (2006). UNRWA: Assisting Palestine refugees in a challenging environment. Forced Migration Review, (26), 10–12.
- Hulal, J. (1992). West Bank and Gaza strip: Social formation under Jordanian and Egyptian rule 1948–1967. Review of the Middle East Studies, 5, 33–74.

- Jad, I. (2018). The Palestinian women's activism: Nationalism, secularism and Islamism. New York: Syracuse University Press.
- Koek, E., Clutterbuck, M., & Kafarna, W. (2015). Gaza: The impact of conflict on women. Norwegian Refugee Council. <https://www.nrc.no/globalassets/pdf/reports/gaza%2D%2D-the-impact-of-conflict-on-women.pdf>. Accessed 6 Feb 2019.
- Murad, N. L. (2015). Donor complicity in Israel's violations of Palestinian rights. Al-Shabaka. <https://al-shabaka.org/briefs/donor-complicity-in-israels-violations-of-palestinian-rights/>. Accessed 3 Dec 2015.
- Natil, I. (2014). A shifting political landscape: NGOs' civic activism and response in the Gaza Strip, 1967–2014. Journal of Peacebuilding and Development, 9(3), 82–87. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2014.983369>
- Natil, I. (2015). Hamas transformation: Opportunities and challenges. Newcastle: Cambridge Scholars Publishing.
- Natil, I. (2016a). The empowered, resilient women of Palestine. Independent Australia. <https://independen-taustralia.net/politics/politics-display/the-empowered-resilient-women-of-palestine,8992>. Accessed 8 Jan 2019.
- Natil, I. (2016b). The challenges and opportunities of donor-driven aid to youth refugees in Palestine. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 11(2), 78–82. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2016.1197791>.
- Noma, E., Aker, D., & Freeman, J. (2012). Heeding women's voices: Breaking cycles of conflict and deepening the concept of peacebuilding. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 7(1), 7–32. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2012.719384>.
- Paffenholz, T. (2010). Civil Society & Peacebuilding: A critical assessment. Boulder: Lynne Rienner. The United States of America.
- Paffenholz, T., & Spurr, C. (2010). A comprehensive analytical framework. In Paffenholz, T. (ed.), Civil Society & Peacebuilding: A Critical Assessment. Boulder: Lynne Rienner. The United States of America.
- Palestinian Central Bureau of Statistics (PCBS). (2017). Press release on the eve of the International Women's Day, 7 March 2017. <http://www.pcbs.gov.ps/post.aspx?lang=en&ItemID=1866>
- Pinto, G. (2014). A cultural occupation? UNRWA's human rights, conflict resolution and tolerance programme: Perspectives from balata camp. Journal of Doctoral Research in Education, 14(2), 57–74.
- Porter, E. (2007) Peacebuilding: Women in International Perspective. Routledge. The USA and Canada.
- Porter, E. (2013). Rethinking Women's empowerment. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 8(1), 1–14. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2013.785657>.
- Potter, M. (2008). Women, civil society and peace-building in Northern Ireland: Paths to peace through women's empowerment. In C. Farrington (Ed.), Global change, civil society and the Northern Ireland peace process implementing the political settlement. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Ratcliffe, R. (2019). Women in Palestine face violence and political exclusion, campaigner tells UN. <https://www.theguardian.com/global-development/2018/oct/26/women-palestine-face-violence-political-exclusion-campaigner-tells-un-randa-siniora>. Accessed 24 Nov 2019.
- Siam, H. (2016). Gaza civil society activist, Interviewed by author on 4 May 2016.
- Srour, M. (2018). A field researcher at a local human rights organisation, Gaza. Interviewed by author on 27 February 2018.
- UN General Assembly Resolution. (1993). 48/104, Declaration on the elimination of violence against women, 20 December. <http://www.un.org/documents/ga/res/48/a48r104.htm>. Accessed 8 Jan 2019.
- UNOCHA. (2017). Three years on from 2014 conflict, 29000 people remain displaced. <https://www.ochaopt.org/content/three-years-2014-conflict-29000-people-remain-displaced>. Accessed 27 Jan 2019.
- UNRWA. (2015). Gaza Situations Report 91. <https://www.unrwa.org/newsroom/emergency-reports/gaza-situation-report-91>. Accessed 25 Jan 2019.
- UNRWA. (2016). What we do: Education. <http://www.unrwa.org/what-we-do/education>. Accessed 9 Mar 2016.
- World Bank. (2018). Reconstructing Gaza-Donors pledges. <http://www.worldbank.org/en/programs/rebuilding-gaza-donor-pledges>. Accessed 27 Jan 2019.
- Zanotti, J. (2018). U.S. Foreign Aid to the Palestinians, Congressional Research Services, 12 December. <https://fas.org/sgp/crs/mideast/RS22967.pdf>. Accessed 7 Feb 2019.

Women's Engagement

- ▶ Women's Community Peacebuilding in the Occupied Palestinian Territories \(OPT\)

Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF)

Catia Cecilia Confortini
Peace and Justice Studies Program, Wellesley College, Wellesley, MA, USA

Description

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom is the longest-operating and one of the most influential international women's peace organization in the world. Created in 1915 by women from the suffrage, social work, and socialist movements with the goal to stop World War I, it now has members in over 40 national sections in all continents. Its headquarters are located in Geneva, Switzerland, and New York, United States. With consultative status first at the League of Nations and, since 1948, at the United Nations, it has engaged with and challenged the international governance system to advocate for total and universal disarmament, a system for the peaceful resolution of conflicts, the establishment of an economic system based on human needs, and women's right to fully participate in peace processes as well as political institutions. It has been an important organization in the disarmament movement, creating its Reaching Critical Will program to offer feminist advocacy for disarmament and the reduction of global military spending and militarism. It has also played a leading role in the creation and support for the Women, Peace, and Security Agenda of the United Nations, which it follows through its PeaceWomen program. Its work has earned the organization three Nobel Peace Prizes: in 1931, to Jane Addams (WILPF's first International President); in 1946, to Emily Greene Balch (first Secretary General); and in 2017, to Reaching Critical Will as part of the Steering Committee of the International Coalition to Abolish Nuclear Weapons (ICAN).

Introduction

The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom (WILPF) is the longest-operating women's international peace organization in the world and one of the most prominent NGOs associated to the international governance system. It has engaged with governments and intergovernmental organizations to inch toward its twin goals of peace and gender equality through reformist efforts and mainstreaming strategies (Stienstra 1994). But it has also worked outside and sometimes in outright opposition to official structures, pushing the system for more radical changes, through a politics of protest, activism, and movement-building (a strategy of disengagement – Stienstra 1994). These two modes of working have coexisted uneasily but productively within the organization since its creation, as had the tension between essentialist and rights-based arguments for its existence and work. WILPF has continuously interrogated itself about the reasons for organizing for peace as women, and about the meaning and content of peace for women from different backgrounds, economic positions, geographical origins, histories, and political opinions. An organization formed primarily by European and North American middle-to-upper class white women, WILPF has struggled to concretize its theoretical visions of peace and freedom into political and policy stances that would benefit all women equally. This paper will trace the history of WILPF and its internal tensions in three sections: The first will cover the period from the organization's founding to the Second World War; the second will be devoted to the Cold War and post-Cold War periods; and the third will be devoted to the new millennium, starting with the passage of UN Security Council Resolution 1325.

The Beginnings

WILPF has its origins in the International Congress of Women for Permanent Peace, an assembly of about 1,200 women from belligerent and neutral countries, who gathered at The Hague in 1915 with the ambitious goal to stop the ongoing World War I. Prominent, middle-class, white social reformers and suffragettes of the progressive era led the group: Jane Addams and Emily Greene Balch from the United States, Aletta Jacobs from The Netherlands, Rosika Schwimmer from Hungary, Crystall Macmillan and Emmeline Pethick-Lawrence from the UK, and Anita Augspurg and Lida Gustava Heymann from Germany (Bussey and Tims 1980). The origins of the effort in the suffrage, social work, and socialist movements situated the group at the border between conflicting ideological strands, but the urgency of the immediate goal united the women.

At the end of this first assembly, the women issued a statement directed to warring nations that outlined the terms of a future international order based on arbitration, equal rights for women, free trade, total and universal disarmament, and national self-determination. They already envisaged an international organization that would establish the conditions for permanent peace, and “gradually adjusted” the interests and rights of great powers, as well as “weaker countries and primitive peoples” (WILPF 1915). Despite the failure of their wartime efforts, the women met again in 1919 in Zurich, Switzerland. It was there that they constituted and named the organization, with headquarters established in Geneva, the home of the nascent League of Nations, to which they later formally affiliated. The final statement of that Zurich Congress reiterated more in detail the principles set in 1915 and decried the terms of the peace deal as overly harsh economically on the losing nations and as sanctioning a unilateral arms’ buildup. They predicted that such arrangements would only ensure the continuation of the “rule of force,” at the expense of the principle of justice in international relations (WILPF 1919). Significantly for the time, the 1919 resolution also included a formal statement on racial equality, thanks to the tireless advocacy of Mary Church Terrell, an African American civil rights activist and the only woman of color present at the meeting (Terrell 2005; Plastas 2011; Blackwell 2004).

The new organization was organized into national sections, with an international congress as its agenda-setting organ meeting every 3 years, and made up of section representatives. Executive bodies – which over the years changed in name, composition, and numbers — were elected by the congress and included an international president. They were tasked to make political and organizational decisions in between congresses. A Secretary General was to be at the helm of an international secretariat at headquarters. On the one hand, WILPF reflected in this form and mode of organizing the kind of internationalism that remained linked to the state system and nationalism (Sluga 2013). On the other hand, its members also saw themselves as cosmopolitans, whose allegiance was to the international organization, rather than to their countries of origins. Melinda Plastas (2011) calls this “community internationalism.”

In this way, the tension between conformity to and rejection of the state system manifested itself since the very beginning of the organization. Moreover, if modus operandi, authority, and accountability structures were and continue to be debated (sometimes intensely so), so did WILPF’s constitution. From the very beginning, it unambiguously stated that WILPF stood for total and universal disarmament; the support for international law; the peaceful settlement of conflicts; the development of a world organization; an economic system based on human needs, rather than profit; and gender equality in international and national politics. The ways in which these general principles have been outlined and operationalized, however, have changed over the course of WILPF’s existence, reflecting partially changing international conditions and partially internal struggles, developments, and self-reflection (Confortini 2012).

As the organization started working, with Jane Addams as its first International President and Emily Greene Balch as Secretary General, the competing rationales for the work of a women’s peace organization continued to coexist in productive tension. WILPF engaged in both mainstreaming and disengaging initiatives – advocacy at the League of Nations, activism and protest, petition, and information campaigns – alone or in coalitions with other organizations. The organization survived but struggled during the Red Scare of the 1920s and 1930s, when many members in different sections were targeted for radical organizing and alleged Communist activities. Notable among its activities were “fact-finding missions,” to US-occupied Haiti (Plastas 2011; Confortini 2021), Palestine, and Indo-China (Bussey and Tims 1980). In this period, WILPF advocated against chemical warfare, in support of the rights of minorities in Europe, and to demand the diversion of military expenses to economic recovery. In its work for disarmament, it often argued for arms embargoes to parties in conflict (for example, during the Sino-Japanese dispute over Manchuria, the Italian invasion of Ethiopia, and the Spanish Civil War), but many within WILPF noticed how arms embargoes could easily be sidestepped and ultimately favor invading or fascist regimes. It supported the Gandhi-led Indian nonviolent struggle against British imperialism. African American women from the US Section, however, insisted in differentiating Gandhian method of nonviolence (see Chap. 97, ► “Nonviolence and Civil Resistance”) from what the organization called nonresistance (Blackwell 2004; Schott 1997) – again an instance of productive debates over both methods and goals of a women's peace organization.

In the 1930s, Gertrude Baer – who had joined WILPF at the Zurich Congress as a 19 year-old German Jewish delegate – stepped in as Secretary General, taking refuge from Nazi persecution in Switzerland. Baer was to shape the organization's work more closely in collaboration with international organizations, even as the League of Nations gradually became irrelevant and eventually dissolved. As Germany started to rearm, WILPF debated the appropriate response and came to be denigratingly associated with a politics of appeasement (for a careful dissection of those arguments and a more nuanced analysis of peace organizations' actions of the time, see Lynch 1999). World War II put the organization in a hiatus: Gertrude Baer moved to the United States, where she kept WILPF alive. The war decimated WILPF's members, many of whom died, some in concentration camps. The surviving WILPFers were able, nevertheless, to meet again in 1946 in Luxembourg and started planning for a postwar world.

The Postwar World: From a Hot to a Cold War

In Luxembourg in 1946, the women's faith in the possibilities of peace was shaken but not defeated: Many of them had fought and died alongside men and now questioned WILPF's reasons for existing as a women's organization. Others felt that WILPF's existence was more necessary than ever. Ironically, the explosion of the atomic bomb seemed to represent for them an opportunity to make total and universal disarmament a reality: who in their right mind could support rearming with weapons that could destroy the entire planet? The goals they had worked for since 1915 now seemed both necessary and achievable. They resolved to continue working, but in the next two decades, they rarely discussed the relationship between women and peace. Nevertheless they remained committed to work both on peace and women's rights, particularly on equal representation at the United Nations, as soon as they became one of the first NGOs (see section Actors, Institutions and Networks) with consultative status with ECOSOC and other UN agencies in 1948. At the height of the modern liberal era – the late 1940s and through the 1950s – WILPF participated in the international system in ideologically ambivalent ways, working within the UN but never trusting the organization fully, seeing the faults in its Great-Power-dominated structure. This skepticism translated in cautious positions toward UN initiatives, especially around questions that were also fiercely internally debated.

For example, when Gertrude Baer became WILPF's representative to the UN, she initially trusted and supported the Trusteeship Council to move the territories under its jurisdiction slowly toward independence. As the decolonization movement grew, Baer attended the First Asian–African Conference in Bandoeng in 1955, the First All-African People's Conference in Accra in 1958, and the 2nd UN Conference of Non-government Organizations on the Eradication of Prejudice and Discrimination in 1959. These meetings of recently or soon-to-be decolonized states, as well as more informal conversations on the ground, bolstered her critique of colonial powers' engagement with the UN as imbued with racist paternalism, a critique that eventually was shared by WILPF. WILPF's initial cautious optimism toward the decolonization process, the Trusteeship system, and the future of world community in the wake of decolonization was replaced with a consensus in support of struggles for independence, declaring it “a human right to resist injustice and to be neither silent witness nor passive victim of repression” (WILPF 1971). The process of getting to this statement is indicative of the edge WILPF constantly negotiated, within itself and with the world around it, between liberally-aligned positions and more radical, transformational ones (Confortini 2012).

Beginning in the 1960s, WILPF intensified its disengaging strategies as well as its cooperation with other organizations, whether or not affiliated with the UN, including those from beyond the Iron Curtain. WILPF's statements in the 1970s condemned both racial injustice and "an economic system based on production for profit rather than production for human needs" as ultimately responsible for both "cold" and "hot" wars. They also linked more explicitly women's emancipation with "the achievement of peace and the relaxation of international tension" (WILPF 1974).

The UN Women's Conferences

The reflection over women's responsibilities, aptitudes, rights, and roles in bringing about peace went hand-in-hand with WILPF's participation in the UN decade for women (1975–1985) and its associated conferences, as well as its attendance to conferences organized outside of and as an alternative to the UN system. Participation in the international women's rights movement (see Chap. 72, ► "Intersectionality and Peace", and Chap. 53, ► "Gender Justice and Peacebuilding") represented a watershed for the organization, which eventually led to its rise as agenda-setting leader in women, peace, and security issues. In Mexico City (1975), Copenhagen (1980), Nairobi (1985), and in the World Conferences against Racism (Falcón 2016), tensions arose visibly and forcefully between women of the global south and north, around questions of difference and marginality (Garner 2013). Feminists from the global south emphasized the connections among different forms of oppression, whereas those in the north argued for the specificity of women's experiences vis-à-vis men, but downplayed or ignored the differences among women, in regard to race, geopolitical location, and class in particular. Despite its own structural and collective shortcomings in these regards, WILPF joined global south women in criticizing the depoliticization of women's conferences and the marginalization of global south women's concerns. In WILPF's view, women's oppression could not be isolated from other forms of injustice, including imperialism, racism, and an international economic system based on profits rather than human well-being.

At the same time, these international exchanges provided WILPF with the opportunity to bring peace and disarmament to the women's agenda. WILPF spearheaded, for example, Peace Tents at the 1985 Nairobi and 1995 Beijing Conferences, drawing women together to share experiences of conflicts in their societies. Both Nairobi's and Beijing's resulting documents explicitly linked the achievement of peace with women's rights (United Nations 1985 and United Nations 1995).

Notably, WILPF also worked with organizations that refused to be part of the UN framework (for example, the Women's International Democratic Federation and the Pan African Women's Organization) and remained active in anti-militarist and disarmament movements, from Women Strike for Peace in the 1960s to Women's Pentagon Action and the women's peace encampments and marches of the 1980s (see section "Actors, Institutions and Networks; also Eschle 2018), consistently denouncing the human and developmental costs of arms manufacturing and use, global militarization, and war. WILPF supported but also critiqued forcefully several arms control treaties for not going far enough or equitably enough toward universal and total disarmament. The organization's main message emphasized the human and environmental costs of the development, testing, and deployment of nuclear and other types of weapons, as well as their differential gender, race, and class impacts.

Out of the need to coordinate NGO actions around the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty following the failure of its 1995 review conference to reach agreement on a number of contentious issues, WILPF created Reaching Critical Will (RCW) in 1999, the program which would lead WILPF's "analysis and advocacy for disarmament, the reduction of global military spending and militarism, and the investigation of gendered aspects of the impact of weapons and of disarmament processes" (RCW n.d.).

The New Millennium

From women's mobilization at the turn of the millennium came the impetus to influence the UN Security Council in feminist directions by forming a coalition of women's organizations that eventually succeeded in having the UN Security Council adopt its Resolution 1325 in October 2000. UNSCR 1325 was a landmark achievement of feminist activism, acknowledging women's roles and vulnerabilities in armed conflict and their contributions to peace (see section Peace Operations and Missions). It also affirms the need to mainstream gender in peace operations as well as other aspects of UN programming. To monitor the implementation of the resolution and disseminate it across the world, WILPF created the PeaceWomen program, which has coordinated and facilitated information-sharing among women's groups and between them and the UN, translating the resolution in over 60 languages. WILPF and other women's organizations' continued pressure on the UNSC has led to numerous follow-up resolutions, which together now make up the Women Peace and Security Agenda of the UN (WPS).

At the same time as WPS is hailed as "both the product and the armature for a massive mobilization of women's political energy" (Cohn 2004: 8), feminist critics lament its shortcomings. Since the Security Council's initial refusal to contemplate a commitment to disarmament among the resolution's provisions, WILPF in particular has noted that, in the implementation of WPS, feminist analysis has been side-stepped in favor of an agenda dominated and co-opted by states and their militarized security system (see also Chap. 105, ► "Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy"). WILPF claims that women's inclusion in peace processes is important and necessary, but the goal of feminist peace cannot be achieved without a solid critique of the gendered power relations embedded both in armed conflicts and contemporary UN-led peace processes. Moreover, the WPS Agenda fails to address the role of neoliberal capitalism and neocolonial exploitation in creating the conditions for armed conflict. Finally, incorporating WPS into military institutions, such as NATO and domestic militaries, through a focus on the inclusion of women, ends up co-opting the women's agenda for the militarist purposes of states (Onyesoh et al. 2020; Basu et al. 2020). Aware of the dangers of co-optation, WILPF has opted nonetheless to continue its engagement with the UN, believing it to be one of the ways for pushing the limits of what is possible within liberal structures, and open avenues for broader transformation. WILPF has also worked with other organizations to have a gender provision included in the 2014 Arms Trade Treaty. As part of its work in the Steering Committee of the International Coalition to Abolish Nuclear Weapons (ICAN), RCW coordinated the effort for the drafting and adoption of the 2017 Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons, arguably a significant step toward the destruction of all nuclear weapons and a ban on their use (Acheson 2021). This achievement has earned the organization (via ICAN) a third Nobel Peace Prize in 2017 (two of WILPF's founders – Jane Addams and Emily Greene Balch – were respectively the first and second US woman to be awarded the Prize in 1931 and 1946).

WILPF's current internal tensions and struggles partly reflect a difficulty on the part of older white members to relinquish leadership and control of an increasingly diverse organization. The rapid growth of sections and leadership from the global south culminated in the election of the first African International President, Joy Onyesoh, from Nigeria in 2018. This growth, in turn, has been made possible by WILPF's greater financial stability and professionalization of the organization, since the appointment of Madeleine Rees, a human rights lawyer, former UN officer and whistleblower, as Secretary General in 2011.

Summary

WILPF is the longest-operating international women's organization in the world. Born in 1915 with the aim of stopping World War I, it has become one of the most influential NGOs associated with the UN system. With headquarters located in Geneva and New York, where it holds consultative status with the UN, and organized in 40 national sections in all continents, it works to “study, make known the causes of war and to abolish the legitimization and practices of war” (WILPF 2018). WILPF’s vision of feminist peace includes the realization of justice in gender and other relations of power, recognizing that violence, militarism, and war are rooted in economic and political structures and processes undergirded by gender and racial oppression (see Chap. 49, ► “Feminist Peace Research”). WILPF’s influence on many areas of international governance related to peace and security is remarkable considering its relatively small size. Its strength lies in its ability to navigate the tension between strategies of collaboration with and strategies of challenge to global governance institutions. It has also been able to hold in productive tension the difficulties of working as women across geopolitical and identity lines. Because of this constant self-questioning, the organization sits uneasily in its position of moderate influence in the avenues of power. As it moves between these interstices, WILPF remains conscious that the structures within which it operates are those that, in many circumstances, support and/or cause the violence the organization abhors.

Cross-References

- Feminist Peace Research
- Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- Intersectionality and Peace
- Masculinity and Conflict
- Nonviolence and Civil Resistance
- Peace and Feminist Foreign Policy
- Women’s Organizations in Post-conflict Contexts

References

- Acheson, R. (2021). Banning the bomb, smashing the patriarchy. New York: Rowman & Littlefield International.
- Basu, S., Kirby, P., Shepherd, L. J., (Eds.). (2020). New directions in women, peace and security. Bristol, UK: Bristol University Press.

- Blackwell, J. (2004). No peace without freedom: Race and the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom, 1915–1975. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press.
- Bussey, G., & Tims, M. (1980). Pioneers for peace: Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom, 1915–1965. London: WILPF British Section.
- Cohn, C. (2004). Feminist peacemaking. Women’s Review of Books, 21(5), 8–9.
- Confortini, C. C. (2012). Intelligent compassion: Feminist critical methodology in the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. New York/Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Confortini, C. C. (2021). Race, empire, and war in the international thought of Emily Greene Balch. In P. Owens & K. Rietzler (Eds.), Women’s international thought: A new history. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Eschle, C. (2018). “Nuclear (in)security in the everyday: Peace campers as everyday security practitioners.” Security Dialogue 49(4), 289–305.
- Falcón, S. (2016). Power interrupted: Antiracist and feminist activism inside the United Nations. Seattle: University of Washington Press.
- Garner, K. (2013). Shaping a global Women’s agenda: Women’s NGOs and global governance, 1925–1985. Manchester: Manchester University Press.
- Lynch, C. (1999). Beyond appeasement; interpreting interwar peace movements in world politics. Ithaca: Cornell University Press.
- Onyesoh, J., Rees, M., & Confortini, C. C. (2020). Feminist transnational engagements as challenges to the cooptation of WPS: Examples from the Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. In S. Basu, P. Kirby, & L. Shepherd (Eds.), New directions in women, peace, and security (pp. 235–268). Bristol: Bristol University Press.
- Plastas, M. (2011). A band of noble women: Racial politics in the women’s peace movement. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press.
- Reaching Critical Will. (n.d.). Reaching critical will. <https://reachingcriticalwill.org/>
- Schott, L. K. (1997). Reconstructing Women’s thoughts: The Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom before World War II. Stanford: Stanford University Press.
- Sluga, G. (2013). Internationalism in the age of nationalism. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press.
- Stienstra, D. (1994). Women’s movements and international organizations. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Terrell, M. C. (2005). A colored woman in a white world. Amherst/New York: Humanity Books.
- Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. (1915). WILPF resolutions, 1st congress, The Hague. https://wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/WILPF_triennial_congress_1915.pdf
- Women’s International League for Peace and Freedom. (1919). WILPF’s resolutions, 2nd congress, Zurich.

https://wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/WILPF_triennial_congress_1919.pdf

Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. (1971). WILPF's resolutions, 18th congress, New Delhi. https://wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/WILPF_triennial_congress_1971.pdf

Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. (1974). WILPF's resolutions, 19th congress, Birmingham. https://wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/08/WILPF_triennial_congress_1974.pdf

Women's International League for Peace and Freedom. (2018). WILPF constitution and by-laws. https://www.wilpf.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/06/WILPF_Constitution-and-By-Laws_Web.pdf

Women's Organizations in Post-Conflict Contexts

Itziar Mujika Chao

Department of International Public Law, International Relations and History of Law and Hegoa Institute for International Cooperation and Development Studies, University of the Basque Country (UPV/EHU), Bilbao, Spain

Synonyms

Inclusion; Gender; Conflict; Militarism; Violence; Peace; UNSCR 1325

Description

This chapter discusses the role and main features of women's organizations in post-conflict contexts, taking as a starting point both the gender order shaping women's experiences in post-conflict societies and the main features of peacebuilding processes and entities in these settings. After discussing the sidelining of women's organizations in post-conflict contexts, the chapter focuses on the main features of these groups, as well as the major international funding dynamics regulating their activities and the consequences of these dynamics for the work and activism of such organizations.

Introduction

The aftermath of conflict is a messy space. The features and dynamics of what is often identified as liberal peace and the initial context of its construction encompass different and layered top-down interventions through actors with different roles, such as international missions under the United Nations (UN) umbrella, with their own organisms and internal and external dynamics; international peacekeeping forces; International Financial Institutions (IFIs); International Non-Governmental Organizations (INGOs); local political elites; local civil society organizations; political parties; etc. The multilayered interrelationships and power relations that evolve from this entanglement aim to build, after conflict, not only peace but also functional states through liberal democracy and governance, market liberalization, and post-conflict reconstruction, based on specific gender norms and with specific gendered consequences. Both conflicts and post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding were identified as gender-neutral processes, as were international relations. However, during recent decades, and more visibly from the 1980s onwards, feminist activists and researchers have shown how the escalation and outbreak of conflicts, as well as post-conflict contexts and spaces, are gendered and have very different effects on women and men, girls and boys, as well as other gender identities.

Within this gendered space of action, feminist activists and researchers have demonstrated that women's organizations have a central role in the defense of gender equity and women's rights, although their capacity to act within post-conflict societies can be hindered. Even though these operate in different conflict and post-conflict contexts, women's organizations share similarities in relation to their actions, goals, and characteristics. Although their work is in some ways promoted by international peacebuilding institutions and structures, they are at the same time marginalized and identified as accompanying or secondary actors, meaning their space for action is both limited and conditioned.

The aim of this chapter is to introduce the main gendered dynamics of postwar societies and the overall peacebuilding framework in which the women's organizations that the text discusses operate. It begins with the identification of the main common features that shape the spaces of action where women's organizations locate within, in order to focus on these organizations' features, objectives, work and activism, as well as the conditions under which they function, the funding dynamics involved, and some of the subsequent obstacles that such organizations face.

Gendered Dynamics and Women's Experiences in Post-conflict Contexts

The constant transformation of gender-based power relations in conflict escalation, open conflict, and post-conflict contexts has been increasingly researched (Zarkov and Cockburn 2002; Anderlini 2007; Eifer and Seifert 2009, etc.). Traditional gender-based power relations have been central in conflict and post-conflict settings, following the dichotomy of peaceful women and violent men. Collective notions of women within such contexts are usually closely linked to traditional gender-based roles, which portray women as caregivers, mothers, sisters, and daughters, usually anchored to the private sphere. Women have been – and still are – generally seen as victims and as holders of certain patriarchal values and roles. Likewise, international institutions have usually responded according to the traditional understanding of the public and private spheres and, consequently, gender roles and women's social, political, and economic place and have acted accordingly in post-conflict contexts. However, feminists have contested these notions about women, exposing how they can also be active perpetrators of violence (Henshaw 2017; Sjoberg and Gentry 2007; see also ► “Female Combatants and Peacebuilding”), actors in the peacebuilding sphere (Porter 2007; Anderlini 2007; see also ► “Gender Justice and Peacebuilding”), or central political figures, among many other roles. Feminist activists and researchers have long indicated the influence of gender power relations in such contexts, expressing how women do not necessarily act following a feminine gender identity and how men do not necessarily act according to hyper-masculine-gendered modes. However, they have emphasized the fact that the persistence of militarization in postwar societies privileges certain kinds of masculinities – usually associated with hyper-masculine values. Cynthia Enloe has warned that this has direct effects on women, as it is “a form of masculinity (. . .) requiring a feminine complement that excludes women from full and assertive participation in postwar public life” (2002, p. 23).

Conflicts can have a twofold effect on women: they can be contexts of regression in relation to their situation and rights and can also hold potential spaces for a positive transformation of gender relations and roles, offering room for women's social, political, or economic advancement (Zarkov and Cockburn 2002). In this regard, violence-torn social fabrics might offer cracks where, paradoxically, opportunities can open up for the development of gender equality amidst hardship and deprivation in post-conflict settings. While positive gender-role transformation is more likely to occur at grassroots than at elite political levels, women are excluded from top levels of power although their role in peacebuilding has proven substantial (Mazurana et al. 2005; Porter 2007; Anderlini 2007). Nevertheless, marginalization from official peacebuilding and decision-making bodies and spaces can act as a catalyst for women's activism. In general, more women than men tend to become active in informal processes. This offers women an opportunity to enter the public sphere and become organized (Bouta et al. 2005, p. 65) but does not ensure their participation in official processes, reaffirming the sexual division of peacebuilding, as often the newly opened space for change is not used for “genuine and lasting gender transformation” (Cockburn 2004, p. 41).

Researchers have also pointed to the violent dynamics that women and girls are subjected to, which can be notoriously exacerbated in post-conflict contexts. The continuation of violence against women – both in the private and in the public spheres – has been a matter for study by feminist researchers, offering evidence of how the path from conflict to reconstruction and peacebuilding is also a gendered process. This continuum can be identified as a result of the combination of new political incentives and the opportunities of war legacies, which can take much more subtle forms in the public sphere but keeps being a constant – or increases – in the private sphere (Cockburn 2004; Kelly 2010; Barry 2005) as a mechanism of patriarchal control over women. Violence against women may increase and acquire different levels of intensity, from the personal to the interpersonal levels: beatings, rape, confinement, genital mutilation, abduction, forced prostitution, etc. (Giles and Hyndman 2004). In a related way, feminist researchers have also focused on the different forms that sexual violence against women perpetrated by international security forces can take. The arrival of international security forces – in the name of safety – can also increase the use of violence: the disproportionate power over citizens and resources that these actors have, combined with impunity, opens the way for soldiers and international agency staff members “to abuse” women, usually understood as sexual violence against women (Barry 2005, p. 43).

Overall feminist research indicates that the relationship(s) between post-conflict reconstruction, peacebuilding, and gender power relations is still complicated and ambiguous for women and other gender identities. These relationships are also influenced by the roles, spaces taken, and impacts of international organizations, agencies, and peacekeeping missions at the local level. The role of international actors has been ambivalent: while they have broadly understood gender power relations linked with traditional values and have mostly acted accordingly, they have also been responsible, since the mid-1990s, for the response to changing gender-based power relations and gender equality at the international level, responding to the requirements of feminist and women's organizations worldwide.

International Interventions as Gendered Encounters

The gendered nature of international interventions and institutions creates a “gendered contextual landscape” (Klein 2004, p. 279) in post-conflict areas, with direct gendered consequences for women as political subjects. The design of the post-conflict peacebuilding architecture is marginalizing for women per se. This can be seen through their sidelining in several ways: the consequences of conflict and the transformation of gender roles for women are widely ignored; women are generally treated as unseen actors without agency; gender issues usually go unnoticed; and international organizations themselves generally fall short in applying a minimum gender perspective. They can be, as Cockburn states, “themselves sometimes a problem” in terms of the defense of women's rights (2004, p. 41).

As mentioned above, recent decades have shown an increase in awareness of gender equality and the defense of women's rights and empowerment. This awareness can be seen at the international level through the adoption of several resolutions by the United Nations Security Council since October 2000, with what is known as the international Women, Peace and Security Agenda, and the implementation of different international gender equality measures – such as the UN Security Council Resolution 1325 (UNSCR 1325) – and subsequent resolutions. These tools for gender equality, after two decades functioning, have become part of reconstruction, peacebuilding, and development programs. They are increasingly referred to and in many cases are used in post-conflict contexts by international institutions, local organizations, or both, but the claims of women activists and feminist researchers – as well as women's organizations – in this regard usually point towards a lack of real implementation and consequently to the effects of this lack of implementation on women's everyday lives. UNSCR 1325, for example, is a mandatory tick in most post-2000's postwar contexts, but its implementation is far from being palpable and real. Lack of economic resources and will from international and state organisms has been identified as one of the main sources of non-implementation by women activists. This is the case of Kosovo, for example, where the National Action Plan (NAP) for the implementation of UNSCR 1325 was adopted in 2014, more than a decade later since women's organizations started advocating for it and 15 years after the end of the war. Iraq, for example, adopted its NAP in the same year, becoming the first country to launch such a plan in the region, but several years after the end of the war. As of 2019, 83 (43%) UN Member States had NAPs, although only 28 (34%) had allocated budgets for its implementation. (For more information, see: <http://peacewomen.org/member-states> (accessed on May 15, 2020).)

As post-conflict contexts are becoming increasingly liberal, the strategies promoted also have a marked liberal nature. Despite the discursive efforts by international institutions to promote gender equality and women's rights and empowerment in post-conflict settings, these efforts are embedded within the global liberal peace agenda. Although for the so-called liberal peacebuilding apparatus, in general, equality between men and women is something to be institutionalized, feminist activists and researchers have long emphasized the risks of mere institutionalization if it is not accompanied and supported by meaningful, real, and palpable equality through radical changes that extend to all social, political, and economic arenas and at structural, interpersonal, and individual levels.

The Emergence, Contributions, and Struggles of Women's Organizations in Post-conflict Spaces

Any postwar setting, as Cynthia Enloe stated (1993, p. 252), "is fraught with questions." She was referring to the post-Cold War period, but the statement could easily be a description of any post-conflict context. The official arrival of peace and the end of the conflict and of direct and open violence is a signal of permission for normal life to start to settle. However, feminists have challenged the concept of post-conflict peace – and, for that matter, the concept of peace itself – through questions such as: When does the conflict end, and when does the peace start? Does the end of the conflict equal the end of violence (Enloe 2002, 2014)? Here, one of the main contributions relates to how the end of conflicts is also a time of violence and insecurity for women (McLeod 2011).

One of the main goals of gender mainstreaming and gender-balanced decision-making policies and programs in post-conflict settings has been, in many cases, as in East Timor, Bosnia, and Kosovo, to foster an active civil society with the aim of promoting lasting peace and ensuring development (Hall and True 2009, p. 159), encouraging the participation of women within this civil society. However, this can lead to women being sidelined into civil society, instead of actively promoting their participation in the political and economic spheres as well. This marginalization of women from formal peace negotiations and top decision-making levels both in state and international bodies can foster their activity at the grassroots level. However, it leads to what can be identified as the "sexual division of the labor for peace" (Mendia Azkue 2014, pp. 142–150) based on two main characteristics: the exclusion of women from political negotiation and the feminization of grassroots activist peacebuilding. In post-intervention Bosnia-Herzegovina, for example, Maria Andreana Deiana identifies how women's collective action and women's experiences were translated "into a politics of small steps" that could re-imagine citizenship for women (2018, p. 139). In Kosovo, for example, the retraditionalization of gender power structures brought the overall of women back to the private sphere after the war – although there were exceptions. Civil society was a space where they could politically articulate their needs and claims, as the political sphere was mainly occupied by men. While women were denied the access to power and to decision-making processes, they saw a bigger space for influence and change in civil society than inside the government, which was subject to male leadership and political platforms (Kosovar Gender Studies Center 2008, p. 170).

While post-conflict contexts feature a marked division between the public and the private spheres – both strongly characterized by gendered power relations – women's activism in post-conflict settings has specific features, marked by two factors. These factors are the overall situation of women and the effects of conflicts on them and the gendered character of civil society itself, which can be more pronounced in post-conflict settings. As stated above, civil society can become the space for the increase in women's participation in the public sphere, but this participation can also be gendered. As Jude Howell explains, as women are usually "excluded from state institutions and male-dominated politics," they may find easier to be active in civil society or community-based organizations, for example. It is precisely in this context and level that most feminist and women's articulations and demands have developed in postwar contexts. To this regard, while civil society can be "excluding to women," it can also "have an emancipatory potential, which feminists can and do make use of" (2005, p. 5).

Women's organizations are usually created with certain common goals. Carmen Magallón identifies seven reasons why women decide to organize in women's grassroots organizations or groups (2006, pp. 70–71): (a) to oppose war or the military policies of governments; (b) to bring together people from opposing groups of which they are part; (c) to find non-military solutions to structural conflicts; (d) to protest the existence of impunity; (e) to support and advocate for women in war contexts or situations where they lack freedom and/or human rights in other countries; and (f) to ensure that women's work and activism will be part of decision-making processes. Women, broadly speaking, follow these general motivations to organize themselves before, during, or after conflict scenarios, but an increase in women's groups and organizations is particularly visible in post-conflict reconstruction and peacebuilding processes with the aforementioned characteristics. In these contexts, women's main motivations to be active and organize seem to be, as Cynthia Cockburn identified them in the Bosnian post-conflict scenario, to confront their own fears, to escape confinement and the continuous attachment to the private sphere, and to regain their own agency (2002, p. 72). At the same time, Cockburn also identified several central subjects or themes that tend to form a focus for women's organizations in post-conflict settings (2002, pp. 71–72): the defense of women's economic independence, the fight against violence against women, offering legal advice to women, the promotion of the participation of women in the political sphere, and the work of reconciliation or building bridges between communities previously in conflict.

Women's organizations in post-conflict settings function not only as part of new social, political, and economic contexts that are being rebuilt after wars and conflicts, but they usually work within a broader concern: a general setback or stagnation of women's rights and gender equality, and/or their marginalization from certain public spaces, as well as the reinforcement of the assumption that they belong to the private sphere. In many places women's organizations were already functioning successfully before the outbreak of conflicts, and awareness of women's rights and gender equality might increase during the conflict. In other cases, even if women's groups may be active before conflicts, these mushroom after the outbreak, due to the incentives international institutions offer for the defense of women's rights. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, for example, between 1500 and 8000 organizations emerged after the war (Simmons 2007, p. 175 and IBHI 1998 in Berry 2018, p. 159). In Kosovo, civil society organizations increased from 25 registered before the war to more than 2500 in the first 5 years after the war, and about 600 (25%) were directed by women or focused on women (Kosovar Gender Studies Center 2008, p. 167). The sudden increase of women's NGOs after war and intervention was partly motivated by international funding, but there were also other significant reasons that affected this phenomenon: to address new and/or different needs within their various communities after the war; to be able to have a broader space for action, having been marginalized from political and decision-making spaces; and in order to be able to sought job opportunities, as the NGO sector was the only sector that offered most jobs, and women were highly unemployed after the war (Kosovar Gender Studies Center 2008, pp. 169–170). However, in most post-conflict settings, women organize motivated by a specific situation – that of women's everyday and multiple constraints after conflicts, their marginalization from decision-making spaces, as well as a strong awareness on the general consequences of conflicts and their specific effects on women.

However, and as mentioned above, a common challenge experienced by women's organizations in post-conflict settings is the loss “of their democratic space.” The entry of international forces marks new dynamics for local forces, and within these dynamics, women's organizations, those that are the main agents responsible for the defense of women's rights, are usually marginalized. There can be several reasons for this, but these tend to be entrenched in the interrelationships between globalization, political violence based upon ethnic-cultural conflict, and social transformation (Klein 2004, pp. 292–295): while international institutions themselves are deeply rooted in a culturally constructed and gendered context, their diplomatic and administrative strategies are unlikely to expand the democratic space without a close relationship to civil society. While women's organizations do not have a central space within civil society, gender issues are not only marginalized, but their integration does not figure on the post-conflict peacebuilding agenda, and therefore, women are treated as “silent victims” in need of “special services,” and thus women's organizations are seen as representatives of these notions.

These dynamics are especially noticeable under the umbrella of liberal peacebuilding. Here, gender becomes a contested terrain: the range of actors participating under the liberal agenda has a certain similar attitude towards gender and gender equality, but this can clash with local actors' visions or needs; the international community usually defends gender equality as part of the same liberal path it follows and through a diverse international system of tools, but this may not be the most suitable background for the defense and construction of gender equality.

As Ruth Seifert points out, “conflicting and contending forces” might be at work: international liberal policies are not necessarily in harmony with the gender policies developed at a central level and therefore not necessarily in harmony with local dynamics and/or requirements and claims by local women and women's organizations. What is more, (neo)liberalism not only produces gender boundaries but also feminine qualities as central to women's individuality and a dramatization of gender differences. Women are encouraged to “individualize,” claim their human rights, and become competent actors in the liberal scenario. At the same time, as the new social conditions may consolidate women's traditional gender roles and obligations, this can create and reinforce a class system between those women who profit from these new conditions and challenge conservative gender roles and those women who do not have this privilege and who have to re-adopt traditional gender roles (Seifert 2009, pp. 35–36). This scenario does not usually involve the consideration of all women but only those women who fit on this agenda, which represents a selective and discriminatory gender equality, not equality for all women – and for all men. The rural and urban division in post-conflict settings, for example, can be illustrative of this dynamic. As most international organisms are settled in capitals – or big cities – in many cases they lack accessibility to remote villages and communities, therefore having a difficult access and knowledge in regard to their situation and needs. These difficulties increase in relation to the situation of women in very patriarchal societies, as the ones communicating with representants of international organisms are men, and they do not necessarily translate – or even know – which are the needs and claims of the women in their communities. International actors tend to shape their programs according to the information they have gathered from those spaces they have access to and tend to address women as an homogeneous social group, omitting diversity, intersectionality, and heterogeneity based on class, ethnic origin, race, or location, for example.

Feminist activists have become indispensable actors for social change “by developing a method of social criticism” that is inclusive and critical. At the grassroots level, they have continuously put into practice what Susan Okin and Brooke Ackerly identify as “deliberative inquiry” and self-knowledge; internationally, they have created networks that convey this knowledge worldwide (Ackerly and Okin 1999 in Tickner 2001, pp. 96–124). This has been key in all contexts but specifically in post-conflict situations, and creating-networks between organizations in different contexts has proved to be a motor for the creation of knowledge and how-to for women’s organizations working under similar conditions. A common point is the defense of women’s rights and gender equality, which often falls on women’s organizations, although they are not identified as central actors in peacebuilding. As Heidi Hudson argues, “then those groups’ strategies, successes, and shortcomings are important factors in the success of peacebuilding processes” (Hudson 2010, p. 262), which still barely happens. International peacebuilding actors have generally “ignored the work of women activists, particularly once the conflicts were perceived as ‘internationally important’ and thus triggered larger international responses” (Barry 2005, p. 69), which directly increases the challenges that women’s organizations need to confront in their everyday peacebuilding activism.

Despite this, international cooperation, usually in the form of development aid or funding, is one of the main supports for women’s organizations in post-conflict contexts, which creates a complex relationship between international institutions and women’s organizations in these situations.

Funding for Women’s Organizations: Between Dependence and Autonomy

Although feminist research within International Relations and Peace and Conflict Studies has persistently revealed the role and importance of women as well as their labor and activism in armed conflicts and wars, their relationship to international cooperation and the dynamics of this relationship in the global peacebuilding apparatus has been less studied. During the 1990s, research into the role of women in development and gender in development from a feminist perspective started to gain centrality (Parpart et al. 2000; Marchand and Parpart 1995; Momsen 2003, etc.), while less information was available about the same dynamics in post-conflict peacebuilding settings. However, the 2000s opened a research space in this regard, especially in relation to international cooperation with women’s groups and organizations in post-conflict areas, due to the changing dynamics in the sector, especially attitudes towards women’s rights and women’s organizations.

This relationship has proved to be a troubled one: activism for the defense of women’s rights and gender equality “rarely factors into international actors’ strategies to tackle deadly conflict,” and in the best case, “it is considered as an afterthought, once hard core peace negotiations are complete” (Barry 2005, p. 5). This has, again, led to the lack of recognition of women’s organizations in these contexts. At the same time, this lack has provoked the growth of women’s organizations outside formal political channels but inside “a transnational linkage around issues related to women’s subordination” (Tickner 2001, pp. 96–124).

The Association for Women’s Rights in Development (AWID) identifies the funding field with respect to local women’s rights groups and organizations as “a complex terrain with limited available information, shifting priorities and interests” (2006, p. 1). Although women’s organizations are key actors for the development and sustainability of gender equality, especially in post-conflict areas, their work and activism are constantly challenged by a lack of funding and a declining relationship between international donors and women’s groups. Bilateral and multilateral aid agencies that used to support women’s rights groups and organizations are cutting their direct funding to these organizations and funding national governments. Although this is done with the goal of gender equality (AWID 2006, p. 2), it notably reduces the funding capacities – and, therefore, acting capacities – of women’s groups.

The main donors for women's rights worldwide, and especially in post-conflict areas, have traditionally been INGOs, development aid agencies, independent foundations, and women's funds. However, this funding is closely related to local post-conflict funding shifts and changes, which can affect the capacity of women's rights groups and activists through the lack of stable and flexible funding. In general, mainstream donors' funding is directed through bilateral arrangements with governments instead of funding local women's organizations directly, which fosters a lack of access of women's organizations to international funding (Barry 2005, pp. 15–16). This creates “a tension between the long term goals and values of conflict transformation” (Francis 2004, p. 11), translated into a blurred space in which women's rights, interests, and demands are marginalized. This tension is reflected in the everyday relationship between women's organizations and donors: local women's groups generally have scarce access to information about funding resources and very often face cultural barriers when communicating with institution's representatives – usually foreigners – including barriers created through a lack of linguistic or technical understanding when it comes to application processes or other bureaucratic operations (Barry 2005, pp. 16–17).

In this regard, AWID also identifies three principal features that women's organizations face in relation to funding, which also include women's organizations in post-conflict contexts: (i) most women's organizations receive less money than in the previous years of activity; (ii) women's funds, INGOs, and bilateral and multilateral agencies are the biggest funders of women's organizations at the global level; and (iii) it is becoming more difficult to raise money, and in this respect, the most difficult step is finding funding for staff salaries, administration expenses, and capacity building (2006, pp. 11,12). One of the factors behind this change in tendency is a change in “fashion” or trends in funding: it can be understood that in the 1990s, with the development of UN conferences on women and especially the organization of the Beijing conference, women's rights and activism gained importance, and specifically in post-conflict settings, UNSCR 1325 became a key document for feminist activists. In Kosovo, for example, high quantities of funding were directed in relation to the implementation of the resolution's main points such as women's political participation or their integration to the security sector. However, other areas which were of importance for women and therefore for women's organizations, such as improving their economic or health situation, were sidelined in comparison. This trend has changed in the last decade, and overall – albeit exceptions – support towards women's organizations has dropped worldwide, specially funding coming from international organisms and agencies.

As a research project conducted by the Kosovo Women's Network in close cooperation with seven women's organizations exposes, funding for women's organizations in the Western Balkans decreased between 2014 and 2016, and some organizations have worked without any kind of funding in different periods of time. 82% of organizations, for example, appear not to have enough funding for the development of their work and activism, and 35% did not even meet their planned budgets in 2018 (Kvinna till Kvinna 2020, p. 7).

One of the main criticisms regarding the funding dynamics of women's organizations – in general but also specifically in relation to post-conflict contexts – relates to the disconnection from the local, national, and global realities and, thus, the reinforcement of political and social hierarchies that instead of strengthening women and women's organizations has weakened them. These dynamics have formed a common situation for local women's organizations working on post-conflict areas: they are usually small organizations working with minimal staff, small or non-existent salaries, enormous workloads, and developing practices of resistance towards not only international and liberal peacebuilding apparatuses but also the dynamics of international funding for gender equality. Their general situation tends to be precarious, and the everyday problems that women face in terms of peace and security are still a challenge both locally and globally.

Summary

This chapter has provided an overview of the role of women's organizations in post-conflict contexts. After an initial identification of the principal features of gender-based power relations and women and their situation in the aftermath of conflicts, the chapter has focused on the general features of women's organizations, as well as the characteristics of their work and activism under so-called liberal peace. In post-conflict contexts, the peacebuilding umbrella – institutions, politics, policies, etc. – does acknowledge gender equality and the defense of women's rights, but according to the liberal agenda. Therefore, it reproduces a liberal notion of gender. One of the main features of these contexts is the situation under which women's organizations function, which is featured by the lack of sufficient funding, which also affects their work as well as their relationship with peacebuilding actors. Although it has been demonstrated by research and is acknowledged by international institutions that women's organizations are key actors in post-conflict societies and in peacebuilding efforts, they are still sidelined in most spaces and at most levels, which creates a blurred space in which it can be difficult and challenging to operate.

Cross-References

- ▶ Civil Society Inclusion in Peace Mediation
- ▶ Female Combatants and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Women, Peace and Security Agenda

References

- Ackerly, B., & Okin, S. M. (1999). Feminist social criticism and the international movement for women's rights as human rights. In I. Shapiro & C. Hacker-Gordon (Eds.), Democracy's edges (pp. 134–162). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Anderlini, S. N. (2007). Women building peace: What they do, why it matters. London/Boulder: Lynne Rienner Publishers.
- Association for Women's Rights in Development. (2006). Where is the money for women's rights? In Assessing resources and the role of donors in the promotion of women's rights and the support of women's organizations. Toronto/Mexico D.F: AWID.
- Barry, J. (2005). Rising up in response. Women's rights activism in conflict. Boulder/Nairobi: Urgent Action Fund.
- Berry, M. E. (2018). War, women, and power: From violence to mobilization in Rwanda and Bosnia-Herzegovina. Cambridge/New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Bouta, T., Frerks, G., & Bannon, I. (2005). Gender, conflict, and development. Washington, DC: The World Bank.
- Cockburn, C. (2002). Women's organization in the rebuilding of Bosnia-Herzegovina. In C. Cockburn & D. Zarkov (Eds.), The postwar moment: Militaries, masculinities and international peacekeeping (pp. 68–84). London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Cockburn, C. (2004). The continuum of violence: A gender perspective on war and peace. In W. Giles & J. Hyndman (Eds.), Sites of violence: Gender and conflict zones (pp. 24–44). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Deiana, M.-A. (2018). Gender and citizenship. Promises of peace in post-Dayton Bosnia-Herzegovina. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Eifler, C., & Seifert, R. (2009). Gender dynamics and post-conflict reconstruction. Frankfurt: Peter Lang GmbH Internationaler Verlag der Wissenschaften.
- Enloe, C. (1993). The morning after: Sexual politics at the end of the Cold War. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Enloe, C. (2002). Demilitarization – or more of the same? Feminist questions to ask in the postwar moment. In C. Cockburn & D. Zarkov (Eds.), The postwar moment. Militaries, masculinities and international peacekeeping (pp. 22–32). London: Lawrence & Wishart.
- Enloe, C. (2014). Bananas, beaches and bases. Making feminist sense of international politics. Berkeley, Los Angeles and London: University of California Press.
- Francis, D. (2004). Culture, power asymmetries and gender in conflict transformation. Berghof Handbook for Conflict Transformation, 1–16.
- Giles, W., & Hyndman, J. (2004). Introduction: Gender and conflict in a global context. In W. Giles & J. Hyndman (Eds.), Sites of violence: Gender and conflict zones (pp. 3–23). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Hall, N., & True, J. (2009). Gender mainstreaming in a post-conflict state. Toward democratic peace in Timor-Leste? In B. D'Costa & K. Lee-Koo (Eds.), Gender and global politics in the Asia-Pacific (pp. 159–174). New York/Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Henshaw, A. L. (2017). Why women rebel. Understanding women's participation in armed rebel groups. London/New York: Routledge.
- Howell, J. (2005). Introduction. In J. Howell & D. Mulligan (Eds.), Gender and civil society. Transcending boundaries (pp. 1–22). London/New York: Routledge.

- Hudson, H. (2010). Peace building through a gender lens and the challenges of implementation in Rwanda and Côte d'Ivoire. In L. Sjoberg (Ed.), Gender and international security: Feminist perspectives (pp. 256–279). London/New York: Routledge.
- Kelly, L. (2010). The everyday/everynightness of rape: Is it different in war? In L. Sjoberg & S. Via (Eds.), Gender, war, and militarism. Feminist perspectives (pp. 114–123). Santa Barbara: Praeger Security International.
- Klein, E. (2004). The gendered impact of multilateralism in the post-Yugoslav states: Intervention, reconstruction, and globalization. In W. Giles & J. Hyndman (Eds.), Sites of violence: Gender and conflict zones (pp. 273–298). Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Kosovar Gender Studies Center. (2008). History is her-story. The history of women in civil society in Kosovo 1980–2004. Prishtina: Kosovar Gender Studies Centre.
- Kvinna till Kvinna. (2020). Where's the money for women's rights? Funding trends in the Western Balkans. Prishtina: Kvinna till Kvinna.
- Magallón, C. (2006). Mujeres en pie de paz. Madrid: Siglo XXI.
- Marchand, M. H., & Parpart, J. L. (1995). Feminism, postmodernism, development. London/New York: Routledge.
- Mazurana, D., Raven-Roberts, A., Parpart, J., & Lautze, S. (2005). Introduction. Gender, conflict, and peacekeeping. In D. Mazurana, A. Raven-Roberts, & J. Parpart (Eds.), Gender, conflict, and peacekeeping (pp. 1–26). Lanham: Rowman & Littlefield.
- McLeod, L. (2011). Configurations of post-conflict: Impacts of representations of conflict and post-conflict upon the (political) translations of gender security within UNSCR 1325. International Feminist Journal of Politics, 13(4), 594–611.
- Mendia Azkue, I. (2014). La división sexual del trabajo por la paz. Género y rehabilitación posbélica en El Salvador y Bosnia-Herzegovina. Madrid: Tecnos.
- Momsen, J. (2003). Gender and development. London: Routledge.
- Parpart, J. L., Connelly, M. P., & Barriteau, V. E. (2000). Theoretical perspectives on gender and development. Ottawa: International Development Research Centre.
- Porter, E. (2007). Peacebuilding. Women in international perspective. London: Routledge.
- Seifert, R. (2009). Armed conflicts, post-war reconstruction and gendered subjectivities. In C. Eifler & R. Seifert (Eds.), Gender dynamics and post-conflict reconstruction (pp. 21–45). Frankfurt am Main: Peter Lang GmbH Internationaler Verlag der Wissenschaften.
- Sjoberg, L., & Gentry, C. (2007). Mothers, monsters, whores. Women's violence in global politics. London/New York: Zed Books.
- Tickner, J. A. (2001). Gendering world politics, issues and approaches in the post-Cold War era. New York: Columbia University Press.
- Zarkov, D., & Cockburn, C. (2002). Introduction. In C. Cockburn & D. Zarkov (Eds.), The postwar moment: Militarities, masculinities and international peacekeeping (pp. 9–21). London: Lawrence & Wishart.

Women's Participation in Peace Processes

- ▶ Gender and Mediation

Women's Participation in Transitional Justice

- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding

World Government

- ▶ Search for Peace, the

X

Xeer

- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

Y

Yemen Conflict

Ibrahim Galal Fakirah
Yemen and Gulf Program, Middle East Institute
(MEI), Washington, DC, USA

Keywords

Yemeni conflict · Mediation · Gulf security ·
Peace process · Armed rebellion

Synonyms

Armed rebellion; Conflict resolution; Fragile peace transitions; Foreign mediation; Gulf security; Military coalitions; War and peace in Yemen

Definition

This chapter unpacks how the Yemen conflict evolved from a set of largely deep-seated, multi-faceted, and unresolved issues during Saleh's 33-year tenure into a complex armed conflict and foreign military intervention, passing through a fragile transitional peace process that ended with a Houthi coup d'état on September 21, 2014. Interestingly, the internal issues that made Yemen receptive to the Arab Spring continue to aggravate, deepening grievances and local fragmentation, let alone that the combination of domestic and external factors that jeopardized the UN-endorsed, Gulf-backed transitional process continue to reoccur, albeit differently, posing serious wonders to a forthcoming peace agreement. The UN mediation's departure from status quo ante bellum to the normalization of status quo, evident in the Stockholm Agreement, only rewards violence of armed groups and sows seeds of conflict rounds to come, risking to keep the country in fragility trap at best, or a cycle of endless conflicts at worst.

Introduction

The end of the Cold War and the collapse of the Soviet Union marked a new phase in the history of Yemen. Nearly 6 months after the fall of Berlin wall in November 1989, the Yemen Arab Republic (YAR) and the only Marxist–Leninist country in the Arabian Peninsula – the People's Democratic Republic of Yemen (PDRY) – unified on May 22, 1990. This, as a result, reunified Yemen, formed the Republic of Yemen and stretched the rule of President Ali Abdullah Saleh (1978–2011) to over 527,968 km² but not without major challenges that, directly and indirectly, culminated into an Arab Spring uprising, a subsequent fragile peace process, a continued Houthi rebellion and ensuing regional military intervention (Popp 2015).

The Houthis' resort to violence and insurgency against the authority of President Abed Rabbu Mansour Hadi jeopardized the transitional peace process and National Dialogue Conference (NDC) reconciliation efforts but also laid grounds for the subsequent military intervention of the Saudi-led Arab Coalition. Though Iranian-Saudi rivalry is a layer of the multilayered conflict, the conflict is a byproduct of the country's accumulated internal challenges and unresolved grievances piling up, mainly under President Saleh, who ruled Yemen for 33 years. These issues passed through conflict junctures, both latent and manifest, and evolved into a complex cycle of manifest, multi-scale armed conflicts. The web of active actors transcends binary characterization, and their internal re-alignments and association with foreign countries further polarize conflict dynamics, thus complicating sustainable resolution prospects and risking further local fragmentation in the foreseeable future.

This chapter asks a simple question: how has the conflict in Yemen become this complex, multilayered, and blurry? In answering so, it proceeds in six primary sections, passing through episodes of armed rebellion since 2004, the resurgence of secessionist sentiments since 2007, the 2009 deadlock in the political system, the Arab Spring uprising in 2011, the collapse of the transitional process (2011–2014), the regional military intervention of the Arab Coalition, and United Nations-led (UN) mediation efforts. The first section unpacks the Houthis' ideology and reflects on their characteristics by revisiting the insurgency's six Sa'adah wars (2004–2010) and beyond; the second section explores the country's internal landscape, showing the collapse of Saleh's regime was a question of time, which the Arab Spring uprising hastened; the third section analyzes the pitfalls and implementation hurdles of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) initiative that turned the uprising into a political crisis, hoping to put Yemen on a sustainable transitional trajectory that, however, ultimately collapsed for several reasons, including continued armed rebellion; the fourth section briefly examines the formation of the Arab Coalition 6 months after the Houthi-Saleh coup d'état and investigates lack of tangible progress; the fifth section addresses the Southern question and fall of Aden by addressing key attributes and recent developments; and the final section delves into the UN mediation efforts that will conclude a fragile peace agreement at best. The conclusion then summarizes key trends and issues discussed.

Six Wars and Beyond: The Houthis from Sa'adah to Sana'a

This section defines who the Houthis are, unpacks their ideology, and reflects on the insurgency's key attributes. First, the Houthis, a primary party to armed conflicts since the new millennium, are a sectarian movement that evolved into a complex, an adaptive, and a cunning armed insurgency that primarily believes in violence as means to achieve factional ends. A tribal clan from Maran in the mountainous governorate of Sa'adah, the group is guided by a religious ideology that ostensibly claims practicing Zaydism – a moderate Shia sect in Yemen's highlands accounting for 35% of the population – but pursues a Zaydi-Hadawi (Hadawiya) doctrine, a close sect to the Twelver Shia in Iran (Salmoni et al. 2010, p. 65). “Hadawiya” and Twelver Shia sects broadly presume the descendants of Prophet Mohammed – or more accurately his daughter Zaynab – have the divine right to rule and theorize for the formation of Imamate, where its leader is known as (Imam). Socially known as “Sadah” (masters) in Yemen, their self-fulfilling rule prophecy is precisely what dictated the Imamate in Yemen before the 1962 Republican Revolution that ended the monarchy in Yemen, and therefore the Houthi six wars can be viewed – in part – as an attempt to revive the supremacist legacy of Imamate.

Second, the Houthi ideology is distinct, violent, and seemingly anti-Western. Like religious ideologies, including Salafi Jihadism, it has a death slogan, an actionable cause, specific enemies, and recruitment means, including indoctrination, support networks and/or enabling communities, and exploitation of grievances (Moghadam 2008). Its enabling communities and primary beneficiaries are the Hashemites, support networks are aligned tribal Sheikhs through fear, enticement, and/or intimidation, and the internal enemy has been the elected regime – under both Saleh and Hadi – embodying the Republican system. The insurgency’s publicly declared cause – reversing grievances and injustices – is a means to recruit new members and contradicts actual practices evident in, for example, the dominance of Sadah in key offices during the war, an attempt to empower a faction and to revive Hadawiya, which restricts rule to the Hashemites. “The timing of the fall of Sana’a . . . five days before the date of the revolution against the Imamate in 1962 was carrying a clear indication of the intent against the Republic system and its leaders” (Alogail 2015, p. 426).

The Houthi slogan – “God is great! Death to America! Death to Israel! Curse upon the Jews! Victory to Islam!”, known also as “the scream” (Sarkhah in Arabic) – embodies the group’s political culture and worldview. “Death” manifests Houthi belief in political violence as a legitimate means to achieve whatever objectives, where six wars against the state between 2004 and 2010 are a case in point. Houthi external enemies, namely, the United States and Israel as well as their regional partners, grasp enmity philosophy and so does President Saleh, who the Houthis condemned for cooperation with the United States (Zimmerman and Harnisch 2020). The Houthi insurgency shares Iran’s anti-American posture in the Middle East, capitalizes on Palestine’s rights, and was formed during the Second Intifada (2000–2005) and the US invasion of Iraq. Its leaders Badr al-Din al-Houthi and his sons, Hussein (the group leader who died in the first Sa’adah war in 2004) and Abdul Malek (current leader since around then), studied Islamic Studies at Qum Seminary, Iran, after the 1979 Iranian Revolution and derived inspiration from Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (Ardemagni 2017, p. 5).

Doctrinal nurturing in Qum laid grounds for subsequent covert ties with Iranian leaders and political recruitment, which marked a significant departure from peaceful to radical, armed struggle after developing a growing sectarian base in Maran. Hussein, who had co-founded the “Believing Youth” with Mohammed Azan to revive the Zaydi sect, counter growing Saudi-sponsored spread of Salafism, mainly through summer schools and teaching circles, quit in 1997 for establishing the “Houthi” and “Ansar al-Houthi” movements in 2001 (Ardemagni 2017; Porter 2018). Through teaching Houthi handouts (Malazem in Arabic), speeches of its leaders, and indoctrination processes, Houthi followers pay allegiance to the group’s leader and filter the surrounding world through a sectarian, factional discourse (Alogail 2015, p. 417).

Third, the Houthis demonstrated a set of characteristics far above and beyond the six Sa’adah wars. These include the insurgency’s ability to reconfigure leadership at the hardest of conditions, expand public mobilization and recruitment through playing the “hearts and minds,” and attacking the center of gravity in a cost-effective approach that discourages potential resistance. In the first Sa’adah war (June–September 2004), the governmental elimination of the Houthis’ leader, Hussein, failed to put an end to the insurgency, like the capture of Osama bin Laden, Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, and Anwar al-Awlaki, for instance, did not terminate the activities of Al-Qaeda, the Islamic State, and al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) (Kenney 2007; Jordan 2019).

In the following five Sa’adah wars, the Houthi rebels exploited local grievances, such as underdevelopment and decline of Zaydism, to gain credibility and public trust, thus able to recruit thousands of fighters (Knights 2018, p. 15). The indiscriminate destruction of property and associated displacement of 250,000 people during the six wars played out to the group’s advantage, helping them convince Sa’adah public that the war is an all-out-war against all (Boucek 2010, p. 3). War framing and exploitation of grievances eventually created a common sense of frustration and threat that Zaydi-Hadawi indoctrination became a function of regular interaction.

Throughout the armed conflict, the Houthi insurgents emerged stronger emergence from each asymmetric warfare waged. They, for instance, departed from small-scale ambushes against military forces to “guerilla warfare and urban terrorism” by launching concerted attacks on government supply lines and a 240–360-person battalions as well as deploying sleeping cells in, say, Sana’a (Freeman 2009, p. 1013; Knights 2018, p. 16). Almasdar Online (2020) released exclusive evidence suggesting Abdullah Yahya al-Hakem, the Houthi Military Intelligence Chief since 2017, was tasked with assassinating military commanders in 2005, using remote explosives. The group also extended the geographical scope of firefights. In the sixth Sa'adah war (August 2009–February 2010), the firefight was in the outskirts of Sana'a in Bani Hushaysh and transcended Yemeni borders to have Houthi-Saudi skirmishes.

On mediation, ceasefires, to the Houthis, have been tactical means to gain time, capture more territory, infiltrate rivals, sideline potential resistance, and/or defeat enemies. The 2007 ceasefire and subsequent 2008 Doha Agreement was a recovery transition from the fourth Sa'adah war (January–June 2007) to the fifth war (May–July 2008) (Brandt 2017). Renewed Houthi firefight against the Salafis in Dammaj, Sa'adah, in October 2013 despite ongoing ceasefire and reconciliation efforts at the NDC allowed the Houthis consolidate power in Sa'adah (Ardemagni 2017, p. 9). Their surprise attack vis-à-vis Sheikh Yasser al-Awadhi in Bayda governorate – who protested the rebel's "grave violation of tribal customary law" by killing a woman – allowed the Houthis to thwart growing tribal resistance in June 2020 (Al-Dawsari 2020).

The Houthis masterfully geared political divides for their advantage, using several actors for factional strategic ends. While the insurgency appealed to opposition factions, such as Islah who rebuked Saleh's counterinsurgency campaigns (2004–2010) and the Southern Hirak (al-Hirak al-Janoubi), a peaceful secessionist movement gathering several groups, that endorsed the 2014 coup, it aligned with the old enemy, Saleh, to access military hardware, tribal network, and Republican Guards before they assassinated him on December 4, 2017 (Shuja Al-deen 2020). Using intimidation, the Houthis tamed potential opponents by attacking leading figures and propagating psychological defeat, such as targeting al-Ahmar family – tribal figures of Hashed tribal confederation – and videotaping the bombing of Sheikh Abdullah al-Ahmar's house in Amran in 2014. Between late 2014 and 2018, the Houthis detonated 833 private properties, including those of opponents "in an ugly act of revenge" to instill fear, humiliate enemies, and deter potential popular resistance (Yemeni Coalition to Monitor Human Rights Violations 2018, p. 5). Rebellion barely succeeds without penetrating the enemy. The Houthis have increasingly pulled more Hashemites overtime, infiltrating Yemeni institutions from within. For example, Major General Yahya al-Shami, an astute politician who served as the governor of Sa'adah and was sacked in 2007 for collusion with the Houthis, is the assistant to the Houthi Commander of Armed Forces in 2020. To that level, Yemeni institutions were penetrated, and loyalties changed. Combined, these characteristics, coupled with Zaydi-Hadawi ideological ideals, help to put Houthi activities in perspective. The next section explores the country's internal landscape, before the Arab Spring uprising.

Yemen: No Gray Zone Forward

In the late 2010, a group of experts produced "Yemen 2020: Future Scenarios," a forward-looking book that, among its outputs, had two – Green and Black – scenarios. Titles of sections – the Green "Seizing Opportunities" and the black "The Hands of Sheba Scattered" – reflected Yemen's possible future. Fakirah (2010, pp. 35–38) then noted that the GPC's (General People's Congress) inability, under Saleh, to make "bitter strategic decisions that reformulate governance equation," coupled with the opposition's unwillingness to make trade-offs to nurture democratic processes overtime, eventually took the "democratic experience to closed doors." There was no gray zone in Yemen simply because the country was on a two-way highway – it either addresses an array of political, socioeconomic, and security challenges to move forward or ultimately slips backward to a cycle of manifest, endless conflicts.

The political system, under Saleh, reached a deadlock and for several reasons. First, Yemen's longest-serving president adopted mediocre management than a governance approach throughout his 33-year tenure. Since ascendance to power in 1978, Saleh heavily relied on managing the post-1962 order that derived its legitimacy from the republican revolution, where the role of Sheikhs was in upswing that it became the incubator of the state, directly and indirectly. Key to Saleh's political survival was his ability to sustain "dancing on the heads of snakes"; snakes encompassed influential Sheikhs, political dissidents, armed non-state actors and the opposition, however barely included public intellectuals, and the civil society (Whitaker 2010). A year after the assassination of Lieutenant-Colonel President Ibrahim al-Hamadi on October 11, 1977, Saleh ultimately ironed out an informal power-sharing formula with influential Sheikhs that continues, albeit differently, to dictate Yemeni internal politics hitherto and how many Sheikhs think during peace and wartime conditions (Day 2012, pp. 65–70).

Second, the maturity of democratic processes was heavy-footed, largely due to Saleh's dancing model. This left little room for political pluralism, power shifts, and checks and balances in the political system to nurture. Although the parliament passed a new law in 1991 to allow forming new political parties and organizations in a bid to deepen the political participation, the ruling party – the GPC formed in 1982 and chaired by Saleh ever since – fully dominated the political landscape until 2011. For example, the GPC's parliamentary share, through elections, expanded from 123 seats in 1993 to 187 in 1997 and 226 out of 301 seats in 2003 (Al-Yemeni 2003, p. 19). Such overwhelming majority excused the president of parliamentary accountability and therefore undermined checks and balances in the political system that would have effectively monitored, questioned, and restrained the power and progress of the president and the executive branch.

Third, the stability of Yemen depended on a few influential figures rather than robust, inclusive national and local institutions. This resonates with Acemoglu and Robinson's (2012) key explanation to "Why Nations Fail," pointing they do because some states pursue unsustainable extractive and monopolistic governance modalities. Due to Saleh's military background, elementary education, rise to power following multiple coup d'états, and survival through internal balancing and dancing, building strong, equitable institutions was secondary at best. The resurgence of secessionist sentiments in the South and the deadlock in the political system in 2009 were direct results of failure to build inclusive, robust state institutions and a healthy political system but also the retreat of two influential personalities from Yemen's vanguard (Boucek 2010).

The replacement of Prime Minister Abdul Qadir Bajamal (2001–2007), a shrewd Hadhrami politician whose diplomatic skills contained opposition and separatist leaders, caused a clear vacuum in the political spectrum, allowing latent issues to surface. Only in mid-2007 was the Southern Hirak formed. The death of Sheikh Abdullah bin Hussein al-Ahmar – the Sheikh of Hashed tribal confederation and the paramount Sheikh of Sheikhs, the chief Islah party, and Parliament Speaker (1993–2007), in 2007 shook Saleh's system (Day 2010). It prompted Islah, who is a leading member in the Joint Meeting Parties (JMP) of the opposition, to escalate position vis-à-vis the Saleh regime and deepened intra-elite competition over wealth and power. Al-Ahmar, whose multiple roles compounded his influence, was a restrainer of Islah. Only after he died did Islah and the JMP announced boycotting the 2009 parliamentary elections.

Fourth, the array of internal challenges piled up unresolved. Security-wise, the emergence of the Houthi rebellion in 2004 and resurgence of Southern separatist views in 2007 questioned the legitimacy of the regime and shape of the Yemeni state, respectively. It was the unresolved Houthi rebellion in Sa'adah that have, directly or indirectly, prompted communities in the south to protest deep-rooted horizontal inequalities, more importantly, the Saleh regime's inability to genuinely address and fix perceived grievances and resentment, including unequal distribution of power, political marginalization and hegemony of highlands, and economic alienation across the country beyond the capital, Sana'a. Politically, discontented with the GPC's long-standing dominance since 1997 and poor record of institutional reforms, the JMP boycotted the April 2009 parliamentary elections to push for electoral reforms and secure greater concessions from President Saleh (Feierstein 2019, p. 12). The European Union's (EU) support evident in conditioning its oversight of the parliamentary elections on the JMP's involvement eventually emboldened the latter's position. This, as a result, pressured Saleh, in agreement with the opposition in February 2009, to postpone the elections for 2 years, at which the Arab Spring uprising broke.

Economically, the Saleh regime was not progressive enough between 1990 and 2010 that the Millennium Development Goals (MDG) 2010 Report concluded the country was "off track" and cannot meet many MDGs (Pournik and Abu-Ismaïl 2011, p. 2). The Yemeni economy was and remains traditional, heavily reliant on oil exports, where the sector accounted "for about one-third of economic growth" and over half government revenue came from oil and gas sector (World Bank 2015, p. 5). Growth in gross domestic product (GDP) was volatile, declining from nearly 6.2% in 1991 to 3.8% in 2009 (World Bank 2020). The currency, Yemeni Riyal (YER), sharply depreciated vis-à-vis the USD, from approximately 12 in 1990 to above 200 by 2010, inflation that considerably increased living costs for the average Yemeni citizen (Department of Treasury 1990, p. 4; World Bank 2015). Unemployment, corruption, and poverty rates continued to rise, especially in view of rising armed conflicts and political instability (World Bank 2015).

Overall, Saleh's failure to build strong, functioning state institutions and resolve an accumulating set of issues throughout his 33-year tenure, coupled with the demise of political and social stabilization forces as well as unsustainable "political dancing" approach, simmered political adversities for Saleh but, most importantly, deepened the breadth and depth of country's long-term challenges. The next section delves into the Arab Spring and the ensuing transitional process that collapsed chiefly due to the Houthi coup d'état.

The Arab Spring: From an Uprising to a Political Crisis

The December 2010 revolutionary uprising, known also as the Arab Spring, in Tunisia stretched to Egypt, Syria, Libya, and Yemen.

This regional phenomenon catalyzed the Yemeni public, including the JMP, to protest accumulated issues in the streets, caused a political divide that chiefly distracted attention from the Houthis' armed rebellion, and eventually marked the end of Saleh's 33-year tenure but not entirely his regime (Salisbury 2015). Unlike Syrian and Libyan uprisings that directly turned into blurry wars, the Yemeni uprising had a transit point, that if successful would have averted the country a full-scale war, and became a paradigm of peaceful transitional processes in the Middle East and North Africa.

On November 23, 2011, the Yemeni parties – the National Coalition (the GPC and its allies) and the National Council (the JMP and its partners) – signed the GCC initiative in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia (Rashad 2011). Backed by the United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolution 2014 (2011), the Gulf initiative charted a two-phase transitional roadmap but eventually crumpled. What are the flaws of the peace agreement? And what were the challenges during the implementation stage?

Pitfalls in the Agreement

There are several pitfalls in the Agreement. First, the GCC sought to contain the Arab Spring uprising, which constructed an ideational threat to the very foundation upon which the Gulf monarchies stand on. All Gulf countries, except for Qatar, had a strategic interest in containing the Yemeni Uprising for regime security and geographical proximity concerns (Kamrava 2012, p. 96). Yemen, which connectively overlooks the Arabian and Red Seas through the strategic strait of Bab al-Mandeb, is the heart of Gulf security. Therefore, the eruption of a liberal uprising could have a domino effect given proximity, having the Arab Spring proved transnational. Second, the fact that the formerly competing political parties – the GPC and the JMP in particular – signed the agreement eventually meant that the uprising somewhat appeared as a political crisis, leading to elite reproduction, and traditional intra-elite competition while sidelining youth – who ignited the uprising – and potential spoilers (i.e., the Houthis) (Heydemann 2016).

Third, short implementation timeline marked a major challenge to the success of the agreement. The first phase, which encompassed the transfer of power from President Saleh to his Vice President Hadi, the formation of a power-sharing government and a Military Affairs Committee, and holding early presidential elections, materialized by February 21, 2012. However, the great share of hurdles lied in the second phase, which envisioned substantive reforms and national reconciliation. A 2-year set of laborious processes comprised constitutional drafting, convening the NDC to resolve major issues (i.e., Southern question, Sa'adah wars, the shape of state), electoral reform, and organizing parliamentary and presidential elections (Feierstein 2019). Largely because the constitutional reform, for example, was incomplete by the end of the 2 years, the UN-monitored NDC extended the presidency tenure of President Hadi (Day 2014).

Fourth, the deal granted security guarantees (i.e., accountability immunity) to the two signatories but neither limited Saleh's political activism nor preconditioned his isolation overseas to avert misusing security guarantees. By maintaining a political space for the 33-year president, who retained the GPC's chairmanship, the GCC initiative, deliberately or inadvertently, allowed Saleh to pursue political maneuvering with assurances and weakened unaccountability, thus overlooking the possibility of Saleh becoming a spoiler (Petschulat 2012, p. 6; Salmutter 2017, p. 8). The Houthis-Saleh covert alliance, which was reportedly formed following the conclusion of the NDC in late January 2014, to oust President Hadi and revenge from the JMP is a case point. Not only did Saleh use his wide tribal network to facilitate Houthi advancements from Sa'adah to Amran, but he also deployed Republican Guard forces and funneled medium and heavy arms (Shuja Al-deen 2020; al-Jazeera 2016).

Hurdles During Implementation

The shortcomings of the GCC initiative's design surfaced during the second phase of the transition. Poor management of potential and de facto spoilers, coupled with dwindling regional and international commitment to the transitional peace process, cordial/antagonistic geopolitical vicinity, and intra-government competition, heavily contributed to the collapse of the peace process and resumption of hostilities.

Domestic Hurdles

First, peaceful transition processes occurred in concurrence with military incursions and destabilizing activities, without credible local and external opposition. For example, the Houthi displacement of the Salafists in Dammaj – a district southeast Sa'adah – in January 2014 occurred, while the former's delegation participated in Yemen's largest and most inclusive reconciliation platform ever: the NDC (Popp 2015). The Houthis had used the Arab Spring distraction to impose autonomy in Sa'adah, thus separating it from the central government, and the 10-month conference to expand territorial control in the periphery and thus increase their bargaining chips vis-à-vis all actors. Add to that the sabotage of oil and gas pipelines became “more frequent, more regular and better organized since President Saleh stepped down from office in 2011” by “those seeking to derail the NDC outcomes” (UNSC 2015b, p. 36). The absence of a spoiler management mechanism, together with the fragility of the interim regime that left Dammaj takeover uncontested and ambiguous political rhetoric of the UNSC, the EU, and the GCC, sanctioned further destabilization.

Against this backdrop, the UNSC Resolution 2140 (2014a) belatedly formed a Panel of Experts – an investigatory committee to identify, report, and blacklist destabilizing actors – to control spoilers after the completion of the initial transitional duration. However, failure to assess, pinpoint violations, exercise pressure, and timely respond to alarming security developments in a country with deep divisions has contributed to the collapse of the transitional process, undermined the central authority, and reassured armed groups. Saleh, for example, had only been put on the list of targeted sanctions by November 2014, 2 months after he facilitated the Houthi takeover of Sana'a (UNSC 2014b).

Second, the 50/50 power-sharing formula resulted in intra-bureaucratic rivalry within the National Unity Government (NUG), deepening intra-elite power struggle. This turned state institutions ineffective and therefore doubled burden on President Hadi's fragile transitional regime, creating a power vacuum (Lackner 2016, p. 66). Asseburg and Wimmen (2016) and Heydemann (2016) pointed that the failure of post-Arab Spring transformation broadly stems from the reproduction of ruling elite, thus stretching their influence over, if not hijacking, transitional peace processes. Caught in the middle between his ruling party and post-Arab Spring revolutionary forces, President Hadi – who was the Vice President of Saleh and the GPC – experienced mounting pressures that limited his regime's autonomy but ultimately increased Hadi's quest to tighten power grip.

To restructure the local power balance and minimize the number of active forces, the president, as a result, overlooked Houthi firefight in, for example, Amran governorate, including against state military establishments. A good illustration is describing the battle between Brigade 310 Armored, under the command Major General Hamid Al-Qushaibi (aligned with Islah), and the Houthis as rebellion outside state's jurisdiction (Neubauer 2015, p. 3). Furthermore, the Houthis could not win their march from Sa'adah to Sana'a without Saleh's military and logistical support in Amran; Saleh tactically aligned with the Houthis to covertly revenge from Islah; meanwhile, the Houthis used Saleh to access the Republican Guards, tribal network, and military assets (Al-Madhaji et al. 2015). As such, sustained intra-elite competition, coupled with poor governmental measures, continued Houthi armed rebellion, the complicity of Saleh, and ineffective UNSC management of spoilers, crippled Yemen's peaceful transition.

External Issues

Third, regional and international economic commitment to the peace process did not match diplomatic and political support, driven by ideational threats. Throughout the transitional duration, there has been barely any long-term Gulf and international investment to stabilize and reform Yemen to genuinely tackle corruption and offset domestic socioeconomic and security challenges (Abo al-Asrar 2013). Between 2012 and 2014, wealthy GCC monarchies alongside international actors pledged $10.9 billion to the transitional government of Yemen, mainly through the Friends of Yemen (FOY), to tackle immediate priorities but disbursed less than half, averaging at $4.9 billion (Ministry of Planning and International Cooperation 2016). While Saudi Arabia deposited $1 billion at the Central Bank of Yemen (CBY) to stabilize monetary measures and granted $2.2 billion in forms of food aids and petroleum commodities to cover local energy and humanitarian needs, the United Arab Emirates (UAE), for instance, disbursed 0% of $150 million pledged (Foreign and Commonwealth Office 2014).

Largely because international donors had preconditioned disbursement of aid to immediate domestic reforms, including good governance, greater accountability and transparency measures, and more liberal economic policies, limited aid was disbursed, and more interestingly, tight measures deepened insecurities (Abo al-Asrar 2013). In reaction to increasing World Bank pressure, the NUG announced partial removal of fuel subsidies in mid-2014, thus sharply increasing fuel prices and local frustration due to mounting economic hardships, which the Houthi insurgents opportunistically instrumentalized to gain public support given opposition vacuum (Feierstein 2019, p. 15). Not only have fuel protests allowed the Houthis to temporarily fill the political vacuum given their manipulative claim to defend public demands but also expanded their public base before their takeover of Sana'a. Therefore, short-term, dependency-based, conditional foreign interventions maintained, if not deepened, the fragility of the transitional regime, contrary to clause 12 of UNSC Resolution 2051 (2012) that accentuated the significance of bolstering foreign aid to help the country overcome security, political, and macroeconomic challenges (Sharp 2015, p. 24). It can be inferred that regional and international actors adopted short-sighted measures that merely mitigated and/or delayed the intensification of the conflict.

Fourth, the rising role of the GCC's regional rival, Iran, also sabotaged the peace process.

While the Arab Spring triggered regime security concerns in the Gulf, it opened a window of opportunity for Tehran to use the 2011 geopolitical distraction to strengthen the Houthis' foothold in Yemen, expand its regional influence at cheap cost, and instill long-term Gulf instability (Esfandiary and Tabatabai 2016, p. 165). Notwithstanding that the scale of Iranian military, financial, advisory, and logistical support to its partner, the Houthis – if not proxy – remains highly classified and therefore unmeasurable; the US Navy and Yemeni Coast Guards' January 2013 interception of "Jihan 1" ship carrying surface-to-air missiles (SAMs), radar systems, 2.6 t of explosives, anti-aircraft missiles, and Katyusha rockets off the country's coast shows that the Iranian role to support the Houthis has been largely underestimated (Knights 2016). Worth noting, multiple illicit arms consignments were detected and intercepted throughout the conflict, aside from the US Department of State's $15 million bounty offer on information leading to the capture of Abdul Reza Shahla'i, a high-ranking commander in Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps operating in Yemen (Sharp 2020, p. 10).

Fifth, heightening geopolitical rivalry between GCC member states made Yemen's neighborhood less cordial to the peace process. While Qatar reinforced support to Islah to stretch its sphere of regional influence, the UAE and Saudi Arabia maintained ties with Saleh, demonstrated antagonism toward the Muslim Brotherhood (MB) by channeling aid, for example, to install President Abdel-Fatah Al-Sisi in Egypt as a replacement to President Mohammed Morsi, and designated MB a terrorist entity in 2014 (Khatib 2013, p. 419; Matthiesen 2015, p. 4). Although GCC countries had earlier accepted Islah, who dominates the JMP, as an indirect party to the GCC initiative due to perceived ideational threat, the Islamist party, which is perceived as an MB affiliate, remained a source of concern (Yadav 2015, p. 9).

In late 2013, Sheikh Hameed al-Ahmar, a business tycoon, an Islahi politician and one of the ten sons of the gone Sheikh Abdullah, tacitly accused Saudi leadership of supporting regional coups from the hospital's emergency room – in reference to King Abdullah on Egyptian developments (Shabwaah Press 2013). Not only has this political rhetoric led to a degree of estrangement and further tensions between al-Ahmar family and the Saudis – which have sporadically piled up since the death of Sheikh Abdullah and most significantly surfaced after the Arab Spring uprising, but it has allegedly triggered covert Gulf policy to weaken al-Ahmar as a traditional center of power in the post-1962 order and the growing influence of Islah alike, including through unexplained underestimation and disregard of Houthi capture of territory throughout 2014 despite having a record of hostile intentions (Hearst 2015). A series of leaked calls between Saleh and GPC-loyal tribal Sheikhs, such as Sheikh Mabkhoot al-Mahsreqi and Sheikh Mojahed Abu-Shoareb, establish that the ex-president played a major role in the fall of Amran province to the Houthis – with or without coordination with anti-Islah regional actors (Al-Jazeera 2016; al-Jazeera Arabic 2016). Anyhow, intra-GCC competition laid the red carpet for Iran to deepen and broaden its involvement in Saudi backyard, Yemen.

The Houthi Coup d'État: A Gateway to Military Intervention and Beyond

On September 21, 2014, the Houthis, in liaison with Saleh, stormed Sana'a and imposed the National Peace and Partnership Agreement (NPPA), not without covert coordination with UN Special Envoy for Yemen Jamal Benomar who visited Sa'adah around then, thus taking Yemen's transitional process to the unknowns (Al-Muslimi 2015). The NPPA dissolved the NUG, formed a new cabinet, heightened friction between the two signatories of the GCC initiative, and enervated the interim regime. The Houthis immediately formed revolutionary committees to shadow state institutions and deployed militias and Saleh's Republican Guards to several Yemeni cities, including the port city of Hodeida and Bayda, to stretch territorial control. In the first quarter of 2015, developments unfolded quick. The Houthis house-arrested the president and newly appointed Prime Minister Khaled Mahfoudh Bahah, forced both to tender resignation and announced the so-called constitutional declaration on February 6, 2015, instead of pushing the parliament to accept the resignations and legitimize the coup d'état. The insurgency that marched from Sa'adah to Amran dismissed then UNSC Resolution 2201 (2015a) that deplored Houthi unilateral actions, demanding their withdrawal of forces from cities captured, surrender from state institutions and handover of heavy arms seized, unconditional engagement in peace talks, and release high-level officials on February 15.

On February 21, the president fled to Aden, and withdrew resignation, thanks to lacking parliamentary endorsement. The Houthi-Saleh alliance deployed ground and air forces to hunt President Hadi. On March 21, Hadi announced Aden an interim capital, and GCC Defense Ministers discussed potential courses of action should Houthi-Saleh forces march to the strategic city of Aden (WAM 2020). They did. The Houthi armed rebellion and Saleh's complicity in the process launched a new chapter in Yemen's modern history.

The Arab Coalition

On March 26, 2015, Saudi Ambassador to the United States Adel al-Jubier announced the dawn of an ad hoc military campaign – known as the Arab Coalition – to deter the Houthi aggression, reinstate the Hadi regime in Sana'a, and curb Iranian influence in Yemen. Fearing the development of a Hezbollah-like hostile actor by its Southern backdoor, Saudi Arabia preemptively replaced its 2011 mediation role with coercion that is often characterized by military adventurism (Hokayem and Roberts 2016). Structurally, the coalition comprised over 10 Gulf and Sunni-led Muslim countries – Saudi Arabia, the UAE, Bahrain, Kuwait, Qatar, Sudan, Jordan, Morocco, Egypt, Pakistan, and ambiguously Malaysia – and enjoyed strategic UK and US support. While the participation of Morocco, Malaysia, and Pakistan, for instance, were symbolic to render international legitimacy to the coalition and largely driven by economic pragmatism to reap benefits from Riyadh, intelligence, diplomatic, and logistical contributions made by the United Kingdom and the United States were relatively associated with increasing arms procurement in Riyadh and Abu Dhabi (Jalal 2020).

The coalition's proclaimed accomplishments include foiling the Houthis' full control of Yemen, pushing AQAP out of Mukalla, liberating the country's coast except for Hodeida, and – temporary – the restoration of the Republican Government of Yemen (RGOY) to Aden. Although the coalition pursued a battlefield denial strategy through ensuring air superiority and excessive reliance on airpower, the overall operational military effectiveness appears mediocre at best (Shield 2018). By examining the distribution of power on the ground, it can be observed that the Yemeni regime in 2020 is far weaker than in 2016 and faces UAE-sponsored menaces alongside the Houthi rebellion. In the first quarter of 2020, the Houthis reversed gains in the sluggish frontline of Nihm near 40KM east Sana'a; meanwhile, the UAE-backed STC and its military affiliates forced the government of the interim capital, Aden, in August 2019 and announced self-administration in April 2020 under the purview of the coalition. Overall, the “current geopolitical map of Yemen effectively sums up the results of the five-year war” (Nagi 2020b).

Issues Within the Arab Coalition

Several setbacks stem from inherited vulnerabilities within the coalition and developments during the long-drawn-out conflict. First, although the coalition has a Joint Forces Command to manage the operational, tactical, and strategic theaters of war, the lack of institutionalizing such multilateral structure enabled coalition partners to navigate in uncharted waters and ultimately caused incongruity. For example, the April 2018 uncoordinated UAE deployment of troops and tanks in Socotra island – some 950 km from Aden – instigated an official Yemeni complaint at the UNSC, describing it “unjustified military action” (UNSC 2018). This came a few years after the UAE had invested in training, financing, and arming over 100,000 personnel outside state command-and-control structures, for which the UN Panel of Experts concluded Abu Dhabi has been “undermining the authority of the legitimate government” in liberated territories (UNSC 2018a, p. 19; 2019, p. 20). This episode of tensions between the Yemeni and UAE governments exemplifies poor coordination mechanisms, manifests intra-coalition cracks, and reveals Abu Dhabi’s questionable intentions that the “continuation of . . . misunderstanding . . . can no longer be concealed” (UNSC 2018b).

Second, leading coalition partners has varying intensities of interests. Riyadh, who shares the Southern border with Yemen, has both vital and strategic interests. While Saudi’s vital interest lies in protecting the country’s bordering region and critical infrastructure from Houthi infiltration, and drone and ballistic missile attacks, its strategic interests included the construction of an oil pipeline in al-Mahra to divert oil supplies from Hormuz strait, thus gaining direct access to the Arabian Sea and bypassing Iranian threats (Nagi 2020a). Needless to point, having a cordial regime in Sana’a is another Saudi strategic interest. By comparison, Abu Dhabi has a geo-economic interest in reconrolling Yemen’s port of Aden since the abrogation of the rental agreement in 2012 and a geo-strategic interest in controlling Yemen’s Socotra archipelago for tourism and military purposes to stretch influence on the two edges of the Gulf of Aden, thus cementing the UAE’s geopolitical role in the Horn of Africa and Arabian Peninsula. Such diverse regional interests, albeit with potential tacit understanding, transpired in emerging spheres of influence in Yemen, where the UAE enjoyed greater clout in, say, Aden and Hadramawt, meanwhile, KSA in al-Mahra (Ulrichsen 2018, p. 31).

Third, the two allies – Abu Dhabi and Riyadh – have not only had overlapping and divergent interests but seemingly several battles within a predefined battle. In addition to countering the Houthi threat with its ally – Saudi Arabia – the UAE waged two additional battles. While it engaged in trilateral counterterrorism campaigns with the United States mainly against AQAP, the deputy chief of staff of the UAE’s armed forces, Lt. Gen. Eisa Saif al-Mazrouei, revealed a third battle vis-à-vis “the Muslim Brotherhood and their fifth column” (WAM 2020). For instance, the UAE feared that liberation of Taiz – a key province that connects Dhale and Lahj provinces and directly overlooks Bab al-Mandeb strait and Perim Island – would empower Islah (Bonneyoy 2019, pp. 25–26). Such tripartite threat perception manifests that an examination of the coalition as a monolithic entity yields inadequate analytical power of developments on the ground, assuming the coalition has merely fought the Houthis and not also turned the battle within the coalition and imposed caveats – whether to pursue its interests or accommodate big power reservations.

Fourth, the poor performance of the Yemeni regime and its inability to build a functioning model in the interim capital has been problematic. Widespread corruption made the situation worse (Said 2019). Since the liberation of Aden in July 2015, successive wartime governments have been preoccupied with conflict dynamics rather than robustly establishing their respective ministries, improving service delivery, and building the capacity of civil servants in Aden. The appointment of public officials who lack both practical expertise and political astuteness has been a leading cause to failure; the absence of effective oversight by the Anti-Corruption Committee and Central Organization for Control and Accountability left such problems intensify unchecked. For instance, mounting levels of corruption in the Army exemplified in, say, tens of thousands of “ghost soldiers” or in the most lucrative sector, fuel imports and exports, by awarding fuel contracts to actors tied to warring parties deepened war economy and patronage dynamics (Sana’a Center for Strategic Studies 2018, pp. 29–34). These issues, as a result, caused relative power vacuum and ultimately eroded the authority of the government as intra-coalition dilemmas increasingly surfaced, while considering the shortage of resources had put succeeding governments in an unfavorable position.

Fifth, coupled with the quest to preserve remaining autonomy in decision-making while manifesting unclouded resistance to accommodate regional interests through diplomacy and compromise, divisions within the coalition surfaced, and government insecurities deepened to the point that the UAE, directly and indirectly, constrained its presence in Aden. The April 2016 appointment of Lt. Gen. Ali Mohsen al-Ahmar, who is perceived as pro-Islah, replacing Vice President and Prime Minister Bahah, who enjoyed regional and international support, has amplified discontent and distrust in Abu Dhabi, and less Riyadh. From the coalition's perspective, power asymmetry should have led the Yemeni leadership to consult high-level appointments with coalition lead. Furthermore, Essam Shuraim, a member of the Consultative Council, pointed President Hadi's rejection of the UAE's proposal to control Socotra under a 99-year lease prompted the latter to establish counterbalancing proxies to achieve its strategic interests, undermining the mandate of its intervention as per UNSC Resolution 2216 (Shuraim 2020).

Militarily, several high-level statesmen and military commanders exposed the coalition's reservation to autonomously arm the Yemeni Army and deal with the Hadi regime as an equal, contrary to Iran that has illicitly supplied rockets, drones, and missiles to the Houthi rebels. For instance, Maj. Gen. Mohsen Khasrouf, the former chief of Yemen's Armed Forces Moral Guidance Department, pointed the coalition's hesitancy to equip the army with heavy arms stems from ambiguous intentions and accused the UAE of instrumentalizing the guise of countering Islah to achieve its strategic ambitions along Yemen's coast (Khasrouf 2020). A UN Panel of Experts 2020 report further concluded that "coalition support to regular forces of the Government of Yemen has been inadequate, leading to an incapacity of the Government to conduct significant military operations" (UNSC 2020, p. 9).

Paradoxically, the UAE had transferred western heavy arms, including armored vehicles, anti-tank missiles, thermal missiles, G6 howitzers, tanks, and Mine-Resistant Ambush Protected to non-state actors, in potential violation of "end-user" guidelines of western governments (David et al. 2019, pp. 31–32; Sharp 2020, pp. 11–12). Recipients of mainly UAE-diverted western arms include its proxies that opposed the Yemeni regime under coalition's sight, such as the Security Belt Forces, who assumed security control of Aden. Far and beyond sponsorship of counterbalancing actors, the pinnacle of enmity between the UAE and Yemeni regime manifested in late August 28–29, 2020, when the first launched airstrikes on the latter's forces – under flawed claims of counterterrorism – to prevent its recapture of Aden, killing and injuring over 300 personnel (Sharp 2019, p. 8).

Fort these reasons, a military victory under the coalition's command is likely out of sight, especially that coalition's power has considerably dwarfed. The suspension of Qatar involvement in June 2017 followed by the withdrawal of both Malaysia and Morocco in 2018 and 2019, respectively, alongside significant Sudanese military drawdown – reportedly on a UAE request – from nearly 30,000 to 657 troops as of mid-January 2020, substantially weakened the coalition (Al-Ashwal 2020; Jalal 2020). The alleged withdrawal of the UAE in February 2020, under which the UAE departed from strategic direct to indirect engagement as it retains a small military presence in several positions, continues to flag many concerns, including on the future shape of Yemen.

The Southern Question and Fall of Aden

The formation of the Southern Hirak in mid-2007 marked the resurgence of secessionist sentiments in the country's south, demanding secession and therefore challenging the shape of the modern Yemeni state. This came after retired military and security commanders, who voluntarily left or were forcibly removed from service following the 1994 war, demanded their reemployment and payment of salaries. Although the government allocated YER 27 billion (around $128 million) and rectified the status of 74,457 personnel and retirees, perceived local grievances continued to spiral (Fakirah 2008, p. 10). Issues of unequal distribution of power and wealth, political hegemony of the highland in North, corruption, and poor development agenda outside the center are certainly sources of frustration.

Post-Arab Spring developments that placed Hadi, a southern political figure from Abyan governorate, as a transitional president offer a generic account of primary characteristics in secessionist movements or separatist strategic thought. First, communities in Yemen's south thought that rising instability in the country's political system would pave the way for self-determination and independence (Gaston 2014, p. 5). By boycotting the 2012 presidential referendum as per the GGC initiative and under Yemeni laws – or endorsing the Houthi armed rebellion in September 2014 – separatist factions and influenced communities attempted to challenge the legitimacy of Yemen's southern president and undermine formal, constitutional processes of power transfer (France24 2012).

Second, it is noteworthy to point there has been barely tangible compromises to reduce the country's many problems forward, despite increased representation across domains. The NDC, for example, allocated 50% quota for Southerners across the public sector, to resolve the long-standing issue of unequal distribution of power – despite the colossal disparity in population, noting the North is more populous by over threefold. The NDC Outcomes document states “the South shall have a 50% representation in all leadership structures in the executive, legislative and judicial bodies, including the armed and security forces, and in levels where appointments are made by the President of the Republic or the Prime Minister” (Comprehensive National Dialogue Conference 2014). Despite corrective measures led by President Hadi, the Southern struggle was not over, nor satisfied at least.

Third, several groups in the HIRAK boycotted political processes and reconciliatory efforts, such as the NDC (Zyck 2014, p. 7). This drawback exhibits a hardline position and a failure to constructively engage in addressing accumulated grievances to identify a win-win solution that improves living conditions and service delivery, pushes for equitable distribution of wealth, and deepens political participation and decentralization processes. Yemen's unitary structure and kleptocratic dominance of Saleh's regime, as well as the Southern' resistance to cooperate in developing corrective measures during President Hadi's tenure, have together “added an extra layer of complexity to the country's problems” (Feierstein 2019, p. 3).

Fourth, political alignments of Southern factions have been very volatile that some entities are likely to cooperate with any actor supportive of their endeavor or at least pretend to. Aidarous al-Zubaidi, who now leads the Southern Transitional Council (STC) – a UAE-sponsored secessionist entity formed in May 2017 – publicly endorsed the Houthi ascent to power through armed rebellion and acknowledged receipt of Iranian support in the name of Southern Resistance (Aden News 2017).

Fifth, the secessionist cause became a tool for external actors to increase their regional influence and a bargaining chip for local actors to achieve political objectives and share power. Regionally, the UAE had organized the Southern Resistance under security and regional belts outside the auspices of the Yemeni establishment it came to aid to pursue its strategic interests and geopolitical ambitions. Iran, according to some Southern leaders, had ties with and given support to HIRAK's leaders, including former President Ali Salem al-Beidh (Stille 2017, p. 121).

Domestically, Maj. Gen. Ahmed bin Buraik, who adopted federalist rhetoric when President Hadi appointed him as a governor of Hadramawt in 2016, later vowed support for the separatist STC. The formation of the STC itself came after the president sacked Aidarous and Hani bin Buraik in April 2017, who were the governor of Aden and a state minister, respectively, for collusion with foreign powers (Al-Haj 2017). The STC presidential commission comprises two former ministers and five governors, whose performance was mediocre. It can be inferred that changing loyalties and fluid realignments have been problematic for the government and the southern cause alike, a reflection of the prevalent opportunistic competition over wealth and power.

Sixth, there are multiple actors in the South, but there is no representative for the secessionist cause. In addition to a multitude of southern and eastern entities – such as the Southern National Coalition, Reference for the Tribal Alliance of Wadi Hadramawt, Coalition of the Southern Revolution Forces, and Southern National Salvation Council, the UAE-backed STC might be the most powerful militarily and despotic politically but remains only one of many actors (Lackner 2016, p. 27). According to a Yemen Polling Center 2019 survey, only 37% of Southerners support the STC, with Lahj as a strong foothold (Transfeld 2019). This indicates that neither the STC nor other actors represent the southern question in isolation, contrary to the mainstream assumption that oversimplifies the complexity in Yemen's south.

Seventh, microlevel dynamics suggest that the southern region has yet to be a single front or, more accurately, has different aspirations. Hadramawt, a rich and vast province in the east, has a Hadhrami vision isolated from the pre-1990 or the post-British decolonization order, most evident in Hadramawt Conference's desire for the province to be a federal region (Al-Dawsari 2017). Al-Mahra, next to Hadramawt, leans more toward federalism and is largely preoccupied with navigating its border security with Oman and increasing Saudi activities through a long-nurtured "Mahri code of conduct," and widely opposes the UAE-backed STC (Nagi 2020a). On the other hand, Abyan, President Hadi's hometown, and Dale and Lahj, the base of STC's chief and his deputy, respectively, embody ongoing tensions, where "the alignments of the 1986 conflict largely overlap with the current rivalry" that resulted in a bloody conflict, killing over 10,000 people within days (Al-Hamdani and Lackner 2020, p. 25). Tensions on who controls the South seem to be centered in the South's center.

Against these attributes, the fall of Aden for the first time since 1994 to the UAE-backed STC following its armed rebellion that forced the government out of Aden in August 2019 and its subsequent announcement of self-administration from Abu Dhabi in April 2020 are signs of further state erosion, growing regional intervention, and rising domestic instability in the south. Contrary to most secessionist factions that upheld peaceful political rhetoric and protests, the emergence of the STC marks a departure from peaceful to armed struggle for separatism, an indication that the situation will likely get more complex given incompatible aspirations and views. Its reliance on foreign support, coupled with an unprecedented diversion of state revenues in Aden and theft of CBY containers, speaks volumes on the region's future and sparks doubtful questions on whether it can unify the Southern movement or revive a cycle of violence.

Crisis Management or Conflict Resolution Efforts?

Having explored the issues and challenges to the UN-endorsed, Gulf-sponsored peace agreement (2011–2014) and the multifaceted layers of the conflict, this section briefly unpacks the UN-led peace process past the intensification of the conflict in March 2015. Broadly, there has been barely any tangible progress despite continuous engagement, coupled with a major departure from guided, nationwide peace talks to piecemeal consultations that normalized evolving realities, including recent armed activities of non-state actors, and remains driven by a reactionary sense of crisis management rather than conflict resolution efforts. In reaffirmation of its February resolution 2201, the UNSC unanimously adopted S/RES 2216, a resolution that arguably put forward the contours of mediation for UN envoys. Acting under Chapter VII, it decried the Houthi coup d'état, called them to "relinquish all additional arms seized," to "refrain from further unilateral actions," to "withdraw...forces from all areas...seized," and urged all groups to engage in peace talks (UNSC 2015c).

Between 2015 and 2016, UN Special Envoy Ismail Ould Cheikh hosted talks in Switzerland and Kuwait, with the latter discussing substantial issues around UNSC resolution 2216, including transitional security, military and political measures (i.e., unity government, disarmament, withdrawal of militias, relinquishing heavy arms), and prisoners' release. The envoy then pointed out that the sequencing of the political roadmap presented was problematic; however, the parties developed a broader understanding (United Nations 2016). While the Houthis and Saleh's GPC prioritized political measures to reach a comprehensive agreement, the government put military and security measures first to ensure that a reconciliation government does not become a victim of retained forces and militias – largely reminiscent of the Houthi-imposed NPPA (Al-Dawsari 2017). From the viewpoints of the UN, the coalition, and the Yemeni regime then, UNSC Resolution 2216 and relevant peace references marked the contours of discussions in a bid to restore status quo ante bellum; meanwhile, the Houthis believed the de facto status quo should change negotiations framework. Eventually, the warring parties and the international community lost confidence in the envoy, and talks never resumed until Ould Cheikh was replaced in February 2018.

Toward Piecemeal, Fragmentary Peace Efforts

The appointment of Martin Griffiths, a former British diplomat and a muscled mediator, as the third envoy for Yemen marked a departure from comprehensive to piecemeal peace approach and a restart from the “zero point.” First, instead of building on evolving common ground that collapsed but remains a good resumption point, Griffiths rebooted the process and started from square zero, dedicating the first few months to re-map the conflict, meet Yemeni groups in and outside Yemen, and understand developments after the assassination of Saleh in 2017 (McElroy 2018).

Second, with the battle for the port city of Hodeida intensifying, Griffiths, in cooperation with bigger powers, UN agencies and advocacy groups, attempted to constrain the battle and revive the peace process, eventually falling into the crisis management trap. In August 2018, Griffiths made clear to the UNSC that Hodeida is the “center of gravity of the war,” alluding to the battle’s strategic significance from a military standpoint, however used potential humanitarian semblance of the battle to arouse international public opinion and secure greater diplomatic support that ultimately gave peace elusive chances (Office of the Special Envoy of The Secretary-General for Yemen 2018). The Houthi conditional abandonment of Geneva consultations in September – despite the arrival of government delegation to Geneva and the coalition’s military advantage on the ground – is a case in point.

Following the collapse of Geneva consultations due to Houthi inflexibility, the UAE-led Joint Forces renewed the military campaign to capture Hodeida ports. Thanks to unmatched diplomatic and political support Griffiths enjoyed from London, the UK Foreign Secretary Jeremy Hunt shuttled between Riyadh, Abu Dhabi, and Tehran to freeze the battle for the Hodeida and pave the way for piecemeal talks again (Sanchez 2018). For its part, the UN Humanitarian Coordinator for Yemen, Lise Grande, visited the port of Hodeida during the firefight to advocate humanitarian costs, a bold signal of international rejection of the battle for clear and obscure motives (Xinhua 2019). These efforts eventually culminated in the December 2018 Stockholm Agreement, where UK and US pressure made it possible, not local consensus (Salisbury 2018). The Agreement comprised three subsidiary documents: the Hodeida Ceasefire Agreement – a deal characterized by strategic ambiguity open to multiple interpretations, a nominal half-page document on Taiz, and a mechanism on swapping 15,000 prisoners. The latter issue has been ongoing and not new. In fact, a local tribal mediator, Sheikh Naji Murait, facilitated the release of over 2500 prisoners, a figure many times over that of the UN (Al-Jabrani 2019).

Third, by focusing mainly on Hodeida, the UN envoy froze the quest for a nationwide negotiated political settlement between February 2018 and at least June 2020, getting lost in the ambiguous provisions of the Hodeida Agreement, which remains unrealized hitherto. Fourth, the Hodeida deal, endorsed by UNSC resolutions 2451 and 2452, contradicts S/RES 2216 that reinforces the right of the Yemeni government to regain control of all captured cities, including Hodeida and its strategic ports, through which majority of imported goods flow to the country (Jalal 2019). However, Palik (2019) pointed that UNSC “resolution 2216 is not a viable framework for negotiations” largely because it “limits the Special Envoys’ bargaining space and it does not address the influence of other conflict parties,” let alone that the Houthis consider it a “setback.”

Fifth, although the 2018 Agreement led to a temporary de-escalation in Hodeida due to a reduction in heavy firefight, violence in several other frontlines (i.e., Taiz, Dale, Abyan) intensified, with rebel groups becoming more emboldened, and increasing their presence at the expense of the government (Blaxter 2020). In the north, the Houthis captured Hajjur, Hajjah, a few months after the agreement and militarily took over Nihm and the capital city of al-Jawf, al-Hazm, in the first quarter of 2020, following an unannounced de-escalation with Saudi Arabia in late 2019 that led to a significant reduction of air raids, and enabled the Houthis to regroup, rearm, and redeploy forces. Southward, KSA brokered the Riyadh Agreement on November 5, 2019, between the UAE-backed STC and the Yemeni government after the STC forced the government out of Aden, and firefight extended to the governorate of Shabwa, an extension of intra-coalition flaws and current estrangement between Emirati and Yemeni governments. While the Riyadh deal may have solved representation issue for the STC in UN-led peace talks, it, however, marks a continuation of fragmentary peace and crisis management processes, questioning whether inclusion in peace processes is a byproduct of violence, at the expense of peaceful actors. Al-Dawsari (2017) noted that the “peace process must depart from elite-focused affair into an inclusive process,” where the inclusion of marginalized actors like peaceful southern groups, the Tehami Hirak, women, and youth remains crucial to address the array of issues the country is facing.

Overall, Griffiths’ piecemeal approach has, directly or indirectly, contributed to the longevity of conflict whose active players on the ground have proliferated beyond the traditional binary of when the conflict intensified. While rising armed rebellion continues to weaken the fragile authority of the last elected Yemeni regime, division in the coalition’s front cedes greater leverage for the Houthis after they consolidated power in Sana’a. This puts Yemen at a dangerous juncture, considering the multifaceted layers of the conflict, changing distribution of power on the ground and the current mediation trends under Griffiths, of having a fragile peace agreement – under international pressure – that ultimately normalizes armed rebellion, thus continuing in a cycle of endless conflicts.

Summary

This chapter explained how the conflict in Yemen evolved from an accumulated set of deep-seated, multifaceted, and unresolved issues during Saleh’s 33-year tenure into a complex armed conflict, whose local, regional, and international contours are increasingly blurry. The reason why Yemen failed is no secret: Saleh failed to build robust state institutions when he had the golden chance to do otherwise. And the reason why the country’s transitional peace process collapsed and entered a full-scale armed conflict is also no surprise: the continuation of Houthi armed rebellion under conditions of central authority’s fragility, poor regional and international timely stabilizing measures, enduring intra-GCC and intra-elite competition, the instrumentalization of grievances, and fluid alignments and re-alignments in the country. These factors continue to dictate and redefine the breadth and depth of current conflict dynamics and fragile peace trajectories.

The following points sum some of the ideas presented. First, the security and political challenges that questioned the legitimacy of the country’s longest-serving president as well as the shape and political system of Yemen continued to play out hitherto, with rising Gulf and Iranian roles. Of all, the Houthi rebellion that artfully expanded since 2004 and seized state military capabilities after 2014, capitalizing on the political divide to use its adversaries for its strategic ends and exploiting peace agreements and ceasefires to develop realities on the ground, offers a good understanding of the insurgency’s intentions. Second, lack of credible, strategic international and regional support to stabilize the country’s transitional authority only delayed the outbreak of a full-scale war, after the GCC initiative collapsed when the Houthi rebels resorted to violence while they were negotiating details at the NDC. Interestingly, these flaws stretched throughout the military intervention of the Arab Coalition, thus contributing to the polarization of the conflict, further fragmentation, and a second coup d’état in Aden, contrary to the coalition’s proclaimed objectives.

Third, the proliferation of armed groups as the conflict dragged on unresolved, both militarily and politically, poses long-term challenges to post-war recovery and reconstruction, disarmament, and establishment of a national army. Fourth, the Southern question has dragged without compromises for years despite reconciliatory attempts, but the evolving landscape in the South during the conflict will likely increase the complexity of dynamics. Fifth, the role of UN Special Envoys appeared more successful when Yemen's vicinity, GCC countries, was diplomatically rather than militarily engaged. Certainly, the Stockholm Agreement gave the Houthis a chance to not be weakened militarily; however, unfolding events played to rebel groups' advantage. Finally, the future of Yemen is quite cloudy but can be imagined in its recent past and its regional neighborhood in the Arabian Peninsula and the African Horn, especially if the war were to end through a politically negotiated settlement. Between separatist and Imamate advocates, as well as rising foreign interference and exploitation, wartime fragmentation is likely to continue, until the distribution of power changes in favor of one at the expense of others. For now, Yemen has been in a cycle of seemingly endless conflicts, until the causes of conflict cycles and fragile peace processes are addressed equitably.

Cross-References

- ▶ Intractable Conflict
- ▶ Peace Agreements
- ▶ Peace Measuring Approaches
- ▶ Search for Peace, the
- ▶ Troubles, The: The Northern Ireland Conflict
- ▶ War and Peace in Somalia

References

Abo al-Asrar, F. (2013). Myopic solutions to chronic problems: The need for aid effectiveness in Yemen (Working paper). Stanford: Center on democracy, Development, and The Rule of Law, Stanford University.

- Acemoglu, D., & Robinson, J. (2012). Why nations fail: The origins of power, prosperity, and poverty. New York: Crown Business.
- Aden News. (2017, May 16). Sacked Aden governor Aidroos Al-Zubaidi, in a previous statement, "We will stand with Mr. Abdul-Malik Al-Houthi". Retrieved from Aden News: <https://www.adennews.net/story/3663>. Accessed 5 June 2020.
- Al-Ashwal, A. (2020, February 3). Sudanese troops continue exit from war-stricken Yemen. Retrieved from Al-Monitor: <https://www.al-monitor.com/pulse/originals/2020/01/yemen-sudan-pullout-troops-war-uae-saudi-arabia-coalition.html>. Accessed 30 May 2020.
- Al-Dawsari, N. (2017). Breaking the cycle of failed negotiations in Yemen. Washington, DC: Project on Middle East Democracy.
- Al-Dawsari, N. (2020, June 22). Yemen's tribes face the Houthis all alone. Retrieved from Middle East Institute: <https://www.mei.edu/blog/yemens-tribes-face-houthis-all-alone>. Accessed 23 June 2020.
- Al-Haj, A. (2017, April 2017). Yemen's president fires minister, Aden governor. Retrieved from the Associated Press: <https://apnews.com/132d0a1a44874370aa96d54b067c626d/Yemen-s-president-fires-minister,-Aden-governor>. Accessed 10 June 2020.
- Al-Hamdani, R., & Lackner, H. (2020). War and pieces: Political divides in southern Yemen. London: The European Council on Foreign Relation.
- Al-Jabrani, A. (2019, December 09). Yemeni tribal mediator hampered by Stockholm agreement calls on UN to learn from the tribes. Retrieved from Al-Masdar Online: <https://al-masdaronline.net/national/160>. Accessed 9 June 2020.
- Al-Jazeera. (2016, April 16). Leaked Call between Saleh and Sheikh al-Mashreqi before the Fall of Amran. Retrieved from Yemen Press: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=D7P6qaqx32M>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Al-Madhaji, M., Sidahmed, A., & Al-Muslimi, F. (2015). The role of regional actors in Yemen and opportunities for peace. Sana'a: Sana'a Center for Strategic Studies.
- Al-Muslimi, F. (2015). Why Yemen's political transition failed. Retrieved from <https://carnegie-mec.org/diwan/59803>. Accessed 18 May 2020.
- Alogail, F. (2015). The Houthi Movement (Ansar Allah) facing the coalition forces. Strategic Review, 8(5), 415–430.
- Al-Yemeni, A. H. (2003). The dynamic of democratisation – Political parties in Yemen. Bonn: Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung.
- Al-Jazeera Arabic. (2016, October 11). Exclusive, Leaked recording shows ex-President Saleh's threat to kill Army commanders. Retrieved from Al-Jazeera Arabic: <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=zdA5TEGuO5g>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Ardemagni, E. (2017). From insurgents to hybrid security actors? Deconstructing Yemen's Huthi movement. Milan: Institute for International Political Studies.

- Asseburg, M., & Wimmen, H. (2016). Dynamics of transformation, elite change and new social mobilization in the Arab world. Mediterranean Politics, 21(1), 1–22.
- Blaxter, L. (2020, January 1). Regional overview: Middle East 19–25 January 2020. Retrieved from Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project: <https://acleddata.com/2020/01/30/regional-overview-middle-east-19-25-january-2020/>. Accessed 9 June 2020.
- Bonnefoy, L. (2019). Sunni Islamist dynamics in context of war: What happened to al-Islah and the Salafis? In Politics, governance, and reconstruction in Yemen (pp. 23–26). Washington, DC: The Project on Middle East Political Science.
- Boucek, C. (2010). War in Saada: From Local Insurrection to National Challenge. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Brandt, M. (2017). Tribes and politics in Yemen: A history of the Houthi conflict. Oxford: Oxford University Press.
- Comprehensive National Dialogue Conference. (2014). National dialogue conference outcomes document. Sana'a: National Dialogue Conference General Secretariat.
- David, É., Turp, D., Wood, B., & Azarova, V. (2019). Opinion on the international legality of arms transfers to Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates and other members of the coalition militarily involved in Yemen. Antwerpen: International Peace Information Service.
- Day, S. W. (2010). The political challenge of Yemen's Southern Movement. Washington, DC: Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
- Day, S. W. (2012). Regionalism and rebellion in Yemen: A troubled National Union. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Day, S. W. (2014, January 27). The 'Non-conclusion' of Yemen's National Dialogue. Retrieved from Foreign Policy: <http://foreignpolicy.com/2014/01/27/the-non-conclusion-of-yemens-national-dialogue/>. Accessed 2 May 2020.
- Department of Treasury. (1990). Treasury reporting rates of exchange as of March 31 (p. 1990). Washington, DC: Financial Management Service, Department of Treasury.
- Esfandiary, D., & Tabatabai, A. (2016). Yemen: An opportunity for Iran–Saudi dialogue? Washington Quarterly, 39(2), 155–174.
- Fakirah, G. I. (2008). Yemen 2007: Domestic politics and foreign relations. In Gulf Strategic Report 2007–2008. Sharjah: Dar Al Khaleej for Press, Printing and Publishing.
- Fakirah, G. (2010). Seizing opportunities. In Yemen 2020: Future scenarios (pp. 35–52). Sana'a: Friedrich Ebert Foundation.
- Feierstein, G. (2019). Yemen: The 60-year war. Washington, DC: Middle East Institute.
- Foreign and Commonwealth Office. (2014, September 24). Friends of Yemen: How has it performed and where it is going? Steering Committee Report to the 8th friends of Yemen Ministerial Meeting. New York: Foreign and Commonwealth Office.
- Freeman, J. (2009). The al Houthi insurgency in the north of Yemen: An analysis of the Shabab al Moumineen. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism, 32(11), 1008–1019.
- Gaston, E. (2014). Process lessons learned in Yemen's National Dialogue. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Hearst, D. (2015, February 13). Was the UAE behind the Houthi takeover of Sana'a? Retrieved from Middle East Eye: <https://www.middleeasteye.net/news/was-uae-behind-houthi-takeover-sanaa>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Heydemann, S. (2016). Explaining the Arab uprisings: Transformations in comparative perspective. Mediterranean Politics, 21(1), 192–204.
- Hokayem, E., & Roberts, D. B. (2016). The war in Yemen. Survival, 58(6), 157–186.
- Jalal, I. (2019, September 16). Yemen's peace process: The Hodeida agreement that never was? Retrieved from Middle East Institute: <https://www.mei.edu/publications/yemens-peace-process-hodeida-agreement-never-was>. Accessed 31 May 2020.
- Jalal, I. (2020, April 2). Five years on, has the Arab coalition achieved its objectives in Yemen? Retrieved from Middle East Institute: <https://www.mei.edu/publications/five-years-has-arab-coalition-achieved-its-objectives-yemen>. Accessed 29 May 2020.
- Jordan, J. (2019, November 5). Baghdadi's death does not mean ISIS is defeated. Retrieved from Washington Post: <https://www.washingtonpost.com/>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Kamrava, M. (2012). The Arab spring and the Saudi-led counterrevolution. Orbis, 56(1), 96–104.
- Kenney, M. (2007). From Pablo to Osama: Trafficking and terrorist networks, government bureaucracies, and competitive adaptation. University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press.
- Khasrouf, M. (2020, May 15). Aref Al-Sarmi interviews major general Mohsen Khasrouf, former head of the moral guidance Department of the Yemeni Army. (A. al-Surmi, Interviewer).
- Khatib, L. (2013). Qatar's foreign policy: The limits of pragmatism. International Affairs, 89(2), 417–431.
- Knights, M. (2016, December 2). Responding to Iran's arms smuggling in Yemen. Retrieved from The Washington Institute for near East Policy: <https://www.washingtoninstitute.org/policy-analysis/view/responding-to-irans-arms-smuggling-in-yemen>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Knights, M. (2018). The Houthi War Machine: From guerrilla war to state capture. CTC Sentinel, 11(8), 15–23.
- Lackner, H. (2016). Yemen's 'Peaceful' transition from autocracy: Could it have succeeded? Stockholm: International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance.
- Matthiesen, T. (2015). The domestic sources of Saudi foreign policy: Islamists and the state in the wake of the Arab uprisings. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.
- McElroy, D. (2018, September 18). Yemen crisis back to 'square zero'. Retrieved from The National: <https://>

- www.thenational.ae/world/mena/yemen-crisis-back-to-square-zero-1.768150. Accessed 6 June 2020.
- Ministry of Planning and International Cooperation. (2016). Call to resume donor support to Yemen: Yemen socio-economic update no. 16. Aden: Ministry of Planning and International Cooperation.
- Moghadam, A. (2008). The Salafi-Jihad as a religious ideology. CTC Sentinel, 1(3), 14–16.
- Nagi, A. (2020a). Eastern Yemen's tribal model for containing conflict. Beirut: Carnegie Middle East Center.
- Nagi, A. (2020b, March 31). Five years of Yemen Conflict Yield Muddled picture for Saudi Coalition. Retrieved from Carnegie Middle East Center: <https://carnegie-mec.org/2020/03/31/five-years-of-yemen-conflict-yield-muddled-picture-for-saudi-coalition-pub-81406>. Accessed 25 May 2020.
- Neubauer, S. (2015). Chaos in Yemen: Implications for its future and the region. Washington, DC: The Arab Gulf States in Washington.
- Office of the Special Envoy of The Secretary-General for Yemen. (2018, August 2). Special envoy briefs the Security Council and announces consultations in September in Geneva. Retrieved from OSESGY: <https://osesgy.unmissions.org/special-envoy-briefs-security-council-and-announces-consultations-september-geneva>. Accessed 7 June 2020.
- Palik, J. (2019). Mediation in the Yemeni civil war: Actors, outcomes, and lessons learned. Oslo: Peace Research Institute Oslo (PRIO).
- Petschulat, T. O. (2012). Political change with pitfalls: An interim report on the Yemeni transition process. Berlin: Friedrich Ebert Stiftung.
- Popp, R. (2015). War in Yemen: Revolution and Saudi intervention. Zurich: Center for Security Studies.
- Porter, H. (2018). Screaming in the Face of the Arrogant: Understanding the Logic and Symbolism of Yemen's Huthi Movement. Chicago: University of Chicago.
- Pournik, M., & Abu-Ismaïl, K. (2011). The ADCR 2011: Poverty dynamics in Yemen as a representative Arab LDC. Cairo: United Nations Development Programme.
- Rashad, M. (2011, November 23). Yemen's Saleh signs deal to give up power. Retrieved from Reuters: <https://www.reuters.com/article/us-yemen/yemens-saleh-signs-deal-to-give-up-power-idUSTRE7AM0D020111123>. Accessed 3 May 2020.
- Said, O. (2019). The view from Aden: A shadow state between the coalition and civil war. Paris: Arab Reform Initiative.
- Salisbury, P. (2015). Yemen and the Saudi-Iranian 'Cold War'. London: Chatham House.
- Salisbury, P. (2018). Making Yemen's Hodeida Deal Stick. Retrieved from International Crisis Group: <https://www.crisisgroup.org/middle-east-north-africa/gulf-and-arabian-peninsula/yemen/making-yemens-hodeida-deal-stick>. Accessed 8 June 2020.
- Salmoni, B. A., Loidolt, B., & Wells, W. (2010). Regime and periphery in Northern Yemen: The Huthi Phenomenon. Washington, DC: RAND Corporation.
- Salmutter, K. (2017). Why did the transition process in Yemen fail? Paris: Sciences Po Kuwait Program.
- Sanchez, R. (2018). Hunt urges Saudi Arabia to 'seize the moment' and end Yemen war. Retrieved from The Telegraph: <https://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/2018/11/12/hunt-urges-saudi-arabia-seize-moment-end-yemen-war/>. Accessed 7 June 2020.
- Shabwaah Press. (2013, August 15). As "Al-Ahmar" attacks the "Gulf states", "Al-Islah Party" directs mosque preachers to support Egypt's brothers. Retrieved from Shabwaah Press: <https://shabwaah-press.info/news/8955>. Accessed 13 May 2020.
- Sharp, J. (2015). Yemen: Background and U.S. relations. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service.
- Sharp, J. (2019). Yemen: Civil war and regional intervention. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service.
- Sharp, J. (2020). Yemen: Civil war and regional intervention. Washington, DC: Congressional Research Service.
- Shield, R. (2018). The Saudi air war in Yemen: A case for coercive success through battlefield denial. Journal of Strategic Studies, 41(3), 461–489.
- Shuja Al-deen, M. (2020). The Houthis: From the Saada wars to Saudi intervention. Opinion piece. Sana'a Centre for Strategic Studies. <https://sanaacenter.org/ar/publications-all/analysis-ar/10213>. Accessed 16 June 2020.
- Shuraim, E. (2020, January 2). Member of the Yemeni Shura Council Essam Shraim: Hadi rejected a UAE request to lease Socotra island for 99 years. (J. Chahda, Interviewer).
- Stille, C. (2017). Iran's role in Yemen's civil war. The Pardee Periodical Journal of Global Affairs, 2(1), 115–129.
- The Sana'a Center for Strategic Studies. (2018). Beyond the business as usual approach: Combating corruption in Yemen. Sana'a: The Sana'a Center for Strategic Studies.
- Transfeld, M. (2019, November 22). Peace and state fragmentation in Yemen. Retrieved from Sada Journal, The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. <https://carnegieendowment.org/sada/80399>. Accessed 2 June 2020.
- Ulrichsen, K. (2018). Endgames for Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates in Yemen. In Politics, governance, and reconstruction in Yemen (pp. 31–33). Washington, DC: The Project on Middle East Political Science.
- United Nations. (2016, June 30). Note to Correspondents: Remarks by the Special Envoy of the Secretary-General for Yemen, Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed. Retrieved from United Nations Secretary-General: <https://www.un.org/sg/en/content/sg/note-correspondents/2016-06-30/note-correspondents-remarks-special-envoy-secretary>. Accessed 27 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2014a, February 26). S/RES/2140. Retrieved from UN Documents: https://www.undocs.org/S/RES/2140%20\(2014\)). Accessed 7 May 2020.

- United Nations Security Council. (2014b, November 7). Ali Abdullah Saleh. Retrieved from the United Nations: <https://www.un.org/securitycouncil/sanctions/2140/materials/summaries/individual/ali-abdullah-saleh>. Accessed 7 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2015a, February 15). S/RES/2201. Retrieved from the UNSCR: <http://unsr.com/en/resolutions/doc/2201>. Accessed 24 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2015b). Letter dated 20 February 2015 from the Panel of Experts on Yemen established pursuant to Security Council resolution 2140 (2014) addressed to the President of the Security Council. Retrieved from the United Nations: <https://reliefweb.int/sites/reliefweb.int/files/resources/N1500825.pdf>. Accessed 7 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2015c, April 14). UN documents for Yemen: Security Council resolution, S/RES/2216. Retrieved from Security Council Report: http://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF96FF9%7D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/s_res_2216.pdf. Accessed 24 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2018a, January 26). Final report of the Panel of Experts on Yemen. Retrieved from the UN Documents: <https://undocs.org/pdf?symbol=en/S/2018/68/CORR.1>. Accessed 28 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2018b, May 14). Letter dated 8 May 2018 from the Permanent Representative of Yemen to the United Nations addressed to the President of the Security Council. Retrieved from Security Council Report: https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF96FF9%7D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/s_2018_440.pdf. Accessed 28 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2019, January 25). Final report of the panel of experts on Yemen. Retrieved from Security Council Report: https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF96FF9%7D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/s_2019_83.pdf. Accessed 28 May 2020.
- United Nations Security Council. (2020, January 27). Retrieved from Security Council Report: https://www.securitycouncilreport.org/atf/cf/%7B65BF96FF9%7D27-4E9C-8CD3-CF6E4FF96FF9%7D/S_2020_70.pdf. Accessed 29 May 2020.
- WAM. (2020, February 9). UAE celebrates its sons participating in Arab Coalition in Yemen. Retrieved from Emirates News Agency: <https://wam.ae/en/details/1395302822487>. Accessed 31 May 2020.
- Whitaker, B. (2010, April 24). Yemen: Dancing on the heads of snakes by Victoria Clark. Retrieved from The Guardian: <https://www.theguardian.com/books/2010/apr/24/yemen-victoria-clark-review>. Accessed 27 April 2020.
- World Bank. (2015). The Republic of Yemen: Unlocking the potential for economic growth, a country economic memorandum. New York: MENA Macroeconomics and Fiscal Management Global Practice, The World Bank.
- World Bank. (2020). GDP growth (annual %) – Yemen Rep. Retrieved from World Bank: <https://data.worldbank.org/indicator/NY.GDP.MKTP.KD.ZG?end=2011&locations=YE&start=1991>. Accessed 1 May 2020.
- Xinhua. (2019, November 6). UN envoy inspects Yemen's Hodeidah. Retrieved from Xinhua Net: http://www.xinhuanet.com/english/2019-11/06/c_138531372.htm. Accessed 8 June 2020.
- Yadav, S. P. (2015). Yemen's Muslim brotherhood and the perils of power-sharing. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution.
- Yemeni Coalition to Monitor Human Rights Violations. (2018). Detonation of houses: Terrorism of another type in Yemen. Online document. <http://ycmhrv.co/Home/MonthlyReport/mVwjnbf/DetonationofHouses>. Accessed 25 April 2020.
- Zimmerman, K., & Harnisch, C. Profile: al Houthi Movement. Online document. Critical threats. https://www.criticalthreats.org/analysis/profile-al-houthi-movement#_ednf58d895eda3b75dc824c09b3166cdd1828. Accessed 11 May 2020.
- Zyck, S. A. (2014). Mediating transition in Yemen: Achievements and lessons. New York: International Peace Institute.

Youth and Peacebuilding

Helen Berents and Caitlin Mollica
School of Justice, Faculty of Law, Queensland
University of Technology, Brisbane, QLD,
Australia

Description

The practice of building peace is slowly becoming more inclusive. Youth have proven to be integral to this development as their contributions through formal and informal networks have challenged how we understand substantive participation and representation within this space. However, young people's visibility and inclusion within the peacebuilding discourse has been hard fought and slow to evolve as narrow social constructions of youth continue to determine how they engage with other actors, particularly at the institutional level. Youth often are characterized as potential threats or passive recipients of peacebuilding. However, youth are active peacebuilders who negotiate systems of insecurity and risk to work for peace in their communities and countries and on the international stage. This chapter examines the evolution of youth's inclusion in peacebuilding discourse and practice. It considers the theories, norms, intersections, and classifications that have informed understandings and engagements with youth in both scholarship and practice. It then turns to examine the factors that enable and constrain youth's participation: gendered challenges, the securitization of youth, and the vexed question of youth's participation and inclusion in peacebuilding. This chapter highlights the evolving role of youth advocacy in continued efforts to ensure that their engagement with the peacebuilding discourse is substantive and meaningful.

Introduction

Youth constitute a growing portion of the global population with 1.8 billion individuals aged between 10 and 24 years old (UNFPA 2014; Simpson 2018, p. 12). Of these, approximately 408 million live in regions or states affected by violence (Hagerty 2017). Youth also disproportionately bear the consequences of conflict as over half of those forcibly displaced by conflict are under 18 (UNHCR 2019). In 2015, for example, 90% of direct conflict deaths were young men (UNFPA 2015); between 2013 and 2017, there were more than 12,700 attacks on education (including against buildings, teachers, and students) globally (GCPEA 2018); and conflict and displacement exacerbates sexual and gender-based violence faced by young women (UN SG Report 2019). Despite young people's pervasive presence in conflict-affected areas, their experiences and contributions continue to be overlooked or mischaracterized, particularly at the institutional level. The prevalence of the youth demographic in post-conflict communities is employed both as a call to action, most notably by youth activists, and as justification for intervention, in particular by those looking to "manage" young people's perceived capacity to spoil peace.

Given this, understanding the origins of these representations is central to broader discussions of youth in peace and security contexts.

Framings of youth often rely on simplistic tropes of youth as victim or, more often, as potential threat or risk. This has meant that when youth are considered at all in peacebuilding discourse, they are often excluded or engaged only as a problem to be managed. While some young people do engage in violence, it is curious that we rarely ask why a majority of young people remain peaceful even in violent contexts. Young people are also rarely asked about their contributions to peace. Just like gendered assumptions structure and enable conflict (Sjoberg 2014; see chapter ▶ "Gender Justice and Peacebuilding"), youthed tropes of young people as either passive victims or threats to contain limit our ability to fully account for their efforts to build peace (Berents and McEvoy-Levy 2015: 124). Broadly speaking, three themes underpin scholarly and policy engagement with youth in peacebuilding: youth are political actors in formal spheres of politics such as elections, youth can be conflict actors who participate in or support violence, and youth contribute productively to peacebuilding (Özerdem and Podder 2015, pp. 4–8). Even at this macro level, it is evident how diverse young people's experiences can be.

It is undeniable that youth suffer in multiple ways due to war and violence. However, formal and informal structures of power exclude multiple experiences of youth from consideration. Youth are active peacebuilders who negotiate systems of insecurity and risk to work for peace in their communities and countries and on the international stage. Commonly, they work in diverse ways: on training and capacity building, advocacy, events, dialogues, alliances with other peace actors, networks, and specific projects (UNOY and SFCG 2017, p. 27). A few indicative, but not exhaustive, examples here help set the context and frame the work youth peacebuilders do that is discussed through this chapter. Youth work creatively to encourage peers away from violence, such as through nonviolent hip-hop collectives in response to gang violence in Colombia that have helped transform previously highly dangerous communities (Garcés Montoya 2011), through Luta pela Paz (“Fight for Peace”) which teaches martial arts and boxing in the favelas of Rio de Janeiro in Brazil (Simpson 2018, p. 57), or through music and dance in Northern Ireland (Pruitt 2013). Youth communicate constructively with their peers; for example, young Yemenis use radio, social media, and peer networks to explain “viable alternatives” to extremist violence and prevent recruitment (Simpson 2018, p. 48). Youth also participate in and lead short- and long-term post-conflict peacebuilding efforts: in Cameroon, former violent offenders are offered capacity-building training to support their reintegration (Sanyi and Achaleke 2017), while organizations such as Jovenes Contra la Violencia (Youth Against Violence) Guatemala work in communities on violence prevention initiatives. Monitoring and participation peace processes and reconciliation efforts also are sites where youth involve themselves: in Somalia, the Joint Galkayo Youth Committee is a formal, elected structure that channels youth opinions into peace negotiations (Altiok and Grizelj 2019, p. 24), and in the Solomon Islands, youth actively contested and negotiated their absence and representation in the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (Mollica 2017). At the micro level, young people also involve themselves in informal, community-level efforts to foster resilience and security within everyday routines in the absence of state care such as in informal communities of internally displaced people in Colombia (Berents 2018). Despite exclusion, in post-conflict contexts, young people have been operating largely from the margins of their communities, developing and implementing positive practices intended to build more secure and peaceful societies.

Young people’s contributions to peace have received increased attention within the formal structures of the international community, including the establishment of an emergent Youth, Peace and Security Agenda (see Simpson 2018; Altiok forthcoming; IANYD 2014; Youth4Peace n.d.). In 2015, after successful lobbying and advocacy by youth-led and adult-led organizations, the UN Security Council unanimously adopted Resolution 2250 on Youth, Peace and Security (YPS). Building on established norms around children and youth rights, Resolution 2250 recognizes youth (defined as 18–29) as having significant roles in building peace and security. It requires international actors, states, and other groups to meaningfully include youth in peacebuilding practice. The resolution established a YPS agenda that has seen a subsequent UN Security Council Resolution 2419 (2018) on youth participation in peace processes, as well as an independent progress study on YPS mandated by resolution 2250: The Missing Peace: Independent Progress Study on Youth, Peace and Security (Simpson 2018). It also has led to the establishment of formal programs, funding streams, and commitments by states and INGOs to better include youth in peace and security programming, policy, and practice. The establishment of a YPS agenda seeks to institutionalize an understanding of youth as peacebuilders and thus challenge “contagious stereotypes” (Simpson 2018, p. x) of youth as violent that contribute to “policy panic” (Simpson 2018, p. 30). McEvoy-Levy notes that understanding youth as peacebuilders often “underestimates the structural challenges and asymmetries of power between youth and political elites that make peace action [for youth] very difficult” (2011, p. 169). While there are important cautions with the YPS agenda, it nevertheless presents an opportunity to strengthen young people’s already-existing peace work through institutional support and engagement.

This chapter first examines how “youth” is conceptualized in peacebuilding. It then introduces the scholarship and practice on youth and peacebuilding, building a rough chronology of work highlighting the emergence of attention on youth, efforts toward youth participation, and youth as partners and active agents for peace. After this brief overview, the chapter explores three contemporary thematic areas of relevance to those interested in youth and peacebuilding: the intersections of age and gender, the tensions presented by securitized discourses of youth, and the complex pursuit of substantive participation of youth.

Considering Youth: Classifications and Intersections

Interactions with youth in peacebuilding contexts are informed by three overarching discourses: the “age-defined perspective,” “the social construct,” and the “physiological approach” (Özerdem and Podder 2015, pp. 6–7). Taken together, these discourses provide a comprehensive framework for conceptualizing youth and their participation in peace and conflict practices. However, when employed on their own, these discourses perpetuate barriers to youth’s engagement, in part due to their failure to consider youth’s unique voices and experiences. Within the physiological field, biological and cognitive markers are employed to distinguish youth from children and adults. In contrast, numerical classifications reflect predetermined and static turning points in a young person’s development (Özerdem and Podder 2015, p. 6). Missing from these approaches is the recognition that cultural “rites of passage” including marriage, childbirth, and spiritual initiation often determine “youthhood” and thus transitions into and out of this phase are rarely uniform and cannot be predetermined (Hansen 2008 cited in Özerdem and Podder 2015). Durham suggests “youth are social shifters” situated in constantly evolving political contexts where knowledge, rights, power, and culture influence their identity, roles, and status (2004). As such, their experiences do not exist in a vacuum; rather, they occur in response to a range of intersecting factors including gender, ethnicity, age, class, and race (see chapter ▶ “Intersectionality and Peace”). Given this, our understanding of young people’s contributions to building peace should be seen through a more expansive lens that acknowledges their diverse social and political experiences.

Socially constructed classifications of youth commonly emphasize “who they are not” by situating their experiences within the broader context of the generational attributes assigned to children, adults, and the elderly (Furlong et al. 2003; Durham 2004, p. 593; De Waal and Argenti 2002). These social constructions often perpetuate marginalizing cultural stereotypes that cast youth as passive observers and thus obscure their unique social and political contributions that are derived from their experiences as youth. In practice, youth are individuals whose identities are transitioning through stages of development ensuring that their capabilities are heterogeneous and responsive to external factors. These constantly evolving social representations further contribute to the contested nature of youth within the peacebuilding discourse. At any given time, youth are an age group, a social demographic, “a political group or a group in-between children and adults” (Özerdem and Podder 2015, p. 4). These shifting identities are significant obstacles to youth’s participation in formal peace practices as classifications often determine the character and extent of an individual’s engagement.

Strict adherence to numerical definitions produces barriers to youth’s participation due to the lack of consensus between institutions and among states. Illustratively, the Solomon Islands defines youth as those aged 14–29, while in Timor Leste, youth is any individual between the age of 16–30. At the institutional level, the World Programme of Action for Youth (WPAY) defines youth as those aged between 15 and 24 years old, while the African Charter defines youth as 15–35. Reflecting the heightened visibility of young people, the ratification of Resolution 2250 (2015) introduced the age range of 18–29 into the discourse while also acknowledging that classifications might vary in different contexts. Institutional definitions that adhere to narrow classificatory boundaries lack the nuance necessary to represent the experiences of youth, which has implications for how their role as peacebuilders is conceptualized. In addition, the voices of youth are absent from these structural discourses, and thus they reflect external perceptions of youth rather than youth themselves. The 2005 World Youth Report sought to address this silence, defining youth as “an important period of physical, mental, and social maturation [where they] are actively forming identities and determining acceptable roles for themselves.” This classification frames youth as competent social agents, whose perspectives offer valuable insights. In doing so, it recognizes that youth are a unique demographic of individuals who transition into and out of “youthhood” at different paces.

The increased visibility of youth advocates has produced limited opportunities for young people to claim these transitional spaces (Sommers 2006; McEvoy-Levy 2006). A youth representative of the Network for Empowerment and Progressive Initiatives in Liberia explains “the issue of self-identity. . . is very important. Once [youth] understand what [they] can offer society, [they] will find opportunities” (Maclay and Özerdem cited in Simpson 2018, p. 110). Despite this, widespread realization of this agency, particularly within the formal peace architecture, remains constrained by the persistence of institutional classifications. For example, despite acknowledging that “variations exist at the national and international level,” Resolution 2250 employs numerical boundaries that begin at 18. Codification of this numerical definition reflects institutional attempts to avoid definitional overlap with the Convention on the Rights of the Child. However, introducing a static numerical starting point for “youthhood” also perpetuates tensions between these complementary agendas and individual’s younger than 18 who may self-identify as youth, not children. While it is now increasingly acknowledged within the scholarship that uniform classifications of young people obscure the complex and fluid reality of their experiences, these issues persist and, as discussed below, are often employed to frame the relationships between youth and other actors in peacebuilding practice.

Understanding Youth in Literature and Practice

While there has been growing recognition of the complexity of youth’s experiences and capacities, attention to “youth” has long often been marginal and limited in both academic and policy contexts. Where young people, and issues of concern to youth, have been engaged these engagements have often reiterated binaries of victim/delinquent (often in profoundly gendered ways) and have been narrowed by adherence to ideas of the limitations of young people’s capacity and understanding. Such characterizations have been challenged and resisted for decades, with scholars and practitioners arguing for recognition of the complex lives youth live in conflict-affected contexts and their capacity to contribute to positive peacebuilding efforts. More recently, growing attention on youth, as evidenced by the establishment of the YPS agenda in 2015, has further expanded and formalized considerations of youth as positive actors in peacebuilding.

Understandings of young people’s involvement in peace and conflict have always been informed by multidisciplinary perspectives, including scholarship from sociology, international relations, anthropology, and peace studies. These diverse perspectives shed light on the complexity of youth experiences of conflict and peace. Because of the diversity of work on youth, it is difficult to succinctly characterize research and practice. Organized as two broadly chronological phases, this non-exhaustive overview provides a guide to some of the key arguments and developments.

Children and Youth as Categories of Concern

In the 1990s, “child soldiers” became a prominent category of concern to the international community. With the emergence of “new wars” and attention on intrastate conflicts, children associated with armed groups were highlighted as a feature of conflict but also a problem to be solved in the process of building peace. Anxiety about children participating in armed conflicts sensationalized media coverage, particularly in Africa and Eastern Europe. This sometimes sensational coverage was challenged by scholars, often working in anthropology and sociology. Groundbreaking reports such as the Machel Report “The Impact of Armed Conflict on Children” commissioned by the UN and presented to the General Assembly in 1996 and the work of Brett and McCallin (1998) and Cohn and Goodwin-Gill (1994) brought comprehensive attention to the experiences of child soldiers. The work of Boyden (1994) and Boyden and de Berry (2004) expands recognition of diverse social experiences of young people in conflict and their varied capacities for responding to violence. In Uganda, for example, young women who were victims of conflict-related sexual violence responded to the “consequences” of this experience in ways that challenge the dominant perceptions of vulnerability traditionally assigned to them (de Berry 2004, p. 61). De Berry concludes that the ability of these women to rebuild their lives in constructive ways, through the creation of business opportunities and safe social spaces, challenges homogenous victim narratives and suggests that young peoples’ responses to the trauma of conflict are nuanced and multifaceted. Other literature in the late 1990s drew on established work in previous decades in sociology and psychology to young people affected by conflict (see Cairns 1996).

In practice, the normative framework for children and youth in peacebuilding was being established, as evidenced by key UN documents from the late 1980s onward (Lee-Koo 2018). The UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), ratified in 1989, placed an emphasis on victimization and protection, rather than active agency. However, as Holzscheiter observes, “the CRC enshrined for the first time in international law, the right of the child to express his or her own views” (2010, p. 2). Building upon the norms established in the CRC (1989), the Machel Report (1996), and the Paris Principles (2007) recognized the diversity of children’s experience in conflict and provided a foundation for the inclusion and recognition of children’s voices in post-conflict practices.

Children’s experiences occupy a central (but limited) place in peacebuilding, while recognition of youth as a distinct demographic remains sporadic. In international policy spaces, the UN General Assembly established the “World Programme of Action for Youth for the Year 2000” in 1995 (WPAY). Youth, in the WPAY, are largely seen within social and economic development frames, rather than having a stake in peace and security. Although focused attention on young people in peace and conflict was a welcome development in the 1990s, including critical attention from scholars on young people’s experiences, adherence to notions of victim/delinquent and passive recipients of peacebuilding dominated.

Participation and Partnership

The second broad phase of attention emerged in the late 1990s and into the 2000s, characterized by increased recognition of young people’s participation and the complexity of young people’s experiences of conflict and peace. Broader recognition of young people’s capacity has been limited, and youth continue to be marginal in peacebuilding. Despite this, informed by developments in the sociologically oriented “youth studies” more broadly, scholarship reflects a more nuanced understanding of young people’s agency and lifeworld in conflict and peace. This work demonstrates the value of inclusive approaches to youth, as McEvoy-Levy (2001) argues: “a neglect of adolescents and older young people is shortsighted and counterproductive in terms of peace building particularly in the crucial post-accord phase with its twin challenges of violence prevention/accord maintenance and societal reconciliation and reconstruction.”

Scholarship reveals that youth occupy a broad range of identities in post-conflict communities and demonstrate agency in ways that challenge traditional notions of youth as passive subjects. Contributions to the edited volume Troublemakers or Peacemakers? (McEvoy-Levy 2006) demonstrate across a variety of contexts how young people respond to insecurity and contribute to peacebuilding, including the challenges of reintegrating child soldiers in Sierra Leone (Wessels and Jonah 2006), the social and cultural difficulties facing young people in post-genocide Rwanda (Sommers 2006), and young people’s role in transforming education systems in post-conflict Bosnia and Herzegovina (Cilliers 2006). Attention to young people’s capacities and agency characterize work by Borer et al. (2007), Schwartz (2010), Del Felice and Wisler (2007), Schnabel and Tabyshalieva (2013), Berents (2015), and Özerdem and Podder (2015) among others. Contributors to the edited volume Makers & Breakers: Children & Youth in Postcolonial Africa explored childhood and youthhood in the contexts of post-colonial Africa (Honwana and de Boeck 2005). Work has also focused on the importance of including youth in formal peace and justice processes (see chapter ► “Transitional Justice” and Peacebuilding”), including Mollica’s work with youth in the Solomon Islands (2017). The UN-supported research policy paper We Are Here: An integrated approach to youth inclusive peace processes proposed understanding youth engagement with formal peace negotiations as “at the table,” “in the room,” “around the room,” and “outside the room” to more fully map the diverse ways youth participation already takes place and how it can be productively engaged (Altiok and Grizelj 2019). Attention to youth within the “everyday turn” of peace studies (see chapter ▶ “Everyday Peace”) has shown the value of local-focused or ethnographic approaches that uncover youth’s political agency in peacebuilding (Berents 2018; Berents and McEvoy-Levy 2015; Turner 2015). Illustratively, in Supingstad, rural black South African youth mobilized collectively to achieve better provision of basic services from the state, more economic opportunities, and participation in civic life (Turner 2015). The intersections of age and gender have also revealed important sites to consider young people’s role in peacebuilding including the exclusion faced by girls and young women in peacebuilding programs (Pruitt 2013, 2015) and the ways in which socially constructed expectations of masculinity intersect with peace efforts (Kent and Barnett 2011). In practice, youth’s engagement with current global political challenges, including the 2010–2011 Arab Spring (see Honwana 2013), the 2019 political actions in Chile and Hong Kong, and the global movement for climate justice, demonstrates their social and political capital and their ability to mobilize for substantive change.

In the early 2000s, civil society, the UN, and policy think tanks turned their attention to how young people could be supported in times of transition (e.g., see Ackermann et al. 2003, Bidwell et al. 2008, and UNICEF 2001). Simultaneously, the “War on Terror” saw certain youth repositioned as “threats” (see Maira 2016). Youth, particularly young men in the Global South, became identified in policy and discourse as indicators of potential civil unrest through the wide adoption of the problematic “youth bulge theory” (Urdal 2004). These racialized and gendered frames (see Pruitt et al.

2018), underpinned by biologically essentialist assumptions (Pruitt 2020), have had a pervasive negative effect on efforts to institutionalize and meaningfully include youth in positive peacebuilding practices. Issues with the securitization of youth in peacebuilding are discussed below in more details. While academic and practitioner work had expanded recognition of young people’s capacities in peacebuilding, continued tensions in portrayals of youth persisted.

Until recently, recognition of the contributions of youth to peace existed almost exclusively in informal spaces on the margins of post-conflict states. Today, however, there is greater recognition of the importance of creating inclusive formal structures to support their peacebuilding initiatives and amplify their voices (Berents and McEvoy-Levy 2015). Broadly speaking, current attempts to create sustainable peace emphasize the importance of the youth demographic and thus prioritize as a critical imperative the need to “invest in young people’s capacities” in ways that “prioritize partnerships and collaborative actions” and recognize the diverse experiences of youth (Simpson 2018, p. xiii). While this growing attention includes establishing formal mechanisms and roles such as youth envoys to organizations such as the UN or the African Union (OSGEY n.d.; OAUSEY n.d.), youth participation in parliamentary processes (Spark 2014), or peak representative bodies such as the European Youth Forum (EYF n.d.), fundamentally, these practices need to support and develop already-existing youth efforts for peacebuilding that may not be connected to institutional processes. Youth in conflict and peace are political actors, advocates, agents of resistance, negotiators, mediators, combatants, and victims, yet despite this, formal structures often fail to provide substantive and diverse opportunities for engagement.

Within the formal peacebuilding discourse, interactions with youth often reinforce the idea that “youth” as a category is static and their needs and interests are homogenous (Aguilar 2007; Özerdem and Podder 2015, p. 5). Challenges of meaningful participation of youth in formal and informal processes are discussed further below. Yet, as youth peacebuilders slowly penetrate institutionalized peacebuilding structures, these classifications are increasingly challenged. Given this, young people's engagement with peacebuilding reflects an inherent tension between old classifications derived from collective, external perceptions of who youth are and new, responsive representations, which reflect their lived experiences and capabilities. Our understanding of youth and peacebuilding today is informed by how "young people creatively seek ways to prevent violence and consolidate peace across the globe" despite persistent rhetoric which cast their experiences as a "problem" to be managed or solved (Simpson 2018). The inclusion of youth's voices in the development and implementation of peacebuilding practice is "pragmatic and constructive" as it encourages ownership and buy-in (Drummond-Mundal and Cave 2007, p. 67).

Engagement with youth in peacebuilding has matured and expanded in recent decades. Careful academic work and thoughtful policy efforts have seen the space of recognition for young people's capacity and participation expand dramatically. Despite this, youth remain peripheral to many considerations in peace and conflict studies or invoked only in limited and problematic binaries of delinquent or victim, resulting in scholarship and practice overlooking the positive potential of younger generations to contribute to building lasting peace in conflict-affected contexts around the world.

Thematic Consideration for Youth in Peacebuilding

For those willing to take youth seriously as both a category of analysis and a demographic to meaningfully engage with, there are several key issues that need careful consideration: first, attention to the gendered dynamics of youth in peace and security practices; second, consideration of the (re)securitization of youth through discourses that reaffirm their status as risky and potentially dangerous; and, third, the significant challenges of ensuring meaningful participation for youth in formal and informal peacebuilding efforts.

Gendered Challenges

Gender norms inform the character and extent of young people's participation in peacebuilding. Where girls are concerned, socially constructed conflict identities often result in the development of peacebuilding programs that misrepresent their needs or exclude them entirely from the process. Young women are traditionally cast through a narrow lens as the "super-victim": an inherently peaceful, vulnerable group that the international community is obligated to protect (Park 2006, p. 316). This framing becomes problematic when it is relied upon to inform how they engage with peacebuilding practices and other actors following conflict. For example, in Sierra Leone, all young women were assigned "follower" status by the international community, despite occupying a wide range of roles, including combat positions (McKay and Mazurana 2004). Formal peacebuilding practices rarely account for the "gender differences" in participation or acknowledge the agency of girls, instead of relying on old tropes which cast girls as apolitical (Pruitt 2015; Harris 2004). These representations present a significant challenge to young women's participation as they tell only part of the story of how they participate in both conflict and its aftermath.

The homogenization of "youth" within the peace and security discourse creates practices which overlook the gendered dimension of conflict participation and thus fail to pursue the substantive engagement of young women. Youth as a category is typically employed to represent the "boys and young men" that the formal systems must manage to avoid spoiling the peace process (Pruitt 2015, p. 161). Discussions of child soldiers, for example, perpetuate gender stereotypes of deviance and violence as they are dominated by depictions of young African or, more recently, Middle Eastern boys (Lee-Koo 2011, p. 726). Missing from this portrayal of the child soldier are young girls who join rebel groups in conflicts around the world (Mazurana and McKay 2001, p. 33). Despite occupying active roles in conflicts, young girls are often excluded from decision-making and the implementation of peacebuilding practices, including demobilization, demilitarization, and reintegration efforts, as narrow ideas about who fights render their experiences invisible (Coulter 2005; see chapter ► “Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR)”). In practice, girls are excluded from institutionalized peacebuilding programs more than any other demographic as the intersection of age and gender produces marginalizing conditions that perpetuate a cycle of exclusion (Sommers 2006; Pruitt 2015). At the same time, representations of “youth” that assume young men are combatants driven by deviance also neglect their potential victim status, as evident in Liberia and Uganda where boys were often forced to participate in sexual acts (Mazurana and McKay 2001, p. 33). Broadly speaking, narrowly constructed gender representations present a significant challenge for the development of meaningful peacebuilding practices, particularly when employed to predict the roles youth occupy in these contexts. Moreover, they perpetuate inaccurate assumptions about why youth choose to engage in conflict and pursue peace.

Similar representation challenges persist within peace and conflict around notions of the masculine identity. The belief that young men are “bad boys [who] need to be contained due to their propensity for violence” informs the character of their engagement within the international community (Burman 1994, pp. 244–245; Pruitt et al. 2018, p. 694; see chapter ► “Youth Gang Violence in Honduras”). This is evident in the dominance of young men in deradicalization programs and the emphasis on masculinity within the securitization discourse (discussed below). These classifications derive, in part, from the notion that “war is men’s business,” and thus presume a relationship between risky and violent behavior and masculinity (Large 1997, p. 28). Similarly, militarized rhetoric that frames vulnerability as weakness informs beliefs among boys in conflict contexts that being a man requires “the need to be tough” (Harland 2011, p. 417). This is further reinforced by the scholarship of the 1990s on youth culture and masculinity, which argued that structural conditions, including a lack of employment opportunities, coupled with a propensity for deviance, motivated young men’s participation in conflict (Large 1997, p. 27; Bradbury 1995). The complex relationship between violence and structural inequality is also evident in the Solomon Islands, where young men joined rebel groups on the promise of goods and services and the opportunity to escape the idleness of unemployment (Allen 2013).

The belief among young men that they are the providers and protectors of their communities derives from normative stereotypes that militarize the male identity. However, these perceptions often fail to reflect how ideas about young men are informed by intersecting notions of class and age. Ashe and Harland suggest that “while men as a group benefit from the social organization of gender, particular groups of men are located in socially subordinated positions” (2014, p. 750). This is particularly relevant in communities where cultural hierarchies determined by age inform the political and social roles that men occupy. Despite the emergence of critical masculinity scholarship, which seeks to challenge these linear notions of the male identity, and how they are employed to conceptualize young men’s participation in violence, the perception that young men are troublemakers persists within the peacebuilding discourse and continues to inform how the international community responds to their participation (Barker 2005; Hall 2002). This is evident in the emphasis on securitization within peace and security discourses.

Securitization of Youth

Despite evidence of young people’s overwhelming nonparticipation in violence, characterizations of youth as a threat or a “problem to be solved” endure. These dominant discourses frame youth as risky, as potentially delinquent, and as spoilers to peace efforts, and they legitimize the exclusion of youth from peacebuilding. In the mid-1990s, claims of the dangers of “youth bulges” – that large populations of youth, particularly in African countries, increased a country’s risk of violence or conflict (see Urdal 2004 and 2006) – had a significant influence on policy and public discourse. Kaplan described youth in Africa as “loose molecules in an unstable social fluid, a fluid that was clearly on the verge of igniting” (1994). In these representations of young people, agency is acknowledged strictly in pejorative terms and assumes a causal connection between violence and a large male youth population. Like the youth-as-victim classification, they remain a social and political challenge, yet rather than protecting them, the deviance lens calls for youth to be managed. This characterization is built on both gendered and racialized assumptions of youth and the global order (Hendrixson 2004; Pruitt et al. 2018). Despite the pervasiveness of these understandings, evidence does not support claims made by adherents to the “youth bulge” theory (Pruitt 2020), yet they’ve had a disproportionate impact on the exclusion of youth from peacebuilding. The Global War on Terror strengthened attention on youth as a security threat (Maira 2016). This understanding of youth as a risk to be managed, rather than potential contributors to engage and include has been evident in policy responses to terrorist threats by Islamic State, Boko Haram and others.

This framing of certain youth as a risk places youth in a securitized position – youth have been positioned as a marginal group to be contained (see Pugh et al. 2013 on securitization of peacebuilding). This has occurred as development and peace programs have become more closely linked to neoliberal goals and influenced by globalizing nature of security concerns (Sukarieh and Tannock 2018; Distler 2017). The rise of Preventing/Countering Violent Extremism (P/CVE) approaches within peacebuilding architecture has often had the effect of further securitizing youth (Altiok forthcoming). Youth are targeted for surveillance, stereotyped, and offered limited ways of responding to such framings (Altiok et al. 2020). Sommers argues that CVE programs that target youth can often encourage rather than prevent violent extremism (2018). Increased focus on youth through P/CVE returns youth to securitized frames of a “problem to be solved,” limiting the space for youth to be seen as positive contributors to peacebuilding.

The UN YPS agenda embodies the tensions between the securitization of youth and efforts to see them as positive peacebuilders. The resolution emphasizes young people’s positive roles but also reproduces language that returns youth to a risk frame. Sukarieh and Tannock argue that the YPS agenda is neoliberal and reproduces frames of youth that are productive for the “current global economic order” (2018). Altiok argues that while youth are securitized, they resist this through local, national, and international efforts, resulting in a “squeezed youth-led peacebuilding agency” (forthcoming). While countering violent extremism is an important goal, youth peacebuilding faces challenges as it narrows the legitimate spaces they can work. With funding often tied to P/CVE approaches and projects, youth peacebuilders and adult-led organizations that work with them have to navigate these tensions carefully to deliver successful projects that meaningfully support youth peacebuilders in contexts around the world. The Missing Peace: Independent Progress Study on Youth, Peace and Security, mandated by the 2015 UNSC resolution 2250 on YPS, highlights the danger of negative understandings of youth as they can result in “policy panic” (Simpson 2018, pp. 30–31). Such panic reduces youth to reductive and harmful stereotypes and limits the space to recognize the diverse and extensive ways youth already are contributing to building peace and responding to violence.

Meaningful Participation

The 2015 Global Forum on Youth, Peace and Security in Amman, Jordan, marked a significant turning point in the character of youth participation. This international conference and the resultant Amman Youth Declaration called for a framework for the meaningful participation of youth in peace. Moreover, the visibility of the agenda facilitated by youth’s advocacy within the formal systems of the UN architecture shifted the discourse on substantive participation and compelled the international community to adopt youth engagement as a key strategic priority. There are growing calls for the international community to take youth seriously and to “tap into the peacebuilding potential of youth organizations” by providing “improved access to funding, technical support and capacity-building” (UN Secretary General 2018, p. 62). This approach to youth engagement envisages an active role for youth in the programming and implementation of peacebuilding practice, which highlights “the unique contributions of youth-led organizations” already occurring within informal peacebuilding spaces (Simpson 2018, para. 22). For example, in Uganda, the development and implementation of social cohesion programs, such as the Reformed Warriors Program, has been instrumental in mitigating ongoing violence. This program provides peer mentorship to youth “cattle raiders” and aims to “disengage” these individuals while rebuilding trust between them and the broader community. In addition, youth-led reintegration and diversion programs, which offer capacity building and training for former fighters and young offenders, have been established in Sierra Leone, Somalia, Cameroon, and parts of Central America (Simpson 2018, p. 47). Youth-led organizations have also taken a leadership role in humanitarian efforts, particularly in the absence of international programs. In Yemen, for example, youth “baked and delivered bread to more than 12,000 families in San’a” while the violence was occurring (Simpson 2018, p. 47). These youth-led initiatives, which demonstrate capacity building, mentorship, and leadership, reveal that young people have the will and capability to actively participate in community efforts to build sustainable peace.

Sustained advocacy efforts by youth and an emphasis on alliance building with civil society resulted in the institutionalization of a participatory framework within the UN architecture. Resolution 2250 establishes guidelines for the interactions between donors, institutions, states, and youth in the peace and security space. Among the key action items for the international community within this document is the creation of “measures that support local youth peace initiatives” and “empower youth” (UNSC 2015, p. 1). The importance of meaningful participation is reinforced by Resolution 2419 (2018), which further embedded youth within the formal peacebuilding architecture. The rhetoric within these resolutions reflects broader trends within the discourse on peace and security, which cast youth as key actors whose ownership is necessary for the maintenance of peace and stability and shifts away from tokenistic engagement.

Since 2015, youth-led organizations and their allies have worked extensively on implementing the mandate set out in Resolution 2250 to varying degrees of success. As a result, there has been a noticeable shift in the nature of youth’s engagement with peacebuilding. Within the international architecture, youth are increasingly sought out to engage in commentary on global challenges and to provide recommendations for how to mitigate the specific harms they face. However, the participation pillar remains one of the central challenges for the YPS agenda, due in part to the emphasis on securitization which produces narrow systems of engagement and limits the character of their participation (Altiok et al. 2020; Altiok forthcoming). Well-worn identity classifications which cast youth as vulnerable to recruitment, while important, only represent part of their conflict experience. Given this, a more nuanced framework for understanding youth’s participation is needed to ensure inclusion is representative of the on-the-ground realities of how young people engage in both violence and instability (Simpson 2018; Altiok forthcoming).

Heightened attention on youth’s role is underpinned by the growing prominence of the youth agency lens within the peace and security literature (as discussed above). This framework is informed by evidence-based research, which highlights the ability of young people to act to facilitate change, both positive and negative, independent of external actors (e.g., McEvoy-Levy 2011, p. 168, and Schwartz 2010). Drawing on data collected in Mozambique, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, and Kosovo, Schwartz reveals that youth are important actors in the reconstruction process, who actively pursue ways to participate in peacebuilding (Schwartz 2010, p. 155). Utilizing interviews with youth, she demonstrates that predetermined ideas about their capacity, which perpetuate deviance stereotypes, fail to reflect how programs and practices established within post-conflict communities empower youth and harness their political will (Schwartz 2010, p. 156). Similarly, citing examples from her edited volume, such as “. . . youth in the Colombian Peace Communities. . . and young activists at peace centers” in Bosnia and Herzegovina, McEvoy-Levy concludes that “youth are powerful as conflict transformers” (McEvoy-Levy 2006, p. 287). She suggests that these examples of activism and engagement highlight youth’s capacity to be “creators of peaceful culture,” as well as symbols of trauma and instability (McEvoy-Levy 2006, p. 287). Increased engagement with youth in peacebuilding contexts demonstrates that their participation and leadership is essential for sustainable peace as not only can they “mobilize their peers and other community members” but they also have the capacity to “understand local dynamics and priorities” that other actors may overlook (Simpson 2018, para. 24). As demonstrated throughout this chapter, including the voices of young people in the development of peacebuilding practices ensures that they are holistic, inclusive, and responsive to the diverse needs of a wide range of conflict participants.

Inclusion and involvement are key characteristics of participation; however, the nature and extent of this engagement matters. Substantive forms of participation are informed by the notion that youth possess agency and thus their contributions are innately valuable. As demonstrated throughout this chapter, meaningful participation for young people relies on institutional recognition that they “have been and are actively involved in emergent, innovative, experimental and substantive forms of solidarity and coexistence” (Oswell 2013, p. 6).

In addition, peacebuilding practices that are meaningfully participatory must acknowledge that all youth are equal partners who inform and shape political structures, knowledge, and relationships. Recent examples of consultations with youth, including the consultative research conducted for the progress report The Missing Peace, mandated by Resolution 2250, demonstrate an emerging commitment toward substantive participation (Simpson 2018, p. 5). This consultative process aligns with evolving trends that are increasingly informing the relationship between youth and the international community, which now aims to “reach out beyond easily accessible and elite youth, to young people who would not ordinarily have a say in. . . global political processes” (Simpson 2018, p. 3). Efforts to encourage youth participation and to reframe the political interactions between states and young people are also evident in the development of National Action Plans for the implementation of the YPS agenda, the renewed commitment to developing youth parliaments, as well as the appointment of a UN Special Envoy on Youth. Youth’s political participation in these spaces provides them with opportunities to reframe the narratives of engagement in ways that enhance their identity as peacebuilders and positive social agents (McEvoy-Levy 2006; Kwon 2019; Sukarieh and Tannock 2018).

Despite recognition that youth are political agents whose participation is necessary for sustainable peace, structural conditions still produce significant challenges for the nature of this engagement. Youth-led peacebuilding organizations were instrumental in shaping the public facing “youth as peacebuilders” narrative central to the YPS agenda. The impact of these interactions, however, was limited as, while the rhetoric around youth participation evolved as a result of advocacy efforts, it did not initially produce meaningful structural change within the formal peacebuilding structures (Altiok forthcoming). The absence of meaningful implementation with respect to the participation rhetoric results in part from the persistence of traditional power structures within the UN architecture, which determine political and social capital. As Altiok argues “youth. . . are neither powerful nor connected enough to shift the policy orientation of the Security Council on youth related issues” (forthcoming: 11). Kwon’s research on global youth forums echoes this sentiment, as she demonstrates that within the international architecture, “institutionalized spaces of power regulated by the politics of consensus” persist which determine the character of youth’s participation (Kwon 2019, p. 930). Although these global forums, including the Amman Global Forum on Youth, Peace and Security in 2015, were envisaged as a way to create space for youth leadership within the international peace architecture, in practice, the agency of youth was constrained by the persistence of traditional hierarchies, which prioritize the voices of “high-level” speakers (diplomats, UN agency representatives) and state representatives (Kwon 2019, p. 930). Formal networks that engage with youth often envisage a type of interaction that is performative where youth represent the “good global citizen” fulfilling their right and duty to participate. Yet adherence to these archetypes for participation and the persistence of power hierarchies within these sites of engagement fails to reflect the diverse and innovative ways that youth engage to facilitate sustainable peace. To that end, rather than amplifying youth’s voices and contributions, these formalized spaces perpetuate an environment where the perceptions of external actors are framed as legitimate surrogates for youth voices.

While much attention has been on youth participation in formal structures, youth leadership in the peacebuilding space has also allowed for increased recognition of their contributions to sustaining peace through informal networks. Youth peacebuilders effectively utilize informal systems such as protests and harness non-traditional social and political networks, including social media, to facilitate change. Informal networks allow youth to maintain ownership of the peace process to ensure that it is responsive and representative of their interest. By engaging with peace processes through these informal spaces, they are able to maintain autonomy over their ideas and experiences. Altiok and Grizelj (2019) suggest that avoiding “programmatisation” of youth political participation in peace processes ensures that all forms of youth engagement are included, even those that do not adhere to emerging ideas about what “effective” participation entails. Notions of how youth contribute to peacebuilding should acknowledge the complex interplay between these informal and formal networks and recognize that youth have the capacity to move between these networks.

The increased acknowledgment that youth participate in peacebuilding in diverse ways through a wide range of systems reflects an evolution in the discourse away from approaches that prioritize top-down decision-making and implementation and toward processes that encourage the development of practices which are widely consultative (Autesserre 2014). This shift highlights the relationship between political will, inclusivity, and durable peace. As recent empirical scholarship demonstrates, social and political stability are more likely when a wide cross section of the community has ownership over the development of peace practices as this encourages sustained participation (Autesserre 2014; Barnes 2009). This expansive approach to participation, which emphasizes collaboration and partnership, emerged largely in response to the increased complexity and scale of current global challenges. As the UN Secretary General noted in his 2018 address, “it is high time that the contributions of young people to sustaining peace were recognized and supported” (para. 28).

Summary

Despite demonstrating agency in their communities, youth have long been marginal and marginalized within formal peacebuilding networks. Since 2015, due to concerted efforts by youth and allies, there is now growing institutional recognition of their capacity to positively contribute to build peace and respond to security challenges at the local, national, and international levels. This increased academic and policy attention does not come without practical and normative challenges. To ensure youth engagement continues to evolve, it is crucial that those working with and for youth in peacebuilding are aware of these tensions and commitments.

In practice, how youth substantively participate in peacebuilding and engage with the UN peace architecture remains a primary challenge for practitioners and scholars. Youth are often framed as holding “potential” and “power” for positive change; but as Özerdem and Podder note, there is still limited literature that analyzes and explains the “mechanisms through which this potential can be operationalized” (2015, p. 7). This gap is not just theoretical but has practical implications. If there is limited attention to this cohort – who are known to disproportionately suffer from violent conflict and be marginalized in post-conflict contexts – this has an impact on how societies rebuild after violence. There is an opportunity for more research that pays attention to the practical, implementation-focused aspects of youth peacebuilding.

While there are many well-intentioned efforts to meaningfully include youth, these can reproduce hierarchical or tokenistic relationships between adults and young people. For youth-focused programming to be successful, actors must ensure that youth's own identities and ownership are harnessed in ways that allow them to speak for themselves. Too often, the political will and agency of youth are silenced within formalized structures as others – often with good intention – speak for youth. As discussed, the complex relationships between formal and informal networks in youth peacebuilding are key to producing the substantive and inclusive form of participation that is widely acknowledged as essential for sustaining peace. To that end, research and practice needs to work as a mechanism for amplifying the voices and work already being done, particularly by youth-led organizations in their own communities.

As attention to youth-led dimensions of peacebuilding grows, recognition of the intersections between gendered and racialized dimensions of peacebuilding must be incorporated into analysis and practice. As the Women, Peace and Security (WPS) Agenda has highlighted, women and men experience conflict and peace differently, and thus programming that overlooks gendered dimensions will be unresponsive and ineffectual. The path paved by the WPS movement provides important lessons for YPS as age, class, race, and gender similarly intersect to create unique challenges and opportunities. Given this, recognition of young people's own conceptions of themselves must underpin programming and engagement.

If peace is built collectively from communities and social movements (Jabri 2007) and supported through structures and institutions, then our conceptions of peacebuilding are inadequate if a constituency is not being taken seriously. Youth are positioned as both potential risks and as potential positive contributors to peace; the liminality and temporality of youth hold in tension these contrasting positions. There is increased attention on youth leadership and advocacy. This is occurring both in noninstitutional spheres, such as the global climate justice movement and local context-specific actions by youth around the world, and in institutional spaces, such as the YPS agenda. It is evident that to think productively about peace, youth have an important role to play in peacebuilding and responding to insecurity and violence.

Cross-References

- ▶ Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration \(DDR\)
- ▶ Everyday Peace
- ▶ Gender Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Intersectionality and Peace
- ▶ Transitional Justice and Peacebuilding
- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

References

- Ackermann, L., Feeny, T., Hart, J., & Newman, J. (2003). Understanding and evaluating children's participation: A review of contemporary literature. London: Plan UK/Plan International.
- Aguilar, M. I. (2007). Rethinking age in Africa: Colonial, post-colonial and contemporary interpretations of cultural representations. American Ethnologist, 31(4), 589–605.
- Allen, M. (2013). Greed and grievance: Ex-militants' perspectives on the conflict in Solomon Islands, 1998–2003. Honolulu: University of Hawai'i Press.
- Altiok, A. (forthcoming, 2020). Squeezed agency: Youth resistance to the securitization of peacebuilding. In M. O. Ensor (Ed.), Securitizing youth: Young people's role in the global peace & security agenda. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Altiok, A., & Grizelj, I. (2019). We are here: An integrated approach to youth-inclusive peace processes. New York: United Nations.
- Altiok, A., Berents, H., Grizelj, I., & McEvoy-Levy, S. (2020). Youth, peace and security. In F. Hampson & A. Özerdem (Eds.), The Routledge handbook of peace, security and development. London: Routledge.
- Ashe, F., & Harland, K. (2014). Troubling masculinities: Changing patterns of violent masculinities in a society emerging from political conflict. Studies of Conflict and Terrorism, 37(9), 747–762.

- Autesserre, S. (2014). Peaceland: Conflict resolution and the everyday politics of international intervention. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Barker, G. (2005). Dying to be men: Youth, masculinity and social exclusion. London: Routledge.
- Barnes, C. (2009). Civil society and peacebuilding: Mapping functions in working for peace. The International Spectator, 44(1), 131–147.
- Berents, H. (2015). An embodied everyday peace in the midst of violence. Peacebuilding, 3(2), 115–125.
- Berents, H. (2018). Young people and everyday peace: Exclusion, insecurity and peacebuilding in Colombia. New York: Routledge.
- Berents, H., & McEvoy-Levy, S. (2015). Theorising youth and everyday peace(building). Peacebuilding, 3(2), 1–14.
- Bidwell, K., Galbraith, C., Haddad, L., Hermes, R., Kleiner, S., Raheem, Z., & Scheffler, K. (2008). Youth and sustainable livelihoods: Linking vocational programs to market opportunities in northern Uganda. New York: Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children.
- Borer, T., Darby, J., & McEvoy-Levy, S. (2007). Peacebuilding after peace accords: Violence, truth and youth. Notre Dame: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Boyden, J. (1994). Children's experience of conflict related emergencies: Some implications for relief policy and practice. Disasters, 18(3), 254–267.
- Boyden, J., & de Berry, J. (Eds.). (2004). Children and youth on the front line: Ethnography, armed conflict and displacement. New York: Berghahn Books.
- Bradbury, M. (1995). Rebels without a cause. Care Report on the Conflict in Sierra Leone.
- Brett, R., & McCallin, M. (1998). Children: The invisible soldiers. Växjö: Grafiska Punkten.
- Burman, E. (1994). Innocents abroad: Western fantasies of childhood and the iconography of emergencies. Disasters, 18(3), 238–253.
- Cairns, E. (1996). Children and political violence. Oxford: Blackwell.
- Cilliers, J. (2006). Transforming post-accord education systems: Local reflections from Bosnia-Herzegovina. In S. McEvoy-Levy (Ed.), Troublemakers or peacemakers?: Youth and post-accord peace building. South Bend: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Cohn, I., & Goodwin-Gill, G. S. (1994). Child soldiers: The role of children in armed conflict. Oxford: Clarendon Press.
- Coulter, C. (2005). The post-war moment: Female fighters in Sierra Leone. Migrations Studies Working Paper Series 22.
- De Berry, J. (2004). The Sexual Vulnerability of Adolescent Girls during Civil War in Teso, Uganda. In Children and youth on the Front Line: Ethnography, Armed Conflict and Displacement. New York: Berghahn Books.
- De Waal, A., & Argenti, N. (Eds.). (2002). Young Africa: Realising the rights of children and youth. Asmara: Africa World Press.
- Del Felice, C., & Wisler, A. (2007). The unexplored power and potential of youth as peace-builders. Journal of Peace and Development, 11, 1–29.
- Distler, W. (2017). Dangerised youth: The politics of security and development in Timor-Leste. Third World Quarterly, 40(4), 727–742.
- Drummond-Mundal, L., & Cave, G. (2007). Young peacebuilders: Exploring youth engagement with conflict and social change. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 3(3), 63–76.
- Durham, D. (2004). Disappearing youth: Youth as a social shifter in Botswana. American Ethnologist, 31(4), 589–605.
- European Youth Forum. n.d. Our goals and vision. <https://www.youthforum.org/european-youth-forum-our-goals-vision>
- Furlong, A., Cartmel, F., Biggart, A., Sweeting, H., & West, P. (2003). Youth transitions: Patterns of vulnerability and processes of social inclusion. Edinburgh: Scottish Executive Social Research.
- Garcés Montoya, A. (2011). Juventud y comunicación: Reflexiones sobre prácticas comunicativas de resistencia en la cultura hip hop de Medellín. Signo y Pensamiento, 58(enero), 108–128.
- Global Coalition to Protect Education from Attack (GCPEA). (2018). Education under attack 2018. New York: GCPEA.
- Hagerty, T. (2017). Data for youth, peace and security: A Summary of research findings from the Institute for Economics and Peace. https://www.youth4peace.info/system/files/2018-04/16.%20TP_Youth%20affected%20by%20violent%20conflict_IEP.pdf. Accessed 17 Feb 2020.
- Hall, S. (2002). Daubing the drudges of fury: Men, violence and the piety of the hegemonic masculinity thesis. Theoretical Criminology, 6(1), 35–61.
- Harland, K. (2011). Violent youth culture in Northern Island: Young men, violence, and the challenges of peacebuilding. Youth & Society, 43(2), 414–432.
- Harris, A. (2004). Future girl. New York: Routledge.
- Hendrixson, A. (2004). Angry young men and veiled young women. Constructing a new population threat (Corner house briefing 34). Dorset: The Corner House.
- Holzscheiter, A. (2010). Children's rights in international politics. London: Palgrave.
- Honwana, A. (2013). Youth and revolution in Tunisia. London: Zed Books.
- Honwana, A., & de Boeck, F. (Eds.). (2005). Makers and breakers: Children and youth in postcolonial Africa. Oxford: James Currey.
- IANYD (UN Interagency Network on Youth Development). (2014). Guiding principles on young people's participation in peacebuilding. New York: United Nations. Available at: <https://www.youth4peace.info/node/60>

- Jabri, V. (2007). War and the transformation of global politics. New York: Palgrave.
- Kaplan, R. (1994). The coming anarchy: How scarcity, overpopulation, tribalism and disease are rapidly destroying the social fabric of our planet (pp. 44–76). Boston: Atlantic Monthly.
- Kent, S., & Barnett, J. (2011). Localising peace: The young men of Bougainville's 'crisis generation'. Political Geography, 31(1), 34–43.
- Kwon, S. A. (2019). The politics of global youth participation. Journal of Youth Studies, 22(7), 926–940.
- Large, J. (1997). Disintegration conflict and the restructuring of masculinity. Gender and Development, 5(2), 23–30.
- Lee-Koo, K. (2011). Horror and hope: (Re)presenting militarised children in global north–south relations. Third World Quarterly, 32(4), 725–742.
- Lee-Koo, K. (2018). 'The intolerable impact of armed conflict on children': The United Nations Security Council and the protection of children in armed conflict. Global Responsibility to Protect, 10(2018), 57–74.
- Machel, G. (1996). Impact of armed conflict on children: Report of the expert of the Secretary-General, Ms. Graça Machel, submitted pursuant to General Assembly resolution 48/157. New York: United Nations.
- Maira, S. M. (2016). The 9/11 generation: Youth, rights, and solidarity in the war on terror. New York: NYU Press.
- Mazurana, D., & McKay, S. (2001). Child soldiers; what about the girls? Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, 57(5), 30–35.
- McEvoy-Levy, S. (2001). Youth as social and political agents: Issues in post-settlement peace building (Kroc Institute occasional paper) (21st ed.). South Bend: University of Notre Dame.
- McEvoy-Levy, S. (Ed.). (2006). Troublemakers or peacemakers?: Youth and postaccord peace building. South Bend: University of Notre Dame Press.
- McEvoy-Levy, S. (2011). Children, youth and peacebuilding. In T. Matyok, J. Senehi, & S. Byrne (Eds.), Critical issue in peace and conflict studies: Theory, practice and pedagogy. Lanham: Lexington Books.
- McKay, S., & Mazurana, D. (2004). Where are the girls? Girls in fighting forces in northern Uganda, Sierra Leone and Mozambique: Their lives during and after war. Montreal: Montreal International Centre for Human Rights and Democratic Development.
- Mollica, C. (2017). The diversity of identity: Youth participation at the Solomon Islands Truth and Reconciliation Commission. Australian Journal of International Affairs, 71(4).
- OAUSEY (The Office of the African Union Special Envoy on Youth). (n.d.). Youth Envoy: About. <https://auiyouthenvoy.org/youth-envoy/>
- OSGEY (Office of the Secretary General's Envoy on Youth). (n.d.). Envoy on Youth. <https://www.un.org/youthenvoy/about/>
- Oswell, D. (2013). The agency of children: From family to global human rights. New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Özerdem, A., & Podder, S. (2015). Youth in conflict and peacebuilding: Mobilization, reintegration and reconciliation. Basingstoke: Houndsmill.
- Paris Principles. (2007). The principles and guidelines on children associated with armed forces or armed groups. https://www.icrc.org/en/doc/assets/files/other/parisprinciples_en%5b1%5d.pdf. Accessed 17 Feb 2020.
- Park, A. S. J. (2006). 'Other inhumane acts': Forced marriage, girl soldiers and the special court for Sierra Leone. Social and Legal Studies, 15(3), 315–337.
- Pruitt, L. (2013). Youth peacebuilding: Music, gender, and change. New York: SUNY Press.
- Pruitt, L. (2015). Gendering the study of children and youth in peacebuilding. Peacebuilding, 3(2), 157–170.
- Pruitt, L. (2020). Rethinking youth bulge theory in policy and scholarship: Incorporating critical gender analysis. International Affairs, 96(3), 711–728.
- Pruitt, L., Berents, H., & Munro, G. (2018). Gender and age in the construction of male Youth in the European "migration crisis". Signs: Journal of Women and Culture in Society, 43(3), 687–709.
- Pugh, J., Gabay, C., & Williams, A. (2013). Beyond the securitisation of development. Geoforum, 44, 193–201.
- Sanyi, E. S., & Achaleke, C. L. (2017). Youth positive practice memoir on rehabilitation and reintegration in Cameroon: Transforming violent offenders into champions of peace. Yaounde: Local Youth Corner Cameroon. www.loyocameroun.org/wp-content/uploads/2017/11/Final-LOYOC-Youth-Positive-Memoire.pdf
- Schnabel, A., & Tabyshalieva, A. (2013). Escaping victimhood. Children, youth and post-conflict peacebuilding. Tokyo: United Nations Press.
- Schwartz, S. (2010). Youth in post-conflict reconstruction: Agents of change. Washington, DC: United States Institute of Peace.
- Simpson, G. (2018). The missing peace: Independent progress study on youth, peace and security. <https://www.youth4peace.info/system/files/2018-10/youth-web-english.pdf>. Accessed 17 Feb 2020.
- Sjoberg, L. (2014). Gender, War, and Conflict. Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Sommers, M. (2006). In the shadow of genocide: Rwanda's youth challenge. In S. McEvoy-Levy (Ed.), Troublemakers or peacemakers?: Youth and postaccord peace building (pp. 81–98). South Bend: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Sommers, M. (2018). Youth and the field of countering violent extremism. Washington DC: Promundo-US.
- Spark, C. (2014). Emerging women leaders in Solomon Islands: The aims and activities of the young women's parliamentary group. In Brief 2014/12. The State,

- Society & Governance in Melanesia Program, ANU College of Asia & the Pacific.
- Sukarieh, M., & Tannock, S. (2018). The global securitisation of youth. Third World Quarterly, 39(5), 854–870.
- Turner, R. L. (2015). Youth, ‘tradition’ and peace building: Mobilising for just governance in rural South Africa. Peacebuilding, 3(2), 126–140.
- UN General Assembly. (1989). Convention on the Rights of the Child. November 20. <http://www.ohchr.org/EN/ProfessionalInterest/Pages/CRC.aspx>
- UNHCR. (2019). Global Trends: Forced Displacement in 2018. United Nations. <https://www.unhcr.org/globaltrends2018/>
- UN Secretary General. (2018). Peacebuilding and sustaining peace: Report of the Secretary General, 18 January 2018, Seventy-Second Session. <https://reliefweb.int/report/world/peacebuilding-and-sustaining-peace-report-secretary-general-a73890-s2019448-enar>
- UN Secretary General. (2019). Conflict related sexual violence: Report of the United Nations Secretary-General, 29 Mar 2019. S/2019/280. <https://www.un.org/sexualviolenceinconflict/wp-content/uploads/2019/04/report-s-2019-280/Annual-report-2018.pdf>
- UNFPA. (2014). State of world population 2014: The power of 1,8 billion adolescents, youth and the transformation of the future. New York: United Nations Population Fund. https://www.unfpa.org/sites/default/files/pub-pdf/EN-SWOP14-Report_FINAL-web.pdf. Accessed 17 Feb 2020.
- UNFPA. (2015). State of the world population 2015: Shelter from the storm. New York: United Nations Population Fund.
- UNICEF. (2001). The participation rights of adolescents: A strategic approach. New York: United Nations.
- UNOY & SFCG (United Network of Youth Peacebuilders & Search For Common Ground). (2017). Mapping a sector: Bridging the evidence gap on youth-driven peacebuilding: Findings of the global survey of youth-led organisations working on peace and security. The Hague: UNOY & SFCG.
- UNSC. (2015). Resolution 2250 on youth, peace and security. Available at https://undocs.org/S/RES/2250\(2015\))
- Urdal, H. (2004). The devil in the demographics: The effect of youth bulges on domestic armed conflict, 1950–2000 (Social Development Papers: Conflict Prevention and Reconstruction). Social Development Department, for the World Bank.
- Urdal, H. (2006). A clash of generations? Youth bulges and political violence. International Studies Quarterly, 50(3), 607–629.
- Wessels, M., & Jonah, D. (2006). Recruitment and reintegration of former youth soldiers in Sierra Leone: Challenges of reconciliation and post-accord peace building. In S. McEvoy-Levy (Ed.), Troublemakers or peacemakers?: Youth and post-accord peace building. South Bend: University of Notre Dame Press.
- Youth4Peace. (n.d.). Youth4Peace global knowledge portal. <https://www.youth4peace.info/>

Youth Bulge and Conflict

Mohd Tahir Ganie

Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction, School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Demographic dividend; Demographic gift; Demographic window; Political demography; Waithood; Youthquake

Definition

Youth bulge refers to the phenomenon of rapid growth of the young population of a country relative to its general population, causing considerable impact on its economy and politics. While youth bulge is characterized as a negative development for its potential to cause upsurge in social unrest, violence, and conflict, it is also viewed positively as an opportunity for economic growth, captured by the associated term “demographic dividend,” a situation where a country sees expansion of its young working-age population accompanied by the relative decline in the dependent population (i.e., people above 65 and below 14 years old) due to low rates of fertility and mortality.

Introduction

The idea of youth bulge was first proposed by French sociologist Gaston Bouthoul (1896–1980), who looked at the demographic causes of war and aggression. Bouthoul saw war as deferred infanticide, i.e., the elimination of surplus young men. Nine years before Salvadorans started killing each other in a civil war, Bouthoul had predicted that El Salvador’s large young population (of over 30%) would potentially become a cause of the conflict in that country. In his 1968 article, Youth as Force in the Modern World, Herbert Moller placed youth at the center of historical changes, stating that “Social change is not engineered by youth, but it is most manifest in youth” (p. 260). Later, in the 1970s, scholars like Nazli Choucri, who saw limitations in the analyses that separated “politics from its demographic context,” attempted to systematically analyze the connections between the eruption of interstate violence and dynamics of population. Such studies are now part of the incipient subfield within political science called “political demography,” a term associated with its foremost scholar Jack Goldstone (1991, 2012). The concept of youth bulge is a core component of this area of study, which explores interlinkages between shifting age structures and politics.

What Is Youth?

While youth bulge is a significant concept in political science, the term “youth” itself lacks definitional consensus. Definition of youth varies between societies and regions, and institutions. For example, United Nations defines youth as people between the age 15–24 years, while as European Union has divided youth category into three age brackets to account for contextual differences or indicators: 15–19, 20–24, and 25–29. Variations in definition of youth have implications for the validation of youth bulge theory, because if you consider a narrower age bracket as youth, then results might show that there is no youth bulge, i.e., percentage of young people relative to the general population. For example, for Gunnar Heinsohn, youth bulge exists when a country has 30–40% of males aged between 15 and 29 years. But, a narrower conception of youth cohort (15–24) would affect the percentage proposed by Heinsohn.

What it means to be youth has undergone a significant change as we transitioned from agrarian societies to modernity (which promoted mass education) and capitalism (which changed the labor market and economies). Young people stay in educational institutions for an extended period and thus remain in a dependent position for a lengthier time. Unlike 50 years ago, they enter job late, they marry late.

Legal definition of maturity also differs between countries, so while you can drive or marry at certain age in some countries but cannot do so in certain others. Such legalities also define youth age (Heinz 2009: 4). Thus, scholars see youth as a social construct and some argue that the notion of youth emerged in the modernity when bureaucratic processes for social provisions (such as education and welfare) started defining populations as per the age (Wallace and Kovatcheva 1998). Scholars disagree with the age-based conceptualization of youth, as across cultures and societies there is dissimilarity in what it means to be youth. Thus, for Andy Furlong (2013: 3), youth is “a period of semi-dependence that falls between the full dependency that characterizes childhood and the independence of adulthood.”

Youth Bulge as Demographic Gift

Since youth bulge have implications for politics and economy, it has gained wide currency in policy, security, and developmental studies. Governments seek to invest in youth to reap benefits of demographic dividends or “economic miracle,” which occurred in East Asia where the working-age population grew faster than the dependent population between 1965 and 1990 and expanded “the per capita productive capacity” (Bloom and Williamson 1998). This demographic-driven economic growth is, however, linked as much to the lowering fertility rates as to the educational attainment which leads to enhanced human capital and contributes to productivity of age structures. Cuaresma et al. (2014) calls it “educational dividend.”

Emphasis worldwide is on integrating schemes and programs for young cohorts of the population into developmental policies so that they are offered opportunities for gainful employment. As knowledge-based economies require a steady stream of skilled labor, youth are expected to acquire relevant skills. Moreover, governments, especially in Europe and North America, also try to make politics attractive to young people, as there is growing anxiety among the political elites about young people displaying apathetic attitude towards representative democracy by remaining absent from polls and not joining political parties. Some scholars believe that growing disenchantment of young people with electoral politics threatens to undermine liberal democracy, as broad base of public support for its legitimacy would shrink if the current trend is not reversed. However, recent scholarship counters such arguments, arguing that the contemporary young people are not politically apathetic rather they are engaged in newer forms of political participation in the digital era (Pickard and Bessant 2017). These political engagements are pursued through what Pippa Norris (2007) calls cause-oriented repertoires, which focus on influencing policies of local and national governments as well as multinational corporations and international organizations in terms of environmental protection and social justice. Young people's impact on modern societies is well captured by the new term "youthquake," (Sloam et al. 2018), which was inducted into Oxford English Dictionary in 2017 and defined as, "a significant cultural, political, or social change arising from the actions or influence of young people."

Crisis of Youth Bulge

In the absence of opportunities, aggrieved young people are prone to engage in rioting and street protests. These engagements may be less threatening as they happen at a smaller scale. However, as Urdal (2011: 118) shows, "youth bulges may also increase the risk of more organized forms of political violence like internal armed conflict." Growing young population tend to strain state resources and put pressure on its institutions, which cannot easily meet the demands of the bulging youth cohorts, who turn into an aggrieved sector of the population with festering grievances. Existence of such grievances itself does not pose a threat, because they are not a sufficient condition for the outbreak of violence. The young population first grows negatively predisposed toward their political system when alternatives for employment and income shrink and such a situation leads to weakening of the political system's legitimacy (Braungart 1984: 16). Persistence of precarious situation creates conditions for radicalism for the aggrieved young, who do not have much to lose. If a country is facing economic slump, this will further exacerbate the situation, as in the despairing times youth would be more inclined towards extremism (Choucri 1974: 73).

There is an incentive for the underprivileged in taking part in rebellion as the rebellion itself provides an opportunity to gain income in the absence of alternatives (Collier and Hoeffler 2004: 94). However, as income-opportunities for the young people with high level of education remain relatively high, such segments are less likely to embrace the path of rebellion and thus reduces the risk of violence. They will be constrained by high cost of rebellion. Bricker and Foley (2013), however, disagree with this view, arguing that high educational qualification does not lower the risk of outbreak of violence.

But, economic factors alone do not explain the youth bulge theory. Where a government or a regime imposes authoritarian rules and curbs on political and civil freedoms, youth-led political violence is likely to happen. This is, however, more likely in semi-democratic countries than highly autocratic ones (Urdal 2011: 4). So regime types and their capabilities and resources of control will matter. What may also mitigate the risk of youth-led unrest is the migration to other countries for economic opportunities that lessens the strain on state institutions and resources of the home country.

Nevertheless, as Urdal (2011: 131) says, "there is very limited micro-level evidence explaining what motivates youth who engage in political violence." So, to address this problem, studies examining interlinkages between age structures and politics need to refine their explorations by incorporating subregional and microlevel studies, which can strengthen the existing theoretical models.

Yet, there are critiques of youth bulge framework, especially of the type propounded by scholars like Heinsohn, whose 2003 book Söhne und Weltmacht: Terror im Aufstieg und Fall der Nationen (Sons and World Power: Terror in Rise and Fall of Nations) has been criticized for decontextualizing historical demographic trends and extrapolating that data to contemporary geopolitical situation, as well its strong undercurrents of Islamophobia as, for example, evident in his problematic phraseology, such as “demographic armament,” which he uses to frame high fertility rates among Palestinian women. Heinsohn’s idea of demographic determinism predicts that the growing population of young Muslims in the Middle East (and Muslim countries) poses a serious security threat to the Western world and this threat should be tackled based on his four principles, which include both (western) nonintervention and intervention. Sociologist Göran Therborn (2009) sees Heinsohn’s ideas as “pseudo-deterministic predictions” and argues that:

The youth-bulge argument can tell us nothing of the oppressive character of the Shah’s regime in Iran, the terror of the Zionist occupation of Palestine, the horror of the US wars in Vietnam, Iraq, and Afghanistan, the insults of the Islamophobes, the hypocrisy of capitalist liberalism, or the stifling closets of patriarchy.

Key Empirical Examples

Youth Bulge and Political Violence

In his 2006 study, “A Clash of Generations? Youth Bulges and Political Violence,” Urdal (2006) empirically tested the youth bulge theory through a time-series cross-national statistical model. He took two set of data to test the dependent variables of internal armed conflict (between 1950 and 2000) and terrorism and rioting (between 1984 and 1995). His finding strongly suggested that youth bulges “increase the risk of political violence [...] for all three forms of violence.”

Urdal’s claims were confirmed by the 2007 study conducted by Population Action International, which found that the majority of the civil conflicts that occurred in the four decades between 1970 and 2007 were concentrated in countries where at least 60% of the general population was under 30. Following on this PAI study, Madsen et al. (2010) examined the cases of youth bulge in three African countries (Haiti, Yemen, and Uganda) and suggested that there is a correlation between large young population and instability in those countries. They reached the conclusion that the countries which have very young age structures (with 77% of the population under the age 30) have high probability of experiencing conflict. Their study also accounted for the gendered aspect of the phenomenon, looking at how balanced age structures are linked to gender equality, family planning and reproductive health. These aspects effect fertility rates, which in turn effect age structures. High fertility leads to increase in dependent age structures (below 14 years). Based on cross-national study of 175 countries, Urdal and Malmberg (2008) had also showed a strong correlation between high growth in the population of children and the onset of armed conflict. High number of children and large youth bulges were shown to be “strongly associated with the onset of armed conflict” (Urdal 2011).

Conclusion

When a country or region has a pool of young people of working age (growing) larger than its dependent population, then it is experiencing youth bulge, which can have a significant impact on its politics and economy. Harnessed properly to supply the labor market, youth bulge can be beneficial for economy and become a demographic gift. But, if the institutions are unable to absorb abundantly available working age population, youth bulge can pose serious problems. Longitudinal, cross-national studies have provided evidence that youth bulge is a contributing factor to the outbreak of different forms of violence and conflict. For example, scholars and analysts attribute recent political developments, such as the Arab Spring, to the factor of youth bulge in the Middle East. The post-2008 anti-India uprisings in Kashmir are also attributed to the region’s youth bulge. All these data and insights make it possible to reasonably predict which countries and regions are at greater risk of experiencing conflict in the coming decades. High level of fertility accompanied by youth bulge is expected to lead to turmoil and potentially a violent conflict if good governance and economic opportunities are lacking. Based on current population data, countries with high youth population will be mostly located in Asia, Africa, and Middle East in the next two decades.

While youth bulge may be a contributing factor in a conflict, it is difficult to predict future based on this factor alone. For example, in 2008, Gunnar Heinsohn had predicted that Kenya might see a wave of violence as, over the next 15 years, its young male population of fighting age would reach eight million amid dwindling economic opportunities. Kenya, however, has remained relatively calm and its GDP has doubled from 45 billion in 2010 to 85 billion in 2018. Its young workforce has stimulated this economic growth. Therefore, while instability may be linked to imbalanced age structures, conflicts arise due to all sorts of factors. As Madsen et al. (2010) says, “There is no single cause of conflict, and precipitating incidents are built on a constellation of deeper issues, of which age structure can be a part.” Cincotta and Doces (2012) also cautions us to see demographic models as statistical rather than deterministic. These models can be useful tools if studies based on them also incorporate contextual qualitative analyses. Demographic factor may have a marginal or significant influence on the outbreak of violence and conflict, but what subjective experiences make youth walk those dangerous paths need to be understood first.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Hybrid Political Orders and Hybrid Peace
- ▶ Perpetrator Research
- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

References

Bloom, D., & Williamson, J. (1998). Demographic transitions and economic miracles in emerging Asia. The World Bank Economic Review, 12(3), 419–455.

- Bouthoul, G. (1970). L'infanticide différé. Paris: Hachette.
- Braungart, R. G. (1984). Historical and generational patterns of youth movements: A global perspective. Comparative Social Research, 7(1), 3–62.
- Bricker, N., & Foley, M. (2013). The effect of youth demographics on violence: The importance of the labour market. International Journal of Conflict and Violence, 7(1), 179–194.
- Choucri, N. (1974). Population dynamics and international violence: Propositions, insights and evidence. Lexington: Lexington.
- Cincotta, R., & Doces, J. (2012). The age-structural maturity thesis: The impact of the youth bulge on the advent and stability of liberal democracy. In J. Goldstone (Ed.), Political demography: How population changes are reshaping international security and National Politics (pp. 98–116). Boulder: Paradigm.
- Collier, P., & Hoeffler, A. (2004). Greed and grievance in civil war. Oxford Economic Papers, Oxford University Press, 56(4), 563–595.
- Cuaresma, J., Lutz, W., & Sanderson, W. (2014). Is the demographic dividend an education dividend? Demography, 51(1), 299–315.
- Furlong, A. (2013). Youth studies: An introduction. New York: Routledge.
- Goldstone, J. (1991). Revolution and rebellion in the early modern world. Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Goldstone, J., Kaufmann, E., & Toft, M. (2012). Political Demography: How Population Changes Are Reshaping International Security and National Politics. Boulder, CO: Paradigm.
- Heinsohn, G. (2003). Söhne und Weltmacht: Terror im Aufstieg und Fall der Nationen. Zurich: Orell Füssli.
- Heinsohn, G. (2008, January 7). Exploding population. New York Times. Retrieved from <https://www.nytimes.com/2008/01/17/opinion/17iht-edheinsohn.1.9292632.html>
- Heinz, W. (2009). Youth transitions in an age of uncertainty. In A. Furlong (Ed.), Routledge handbook of youth and young adulthood. Abingdon: Routledge.
- Madsen, E., Daumerie, B., & Hardee, K. (2010). The effects of age structure on development: Policy and issue brief. The shape of things to come series. Washington, DC: Population Action International. Retrieved February 14, 2020, from https://pai.org/wp-content/uploads/2012/01/SOTC_PIB.pdf
- Moller, H. (1968). Youth as a force in the modern world. Comparative Studies in Society and History, 10(3), 238–260.
- Norris, P. (2007). Political activism: New challenges, new opportunities. In C. Boix & S. C. Stokes (Eds.), The Oxford handbook of comparative politics (pp. 628–649). New York: Oxford University Press.
- Pickard, S., & Bessant, J. (2017). Young people re-generating politics in times of crises. Imprint: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Sloam, J., Ehsan, R., & Henn, M. (2018). ‘Youthquake’: How and why young people reshaped the political landscape in 2017. Political Insight, 9(1), 4–8.

- Therborn, G. (2009). NATO'S demographer. New Left Review, 56(Mar/April), 136.
- Urdal, H. (2006). A clash of generations? Youth bulges and political violence. International Studies Quarterly, 50(3), 607–630.
- Urdal, H. (2011). Youth bulges and violence. In J. Goldstone (Ed.), Political demography: Interests, conflict, and institutions (pp. 117–132). Boulder: Paradigm.
- Urdal, H., & Malmberg, B. (2008). Demography and the changing global geography of internal armed conflict. Oslo: Mimeo: PRIO.
- Wallace, C., & Kovatcheva, S. (1998). Youth in society: The construction and deconstruction of youth in east and West Europe. Basingstoke: Palgrave Macmillan.

Using a conceptual approach, the issues and problems in developing a definition of a gang, and with that of gang violence, are examined. Despite controversy, a number of common gang criteria are prolific in the existing academic gang literature, and four of the most common criteria are presented and elaborated upon in this entry: a collective identity, high levels of violence, youth membership, and urban activity. Subsequently, the society-wide approach is used to explain the presence of youth gangs in Honduras. It becomes clear that to explain gang presence in a specific setting, it is important to take various contextual levels into account, among others the global, regional, and national context. Lastly, building on existing ethnographical research, the community approach discusses the influence of youth gangs on the everyday life in Honduras. In doing so, the four common gang criteria are used to determine gang presence on a community level.

Youth Gang Violence

► Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Marije Luitjens

School of Law and Government, Dublin City University, Dublin, Ireland

Synonyms

Honduras; Normalization of violence; (state-) security; Urban violence; Youth gang violence; (Youth) gangs; Safety perceptions

Definition

By building on existing research, this entry discusses the controversial concept of a youth gang and with that the presence of youth gang violence. In doing so, a specific focus on Honduras is applied. Three different approaches are used to provide a comprehensive overview of the existing academic research on gangs: a conceptual approach, a society-wide approach, and a community approach. Consequently, the entry is divided following the three approaches.

Introduction

Despite a slight decrease measured by the UNODC over the last 5 years, the homicide rate in Honduras remains among the world's highest (Human Rights Watch 2018; OV-UNAH 2019; Palencia 2018; UNODC 2019). The presence of youth gangs, and therewith of youth gang violence, is considered to be the most important reason for this (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Palencia 2018; OV-UNAH 2019). The violence in Honduras is primarily prevalent among young adult males between the ages of 15 and 34 (Jütersonke et al. 2009). Despite an increase in gender violence against women, young men living in urban areas in Honduras are more “likely to die a violent death than any other gender or age combination” (Wolseth 2011, p. 11). Youth gang violence holds many Latin-American cities in a grip: a clear sign of the persisting insufferable situation is the migrant caravan travelling in October 2018 from Central America to the USA in search for a better life (Albaladejo 2018). From the more than 7000 people participating, a big part originates from Honduras – fleeing, among others, the high numbers of gang-related violence.

Not unlike other social concepts, the concept of a “gang” is a widely contested one. This entry discusses the ongoing academic debate on youth gang definitions and on the presence of youth gang violence, with a specific focus on Honduras. To present a comprehensive overview, this entry uses three different approaches to understanding youth gangs and youth gang violence: a conceptual approach, a society-wide approach, and a community approach. First, conceptual approaches are used to present a theoretical background on youth gangs and the importance of violence within gang life. This part hence highlights the ongoing debate within the gang research present, including the persisting definitional issues. Subsequently, the society-wide approach incorporates various contextual levels, i.e., the global, the regional, and the national context, which are necessary to understand the gang presence and high levels of violence in Honduras. Lastly, using a community approach, the influence of gangs and gang violence on the everyday life within the gang-dominated communities in the urban areas of Honduras will be discussed.

Conceptual Approaches to Understanding Youth Gang Violence

Research into the phenomenon of gangs, and into gang-related violence, knows a relatively short history as its origins date back to about a century ago (Decker 1996; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; Kontos and Brotherton 2008; Weerman 2012; Wolseth 2011). During periods of early urbanization, among others as a result of industrialization, gangs came into existence in various places all over the world (Hagedorn 2005, pp. 154–155). While gangs do not specifically originate from the USA, it is widely understood that gang research does. This is because Frederic Thrasher is considered the “father” of gang research: Thrasher and his colleagues at the Chicago School of Sociology conducted one of the first of a long line of research into gang presence in the USA (Densley 2013, p. 44; Hagedorn 2008, p. 55). Following this research, Thrasher published “The Gang: a study of 1,313 gangs in Chicago” in 1927, which is considered as the start for widespread research into the gang phenomenon (Hazen and Rodgers 2014, p. 9). According to Thrasher (1936, pp. 494–495), gangs were a direct result of “community disorganization,” where gang patterns are largely determined by the social-ecological environment. Throughout the century, different approaches to gang existence however emerged, which portrayed gangs, for example, as a process of male maturation and identity creation (Bloch and Niederhoffer 1958) or as pure economic enterprises (Padilla 1992).

Throughout the second half of the twentieth century, gangs became an important research subject outside of the USA, and gangs are now understood as a global phenomenon (Hagedorn 2005; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; Jones and Rodgers 2009). Due to the high levels of globalization, similarities in gang culture can be found all over the world. The increased connection between societies has enabled gangs, and specific gang culture, to spread over large distances (Hagedorn 2008; Hazen and Rodgers 2014, pp. 1–2). Concurrently, the diminishing of barriers for communication has given rise to similar social phenomenon in similar social context around the world (Kontos and Brotherton 2008, p. x).

Despite the globalization of gang research, the original definition as proposed by Thrasher (1936, p. 57) remains the most commonly accepted:

A gang is an interstitial group, originally formed spontaneously, and then integrated through conflict. It is characterized by the following types of behavior: meeting face to face, milling, movement through space as a unit, conflict, and planning. The result of this collective behavior is the development of tradition, unreflective internal structure, esprit de corps, solidarity, morale, group awareness, and attachment to a local territory.

Part of the continuing appeal of Thrasher’s definition is “that it is sufficiently broad to apply to a whole range of social forms” (Hazen and Rodgers 2014, p. 6). The broadness of Thrasher’s definition is however also considered problematic, especially in relation to creation of policy that counters gang violence (Esbensen and Carson 2017, p. 8; Spergel 1995). Formulating a narrower definition is complicated by the notion that gangs often differ in form and structure (Maxson and Klein 1995). The high levels of gang violence furthermore complicate conducting in-depth research due to safety issues, and there is continuous social reluctance to admit being in a gang (Esbensen et al. 2012, p. 18). Despite this, there is an ever-growing body of literature on gangs, reaching from ethnographic, qualitative research to a more quantitative approach to understanding gang presence (Ball and Curry 1995; Densley 2013; Hagedorn 2005, 2008; Kontos and Brotherton 2008; Rodgers and Baird 2015; Winfree et al. 1992; etc.). There is nevertheless not one widely accepted definition of a gang (Ayling 2011; Esbensen and Carson 2017; Gunter 2017, p. 14; Hagedorn 2008; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; White 2013), or as Greene and Pranis (2007, p. 9) argue, both academics and policy makers “can agree on only one point in this regard: that there is no agreement.” The absence of a dominant academic paradigm, or this kind of “nit-picking” categorization (Hagedorn 2008, p. 145), provides little insight in the gang dynamics. While a widely accepted definition remains absent, various common gang criteria come forward in the existing gang literature. From these, the four most common criteria have been deduced and will be explained here: collective identity, high levels of violence, youth membership, and urban activity.

While the notion of a “group or collectivity” is included in the vast majority of gang research, it is considered controversial as not one gang is the same (Esbensen and Carson 2017, p. 2; Maxson 1998; Maxson and Klein 1995; Klein 2005). In general, gang members do however share a feeling of belonging to their gang. Regardless of the differences between gangs, social rules and expectations play an important role within each gang, which helps to create a collective sense of identity (Papachristos et al. 2013, p. 418). The manner in which this collective identity is expressed and articulated toward society or other (rival-)gangs however differs greatly. While most gangs in Central America have been known for their use of symbols in the form of tattoos, the use of tattoos has lowered significantly with the aim to become less recognizable for the police or possible “enemies”. Sign and symbols however still play a big role in self-identification, but have become less obviously articulated (Rodgers 2009, p. 16). As with any other identity, the boundaries of a gang identity are fluid and change over time and place. Gangs set themselves apart from the rest of the society precisely because of the production of a collective community feeling. This notion of a collective identity is moreover strengthened as gangs often become institutionalized (Hagedorn 2008, p. xxvi); in other words, gangs become embedded in society and show no sign of disappearing. There is hence a continuity of their existence, independent of its membership (Hazen and Rodgers 2014).

A number of authors have made the comparison to the notion of an “imagined community”, as coined by Benedict Anderson (2006). While Anderson refers to a political imagined community, and hence to the relationship between the state and its citizens, there are significant elements from Anderson’s concept that can be relevant to understanding gang dynamics (Davis 2009, pp. 226–227). Anderson (2006), among others, argues that a community is imagined since “the members of even the smallest nation will never know most of their fellow-members, meet them, or even hear of them, yet in the minds of each lives the image of their communion” (6); in this same sense, not all gang members belonging to, for example, the Honduran 18th Street gang will ever meet, know, or hear of each other but will still feel connected to one another. This is especially true for transnational gangs, as the blurring of local and national boundaries replaced the notion of physical space with the notion of an imagined community (Gutiérrez Rivera 2010, p. 498). Besides that, an “imagined gang community” often (but not always!) shares the same codes of conduct, attributes importance to same forms of symbols, and collectively stands against (various) common enemies (Collins 2010; Decker 1996; Gutiérrez Rivera 2010; Papachristos et al. 2013).

In contrast to other characteristics which are disputed in gang literature, the use of violence has ubiquitously become associated with the notion of a “gang”. The relationship between gangs and violence is well documented in the literature (Battin et al. 1998; Esbensen and Carson 2017; Cohen 1990; Esbensen et al. 2010; Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; Klein and Maxson 1989; Miller 1982; Spergel 1995; Thornberry et al. 2003; Vigil 2003). While already in 1927 Thrasher noted that gangs flourish on conflict, the intensity and amount of gang violence have significantly increased over the last decades due to a variety of reasons, such as an increased access to weaponry (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Hagedorn 1998, pp. 369–360; 2008; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; Rodgers 2009). Especially in Central America, gangs are currently considered to be the most important security threat, as the levels of violence even surpass those of the revolutionary conflicts of the 1970s and 1980s that took place in almost the whole region, with the exception of Honduras (Hazen and Rodgers 2014, p. 1). While in general gang members engage in more violence than other youths, delinquent behavior naturally also occurs among non-gang youth. Gang violence is however set apart because the wider society considers it to be an intrinsic feature of the specific gang (Jones and Rodgers 2009, p. 6). Gang violence also serves various functions of gang life. Decker (1996, p. 263) points out that mechanisms of violence “strongly reflect mechanisms of collective behavior” and the use of violence results in increased solidarity or cohesion within a gang as it “unites” the gang against a common enemy.

While gangs are often considered to be inherently violent, the intensity and presence of violence depend on the social context the gang is situated in. Next to the use of violence, gangs are set apart from other groups by their association with illegal and criminal activities. In Central America, drug trafficking is largely controlled by gangs, which leads to serious problems (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 47). Even though there is no doubt that Central American gangs are strongly related to the high levels of violence and drug trafficking, this relation is not predetermined (Decker and Pyrooz 2015, p. 479). The relationship between gang presence and organized crime is complex, and the data existing is often contradictory: there are also gangs, or gang members, that do not engage in drug trafficking or other forms of organized crime (Hazen and Rodgers 2014, pp. 4–5; Spergel 1995, p. 132).

When referring to a gang, the majority of academics refer to a group of youth, predominantly under the age of 25. A big part of gang research has therefore been devoted to researching “youth gangs”, in comparison to “street gangs”, or “urban gangs” (Densley 2013; Esbensen and Maxson 2012; Gutiérrez Rivera 2010; Hazen and Rodgers 2014; Jones and Rodgers 2009; Miller 1982; Spergel 1995; White 2013). While it is indisputable that the vast majority of active gangs consist of people below the age of 30, the definition of youth is a problematic one in itself. There are various different definitions of “youth” present. The UN (UNESCO 2019) defines youth as “those persons between the ages of 15 and 24 years” but simultaneously states that this definition is flexible when used in different nations. The Honduran government has adopted a much broader definition of youth, from the age of 12 until 30. The boundaries separating “youth” from “adults” are thus considered to vary per social context (Jones and Rodgers 2009, p. 3).

According to an UNDESA report published in 2018, an estimated 68% of the world population will be living in urban areas in 2050 in comparison to 54% in 2014 (UNDESA 2014, 2018). This rapid increase in urbanization raises an array of risks; it has, for example, become apparent that there is an increasing trend of conflict in urban areas (Cockayne et al. 2017; ICRC 2017; Patel and Burkle 2012; UN and WB 2018). Over the last decades however, a shift where gangs have also spread to nonmetropolitan areas has taken place, with gang activity in both urban and rural areas (Esbensen et al. 2010; Klein and Maxson 2006; Wells and Weisheit 2001). Despite this, a US national youth gang survey from 2014 indicates that due to a declining prevalence in smaller cities, “gang activity is becoming even more concentrated in urban areas” (Carson and Esbensen 2017; Egley et al. 2014, p. 2). On top of that, the youth population under the age of 25 has been growing gradually over the last years, and according to the World Bank in 2017, 42% of the world population is under the age of 25 (WB 2017, p. 44). Especially in times of rapid urbanization, in combination with high levels of poverty, no entry to education, and other forms of social exclusion, the young population is put in an extremely vulnerable position (Hagedorn 2008, p. 4). A combination of these social factors moreover provides fertile breeding ground for the emergence of youth gangs (Hazen and Rodgers 2014, p. 139).

While these four criteria are common in the academic gang literature, it is crucial to keep in mind that these criteria should not be considered as static: they adapt to the social context and fluctuate over time and place. Deducted from the existing literature, it can however be stated that a gang generally (1) knows and articulates a collective identity, (2) engages in (extremely) violent behavior, (3) consists primarily of “youth” under the age of 30, and (4) is most active in urban areas. To provide a more concrete understanding of gang presence and its dynamics, it is important to take both the global, regional, and national context into account.

Society-Wide Approaches to Understanding Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

In order to understand the roots of gang presence in a specific context, different contextual layers, as, i.e., global, regional, and national, have to be taken into account. It is generally assumed that gangs are likely to appear in ghettos or favelas where the state is not present, but there is also gang activity in areas where the state is unquestionably present (Hagedorn 2008). The reasons for gangs to appear are hence deeper embedded in a society, and by using a society-wide approach, it becomes possible to obtain a fuller understanding of the roots of gang presence. This approach will therefore be used to understand the presence of gangs in the Honduran society.

The extreme levels of violence known in Honduras have various roots, of which the most widely agreed upon will be discussed here. First of all, throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Honduras struggled with her state formation, aiming to monopolize her power (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 2; Koonings and Kruijt 1999). The decline of agriculture and the growth of the urban industry led to rapid urbanization, mostly between 1950 and 1985. While in 1950 only 18% of the Honduran population lived in cities, this rose to over 40% of the population in 1985 (Barry 1991, p. 327) and had increased to 57% in 2018 (CIA 2019). The country experienced major problems as a result, and it appeared unable to regulate the massive flood of people, who ended up “in informal, unplanned, and under-serviced settlements” (Angel et al. 2004, p. 4), lacking basic social services as drinking water (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 2). Congruently with the high urbanization rate, throughout the 1980s and 1990s, neoliberal policies were introduced in Central America, as part of the “global” transition to democracy (Robinson 2003, pp. 55–56; Wolseth 2011, pp. 17–18). The introduction in 1990 of the Programa de Ajuste Estructural (structural adjustment program) under the administration of Rafael Leonardo Callejas (1990–1994) had disastrous results as, for instance, the widening gap between rich and poor. As a consequence of the fragile centralized forms of power, the government proved moreover to be incapable of providing protection and security for the population on a sustainable basis (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 2).

Throughout the 1990s, the Honduran foreign debt increased by more than a third of what it had been in 1989 (PNUD 1999, p. 95). As a result, education and health programs were budgeted, and youths were “erased from political plans for human and economic development” (Wolseth 2011, p. 10). This coincided with a new policy to fight crime in Los Angeles, USA. It led to the deportation of nearly 46,000 convicts and 160,000 illegal immigrants to Central America between 1998 and 2005 (Jütersonke et al. 2009, p. 380). Before their deportation from Los Angeles, most of the convicted were organized in two prominent rival street gangs. While there are multiple variations of the names for the two gangs circulating within the academic literature and the media, the most prominent ones are the MS-13 (short for Mara Salvatrucha, a reference to the Salvadorian descent) and the 18th Street gang (hereafter referred to as the 18th). While both gangs are distinct, and moreover bitter rivals, maras is used generically to refer to the both gangs (Hagedorn 2008; Jütersonke et al. 2009; Rodgers 2009; Wolf 2010; Gutiérrez Rivera 2013). El Salvador, Guatemala, and Honduras received more than 90% of these deportations (Rodgers et al. 2009, p. 8). For various deportees, who were either active or former members of the MS-13 and 18th, it appeared there were no other alternatives but to join the maras. While this arrival of deportees from Los Angeles is believed to be inextricably linked to the emergence of the maras in Honduras, street gangs had been present in the country for much longer. Scholars distinguish between the existence of “homegrown” street gangs or pandillas, which are “loosely organized and highly localized” and had been known to Honduras before the US deportations started, and the maras or “transnationalized gangs” (Bruneau 2011, p. 3; Jütersonke et al. 2009). The deportation contributed to transnationalizing both MS-13 and 18th, as due to Honduras’ geographical location the country has become an important chain in the drug trade from South America to the USA (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Wolf 2012). This provided the maras with easy access to the lucrative business of drug trafficking, therewith significantly increasing the international drug trade. At the same time, scholars spoke of “new violence” in Central America, as opposed to the political violence from decades before, that seemed “to be everywhere, targeting everyone” (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 49).

Another important factor that worsened the precarious situation in the country is the political coup in June 2009, which caused political turmoil in the whole country. President Jose Manuel Zelaya (2006–2009) had organized polls concerning a variety of issues, including the possibility of modifying the Constitution to allow the president to run for a second term (Meyer 2010). Dissatisfied with their limited power, the military strongly opposed the organization of the polls. Ignoring the wishes of the military, Zelaya decided to continue the polls, which led to the arrest of the president by the military on the 28th of June 2009, after which Zelaya was expelled from the country (HRW 2011, p. 1). The increased political instability and turmoil became fertile soil for organized crime to grow (Bosworth 2010; Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 133). Especially in the parts of the city where there was barely any state control, the power of the gangs rapidly increased (Gutiérrez Rivera 2010; Wolseth 2011).

While it seems straightforward to conclude that the MS-13 and 18th originate from the deportation policy of the USA, it is not that simplistic. The expansion and rapid increase in gang power are linked to the overall lack of opportunities for youth in Honduras, especially in the more marginalized areas. Moreover, while the two most prominent youth gangs are the MS-13 and 18th, there are various other smaller gangs present in Honduras. The maras are however considered to be more organized, having clear lines of rank and well-established leadership roles (Bruneau 2011; Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Wolseth 2011). The maras apply a strict code of conduct, and there is, in comparison to the pandillas, a frequent and institutionalized use of violence present (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 6; Jütersonke et al. 2009, p. 379; Save the Children UK and ACJ 2002). According to Gutiérrez Rivera (2013, p. 77), the use of violence by the maras has intensified the last decades, mainly because of “(a) the proliferation of firearms in the local neighborhoods; (b) changes in the economic function of contemporary gangs, for instance, the need to control resources and illicit commerce in the neighborhoods; (c) the effect of prisons on neighborhood gangs; and (d) mainstream cultural values of money and success.”

Aiming to decrease the level of violence, the government has implemented various security policies throughout the last decades. Where in the 1980s the National Security Doctrine proved to be insufficient, harsh Mano Dura policies were implemented in the beginning of the twenty-first century (2002–2006) by President Maduro. The National Security Doctrine placed the notion of “national security above personal security, the needs of the state before individual rights, and the judgment of a governing elite over the rule of law” (Crahan 1982, p. 101). Mano Dura refers to the legitimization of the use of state violence, implying that security and law enforcement agents perform raids or police the streets of the gang-dominated areas. This led to the implementation of the Ley Antimaras (anti-gang law) in 2003, which authorized security forces and police to imprison maras (and street gangs) on the basis of membership (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 85). Heavily funded by the US government and the World Bank, these interventions were aimed at establishing a “culture of lawfulness,” with interventions that “transform culture to enable the rule of law” (Chandler 2014, p. 34). According to various scholars, both security policies have however also contributed to the increasing levels of violence (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Hagedorn 2008; Hume 2007; Hazen and Rodgers 2014). To be more precise, according to Gutiérrez Rivera (2013), “government stigmatization and criminalization of the maras” (79) has led to a more polarized society, where the actions only fueled the conflict as the maras became more violent. The counter-effect of these policies became all the clearer when, according to the statistics provided by the UNODC (2019), in 2011 the homicide rate hit a high of 85.1 murders per 100,000 people.

Then, however, the homicide rate lowered significantly to 56.6 per 100,000 people in 2016 (UNODC 2019), and according to the Observatory of Violence at the National Autonomous University of Honduras (OV-UNAH), the murder rate even fell to 40 in 2018 (Asmann 2019). While several reasons are provided for this drop, the substantial increase in anti-crime resources and subsequently a thorough national police reform which allowed for a less corrupt and more effective policy force are among the most common (Rísquez 2017). While this seems positive, at the same time, more than 66% of the Honduran population lived in poverty in 2016, and the country faces the highest level of economic inequality in Latin America (World Bank 2019). On top of that, two million Hondurans have limited access to education and health. While the lowering violence seems optimistic, the more substantial problems the country has been dealing with are not improving (HRW 2018; Tinti 2018). In other words, the roots of the gang violence have not been taken away. A tragic sign of this are the 2019 homicide rates, which have been released by OV-UNAH (2019). These findings show that, while still lower than before, the rate has already increased with 117% in comparison to 2018.

Gangs are deeply embedded in the Honduran society and have a wide variety of roots. While the conditions as presented above are considered to be important incentives for gang activity to appear, it cannot be assumed that gangs are predetermined to emerge in similar situations elsewhere (Jones and Rodgers 2009). The answer to the question why gangs are active and powerful in Honduras is a complicated one, and there is not a straightforward answer. It results from a mix of different factors, including the persisting high levels of inequality and poverty, the social marginalization and weak government presence, in combination with a geographical location conducive to drug trafficking, increased transnationalism of gang life, and the high levels of gang violence, which guarantee a strong and perpetual presence of the maras in Honduras. Gang activity hugely depends on the local context and can therefore be only understood within this perspective. When doing so, it becomes clear that finding a solution to the high levels of violence is further complicated by the varying notions of security that are present on community level. The last part of this entry will incorporate various of these local voices and will apply the four gang criteria to demonstrate whether they prove to be applicable to gang presence in Honduras.

Community Approaches to Understanding Youth Gang Presence

By using a community approach, it becomes possible to analyze the impact gang presence has on everyday life in a community. This part of the entry is based on various ethnographic research that has been conducted in Honduras (Castro and Carranza 2001; Berg and Carranza 2018; Gutiérrez Rivera 2010, 2013; Luitjens 2015; Pine 2008; Savenije and van der Borgh 2015; Wolseth 2011). Both Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula know extreme levels of gang violence, and as a result, most of the gang research has been conducted in these urban areas. As there is however a lot of controversial information on the functioning of the 18th, MS-13, and other gangs and pandillas in Honduras, this part presents an overview of the most common findings on gang presence in Honduras. The four common gang criteria as presented in part 1 will moreover be applied to discuss whether they prove to be applicable to study gangs in Honduras.

During the initial period of urbanization, numerous neighborhoods in Tegucigalpa and San Pedro Sula started as informal settlements, referring to a group of people, mostly close families, that moved to the capital in search for work about 60 years ago (Angel et al. 2004). Initially, the communities they formed were illegal ones, where no basic services were provided. Over time however, the communities have become integrated as a part of the city with access to basic public services and infrastructure (Luitjens 2015, p. 20; Pearce-Oroz 2005, p. 108).

Besides the deportation of the maras in the 1990s and the economic and political deprivation over the last decade, hurricane Mitch in 1998 contributed to internal displacement in the country and to the growth of these urban communities (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 104; Moser and Winton 2002, p. 24; Wolseth 2011, pp. 16–17). While initially everyone within the communities knew each other, over time, more and more people moved to these areas, which coincided with the rising crime rates. Elena, a 50-year-old woman living in a mara-dominated area, explained that “during our youth we were able to go dancing, we danced a lot! Now not anymore, the youth from now can’t go out of the house that much, because yes, that is dangerous” (Luitjens 2015, p. 20). It is an extreme challenge to live an “ordinary life” in a community controlled by gangs (Pine 2008; Savenije and van der Borgh 2015). The security policies implemented by the state coincide with the lowering security perceptions within the community. This only contributed to the perceptions of community residents that the state is unable to provide public security (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 9).

Especially for the youth living in the gang-dominated areas, it is a daily challenge to avoid gang recruitment or to stay away from gang activities. Despite the presence of public schools in most urban areas in Honduras, there are various risks and obstacles to attending education. Children in gang-dominated areas are prone to experiencing violence or crime on the way to school; as a result, parents are inclined to keep their children at home. Children moreover often need to help their family with (un)paid labor as caring for younger siblings (Adelman and Székely 2016, pp. 3–4). On top of that, Honduras knows a high level of teen pregnancy which forms a difficult obstacle to obtaining a diploma (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 66). As a result, there is a high dropout rate, and dropouts are considered to be extra susceptible to joining a gang (Orlang 2012, p. 635; Perez 2013, p. 229). Remaining in school is not always the safest option either, as schools are often a place where active gang recruitment takes place (Alberto and Chilton 2019; Luitjens 2015). Arce (2014) moreover points out that “gangs rule over most public schools in the capital”. Even when residents obtain a school diploma, they generally remain socially excluded from the rest of the society and experience difficulties in finding a job. The high levels of marginalization and social exclusion that many adolescents and young adults from these areas experience lead to feelings of frustration and anger toward the authorities and traditional institutions (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 72). A mix of poverty, structural exclusion, the overall lack of opportunities, and chronic high levels of violence moreover weaken the capacity of individuals to develop social ties, within and outside of their families. Moreover, as a result of structural poverty, while parents spend the days and sometimes nights at work, children and adolescents are left alone without supervision. It thus becomes more difficult for parents to engage in affectionate and supportive interactions with their children (Banovcinova et al. 2014, p. 152).

The maras are generally considered to fill the void that these institutions, as, for example, school or family, leave behind (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Wolseth 2011). By joining the maras, it is believed that concrete action against these forms of exclusion is taken. In this sense, the gang is understood to compete with natal household. Wolseth (2011, pp. 55–56) indicates that gangs replace “many of the primary functions of the family, providing food, shelter, and protection, yet within a space that, unlike parental authority, allows young men the freedom to dress and behave the ways they want (. . .).” On the other hand, some youth also joins the gang to feel less scared while being out on the streets. Following the words of a 21-year-old ex-gang member, “you either adapt or you die,” clearly feeling like he did not have another choice but to join the gang (Luitjens 2015, p. 27).

Children moreover get familiarized with gang life from a very young age, for example, when acting as a bandera. “Banderas” refers to people, mostly young kids, who function as the “watchmen,” standing at the borders of the community, looking for either police or unknown persons (Hiles 2019; Luitjens 2015, p. 34). They are guarding their territorial borders and control every move along the border. Another way to control the neighborhoods’ border and to extend gang power is by extorting money from (non-) residents, taxis, or busses that enter the enclosed area (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 78; Alberto and Chilton 2019). According to Venkatesh (1997, p. 95), this is also a way to obtain a “legitimate status” in the community, where the maras become accepted and are not perceived as an immediate threat. In the gang-controlled areas of Honduras, the state is mostly absent, which paves a way for residents to accept the gang as a provider of safety and economic prosper (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Wolseth 2011). Despite this, the maras have not fully obtained a legitimate status in the community; instead a complex relationship is present whereby safety and security perceptions fluctuate (Luitjens 2015).

As explained in the previous parts of this entry, violence is omnipresent in any gang – notwithstanding, this also counts for the gang members of the maras. Violence is a big part of the “code of street” for the maras, and adherence to this street code “permits gang members to obtain both a positive self-image and resources in the midst of situations of poverty and social exclusion” (Savenije and van der Borgh 2015, p. 96). For both the MS-13 and the 18th, respect is at the heart of their street code, and violence is deemed crucial to obtain respect from peers and the community and to defend the respect of the wider gang (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 7; Savenije and van der Borgh 2015, pp. 96–97). The notion of respect is deeply rooted in the mara mentality: violent rituals play a big role when becoming part of the maras. These rituals vary from surviving a beating by a gang member, performing extortion, or even killing someone (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 6; Luitjens 2015). Extreme violence is thus deeply embedded in the mara life, and as Wolseth (2011) refers to it, they foster a “kill-or-being-killed mentality” (58) to uphold the respect. For residents of the gang-dominated areas, it is moreover crucial to show respect to gang members as not doing so might put their own safety in jeopardy (Luitjens 2015, p. 27).

Hence, everyday life is to a great extent controlled by the presence of the maras, and living a normal life is a constant struggle. As Luitjens (2015, pp. 24–25) demonstrates through the use of participatory mapping exercises, residents from gang-dominated areas are prone to adjust their mobility patterns to the high levels of violence. As mentioned, there is moreover a certain level of “normalization”, where people have become used to the presence of the maras (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 49; Koonings and Kruijt 1999). People adjust their behavior to obey the rules imposed by the gangs. This unconsciously adjusted behavior is what Pine (2008, p. 76) refers to as violence having become a part of the Hondurans’ “habitus”, and to use Gutiérrez Rivera’s (2013, p. 54) words “that is, the structuring and structured system that organizes and gives meaning to agents’ practices”. Luitjens (2015,

p. 3) illustrates this in an interview with Mayra, a 53-year-old woman, who explained, without much emotion, that her day was slightly disorganized as she could not buy tortillas due to the heavy “rain of bullets” in the area. In other words, violence seems to have become “accepted” in society as it is internalized through different processes and experiences, as threats by the youth gangs, muggings, or murders. In a study on the perceptions of violence and exclusion, Moser and McIlwaine (2004, 179–181) discern three individual coping strategies: avoidance, confrontation, and conciliation. While the confrontation strategy is not often used by the residents, both the avoidance and conciliation strategy are common in the urban streets of Honduras. Tactics as taking certain routes, or avoiding certain areas after dark, or hiding money in body parts to keep it safe are well-known to the urban citizens of Honduras (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 1). It is moreover a shared understanding that it is better to not walk the streets alone. Besides that, everyone is aware of the rule: “ver, oír y callar” [Watch, listen and be silent]. This “unwritten rule” is shared among all community members: as long as you keep your mouth shut, you can live in the neighborhood relatively safe (Luitjens 2015, p. 22; Savenije and van den Borgh 2015, p. 98). In other words, the gang won’t bother you, as long as you don’t bother them. Despite this, fear is omnipresent. The “gathering spots” of the maras are very well-known within the communities and are mostly referred to as the Esquinas (corners) (Luitjens 2015, p. 25). Residents moreover often stay inside, especially after dark when the situation is assumed to be worse. In the direct period after a violent incident, the streets are often avoided altogether (World Bank 2011, p. 10). When these experiences seem inevitable, a common way in which residents continue their life is by accepting the situation and adjusting their daily patterns in order to avoid complications (Luitjens 2015, 24–25)

The maras have a high visible presence in the Honduran society due to the use of specific iconography, as tattoos or body piercings (Dammert 2017; Gutiérrez Rivera 2013; Luitjens 2015; Wolseth 2011). The use of these cultural signs is crucial for the creation of a feeling of belonging, a collective identity. Despite this, the use of (visible) tattoos has significantly lowered over the last years in order to make oneself, as mentioned before, less obvious to the police (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 117). As a result, gang boundaries have become more diffuse, and there is more cooperation with non-gang members to extend drug-trafficking business. This indicates an important change in gang life, where non-youth have also become active in drug-trafficking activities (Luitjens 2015). People from outside the gang-dominated areas, with relatively good jobs, also cooperate with the maras in order to gain extra money. This varies from helping to open up new “business possibilities” through expanding the existing network to bribing the police. While the core of the gang is below the age of 25, the maras have become more integrated in the wider society, and gang boundaries seem to have become more diffuse. Despite the gang members becoming more difficult to recognize for a complete outsider, to people who live in the community, or who are part of a gang (either the same or a rival gang), it is often clear who belongs and does not.

The territorial gang borders are moreover articulated through the use of MS-13 and 18th symbols, in the form of, i.e., graffiti or murals (Gutiérrez Rivera 2013, p. 78; Wolseth 2011, p. 27). Besides the more obvious “border articulations,” there is also a figurative big gate around the communities, to bar outsiders from entering. In this sense, banderas, as explained above, shape a strong sense of a collective “us” (Luitjens 2015, p. 35). There is a strong feeling of “belonging” among the members, and through the presence and the use of violence, a feeling of collectiveness is enhanced. When someone would be harmed, or even killed, in one of the communities, other communities controlled by the same gang would gather to take revenge. Besides the shared rules concerning revenge, the maras share a common understanding regarding the importance of religion. The reason for this is that when becoming a part of the maras, one has to sign a pact with the devil (Luitjens 2015, p. 29). This is through the means of satanic rituals, for example, by sacrificing animals or even human beings. It is for everyone in the community clear that the power of God is greater than the power of the devil. Hence, everyone understands “el poder de dios” (the power of God), and nothing is more powerful than God. This strong religious notion implies that when a member of the maras has “found God”, the maras cannot do anything against it but let the person go. This however also implies that people would place the power over their lives outside themselves; you are either with “God” (and be safe) or with the “Devil” (and be a gang member) (Wolseth 2008). Religion thus offers real security and is also visible in the neighborhoods: evangelic conversion is according to various people the only way for gang members to leave the gang (Luitjens 2015, p. 29; Wolseth 2008, pp. 101–102).

Lastly, while not all gang members would know each other in person, belonging to the same gang creates a feeling of unity, a strong connection – as Gutiérrez Rivera (2013, p. 118) argues, the maras see themselves as one big family, one gang. According to various residents from gang-dominated areas, there is a feeling of safety because of the presence of the maras. By guarding the borders and making sure no other crime enters the community, not only a feeling of belonging, but also a notion of security within the community borders is created (Luitjens 2015, 21–22) This is again an illustration of the complexity of the concept of security – while at the surface it seems that the maras have obtained a “legitimate status” in the community, this is not the whole story. Suyapa explained that despite the advantages the maras offer, she, along with most others, still wishes to “live a safer life” (Luitjens 2015, p. 22). This indicates that for the majority of the inhabitants, the maras offer the best possible form of security, a form of security that the Honduran state has yet to provide.

When using the four definitional criteria as mentioned in part 1, it becomes clear that there is a clear sense of collective identity among the maras and, despite internal fear, there is a notion of shared values, rules, and protection that has to be shared and shown (1). The Honduran youth from marginalized areas is considered to be most vulnerable and seem to have limited opportunities for other future jobs – as a result, the gang primarily consists of youth under the age of 25 (3). With that, there is engagement in violent behavior (2) to protect their areas of control and strengthen the existing power. While this is not shown on this level, most activity is present in the urban areas (4). The rest of the neighborhood adapts, as the deep fear present in the communities, shown in the notion of ver, oír y callar, overshadows other options.

Future Possibilities

While there is an ongoing debate on the definition of a gang and the origins of youth gang violence, gangs continue to form a global phenomenon and a serious security threat. Throughout this entry, four common criteria have been deduced from the academic literature, which can be used to better understand and define the presence of a gang. These criteria are collective identity, high levels of violence, youth membership, and urban activity. There is however not a specific set of reasons that explains gang presence in a certain area. While it is often assumed that a weak government and the existence of a gang are related, this is not always the case. It is therefore important to take various contextual levels, i.e., global, regional, national, or local, into account when explaining the presence of gang violence. By using three different approaches, a conceptual approach, a society-wide approach, and a community approach, the concept, presence, and roots of (Honduran) youth gangs are explained. While the first approach is merely theoretical, both the society-wide and community approaches offer crucial insights that help define gang presence in the specific context of Honduras. By utilizing a society-wide approach, it becomes clear that gang presence in Honduras is a result of a combination of factors, including the persisting high levels of inequality and poverty, the social marginalization, and weak government presence, all combined with a geographical location conducive to drug trafficking and increased transnationalism of gang life. The community approach indicates that gang violence has become a part of everyday life in the Honduran urban communities. Both these approaches demonstrate the complexity of gang presence in relation to security and peace in areas where violence is thriving.

As the society-wide approach demonstrates, Honduras' state formation process has resulted in fragile state institutions, which appear unable to provide security and protection for its citizens. The security policies that have been implemented seem to have only fueled the conflict or have a positive effect for only a short amount of time. An effective solution, whereby a lasting peace can be achieved, has not been found yet. At the same time, the community approach illustrates that security perceptions within the gang-dominated areas fluctuate. Where the state has left a void concerning the provision of security and opportunities for education or jobs, the maras aim to fill that void. Various community members mention that the presence of the maras offers security which the state does not and thus adapting to the situation appears to be the "safest" decision. When looking beneath this surface, it becomes clear that this notion of security is led by high levels of fear. Consequently, residents have accepted that a form of security where residents can dance on the streets again remains a distant possibility.

Hence, the maras are deeply embedded in the Honduran society and hold a strong power over the gang-dominated areas, where their presence seems to have become normalized. By making use of both society-wide and community approaches to understand the complex situation in Honduras, it becomes possible to better discern and observe the presence of a gang and to expose the roots of gang violence. Doing so is crucial in finding a solution to lowering the extreme levels of gang violence in the country.

Summary

As with most concepts within the social sciences, a gang is a controversial phenomenon: there is not one widely agreed-upon definition of a gang. Despite this, there are various gang criteria mentioned within the existing academic gang literature. Four of the most common criteria are a collective identity, high levels of violence, youth membership, and urban activity.

There is not a specific set of reasons that explain gang presence in a certain area. While it is often assumed that a weak government presence and the existence of a gang are related, this is not always the case. It is therefore important to take various contextual levels, i.e., global, regional, national, or local, into account when explaining the presence of gang violence. By using three different approaches, a conceptual approach, a society-wide approach, and a community approach, the concept, presence, and origins of (Honduran) youth gangs are explained. While the first approach is merely theoretical, both the society-wide and community approaches offer crucial insights that help define gang presence in the specific context of Honduras. Adopting the society-wide approach, it becomes clear that gang presence in Honduras is a result of a mix of different factors, such as the persisting high levels of inequality and poverty, the social marginalization, and weak government presence, in combination with a geographical location conducive to drug trafficking and increased transnationalism of gang life.

Lastly, the community approach observes the influence of gang presence on a community level and illustrates that gang violence has become a part of everyday life in Honduras. Simultaneously, the complexity of the notion of security presents itself. Where the state has left a void concerning the provision of security and protection for its citizens, the maras aim to fill that void. While for many community members the presence of the maras offers a form of security that the state is unable to provide, it is clear that this notion is mostly led by fear. In other words, in the gang-dominated areas where the state is mostly absent, the maras provide the best possible security.

Cross-References

- ▶ Culture and Conflict Resolution
- ▶ Nonviolence and Civil Resistance

- ▶ Security-Development Nexus in Peacebuilding
- ▶ Urban Violence and Crime

References

- Adelman, M., & Székely, M. (2016). School dropout in Central America: An overview of trends, causes, consequences, and promising interventions. The World Bank. <http://documents.worldbank.org/curated/en/308171468198232128/School-dropout-in-Central-America-an-overview-of-trends-causes-consequences-and-promising-interventions>. Accessed 15 July 2019.
- Albaladejo, A. (2018). Care and the caravan: The unmet needs of migrants heading for the US. BMJ, 363–366. <https://doi.org/10.1136/bmj.k5315>.
- Alberto, C., & Chilton, M. (2019). Transnational violence against asylum-seeking women and children: Honduras and the United States-Mexico Border. Human Rights Review, 20(2), 205–227.
- Anderson, B. (2006). Imagined communities: Reflections on the origin and spread of nationalism. London: Verso.
- Angel, S., Bartley, K., Derr, M., Malur, A., Mejia, J., Nuka, P., Perlin, M., Sahai, S., Torrens, M., & Vargas, M. (2004). Rapid urbanization in Tegucigalpa, Honduras: Preparing for the doubling of the city's population in the next twenty-five years. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Arce, A. (2014). In Honduran schools, gangs are in control. AP News. <https://www.apnews.com/f87ead82756b49739652601db71c6c43>. Accessed 15 July 2019.
- Asmann, P. (2019). New Year's bloodshed casts doubt on Honduras security gains. Insight Crime. <https://www.insightcrime.org/news/brief/new-year-bloodshed-cast-s-doubt-honduras-security-gains/>. Accessed 10 July 2019.
- Ayling, J. (2011). Gang change and evolutionary theory. Crime, Law and Social Change, 56, 1–26.
- Ball, R., & Curry, D. (1995). The logic of definition in criminology: Purposes and methods for defining “gangs”. Criminology, 33(2), 225–245.
- Banovcinova, A., Levicka, J., & Veres, M. (2014). The impact of poverty on the family system functioning. Social and Behavioral Sciences, 132, 148–153.
- Barry, T. (1991). Central America inside out: The essential guide to its societies, politics, and economics. New York: Grove Weidenfeld.
- Battin, S. R., Hill, K. G., Abbott, R. D., Catalano, R. F., & Hawkins, J. D. (1998). The contribution of gang membership to delinquency beyond delinquent friends. Criminology, 36, 93–115.
- Berg, L.-A., & Carranza, M. (2018). Organized criminal violence and territorial control: Evidence from northern Honduras. Journal of Peace Research, 1–16. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343317752796>.
- Bloch, H., & Niederhoffer, A. (1958). The gang. New York: Philosophical Library.
- Bosworth, J. (2010). Honduras: Organized crime gained amid political crisis. Working paper series on organized crime in Central America. Woodrow Wilson for International Scholars, pp. 1–33. <https://www.wilsoncenter.org/sites/default/files/Bosworth.FIN.pdf>. Accessed 17 July 2019.
- Bruneau, T. (2011). Introduction. In T. Bruneau, L. Dammert, & E. Skinner (Eds.), Maras: Gang violence and security in Central America (pp. 1–22). Austin: University of Texas Press.
- Castro, M., & Carranza, M. (2001). Las Maras en Honduras Maras y Pandillas en Centroamérica Vol. I. Universidad de Centroamérica. <http://www.uca.edu.sv/publica/iudop/libros/libromarasypandillascentroamericaVol.I.pdf>. Accessed 13 July 2019.
- Chandler, D. (2014). Resilience and the ‘everyday’: Beyond the paradox of ‘liberal peace’. Review of International Studies, 41(1), 27–48.
- CIA. (2019). Central America: Honduras. CIA Factbook. https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/the-world-factbook/geos/print_ho.html. Accessed 30 June 2019.
- Cockayne, J., Bosetti, L., & Hussain, N. (2017). Preventing violent urban conflict. A thematic paper for the United Nations – World Bank Study on Conflict Prevention. <https://collections.unu.edu/eserv/UNU:6432/PreventingViolentUrbanConflict-Aug-2017.pdf>. Accessed 26 June 2019.
- Cohen, A. (1990). Foreword and overview. In C. R. Huff (ed.), Gangs in America (pp. 7–21). Newbury Park: Sage.
- Collins, P. (2010). The new politics of community. American Sociological Review, 75(1), 7–30. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0003122410363293>.
- Crahan, M. E. (1982). National security ideology and human rights. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press.
- Dammert, L. (2017). Gang violence in Latin America. In P. Sturmy (Ed.), The Wiley handbook of violence and aggression (pp. 102–115). New Jersey: John Wiley & Sons.
- Davis, D. (2009). Non-state armed actors, new imagined communities, and shifting patterns of sovereignty and insecurity in the modern world. Contemporary Security Policy, 30(2), 221–245.
- Decker, S. (1996). Collective and normative features of gang violence. Justice Quarterly, 13(2), 243–264.
- Decker, S., & Pyrooz, C. (2015). The handbook of gangs. West Sussex: Wiley-Blackwell.
- Densley, J. (2013). How gangs work: An ethnography of youth violence. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Egley, A., Howell, J., & Harris, M. (2014). Highlights of the 2012 National Youth Gang Survey. Washington, DC: US Department of Justice. <https://www.ojjdp.gov/pubs/248025.pdf>. Accessed 14 July 2019.
- Esbensen, F.-A., & Carson, D. (2017). Prevalence, risk factors, and pathways to gang violence. In P. Sturmy (Ed.), The Wiley handbook of violence and aggression. Hoboken: John Wiley & Sons. <https://doi.org/10.1002/9781119057574.whbva101>.
- Esbensen, F.-A., & Maxson, C. (2012). Youth gangs in international perspective: Results from the Eurogang program of research. New York: Springer.

- Esbensen, F.-A., Peterson, D., Terrance, J., & Freng, A. (2010). Youth violence: Sex and race differences in offending, victimization, and gang membership. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Esbensen, F.-A., Matsuda, K., & Carson, D. (2012). Putting the “gang” in “Eurogang”: Characteristics of delinquent youth groups by different definitional approaches. In F.-A. Esbensen & D. Carson (Eds.), Youth gangs in international perspective: Results from the Eurogang program of research (pp. 17–33). New York: Springer.
- Greene, J., & Pranis, K. (2007). Gang wars: The failure of enforcement tactics and the need for effective public safety strategies. A Justice Policy Institute Report. http://www.justicepolicy.org/images/upload/07-07_rep_gangwars_gc-ps-ac-jj.pdf. Accessed 15 July 2019.
- Gunter, A. (2017). Race, gangs and youth violence: Policy, prevention and policing. Chicago: Bristol University Press.
- Gutiérrez Rivera, L. (2010). Discipline and punish? Youth gangs’ response to ‘zero-tolerance’ policies in Honduras. Bulletin of Latin American Research, 29(4), 492–504.
- Gutiérrez Rivera, L. (2013). Territories of violence: State, marginal youth, and public security in Honduras. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hagedorn, J. M. (1998). Gang Violence in the Post-industrial Era. In: Tonry, M. and Moore, M. H. (Eds.), Youth Violence (364–420). Chicago: University of Chicago Press.
- Hagedorn, J. (2005). The global impact of gangs. Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice, 21(2), 153–169.
- Hagedorn, J. (2008). A world of gangs: Armed young men and Gangsta culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.
- Hazen, J., & Rodgers, D. (2014). Global gangs: Street violence across the world. London: University of Minnesota Press.
- Hiles, L. (2019). Gangs in Honduras and containment policy. Classical Conversations 8. <https://firescholars.seu.edu/ccplus/8>. Accessed 13 July 2019.
- HRW (Human Rights Watch). (2011). World Report 2011: Honduras. <https://www.hrw.org/world-report/2011/country-chapters/honduras>. Accessed 8 July 2019.
- HRW (Human Rights Watch). (2014). World Report 2014: Honduras. <http://www.hrw.org/world-report/2014/country-chapters/Honduras>. Accessed 8 July 2019.
- HRW (Human Rights Watch). (2018). Honduras: Events of 2018. <https://www.hrw.org/world-report/2019/country-chapters/honduras>. Accessed 7 July 2019.
- Hume, M. (2007). Mano Dura: El Salvador Responds to Gangs. Development in Practice, 17(6), 739–751.
- ICRC (International Committee of the Red Cross). (2017). City at war. Special report. Geneva: ICRC. <http://cityatwar.icrc.org>. Accessed 8 July 2019.
- Jones, G. & Rodgers, D. (2009). Youth violence in Latin America: An overview and agenda for research. In D. Rodgers & G. Jones (Eds.), Youth violence in Latin America: Gangs and juvenile justice in perspective (pp. 1–25). New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Jütersonke, O., Muggah, R., & Rodgers, D. (2009). Gangs, urban violence, and security interventions in Central America. Security Dialogue, 40, 373.
- Klein, M. (2005). The value of comparisons in street gang research. Contemporary Criminal Justice, 21, 135–152.
- Klein, M., & Maxson, C. (1989). Street gang violence. In M. E. Wolfgang & N. A. Weiner (Eds.), Violent crime, violent criminals (pp. 198–234). Thousand Oaks: Sage.
- Klein, M., & Maxson, C. (2006). Street gang patterns and policies. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Kontos, L., & Brotherton, D. (2008). Encyclopedia of gangs. London: Greenwood Press.
- Koonings, K., & Kruijt, D. (1999). Societies of fear: The legacy of civil war, violence, and terror in Latin America. London: Zed Books.
- Luitjens, M. (2015). The power of community-resilience: Potential abilities to create stable and non-violent neighbourhoods in Tegucigalpa, Honduras, master’s thesis. Utrecht: Utrecht University.
- Maxson, C. (1998). Gang members on the move. Retrieved from the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention website: <https://www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles/171153.pdf>. Accessed 13 July 2019.
- Maxson, C., & Klein, M. (1995). Investigating gang structures. Journal of Gang Research, 3, 33–40.
- Meyer, P. (2010). Honduran Political Crisis, June 2009–January 2010. CRS Report for Congress. <https://fas.org/sgp/crs/row/R41064.pdf>. Accessed 15 July 2019.
- Miller, W. (1982). Crime by youth gangs and youth groups in the United States. <https://www.bjs.gov/content/pub/pdf/cyggus.pdf>. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- Moser, C., & Winton, A. (2002). Violence in the Central American Region: Towards an integrated framework for violence reduction. (Working paper, Vol. 171). London: Overseas Development Institute. <https://www.odi.org/sites/odi.org.uk/files/odi-assets/publications-opinion-files/1826.pdf>. Accessed 7 July 2019.
- Moser, C. & McIlwaine C. (2004). Encounters with violence in Latin America: Urban poor perceptions from Colombia and Guatemala. New York: Routledge.
- Orlang, A. (2012). Clearly amorphous: Finding a particular social Group for Children Resisting Gang Recruitment. Catholic University Law Review, 61, 621–650.
- OV-UNAH. (2019). En casi seis meses del 2019, hay 98 víctimas en 28 masacres. <https://hondudiario.com/2019/05/20/en-casi-seis-meses-del-2019-hay-98-victimas-en-28-masacres-ov-unah/>. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- Padilla, F. (1992). The gang as an American enterprise. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press.
- Palencia, G. (2018). Honduras murder rate fell by more than 25 percent in 2017: Government. Reuters. <https://www.reuters.com/article/us-honduras-violence/honduras-murder-rate-fell-by-more-than-25-percent-in-2017-government-idUSKBNIER1K9>. Accessed 16 July 2019.

- Papachristos, A., Hureau, D., & Braga, A. (2013). The corner and the crew: The influence of geography and social networks on gang violence. American Sociological Review, 78(3), 417–447.
- Patel, R., & Burkle, F. (2012). Rapid urbanization and the growing threat of violence and conflict: A 21st century crisis. Prehospital and Disaster Medicine, 27(2), 194–197.
- Pearce-Oroz, G. (2005). Causes and consequences of rapid urban spatial segregation. In D. Varady (Ed.), Desegregation the city: Ghettos, enclaves and inequality (pp. 108–124). New York: Sunny Press.
- Perez, O. (2013). Gang violence and insecurity in contemporary Central America. Bulletin of Latin American Research, 9, 217–234.
- Pine, A. (2008). Working hard, drinking hard: On violence and survival in Honduras. Oakland: University of California Press.
- PNUD (Programa de las Naciones Unidas para el Desarrollo). (1999). Informe sobre desarrollo humano, Honduras 1999. Tegucigalpa: Programa de las Naciones Unidas para el Desarrollo.
- Risquez, R. (2017). 7 keys to understanding Honduras' declining homicide rate. Insight Crime. <https://www.insightcrime.org/news/analysis/7-keys-understanding-honduras-declining-homicide-rate/>. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- Robinson, W. (2003). Transnational conflicts: Central America, social change, and globalization. London: Verso.
- Rodgers, D. (2009). Slum wars of the 21st century: Gangs, mano dura and the new urban geography of conflict in Central America. Development and Change, 40(5), 949–976.
- Rodgers, D., & Baird, A. (2015). Understanding gangs in contemporary Latin America. In S. Decker & D. Pyrooz (Eds.), The handbook of gangs (pp. 478–490). Oxford: Wiley Blackwell.
- Rodgers, D., Robert, M., & Stevenson, C. (2009). Gangs of Central America: Causes, costs, and interventions. Geneva: Small Arms Survey. <http://smallarmssurvey.org/fileadmin/docs/B-Occasional-papers/SAS-OP23-Gangs-Central-America.pdf>. Accessed 17 July 2019.
- Save the Children UK and ACJ (Asociación Cristiana de Jóvenes). (2002). Las maras en Honduras: Investigación sobre pandillas y violencia juvenil. Consulta nacional, propuesta de Programa Nacional de Atención, Ley Especial. Tegucigalpa: Asociación Cristiana de Jóvenes de Honduras.
- Savenije, W., & van der Borgh, C. (2015). San Salvador: Violence and resilience in gangland: Coping with the code of the street. In D. Kruijt & K. Koonings (Eds.), Fragility and resilience in Latin American cities (pp. 90–107). London: Zed Books.
- Spergel, I. (1995). The youth gang problem: A community approach. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Thornberry, T., Krohn, M., Lizotte, A., & Smith, C. (2003). Gangs and delinquency in developmental perspective. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Thrasher, F. (1936). The gang: 1,303 gangs in Chicago (2nd ed.). London: University of Chicago Press.
- Tinti, P. (2018). Inside the corruption and repression forcing Hondurans to flee to the US. Vice. https://www.vice.com/en_ca/article/yw98nm/inside-the-corruption-and-repression-forcing-hondurans-to-flee-to-the-us. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- UN (United Nations) and WB (World Bank). (2018). Pathways for peace: Inclusive approaches to preventing violent conflict. Washington: International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.
- UNDESA (United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs). (2014). World urbanization prospects: The 2014 revision. New York: UNDESA.
- UNDESA (United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs). (2018). World urbanization prospects: The 2018 revision. New York: UNDESA.
- UNESCO (United Nations Department of Economic and Social Affairs). (2019). By youth, with youth, for youth. UNESCO. <https://en.unesco.org/youth>. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- UNODC. (2019). Intentional homicide victims, total counts and rates per 100,000 population. UNdata. <http://data.un.org/DocumentData.aspx?q=honduras+homicide&id=407#33>. Accessed 16 July 2019.
- Venkatesh, S. A. (1997). The social organization of street gang activity in an urban ghetto. American Journal of Sociology, 103(1), 82–111.
- Vigil, J. (2003). Urban violence and street gangs. Annual Review of Anthropology, 32, 225–242.
- Weerman, F. (2012). Are the correlates and effects of gang membership gender-specific? Troublesome youth groups and delinquency among Dutch girls. In F.-A. Esbensen & C. L. Maxson (Eds.), Youth gangs in international perspective: Tales from the Eurogang program of research (pp. 271–291). New York: Springer.
- Wells, E. L. & Weisheit, R. A. (2001). The Perception of Gangs as a Problem in Nonmetropolitan Areas. Criminal Justice Review, 26(2), 170–192.
- White, R. (2013). Youth gangs, violence and social respect exploring the nature of provocations and punch-ups. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Winfrey, I., Fuller, K., Vigil, T., & Mays, G. (1992). The definition and measurement of “gang status”: Policy implications for juvenile justice. Juvenile and Family Court Journal, 43(1), 29–37.
- Wolf, S. (2010). Review: Maras transnacionales: Origins and Transformations of Central American Street Gangs. Latin American Research Review, 45(1), 256–265.
- Wolf, S. (2012). Mara Salvatrucha: The most dangerous street gang in the Americas? Latin American Politics and Society, 54(1), 65–99.
- Wolseth, J. (2008). Safety and sanctuary: Pentecostalism and youth gang violence in Honduras. Latin American Perspectives, 35(4), 96–111.
- Wolseth, J. (2011). Jesus and the gang: Youth violence and Christianity in urban Honduras. Tuscon: The University of Arizona Press.

World Bank. (2011). Violence in the City: Understanding and Supporting Community Responses to Urban Violence. Washington: The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

World Bank. (2017). Atlas of sustainable development goals: From world development indicators. Washington, DC: International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

World Bank. (2019). The World Bank in Honduras. <https://www.worldbank.org/en/country/honduras>. Accessed 16 July 2019.

Further Reading

Decker, S., & Pyrooz, C. (2015). The handbook of gangs. West Sussex: Wiley-Blackwell.

Densley, J. (2013). How gangs work: An ethnography of youth violence. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Gutiérrez Rivera, L. (2013). Territories of violence: State, marginal youth, and public security in Honduras. New York: Palgrave Macmillan.

Hagedorn, J. (2008). A world of gangs: Armed young men and gangsta culture. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press.

Hazen, J., & Rodgers, D. (2014). Global gangs: Street violence across the world. London: University of Minnesota Press.

Wolseth, J. (2008). Safety and sanctuary: Pentecostalism and youth gang violence in Honduras. Latin American Perspectives, 35(4), 96–111.

(Youth) Gangs

► Youth Gang Violence in Honduras

Youthquake

► Youth Bulge and Conflict

Yugoslavia

► Transitional Justice in Croatia

Z

Zones of Peace

Landon E. Hancock
School of Peace and Conflict Studies, Kent State University, Kent, OH, USA

Synonyms

Experiencia de Paz \(peace experience\); Peace community

Definition/Description

Zones of peace (ZoPs) began as geographically based communities of citizens seeking to withdraw themselves from situations of violence in the midst of armed conflict. This definition later expanded to include peace communities in post-conflict areas as well as peace experiences for communities that became displaced due to violence or war. ZoPs are often characterized by a triggering event, high levels of communal participation and cohesion, a wide variety of peacebuilding activities, and the need to continually negotiate their safety by practicing “active neutrality” with respect to groups of armed actors – state supporting, state opposing, or even criminal gangs. First created in the Philippines in the 1980s, ZoPs have been used most widely in Colombia during its civil conflict, but have analogues in El Salvador, West Africa, and elsewhere.

History and Current Uses

One of the lesser-known corners of academic study concerns the efforts of local communities to create islands of sanctuary in the midst of violence, largely known as zones of peace. Some of the original uses of this term stem from classical forms of sanctuary, dating back to the Greek city states and up through the Catholic Church’s use of sanctuary during the middle ages (Mitchell and Hancock 2007). More modern uses have stemmed from state-oriented conceptions such as ASEAN’s 1971 declaration Zone of Peace, Freedom, and Neutrality (ZOPFAN) and the division of the world’s states in zones of peace and conflict based on their alignment with western ideals of liberal democracy (Kacowicz 1998; Singer and Wildavsky 1993), Safe Havens in Bosnia during the civil conflict there (Mitchell 2007), disarmament zones in Aceh, Indonesia (Iyer and Mitchell 2007), days of tranquility or humanitarian aid corridors (Rigalo and Morrison 2007), the Harm Free Zone movement in marginalized communities in the USA (Harm Free Zone: General Framework), or even personal zones of protection such as the Nepalese/UNICEF project to declare children and schools as zones of peace (Maulden 2018). However, the more common use of the term of zones of peace stems from its use by communities that, trapped in the middle of civil conflicts, have chosen to try and withdraw from that conflict and declare themselves to be “actively neutral” in the struggle between insurgents and pro-government forces.

These “Local Zones of Peace” first cropped up in the Philippines in the 1980s before spreading to Latin America – specifically in Colombia and El Salvador – Africa – specifically, Côte d’Ivoire and Sierra Leone – and developing offshoots in places like Peru, Sri Lanka, Nepal, and Belfast (for instance, see Allouche and Jackson 2019; Avruch and Jose 2007; Hancock 2007, 2012; Hancock and Iyer 2007; Idler et al. 2015; Langdon and Rodriguez 2007; Macaspac 2018; Mitchell and Rojas 2012; Mouly 2013; Rojas 2007; Sanford 2003; Santos Jr. 2005). They have come under many guises and have existed in many countries, albeit often under different names. Some of the first ZoPs were territorially defined, such as the Philippine Zone of Peace, Freedom, and Neutrality (also ZOPFAN) declared in Naga City, southern Luzon, in 1988 (Garcia 1992, p. 73). But others, such as later communities in Colombia, began to organize themselves around the notion of communities of peace or peace experiences, recognizing that for those forced to flee their homes, issues of territoriality were only a part of their drives to escape conflict and build more sustainable and positive lives.

In addition to the differences in focus, there are differences in nomenclature. Most of these appear to be driven by members of the local community, or communities, involved and are expressions of local culture, local understandings of what drives conflict or peace, or even responses to how terms used in one locale can have very different meanings in translation. (For instance, while observing a workshop held between North and South Ossetian community members in 2009, this author learned that the Russian translation “zona” was an informal term used to describe Soviet Gulags.) Names for these zones range from the Tabuk Peace Zone’s title of “Matagoan” (meaning “zone of life” in Kalinga) (Garcia 1992, p. 74), to the Constituent Assembly of Mogotes in Colombia (Rojas 2007, p. 78), the Rondas Campesinas in Peru (Langdon and Rodriguez 2007), to Local Peace Committees or informal peace NGOs in various African countries and communities (Allouche and Jackson 2019; van Tongeren forthcoming).

One main way that scholars have attempted to define or differentiate ZoPs experiences from one another is to look at them through a temporal lens. This lens differentiates ZoPs into those created and functioning during an active conflict, those functioning during a post-agreement or post-conflict period, and those functioning in a more limited fashion or for a more limited period of time (Hancock and Iyer 2007). This brief overview will largely concentrate on the first two types of ZoPs, reviewing some of the key features of the concept and its application before moving on to the current state of the literature and how the practices of successful zones of peace can or have informed other peacemaking and peacebuilding activities.

Defining Characteristics/Key Features

Given the wide variety in the use of the term, and the even wider variety in names and nomenclature, it is well to take some time to discuss what different authors have suggested or found to be their defining characteristics or key features. One of the main key features that many ZoPs, especially those created by local inhabitants, is the necessity of a triggering event – and usually a violent one – that pushes local organizers to propose and construct the zone. In places like Mogotes, Colombia, the event was an attack on the town by ELN guerrillas, while in El Salvador, the creation of the Local Zone of Peace came about because of a rise in gang violence in the area (Hancock 2007; Rojas 2007). Even when the triggering event is nonviolent – as it was in the case of Belfast – what it does is to provide the impetus, or the realization, that the community can develop the strength to deal with its own problems locally (Hancock 2012). (In Belfast, the Suffolk-Lenadoon Interface Group (SLIG) was formed by two single-community organizations – one Catholic and one Protestant – following a nonviolent intervention event designed to force the city to put up a pedestrian traffic light on a busy thoroughfare.)

A second key feature of successful ZoPs is their grassroots orientation in terms of ownership and control. While many peacebuilding programs or projects tend to have extensive links with national or international bodies, most ZoPs tend to form out of local communities, and a good many of them manage to retain significant local control over their activities. This second feature links directly to their third feature, namely that grassroots-oriented peace zones tend to focus on a wide variety of peacebuilding projects and programs – which stands in stark contrast to international or state-led peace zones, which tend to focus narrowly upon security issues. For locals, the inclusion of a wide variety of programs has two main drivers. The first is the need to develop and maintain a strong sense of internal cohesion – perhaps among a widely diverse community. This means that projects and programs will have to be devised and carried out to meet the needs of many community members, rather than just select subgroups. Examples of this kind of focus include programs for youth groups (Kaplan 2017), the development of agricultural cooperatives (Hancock 2007; Villanueva et al. forthcoming), educational institutions (Mitchell and Rojas 2012), and many, many others. The second driver is that the ability to direct their own peacebuilding projects gives community members a powerful sense of agency that is not typically available when carrying out peacebuilding projects that are conceived of and funded by external actors (Hancock 2017). This can translate into higher levels of local legitimacy when the zone connects with the needs of the community and remains accountable to community members for its performance (Hancock and Mitchell 2018).

Another key that defines ZoPs is the necessity to continually negotiate the parameters of their “active neutrality” with various armed actors. This is largely the provenance of ZoPs active during armed conflict or manifest violence, when community leaders need to maintain contact with local representatives of all of the armed factions – including government forces, pro-government vigilante forces, insurgent forces, and even criminal gangs. The essence of these negotiations is to ensure the neutrality of the ZoP and assure various forces that the zone itself will not be used as a base of support for the other side (Mitchell and Hancock 2007; Neumann 2010; Rojas 2007; Sanford 2003; Valenzuela 2009). These forms of active neutrality are not without their dangers or drawbacks. One of the primary problems that zones declaring active neutrality have is with the state. Even when local commanders agree to keep their forces out of the zone or to only enter when unarmed, regional or national leaders may balk at such conditions because they argue that state forces should have the right to control all of the country’s territory. In Colombia, in particular, this has extended to attacks on zones by the president of the country, who tried to define neutral zones as guerilla sympathizers (Mouly et al. 2016; Rodríguez 2012). At other times, negotiations with armed actors can fall through, especially when the location of the zone lies upon valuable territory. This most often happens when the zone has military or economic value for one side or the other but can also happen when long-established relationships between locals and military commanders are disrupted. In Colombia, the movement of guerilla leaders or military commanders has disrupted communication channels, and the impact of the 2016 Havana Accords and subsequent demobilization FARC forces created several vacuums, which were then filled by a variety of armed actors, leading to increased violence in several zones (Delgado forthcoming; Iglesias et al. forthcoming; Mitchell and Hancock 2007; Pardo-Herrera and Victorino forthcoming; Rojas 2007). Overall, although the goal of active neutrality is one of the most prominent defining characteristics of a ZoP, it is also one of the most difficult to achieve, requiring a high level of internal solidarity and no small amount of skill to maintain positive relationships with varied armed groups.

Current Uses

Initial interest in peace zones as forms of sanctuary has blossomed into a wider set of analyses of peace zones, and similar entities, as forms of localized and locally owned peacebuilding and sources of civil resistance to armed conflict and violence. Many authors have grappled with different aspects of peace communities and the kinds of local peacebuilding that they have engendered. Among these four key elements have emerged that help to define what makes these peace communities successful or which could possibly inform broader debates on peacebuilding. These are the impact of local cultures on the development and success of peace communities, the role of peace communities – and their variants – in negotiating the cessation or prevention of violence, the role of peace communities in supporting the empowerment of previously marginalized groups, and peace community processes that encourage the participation of community members and the engendering of local agency.

Cultural Elements

There have been several studies that examined the cultural elements associated with peace communities and zones of peace. The importance of these elements has to do with the need for high levels of internal cohesion, and the cultural elements to a peace community are invaluable when that community transitions from a time and space when they are under external pressure – violent or not – to a time and space when that pressure has been lifted. For instance, one of the earlier examinations of the cultural element comes from the post-conflict Local Zone of Peace in El Salvador. As Chupp (2003) details, their Culture of Peace Program was designed to elicit an indigenous set of processes based on local values in order to transform what had been a culture valorizing aspects of violence into one that supported peaceful interaction on a holistic scale. Likewise, in both the Philippines and in Colombia, indigenous and Afro-Colombian communities have leveraged their cultural traditions in the service of building peaceful communities and encouraging internal cohesion. Macaspac (2018) details how the community of Sagada in the Philippines used forms of indigenous governing structures known as dap-ay, to call for the removal of armed factions from the community. The argument for this removal was less directly connected to issues of neutrality, or even security, but was based on the need to undertake onerous rituals to cleanse any areas that might be polluted if the armed groups perpetrated violence upon them (Macaspac 2018, p. 22). They also used local norms, called innayan, to create a set of prohibited practices to assure the neutrality of community members and to forbid the use of violence or other practices that might endanger local inhabitants or force the elders to conduct cleansing ceremonies (Macaspac 2018, p. 23). In Colombia, Iglesias, Rosen, and Masullo (forthcoming) detail how the Afro and indigenous communities of the Chocó region used their cultural distinctiveness and organizing capacities to develop a region-wide peace platform following the signing of the 2016 Havana Accords between the Colombian Government and FARC guerillas. Likewise, Villanueva et al. (forthcoming) detail how in Granada, a region-wide culture of cooperativismo “produced a culture that reinforced and regulated bonds between individual people through values that transcended economic, social, political, and cultural identities,” enabling interpersonal and inter-group structures for peace to be developed.

Negotiating and Interventions to Prevent Violence

One of the key goals for peace zones is the prevention of violence directed against members of the community. In many zones, this means that their leaders need to negotiate with armed actors, often from several groups. Extensive reports on zones in the Philippines, Colombia, and El Salvador show that the impetus for ZoP creation is often a violent triggering event, which can include kidnappings, but often involves the murder of one or more civilians at the hands of armed actors (Avruch and Jose 2007, p. 55; Chupp 2003, p. 99; Rojas 2007, pp. 77, 80, 83). Some of the keys for successful negotiation include widespread community participation in the activities of the peace zone (Idler et al. 2015; Kaplan 2013), a collective leadership that is seen as legitimately representing the interests of the community (Mitchell and Hancock 2007), or trusted elders are available to reassure both the community and outsiders that any agreement made will be kept (Mouly et al. 2016; Neumann 2010). These keys help to ensure a high level of internal cohesion, trust in the local leadership by the community, and trust by the external actors that the leadership is legitimately acting on behalf of the community. As noted in several studies, the lack of a relationship between the community and the armed actors, whether through changes in the community, changes in armed group leadership, or even the withdrawal of one armed actor from the conflict, can have a negative impact upon the ability of the community to successfully negotiate their neutral status (Hancock and Allen forthcoming; Hancock and Mitchell 2012; Mitchell and Hancock 2007). Additionally, the position of the peace zone on desired land, whether strategically desired or valuable for economic reasons, can also make it far more difficult to successfully negotiate with armed actors (ibid.).

Tools for Empowering Marginalized Groups

Because zones of peace often represent what Richmond (2014, p. 133) describes as localized practices of peace formation, they embody the kinds of empowerment that is often missing from top-down peacebuilding programs. As described above, much of this can be ascribed to the twin drivers of the need for community cohesion in the face of external threats, and the use of local or indigenous cultural forms to give structure and meaning to local peacebuilding efforts. The result is that larger numbers are welcomed to participate in community peacebuilding activities and groups that had been previously marginalized are often provided with seats at the table.

This empowerment of marginalized groups is most evident in Latin American ZoPs, where traditional cultures of patriarchy and ageism have kept women, youth, indigenous, and Afro-descendant communities out of positions of power and authority for much of the region's history. In Hancock's (2007) examination of El Salvador's Local Zone of Peace, several of that group's projects, such as its, cybercafé, local radio station, youth art project, and in particular, its provision of laser tattoo removal for former gang members, were designed to empower those on the margins of society and to provide opportunities for creative expression, education, and advancement. Pardo-Herrera and Victorino (forthcoming) relate how women have taken advantage of the provisions of the Havana Accord to seek public office and to participate more fully in civic life, in particular by contributing to the creation of women's boards and supporting women's economic activities. Several authors have commented on the radical peace community of San Jose de Apartado, which has created a number of initiatives designed to empower its community members, including fair trade economic activities, partnerships with international NGOs like Peace Brigades International to provide accompaniment and security, and not least, the creation of their own educational system, including the university of resistance (Brown 2016; Burnyeat 2017; Finn 2014; Masullo 2015). Not all ZoPs seek to empower broad swathes of the community, but as Idler, Garrido and Mouly (2015) show us, communities that do not invest in empowerment often fail to engender the kind of cohesion that helps them weather external attacks, whether physical or symbolic.

Processes for Engendering Agency

One of the most important aspects of peace communities, and the one that has the clearest implications for grassroots peacebuilding, has to do with the kinds of governance structures and processes that formalize community participation in decision-making, give community members the ability to hold community leaders accountable, and engender agency in the community, rather than letting it reside in outsiders, whether they are governments or external funding agencies. One of the clearest examples of this kind of participatory governance structure is that built by the Local Zone of Peace in El Salvador. They developed a program of Dialogue and Reflection Circles, designed to open channels of communication between LZP members and community members. In addition, they created a process of election, wherein individual communities would elect members to the circles, who would then elect members to regional circles, promoting grassroots control over the LZP (Chupp 2003; Hancock 2007).

Neumann (2010) describes the governing processes of the GiNaPaLad Ta Ka Space for Peace in Mindanao as based on a series of dialogues between Christian, Moro, and Lumad (indigenous) communities. She further notes that in stepping away from a western ideal of individual equality, these groups have focused more on community, turning elections into consultative processes wherein the community questions potential candidates and decides who will be allowed to run for office, with the final candidate essentially running unopposed (Neumann 2010, p. 189). This is similar to how Rojas describes the activities of the Constituent Assembly in Mogotes, where candidates for community manager – the office being renamed from mayor – were required to support the community-devised development plan and to give periodic reports to the community (Rojas 2007, pp. 78–79).

Hancock (2017, 2018, 2020) goes into more detail on how governance processes and the relationship between the peace community and those they serve has an impact upon the perceptions of local agency on the part of the community and the legitimacy of the peacebuilding organization. Some of the key elements discovered in an analysis of many peace communities shows that when peace communities meet the tenets of procedural justice (cf. Tyler 2000), even if those are conceptualized in local, folk manners, then they are more likely to display indicators of agency and to have legitimacy conferred upon them by the recipient community. These elements include trustworthiness of the authorities, neutrality of the forum/organization, treatment of the recipient population with dignity and respect, and opportunity for meaningful voice. The presence of these four elements, when combined with democratic governance, broad public participation and what Galtung and Tisné (2009) describe as accountability down make up what is described as deliberative peacebuilding, leading to increased local agency and the legitimacy of the peace community or peacebuilding organization (Hancock 2020, p. 143).

Importance to Peacebuilding

In many ways, the zones of peace movement represents some of what is best and cutting edge in peace studies, and peacebuilding in particular.

When Lederach (1997) points to peacebuilding as being driven by a balance between relationships and structures, he could have easily been describing the dynamics that lie at the heart of the most successful peace zones. Additionally, parts of Richmond's concept of peace formation is highly aligned with principles and practices of successful ZoPs. Richmond (2014, p. 134) describes peace formation as a set of localized practices that can be engaged in by locals but also require networking across multiple levels of action or place. Additionally, ZoPs represent a very early attempt to address some of the problems of peacebuilding that have become more prevalent to study with the advent of the "local turn" (Leonardsson and Rudd 2015; Mac Ginty and Richmond 2013; Paffenholz 2015; Schierenbeck 2015). Some of the practices within peace zones and some of the research seeking to understand them have the potential to improve our understanding of and practices within the broader context of peacebuilding at multiple levels.

The question of why some peace communities are successful, and others not, has been partially addressed by the many scholars who have examined them in various contexts. Some of the indicators for success – laid out above – are dependent upon the context, especially for those ZoPs operating in conflict environments. Elements such as whether the locality lies on valued territory or whether local armed-actor commanders are new to the area or long resident with established relationships can be seen as largely out of the control of the peace community. However, those things that are under their control, such as how the peace community engages with its citizens, what kinds of programs it develops, whether it is accountable to community needs and is transparent in its activities, can all have a bearing upon the development of local ownership, indicated by high levels of local community agency, and the receipt of local legitimacy from the community (Hancock 2020).

Problems of local ownership have bedeviled internationally-sponsored peacebuilding programs for some time (Autesserre 2017; Donais 2012; Richmond 2012; Richmond and Carey 2005). This has led some scholars to attempt to move beyond ownership – which has become a contested term – into trying to define agency in relationship to peacebuilding (Boas and Tom 2016; Kappler 2014; Mac Ginty 2014; Plonski 2005; Pugh 2011; Richmond and Mitchell 2011, 2012). Examinations of ZoPs show that functional and successful peace communities seem to necessarily have high levels of community agency (Hancock 2017, 2020) and that, furthermore, this community-oriented agency often translates into increased legitimacy for the peacebuilding organization (Hancock 2018; Hancock and Mitchell 2018). These issues of agency and legitimacy in peace zones have larger implications for peacebuilding practice. Richmond describes local legitimacy as reflecting “social patterns of identity, history, and culture,” drawing a distinction between it and international legitimacy, which rests upon international law and custom (Richmond 2013, p. 275). He further notes that local ownership is necessary for bottom-up legitimacy, a proposition that is equally in line with key elements of successful ZoPs and peace communities. Richmond (2013, p. 275) also states that peace formation “offers a form of legitimacy that the state and the international cannot do without,” showing the value of the kinds of processes occurring in peace communities that develop the kinds of legitimacy that can, at times, be extended from the community to state-level actors (Hancock and Allen forthcoming).

One key factor that still needs more exploration is the monetary of funding relationships between peace communities and external organizations. As with much else in peacebuilding, these sets of relationships can be difficult and raise the specter of undermining local agency and legitimacy – and hence, the effectiveness of peace communities. Different models of funder/ZoP relationship have included accepting funding with strings attached, to only accepting funding when the community could decide what programs, and projects to work on, to not accepting any external funding, and even to one peace community – the Local Zone of Peace in El Salvador – creating its own funding arm to ensure high levels of independence (Hancock 2007). Some NGOs, such as Tabang Mindanao in the Philippines and REDEPAZ in Colombia, have worked in a highly elicitive manner, seeking to preserve local control and local agencies. In other cases, the influx of government or foundation funds has been somewhat destabilizing, leading to internal divisions and conflicts about where and how to spend these monies (Avruch and Jose 2007; Hancock 2020). The issue in these cases often has to do with the direction of accountability and the fairly reasonable expectation on the part of funding agencies that when they disburse large amounts of cash, that they should receive some sort of reporting in order to gauge the effectiveness and/or success of their efforts. Unfortunately, as some have described, typical top-down accountability schemes often clash directly with the need to have local ownership and to use indigenous methods of peacebuilding (Galtung and Tisné 2009; Mac Ginty 2010; Wilen 2009). Furthermore, top-down accountability requirements often mean that the peacebuilding organization needs to spend a great deal more time on their reporting requirements than on the actual work of building peace (Hancock 2020; Mac Ginty 2010; Pouligny 2005).

One alternative to this problem rests on suggestions to substitute top-down accountability models with those that are bottom-up (Galtung and Tisné 2009), with community members holding peacebuilding organizations accountable, or to create systems of mutual accountability (Arandel et al. 2015, p. 991), where “key stakeholders” agreed to hold each other accountable and to collaborate to address agreed upon priority issues. These kinds of models – as well as potentially others – need to be explored further both in the context of peace communities and in the wider realm of local peacebuilding.

Contributions to Peacebuilding

The detailed examinations of peace communities by the many scholars and activists reviewed in this entry show that they are heavily involved in examining the everyday instances of peace formation, and that our understanding of both grassroots peacebuilding and peace formation as a concrete phenomenon can be enhanced through this kind of study of the lived experiences of peace communities across the globe.

Cross-References

- ▶ Local Peacebuilding
- ▶ Peace Infrastructures

References

- Allouche, J., & Jackson, P. (2019). Zones of peace and local peace processes in Côte d'Ivoire and Sierra Leone. Peacebuilding, 7(1), 71–87. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2018.1491276>.
- Arandel, C., Brinkerhoff, D. W., & Bell, M. M. (2015). Reducing fragility through strengthening local governance in Guinea [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 985–1006. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1025741>.
- Autesserre, S. (2017). International peacebuilding and local success: Assumptions and effectiveness. International Studies Review, 19(1), 114–132. <https://doi.org/10.1093/isr/viw054>.
- Avruch, K., & Jose, R. S. (2007). Peace zones in the Philippines. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 51–70). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Boas, M., & Tom, P. (2016). International interventions and local agency in peacebuilding in Sierra Leone. In O. P. Richmond & S. Pogodda (Eds.), Post-liberal peace transitions: Between peace formation and state formation (pp. 143–159). Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press.
- Brown, C. (2016). Supporting a radical peace: Reflections on the peace community of San Jose de Apartado. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 11(1), 70–74. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2016.1145517>.
- Burnyeat, G. (2017). “Rupture” and the state: The “radical narrative” of the peace community of San José de Apartado, Colombia [Article]. Ruptura” y el Estado: la “narrativa radical” de la Comunidad de Paz de San José de Apartado, Colombia, 29, 17–40. <https://doi.org/10.7440/antipoda29.2017.01>.
- Chupp, M. (2003). Creating a culture of peace in postwar El Salvador. In C. Sampson, M. Abu-Nimer, & C. Liebler (Eds.), Positive approaches in peacebuilding: A resource for innovators. Washington, DC: Pact Publications.
- Delgado, E. H. (forthcoming). Assuming peace at the beginning of the post-agreement: The case of the “women weavers of life” in Putumayo, Colombia. In S. Allen, L. E. Hancock, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Donais, T. (2012). Peacebuilding and local ownership: Post-conflict and consensus-building. Vol. 5 Studies in conflict, development and peacebuilding New York: Routledge.
- Finn, L. (2014). Colombia: Peace community of San José de Apartadó. In A. Dey, J. Garate, S. Kattel, C. Schweitzer, & J. Sheehan (Eds.), Handbook for non-violent campaigns (2nd ed., pp. 156–159). London: War Resisters’ International.
- Galtung, F., & Tisné, M. (2009). A new approach to postwar reconstruction. Journal of Democracy, 20(4), 93–107.
- Garcia, E. (1992). Empowering people for peace: The Philippine experience. In K. Rupesinghe (Ed.), Internal conflict and governance (pp. 65–80). Oslo: St. Martin’s Press in association with the International Peace Research Institute.
- Hancock, L. E. (2007). El Salvador’s post-conflict peace zone. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 105–122). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Hancock, L. E. (2012). Belfast’s interfaces: Zones of conflict or zones of peace. In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: interaction between grassroots and elite processes (pp. 111–132). London: New York: Continuum.
- Hancock, L. E. (2017). Agency & peacebuilding: The promise of local zones of peace. Peacebuilding, 5(3), 255–269. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2016.1253604>.
- Hancock, L. E. (2018). Legitimate agents of peacebuilding: Deliberative governance in zones of peace. In L. E. Hancock & C. Mitchell (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and legitimacy: Interactions between national and local levels. London: Routledge.
- Hancock, L. E. (2020). Deliberative peacebuilding: Agency and development in post-conflict practice. Peacebuilding, 8(2), 139–158. <https://doi.org/10.1080/21647259.2019.1591839>.
- Hancock, L. E., & Allen, S. H. (forthcoming). Local peace roles in post-agreement nominal peace and continuing conflict. In S. Allen, L. E. Hancock, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Hancock, L. E., & Iyer, P. (2007). The nature, structure and variety of “peace zones”. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 29–50). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. R. (2012). Between local and national peace: Complementarity or conflict? In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes (pp. 161–178). London, New York: Continuum.
- Hancock, L. E., & Mitchell, C. R. (2018). Legitimacy, peace, and peacebuilding. In L. E. Hancock & C. Mitchell (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and legitimacy: Interactions between national and local levels (pp. 222–236). Abingdon, Oxon; New York, NY: Routledge.

- Harm Free Zone: General Framework*. <http://harmfreezone.org/framework.pdf>.
- Idler, A., Belén Garrido, M., & Mouly, C. (2015). Peace territories in Colombia: Comparing civil resistance in two war-torn communities. Journal of Peacebuilding & Development, 10(3), 1–15. <https://doi.org/10.1080/15423166.2015.1082437>.
- Iglesias, A. I. R., Rosen, N., & Masullo, J. (forthcoming). Mobilizing to counter post-accord security challenges: The case of the “humanitarian accord now” in Chocó. In S. Allen, L. E. Hancock, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Iyer, P., & Mitchell, C. R. (2007). The collapse of peace zones in Aceh. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 137–166). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Kacowicz, A. M. (1998). Zones of peace in the Third World: South America and West Africa in comparative perspective. Albany, NY: State University of New York Press.
- Kaplan, O. (2013). Protecting civilians in civil war: The institution of the ATCC in Colombia. Journal of Peace Research, 50(3), 351–367. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0022343313477884>.
- Kaplan, O. R. (2017). Resisting war: How communities protect themselves. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Kappler, S. (2014). Local agency and peacebuilding: EU and international engagement in Bosnia-Herzegovina, Cyprus and South Africa. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Langdon, J., & Rodriguez, M. (2007). The Rondas Campesinas of Peru. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 91–104). Kumarian Press.
- Lederach, J. P. (1997). Building peace: Sustainable reconciliation in divided societies. United States Institute for Peace.
- Leonardsson, H., & Rudd, G. (2015). The ‘local turn’ in peacebuilding: A literature review of effective and emancipatory local peacebuilding [Essay]. Third World Quarterly, 36, 825–839. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029905>.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2010). Gilding the lily? International support for indigenous and traditional peacebuilding. In O. P. Richmond (Ed.), Palgrave advances in peacebuilding: Critical developments and approaches (pp. 347–366). London: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Mac Ginty, R. (2014). Everyday peace: Bottom-up and local agency in conflict-affected societies. Security Dialogue. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010614550899>.
- Mac Ginty, R., & Richmond, O. P. (2013). The local turn in peace building: A critical agenda for peace. Third World Quarterly, 34(5), 763–783. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2013.800750>.
- Macaspac, N. V. (2018). Insurgent peace: Community-led peacebuilding of indigenous peoples in Sagada, Philippines. Geopolitics, 1–39. <https://doi.org/10.1080/14650045.2018.1521803>.
- Masullo, J. (2015). The power of staying put: Nonviolent resistance against armed groups in Colombia [Monograph] (ICNC Monograph Series, Issue. I. C. o. N. Conflict). Washington, DC: ICNC Press.
- Maulden, P. A. (2018). Targets of violence, zones of peace: The child and school as post-conflict spaces. In L. E. Hancock & C. Mitchell (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and legitimacy: Interactions between national and local levels (pp. 141–170). London: Routledge.
- Mitchell, C. R. (2007). Comparing sanctuary in the former Yugoslavia and the Philippines. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 123–136). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Mitchell, C. R., & Hancock, L. E. (2007). Local zones of peace and a theory of sanctuary. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 189–221). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Mitchell, C. R., & Rojas, C. (2012). Against the stream: Colombian zones of peace under democratic security. In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes (pp. 39–67). London: New York: Continuum.
- Mouly, C. (2013). The Nicaraguan peace commissions: A sustainable bottom-up peace infrastructure [Article]. International Peacekeeping (13533312), 20(1), 48–66. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533312.2012.761833>.
- Mouly, C., Garrido, M. B., & Idler, A. (2016). How peace takes shape locally: The experience of civil resistance in Samaniego, Colombia. Peace & Change, 41(2), 129–166. <https://doi.org/10.1111/pech.12184>.
- Neumann, H. (2010). Reframing identities and social practices despite war [Article]. Peace Review, 22(2), 184–191. <https://doi.org/10.1080/10402651003751487>.
- Paffenholz, T. (2015). Unpacking the local turn in peacebuilding: A critical assessment towards an agenda for future research [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 857–874. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1029908>.
- Pardo-Herrera, C., & Victorino, R. (forthcoming). The illusion of peace: Rural Colombia in the post-agreement. The case of Policarpa. In L. E. H. Allen, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Plonski, S. (2005). Developing agency through peacebuilding in the midst of intractable conflict: The case of Israel and Palestine [Article]. Compare: A Journal of Comparative Education, 35(4), 393–409. <https://doi.org/10.1080/03057920500331454>.
- Poulligny, B. (2005). Civil society and post-conflict peacebuilding: Ambiguities of international programmes aimed at building ‘new’ societies [Article]. Security Dialogue, 36(4), 495–510. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0967010605060448>.
- Pugh, M. (2011). Local agency and political economies of peacebuilding [Article]. Studies In Ethnicity &

- Nationalism*, 11(2), 308–320. <https://doi.org/10.1111/j.1399-6576.2011.01113.x>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2012). Beyond local ownership in the architecture of international peacebuilding [Article]. Ethnopolitics, 11(4), 354–375. <https://doi.org/10.1080/17449057.2012.697650>.
- Richmond, O. P. (2013). Peace formation and local infrastructures for peace. Alternatives: Global, Local, Political, 38(4), 271–287.
- Richmond, O. P. (2014). The dynamics of peace formation. In Failed statebuilding (pp. 133–172). New Haven, CT: Yale University Press.
- Richmond, O. P., & Carey, H. F. (2005). Subcontracting peace: The challenges of the NGO peacebuilding. Aldershot, Hampshire, England; Burlington, VT: Ashgate.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mitchell, A. (2011). Peacebuilding and critical forms of agency: From resistance to subsistence [Article]. Alternatives: Global, Local, Political, 36(4), 326–344. <https://doi.org/10.1177/0304375411432099>.
- Richmond, O. P., & Mitchell, A. (2012). Hybrid forms of peace: From everyday agency to post-liberalism. Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire; New York: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Rigalo, K., & Morrison, N. (2007). Operation Lifeline Sudan. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 167–188). Bloomfield, CT: Kumarian Press.
- Rodríguez, M. (2012). Colombia: From grassroots to elites – how some peacebuilding initiatives became national in spite of themselves. In C. R. Mitchell & L. E. Hancock (Eds.), Local peacebuilding and national peace: Interaction between grassroots and elite processes (pp. 69–92). London, New York: Continuum.
- Rojas, C. (2007). Islands in the stream. In L. E. Hancock & C. R. Mitchell (Eds.), Zones of peace (pp. 71–90). Kumarian Press.
- Sanford, V. (2003). Peacebuilding in a war zone: The case of Colombian peace communities [Article]. International Peacekeeping (13533312), 10(2), 107–118.
- Santos, S., Jr. (2005). Peace zones in the Philippines: Concept, policy & instruments. Quezon City: Gaston Z. Ortigas Peace Institute & the Asia Foundation.
- Schierenbeck, I. (2015). Beyond the local turn divide: Lessons learnt, relearnt and unlearnt [Article]. Third World Quarterly, 36(5), 1023–1032. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01436597.2015.1043991>.
- Singer, M., & Wildavsky, A. B. (1993). The real world order: Zones of peace, zones of turmoil. Chatham, N.J.: Chatham House Publishers.
- Tyler, T. R. (2000). Social justice: Outcome and procedure [Article]. International Journal of Psychology, 35(2), 117–125.
- Valenzuela, P. (2009). Neutrality in internal armed conflicts: experiences at the grassroots level in Colombia [Originally presented as the author's thesis (doctoral), Uppsala University]. Uppsala.
- van Tongeren, P. (forthcoming). Local peace committees and how they relate to governments and peace agreements: Five examples from Africa. In S. Allen, L. E. Hancock, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Villanueva, L., Giraldo, C., Aristizábal, L. M. G., & Hernández, D. G. (forthcoming). Rural human networks in Granada: The challenges of sustaining peace infrastructures in a post-agreement phase. In S. Allen, L. E. Hancock, C. R. Mitchell, & C. Mouly (Eds.), Confronting peace: Local peace communities and post-agreement problems. London: Palgrave.
- Wilen, N. (2009). Capacity-building or capacity-taking? Legitimizing concepts in peace and development operations [Article]. International Peacekeeping (13533312), 16(3), 337–351. <https://doi.org/10.1080/13533310903036392>.